⁸ In this Case the Lawyers affirm, "That if one buy Wine, upon Condition that he'll come and measure it, and, being measured, will draw it at a certain Time; the Seller, after the Term, may pour out the Wine, to make use of the Hogsheads, having given Notice to the Buyer first." Licet autem venditori vel effundere vinum, si diem ad metiendum præstituit, nec intra diem admensum est; effundere autem non statim poterit, priusquam testando denunciaverit emptori, ut aut tollat vinum, aut sciat futurum, ut vinum effunderetur. Digest. lib. 18. tit. 6. De periculo & commodo rei venditæ, Leg. 1. § 3. It is true, that the Seller is more to be commended, if he uses not his Right, but sells the Wine as well as he can, or buys other Vessels for his Use, to favour the Buyer. Si tamen, cum posset effundere, non effudit, laudandus est potius — commodius est autem conduci vas, nec reddi vinum, nisi quanti conduserit, ab emptore reddatur, aut vendere vinum binâ fide, i. e. quantum sine ipsius incommodo fieri potest, operam dare, ut quam minimo detrimento sit ea res emptori. But it is doubtless a Precept of Right, opposite to the Rules and Laws properly so called, of which Mr. NOODT treats in his Julius Paulus, c. 10. & 11. The Permission is evidently unjust, and yet is not less full and entire in the foregoing Words; and it is noted with Reason, that GROTIUS did amiss in placing this Example in the Number of Things good and innocent, altho' it be commendable to abstain from it. Interdum enim licere dicitur, id quod rectum ex omni parte, piusque est, etiam si forte aliud quid fieri possit laudabilius, Lib. 3. ch. 4. § 2. num. 1. See J. SAMUEL STRYKIJ Traçt. de Jure Liciti sed non Honesti, Ch. 2. § 97. &c.

⁹ He that suffers the Loss, ought to have the Gain, according to the indisputable Proverb. If, for Example, a Piece of Ground be sold, and a Flood adds something to it, 'tis the Purchaser's Gain. Sed & si post emptionem fundo aliquid per alluvionem accesserit, ad emptoris commodum pertinet. Nam & commodum ejus esse debet, cujus periculum est. Inst. Lib. 3. tit. 24. De empt. & vend. § 3.

^a Ziegler ad Grat. l. 2. c. 12. f. 15. ^b Vid. supra, l. 4. c. 9. f. 5. ^c See above in B. 4. c. 9. f. 9. ^d Commodum ejus esse debet, cujus est periculum, Vid. Instit. l. 3. t. 24. f. 3. De empt. & vendit. ^e Vid. Instit. ibid. Vid. Caton. de re rusticâ, c. 80. ^f Vid. lib. 18. t. 2. l. 2. D. de in diem additæ.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § IV.

¹ The Words are, Quod si fignrit homo, qui venit, aut surreptus fuerit, ita ut neque dolus neque culpa venditoris intervenierit; annuacertendum erit, an custodiam ejus usque ad traditionem venditor suscepit. Sanè enim si suscepit, ad ipsius periculum is casus pertinet: Si non, locusus est. Instit. ibid.

² This is what the Lawyers call, Additio in diem, of which the Digests treat, Lib. 18. tit. 2. and thus define it, In diem additio ita fit: Ille fundus centum tibi emptus, nisi si quis intra Kalendas Januarias proximis meliorem conditionem fecerit, quo res à domino abeat. Leg. 1. ibid.

³ Nam si quis in hoc actum est, ut meliore aliâ conditione, discedatur, erit pura emptio, quæ sub conditione resolvitur: si autem hoc actum est, ut persisteret emptio, nisi melior conditio asseratur, erit emptio conditionalis. Ibid. Leg. 2.

⁴ Lex Commissoria is treated of Digest. Lib. 18. tit. 3. thus, "SI AD Diem Pecunia soluta non fit, ut Fundus inemptus sit, ita accipitur, inemptus esse fundus; si venditor eum inemptum esse velit, quia id venditoris causâ caveretur: nam si aliter acciperetur, exusta villa in potestate emptoris futurum, ut dando pecuniam inemptum faceret fundum, qui ejus periculo fuisset. Nam legem commissoriam, quæ in venditionibus additur, si volet, venditor exercebit: non etiam inuitus. — Sed si fundus reventisset, Aristò exstimabat, venditori de his [iuribus] judicium in emptorem dandum esse: quia nihil penes eum residere oporteret ex re, in quâ fidem sefellisset. Digest. ubi supra, Leg. 2, 3, 4.

⁵ That is to say, if the Seller think fit, for 'tis for his Sake, that this Clause is added; otherwise when a Thing sold with a Commissory Clause happens to be lost, it renders the Sale null, so as not to pay for it, and so the Seller loses both his Money and Goods.

claim them again with the Emolument ^a; or else the Goods may be kept in Possession, till the Payment be actually made; which last seems to be the safest Way, for generally this Clause is design'd in Favour of the Seller, to ^b save him from being put to any Trouble in quest of his Money; whereas, the Trouble would be the same, were he to recover his Goods out of the Hands of an ill Paymaster ^b.

⁷ Sometimes too either the Laws of the Land, or the Parties themselves grant one another the Liberty of breaking off the Bargain ^c, which is done several ways; for sometimes a Clause is ^d added, that upon Tender of the Price at any time, or by such a certain Day, the Buyer shall be obliged to restore the Goods to the Seller, or his Heirs ^d. And this certain Day may be express'd with a different Design, either to signify the Term, after which the Seller may have Power to break off the Bargain: or the Term, to which, and not longer, such a Liberty shall be granted. Where 'tis observable, that as this Power of redeeming is design'd in Favour of the Seller, who sometimes, upon urgent Occasions, is forc'd to part with that which he would not willingly lose for ever: So the fixing a Term to that Power, is in Favour of the Buyer; for it is to his Advantage, if he be not forc'd to quit the Possession of his Purchase in some short time, to be at length sure of the Perpetuity of it ^e. Sometimes too, when the Sale is made in Favour of the Seller, the Buyer is allow'd the liberty to bring back the Commodity whenever he pleases, or at such a certain time, and the Seller is oblig'd to refund the Money ^e. "The Emperor Marcus, in want of Money, having sold all his Imperial Furniture, afterwards gave leave to the Purchasers, for any of them, to bring back their Purchase, and receive their Money." Jul. Capitol.

Another more easy sort of Redemption, is what they call Jus recipiendi, or, the Privilege of the first Refusal, that is, if the Buyer be hereafter dispos'd to part with the Commodity, ¹⁰ he must let the Seller have the first Refusal at the same Rate he would sell it to another. In many Cases certain Persons pretend to this Privilege by Law; as the Landlord in ¹¹ the Sale of his Tenant's Stock, the Creditor in his ¹² Debtor's Goods, the Neighbour ¹³ in the Purchase of a neighbouring Farm, ¹⁴ any Member in a Thing that belongs to the Society, and the next of Kin, in the ¹⁵ Goods of their Relations, which is peculiarly call'd Retrañtus Gentilitius, or the Family Privilege ¹⁶.

Usual too it is, at the selling of Land, to except one Spot, and the Use of it; as Prodigals, when they sell their Estates, do sometimes reserve a Title to as much as may serve for their Grave, to which many think Virgil alludes, Ecl. 3. v. 104, 105.

Dic quibus in terris, & eris mihi magnus Apollo, Tres pateat cæli spatium non amplius ulcus.

Tell where the Round of Heaven, which all contains,
To three short Ells on Earth our Signat' retains.
Tell that, and rise Apollo for thy Pains.

Thus Menius, when he sold his House to the Censors for a Basilicon, reserved the Right of one Pillar to build upon, that from thence he and his Posterity might see the Gladiators that used to fight in the Forum ^f.

What the Divine Law prescribes about Redemption, may be read in Lev. xxv. 13, &c. &c. The ¹⁷ Reason of which Injunctions was taken from the particular Constitution of that Commonwealth founded by Moses; for his Design was that an equal Degree of Liberty should flourish amongst them; to which End it was necessary to hinder any from engrossing to themselves so much Land, ⁶ Or rather we run no Hazard here, whereas the other way there is great Hazard.

⁷ Retrañtus, seu pactum de Retrovendendo, as the Lawyers speak, and our Author terms it. Retrañtus comes of the Word ret-ahere, which according to the Roman Lawyers signifies, to resume, what has been alienated. See the Digests, lib. 50. tit. 8. De adm. nistrat. rer. ad Cicil. pertinentiam. Leg. 9. § 1. The Custom of Redeeming a Thing sold, allowed by the Law, is called a Legal Retrañting, but that which is done by the Agreement of Parties is a Conventional Retrañting. Some think this has a near Relation to a Bargain of Pawn. See Mr. THOMASIU'S Discourse, Intituled, De usu pratico accuratæ distinctionis inter emptionem cum pacto de Retrovendendo, & Contractum Pignoratitium. Printed at Hall, in 1707.

⁸ So the Code speaks, "Si fundum parentes tui eâ lege vendiderunt; ut sine ipsi, five hæredes eorum emptori pretium quantumcunque, vel intra certa tempora obtulissent, restitueretur; teque parato satisfacere conditioni dictæ, hæres emptoris non pareret, ut contractus fides servetur, actio præscriptis verbis, vel ex vendito tibi dabitur." Cod. lib. 4. tit. 54. De pactis inter empt. & venditores compositis. Leg. 2.

⁹ The Words of the Digest are, Si convenit, ut res quæ venit, si intra certum tempus displicisset, redderetur, ex empto actio est, &c. Digest. lib. 18. tit. 5. De rescindenda vendit. &c. Leg. 6. See tit. 1. De contrah. empt. Leg. 3. & lib. 21. tit. 1. De Edictis edicto, &c. Leg. 31. § 22.

¹⁰ The Laws is, "Qui fundum vendidit, ut eum certâ mercede conductum ipse habeat; vel si vendat, non alii, sed sibi distrahat, vel simile aliquid paciscatur: ad complendum id, quod pepigerunt, ex vendito agere poterit." Digest. lib. 18. tit. 1. De contrah. Empt. Leg. 75.

¹¹ So the Code has it, Et si quidem hoc dominus dare voluerit, & tantam præstare quantitatem, quantum ipse revera emphyteuta ab alio recipere potest, ipsum dominum omnimodo hæc comparare. Cod. lib. 4. tit. 66. De jure emphyt. Leg. 3.

¹² In this last Case, the Creditor, to whom much is due, must be preferred according to the Roman Law. Cum bona veniant debitoris, in comparationem extranei, & ejus qui creditor cognatusve sit, potior habetur creditor cognatusve: magis tamen creditor quam cognatus; & inter creditores potior is, cui major pecunia debetur. Digest. lib. 42. tit. 5. De rebus Auctoritate Judic. possid. &c. Leg. 16.

¹³ See the Greek Novel of Romanus called Lecapene, which is abridg'd by Cajacius, Feud. lib. 5. tit. 15. By a Law of the Code the Inhabitants of a principal City could not sell their Possessions to any, but to one of the same City, Lib. 11. tit. 55. N. licere habitatoribus Metrocomiæ, loca sua ad extraneam transferre.

¹⁴ As for Example, those that are Legatees in common. See Cod. lib. 8. tit. 54. De Donationibus, Leg. 34. §. 2. & Fiduciæ Lib. 5. tit. 14. &c.

¹⁵ See the Law quoted above Note 12. of this §. and Digest lib. 4. tit. 3. De Minoribus, &c. Leg. 35. & lib. 10. tit. 1. De contrahend. Emptione. Leg. 62. Princ.

¹⁶ Here the Quotation out of the Law of Moses, and what our Author says upon it, ought to be placed.

¹⁷ For, says our Author lower, in a Parenthesis, I do not approve the Reason alledged by Grotius upon v. 23. that it is more easy to find a Dwelling and Subsistence. But Grotius explains here only how one might sell the Fee-simple of an House in a City, and not a Country House.

^a Vid. Lib. 18. tit. 3. leg. 5. D. de lege Commissor: de pactis inter empt. & vendit. compositis, leg. 2.

^b Vid. L. 2. 3. D. d. t.

^c Vid. Liv. l. 31. c. 13.

^c Retrañtus.

^d Fid. C. lib. 4. t. 50.

^e ad hæcisse creditur. Alcon. Ped. in Divin. Cicer. c. 16. p. 328. Ed. Græc.

^f Unde Menianorum nomen ejusmodi projectis

^g Upon which place see Mr. Le Clerc.

Land, as might make others, divested of their Patrimony, dependent on them; for so by degrees, Lordship and¹⁸ Tyranny might be introduc'd. The same End did^a Lycurgus propose to himself, when he divided the Territories of Sparta into 39000 Parts: which he distributed among the People by Lot; and forbid them to increase, diminish, subdivide, or sell. Among the Lacedemonians it was held unlawful and dishonourable to sell Land that had been a long time in the Family. Heracl. de Pol.

Besides, there is another common way of Selling, which they call per aversionem, where Things of different Value are not rated separately, but sold together.

Lastly, Things are sometimes so sold, as to return again to the Seller after a certain Term of Years, without his being oblig'd to refund the Price. Thus, in England Gentlemen sell their Ground for 30, or 35 Years, upon Condition that the Buyer shall build upon it after such a particular manner; when sort of Contract is something like that of Renting.

V. As for any other Obligations between the Buyer and the Seller, they easily appear from the Nature of the Contract, and the additional Pacts. The Buyer is oblig'd to pay the Price agreed for at the time appointed, and to give the Receiver a good Title to it, I mean, 'to pay him with his own, and not another Man's Money^b. And if he pays another Man's Money, and it happens to be challeng'd by the Owner, he is oblig'd to pay it over again, and as much more as the Receiver loses, by having it thus challeng'd. As for the Seller, he is oblig'd^c to deliver the Goods bargain'd for with such Qualities as the common Nature of Contracts, or^d the particular Agreement requires, and that too at the time appointed^e. And if, between the Completion of the Bargain, and the Delivery of the Goods, the Seller should repent, and be desirous to return the Money with Amends, 'the Buyer nevertheless is not oblig'd to accept it; but may force him to stand to his Bargain, unless in point of good Nature he be otherwise persuaded; but if, through the Default and Knavery of the Seller, the Delivery cannot be made, the Money together^f with Damages is to be restored. What the Law is, when the Seller is not in the Fault, we have said above.

¹⁸ Our Author here relates a Sale in gross, and chiefly, per aversionem, as the Lawyers speak; but, besides that he speaks something of it in the beginning of § 6. we may see that 'tis not fitly placed here, where he treats, not of the divers Sorts of Sales, but only of the Terms and Conditions added to a Bargain and Sale, whether by Wholesale or Retail. Wherefore I have been bold to leave out this short Period, equally superfluous, and fit to confound our Understandings.

^a Pleat. in Vitul. ^b Vid. D. lib. 19. t. 1. leg. 11. f. 2. & C. lib. 49. leg. 7. & leg. 13. f. 19. D. ubi sup. ^c Vid. l. 11. f. 1, &c. D. de A. empt.

MR. BARB. NOTES on §. v.

¹ Emptor autem nummus traditoris facere cogitur. Digest. lib. 19. tit. 1. De actionibus empti, & venditi, Leg. 11. § 2. See Cod. lib. 4. tit. 49. Leg. 7. For want of Payment at the time, the Buyer ought to pay the Interest of his Money. Ex vendito alicui venditori competit ad ea consequenda, quae ei ab emptore prestari oportet. Veniant autem in hoc iudicium infra scripta: In primis pretium, quanti res venit: item usurae pretii post diem traditionis: Nam cum re emptor fruatur, aequissimum est eum usuras pretii pendere. Dig. Lib. 13. § 19. 20.

² The Interpreters of the Roman Law do not agree here; for some think the same thing ought to be delivered, if it be in our Power; but others affirm, that if we do not put it into the hands of the Buyer, yet he is discharged from paying Damages or Interest. See Vinnius upon the Institutes, lib. 3. tit. 24. prin. where he recites and confutes, at the same time, the Reasons of the last. Mr. Van Eck nevertheless takes their Part, but observes, at the same time, in his Principia Juris Civilis, under the Title De Actionibus Empti & Venditi, § 9. "That this Case ought not to give any great Trouble to the Judges or Lawyers, because the Damages and Interests may surpass the Value of the Thing itself; and in so doing it becomes very hard to keep what "is sold up to the Price it was sold for." Mr. Thomasius says, "That he fell into this Mistake by misunderstanding some Laws, "where 'tis said, that the Seller, for want of delivering his Goods, ought to bear the Loss and Interest." These Laws suppose that the Thing sold either can't be deliver'd, because it is perished, or is grown worse by the Seller's Fault, or that it ought not to be delivered, because the Buyer has no occasion for it; as when Provisions are not brought in at the Time agreed on, and so the Buyer has no way but to be contented with reasonable Damages. Whereupon some imagine, tho' improperly, that a Seller has his Choice, either to deliver the Goods, or pay Damages and Costs. See the Discourse, De Pretio affectionis. Sec. c. 2. §. 8. However this be, this Choice is directly contrary to the natural Intention of a Bargain and Sale, and very hurtful to Commerce.

³ The Law is, Ex empto actione is, qui emit, utitur; & in primis sciendum est, in hoc iudicio id demum deduci, quod praestari convenit. Cum enim sit bonae fidei iudicium, nihil magis bonae fidei convenit, quam id praestari, quod inter contrahentes actum est: Quod si nihil convenit, tunc ea praestabuntur, quae naturaliter insunt hujus iudicii potestate. Et imprimis ipsam rem praestare venditorum oportet, id est, tradere: Quae res, si quidem dominus fuit venditor, facit & emptorem dominam. Si non fuit, tantum evictionis nomine venditorem obligat; si modo pretium est numeratum, aut eo nomine satisfaciunt. Digest. Lib. 19. tit. 1. § 12.

⁴ On the other Side, the Buyer can't, unless the Seller consent to it, avoid taking the Thing sold, and pay for it. This Consent is so necessary by the Roman Law, that unless we will pay double, or can obtain a Rescript from the Emperor, the other Contractor can't be oblig'd against his Will, to forsake his Bargain, and neither the Treasury nor Soldiers have any Privilege here. De contractu venditionis & Emptionis jure perfecto, alterutro invito, nullo recedi tempore bona fides patitur; nec ex Rescriptis nostris, quo jure filium nostrum uti, sepe constitutum est, ----- Quamvis enim duplum afferas pretium emptori, tamen invitus ad rescindendam venditionem urgeri non debet. Cod. Lib. 4. tit. 44. De rescind. Vendit. Leg. 3 & 6. See Leg. 7. which is a Rescript directed to A. A. Maraculus, and other Soldiers. But as sometimes Pledges must be given (a Circumstance which our Author ought not to forget) it is good to know what Liab'd they produce. Mr. Thomasius hath published a Discourse on this Subject in 1702, quoted once before, and which is reduced to this in general: He says, "That it belongs to the Seller alone to give Earnest commonly, "and this is at the same Time a Proof that the Bargain is made, and a Security of executing the Engagements entred into. As to the last, either they oblige to the Penalty imposed in case of Delay, either in the Seller, who delivers not his Goods at the Time, or in the Buyer, who pays not at the Term fixed; insomuch that the one loses his Earnest, and the other pays double, and yet is no less bound to stand to his Bargain; or they leave a liberty to recant, so that a Man is discharged from all Losses, and this is presumed in a doubtful Case, or when the Parties are otherwise agreed. But if the Bargain be broke by Consent, he that has received the Earnest is oblig'd to restore it: But if the Engagements on both Sides be performed, the Earnest must be restored or deducted in the Payment. Mr. Thomasius looks upon it as certain, that Earnest is never given but when the Market is ended, and the Bargain made; which he shows as to agree well with the Principles of the Roman Law, altho' the Interpreters of it usually draw other Conclusions from it. I shall content myself to recite what is said in the Institutes: Nam quod arrha nomine datur, argumentum est emptoris & venditoris contractus ----- Ita tamen impud. eis (emptori & venditori) recedere conceditur, nisi jure arrharum nomine aliquid fuerit datum. Hec enim subsequitur, sive in scriptis, sive sine scriptis conditis celebrata est. Is qui recusat adimplere contractum, si quidem est emptor, perdit quod dedit: Si vero venditor, duplum restituere compellitur, licet super arrha nihil expresserit. Lib. 3. tit. 24. princip.

⁵ The Words of the Digests are, Nec videtur abesse [dolos malus] si per eum factum est aut fiet, quo minus fundum emptor possidet. Erit ergo ex empto actio, non ut venditor vacuum possessionem tradat; cum multis modis accidere poterit, ut tradere possit, sed ut ----- dolus malus ejus aestimaretur. Dig. lib. 18. tit. 1. De contr. empt. Leg. 68. § 2.

6 But if a Man sells the same Thing to Two, and has as yet deliver'd it to neither, without doubt the first Bargain ought to take place; and much rather, if the Thing has been already deliver'd to him. But yet, in this case, the knavish Seller ought to make Satisfaction to the last Purchaser, for whatsoever Loss he is at by being thus disappointed. But supposing the Delivery to have been made to the last, he, upon the Grounds of the Civil Law, will be prefer'd to the other: For he receiv'd the Thing of the Owner upon a just Title; and the first can have no Action against him; not a real one, for he was not yet Master of the Thing; nor a personal, for no Intercourse had pass'd between them; neither can the Seller have any Pretence to revoke the Bargain ^a ^b. Grotius ^c too, in this Case, prefers the Title of the last, Because by the Delivery of the Thing, the Buyer makes over all his Right, which is not done by promising to sell it. But here Grotius does not seem to be consistent with himself; indeed the Promise to sell is not selling, but yet he had asserted, that the Property is made over at the very Moment of Contract, altho' the Thing be not delivered: And therefore after such a Sale, no Right can remain in the Seller, any further than what tends to the Delivery of the Thing into the Hands of the Buyer; and consequently whatsoever Bargain the Seller concludes afterwards, it is null, and cannot stand in Prejudice of him, who before has got a Right to it. And this being granted, I question whether the favourable Plea of Possession, thus unjustly acquired, can always hurt the Title of the first Purchaser. Moreover, since a Man does not lose his Right in a Thing by being deprived of the Possession of it, and since a Man may honestly come by the Possession of another's Goods; if therefore such a Possessor sells a Thing to a third Person, he does not extinguish the Right of the Owner; nor can he transfer to another a better Title than ⁷ he had himself. And therefore, although the Design of the Buyer be to acquire a Property in the Thing, yet since the Thing, which is thus sold, either ignorantly, or designedly, is another Man's, it is as much as can be expected, if the Seller ⁸ gives the Buyer free Possession, and puts him in Power of using it, and bears him harmless, ⁹ if his Title be disputed ^d.

VI. There is also a peculiar sort of Sale, where the Purchase is no certain Thing, but Hope and Expectation only, on which, by Agreement of the Parties, a Price is laid. Nor is there ¹ any Default in this sort of Sale, altho' afterward the Thing happens to be above, or below the Price. The same obtains at Auctions, and where Things of different Prices are sold altogether ² at a Lump; for all such sort of Bargains have something ³ of Chance in them ^e: Such as was the Cast of a Net ^f, bought of the Milesians Fishermen, which occasioned a famous Suit between the Fishermen and the Buyer of the Cast; for they having drawn out a golden Table in their Net, the Buyer claim'd it as his, for that he had bought whatever should be taken, or the Fortune of the Cast: whereas the Fishermen, on the other side, contend'd that the Bargain had regard only to what Fish should be caught. And indeed they seem to have been in the right, for in explaining any Contract we ought to consider the Intent of the Contractors; and here 'tis evident, they had no Thoughts of Gold, but of Fish only; nor does it make for the Buyer, that it was a Purchase of Chance; for that was only design'd to extend to the Quantity of Fish, and not to any Thing else, which by great Fortune might come to the Net. And therefore the Table ought to be look'd upon as a Treasure found by Chance.

As for the Decision of the Oracle, which adjudg'd it to the wisest, that plainly favour'd of the ⁴ crafty Covetousness of the Priests, who there by bid fair for the procuring such a glorious Prey to themselves: For what Mortal would arrogate to himself the Title of the Wiseest Man? According to that of Sophoc. Antigone, 257. Edit. H. Steph. All Priests are greedy of Gain. See Val. Max. l. iv. c. 1. f. 7. inter externa. Mornac. add. l. xii. D. de Act. emp. &c.

VII. In this place something may be expected to be said concerning Monopolies, Whether any, or all of them be against the Law of Nature, or no? For 'tis an odious Name, and the Laws of many States brand it grievously. But here we must exempt several Things from the invidious Title of Monopolies, which indeed are not such. For sure 'tis prohibited by no Law, nor can it come under the Name of a Monopoly, if only one Man, in any Town, has got the way of making some sort of Manufacture, or if one Man only has got such a sort of Grain in his Ground, or if some certain Commodity be the Produce only of one particular Country. "Since there is no such Produce of Alume in any other Country, which yet is of great Use, it is not to be wonder'd at, that the Lipareans have the Monopoly of it, and setting what Prices they please upon it, make vast

" Re-

⁶ So the Code tells us, Quotiens duobus in solidum praedium distrabitur iure: manifesti juris est, cum cui priori traditum est, in detinendo dominio esse potiore. Cod. lib. 3. tit. 32. De rei vindicatione, Leg. 15. See Digest. lib. 6. tit. 2. De publicana in rem actione, Leg. 9. § 4.

⁷ The Words of the Digests are. Traditio nihil amplius transferre debet, vel potest, ad eum qui accipit, quam est apud eum qui tradit. Si igitur quis dominium in fundo habuit, id tradendo transfert: Si non habuit, ad eum qui accipit nihil transfert. Digest. lib. 41. tit. 1. De acquir. rerum Domin. Leg. 20.

⁸ Sive tota res evincatur, sive pars, habet regressum emptor in venditorem. Digest. lib. 21. tit. 2. De evictionibus, &c.

⁹ Quod sine ullius damno pars, quae putatur esse vendentis, per longam possessionem ad emptorem transit. Digests lib. 41. tit. 2. De acquir. & amit. Possess. Leg. 43. princ.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § VI.

¹ Tho' there comes nothing of it: Aliquando tamen, & sine re venditio intelligitur, veluti cum quasi alca emitur: quod fit, cum captus piscium, vel avium, vel missilium emitur. Emptio enim contrahitur, etiamsi nihil inciderit: quia spei emptio est. Digests lib. 18. De contrah. empt. Leg. 8. § 1.

² Per averfionem, an Expression of the Roman Law: As for Example, in Law 62. § 2. of the Title last mentioned, Res in averfione emptae, si non dolo venditoris factum fit, ad periculum emptoris pertinet, etiamsi res assignata non fit. See Cujas Observ. 8. 15.

³ Veluti cum futurum factum retis à Piscatore emittitur, aut indaginem plagis positus à venatore, aut pantheram ab aucupe. Dig. lib. 19. tit. 1. De actionibus empti & venditi. Leg. 11. § 18.

⁴ The Greek is, τὸ μάκιστος γὰρ πρὶν φαίεσθαι γένεσθαι. Soph. in Antigon. p. 257. Edit. H. Steph. See Mr. Vandale, in his Treatise De Oraculis, & de Idololatria & superstitione, or Mr. Fontenelles History of Oracles.

^a Adl. lib. 6. t. 2. l. 9. f. 4. D. de publicana in rem actione. ^b Adl. C. lib. 3. t. 32. De rei vin lic. leg. 15. ^c Adl. d. l. f. 15. ^d Adl. Plant. Perf. Act. 4. Sc. 4. ^e Vid. l. 39. t. 4. l. 9. princ. D. de Publicanis. But yet add Plin. l. 8. Ep. 2. See Sueton. in August. c. 75.

^f Concerning which see lib. 18. t. 1. l. 8. D. de contrah. empt. l. 11. f. 18. l. 12. De ad. empt. ^g Plut. in Solon, p. 80. Edit. Wech. says between the Fishermen of Cos, and a Milesian Stranger, Dio. Laert. lib. 1. t. 23. between some young Men of Ionia, and the Milesian Fishermen in Theleto.

“ Returns. Diod. Sic. l. v. c. 10. p. 293. Ed. Rhodom. For Monopolies, as such, imply that others too would sell the same, did not one Man ingross the whole Trade to himself. And therefore, he who alone brings a Commodity from a foreign Country, cannot be said to set up a Monopoly, provided he does not hinder others from importing the same. Nor is it unlawful for any Nation, that abounds in one particular Commodity, to bargain with another Nation to let them only have the Trade of it ^a, for any one may sell his own when and to whom he pleases; indeed when we happen to have a Superfluity of what another cannot be without, then the Law of Humanity requires, that we should not make such a Bargain to the Prejudice of others. But if a Man, without contracting with the Owners, should of his own Head aim at a Monopoly, by hindring some by Force, and others by clandestine Contrivances, from coming to the same Place, and by that means lay a Necessity upon all others to buy of him, it is plain that he offends against the Law of Humanity, and impudently breaks in upon the Liberty of the rest.

As for Monopolies among private Citizens, it cannot be accounted illegal, or oppressive, that every one is not allowed to set up what Trade he pleases, but those only who have gain'd a right by the Charter of the Corporation; thus in most Cities of Europe no Man can open a Shop, or betake himself to any particular Trade, but he who has served some time an Apprenticeship at it, for it is not enough that he is expert in it.

Besides, the Magistrate may give one Man, or one Company of Men the sole Power of Importing certain Commodities from certain Places, exclusive of all others. And there may be several good Reasons for the granting such a Privilege. For it requires vast Charges to settle a Trade with a very remote Nation, and perhaps after great Expenses it may not succeed at all; and therefore the Authors of such a Commerce ought in reason to have Security, that others may not intercept gratis what they have establish'd at their great Risque and Charge; and besides such privileg'd Companies are better able to assist the Publick with their Riches, upon any Emergencies, than private Persons: By this means too a greater Trade may be carried on, and with better Credit: Nor is this Method liable to so many Tricks and Shifts, since the Gain comes into the common Bank to be divided proportionably amongst them all. But as for these Privileges, a prudent Government will not grant 'em, but where the Commodities are imported from remote Places, and with great Hazard; and which do not so much concern the Necessaries as the Superfluities of Life. Nor even then must the Merchants be allowed to enhance the Price of those Things at their Pleasure; for it is against Reason to give a few an opportunity of scraping up exorbitant Riches out of the Fortunes of the rest, when the Publick gets nothing by it.

Lastly, It seems unjust that Tradesmen, or Farmers should be forced to sell their Manufactures, or the Produce of their Ground to certain People only, who sell the same to others by Retail; for by this Means the Riches of the State may come into the Hands of a few, to the Detriment and Oppression of the rest.

I cannot but take notice, by the way, that Grotius ^a brings the Example of Joseph, when he was Viceroy of Egypt, in Justification of Monopolies; tho' that Example is not much to the Purpose: For neither did the King hinder others from buying up the Corn in the Years of Plenty, nor any from selling, who had too much: Neither had the Alexandrians in Strabo ^b the Monopoly of Indian and Ethiopic Commodities from any Privilege, but from the Situation of the Place.

But a Monopoly, properly so call'd, as having the Force of a Privilege, cannot be set on foot by private Men: For how can a private Man justify his hindring others from meddling with their share of Commodity, when he has no Command over, nor can lawfully use Force against them? and therefore the Monopolies of private Men are spurious and illegal, and do not depend upon Rights and Privileges, but are generally carried on by clandestine Frauds and Combinations: As if some few by a Trick should debar others from Trading to those Places from whence they have their Commodities, or should hinder those that have them from bringing them to Market: Or, if they should enter into a Combination to buy up all such sort of Commodities, and then stifle them, that so the Scarcity may enhance the Price. Against whom may be apply'd that of Apollonius Tyanicus in Philostr. l. i. c. 12. in the Beginning ². “ The Earth is the Mother of all, for she is just; but you being unjust have made her only “ a Mother to your selves.” The Knavery of such ought as much to be corrected, as those who ^c enter into Compact to raise extravagantly the Prices of other Things, by agreeing privately to sell nothing under such a Rate: Which piece of Roguery Labourers and Workmen are sometimes guilty of ^d.

I cannot discommend the Sagacity of Thales, who rented all the Olive-yards, having foreseen by his Skill in Astrology, that there would be great Plenty of Olives that Year ^e ^f.

MR. BARB. NOTES on § VII.

¹ See above Lib. 3. c. 3. § 6. Et lib. 4. c. 5. § 10.

² The Greek is, Ἡ γῆ πάντων μητέρα, δικαιοτατός τε ἔστιν ἡμῶν ὅτι ἀδικίας ὄντων, παροίκαται ἡμῶν ἀποφύμνον μὴδέα, Philostrat. de vita Apoll. Tyan. lib. 1. c. 15. in fin. Ed. Olear.

^a L. 2. c. 12. f. 16.

^b L. 17. p. 549. Ed. Gen. Casaub.

^c Ut in Velabro Olearii de quo vide Erasim. Adag.

^d Add. Plin. l. 8. c. 37. de crinaceo, L. un. C. de Monopol. l. 6. D. de extraord. crim. and Cujacius Obs. 10. 19. • Arist. Pol. l. 1. c. 7. (11) Diog. Laert. l. 1. f. 26.

^f Vid. Cicero. de Divinitat. l. 1. c. 49.

CHAP. VI.

Of Renting and Hiring.

- I. What Things Hiring hath common with Buying.
- II. The certain Use of a Thing, if it be intercepted, tends to the Loss of the Lessor.
- III. The uncertain regularly to the Loss of the Lessee.
- IV. Whether the same Work may be Let to many together.

Renting and Hiring^a, whereby the Use of a Thing, or Labour is granted for a certain Rate^b, bears some Affinity to Buying and Selling, and may be brought under almost the same Rules^c. For the Rent or Wages answers the Price; and the Use of the Thing or the Labour answers the Property which is acquired by Buying; and as the Contract of Buying and Selling is compleated, when the Price is agreed upon, so is this of Renting and Hiring, when the Parties are agreed about the Rent and Wages^d. And as a Thing sells the cheaper, when sold in Favour of the Seller, and the dearer when in Favour of the Buyer; so in Renting and Hiring, if a Man is at a Loss for a Tenant, or wants Work, he is contented with small Rent or Wages; but if his Land or Work is sought after, he may demand much greater. Lastly, as in Buying and Selling 'tis generally the Seller's Business to name the Price^e, and the Buyer ultimately resolves upon it; so is it also in Renting and Hiring^f. "Whose Business is it to assign the Price? He who delivers the Thing, or he that receives it? He who delivers it seems to leave it to the other: As they say Protogoras used to do, for whatever he taught, he left it to the School to set a Value upon what he learn'd, and was paid accordingly." Arist. Nic. l. ix. c. 1. Tho' concerning this Custom of Protogoras he himself thus speaks in Pluto, in the Dialogue that bears his Name. "My way is this, when I have taught any one, if he pleases, he gives me as much Money as I demand; if not I bring him into the Temple, and make him declare upon Oath what he thinks my Teaching is worth, and so much I receive." But as he who buys any Commodity, without agreeing upon the Price, is suppos'd to oblige himself to the common Price of it; so in this Contract, if Terms are not agreed upon, it is left to the Equity of the Person Renting or Hiring, who is nevertheless oblig'd to give as much as is usually given^g. That way of paying for a Work of Pleasure, which Aristotle^h mentions, is a perfect Cavil. *A certain Person promis'd a Musician the better he play'd, the more he should be rewarded. The next Day, when the Musician claim'd his Promise, he reply'd that he had repay'd Pleasure with Pleasure*ⁱ. But Aristotle was right in saying, He had as good received nothing, since he did not receive that which he expected. Rectius similem cavillationem adhibuit Bochoris apud Plutarchum, Demetrio, pag. 901. D. Quum quidam amaret Thonidem meretricem, poposcit illa ingentem pecunie summam. Adolescens inde, cum in somnis suis visus esset cum illa concumbere, liberatus est libidine. Ob id mercedem ab illo infisit Thonis judicio exigere. Cognita causa jussit Bochoris illi quantum pestulaverat Thonis argenti in vas numeratum huc atque illuc manu jacture, ac meretricem umbra frui. Quanquam sententiam hanc arguit Lamia iniquitatis. Neque enim, inquit, ademit meretrici umbra pecunie cupiditatem, somnium vero amore adolescentem expedivit. In this Contract also, if any Damage happens to the Labourer, whilst he is about his Work^j, 'tis his own Loss, and not the Hirer's^k. Among the Ephesians there was a remarkable Law concerning Architects, that if the Charge in Building amounted to a fourth Part more than what the Architect had computed it, he was bound to make it good out of his own Pocket^l.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on Chap. VI. § I.

¹ The Words are, Locatio & conductio proxima est emptioni & venditioni, utriusque juris regulis consistit. Nam ut emptio & venditio ita contrahitur, si de pretio convenerit, sic & locatio & conductio ita contrahi intelligitur, si merces constituta sit: Et competit locatori locati actio, conductori vero conducti. Instit. Lib. 3. tit. 25. Quæri solet de locatione & conductione, si forte rem aliquam utendam vel fruendam tibi aliquis detulit. Ibid. § 2. At cum de ut facias, si tale sit factum, quod locari solet, puta ut tabulam pingas, pecunia data, locatio erit. Digest. lib. 19. tit. 5. De Præscriptis verbis, &c. Leg. 5. § 2. See more of this Matter in Mr. DAUMAT'S Civil Laws in their Natural Order. Part. 1. lib. 1. tit. 4.

² The Contract of Hiring may be renewed by a tacit hiring anew, when the Time being expired, the Tenant continues to enjoy the Thing hired without any Opposition from the Lessor; for, in this Case, both of them are supposed to enlarge the Contract for the same Time, and on the same Conditions. Qui impleto tempore conductionis remansit in conductione, reconduxit præsumitur. ----- ipso jure, sed non in perpetuis annis. Digest. lib. 19. tit. 2. Locati, &c.

³ Plautus's Latin is, § A. In illa sic pretium. DO. Tua merx est, tua indicatio est. And Aristotle's Greek is, Ὅ γὰρ αἰσίο- πος ὁ ἄλλοις ὄντιν τῶν ἐπιτην (τῶ ἀρχαίων)

⁴ Here, as in a Matter of Sale, every one may make his Market as advantageous as possible for himself. Quemadmodum in emendo & vendendo naturaliter concessum est, quod plaris sit minoris emere; quod minoris sit plaris vendere, & ita in locum se circumferre, ita in locati verbis & conductionis juris est. Dig. lib. 19. tit. 2. Locat. & Cond. Leg. 22. § 3.

⁵ This was done by Dionysius the Tyrant, to one that played on the Flute to him, to whom he had promised a great Reward.

⁶ Aristotle's Greek is, Ὅταν γὰρ τῶ ἄλλοις γινώσκων, ἔταν δ' ἰσίοι μὴ τυχεύων.

⁷ For Example, If a Smith, in working for us, break his Hammer or Anvil, we are not bound to pay for them. Nam etsi Faber inciderit aut malleum fraxerit, non imputaretur ei, qui locaverit opus. Digest. lib. 14. tit. 2. De Lege Rhodiâ, &c. Leg. 2. § 1. In like manner, if a Transport Ship, being shattered by a fierce Tempest, is forced to put in at some Place to amend any Defect, the Expence must fall on the Owner of the Vessel, and not on the Passengers. Naves adversâ tempestate depressæ, cum fulminibus deultis armamentis & arbore, & antennâ, Hippomen delata est, ibique tumultuariis armamentis ad præsens comparatis Offitium navigavit, & onus integrum pertulit: Quæsitum est an hi, quorum onus fuit, navis pro damno contære debeant? Respondit, Non achere. Hic enim sanctus infraen le magis navis, quam conservandam mercium gratia factus est. Ib. Leg. 6.

^a Locatio & Conductio. ^b V. Instit. ibid. & l. 3. t. 25. princ. ^c V. Instit. ibid. & l. 19. t. 2. D. locati. Which yet how it may be usefully prolong'd. V. l. 13. f. 11. l. 14. D. b. t. ^d Plaut. Pers. Act. 4. Sc. 4. v. 37. "Tis your Ware, you ought to set the Price." ^e See Mit. 20. 4. 7. ^f Nicom. 1.9. c. 1. V. l. & Plut. de avatione, p. 41. D. & de fortuna Alexandri, p. 333, 334. ^g Vid. lib. 14. t. 2. l. 2. t. 2. l. 2. f. 1. l. 6. D. de lege Rhodiâ. ^h Vid. Vitzuz. l. 10. princ.

II. But

II. But if a Man rents a Thing, and any Accident intercepts the Use of it, or renders it worse, Ought the Loss to be the Landlord's, or the Tenant's? To which some answer, in short, that if the Thing itself perishes¹, the Loss belongs to the Landlord; but as for Barrenness and other Mischances, which intercept only the Use of it, they are, unless provided against by Covenant, generally at the Loss of the Tenant: And the Landlord may justly demand the full Rent agreed upon, although perhaps the Tenant has not made so much of his Land as was expected. For, the Landlord gave the Tenant Power to make the best of it; and the Hopes of the Produce, when they made the Bargain, was really worth so much; and therefore since he made good his Part, 'tis but fair that the other should also make good his.

But to canvas this Question more nicely; 'tis manifest, ² when the Thing perishes without the Tenant's Fault, he is not oblig'd to make it good, but from that time his Rent ceases. For the Title to the whole Rent is founded upon Presumption that the Thing be in Being, during the Time included in the Contract; but if the Thing ceases to be, the Contract ceases also³. And upon this is founded the Law of Sesstris an Egyptian King: That if the Violence of the River should wash away any part of the Land, the Tenant should be proportionably abated in his Rent^b. Again, we must distinguish between those things, where the Landlord may and ought to assign⁴ a certain and determin'd Use; and those, whose Use, as to Quantity, is uncertain, and depends upon Chance, and which, upon that Account, neither can, nor ought to be determin'd. To instance in the former sort; I hire a House to dwell in, which my Landlord is oblig'd to make habitable, and therefore if the Violence of a Storm, or my Neighbour's Fire should intercept the Use of it⁵, I may fairly withhold in Proportion so much of the Rent. For the Rent was determin'd for the Use, which the House, in the Condition it was in at the making of the Bargain, was capable of affording during the whole Time I had hired it for; the Use being lessened without any Fault of mine, the Rent ought to be lessened also, and if the House be immediately repaired without any extraordinary inconvenience, or Loss to me^c. And so, if

M. BARB. NOTES on § II.

¹ This is the Opinion of GROTIUS, lib. 2. c. 12. § 18. where, to take notice by the Bye, Græcæ has been very badly. Structures non no perit; for he makes that great Man say, That if a Thing be bought, and once deliver'd to the Buyer, it must be accounted to him who is actually the Owner of it, and not his whose it was. A strange thing! as it is here questioned it! He need not be very acute to see, that GROTIUS speaks, on the contrary, of a Thing sold, but not deliver'd; and nevertheless, according to what is said in the beginning of § 15, is to be at the Hazard and Peril of the Buyer, whose Loss it makes parallel with that of Fruits, which being sold, and entered, as we may say, delivered to the Farmer, yet the Loss belongs to the Owner: Even so a Thing sold is supposed to be delivered to the Buyer, altho' it remains some time in the Seller's Hands.

² The Words of the Digests are, Si ager terræ motu corruperit, ut nunquam sit, damno domini esse; operere enim agrum præstare conductori, ut frui possit. Dig. lib. 19. tit. 2. locati & cond. Leg. 15. § 2. Si casus latrones citra tuam fraudem abegisse probari potest, judicio locati causeri præstare non cogeris: atque temporis, quod insecutum est, mercede ut indebitas recuperabis. Ibid. Leg. 9. § 4.

³ As the Author applies himself only to treat of the Question about Accidents, that happen to the Thing hired, and does only by the Bye, and in an imperfect manner, shew the Engagements of him who lets his Goods or Labour, I shall supply this Defect in a few Words. I. He then that lets out his Estate, ought, 1. To put the Thing into a Condition to be serviceable for what it is hired, and for the Time fixed, as also in the Manner and Way agreed on. 2. To uphold it in that Condition, as long as it depends on him, and to that end, to be at all necessary Expenses, or reimburse the Tenant for them, at least, if he be not engaged by Contract to do them himself. See Law. 15. § 1. Tit. locati, conducti, quoted Note 5 below. In conducto si quis, si conductor pro operâ aliquid necessario vel utiliter auxerit, vel ædificaverit, vel inlaturit, cum id non concernisset, ad recipienda ea quæ impendit cu conducto cum domino fundi experiri potest. Ibid. Leg. 55. § 1. See also Leg. 61. of the same Title. 3. To leave the Thing to the Tenant, till the Time that 'tis hired for is expired, at least, if there happen no Case which may probably be expected, if it were foreseen; as, if the Master of an House hath need of it himself, or will make some necessary Repair, if the Tenant pays no Rent for a considerable Time, or pulls down the House, or useth it so that it may be feared he'll set it on Fire, or does in it, or suffers some unlawful Trade to be maintained. Ædii, quar te conductum habere dicis, si pensionem domino in solidum solvisti, invitum te expelli non oportet, nisi propriis visibus Dominus eam necessariam esse probaverit, aut corrigere domum malaverit, aut tu male in re locati versata es. Cod. lib. 4. tit. 65. De locato & conducto, Leg. 3. See also Leg. 15. & Digest. lib. 19. tit. 2. Leg. 30. prin. 35. 54. § 1. 56. 61. & Nov. 14. c. 1. A Sale, and in general every Alienation of Property, made in Favour of him who is not the Heir General, dissolves also the Contract of Hiring (see Mr. HARTWELL'S Paræmia Jur. Germ. lib. 1. c. 47.) but so that the Land sold, and those that represent him, are obliged to make good the Damages and Costs of the Tenant, if the Purchaser, for Example, or the Legatee, will use their Right. Qui fundum fructuum, vel habitationem alicui locavit, si aliqua ex causa fructuum vel ædes vendat, curare debet, ut apud emptorem eadem pactione & colono frui, & inquilino habitare liceat, alioquin prohibitus is, aget eum eo ex conducto. Digest. lib. 19. tit. 2. locati, &c. Leg. 35. § 1. See also Col. lib. 4. tit. 65. Leg. 9. Qui fundum colendum in plures annos locaverat, decessit, & eum fundum legavit: Cassius negavit cogi posse colonum, ut eum fundum coleret, quia nihil hæredis interesset. Quod si colonus vellet colere, & ab eo, cui legatus esset fructus, prohiberetur, cum hæredæ actionem colonum habere, & hoc detrimentum ad hæredem pertinere, &c. Digest. ibid. Leg. 32. See Mr. TITTIUS'S Observations on Lauterbach, 597, &c. Lastly, The Landlord ought to indemnify the Tenant for any Faults he suffers by reason of the Faults of the Thing hired, which he knew, or ought to have known. As for Example, if a Man hires Hogheads leaky, and loses his Wine by it. But 'tis not so, if a Man hires a Pasture, where there grow such Weeds as burst the Farmer's Cattle; for, in this Case, it is sufficient to demand no Rent, at least, if he prove a Mixture of good Grass with the Weeds. Si quis solia vitiosa ignarus locaverit, deinde vinum efflaverit, tenebitur in id, quod interest, nec ignorantia ejus erit excusata. Et ita Cassius scripsit. Aliter, si saltum pasuum locasti, in quo herba mala nascatur; hic enim si præra vel demortua sunt, vel etiam deteriora fuerint, quod interest, præstabitur, si scisti; si ignorasti, pensionem non petes. Digest. ibid. Leg. 19. § 1. Thus much for the Hiring of Things. II. He that lets out his Labour, ought, 1. To attend faithfully to his Business, or the Work he undertakes. 2. Finish it in the Time agreed on, if possible. 3. Not to leave it without some great Reason, such as may be credibly thought an Exception to his Engagement, if it had come into his Mind. 4. To make good the Damages which he may cause to him for whom he labours, either by his Negligence or by his Ignorance, at least until he knew his Inability, and did not for that Consideration pass him by; for then he can blame none but himself, and the other is discharged from doing better than he was able. See Note 3 of the following §.

⁴ So the Digests order, "Si vitiatum ædificium necessario demolitum esset, pro portione, quanti dominus prædiorum locasset, quod ejus temporis habitatores habitare non potuissent, rationem duci, & tanti litem æstimari." Ibid. Leg. 30. prin.

⁵ So the Words are, "Habitatores non, si paulo minus commodè aliquâ parte cœnaculi uterentur, illam deductionem ex mercede facere oportet; eâ enim conditione habitatores esse, ut si quid transversarium incidisset, quamobrem dominum aliquid demoliri oporteret, aliquam partem parvulum incommodi fuissent; non ita tamen ut eam partem cœnaculi dominus aperuisset, in quâ magnam partem usus habitator haberet." Ibid. Leg. 27. prin. Moreover, that the Proprietor is obliged to make necessary Reparations, appears from Leg. 15. § of the same Title.

^a Vid. lib. 19. t. 2. leg. 15. f. 2. in fin. & ibid. l. 9. f. 4. D. locati. ^b Vid. Herod. Euterpe, l. 4. c. 7. f. 12. ^c Vid. l. 15. f. 1. l. 30. D. b. t.

or a Farmer,⁶ by force of Arms, be drove out of his House, or Farm, 'tis manifest, the Rent from that time ought to cease; for, in this case, the Thing is morally lost to the Owner, till the Enemy be ejected. But if the Corn be gathered in, and then plundered by the Enemy, the case is altered; and the Tenant is then obliged to stand to the Loss.

As for Labour; if a Man be hired only for the Dispatch of some transient Business, and any Mischance hinders him from performing it, he can have no Title to his Wages: But if a Man takes another into his Service for a continued time, and such an Accident happens, in common Humanity he ought not to discard him, or to abate his Wages,⁷ especially if there be Hopes that he may make Amends by his future Diligence for the time he has lost; or if his former Behaviour has deserved such Favour.

III. But as for those Things, whose Produce is uncertain, as Fields, Orchards, Vineyards, Rivers for Fishing, and such like; as a plentiful Produce is to the Benefit of the Tenant, so a bad one is to his Loss: Nor in Strictness of Justice can he desire any of the Rent to be abated by reason of a poor Harvest, especially since the Barrenness of one Year is made up by the Plenty of another; for a good Husband is not used to let or rent such Things for one Year only.⁸ Nor can that common Objection well place here, That no Body ought to grow rich at another's loss: For the Landlord might as well be the same in a plentiful Year for the raising the Rent, whom in that Case the Tenant would have no Regard to. For, because the Produce is more one Year than another, the Landlord had rather be sure of such a Rent, than depend upon the Uncertainty of the Season: And, on the other side, the Tenant lays out a Certainty for the Hopes of an uncertain Gain, for which, if it fails him, he can blame no Body but himself. However that Medium proposed in the² Digests^b may be rightly applied here, If the Produce happen to perish by Floods, or by Birds of Prey, or by the Inroads of an Enemy, or by a Blight, or Drought, the Landlord ought to make Allowance, and the Reason added is, lest the Tenant, besides the loss of what Corn he had sowed, should be forc'd to pay the Rent of the Ground too, and so bear a double Misfortune. But if the Corn proves bad, and nothing happens more than ordinary, the Loss is then the Tenant's. Where it appears, that this Medium consists in a Division of the Mischances to which the Produce is liable, into ordinary and extraordinary^c, for if the Rent was to be abated for every little Loss, it would give continual Occasion for impertinent Law-suits. And therefore the Rent of Land is determined according to the middle Produce, computing one Year with another, lest the Farmer upon every little Loss should have Occasion to complain; and yet 'tis difficult to lay down precisely how great the Loss ought to be for the Abatement of the Rent, which may better be left to the Discretion of an honest Man, considering all Circumstances, than to the Determination of any general Rule.

Sometimes a Farmer takes Land upon Condition to pay his Landlord the whole Produce of it, deducting first the Value of his Labour. And here the Farmer is, as it were, an Hireling, and if the Year prove barren, the loss is to the Landlord only.

If the Tenant should by any Accident have the Use of the Land intercepted, and the Landlord should, in the mean time, let it to another, or reap the Profit himself, which otherwise would be due to the Tenant; whatsoever Gain he makes of it, he ought to refund it to the first Tenant, or else to receive it in part of Payment for the Rent. The Duty of the Tenant and Landlord in respect of any Thing or Labour let out to³ Hire, is

⁶ See in the same Title, Leg. 33. in fine, & 35. princ.

⁷ See Digest. lib. 40. tit. 7. De statu liberis, Leg. 4. § 5. & Collumella de re Rusticâ, lib. 12. c. 1. in fin.

MR. BARB. NOTES on § III.

¹ Pliny junior nevertheless pleases himself much in several Places of his Letters, in the Releases which he made to his Farmers in that very Case. See lib. 8. Ep. 2. & lib. 9. Epist. 38. & lib. 10. Ep. 24. But it appears by those Letters, that, besides the Vanity, he had some future Interest in so doing.

² "Servius omnem vim, cui resisti non potest, dominum colono præstare debere ait; ut puta, fluminum, graculorum, stur-norum, & si quid simile acciderit, aut si incurtus hostium fiat. Si qua tamen vitia ex ipsâ re oriuntur, hoc damno coloni esse: veluti si vinum coacuerit, si raucis aut herbis segetes corrupte sint. Sed et si labes facta sit, omnemque fructum tulerit, damnum coloni non esse, ne supra damnum seminis amissi mercedes agri præstare cogatur. Sed si urdo fructum olæe corruperit, aut solis fervore non adjueto id acciderit, damnum domini futurum. Si vere nihil extra consuetudinem acciderit, damnum coloni esse. Idemque dicendum si exercitus præteriens per lasciviam aliquid abtulit." Ibid. Leg. 15. § 2. See Cujac. Obsere. 15. 28. Mr. TITIUS on Lauterbach, Obsere. 610. believes, that this Circumstance in the last Law, unless the Loss of the Farmer be insupportable, ought to be chiefly regarded: For a bad Harvest is so far from being prejudicial to the Farmer, that we may see that the holders of great Farms love a Year of Scarcity more than one of Plenty, because the less Provision there is, the dearer they sell their Corn; so that according to this Author, all that is said of Abatement of Rent must have respect only to little Farmers. But when certain Provisions become very cheap, for Reasons independent on a good or bad Harvest, there is no Cause that an Abatement of Rent should be desired upon that Account, because the Price of Things is commonly very chargeable. This is determined by the following Law, understood in the manner that Mr. Bynkerhoeke hath explained it learnedly and judiciously, according to its Custom. Cum qui, cum de fructuum exiguitate quereretur, non esse rationem ejus habendam, Rescripto Digni Antonini continetur. Digest. ubi supra, Leg. 15. § 5. This Lawyer explains, at the same time (Obsere. lib. 2. c. 12.) another Rescript of Justinian, recited in the same Place. Item alio Rescripto ita continetur: NOVAM rem desideros, ut propter veteris rem esse non Rescripto Digni Antonini, ibid. i. c. A Man that hath taken an old Vineyard to farm, ought to impute it to none but himself, if it bear not as much as he expected, because he might have known that before he hired it.

³ The Words are, "Conductor autem omnia secundum legem conductionis facere debet, & si quid in lege prætermisum fuerit, id emendo & proprio præstare. Qui pro usu autem vestimentorum, aut argenti, aut jumenti, mercedem aut dedit, aut pronunt, ab eo culto rem talem desideratur, qualem diligentissimus paterfamilias suis rebus adhibet, quam si præstiterit, & aliquo cum fructu eam rem amiserit, de restituendâ eam non tenebitur." Indit. lib. 3. tit. 25. §. "Cælius etiam imperitiam culpæ adnumerandum tenet. Si quis vitulos pascendor, vel faciendum quid, poliendumve conduxit, culpam eum præstare debere, & quod imperitiâ peccavit, culpam esse, quippe, ut artifex (inquit) conduxit." Digest. ut supra, Leg. 9. § 5. See also § 2, 3, & Leg. 11, 12, 13, 25. § 3, 4, 7, 8, 27, 30. § 4, 38, 55. § 1, 2, 60. § 2, 61. princ. I have said at the End of Note 3. upon the § here going, how it is to be understood, That we must judge by the Principles of the Law of Nature only, what is here said of the Ignorance and Insibility of him who takes upon him a Work or Labour. As for the Care that the Tenant ought to have of what he hires, the Lawyers are not well agreed about it; some will have him answerable for the least Negligence, and other for small Faults only. See Mr. THOMASTUS's Discourse De Culparum Præstatione in contractibus, c. 1. § 22. What I have said of a Bargain and Sale in Note 2. upon § 3. of the foregoing Chapter, ought to be applied here.

^a Vid. D. ubi supra.

^b L. 15. f. 2. D. h. t.

^c Vid. l. 25. f. 6. D. h. t. Where it is well added, "The Tenant ought to bear contentedly a moderate Loss, when an immoderate Gain is not taken from him."

is shew'd in Instit. l. 3. t. 25. f. 5. & in D. ubi supr. l. 9. f. 2, 3, 5. l. 11. l. 12. l. 13. l. 25. f. 3, 4, 7, 8. l. 27. l. 30. l. 4. l. 38. l. 55. f. 1, 2. l. 60. f. 2. l. 61. prin. D. h. t.

Hither may be refer'd the Law in Egypt, relating to Physicians; who, if they took care of their Patient, according to the Direction of the publick Book, were not answerable if he died under their hands; but if they acted against those Directions, they were tried for their Lives^a. Alexander de Rhodes^b relates, that in the Kingdom of Tunquin they agree with the Physician for a certain Rate at the beginning of the Distemper, but which he does not receive, till he makes his Cure: and if the Patient miscarries, he has nothing for his Pains: By this means they think to quicken the Diligence of the Physician. The same Author tells us of a Physician, who being consulted and bargaining for his Fee, said, That were the Patient a young Man, he would not cure him under 100 Crowns, but since he was old, he would be contented with 20; because the Life he should restore was not likely to last long.

IV. But if my Labour, suppose in a Journey, can be serviceable to many, and I am hired by one Person to the full Value, Can I exact the same Price from others also? Grotius^c is of the Opinion I may, if the Law of the Land does not interpose; for it has no Relation to the Contract which I made with the first: Nor is my Labour the less valuable to him by being serviceable to others also. However such a Contract as this does not seem agreeable to Equity and good Nature, tho' perhaps it is not strictly unjust. For when one Man alone has paid for the whole Labour, if it can do service to others also, without being the more painful to the Performer; in respect of them^d it ought to be rankt among those Favours, which are of no Expense to the Doer, and are yet beneficial to the Receiver. But yet since 'tis hard that the first Contractor shou'd bear the whole of the Burden, it is^e but reasonable, that the others shou'd contribute to him their Proportion. Thus if I hire a Ship to my self, the Owner cannot take in others without my Leave; and if I am dispos'd to admit of it, the Advantage redounds to me only.

But yet in Arts and Sciences, which receive a Value from the Scarcity of such as understand them, the whole Price may be fairly demanded of each, though the same Trouble would inform many; for such sort of Arts, the more common they are made, the cheaper they grow: And therefore though my Labour be never the greater to me by being apply'd to many, yet I can^f demand a Price upon Consideration that my Knowledge will be less worth, the more it is communicated. Some indeed are not willing that the Salary, which a Man receives for teaching the liberal Sciences, should come under the Denomination of Hiring, because Learning cannot be sold for Money; and so they are for making this one of those Contracts which want a Name, reducible to the 4th general Head, Work for Goods^g. Be it as it will, it seems to have this in common with Hiring of Labour, that the Honesty and Industry of the Party only, and not the Event, is to be regarded; so that although one's Labour happens to be in vain, yet the Salary agreed upon may be demanded.

Mercedem appellas? Quid enim scio? Culpa docentis Scilicet agitur, quod lex in parte mamille Nil salit Arcadico juveni. Juv. Sat. vii. v. 159, &c.

Pay, Sir, for what? The Scholar knows no more At Six Months End, than what he knew before. Taught or untaught, the Dunce is still the same, Yet still the wretched Master bears the Blame.

Sometimes that which Pliny mentions of the Terandus or Buff, N. H. l. viii. c. 34. may be applied; when he appears in his own genuine Complexion, he is like an Ass. 'Tis an excellent Master that can make a Fool wise, Eurip. Hipp. Coron. v. 921, 922, Nature is too violent and powerful for any Discipline, Lib. Decl. 29. Though sometimes that may be reply'd which Lucian mentions in Hermotim. Tom. 2. p. m. 293. The Speech which Aureng-Zebe the great Mogul made to his Tutor, is worth observing, Vid. Bernier de rebus in regno Mogoris gestis, Part. ult. p. m. 57.

¹ Eschines acted directly counter to this sort of Contract, for he gave People money to come and hear him^e: And so did the pompous and ambitious Rhetoricians at Rome, who by Intreaties and Entertainments did what they could to get themselves Auditors. Socrates did not demand Money of his Auditors, but wondred, That a Man professing himself to be a Teacher of Virtue should insist upon so mean a Reward, and not rather look upon himself to be the greatest Gainer, in having procured a good Friend; that such a Man ought not to fear, lest he, whom he had made good and honest, should forget to be grateful to his Benefactor^f.

⁴ We follow the Notions of the Roman Law, which looks upon the Tenant (Conductor) as he that undertakes a Work or Labour, and the Landlord (Locator) as he that lets it at a certain Price to be paid him. But 'tis the Impropriety of Language which makes the Notions confus'd: For, in the main, he that lets his Labour and Work for Wages to a Person, who is to find Matter for him to Work on, is no less a Landlord, than he that lets an House or Land. As for Bargains at a Price agreed on, where the Undertaker finds the Materials, and is at all Expenses, this is properly Selling. See c. 2. § 10. above.

MR. BARB. NOTES § IV.

¹ This only proves that we can require no more of another than he has expressly agreed to pay. But if after the former is engaged, some other Person can make an Advantage by it, nothing hinders but that some Recompent^e may be made to the latter for the Care he takes of his Affairs, unless there is some Reason from Humanity and Charity, which requires that the Service be done to him freely.

² This is not always necessary; for, provided that the Person hired doth not neglect the Affairs by him undertaken, if at the same time he can attend upon another's, he may be allow'd to make that small Gain, as a little Perquisite, which we are contented he should have.

³ Sometimes also that which every one gives is so small a Thing, that what is paid for the Labour of all together, is little enough for the Labour of teaching one only.

⁴ This Story is founded only on a bad Translation of these Words, Ἐπιτιμῶν δ' ἀνεπίστου πικρῶν, which signify the contrary, That Eschines took Money of his Auditors, as Aldobrandinus observes.

^a Diad. Sic. l. 1. c. 82. ^b Itin. Part 2. c. 30. ^c L. 2. c. 12. f. 19. ^d Vid. l. 50. t. 13. l. 1. f. 4. D. de extraord. cogn. Vid. Sen. de Benef. l. 6. c. 11. How poor Schoolmasters are often cheated of their Wages, is shew'd in Lucian, De mercenario conduct. ^e Vid. Diog. Laert. l. 2. f. 62. ^f Vid. Xenoph. Apornum. l. 2. p. 426. Ed. II Steph. in fin.

C H A P. VII.

Of the Loan of a consumable Commodity.

- I. What a Loan is, and what a consumable Commodity.
- II. A double Use of these Things.
- III. For what Things we are wont to be credited.
- IV. Of tacit Lending.
- V. Whether Lending be an Alienation.
- VI. What if Money be altered in the intrinsic Value?
- VII. Or in the extrinsic Value?

- VIII. The Doctrine of the Jews about Usury.
- IX. That Usury is not contrary to the Law of Nature is proved.
- X. The Arguments to the Contrary are answered.
- XI. Some Contracts are much the same as Usury.
- XII. The Evasions used to avoid the Disgrace of Usury.

THE Loan of a ^a consumable Commodity is founded upon this Condition, that the same Quantity and Quality be returned in kind ^b. Things thus lent are called ^c consumable, because they are consumed and perish in the Use: ² And therefore 'tis enough, if the same Sort of Things, tho' not the self same Individuals, be returned. The ^d Loan of a consumable Commodity differs from the ^e Loan of any other Thing not consumable, and from the ^f Use of a Thing let out to hire, in this respect: In the two latter, the self same numerical Thing that was lent, or let out, is to be restored, and no other without the Consent of the Creditor: And that, not only because the Value of such Sort of Things is not always capable of being exactly adjusted ^g, but because it was expressly the Condition of the Loan or Letting. Whereas in the Loan of a consumable Commodity; if, for Example, my Neighbour borrows a Bushel of Wheat, and returns me another Bushel of the same Goodness, I am suppos'd to have received my own.

These consumable Commodities are said to consist of Number, Weight, and Measure, as being thereby determin'd and specified; whereas other Things have their Quantities determin'd by Nature. And therefore consumable Commodities are peculiarly termed Quantities: But other Things, which don't come under this Sort of Loan, are call'd Species. And here we must observe, that, v. g. Oxen are not therefore a consumable Commodity, because 50, or 100 of them may be sold by Tale; for the Number, in that case, does, not specify them, but only denotes the Quantity of the Species ^h.

II. The use of these consumable Commodities is either ordinary or extraordinary. The latter is when a Man borrows ⁱ to make an Appearance of being better provided than really he is; for sometimes 'tis of great Importance to be thought rich; as if a Man, in order to gain upon the Affections of his Mistress, should borrow a Sum of Money, and shew it for his own; in this case, the Money is not taken up as a consumable Commodity, nor is the Borrower ever Owner of it; and therefore he ought to return the very same in Specie. But the ordinary use of such Things consists in the Loss of them; or, in other Words, I can't directly apply them to my use, unless they be consum'd, and so become lost to me. This is plain in Corn, Wine, and other Things that turn to Nourishment; and Money itself I can't make use of in buying Necessaries, and paying Debts, unless I part with it: So that altho' the Substance of the Money remains, yet as to me it is utterly lost. And therefore, when such Things as these, to the end they may be put to their ordinary use, are made over to another, not with a design to barter, but with a design to have the same return'd again; since the Species that was deliver'd must be consum'd, the Restitution must necessarily be in the same kind ².

III. Money

^a Res fungibilis. ^b Vid. Inst. l. 3. t. 15. princip. ^c Vocantur res, quæ mutuo dantur, fungibiles, seu quæ functionem in suo genere recipiunt, ideo, quia quodlibet ex isto genere vice alterius ita fungitur, seu alterius vicem subit, ut qui ex eodem genere, eadem qualitate, & quantitate receperit, idem recepisse censetur, D. L. 12. t. 1. l. 2. f. 1. quæ functionem, &c. ^d Mutuum. ^e Commodatum. ^f Locatum. ^g Vid. D. ubi supra de rebus creditis, leg. 2. f. 1. ^h Add. Jac. Gothofredi Dissert. de æqualitate & functione in mutuo.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on Chap. VII. §. I.

¹ The Word of the Institutes are, "Mutui autem datio in iis rebus consistit, quæ pondere, numero, mensura constant; veluti vino, oleo, frumento, pecuniâ numeratâ, ære, argento, auro, quas res aut numerando, aut metiendo, aut adpendendo, in hoc damus, ut accipientium fiant. Et quoniam nobis non eadem res, sed aliæ ejusdem naturæ & qualitatis redduntur: inde etiam mutuum appellatum est, quia ita à me tibi datur. ut ex meo tuum fiat." Inst. lib. 3. tit. 15. See Cujas Obs. 11. 37.

² Res fungibiles. See what is said Lib. 1. c. 2. § 10. Note 3. The Word Fungibilis is not found in the Roman Law; but Fungis is used in the same Case, tho' it may be doubted whether the Antient Lawyers called, Res quæ in genere suo functionem recipiunt, what the Modern have abridg'd into Res fungibiles. The Law upon which it is grounded, is plainly corrupted, and ought to be read, in all Appearance, as Mr. Bynkershoek explains it, Observ. 1. § 10. Mutui datio consistit in rebus, quæ pondere, numero, mensurâ constant; quoniam eorum datione possumus in creditum ire. Quæ in genere suo solutionem recipiunt per functionem, quam specie. Digest. lib. 12. tit. 1. De Rebus creditis, &c. Leg. 2. § 1. i. c. (if we understand tam --- before quam specie). In these sort of Things we pay what we owe, by restoring another Thing of the same Kind and Quality, as well as by returning the same we have received.

³ The Word of the Digests are, Nam in cæteris rebus ideo in creditum ire non possumus, quia aliud pro alio invito creditori prestari non potest. Digest. lib. 12. tit. 1. De Rebus creditis, &c. Leg. 2. § 1.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § II.

¹ So the Law speaks, Non potest commodari id, quod usu consumitur, nisi fortè ad pompam vel ostentationem quis accipiat. Sæpt. et. c. ubi hæc commodantur pecuniæ, ut dicis gratiâ nonærationis loco intercedant. Dig. l. 13. tit. 5. Commod. vel cont. Leg. 3. § 6. 4.

² The true Character of Things, call'd consumable Goods, is, that they perish in the using, as our Author says. Now there are two sorts of Consumption: 1. Natural. 2. Civil. Natural Consumption hath place either in such Things as are lost in the Use, as these are: such we eat and drink; or in such as are subject to be easily destroyed, tho' we do not meddle with them, as the Branch of Trees, &c. For as for those which decay insensibly as we use them, but don't altogether perish, as Cloaths, Earthen Ware,

III. Money, which commonly goes by Number, or Counting, Gold and Silver in Bullion, Bread, &c. (which passés by Weight) Corn, Salt, Wine, Beer, Oil, &c. (which are specified by Measure) and, in general, all sorts of Provision; as Flesh, Eggs, Milk, and even intire Animals, consider'd as Provision, come under the Name of consumable Commodities ^a. For suppose I am to make an Entertainment, and have not Provision enough at Home, or Money to buy it, I may borrow of my Neighbour, not only Eggs and Flesh, but Fish, Lobsters, Hares, Hens, Geese, and even Sheep and Calves, upon Condition to repay him again in kind ^b. Fair Paper may likewise be brought under the same Denomination, as being consum'd in the Use; for Paper once scribbled upon is lost for any other Writing. In short, under this Denomination may be reduc'd any sort of Commodity, which can be determin'd by any certain Measure, and which (if after it has been apply'd to its genuine and principal Use, it cannot be intirely restored again to its former Condition) is capable of being repaid in kind. For such sort of Things, altho' they are generally the Matter of Sale, yet sometimes happen to be borrow'd. As if, v.g. I should procure a certain Quantity of Cloth for my own Use, and should let a Friend, who has immediate Occasion for some of the same sort, and has not wherewithal to buy it, make use of it, upon Condition to return me as much and as good of the same kind.

IV. And this Contract is perform'd not only expressly, but sometimes tacitly: As suppose I should pay a Man Money by Mistake, which I did not owe; or should give a Man Money for some Reason which afterwards does not appear; in this Case the Roman Law admits of an Actio for Money paid where not due, and for some Reason which does not appear. For since such Money was not paid as a Gift, but as a Debt, or for the procuring an Equivalent, and yet the Receiver became Master of it; it is the same Thing ^c as if it had been borrowed, and may be demanded back as such. And therefore the Foundation of these Actions may not improperly be call'd a tacit Borrowing ^d. Thus Mauritius the Emperor having given Childebert, the French King, Money to drive the Lombards out of Italy, after he had made Peace with them, demand'd it back: Childebert indeed would not so much as vouchsafe him an Answer, but that was because he was more powerful than just. Paul Warnefrid. de gest. Longobard ^e.

V. Some Years ago Salmasius and some Civilians had a Dispute, Whether the Loan of a consumable Commodity was an Alienation? Now it is plain, since the ordinary Use of such Things consists in the Consumption of them, they must be made over to the Receiver, with full Power to dispose of them as he pleases; which cannot be done without investing the Property in him. But because the Creditor gives, in order to receive back, and the Debtor receives, in order to refund; therefore neither is the Estate of the one lessen'd, or the Estate of the other increased by it. Unless the Creditor may be rather thought a Loser, having only an Action against the Debtor's Person, in lieu of his Money, which, by Reason of the Trouble and Uncertainty attending it, may be reckon'd less worth than the Money it self. And hence it is, that as Debts, due to any Man, are look'd upon as Part of his Fortune; so a Man is suppos'd to be worth only so much as remains to him after his Debts are paid. And he that owes more than his Estate comes to, may fairly be said to be worth less than nothing. To this Purpose was that Saying of Cicero's, that he wanted 2500 H. S. to be worth nothing, App. de bello civil. l. ii. p. 432. B. Ed. H. Steph. Hence Money borrowed is call'd as alienum, another Man's Money; not that the Person borrowing has not the Property of it, but because he receiv'd it upon Condition to return as much. On the other side, he who is out of Debt, may say, Meo sum dives in aere, The Money that I have is my own. In a word, he that lends Money does in-

Ware, &c. they don't belong to this Place; and 'twas an Oversight of Tribonian to exclude Cloaths from the Number of an Usufruct, properly so call'd. Institut. lib. 2. tit. 4. § 2. Consumption Civil hath Place in Things, whose Use consisteth in being alienated, altho' they have a continual Being. Such are not only Money, but all Things we barter with, as also Things made use of in Building, and all other Materials for Compositions, and Work. See lib. 4. c. 7. § 10. above. Upon this Foundation there are two sorts of Things call'd consumable Commodities: One, which are such in their own Nature, and unchangeably such; the other, which depend upon the arbitrary Will of Men, and mutable Appointment. The first are such whose ordinary Use consists in their Natural or Civil Consumption: I say, ordinary Use; for tho' the Owner may lend sometimes, for Example, a Sum of Money, merely for Firm and Appearance, and a Beam only to support a Building; yet, as that is rare, it has no regard to Laws, which respect Things that commonly happen only. The other sort of consumable Things contains such, as tho' they may be used or lent without Consumption, are often appointed to be sold, or are dealt in after some other Manner; so that according to the Design of him of whom they are borrowed, they are sometimes for Consumption, and sometimes for Use. As for Example, when a Man who has a Library for his own Use, lends me a Book, he intends that I should return the same Copy again; so that if I would give him another as good, he is not oblig'd ordinarily to accept it: But if he of whom I borrowed the Book, be a Book-eller, or Trader in Books, 'tis sufficient that I return him another Book as good; because, as he keeps it for Sale only, 'tis indifferent to him, whether I restore him the same Book, or another as good. 'Tis the same in other sorts of Goods, unless they be such as are very rare, or curiously wrought, as some sort of Drugs not common, a Watch, Mathematical Instruments, an Air-Pump, or other Instruments to try Experiments, &c. because 'tis hard to find others of the same Nature and Goodness, which may be returned for what's borrowed. This is taken out of Mr. THOMASUS's Discourse before quoted, De pretis affectionis in res fungibiles non cadente, c. 1. § 16, &c.

MR. BARR. NOTES on § III.

¹ We may give Gold for Silver, and pay it in other Kinds, unless it be otherwise agreed on. See Corn. Van B. Keyser's Observ. 1. 9.

MR. BARR. NOTES on § IV.

¹ It is not necessary to suppose a tacit Lending. The Nature of the Thing sufficiently shews the necessity of Restitution, as appears by the Author him. self. But if it be sufficient to render an Equivalent, yet it does not follow that it should be by virtue of a tacit Loan; but 'tis because it can't be otherwise restored, or because 'tis all one whether the Thing be restor'd in specie, or by an Equivalent. See what is said of Quasi-Contracts in several Notes above, and among others on lib. 4. c. 13. § 15.

² The Lawyer call'd Procurator. See Collectio Old. 8. 33.

³ "By the way we may observe, that Plinius says, why the Gnostians us'd to take away forcibly the Money which they borrow'd at Interest. Perhaps, that the Creditor might evade the Law against Ujury. For should the Debtor refuse paying Use for what he thus took away, he would have an Action of Robbery against him. Quæst. Græc. p. 303. Edit. Wab.

⁴ Vid. D. ubi supra. l. 2. f. 1. D. de reb. cred. ⁵ Adi. Plin. N. H. l. 9. c. 55. ⁶ Civilis. l. 1. tit. 1. § 1. et l. 1. tit. 1. § 1. data, causa non facta. ⁷ Which is otherwise call'd by the Civilians Quasi-Contractus.

deed alienate it, yet so as neither to lessen his own Estate, nor ¹ to add to that of his Debtor.

VI. It is a Question of greater Moment, Whether, if a Change happens in the Money, between the Borrowing and the Payment, regard must be had to the Value of Money, as it was ¹ at the time of Payment? Here most think fit to distinguish between the intrinsic Goodness of Money, and the extrinsic; whereof the former consists in the certain Quantity of such, or such a Metal; the latter in the publick Rate, or Value impos'd by the Magistrate. If the Change happen in the intrinsic Value, as suppose the Metal becomes baser or lighter (for the Change in Money is generally for the worse) then they think the Money ought to be reduc'd to the Value it bore at the time of Borrowing. For this Contract obliges not only to restore the same Thing in kind, but in Goodness also ²; indeed otherwise the same Quantity would not be restor'd. And therefore, if, for Example, in Money newly coin'd a fourth Part of the intrinsic Goodness be wanting, for 100*l.* lent in old Money, I ought to receive 125*l.* in the new. In like manner, if I lend another 100*l.* half of which is perfectly Alloy, I ought to receive only 50*l.* when the Baseness of the Coin is redress'd. For tho' it be in the Breast of the Government to raise or lower the Value of Money, yet if the extrinsic Valuation differs very much from the intrinsic Goodness of the Coin (since Regard must be had to Foreigners, unless we would reduce our Commerce with them to pure Bartering) the Price of Commodities will be determined rather by the ³ intrinsic Goodness, than the extrinsic Value and Denomination of it. For supposing the Money diminished a 4th Part, we should give 125*l.* for that which we us'd to pay but 100*l.* And therefore if a Man should pay me an old Debt of 100*l.* in so much new Money, he would really pay me a 4th Part too little.

VII. But if, without any Alteration in the intrinsic Goodness, the extrinsic Value should rise or fall; then Regard ought to be had to the Value of the Money, as it was at the time of Contract, and the increase or decrease of it ought to be at the Gain or Loss of the Debtor. For Example, if I should lend 100 Guineas in Specie, when they go for 26*s.* and afterwards they should rise to 30*s.* I can't demand more than 26*s.* the Guinea, if my Debt be paid in Silver, and if the Payment be made in Guineas, I must deduct 4*s.* from each, and so receive not much more than than 86 Guineas in Specie.

And on the other hand, if they sink to 22*s.* and my Payment be made in Silver, I can demand 26*s.* for every Guinea. But if I be paid in Guineas, I ought to have an Addition of 4*s.* to each, and so to receive above 118 Guineas in Specie.

But yet this does not clear the Business, for against the former Determination the Creditor may make his Exceptions; for had he kept his Guineas, the Increase had been to him; which if he be now forc'd to lose, another makes a Gain at his Loss: And the same Plea may the Debtor have in Bar of the latter.

And therefore we must enquire further, 1st, Whether any certain Sort of Money was lent, v. g. Guineas in Specie, upon Condition that so many should be return'd in Specie, and in no other Money; or 2^{dly}, Whether they were paid as common current Money; or 3^{dly}, Whether all the Money of the Nation, or 4^{thly}, Only that Particular Species has undergone a Change. In the 1st Case, without Dispute, the Number of Guineas is to be return'd. In the 2^d, the former Decision takes place, and therefore the Value of Guineas in such a Loan must be refer'd to some other Species as a Standard; v. g. so many Guineas of 26*s.* The 3^d Case, where the Change affects the whole Body of the Money, in Comparison of the Plenty or Scarcity of other Things, may be determin'd from what has been said in Chap. 1. S. 16. although it hardly ever happens in Fact, that this general Change in the Money affects the Payment of an old Debt. As for the 4th Case, when the Value of any one Species rises without any intrinsic Alteration, all the other Money ¹ must needs have been debas'd. Thus v. g. when Guineas rose from 26*s.* to 30*s.* it was a sign that the Silver Money in its intrinsic Value was grown worse. And therefore in this Case, if Guineas were lent in Specie, and the Payment be made in Silver, Guineas ought not to be valued as lent at 26*s.* but at 30*s.* But

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § v.

¹ That is to say, as Mr. PLACETTE, in his Treatise of Interest observes, Chap. xii. p. 133. "If he that lends, transfers the Property of a Thing to another in Specie, yet he reserves the Value." Now the Value always exists, and we know what it is: We put it into the hands of the Debtor, but he is not the Owner; for if it were so, he might dispose of it as he pleas'd, by giving, squandering, or playing it away, which he is not certainly allowed. But the Creditor, on the contrary, can make a Present of it to the Debtor himself, or any other. He may call it in, forbear it, spend it, or dispose of it as he pleases. See the rest of this Chapter, and the foregoing, of the Treatise from whence I have taken it. Hence it is, as our Author observes, that a Debt is called Es alienum, i. e. Another Man's Money; not but that a Debtor acquires a Property to the Species he has received, but because he gets it on Condition to render the like Value again. On the contrary, a Man who owes nothing may say, Meo jum dives in are.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § vi.

¹ See FRANCIS HOTOMAN'S Quaest. illustr. Qu. 15, 16. upon this Question, where it is determin'd otherwise than it is here, but not from solid Principles.

² So the Digests speak, Cum quid mutuum dederimus, etsi non cavimus, ut aequae bonum nobis redderetur, non licet debitori deteriorem rem, quae ex eodem genere sit, reddere; veluti vinum novum pro veteri: nam in contrahendo quod agitur, pro cauto habendum est; id autem agi intelligitur, ut ejusdem generis, & eadem bonitate solvatur, qua datum sit. Dig. Lib. 12. tit. 1. De Rebus credit. &c. Leg. 3. We may add to it, that if the Money had remained in the hands of the Creditor, he had lost nothing by lessening the Species; and so in the Alienation, this Consideration passes into a Rule: Alienatio quum fit, cum sua causa dominium ad alium transferimus, quae esset futura, si apud nos ea res mansisset: Alique toto jure Civili ita se habet, praeterquam si aliquid nominatim sit constitutum. Digest. lib. 18. tit. 1. De contrah. empt. &c. Leg. 67. In fine, In all this we must suppose that the Time for Payment was not pass'd; for if the alteration of the value of the Species was made when the Debtor delayed the Payment, or after the Creditor would not receive the Payment, it so much the worse for him to whom he was bound, that the Money was not paid in a Species of the Goodness and Value, according to the Rule of the Law: Unicuique sua mora nocet. Digest. lib. 50. tit. 17. De diversis regulis Juris. Leg. 173. § 2.

³ This appears by the following Law: Pro imminutione, quae in aestimatione solidi forte tractatur, omnium quoque pretia specierum decrescere oportet. Cod. lib. 11. tit. 10. De veter. numismatis potestate, Leg. 2.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § vii.

¹ Mr. HERTIUS says here, That the Text is corrupted in all the Editions. It is true, that in the Swedish and Frankfort Editions it is read Valore augetur, for augetur; but the Fault is so manifest, that he might without Scruple correct it in his own. As for what he says, that OB ought to be added after augetur, I see no Reason for it, but think it contrary to the Reason and Sense of the Author.

But if common Money was lent, the Debtor gets the Advantage of the Rise, unless the Largeness of the Sum, or the Enormity of the Change may plead for some Consideration in behalf of the Creditor.

As for other consumable Commodities, provided they be return'd at the Time and Place appointed^a, 'tis little regarded whether their Price has risen or fallen; but the Advantage of the Rise, and the Loss of the Fall belongs to the Creditor, unless they had agreed about it otherwise.

But when the Debtor is backward in his Payment, and the Price, in the meantime, happens to be altered, the Roman Lawyers are at a Loss to what Time or Place the Valuation ought to be assigned: It seems most reasonable that it be adjusted according to the Time and Place of Payment. But, if it be through the Debtor's Fault that the Payment is protracted; and the Price in the mean time alters, it ought to be to his Loss^b.

VIII. Whether Usury, which is generally given for the Loan of Money, be repugnant to the natural and divine Law, is a Question that has been warmly debated^c. Which ought to be canvast more nicely, because most People are not of the Persians Opinion, Who, as Plut. relates in his Book against Borrowing, among their Sins, give the second Place to Lying, but the first to Borrowing, because it often happens that they that borrow, lye. Tho' Herodotus, in Clio, in my Opinion better assigns the first to Lying, the next to Borrowing. How the old Hebrews explain the Divine Law^d, relating to Usury, Selden^e gives a large Account; viz. they thought it^f was unlawful not only to receive, but even to give Usury; and that the very Scrivners, Notaries, Witnesses, and Procurers of such Bargains contracted a Guilt. However, the Money of Orphans was allowed to be put out to Interest to a rich Man, provided he gave the Gain to the Orphan, but bore the Loss himself.

Now they had two Sorts of Usury, the one was^g Usury properly so called, which was covenanted for, and received at the Beginning, or during the Contract; and this was suppos'd forbidden by the Divine Law: The other was called the^h The Resemblance of Usury, and was forbidden only by the Decrees of the Elders.

A Man was guilty of Usury properly so called, not only when he received back a consumable Commodity with Increase, but if by Reason of such a Loan he lived in another's House Gratis, till he was paid; or gave less Rent for it, than otherwise he would have done; or if he received an Emolument from a Pawn left with him upon Account of the Debt. And yet a Man never suffered in their Courts for receiving Usury, as was usual for the Violation of other Divine Laws, but was obliged to Restitution only. But, if the Usurer himself was Dead, his Heirs were not so much as obliged to that; for they did not refund Money, or any other consumable Commodity, but only Plate, Cloaths, Instruments, Cattle, and such like, which had been received upon that score. And this was done in Honour of the Deceased, and out of Respect to his Memory, and that too only, if it appear'd that he repented of it, and had Thoughts of making Restitution before he died; for otherwise the Heirs were not oblig'd to refund at all. Besides, Private Men were not permitted so much as to receive a small Present from their Debtor, while he continued such; the Lawyers indeed might, for they were presum'd by no means willing to violate the Precept against Usury, but to receive it purely as a Gift, and not as Interest.

By that which they called the Resemblance of Usury they were forbidden to receive any Profit, or Acknowledgment of the Kindness (altho' utterly beside the Contract, and after the Expiration of it) except the Payment of the Principal before the time appointed. And this again they divided into two Sorts; the One which related to the difference of the Time, in which something was perform'd by the Debtor, to the Profit and Advantage of the Creditor; the Other, which related to the different manner of Contract.

The former they again divided into antecedent and consequent. By that they understood whatsoever a Man, designing to borrow, gave to the Person, upon whom he had this Design, in hopes to bring him to it the more easily: By this, whatsoever the Debtor after the Receipt of the Loan bestowed upon the Creditor, in order to prolong the Time of Payment. Nay, they would not so much as allow the common Offices of Humanity to be perform'd by the Debtor to the Creditor, unless what was used to pass between them before the Loan.

The latter sort was thought to have Regard to such a Contract as this; says the Seller, if you buy to Day, you shall have it for 90*l.* but if you put it off till to Morrow, you shall pay a 100*l.* Here the Delay, together with the Increase of the Price, seems to intimate, that 100*l.* is to be paid as Use. In this Case the Law did not oblige to a Restitution, nor did there lie an Action against the Party in the civil Court. Yet he, who offended against these Decrees of the Elders, was liable to corporal Punishment. He likewise that received a Farm in Pledge, was not allowed to let the same to the Owner for Rent, for that lookt like Usury. But these obtain'd only between Hebrew and Hebrew; of a Gentile they might lawfully demand Usury, from Deut. xxiii. 20. Nay, they thought themselves commanded to do it, in ^a The Words of the Digests are, Vinum, quod mutuum datum erat, per judicem petatum est: quæsitum est, cujus temporis æstimatio fieret. ----- Sabinus respondit, Si dictum esset, quo tempore redderetur, quanti tunc fuisset; si non, quanti tunc cum petatum esset. Interrogavi, Cujus loci pretium sequi oporteat? Respondit, Si convenisset, ut certo loco redderetur, quanti eo loco esset; si dictum non esset, quanti ubi esset petatum. Dig. lib. 12. tit. 1. De rebus credit. &c. Leg. 22. See Lib. 13. t. 3. De conductione triticaria, Leg. 4. & tit. 4. De eo quod certo loco dari oportet. Leg. 3. lib. 17. tit. 1. Mandati vel contra, Leg. 37. lib. 45. tit. 1. De verbor. Oblig. Leg. 59.

MR. BARB. NOTES on § VIII.

¹ This Passage of our Author might have been left out, because the Question here debated refers directly to the Lender, and not to the Borrower.

² This is certain; and God forbid it for some special Reasons, which our Author speaks of a little lower; so that nothing is more ridiculous than the blind and malicious Zeal of certain modern Authors, who, to shew their Reading, have blinded the Eyes of the People, by quoting the Talmud and Spanish Rabbins, who explain the Law in Deut. xxiii. 19. strictly. I shall speak upon the Passage in S. Luke vi. 35. in Note 6. upon § 9.

^a Instance in Wine, lib. 12. tit. 1. l. 22. D. de reb. cred.

^b Add. lib. 13. t. 3. ult. D. de condict. Triticaria. § t. 4. D. de eo quod certo loco, &c.

^c Which is extant, Exod. xxii. 25.

^d Lev. xxv. 37. Deut. xxiii. 19.

^e De J. N. & G. sec. Heb. L. 6. c. 9.

^f עבור קצורה i. e. Usury fixed and determined.

^g אבק רבוי i. e. The Dust of Usury.

in order to drain them of their Riches, and weaken those Nations which God had otherwise destin'd to Destruction. Yet Leo of Modena^a says, That Text is to be understood of the seven Nations only that dwell in Canaan; and not of the other Gentiles: of whom it was not lawful to receive Usury. But yet that many, by reason of the Miseries of a long Captivity, and their Lands being withholden from them, and for want of a better Way of getting a Livelihood, had degenerated from the Integrity of their Forefathers. But he protests that to be false, which soon spread abroad, That the Jews every Day take an Oath to do what they can to cheat the Christians; and, he says, it was invented to render them odious.

IX. Let us now consider, whether what has been thus punctually observ'd among the Jews, be the dictate of the Law of Nature; or the positive Law of God; and that not peculiarly calculated for the Jews, but for all Nations. As for what has been added by the Jews' Elders, 'tis plain, that is altogether positive; and imposed only to prevent Cavils, which designing Men had found out to evade the force of the Law. But in general our Opinion of Usury^b is this; provided it does not oppress and grind the Poor, but answers the Advantage which we ourselves might have made, or which the Debtor does actually make of our Money (especially if he borrows not out of Necessity, but in order to make a Gain of it) the Law against it is neither that of Nature, nor that of God universally obliging all Nations; but a positive Law to the Jews only, founded upon Reasons in a manner purely politick. And it was generally the Opinion of the Rabins themselves, that Usury was neither Theft, nor against the Law of Nature, as being founded upon Consent and free Contract.

But the same may be evidently proved from Reason; for tho' the Jews were by the Divine Precept join'd together in a closer Tie of Amity than ordinary, yet they were oblig'd to exercise towards others all the common Duties of the Law of Nature^c. And therefore, if Usury be against the Law of Nature, I don't see how the God of Holiness could indulge that Nation, which he had peculiarly sanctified, in the Practice of it, and in a manner charge them to violate a Precept of the Law of Nature, in Prejudice of those who had never injur'd them; if indeed that Passage in Deut. xxxiii. 20. ^d ought to be expounded not of the Canaanites only, but of any other Nation.

There seem to be several good Reasons why such a Law against Usury should more especially obtain amongst the Jews. The first may be taken from the Genius of the People; for they were as much addicted to the scraping up of Riches then, as now; in which they thought their greatest Happiness to consist. And therefore, that their Thirst after Riches might not tend to the Oppression of the Poor, God seems to have provided by this Law. But yet lest too great a Violence should be offer'd to their Inclinations, he permitted them to use greater Liberty among Strangers.

Besides, ' the Constitution of that Commonwealth required such a Law. For 'tis evident, Moses design'd to have it democratical (for such a State may admit of a Chief at the Head of it) and nothing contributes more to this than to preserve, as much as possible, an Equality of Riches amongst the Members; and to this end, were the Laws of Jubilee and Remission inflicted, and those against alienating Land for ever. Lev. xxv. 14, 31, 35, 36. Deut. xv. 2. Add Num. xxxvi. Which the Law of Solon resembles, That an Heiress should marry her next Kinsman by her Father's side.

And the very Condition of those Times furnishes us with another Reason for the Law against Usury. For that Nation had then a more plain way of Trading, which consisted in Pasture and Husbandry,

MR. BARB. NOTES on § IX.

¹ I use the Word Usury to avoid the ill Phrase of Lending at Interest. But some Authors who retain some Relicks of Popery, declaiming against the common Opinion of the Protestant Divines and Lawyers, maliciously affect to use the Word Usury alone, and say, for Example, that Usury is allowed, or not allowed, because that Term is become odious through the Abuse which is often made of a Contract innocent enough in itself, and originally denoted by it.

² This appears by the Law of Moses itself; for it forbids to oppress the Stranger and to do him any Injury, Exod. xxii. 21, xxiii. 9. Deut. xxiii. 7, xxvii. 19. See Mr. NOODT, De favore & usuris, lib. 1. c. 10. p. 66, &c.

³ And therefore they are deservedly censured by Juvenal, Sat. 14. v. 103, 104.

*Non manifestare vias, calum nisi sacra colenti;
Quæritur a fonte solo deducere verpos.*

Ask them the Road, and they shall point you wrong,
Because you do not to their Tribe belong:
They'll not betray a Spring to quench your Thirst,
Unless you shew them Circumcision first.

MR. DRYDEN.

⁴ " If they were (as with Mr. la Placette, in his Treatise Of Interest, God would not have excepted the poor Strangers, as they are not excepted among those that are condemn'd to Death without Mercy. See Lev. xxv. 35, 36. But tho' God doth not approve the Interest should be taken of any poor Stranger, he doth not formally forbid any part; for the Law cited here concerns Prodiges, who were, as it were, naturalized, and enjoyed the same Privileges as the Hebrews." See Exod. xii. 48. &c. Numb. xv. 14, &c. and Mr. NOODT, ubi supra, p. 60. We should rather say, as Mr. la Placette also does, that the Expression of the Law, which allows giving of Interest, is general, and there is no Reason to restrain the Sense. 'Tis to no Purpose, that St. Ambrose supposing of his own Authority, that the Permission only respected the seven Nations of the Canaanites, who ought to have been destroyed, faith in his Book of Tobias, chap. xv. " That it was a lawful Act of Hospitality, and that since they might have slain those Nations by the Right of War, by much greater Reason they might be allowed to spoil them of their Goods; for he says, Lending on Usury was an easier Way, and pleasanter Means to impoverish and ruin them." Mr. NOODT answers this, p. 65. " That when one lends to, or makes any other Contract with an Enemy, he treats with him, not as an Enemy but as a Man, towards whom consequently he ought to observe the Law of Nature and Nations, and on that Account suspend all Acts of Hospitality. Further, God allowed the Jews also to take Money at Interest of Strangers; and then we may as well say, That God would have Strangers to impoverish and ruin his own People by it." Mr. NOODT urges many other Things, which utterly overthrow St. Ambrose's Notion, and which obviate all the Evasions which that Father, and such as are of his Opinion, could devise. We may observe also, that at one Time, the Lending at Usury was forbidden at Rome, from one Citizen to another, altho' it was permitted in respect to the Latins, who were their Allies. See Tit. Liv. lib. 35. c. 7.

⁵ We may find these two Reasons unfolded, and supported with several other Remarks, in the forementioned Chapter of Mr. NOODT's Book De favore & usuris, p. 62, &c. We should also do well to read what J. F. B. G. G. G. says in his Treatise, De Contractibus & Usuris, Antexeg. 1. p. 467, &c. which follows his Book De Sacerdotio, &c. lib. 1691.

^a De Rebus, lib. 1. c. 5. ^b See Mr. la Placette's Treatise upon Usury. ^c A. Selden in the aforesaid Place informs us, ^d See Mr. la Clerc upon the Place abovecited.

dry, or Manufactures; Merchandise was simple and moderate, the Secrets of Trade and Navigation being not known to them; and in such a State no one borrows, but when he is prest with Necessity. And therefore Deut. xxviii. 12. it is mention'd as an Argument of the greatest Happiness; Thou shalt lend unto many Nations, and thou shalt not borrow ^a. Since the Gains in such a Case, could not but be very small, the least Usury imaginable must needs be very burthenfome. And where the Money borrowed is laid out upon the Necessaries of Life, it will be next to impossible ever to recover it; for how can your Labour be able to bring you out of Debt, when it was not sufficient to support you from Borrowing? "Upon this Account the State of Athens was involved in such Troubles, by means of Usury, that it could not be remedied otherwise than "by Means of Solon's σεισάχθεια, i. e. Shaking off the Burthen". Vid. Plut. Solone, which Milchief Rome also felt in its Infancy,

Grotius ^b brings this as one Reason among others of the Law in Deut. xxviii. 19. That the Chief Riches of the Jews lay in Husbandry and Money, whereas most of the neighbouring Nations made vast Returns by Merchandise: And therefore Usury was allowed the Jews in their Dealings with them, which, with very good Reason, was forbidden to be taken of one another; for Usury laid upon Husbandmen is every where oppressive. Besides, Moses endeavour'd by that Law to endear them to one another; and they had the more frequent Occasion to put it in Practice, because then only small Sums were borrowed, and those too by the meaner sort, and such as struggled with Want and Poverty. From hence Philo Judæus ^c inferees the Exercise of Charity and Liberality among Fellow-Subjects ⁶. Which Virtue the great Legislator has indeed established by several other Laws. See Exod. xxi. 10, 11. xxii. 22, 23, 25, 26, 27. xxiii. 4, 5, 9, 11, 12. Lev. xix. 9, 10, 13, 33. xxiii. 22. xxv. 6, 10, 11, 35, 36, 37, 39, &c. Deut. xiv. 28, 29. xv. 2, 4, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11. xxiii. 24, 25. xxiv. 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 19, 20, 21. xxvi. 12, 13.

But now Money is borrowed for other Ends, viz. in order to increase and improve one's Wealth. When a Man borrows for this Purpose, why should another lend for Nothing? Nay, 'tis an unreasonable Thing, when you vastly improve your Fortune with my Money, not to admit me into some ⁷ Share of the Gain: For I, in the mean time, am debarr'd from making that Advantage which I might otherwise have expected by applying it to my own Use. Besides, I have parted with something valuable, which ought therefore to be consider'd: for in lieu of my Money

^a Add. Deut. xv. 7, 8.

^b Upon Luke vi. 35.

^c De Caritate.

⁶ From all that has been said, it appears, that David, Pl. xv. 5. and Ezekiel xviii. 13. xxii. 12. give this Character of a good Man, That he giveth not his Money upon Usury; but they treat only of the Lending forbidden by the Law, so long as the Government of the Jews was in Being, i. e. that which was done by one Jew to another. As for the Words of our Saviour JESUS CHRIST, Luke vi. 34, 35. they seem to me, if we consider them in themselves, or with their Connexion, not to respect Lending upon Usury. His Divine Words are, If you only love them that love you, what thanks have you? v. 32. And if you do good to them that do good to you, what thanks have you? Do not Publicans and wicked Men the same? v. 33. And if you lend to them of whom you hope to receive, what thanks have you? Sinners lend to Sinners, that they may receive as much again: But love your Enemies, and do good and lend, hoping for nothing, and great shall be your Reward, and you shall be Children of the most High, for he is beneficent to the Unthankful and Sinners. This Phrase, Hoping for nothing, doth not in the least refer to loving your Enemies, and Doing good, to Lending; and I wonder that no Man, so far as I know, hath taken notice of it. So Lend, hoping for nothing, plainly signifies, Lend, tho' you can't expect that he that borrows should do the like in his Turn. The Reason which our Saviour uses, is taken from the most noble Motive, and that is, to imitate God, who doth Good to the unthankful and unholly, which makes the Thing very clear. But if we desire a greater Plenty of Proofs and Arguments, let us read Mr. NOODT's First Book De Fænore & Usuris, and Mr. LA PLACETTE's Chap. 3. of his Treatise of Interest. The Truth is, JESUS CHRIST in that Text neither forbids nor approves giving of Usury, nor had he any Occasion to do it, since the Jews, to whom he spake, according to their Law, could not lend one to another, but freely. It belongs therefore to them, who condemn all Usury in general, to prove, that it is unlawful in itself, and disagreeable to our Gospel Dispensation. But they'll never compass their Design, seeing, that tho' they have studied the Natural and Moral Law with so much Care, yet some of them shew not only gross Ignorance, but at the same time Weakness and Presumption. A famous Casuist, Bannes 2. 2 Quæst. 78. Art. 1. Dub. 1. owns (as Mr. LA PLACETTE observes) that the Proof which the Words of JESUS CHRIST afford, takes its Force, not from the Words themselves, which may have another Sense, but from the Authority of the Popes and Councils, which have so explained them. Thus the Knot is loosed, and they, who, tho' Protestants, dare let out themselves into gross Invectives against the Opinions of their own Party, shew, that 'tis the Credit of the Fathers that they most value. But they make a Noise to no Purpose. All their Declamations and fierce Contentions serve only to shew that the Reading of the Fathers is capable of biasing their Thoughts, especially when it meets with a serious Temper, and such as are more careful to improve their Memory than their Judgment: For had these Men so much Zeal for the Honour of the Fathers, as to judge of them so long after their Death, as freely as they would of an Author of the last Age, they ought to prove by good Reasons, either that the Fathers were infallible, or are not guilty of the Errors imputed to them. And I am willing that they begin, for that End, with Lending upon Usury, wherein they think themselves to triumph; and let them see whether they can confute the two Treatises before quoted, the one of a Divine, the other of a Lawyer. Waiting for what they'll do, I say boldly of those Works, and some others, that have discover'd the Errors of those ancient Christian Doctors, That they are Iron, Steel, and Diamond for them. See what shall be said lower in the Note on § 10.

⁷ This is what is called Interest Lucrative, or Gainful Interest: whereas Compenfative Interest is only a simple indemnifying a Man for a Profit ceasing, and a Damage arising. There is no Difficulty of any Consequence, but in the last; and he must shut his Eyes, that will not see the Justice of such an Interest, since in requiring it, no more is demanded, than what we had when we lent it. If any doubts of it, he may be fully convinced by reading of the 5th, 6th, and 7th Chapters of Mr. LA PLACETTE's Treatise of Interest. As to Lucrative Interest, something may truly be alledged more specious to oppose it: But if we bring a Mind free from Prejudice, we shall easily find that this Interest is neither less innocent nor lawful than the Compenfative. What Mr. LA PLACETTE has said upon it is solid, and from him I shall borrow some Reflexions. As it depends on the Creditor to lend, or not; so 'tis at his Pleasure when he purposes to lend, whether he will pay his Money into the Hands of the Debtor for several Years, or for one only, or for a Month, or for a Week, or for one Day only. Supposing then that he can lend for a Day, or a Week, yet he is willing to lend for one or two Years, engaging himself not to demand it sooner, why may not such a Renunciation, which depends upon him, and is beneficial to the Debtor, be settled at a Price? When one has a Right of Service upon an House or Field, he can renounce it for a Time, or for ever, and set a Price upon such a Release. The same Thing hath a Place in the Business of Homages and Redemptions. Upon what Account then is it forbidden to be used in the Right we have to call in what is borrowed? 'Tis no Purpose to alledge, that when the Sum lent remains in our Hands, 'tis very probable that it affords us no Profit; and is it not then an Injury to our Neighbour to make him pay for the Use of it, when we lose nothing ourselves? This Answer supposes two Things, and both of them alike false: 1. That in treating with our Neighbour, he may enquire what we shall lose by lending him. 2. This is a Consequence of Money I have only an Action against your Person, which can't be prosecuted without some Trouble. For every Body does not consider that of Martial, B. 2. Epig. 13.

Et Judex petit, & petit Patronus : Solvas, cenfeo, Sexte, creditor.

It may also happen by some Accident or other, that my Debt may be lost. "My Slowness, in paying what I promised, has made me ashamed of my Debt; however, I may avoid the Censure of the world by paying it with Interest." Pind. Olymp. Od. 10. Nay some times the Debtor must be courted and caress'd, that it may not be lost. And some borrow on purpose to make their Creditors dependent on them. As the Mareschal de Rochelaure, when he was tax'd by Lewis XIII. with taking part with the Duke of Mayenne, pleaded in Excuse, That he did not follow the Duke, but his Money: For his Debt would be but in a desperate Condition, if he did not stick close to his Debtor^a. Besides it is not seldom that we lend to Persons who are utterly unable to pay. To whom that of Martial may be apply'd, L. 1. Epig. 76.

*Dimidium d'nare Lino quam credere totum
Qui mavult, mavult perdere dimidium.*

And therefore some are of Opinion, that it would be for the advantage of the Publick, to allow none but Merchants to take up Money at Use; for this would make the Poor industrious, and force them to Frugality, who, some of them, are not afraid to pay Interest for Money to maintain their Extravagancies. And monied Men, rather than let their Money lie dead, would either take to Merchandize themselves, or would put out their Money to those that do; which would make Trade flourish, to the great Benefit of the Commonwealth^b. Grotius^c is of Opinion, That the legal Interest ought to be stated, not according to the Gains of the Borrower, but the Loss that thereby accrues to the Lender; as in Buying and Selling, and other Contracts, no regard is had to what the Receiver may make of the Commodity, but what goes away from the Seller. And, in this Case, so much goes away as every Man, in his own Calling, might and usually does make of his Money; Allowance being made for Hazards, which in some Cases are more, in others less. With whom I so far agree, that no Man can complain, if his Debtor makes a vast and unexpected Return of his Money: But yet there is no doubt but I may demand higher Interest of him that makes a very gainful Trade, than I can of another who drives a poor one.

X. The Arguments which are brought against Usury are easily answer'd. It is urged, That the Loan of a consumable Commodity ought to be given Gratis, because the Loan of all other Things is so. But I answer, That as I have a Power of granting the Use of my Goods, that are not consumable, either Gratis or for Rent, whereof the one is a Loan, the other a Letting; so what should hinder me from granting the use of my Money also, either Gratis, or for a certain Recompense? But if you should insist, That that only is a Loan which is lent out gratis; the Consequence would be, that Money lent upon Interest ought to be called by some other Name, and not that the former, That every one is bound to do all he can for his Neighbour, if it costs him nothing. If the first be allowed, Commerce would be essentially unjust, for it consists only in endeavouring to get by what one sells; but if the Profit made hath nothing contrary to Charity or Justice (which is not impossible) nothing hinders but that we may lawfully pursue it. If the other Supposition be true, we must condemn a Thousand Things every Day, and have nothing to oppose. As for Example: I have two Houses, of which one is of no Use to me, but a Charge, because no Body dwelling in it, it runs to Decay. Again, I have two Copies of the same Book, of which one is of no Use. Does it follow from thence, that I may not sell or let out that House or Book? There are a Thousand such Instances, where it can't be taken ill, if one sell the Property or Use of certain Things which cost nothing, and are useless to such as sell them, tho' profitable to such as buy them. Why then may we not do the same with Money, in lending it, as innocently as in other Things? But there is another Proof more exact, and taken from the same Matter. A Creditor allows his Debtor to make use of his Money lent him; this is sufficient to entitle him to pay him Use. In short, If we may lawfully let an House, an Horie, Oxen, Tools, and an hundred other Things of that nature, why may we not do the same with Money, and, in general, with every Thing that is used in Commerce? Divers Things are answered to this, of which we may find a Solution in the next Paragraph, and in the Treatise from whence this is taken. We shall now only add the five Conditions which Mr. La Placette lays down to make lucrative Interest lawful: 1. That the Creditor is not otherwise bound to lend his Money freely. 2. That the Debtor obliges himself willingly to pay such Interest. 3. That the Debtor may probably get by the Loan. 4. That the Interest is not greater than the Advantage he hopes to gain by it. 5. Lastly, That he does not go beyond the Bounds fixed by the Laws. Let us also observe, with the same Author (Chap. 18.) that there are two sorts of Profit: 1. Positive, when a Man gets that by his Money borrowed, which he could not otherwise have had. 2. Negative, which consists not in getting what one has not, but in keeping what we have already, or may at length have, not in growing more rich, but to prevent being poorer. Borrowing is most commonly of this last Use, which happens several Ways. As for Example: A Man owes a considerable Sum, which he can't pay, and pays 6*l.* per Cent. for it; I lend him the same Sum at 4*l.* per Cent. he really gets nothing, but he actually spares 2*l.* per Cent. which, were it not for me, he must pay to his first Creditor. Another hath need of Money, and not getting it, is forced to sell at a low Price those Goods, which he was sure to sell dear in a little Time; I lend him Money, which he could not be without, and so prevent the Loss he should have had by his Goods. On these and the like Occasions it can't be unlawful to take Interest; for indeed 'tis as good an Office to prevent a Loss, as further a Gain. Moreover, this is the only, or, at least, the principal Foundation of the Interest paid to the Directors of the Bank called Monts de Pitié, an Establishment which all the World has found so useful and profitable to such as are in Necessity. We ought only to observe, that tho' this sort of Interest is not so contrary to Justice as the other, yet it commonly is more opposite to Charity. The Need of the Borrower is such very often, that he is obliged to borrow either without Interest, or content himself with an Interest Compensative, which hath not Place so commonly in such Loans as are made to them who borrow to make a positive Gain. To all that has been said, we may join Chap. 5 and 6, of the 1st Book of Mr. NoODR's Treatise.

^a Gramond. Hist. Gal. l. 5. Diodor. Sic. l. 19. c. 24. Plat. Eumene. p. m. 591. C. Edit. Franc. 1620.

^b Vil. Lud.

Septalium, de ratione status, l. 2. c. 15.

^c Ad Lucan. 6. 35.

MR. BARRP. NOTES on §. X.

¹ See Mr. NoODR's De Fœnore & Ujuris, lib. 1. c. 6. p. 37, &c.

that it is unlawful. Another Objection is, That Money is a barren Thing, of no use to human Life, as are Cloaths, Buildings, Cattle, &c. and therefore nothing ought to be demanded for the use of it. To which I answer, That tho' Money is so far barren, as not to produce its like; yet after an eminent Price has been set upon it, by the Industry of Man it gains a faculty, which naturally it had not, and becomes productive of those Things which are both in natural and civil Respect fruitful. And therefore Usury is not to be look'd upon as a natural, but as a civil Increase. Or which however Seneca speaks severely enough: "I see, says he, Deeds, and Bonds, and Writings, the Emblems of Covetousness, which deceive our vain Minds. For what are Usury and Accounts, but Names unnaturally imposed upon Things for the support of human Avarice? What are these Bills of Contract, these Computations, these Prices set upon Time, this cruel Interest upon Interest? They are all Evils of our own making, and depend upon ourselves, they have nothing in them of Solidity, that can be either seen, or held, but are the empty Dreams of a covetous Mind. De Benef. l. vii. c. 10. Aristotle too is severe enough upon Usury: "The Art of Usury, says he, is deservedly odious, for it makes a Gain of Money itself, and not of that for the sake of which it was found out; for the use of Money is to carry on Traffick, but Usury increases it, and is therefore call'd Τὸ κέρδιον, for the Thing begotten is like the Thing that begets; but in Usury Money is both the Thing begetting and begotten; and therefore this sort of Gain is unnatural." Pol. 1. 7. towards the end. Besides, Money let out to Interest is not apply'd contrary to its proper use; for he who borrows Money does it at least for the sake of Bartering. And Property itself was first settled with a Design, that every Man's Goods should be immediately beneficial to himself; and yet it is not against Nature, to let out our Goods to another for Rent.

There is another Objection, which is somewhat nice; In consumable Commodities the Property cannot be distinguish'd from the Use, and therefore the Use can't be made over, but the Property must too, and vice versa. For as the Substance of Corn, Wine, and Flesh, perishes in the Use of them; so the Money that I expend perishes to me, as being remov'd out of my Estate. And therefore since the use can't be distinguish'd from the Thing, nothing ought to be demanded for the use; it being enough, if the Thing be restored in kind. To this I answer, that indeed the Use of a consumable Commodity does not properly differ from its Substance; but yet it does not therefore follow, that the Power to make use of it upon an Obligation to return the same in Kind some time after is not worth something. Now 'tis a Condition in every Loan, that the Thing be not return'd till some time after: But if I borrow Money for such a certain Time, I may lay it out upon other fruitful Commodities, or make a Gain of it some other way. And thus suppose I borrow Provisions, or other Necessaries, my Gain consists in this, that I am not necessitated to part with my Goods upon ill Terms to procure Bread: Or my Money, which must otherwise have been thus expended, may now be laid out to more Advantage.

2 Here the wicked and lazy Servant says to his Master, I knew that thou wert an austere Man, who reapest where thou hast not sown, and gatherest where thou hast not scattered. But the Sense is not, that it is Cruelty to take Use for Money lent, which is a Thing barren in itself; but it is a Proverbial Speech, which implies only, that some Men require more than others can do. See the Interpreters upon the Parable. It may be better observ'd from the Parable, that it proves, that lending at Interest is very innocent; for if it were sinful, we can't think that JESUS CHRIST would have put into the Mouth of the Master in the Parable, who represents GOD himself, these following Words, Thou wicked and lazy Servant, thou knowest that I reaped where I had not sown, and gather where I have not sowed, you ought to have put my Money to the Bankers, that at my Return, I might have received my own with Usury, ver. 26, 27. See further Mr. NOODT, lib. 1. c. 7, 8. De san. & usur. where he confutes at large the Objections which our Author propounds here, and some others. The same Lawyer also examines in Chap. 9. a Passage in Seneca, De Benef. lib. 7. c. 10. quoted also here, and proves it only meer Declamation.

3 Some answer, That true it is, that the Debtor finds Means to improve the Money borrowed; but that's from his Industry only, and so conclude, he only ought to have the Profit. But (as Mr. PLACETTE speaks, ch. 10.) his Industry is not the only Cause of the Profit made by the Money; for tho' Money without Industry would bring no Profit, no more would Industry without Money; and so one Part of the Profit must be imputed to the Money, and another to Industry. This is also visible in some Contracts of Letting: Land will bear nothing, if it be not tilled; Tools, let to an Artist, will do nothing, not only if they be not used, but also if there be not Skill to use them. Nevertheless, all this is no Hindrance but that the Rent may be paid for the Land, and Use for the Tools: And why then may not Interest be paid for Money, as well as for other Things?

4 ARISTOTLE'S Greek is, Ἐπιτοκία μισθὸς ἢ ὀφελιστικὸς, διὰ τὸ ἀπὸ τοῦ κέρματος εἶναι τὴν κέρματα, ἢ ἐκ ἐφ' ὅπου ἐκ ποιεῖται. Μισθὸς δὲ τὸ ἐκ τῆς ἀπορίας τὸ ἐκ τῆς ἀπορίας ἀπὸ τοῦ κέρματος εἶναι τὴν κέρματα, ἢ ἐκ ἐφ' ὅπου ἐκ ποιεῖται. De Republica, lib. 1. c. 10. Mr. NOODT, De Fan. & Usur. lib. 1. c. 7. p. 43. hath observ'd that Aristotle may be confuted by Aristotle, who, in the Chapter immediately foregoing, says, "That all Things which we possess have a double Use, one proper and natural, the other improper and strange. As for Example, says he, Shoes are properly made to wear on the Feet, nevertheless we use them to get Money, or some other Thing in exchange for them." Εἰς τὴν γὰρ κέρματα διπλὰ ἢ χερσὶς εἶναι ἀμείβεσθαι ἢ καὶ αὐτὸ μὴ ἀλλ' ἕκ' ἄλλοις καὶ αὐτὸ αὐτὸ ἢ οὐκ εἶναι, ἢ δὲ καὶ εἰς τὸ κέρματα τὸ κέρματα εἶναι τὴν κέρματα, ἢ ἐκ ἐφ' ὅπου ἐκ ποιεῖται, ἢ μεταλλικὴ ἀμείβεσθαι γὰρ κέρματα γίνονται. Καὶ γὰρ ὁ ἀπορίας τὸ κέρματα εἶναι τὴν κέρματα, ἢ ἀμείβεσθαι γὰρ κέρματα τὸ κέρματα, ἢ ἐκ ἐφ' ὅπου ἐκ ποιεῖται, ἢ μεταλλικὴ ἀμείβεσθαι γὰρ κέρματα γίνονται. chap. 9. init.

5 A Sum of Money (say Mr. LA PLACETTE) which is lent to a Man to be traded with, is not any more spent by that, than a like Sum which is put into the Hands of one that acts by Commission, to be employed for the same End, or a like Sum trusted to a Partner, to act according to our Directions. All of them act after the same Manner, and with the same Intentions. We confess that he that gives another a Commission, and trusts a Partner, is still Owner of the Money, and always in Possession of an Equivalent. And why then may not the same Thing have Place with respect to the Creditor and Money lent? We lend not to the Man (says Mr. DE BEAUVAIL very well, Hist. de oper. Doll. Orob. 1691. p. 66.) but to his Goods. We reckon upon the Ability to pay, and not upon the Industry and Fidelity of the Borrower. A Reflection, which MARTIAL puts into the Mouth of his Friend, Lib. 12. Ep. 25.

Quod mihi non creditis, credite, siquid mihi, Creditis colliculis, arboribusque meis

You trust not me, altho' your ancient Friend, 'Tis on my Lands and Trees that you depend.

2 See Mat. 25. 24. 3 Pol. lib. 7. c. 5. l. 1. and 2. D. de Usur. cor. que usu consumantur.

4 See Mr. BARBEYRAC'S

And here we may observe by the way, what Aristotle^a relates of Cypselus, who having devoted all his Goods to the Gods of Corinth, the first Year paid the tenth Part of them, and so for ten Years together. But in strict Justice this did not satisfy his Vow, unless for the relief of such a rash one, any favourable Interpretation may be allow'd. That Saying of Cato in Cicero^b, who thought Usury as bad as Robbing and Murther, is to be understood only of Extortion, which reduces the poorer Sort to Extremities, and administers to the covetousness of the rich. Our Ancestors, says the same Cato^c, enacted in their Laws, that a Thief should be condemn'd to pay double, but an Usurer quadruple. And yet he himself, if we may believe Plutarch^d, did craftily enough exercise that sort of Usury which we now call Bottomry. Augustus very justly censur'd some Roman Gentlemen, for taking up Money at low Interest, and letting the same out at high^e. The old Romans and Greeks^f abhor'd Usury, as being burthensome to the Poor, and the foundation of Suits and Quarrels: The Persians, as being not very far removed from Deceit and Lying. And certainly 'tis unbecoming a Christian for a small Sum to accept of Interest from those whom it is in a manner Charity to relieve^g. The Greeks took an excellent Method to support their Friends in distress: For several entred into a Society, and had a common Chest, to which each contributed a certain Sum every Month; and out of this they lent Money without Interest, to any one of the Society that should happen to be reduc'd to Necessity; upon Condition to refund it, if his Circumstances should ever happen to grow better^h.

XI. In confirmation of what has been said for the lawfulness of Usury, it is observable, that those who are against it, allow of someⁱ Contracts, which in effect amount to the same thing. Thus, suppose Caius is furnish'd with Money enough to buy a Farm, which Seius has a mind to, but wants Money for the Purchase; Caius, at the request of Seius, buys the Farm, and lets it to Seius. No body can deny but that this Contract is lawful. But if Caius should lend Seius the Money to buy it himself, and Seius should pay so much for Interest as he must otherwise have paid for Rent, I don't see but that the Contract would be very just. Nay, this latter Contract is much more for the Advantage of Seius than the former, for here he purchases the Property of the Farm.

Again, Should any one put his Money into an honest Man's hands, upon Condition to be admitted into an equal Share of the Gain which he should make of it; no Man certainly would call this Contract unlawful. But in Equity 'tis the same Thing, if, instead of this uncertain Gain, he bargains for a certain Sum, which will never be the less lawful for being called by the Name of Interest.

The Alcoran forbids Usury, and yet the Moors borrow Money to carry on Trade, and allow the Creditor half the Gain; but if the Principal happen to be lost, the Debtor refunds that only; but if only part of the Principal perish, the whole must be made up out of the Gain of the Remainder.

A Mortgage, whereby a Man receives the Produce of Land given in Pledge for the Loan of Money, is acknowledged to be lawful^k: But if no Pledge be given, why may not the Creditor receive something^l answerable to the Produce of it^m?

*Grotius*ⁿ rejects the Name of Usury, but allows the Thing. For, says he, there are some things which look like Usury, but are Parts of another Nature: as the Amends that ought to be made a Creditor for the Loss he is at by being out of his Money, and the regard that ought to be had to the Gain he might have made of it; still Deductions being made for Uncertainties and Accidents, and the Pains he must have taken in the Management of it. Thus it is not properly Usury to demand a Consideration for the Charges he is at, who lends much Money, and provides it on purpose; and for the danger of losing the Principal where good Security is not given. Now the Interest for Money lent, not to a poor Man, but to one that makes a Gain of it, we demand upon this very Account, because we are debarred from making that Gain of it, which otherwise we might; and because it is worth some Consideration to have, instead of our Money, only an Action against the Creditor; and certainly 'tis reasonable we should be admitted into Part of the Gain made of that Money, which we were not oblig'd to lend, either in Justice or Charity. What Honest Man therefore will quarrel about words? And who would not laugh at those who pretend they don't take Usury for their Money, but^o only what they themselves might have made of it? Besides, this superstitious Nicety is not at all consistent with the Decrees of MR. BARRÉ'S NOTES on § XI.

^a We may add to those spoken of here, a Contract between three Contractors, about which see Mr. PLACETTE'S Treatise of Interest, chap. 14. See also Mr. NODD, De Fœn. & Usur. lib. 1. c. 12. of which the Title is, Mores rigorem Juris Canonici circa Usuras inflexisse ad æquitatem Juris Gentium, non omnino improbantibus ejus Juris interpretibus.

^b We shall treat of this, chap. 10. § 14. following. Cum debitor (say the Roman Lawyers) gratuitâ pecuniâ utatur, potest creditor de fructibus rei sibi pignoratæ ad modum legitimum usuras retinere. Digest. lib. 20. tit. 2. In quibus causis, &c. Leg. 8. See Mr. NODD de Usuris & Fœn. lib. 2. c. 9.

^c Id quod interest. And they understand by it as the Roman Lawyers do, as well the Profit that was not made, as the Loss that positively accrued. Si commissæ est stipulatio, ratam rem Dominum habiturum, in tantum competit, in quantum modò interfuit, i. e. quantum mihi abest, quantumque lucrari potui. Digest. lib. 46. tit. 8. Ratam rem haberi, &c. Leg. 13. See also Cod. lib. 7. tit. 47. De Sententiis, quæ pro eo quod interest, proferantur, and Mr. NODD, ubi supra, lib. 1. c. 12. l. 2. c. 6.

^a Oeconom. l. 2. c. 1. August. c. 39.

^b Off. 2. in fin.

^c De re rusticâ, princip.

^d Cato Major.

^e Suet. in August. c. 39. ^f Appian, l. 1. de Bello Civili, p. 382. B. Edit. H. Steph.

^g Vid. Siracid. 29. 1. 2. &c. Psalm. 15.

^h That Contribution-Money was called æxvæ.

ⁱ Vid. Cicero, de Offic. lib. 2. in fin. See Cæcilius's Comment upon the 16th Chapter of Theophrastus's Characters.

^k Alid. lib. 20. t. 2. l. 8. D. in quibus causis pignus tacite contrahitur.

^l See hereafter, Chap. 10. § 14.

^m Among the Persians Usury is forbidden, but Mortgages allowed even under the

Lex commissoria, Olear. Itin. Perf. L. 5. c. 36.

ⁿ L. 2. c. 12. § 21.

the civil Law : for, according to them, the Usury ⁴ is ascertain'd and agreed upon beforehand : And the Damages allowed the Creditor, for what he might have made of his Money, are, among other Reasons, demanded for failure of Payment at the time appointed, which ought to be stated according to the Loss sustain'd, be it what it will ; but because it would be difficult to prove and adjust it exactly, it is therefore generally ⁵ reduc'd to regular Interest ^{a b}.

Since therefore 'tis lawful to demand Damages for tardy Payment, or because we lose by not having our Money paid in at the time appointed; why may we not bargain for something certain beforehand, upon consideration that our Money is in another Man's Power, whereas we were not oblig'd for his Benefit to venture the Loss, or to neglect the Gain that might be made of it ^c?

XII. Lastly, It being evident that 'Men could not be found who would lend as much Money gratis, as human Necessities and Commerce (as carried on now adays amongst most civiliz'd Nations) requir'd, several Shifts were found out and allow'd of to evade the Decrees of the canon Law against Usury : Among which may be reckon'd the ^d Purchase of a yearly Income ^e ; where, for so much Money, I have such an immoveable Thing made over to me for the payment of it ; out of which I receive a certain Rent for ever, or for such a limited or unlimited Time, or for Life. And this Income may, upon Payment of the Principal, sometimes be redeem'd, sometimes not. Nay, ⁴ In Contracts of rigorous Right, the Engagements must be made exactly in the Forms. R spondit [Africanus] pecunie quidem creditæ usuras, nisi in stipulationem deductas, non deberi. Digest. lib. 10. tit. 5. De præscriptis verbis. Leg. 24. Si pactum nudum de præstandis usuris interpositum sit, nullius est momenti. Paul. Sentent. lib. 2. tit. 14. A bare Agreement gives no Title to Interest in Justice, unless it be to Bankers, or Exchangers, or to Communities, or such as run great Hazards with their Money, and lend in a Way something like it, or to such as lend Wheat or Barley. Neither can any Thing be required, when we say only that we lend upon Interest, without settling what the Debtor shall pay. Such an Agreement was only valid with Bankers, and Justinian, who gave them that Privilege, ordain'd that they shall be look'd upon to lend at 8 per Cent. But for a long Time before that Emperor, Money might be lent at 12 per Cent. which was called, Usura Centesima, but not higher, except, 1. When it was lent at great Hazards; for the Laws prescribed no Bounds, no more than in certain conditional Agreements, 2. In lending Provision; for a Law of Constantine, cited in the Theodosian Code, allowed an Exaction of Three Bushels of Corn, for Two lent. 3. When any one was fined a certain Sum by the Judges, and paid it not within two Months after the Sentence, he was obliged to pay Interest from that Time, at the Rate of 24 per Cent. if the Creditor summoned him to pay it, when three Months were ended; but it was by the Force of the Law, and not from the Agreement of the Parties. As for honest Contracts, a bare Agreement made on a sudden empowers a Man to require Interest. See about this whole Matter Mr. N O O D T, lib. 2. c. 3, &c. lib. 3. c. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5.

⁵ The Words of the Digests are, In ejusmodi stipulationibus, quæ quanti res est, promissoribus habent, commodius et certam summam comprehendere: quoniam plerumque difficultis probatio est, quanti cujusque interit, & ad exiguum summam deducitur. Digest. lib. 46. tit. 5. De stipulat. prætoris, Leg. 11. ----- When one owes a Thing in Specie, as the Use of it is determined, so the Damage which arises from a Delay in such and such a Case may be fixed, and so 'tis not commonly necessary to limit the Value at a certain Rate, which may be a Rule in all Cases. The Creditor, for want of Payment at his Time, may suffer a Loss many Ways, which the Debtor can't imagine, and as to him may seem only fortuitous; so that all that the Creditor can prove to be his Due upon Account of Delay, is only the Interest of the Sum desired. Mr. N O O D T, from whom this Remark is taken, lib. 2. c. 6. shews also lib. 3. c. 6. that while the Roman Commonwealth stood, no Interest could be demanded in Justice, for the Debtor's Delay of Payment, unless some Advance was agreed upon by Contract. But some Lawyers having introduc'd a Custom chiefly in Matters of Companies, the Emperors enlarged it to all honest Contracts without Exception, as also to Legacies and Trusts. In Contracts of rigorous Right, there must be always an Agreement in Form, or nothing can be demanded, altho' a Process be entred. In fine, if we add to this excellent Work of Mr. N O O D T's, so many times quoted, the Treatises of the Learned SALMASIUS, entitled, De Usuris, De modo Usurarum, & De Fœnore Trapezitico, nothing more concerning the History of Lending upon Usury, the Phrase and Decisions of the Roman Law about this Matter can be desired. See also J. VINCENT. GRAVINA'S Origines Jur. Civil. lib. 2. p. 333, &c.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XII.

¹ Some, says Mr. LA PLACETTE, ubi supra, chap. 1. can't live without Lending, and others have need of Borrowing. 1. If it were not allowed to take Interest, what would become of a great number of Persons whose Estate is all in Money? They'd spend it in a few Years, and how then should they subsist? 'Tis to no purpose to say, they ought to learn some Art or Trade, and apply themselves to Husbandry or Commerce. This is quickly said. But do we not really observe, that there are Labourers, Tradesmen, and Merchants enough in the World? Are not Lands sufficiently till'd throughout all Europe, unless it be in Places expos'd to the Ravages of War? And is it not plain, that there are Merchants and Tradesmen more than enough, since many of these Professions can't get a Livelihood, and many of them that do, are forc'd to search out new Inventions to excite and nourish Mens Vanity and Intemperance. 2. But (and this Consideration renders Lending upon Interest more necessary) how many miserable Men are there, who live only upon borrowing at Interest? What would become of many Merchants, whose Trade depends entirely upon Funds of borrowed Money? How many Citizens and Labourers, who are press'd from time to time with want of an hundred Things, which they could not obtain any other Way? Could they find always Persons ready to lend them what they want freely? This might be perhaps, if all Men were charitable, but since there are so few truly such, and among those that are, few are in a Condition to lend, whereas many more are in Necessity than can lend; it's plain that this Remedy has no Proportion to Mens Necessities: Nay, we may say, that what charitable Persons can and ought to do freely, is not the hundredth, nay, not the thousandth Part of what a great Number of Men are continually in want to borrow. So that it is of less Importance to Mankind that we should be permitted sometimes to lend upon Interest, than it is to confine that Permission to certain Bounds, beyond which none may go. See also Mr. N O O D T De Fœn. & Usur. lib. 1. c. 6. Experience heretofore convinced an Emperor of the Necessity of Lending Money on Interest. Byl the Macedonian, out of an inconsiderate Zeal, and ill-informed Piety, having absolutely forbid it, Leo the Philosopher was oblig'd to abolish that Ordinance, and allow Lending at 4 per Cent. knowing, says he, that his Predecessor's Prohibition was prejudicial to the State, because those that had Money would not lend it to those that needed it, so that that Law was above the Attainments of the human Nature. Propter paupertatem res illa non in melius (quem tamen finem Legislatores proposuerat) sed contra in pejus vertit. Qui enim ante usurarum spe ad mutuandam pecuniam prompti erant, post latam legem, quod nihil lucri ex mutuo percipere possent, in eos qui pecuniis indigent, difficiles atque immites sunt. ----- Propterea quod humana Natura ad illius [legis] sublimitatem non perveniat, egregium illud præscriptum abrogamus. Novel. 83.

^a Fid. l. 17. f. 3. l. 22. t. 1. D. de Usuris.

worthy to be consulted.

^b Concerning this, Salmasius de Usuris, and Mr. Placette de l' Interet, are

^c Add. Baco. Serm. Fid. l. c. 39.

^d Emptio Censuræ annuæ.

^e See Mr. Barbeyrac's

sometimes if the Thing given for Security happens to be lost, the Person of the Debtor is responsible for it. But that such a Purchase as this differs only in Name and Shew from Usury, no Man is so blind as not to see ^a.

Nay, in Consideration of the Usefulness of moderate Usury, the ² Popes themselves permitted, under a specious Title, Mountains, as they call them, of Piety; that is, they did not allow either Pledge or Interest to be taken for three Crowns lent to a poor Man; but for larger Sums Pledges might be taken for Security, and every Month some small matter paid as Interest: and if the Pledge were not redeemed in a Year, it was to be sold by Auction, and the Remainder, after Payment of the Debt, restor'd to the Owner. "Alex. Severus lent publicly at 4 per Cent. but gave many poor People Money without Interest to buy Land, and was contented to be paid out of the Produce. Vid. Lamprid. Something of the same Nature (but that they part with nothing gratis, or without Security) is still practis'd in Lombardy, so called because formerly most of the Usurers in France were Lombards and Jews, who afterwards were so odious as to be expelled the Kingdom. Vid. Hen. Steph. introduçt. ad apolog. pro Herodoto, l. 1. c. 6. After much Debate, Usury was allowed of in Holland, as a Thing beneficial to the State, and even those who took it were permitted to enter into holy Orders.

How much the Laws against Usury are evaded by ^b dry Exchange ^c (as they call it) is well known among the Merchants. To which may be refer'd that sort of Contract, which is called in Spanish, Mobatra ^d. When a Man takes up Goods upon Trust at a high rate, and immediately sells them again to his Creditor at a low one. 'Tis more tolerable when Goods are bought dear, by reason that a long time is allowed for the Payment, and immediately sold to a Third something cheaper for ready Money: For hereby a Man may avoid the Necessity of taking up of Money at unreasonable Interest: or, in the mean time, may make so much Gain, as to be well able to pay the Debt at the time appointed. And this is common in Muscovy ^e.

It is requisite indeed, that private Men should be hindred by Law from exacting what Interest they please, and that it should be fix'd at such a certain Rate. Yet a Man may fairly expect something more when his Money is lent but for a short time ^f g.

The Egyptian Law ^h did not permit the Principal to be more than doubled by Usury, and allowed the Debtor's Goods to be seized upon, but not his Person: Whatever they got by their Labour, or any other just Title, was look'd upon as their Goods; but as for their Persons they belong'd only to the Publick, to be dispos'd of in its Service, according as they were best qualified for the Duties of War, or Peace.

² They were formally allowed by Pope Martin V. Extrazagant. commun. lib. 3. tit. 1. De Empt. & Vendit. c. 1. and by P. Calixtus III. ibid. c. 2. See JUSTINIAN'S Novels 161. and MR. NOODT'S, lib. 1. c. 12.

³ This is, when Payment ought to be made in the very Place where the Sum had been told, so that it is really a true Interest. It is oppos'd to real Exchange, which is divided into Minute and Local; Minute consists in the Change of Species, when for Example, Silver is given for Gold, and Gold for Silver, for a small Advantage. Exchange Local is, when one takes a certain Sum to return the like in another Place. See MR. PLACETTE about all this, in the last Chapter of his Treatise of Interest.

⁴ The Reason of it is, and the Author ought to have mentioned it, that tho' the Interest seems excessive, yet it is a small Matter to the Borrower, who usually employs the Money to such Uses as produce a much more considerable Profit than he gives the Creditor for small a Time. Further, besides Sums that are borrowed for a little Time, there are also small Sums, whose Interest, according to the common Rate, comes to nothing, and is not worth the Creditor's Trouble (See MR. LA PLACETTE'S Treatise, c. 22.) it may happen, that in that little Space, he may lose the Opportunity of putting out his Money for a long time, or make some considerable Advantage of it, for which he would receive no manner of Recompense, if he received not greater Interest than he would receive of a Person who takes his Money for a longer time. In the Conclusion the Author recites a Custom of the Inhabitants of Cnossus in Candia, § 4. above, to shew how they eluded the giving of Usury. At that Place such as borrowed Money at Use, took it by Force, that if they refused in earnest to pay Use to the Creditor, he might have an Action of Assault and Battery, and cause them to be punish'd severely. Before we conclude this Matter, let me add one Word of what is called Bottomry, ----- or Great Adventure, which consists in Lending Money upon a Merchant's Ship, upon this Condition, that the Creditor loseth his Money, in case the Vessel and Goods, upon which it is lent, be lost. As the Creditor runs great Hazards, he requires more Interest than ordinary, proportionable to the Dangers he is expos'd to. The civil Law allows it, and there is nothing to oppose it in the Law of Nature, Digest. lib. 22. tit. 2. De nautico fœnore. For the Danger to which the Lender is expos'd is capable of Valuation, and consequently he may, on the one Hand, expose himself to it by the Mediation of a certain Price, and on the other, agree for the Price with them for whose Sake he runs the Hazard. In a Word, such a Treaty hath nothing in it oppositè to Justice, more than a Bargain of Assurance, of which we shall speak in Chap. 9. § 3. See MR. NOODT De Fœn. & Usur. lib. 2. c. 7.

^a Add. Fran. Hotoman. obs. l. 2. c. 1. & Jo. Labard. Hist. de Reb. Gall. l. 6. p. 393.

^b Cambium Siccum.

^c Concerning this, see MR. LA PLACETTE'S last Chapter of Usury.

^d Vid. Montaltii Lit. provincial. 8. & ad cam Wendrock.

^e Olear. Iun. Perf. l. 3. c. 7.

^f Vid. Leonis Novel. 84.

^g See MR. BARBEYRAC'S Fourth Sect. of this Chapter. ^h Diodor. Sic. l. 1. c. 79.

C H A P. VIII.

Of Partnership.

- I. How many ways Partnership may be begun.
- II. Money and Labour are balanced several ways.
- III. Irregular Partnership.
- IV. A Partnership in all Goods.

Partnership is a Contract ^a by which two, or more, join together their Money, Goods, or Labour, upon Agreement, that the Gain or ^b Loss shall be divided proportionably between them ^a. And here, if every Man contributes equally, each must receive an equal Share in the Gain, or Loss: but ^b if they contribute unequally, their Shares must be adjusted according to the Laws of Geometrical Proportion ^b. And the same obtains, if two, or more, join ^c Labour; or one ^d Labour, and the other Money ^c; or each Party both Labour and Money ^d.

II. Upon breaking of Partnership, if each Party contributed only Money, 'tis plain upon a Division, each must receive according to his Contribution. But if both ^e Money and Labour was contributed, it must be consider'd after what manner the Collation was made: For when Labour is contributed on one Side, and only the use of Money on the other, he who contributed the Money does not admit the other to a Share in the Principal; but only to his Proportion of the Gain ^e that might be made of the Money and Labour join'd together. And, in this Case, as he that contributed only Labour has no Title to any Part of the Money, when they break off Partnership; so the other alone, as Owner, is concern'd in the Risque that the Money is exposed to; and, in such a Partnership as this, not the Money itself, but the Risque that it runs, and the Gain that may be probably expected from it, is compared with the Labour. And therefore when the Gain is to be proportion'd, we must not compare the Labour with the Principal (as if one having contributed Work to the value of 100*l.* and the other 1000*l.* in Money, the former were to receive only a tenth Part of the Gain) but to the Risque and Hazard that

Mr. BARR. NOTES on Chap. VIII. §I.

^a Grotius believes it to be a mixt Contract; but see what is said above, c. 2. § 10. We must observe that a Partnership is contracted sometimes tacitly, when, for Example, a Thing being bought in common, 'tis not parted, but without explaining themselves further they enjoy it equally, each taking the Profit that arises, and contributing their Part in the necessary Expences for its Maintenance: Societatem coire, & RE, & Verbis, & per nuncium, posse nos, dubium non est, Dig. lib. 17. tit. 2. Pro Socio, Leg. 4. princ. See Mr. Hartius's Discourse, entituled, De Societate facta contracta, which is found in Tom. 3. of his Commentat. & Opuscula.

^b The Digests order, Sicuti lucrum, ita damnum quoque commune esse oportet, quod non culpa socii contigit. But if the Loss comes by the Fault of one of the Partners, he is responsible for it, and so he must not expect a Recompense of the Loss which came by his Negligence, in not doing what he was oblig'd to by the Contract: For so the Digests appoint, Si socius quaedam negligenter in societate egisset, in plerisque autem societatem auxisset, non compensatur compendium cum negligentia, ibid. Leg. 26. See also Leg. 73. and about this whole Matter M. DAUMAT's Civil Laws in their natural Order, Part 1. lib. 1. tit. 8. As for Leg. 60. § 1. which our Author quotes, it contains a Decision very harsh and unjust; for it requires, that a Partner who has been hurt by his Servant, whom he pursued, and who belonged to the Partners, should be cured at his own Expence; because, says it, tho' he was engaged upon that Expence for the Partnership, yet it was not done in the Partnership: Socius, cum resisteret communibus servis venacibus, ad fugam exumpentibus, eademerat is eis; impensum, quam in curando se fecerit, non consequatur pro socio actione, Labo ait, quia id non in societatem, quareris propter societatem, impensum sit. But was it not in the Business of the Partnership that he was hurt? The contrary Opinion ought to prevail with Reason; for there is another Law under the same Title, where 'tis said, That if a Partner going a Journey about the Business of the Partnership, falls among Thieves, who take away his Baggage, or Money, or hurt his Servants, he shall be indemnified at the common Charge: Quidam sagariam negotiationem coierunt: alter ex his ad merces comparandas profectus, in latrones incidit, suamque pecuniam perdidit: servi ejus vulnerati sunt, resque proprias perdidit: Dicit Julianus, damnum ei commune, ideoque actione pro socio damni partem dimidiam agnoscere debere, tam pecunie, quam rerum ceterarum, quas secum non tulisset socius, nisi ad merces communi nomine comparandas proficisceretur, Leg. 52. § 4. The Law here mentioned, which is the Lawyer Pomponius's, is corrected by the following one of Ulpian; Secundum Julianum tamen, & quod melius pro se natum est, recipere potest. Quod verum est. ibid. Leg. 61.

^c Aristotle's Greek is, ὁ ἕκαστος ἐν κοινῷ κέρει καὶ ἀπὸ κοινῆς ἐπιμέλειας, &c. Arist. Eth. Nicom. lib. 8. cap. 16. And the Words of the Digests are, Conventus est civi boni arbitrio, ut non utique ex æquis partibus socii finis, veluti si alter plus opera, industria, pecunie in societatem collaturus sit. See also Leg. 80. of the same Title.

^d The Words of the Digests are, Qui societatem coierunt, ut Grammaticam docerent, & quod ex eo artificio quaestus fieri solent, contrivans eorum esset. Digest. ubi supr. Leg. 71.

^e The Words of the Legislator are, Nam & ita coiri posse societatem non dubitamus, ut alter pecuniam conferat, alter non conferat, & tamen lucrum inter eos commune sit; quia jure opera alicujus pro pecunia valet. Instit. lib. 3. tit. 26. De Societat. § 2. See Digest. ubi supr. Leg. 29.

^f As when two Merchants are Partners, and are both concerned in the same Business. See Leg. 52. § 4. quoted Note 2. of this §.

Mr. BARR. NOTES on § II.

¹ What the Author says of Money must be understood of Effects, Goods, and every Thing that is different from Labour, and whatever may be reckon'd to be the Stock of the Partners.

² Not more than he that lets Land to be till'd, makes the Labourer a Proprietor of the Lands, tho' he lets him part of the Fruits; or he that commits a Flock to a Shepherd, on condition that he shall have a Share in the Wool, Milk, and other Profits, must take part with him when the Partnership is ended: Si in communis societate ----- artem operantem pollicitus est alter, veluti quom socius in commune pasendum, aut agrum polt est. M. Brakerhoveck reads it, Oditori. Observ. 3. 9.) domus in commune querendi fructibus, nimirum ubi etiam culpa præstantia est. Digest. lib. 17. tit. 2. Pro socio, Leg. 52. § 2.

³ Vid. lib. 17. t. 2. l. 73. and l. 52. l. 3, 4. l. 60. l. 1. D. pro Socio. ⁴ In Partnership, the more a Man contributes, the more does he receive. Arist. Nic. l. 8. c. 16. In the same Sense ought that in the Digests to be explained, l. 20. D. h. t. Id est be nec mentioned what Share each Party contributed, they must be presumed to be all equal. ⁵ Vid. Instit. l. 3. t. 26. De Societat. § 2.

the Money is expos'd to, which if computed to be worth 100*l.* each Party shall gain equally.

The best way, in this Case, is to rate the Risque of the Principal and the Hopes of the Gain, according to the Interest that is generally given for Money. Supposing then this Interest to be 6*l. per Cent.* if one Party contributes Labour worth 60*l.* and the other 1000*l.* in Money, they shall share equally of the Gain.

But sometimes the Labour and Money are so interwoven together, as to give him that contributed only his Labour, a Share even in the Principal; the Labour of the one, and the Money of the other, being in a manner united into one Mass. As when one lays out his Money upon unwrought Commodities, and another spends his Labour in working them up, and managing them. Thus, if I give a Weaver 100*l.* to buy Wool, and he makes Cloth of it, computing his Labour at 100*l.* 'tis manifest, that here both of us have an equal Interest in the Cloth; and when it is sold, the Money must be equally divided: Nor ought I to subtract the Money that I contributed at first, and then divide the remainder with him.^a

III. Besides, 'tis not unjust to enter into such a Partnership, as that one Party may have a Share in the Gain^f, without being in danger of partaking of the Loss^b. But this is irregular, and a mixt Contract of Partnership and Insuring; and here^c an Equality will be observ'd, if the insuring Party receives a greater Gain than the other, in proportion to the risque he runs in bearing the other harmless. But for one to partake^d of the Loss and not of the Gain, is repugnant to the very nature of Partnership; for no Body enters into such a Contract, but upon the prospect of some Advantage^e.

IV. Sometimes People enter into Partnership^f for all they are worth^d; in which Case each Party, according to his Condition and the Laws of good Husbandry, may take from the common Stock, as much as is necessary for the handsome Maintenance of him^g and his^e. But since few Mens Circumstances will induce them to^h continue long in such a Partnership as thisⁱ, it would be convenient to agree at first, what Share of the Gain each shall pretend to at breaking off. Where Grotius & observes, that no regard ought to be had to what has been actually gain'd by this or that Man's Contributions, but to what might probably have been expected from them: For therefore it is that many join their Stocks together, that each may be admitted into a Share of what is gain'd by the Goods of others.

Now tho' no Man ought to have his Liberty so far intrench'd upon, as to be confined to a Partnership

^a This takes place in other Things as well as Money, as when one allows Ground for a Building, on condition that he that builds on it, shall have a Moiety; or, as when one trusts a Flock to be fed, or a Servant to be fed or taught, on condition that if it be sold at the End of some Years, the Money shall be divided among the Partners. Sed si puerum docendum, vel pecus pascendam tibi dederis, vel puerum nutriendum, ita ut, si post certos annos venisset, pretium inter nos communicaretur, abhorrens hoc: ab arca ----- ergo si quis arca dominum non transfulerit, sed passus sit te sic edificare, ut communicaretur vel ipsa, vel pretium, erit societas. Digest. lib. 19. tit. 5.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § III.

¹ The Words of the Digests are, Contra Quinti Mucii sententiam obtinuit, ut illud quoque consisterit, posse convenire, ut quis lucri partem ferat, de damno non teneatur. Yet it must be understood, that in several Matters of Partnership, if there be Gain on the one Side, and Loss on the other, nothing must be called Gain, but what remains when Losses are deducted: Quod tamen ita intelligi oportet, ut si in alia re lucrum, in alia damnum illatum sit; compensatione facta, solum quod superest, intelligatur lucro esse. Instit. ubi supra. § 2. See Dig. lib. 17. tit. 2. Leg. 29. § 1.

² So the Digests speak, Quod ita demum valebit ----- si tanti sit opera, quanti damnum est. Plerumque enim tanta est industria socii, ut plus societati conferat, quam pecunia: Item si solus naviget, si solus peregrinetur, pericula sibeat solus. Digest. ibid. But all that is said here of the Equality of the Portions of Gain, ought to be understood with this Restriction, If it be not otherwise agreed; for then the Consent of Parties supplies the Inequality of what each hath contributed of his own. Et quidem si nihil de partibus lucri & damni nominatim convenerit, aequales scilicet partes & in lucro & in damno spectantur. Quod si expressae fuerint partes, hoc servari debent. Nec enim unquam dubiam fuit, quin valeat conventio, si duo inter se pacti sunt, ut ad unum duae partes pertineant, ad alium tertia. Instit. ut supra, § 2.

³ The Digests so order, Aristo refert Cassium respondisse, societatem talem coiri non posse, ut alter lucrum tantum, alter damnum sentire, & hanc societatem Leoninam solum appellare ----- Iniquissimum enim genus societatis est, ex qua quis damnum, non etiam lucrum spectet. Digest. ut supra, § 2.

^a Compare Grotius, l. 2. c. 12. f. 24.

^b Vid. l. 29. f. 1. D. h. t.

^c Vid. l. 29. f. 2. D. h. t.

^d Ibid. f. 5.

^e Ibid. leg. 73.

^f Vid. l. 70. D. h. t.

^g D. L.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § IV.

¹ So the Digests speak, Societates contrahuntur sive universorum bonorum, sive negotiationis alicujus, sive castigalis, sive etiam rei unius. Digest. ibid. Leg. 5.

² Si societatem (say the Digests) universarum fortunarum ita coierint, ut quicquid erogaretur vel quaeretur, communis lucri atque impendii esset, ea quoque quae in honorem alterius liberorum erogata sint, utrinque imputanda. Ibid. Leg. 73.

³ Nulla societatis in aeternum coitio est. ibid. Leg. 70. The Roman Lawyers say, that tho' a Partnership hath been contracted with this express Clause, Never to separate; yet the very Nature of Society, which is the Source of Divisions and Disorders, if it be entirely free, requires, that it be permitted to each of the Partners to renounce it, when it seems good to him, provided he do it not at an unreasonable Time, and to the Prejudice of others. *Si convenerit inter socios, ne intra certum tempus communis Res divideretur, non videtur convnisse, ne societate abeat. Quid tamen si hoc convenerit, ne abeat, an valeat? Eleganter Pomponius scripsit frustra hoc convenerit. Nam etsi non convenerit, si tamen intempestive renunciatur societati, esse pro socio actionem. Sed etsi convenerit, ne intra certum tempus societate abeat, & ante tempus renunciatur, potest rationem habere renunciatio, nec tenebitur pro socio, qui ideo renunciavit, quia conditio quaedam, qua societas erat coita, ei non praesentatur; aut quid si ita injuriosus & damnosus socius sit, ut non expediat eum pati? Digest. ibid. Leg. 14. See the last Note of this Section. Quas discordias materiae communitatis solet excitare. Lib. 31. De Legatis & fidei commissis, 2. Leg. 77. § 20.*

ship longer than he desires; yet since a great ⁴ Degree of Fidelity is required among Partners, he ought not to break off unseasonably and to the detriment of others ⁵. Upon this Point Cicero ^b discourges very seriously ⁶: It is accounted, says he, a base thing to deceive a Partner in ever so small a matter, and with reason: For he who enters into Partnership does it in hopes of gaining to himself an Assistant: To whom therefore can he fly for Succour, that suffers from him on whom he depended? Those Crimes are of the blackest hue, against which there is the least guard: We may defend ourselves against the Malice of others, but to an intimate Friend we lie open. For how can we provide against a Partner, whom we cannot so much as suspect without violating our Duty? Well therefore did our Ancestors judge him who deceiv'd his Friend in this Point, fit to be reckon'd amongst the worst of Villains ⁶.

⁴ So the Digests order, Venit autem in hoc iudicium pro socio bona fides. Ibid. Leg. 52. § 1. Cum in societatis contractibus fides exuberet, &c. Cod. lib. 4. tit. 37. Pro Socio, Leg. 3. Socius socio utrum eo nomine tantum teneatur pro socio actione, si quid dolo commiserit, an culpa, i. e. desidia, quaesitum est. Praevaluit culpa nomine teneri cum, sed culpa non ad exactissimam, sed talem diligentiam, qualem rebus suis adhibere solet. Institut. ubi supra, § 9. Tribonian joins here two Laws of the Digests, Pro Socio, which do not agree together, viz. Leg. 52. § 2, & 58. See Mr. THOMASIVS's Discourse, De Culparum Praestatione in contractibus, c. 1. § 24. VINNIUS also owns, that the Reconciling of this Section with Leg. 33. of that Title of the Digests, De positi vel contra, is a Gordian Knot. As for me, I have laid down a general Rule about all Contracts, wherein we have the Affairs or Goods of another in our Hands after any manner, that we should act as we would do for ourselves, and our own Interest, in Things that most nearly concern us. And this Practice is the more just, because the Roman Lawyers say, that Partnership is a kind of Brotherhood. Societas jus quoddam fraternitatis in se habet. Digest. Pro Socio. Leg. 63. princ. But as for such Mischances as no human Foresight can prevent, neither of the Partners is responsible for them. Damna, quae in prudentibus (it should be read, as Mr. Bynkerhook observes, Obs. 10. 10. imprudentibus) accidunt, hoc est, damna fatalia, socii non cogentur praestare, Ib. Leg. 52. § 3.

⁵ TULLY's Words are, In rebus minoribus socium fallere turpissimum est -- neque injuria; propterea quod auxilium sibi se putat adjunxisse, qui cum alteri rem communicavit. Ad cuius igitur fidem confugiet, cum per ejus fidem laeditur, cui se commiserit? Atque ea sunt animadvertenda peccata maxime, quae difficillime praevocentur. Testi esse ad alienos possumus, intimi multa apertiora videantur necesse est; socium vero cavere qui possumus? Quem etiam metuimus, jus officii laedimus. Recte igitur majores cum, qui socium sefellisset, in virorum bonorum numero non putarunt haberi oportere. Orat. pro Roscio Amerino. Chap. 40.

⁶ The Digest thus speak, Labeo ----- scribit, si renunciaverit societati unus ex sociis eo tempore, quo interfuit socii non dirimi societatem, committere eum in pro socio actione. Nam si enim mancipia, inita societate, deinde renuncias mibi eo tempore, quo vendere mancipia non expevit, hoc casu, quia deteriore causam meam facis, teneri te pro socio iudicio. Digest. ubi supra. Leg. 65. § 5. of which see the rest.

^a Fid. l. 65. f. 5, &c. D. h. t.

^b Pro Sext. Roscio, c. 40. Add. Quintil. Decl. 320.

CHAP. IX.

Of Contracts depending on Chance.

- I. Bargains mixt with Chance.
- II. They are us'd, as well in Peace,
- III. As in War.
- IV. Contracts in laying Wagers.

- V. Contracts in Play.
- VI. Of Raffleings.
- VII. Of Lotteries.
- VIII. Of Insurance.

WE come now to such Contracts as depend upon Chance; where the Parties refer themselves to some ¹ uncertain Event, and give Security to stand to, and to be determin'd by it. Some of these indeed have no relation to Price, yet most of them have; and therefore we think fit to discourse of them all together in this Place.

II. These Contracts may be either publick or private. The publick are such as concern either War, or Peace. In Peace some Nations determine themselves by Lot ² in choosing Judges, in assigning Provinces, and in disposing of Offices, when the Competitors, both in respect of their Right and their Abilities, are equal; for otherwise should one have a better Right, his Right might be prejudic'd: Or should another have greater Abilities, the Commonwealth might suffer by it. For as Isocrates in Areopag. says, pag. 248. Ed. min. Paris. Fortune governs the Lot. ² And Callimachus in Hymn. Jovis, v. 63, 64. For a thing that each has an equal Title to, 'tis convenient to cast Lots. And Philstr. in vita Apol. Tyan. l. 3. c. 9. Fortune has no Prudence, so that the worst may be chosen by Lot. In such Cases the Parties are suppos'd to enter into Compact to acquiesce without Complaint in the Determination of the Lot, as having voluntarily submitted to it. And when a Superior uses Lots about that which he might enjoyn of his own Authority, he is suppos'd to depart from his Right, and of his own accord to submit himself to their Determination.

The Design of these Lots is not to search into the hidden ³ Decrees of God, unless where he positively

com-

Mr. BARBEYRAC's NOTES on Chap. IX. § I.

¹ Because of the Uncertainty, he to whom the Event is not favourable, can't reasonably complain of the Loss that has befallen him, and to which he submitted before hand. 'Tis the general Law of these Sorts of Contracts, to which we may refer Bargains of uncertain Hopes, of which our Author treats Chap. 5. § 6. above. Mr. HERTIUS also places in the Number of Contracts which are hazardous, the Rents of Ground lost, and Partnership in all Goods, both in present Possession, and future. See the Paræmie Jur. German. of the same Author, lib. 1. c. 43.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § II.

¹ Concerning all these Matters, see Hadrian Junius's Animadvers. lib. 2. c. 5. of the enlarged Edition in 1708. The Gataker speaks more exactly and fully in his English Book, Of the Nature and Use of divers kinds of Lots, c. 4 & 5. where he treats of this Matter, both historically, and as a judicious Moralist.

² Callimachus's Greek is, ἑστὶν ἰσοὺν γὰρ ἕκαστος Πότῳ. See also Justin. l. 1. c. 10. n. 2. & l. 18. c. 3. n. 9, 10.

³ They who believe that God is the Author of the Things effected by Lots, alledge the Text in the Proverbs, xvi. 33. The Lot is cast in the Lap (i. e. in the hollow of some Vessel) but the whole Disposal is of the Lord. But according to the Language of Scripture, no more is meant by it, than that Men are not Masters of the Effects wrought by Lots, as Mr. LE CLERE proves very well in his judicious Reflexions upon Mens good or bad Fortune in the Business of Lotteries, &c. c. 8. which the Reader would do well to peruse thoroughly. See also Gataker, of the Nature and Use of Lots, c. 8. § 3; &c. And Mr. LA PLANTIERE's Treatise Of hazardous Games, c. 2.

commands it ^a, but to put an end to Strifes and Differences ^b, or that a Person, who otherwise has Power to decide them by his own Authority, may avoid the odium of the Party against whom he decrees; and leave no room for a Complaint of the Injustice of the Sentence.

But in a Controversy where the Party cast is punishable by Law, 'tis absurd to apply any thing of Chance; for no Man ought to be punish'd, unless Matter of Fact be evidently prov'd against him: Whereas a Lot, let it fall out how it will, can never be able to undo what has been done, & vice versa; and therefore Lots are not capable of adjusting such Matters. But when a Multitude are in fault, and 'tis inconvenient for them all to suffer, then indeed the Criminals may be punish'd by Lot.

In private Affairs Lots are of great use, either in dividing ⁴ of Inheritances, or conferring upon one a Benefit, or a Burthen which cannot be divided, and yet which many have an equal Title to ^c.

III. Nor are such Pacts as these of less use in War, either when the Issue of the whole is thrown upon the Event of a Battle between both Armies ¹, or between two or more chosen out of each side ^d: Or when some dangerous and honourable Post is to be assigned, for which many are equally qualified ^e.

Indeed almost all solemn Wars, at least after all Terms of Peace have been rejected, seem to suppose an Agreement between both Parties, that which Side soever shall have the good Fortune to be Conqueror shall have Right to give Laws to the vanquish'd ²: and this is the Reason that no Party can ever urge as an Exception against any Treaty, that he was forced to it by Fear; for he who takes the Field, when the Controversy may be decided otherwise, is suppos'd to commit the Decision of it to the Sword, and therefore cannot complain whatever Condition the Chance of it imposes upon him. And this too is the Reason, that when they come to Articles, the Parties engaged are presumed to stand upon equal Grounds as to the Justice of their Cause, and whatever Mischief has been done on either side is forgiven, as suppos'd to have been done by Consent.

Such a Covenant as this do they enter into, who decide their Quarrel by a Duel, and therefore he that kills, is not oblig'd to make Satisfaction to the other's ³ Wife and Children for the Loss; for they join Battle by Agreement upon this Condition, to kill or to be kill'd. But since these Duels, when undertaken by private Men of their own Heads, directly thwart the End of civil Judicature, they are deservedly restrained by severe Penalties. Formerly indeed they were allowed of (but absurdly, and against the End of civil Government) either to clear a Man of a Crime objected, or to demonstrate his Right in Contest ^f. Thus heretofore in Germany a Point of Law, whether the Uncle, or the Son of the elder Brother deceas'd, should take place in the Father's Inheritance; was absurdly left to the Determination of a Duel ^g.

IV. Among these Contracts of Chance we may reckon ^h ¹ Wagers ⁱ, when two differ about some future or past Event, if not known to either Party, each laying down a certain Pledge, to be his, who shall happen to be in the Right. These Wagers seem to be reciprocal Promises, and conditional Bargains; which are so far mixt with Chance, as not having their Event depending on the Parties. The Riddle indeed propos'd by Sampson to his Friends, seems rather a Sport, than a Wager ^k, it being a contest of Wit, whether he could propose a Thing with greater Obscurity than they should answer with Acumen. But his Friends play'd foul, in solving his Riddle, not by their own Ingenuity, but by the Treachery of his Wife. Though perhaps it was not so very fair in him, to make a private Fact, and not some common matter the Subject of his Riddle. For 'tis almost impossible to find out such particular private Facts as those, by guessing ².

V. All Sorts of Plays ^l, where the Parties contend for something, carry with them a Covenant depending more or less upon Chance. And the more they admit of Ingenuity, Sleight, Cunning, or Strength, the less are they concern'd in Chance; and indeed are only so far dubious, as the degree of Strength or Dexterity is not as yet manifest, or, as some unforeseen Accident may interpose ¹, or as human Wit and ⁴ See Pf. xvi. 6. For the other two Passages quoted by the Author, relate only to such rare and extraordinary Occasions, as God over-rules the Lots in; ¹ every Tribe had his Portion of Land exactly in the Places where Jacob (Gen. xlix.) and Moses (Deut. xxxiii.) had foretold that they should be.

MR. BARB. NOTES on § III.

¹ See lib. 8. c. 8. § 5. following.

² See lib. 8. c. 8. § 1. following.

³ See lib. 3. c. 1. § 7. above.

MR. BARB. NOTES on § IV.

¹ They are allowed by the civil Law, provided they are not used about Things unlawful and dishonest: and he that wins them by fair Play, may recover them by Law. Si quis sponsonis causa annulos acceperit, nec reddit victori, prescriptis verbis actio in eum competit. --- Plane si inhonesta causa sponsonis fuit, sui annuli duntaxat repetitio est. Digest. lib. 19. tit. 5. De Praescriptis verbis, Leg. 17. § 5. See also lib. 11. tit. 5. De Aleatoribus, Leg. 3. Moreover, as Mr. TITUS on Lauterbach observes, Obierv. 294. when one lays a Wager about a Thing already done, the Wager is no less good, tho' one of the Contractors knows the Truth of it certainly. Indeed, whoever resolves willingly to lay a Wager with any one without knowing whether he is sure of what he maintains, or not, he must be thought to run the Hazard to engage a Person on the sure side, and consequently, if it so happens, must blame himself. And with great Reason he must do it, when one of the Wagers declares that he is perfectly well informed of the Matter in Debate, and tells the other so, that he may not engage in so rash a Wager. It is another Thing, when before the Wager is laid about an unknown Fact or Accident, one asks the other whether he knows any thing of it; for in this Case, if he seems to be ignorant of what he knows, merely to draw in the other to lay a Wager, he is guilty of Deceit, and so the Wager is void. See my Treatise of Gaming, lib. 2. c. 2. § 16. where this Question is fully handled.

² See Mr. LE CLERC on Judg. xiv. 12. &c.

^a See Prov. xvi. 33. ^b See Prov. xviii. 18. ^c Add. Numb. xxiv. 13. Jos. xiv. 2. Psal. xvi. 6. ^d Vid. Grat. L. 2. c. 23. f. 10. & l. 3. c. 20. f. 42. ^e Vid. Hom. II. n. v. 171. ^f Vid. Jur. Canon. tit. 10. De purgatione vulgaris, & pag. fm Cod. Legum antiquarum Lindenbrogii, c. 13; Glossarium in Vocabulo Campio & Duellum. ^g Apud Sigibertum Gemblacensem ad ann. 942. ^h Sponsores. ⁱ See Mr. Barbeyrac's first Note upon this Section. ^k Judg. xiv. 12. &c.

^l Vid. Virg. Aen. l. 5. v. 328.

MR. BARB. NOTES on § V.

¹ I have search'd this Matter to the Bottom in my Treatise of Gaming, Printed in 1709 and Industry does not exert it self so much at some times, as it does at others, Many are dependent both upon Chance and Skill, as Gaming at Cards, and the like; others are entirely at the Mercy of Chance, as Dice. None of which are naturally unlawful; for it is by Consent that we engage in them, and each Party ventures equally, and plays for Things that are in his own Disposal. But because the Publick is concern'd that no Man should mispend his Estate; and a Man may be easily undone by Gaming³, if he plays high⁴; at least⁵ much Time, which is a precious Thing, may be consumed in it⁶, and because it is frequently the Occasion of Quarrels⁷, and several other⁸ Inconveniences; it is therefore the Business of the Government to consider, how far Gaming should be permitted, and how high⁴; but generally speaking, those Plays seem most allowable, that admit least Chance, and most Ingenuity, and vice versa. Now in all sorts of Gaming's is a standing Rule, that no foul Play be made use of, ⁶ For they that run in a Race are suppos'd to contend by Swiftness, not by Tricks; to endeavour at the Victory by Speed, not by laying on of Hands, or tripping up the Heels of their Adversaries ^c.

VI. Of the several sorts of Gaming that which we call¹ Raffing is, when many contribute towards the Purchase of a Thing, and then leave it to Chance which one shall have the whole. In this there are two sorts of Contracts; for in respect of him who exposes his Goods, it is Selling; in respect of them to whom they are expos'd, it is casting Lots for them. For, by Agreement, he whom Fortune favours is to have the whole; and the rest are to be at the Loss of what they contributed. The Rule here is, that the whole of the Money contributed should equal, and not exceed the Value of the Commodity: And that every one of the Contributors should have an equal Chance for it, in Proportion to their Contributions.

VII. Another sort is, when a certain Number of Tickets, ¹ Benefits and Blanks, are cast into a Glass, and several, at certain Rates, buy the Liberty of drawing them with this Condition, that he who draws a Benefit shall receive the Value inscribed upon it.

This something resembles our Lotteries, and comes nearest to that Sort of Contract, which we call the Purchase of Hope, tho' there be Hazard enough with it. The Rule here is, That the Price of all the Tickets should not much exceed the Value of the Benefits; I say, not much, for Charges are to be consider'd, and the best Benefits may happen to be drawn first, and if so, People won't be so forward to venture upon the remaining Tickets.

Such Lotteries as these are sometimes set up to collect Money for publick Buildings, or for the Relief of the Poor; in which Case, the Price of all the Tickets together is generally much larger than the Value of the Benefits: which Overplus is in the Nature of Alms and Charity given after a free and cheerful manner^h.

But, in fine, for an Equality in Gaming, it is not only requisite that the Venture on each Side should be equal: but also that the Danger of losing, and the probability of winning should bear Proportion to the Thing contend'd for; v. g. in a Game that depends upon Skill or Ingenuity, if one Man is twice as skilful as the other, it is fit he should lay down a double Stake. So if ten lay down each of them a Guinea for him that throws highest, it may seem unreasonable that he who ventures but one Guinea should gain nine; but then we must consider, that it is nine times more probable that he loses, than he wins. Upon which Ground some¹ ² think it a foolish thing to be afraid of

² See Mr. PLACETTE'S Treatise of Hazardous Games, c. 6. who can't be supposed to be inclined to loose Opinions. A learned English Divine a long time ago confuted those of his own Profession, who absolutely condemn'd all hazardous Games, as in themselves contrary to Christianity, very fully. It was Mr. Gataker, in his forementioned Book of Lots, Chap. 6, 7, 8. and he has also, in Chap. 9. laid down such Conditions as he thinks Gaming may be allowed on. This Book I saw not till my Treatise of Gaming was printed, otherwise I should have had regard to so considerable an Authority. Was the vanity of hazardous Playing ever so great! for you compose yourselves to be content to hazard your Money in the Gamehouses. You carry your Pockets full of Pistoles to lose them at one cast of the Dice. See the following Verses:

³ JUVENAL'S Words are, ----- Alca quando
Hos animos! Neque enim loculis comitantibus itur.
Ad casum tabulæ, posita sed laetatur arcâ.

⁴ OVID'S Words are these: Quique alii lesus (neque enim nunc persequar omnes)
Perdere rem charam, tempora nostra solent.

⁵ Nothing is more fine or true than the following Verses of Mad. Desboulivres, which, tho' every where known, yet it may not be unpleasant to read them here:

Pleasures are bitter, when they are abus'd;
It is good to play a little to divert;
But we must let it only amuse us.
The Player, at the first sight,
Hath nothing human but his Appearance.
And further, nothing is so easy as to imagine

That he is an honest Man, and plays high.
The desire of Getting, which haunts us Night and Day,
Is a dangerous Spur.
Tho' our Thoughts and Intentions be often good,
We begin by being deluded,
And conclude by being cheated.

See also the Sixth serious and comical Amusement.

⁶ CICERO'S Words are, Scitô Chrysiippus, ut multa: Qui stadium, inquit, currit, citi & contendere debet, quam maxime possit, ut vincat; supplantare eam quicum certet, aut manu depellere, nullo modo debet.

Mr. BARB. NOTE on § VI.

¹ The Author says Lotaria, which I express'd in my first Edition by Lottery; but it may be better rendred Raffing.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § VII.

¹ This I conceive is meant by Olla Fortunæ in our Author, tho' it can't be exactly rendred in every Language, most Countries having some Terms proper to them. See my Treatise of Gaming, lib. 2. c. 2. § 11. where I oppose the Author of the Art of Thinking, who condemn: Lotteries in general, as Arts of Cheating.

² This is all taken out of the Art of Thinking, Part 4. Chap. 16. tho' our Author quotes it not.

^a Jur. S. 1. v. 88, &c.

^b Ovid. Trist. l. 2. v. 483, 484.

^c The Alcoran, together with Wine, forbids those Plays which depend on Chance, because they administer frequent Occasions of Quarrelling, Cap. de Merju.

^d Vid. L. 11. t. 5.

D. de aleatoribus, & ibi: juris Romani interpretes, Phocius, Nomocan. Tit. 13. c. 29. Selden de Jure. N. & G. jec. Heb. l. 6. c. 11.

^e Ambr. Off. 3. c. 4. Which is taken from the Saying of Chrysiippus in Cic. Off. 3. c. 10.

^f Lotaria.

^g Olla Fortunæ.

^h Add. Martin Delrio Disquisit. Magic. l. 4. c. 4.

ⁱ This may be seen more at large in Mr. Bouhour's Art of Thinking, Part 4. Chap. 16. and the list, whence our Author has taken most of this Section.

Thunder, for of 2,000000 Men perhaps not one may perish by it; and therefore not only the greatness of the Evil, but the probability of its not happening ought to be considered.

VIII. To these Contracts that of Insuring bears some Affinity; when for a certain Sum a Man takes upon him the risque that Goods are to run in Transportation from Place to Place, chiefly by Sea; which, if they happen to be lost, the Insurer is bound to make good. This Contract is null, if either the Insurer knows for certain that the Goods be already safe, or the Merchant that they be lost. For the Master of this Contract is suppos'd to be a Loss considered as uncertain. Whereas, if the Insurer is certain that the Goods are arriv'd safe, he runs no Risque; and if the Owner knows that they are lost, he can't demand another to run the Risque of them; for what is not in Being can't be liable to Risque.

^a De Legibus de Jure Maritimo, l. 2. c. 5. ^b L. 23. c. 49. ^c L. 25. c. 3. ^d See Mr. LaPlacette's

As for the Price of such Insuring, it is to be stated by the common Rate, or by the Agreement of the Parties. Thus much is certain, that the more or greater the Dangers are, which the Commodity is expos'd to, the greater Rate may be demanded for Insuring it; as if the Seas be infested by Enemies and Pirates, more may be demanded, than if only the Uncertainty of Tempests were apprehended. And in respect of them too, more in Winter than in Summer ^a. This Contract I have mention'd here, because in respect of the Insurer it chiefly depends on Chance. There is mention made in Livy ^b of an Insuring which cost nothing, for they who bought up Cloth and Corn to be transported to Spain, demanded, That what was on Board should be insur'd by the Publick from the Danger of the Enemy and the Seas; but what cheats were committed by this means we may read in the same Author ^c ^d.

Treatise of Rijndam, B. 4. c. 15. where he treats of Insuring.

CHAP. X.

Of accessory Bargains.

- I. Accessory Contracts of two Sorts.
- II. Variety of additional Bargains.
- III. An additional Bargain, if it's lewd, is void.
- IV. Sometimes it disorders Business.
- V. Being presently added, is valid, if other Things agree.
- VI. Being added after some time, in the negative, is liable to an Exception.
- VII. Being affirmative, how far 'tis good.
- VIII. Of Trusting.

- IX. A Surety can't be engaged for more than the Debtor.
- X. But he may be more strictly bound.
- XI. What Advantages the Law allows a Surety.
- XII. Of Bails.
- XIII. The use of Pawns.
- XIV. A Pawn is either fruitful, or barren.
- XV. Whether a Pawn may be gained by Use.
- XVI. What is the difference between a Mortgage and a Pawn.

THAT being done with principal Contracts that subsist by themselves, I come now to those that are only accessory, and have no existence, but as they are added to others. These may be divided into two Sorts; for some are apply'd in order to add, or take away something from the principal Contract, and these the Civilians call additional Pacts: others are added only as a Confirmation and Security to Contracts already completed.

II. The Roman Lawyers ^a distinguish between such additional Pacts as are added before, or immediately upon the entire completion of the principal Contract, so as in a manner to be part of it; and such as are added sometime after: Then they examine whether the Contracts, to which they are added, be such as admit of Equity, or such as are tied up to the rigour of the Law; and lastly, whether they affect the essentials of the Contracts, or such Things as naturally flow from them, or such only as are accidental to them. Whereof the first are so necessary, as that no Contract can be without them; the second generally proceed from the Contract, altho' they be not express; yet so as they may be varied by the Parties without affecting the essence of it: the last have no dependence at all upon the essence of the Contract, but owe their Being purely to the pleasure of the Parties. Moreover, they think it ought to be considered, whether these Pacts be added to increase, or to lessen the Obligation.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on Chap. X. §. II.

¹ See above, Chap. 2. §. 2. 8.

² Such is the Consent of Parties, without which no Contract can be made. The exposing of Goods, and setting the Price are particularly essential to a Bargain of Sale.

³ 'Tis a natural quality of all Contracts, that each of the Contractors is answerable for what he is faulty: Yet it may be agreed, that he shall not be responsible at all, or that he shall be answerable more or less for any thing elsewhere done, by virtue of the nature of a Contract. See § 5. following.

⁴ As when a Buyer engaged, that in case of Conviction, the Seller shall forfeit four times the Price of the Goods, or when they agree to give some Security, or to leave some Pledge in hand, &c. See § 5. following.

⁵ See § 6, 7. following, and Cujacius's Observations 14. 28. Francisc. Hotoman's Quæst. illustres 36, 37. This Matter is much perplexed by the Interpreters, by reason of the subtle Distinctions which the antient Lawyers have confounded the Law with, and the Obligation dispersed through the Fragments which we have of their Writings. See what Mr. THOMASius says in his Discourse De juri practico accuratè distinct. inter empt. cum pacto de retrovend. & contractum pignori. Chap. 11. § 10.

^a Inst. D. lib. 2. t. 14. de Pactis, l. 7. § 5

III. Concerning all which we may form these following Conclusions: I. A Pact so affecting the Essence of a Contract, as to make it unlawful, or against good Manners, is null. For we have proved above, that no such Covenant can stand good. Thus if a Bride should add a Clause to her Contract of Marriage, by which she might be allowed the Use of other Men; or, if a Steward should add it as a Condition, that he should be permitted to imbezil his Master's Goods, they would neither be valid. So it would be absurd for a Man to make a Bargain, and at the same time to protest that he is fore'd or frightened into it; or, for a Man in any Contract whatsoever to confess that he does not design to deal honestly^a.

IV. II. When the Pact so affects the Essence of the Contract, as utterly to change the Form of it, Regard must be had to the Intent of the Contractors. For if they designed the Contract, according to the Import of the words in which it is express'd, 'tis plain that the Pact which is repugnant to it must be null; for they cannot be suppos'd to will things, which are inconsistent and destructive of each other. Thus it would be ridiculous, if a Man should pretend to buy, and yet add such a Condition, as would make it impossible for him to receive the Commodity, and the other the Money; or, if he should sell a House, as to make over the Property of it to the Tenant; or to enter into Partnership, so as to have neither the Gain nor the Loss in common.

But if the Parties did really intend the Change, and mistook only in the wording of it, or for some certain Reasons chose to speak improperly, provided it be not against the Laws, it will stand good, and not be qualsh'd for the Impropriety of a Term^{a b}.

V. III. Pacts which are added immediately upon the completion of the Contract, whether they concern the Essentials of it, or those Things which naturally flow from it, or those which are purely accidental to it, are valid, if they be not repugnant to Law. For since both Parties are here suppos'd to have Power to dispose of these Things, they must be oblig'd to what they consent to; thus, although it be natural in buying and selling, that the Buyer be put in Possession of the Commodity, yet the Parties by an additional Pact may order it otherwise^c.

Thus the Obligation to make good a Defect may be augment'd or diminish'd, beside what the nature of the Contract would otherwise admit of; and the same obtains in consensual Contracts^d, if between the completion and the execution of them a Pact be added; for this is the same thing as if the Parties proceeded upon a new Contract.

The purchase of an Annuity seems to be such a sort of borrowing, as may be refer'd hither. For I receive Money upon Condition to pay such a certain Man so much Interest as long as he lives, provided, that after his Death the Principal be my own; whereas otherwise the Nature of a Loan requires, that the Principal be return'd to the Creditor, or his Heirs.

VI. IV. A Pact added to a Contract some time after its Completion, if it be negative and designed to take from the Obligation, and so made in Favour of the Debtor or Defendant, is valid. Thus some time after a Debt has been contracted, the Creditor and Debtor may enter into Covenant concerning the putting off the Payment, the Changing the Place of it, the Species of Money, the forgiving the Interest, &c.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § III.

¹ See what I have said upon lib. 3. chap. 7. § 6. note 2.

² This is decided by the Roman Lawyers. Illud non probabis, dolum non esse præsumam, si convenerit: Nam hæc Conventio contra bonam fidem, contraque bonos mores est: & ideo nec sequenda est. Digest. lib. 16. tit. 3. Depositi, vel contra. Leg. 1. § 7. See also § 35. and lib. 50. tit. 17. De regulis Juris, Leg. 23.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § IV.

¹ This must be supposed in a dubious Case, says Mr. HERTIUS here, who quotes this Maxim about it: Contractus non tam nomine quam animo contrahentium æstimantur, as it is found in the Digests, lib. 19. tit. 2. locati, conducti, Leg. 15. § 4. but there is nothing like it, neither in that Law, nor two others, which the same Author points at afterward, Digest. lib. 16. tit. 3. Depositi, &c. Leg. 24, 26. where we only find some Examples, which may have a Reference in some manner to this Subject.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § V.

¹ So the Digests speak, Contractus enim legem ex conventionem accipiunt. Digest. Depositi, &c. Leg. 1. § 6. Vid. Leg. 24, 26. § 1. Lib. 2. tit. 14. De Pactis, Leg. 7. § 5. Lib. 18. tit. 1. De contrahendâ empt. &c. Leg. 7. § 1. Leg. 79. & Institut. lib. 3. tit. 26. De Societate, § 1, 2.

² We may here set down a Sale with a Clause of Commission. Aldicio in diem, and a Clause for leaving a Bargain, and one of taking Goods upon Trial, i. e. on Condition, if they don't agree, the Seller shall take them again. See above, Chap. 5. § 2. and 4. As also that Sort of Contract, by which one lends a certain Sum on a Lost Fund, i. e. that he who hath received it on that Condition, shall pay Interest, either to ourselves, during Life, or to another Person, as long as he lives; but after the Death of the Person nominated, then the Principal is his to whom it was lent: Whereas commonly, such is the Nature of a Loan, that the Sum borrowed may be called in by him that lent it, or his Heirs, which last the Author mentions.

³ See Chap. 2. § 6. above.

⁴ The Words of the Digests are, Ut constat in emptione, ceterisque bonæ fidei judiciis, re nondum secutâ posse abiri ab emptione. Si igitur in totum potest, cur non & pars ejus pactione mutari potest? ----- ut quodammodo quasi renovatus contractus videatur.

^a Vid. D. lib. 16. t. 3. Depos. vel contra, L. 1. § 7. & § 35. ^b Vid. D. lib. 18. t. 1. de contrah. empt. &c. L. 80. f. 3. lib. 19. t. 5. De præscript. verb. Sec. L. 4. & 6. & lib. 17. tit. 2. pro Socio, L. 5. l. 2. ^c Vid. D. lib. 19. t. 1. De ali. empt. & vendit. L. 11. f. 18.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § VI.

¹ See above Chap. 2. f. 3. Vid. D. lib. 2. t. 14. De pactis, L. 7. f. 5. lib. 18. t. 1. De contrah. empt. L. 72.

VII. V. By the Law of Nature, as far as bare Paſt is capable of Action, a Paſt added to a Contract ſome time after its Completion, although it increaſes the Obligation, and ſo turns in Favour of the Creditor or Plaintiff, may be valid. For the Reason why the Roman Law denies it (viz. becauſe a bare affirmative Paſt does not bear an Action) is out of the Verge of the Law of Nature ¹. Thus ſuppoſe I had bought a Commodity, which by the Bargain is to be delivered by ſuch a Day, if afterwards we covenant to have it deliver'd ſooner, there is no Reason but that I ſhould receive the Benefit of it. Or, ſuppoſe I let you my Houſe for two Years, and we afterwards by Conſent limit the Time to one, at the End of the Year you ought to quit Poſſeſſion; but then I can't demand the Rent that would be due for the other Year. And thus in Loan of Money, I don't ſee why the time of Payment may not be anticipated as well as put off by an ² an additional Compact ^b; nay altho' no Allowance be made to the Debtor for this ³ Anticipation, yet he has no Injury done him, if he voluntarily ſubmits to it. But 'tis manifeſt, that his Obligation ought not to be increas'd againſt his Will, and therefore naturally as much as is added to him by this ſubſequent Paſt, ought to be taken off ſomewhere elſe. Thus, if the Creditor will have me pay him at another Place, than that which we agreed upon, I on the other Hand can fairly demand an Agreement of ſo much as it is my Intereſt to pay it in the former. But 'tis againſt the Nature of Chartering and chargeable Contracts, that any Paſt ſhould be added to increaſe the Obligation ſo much on one ſide, as to make an Inequality; as if the Buyer and Seller ſhould agree upon ſuch a Price, being the true Value of the Commodity; and yet afterwards ſhould covenant, that the Buyer ſhould pay more than the Commodity is worth. Unleſs this be a mixt Contract of buying and giving, I can't ſee how the additional Price can be demanded ^c.

VIII. Hither I think may be referr'd what we call a ^d Truſt, ¹ when we make over to another the Property of a Thing upon Condition to have it reſtor'd again; which I mention among the Additional Paſts, rather than the principal Contracts, becauſe it is always added upon the Delivery of the Thing. And this ſeems to be call'd a ² Truſt; becauſe, whereas otherwiſe, when the Property of a Thing is made over to another, he may diſpoſe of it as he pleaſes, and either keep it himſelf for ever, or part with it to another; by this additional Paſt we ſeem to truſt to his Honour and Honesty, that he will not uſe his Property otherwiſe than according to Agreement, and will be willing to part with it again upon Demand. And therefore the ſolemn Form of this Contract among the Romans ran, ³ As honeſt Men ought to deal together, without Deceit. And becauſe the Truſt was ſo very extraordinary, the Breach of it was therefore branded with a particular Infamy by the Roman Laws. ⁴ There are Three private Concerns, upon the honeſt Diſcharge of which a Man's Reputation and almoſt his Life depends, A Truſt, Guardianſhip, and Partnership, Cic. pro Roſcio, c. 6. If a Guardian ought to be faithful, if a Partner, if one entrusted with a Commiſſion, if one that has received a Truſt, Id. Topicis.

⁵ He who by means of his Truſt has defrauded any one, is condemned immediately, II. pro Cæcilia, c. 3. But in what Matters the Romans interpoſ'd this Truſt, you may meet with every where amongſt their Lawyers. ⁶ De Fiduciario Patre,

MR. BARR. NOTES on § VII.

¹ This is call'd in one Word Conſtitutio, or Pecunia conſtituta.

² It has it in D. L. 1, as appears by theſe two Laws, of which our Author quotes the Firſt; and by this we may obſerve that there is a Connexion there is between the Principles and the Determination of the Roman Law. Si is, qui & Jure Civili & Prætorio deſert, in diem ut obligatus, an cogitur ante tenetur? Et Labo ait teneri [conſtitutum] ----- adſcipt, vel propter has potiffimum ꝑcedunt, ut non ſunt ꝑ ꝑfect, conſtituta indicat: quæ ſententiam non invidus ꝑ harem, habet enim utilitatem, ut ex die obligatus, cogitur ſe eadem die ſoluturam, tenetur. Sed & ſi citiore die conſtituat ſe ſoluturam, ſimiliter tenetur. Digest. ubi ſupra, Leg. 3. § 2. Leg. 4.

^a In the Laws before-cited.

^b Fil. lib. 13. t. 5. l. 3. f. 2. D. de conſtit. pecun.

^c Compare Ann. Vinnii traſt. de paſtis, c. 9, &c. ^d Eliaſta.

MR. BARR. NOTES on § VIII.

¹ 'Tis the Definition that Bætius gives in his Commentary upon Cicero's Topicis, cap. 10. Fiduciari accipere dicitur is, cui res aliqua mancipatur, ita ut ea ſolvendo mancipanti remaneret. "As for Example, ſaith he, If in a Conjunction, when we ſay that we ſhall be ſtript of our Goods, we pray ſome potent Friend to buy of us ſome Land, making him promiſe that he'll ſell it to us again at the ſame Price, as ſoon as the Danger is over." Veluti ſi quis tempus dubium timens, amico potentiori fundum mancipet, ut ei, cum tempus, &c.

² See J. MELNARD upon Tully's Oration pro Q. Roſcio Comædo, Chap. 6. in Tom. 1. of Grævius's Edition, and J. Vincent Grævii. Orig. J. r. Civili, lib. 2. p. 448, 449.

³ Ut inter bonos bene eger oportet, & ſine Fraudatione; vid. Cicero. de Offic. L. 3. c. 17. & in Topicis, c. 10. & ad Famil. L. 7. Ep. 12.

⁴ Cicero's Words are, Si quæ enim ſunt præcæta judicia ſummæ exilimationis, & pene dicam capitis, tria hæc ſunt, fiducia, tutela, ſocietas. Eꝑeculæ perſidioſum & nefarium eſt fidem frangere, quæ continet vitam: & pupillum fraudare, qui in tutelam pervenit: & ꝑctum fallere, qui ſe in negotio conjunxit. Cic. Orat. pro Roſcio Comædo, Chap. 6. See alſo pro Cæcilia, cap. 3.

⁵ Moreover, This Head of Truſt hath Place in diverſe Sorts of Affairs, viz. making the Heir of a Family free, Poſſeſſion for a Time only, Guardianſhip, lending upon Pawns, and a firm Truſt. As to the firſt of theſe, among the Ancient Romans, if a Father would make his Son free, he muſt ſell him 3 times as a Slave, to a Perſon who promiſes him to ſell him to him again, who was therefore call'd Pater fiduciarius. After which the true Father having redeemed his Son, he enfranchiſeth him, and ſo his Freedom is effected. See GAIUS's Inſtitut. l. 6. and ROſINUS's Antiq. Rom. lib. 9. cap. 10. But at length theſe pretended Sales were aboliſhed, and it was ordain'd that the Fathers ſhould appear alone, and declare to the Judges, that they renounced their Paternal Power over that Child that they made free. See Inſtitut. lib. 1. c. 12. § 6. See Mr. THOMASII's Diſcourſe De quaſi-emancipatione Germanorum, printed at Hall 1703. This Freedom produced a particular Effect as to the Succeſſion of Fathers to the Goods of their Children. About which ſee the Inſtitutes, lib. 3. tit. 2. De legitimâ Agnatorum ſucceſſione, § 8. and Code, lib. 8. tit. 49. De emancipationibus liberorum, Leg. 6. Of Lending upon Pawns, ſee SALMASIUS's Treatiſe of Uſury, cap. 4. & de modo Uſurarum, cap. 14. and Mr. NOODP's Obſervat. lib. 2. c. 7, 8. as alſo Mr. THOMASII's Diſcourſe De Uſu præctico accuratæ diſtinctionis inter emptionem cum ꝑcto de retrovendendo, & contraſtu. Pignoratitium, Printed at Hall in 1707. c. 1. § 3. &c. 2. § 20. &c.

Patre, Vid. Caium, Instit. 1, 6. "A Trust was contracted in Childrens succeeding to their Father's Goods". Vid. lib. iii. t. 2. f. ult. Inst. de legit. agnat. success. L. ult. lib. viii. 49. c. de emanc. liber. de fiduciaria possessione. Vid. Budæum ad l. 2. lib. i. t. 2. D. orig. juris. Greg. Tholosan. Syntag. juris l. xxiii. c. 5. f. 2. Vid. Inst. l. 1. t. 19. De tutela fiduciaria. Vid. Bachov. ad d. t. Instit. De fiducia circa pignus contracta. Vid. Ibid. Etymol. l. v. c. 25. Cujac. ad Pauli recept. sent. l. 2. t. 13. Sic & in fidei commissis instar fiducis intercedit. Vid. princ. l. 2. t. 23. Inst. de fidei commiss. & ibi Bachov. &c. We have an Example of this sort of Trust in Livy. L. xxxii. c. 38. "So Alboinus delivered up Pannonia to his Friends the Hænni, upon Condition, that if the Longobards should ever have occasion to return, they should restore it back. Vid. Paul. Warnetried. de gestis Longobard, L. ii. C. 7. Nabarzanes (in Curtius. l. v. c. 9.) advises Darius to make over his Kingdom to Bessus for a time, so as to receive it back again when Things should be settled. Hercules having subdued Sparta placed Tynlarus the Father of the Diocæri in the Throne, which being his by Conquest, he enmeshed with him, upon Condition that he would restore it safe and sound to Hercules's Sons. Diod. Sic. l. iv. t. 33. Boetius (in Topic. Cic. ubi supr.) brings a Case with, "If a Man fearing the badness of the Times should make over in Trust a Farm to a powerful Friend, to return it, when Times should mend." Philip, when he saw that he must fight, raises Forces in all Paris, and being solicitous for the City of Argos, thought it best to put it into the hands of Nabis King of Lacedæmon in Trust, to be restor'd again, if he return'd with Success: but if not, to be kept for himself.

Among the Turks, if a Man swears to put away his Wife, altho' he immediately repents of it, he is yet oblig'd to stand to his Oath; but in order to recover her again, he enters into a Trust with his Friend, and gets him to marry her, and immediately after to part with her. For, after a Divorce, unless the Woman be married again, she can't return to her first Husband ^a.

But such a Trust as evades the force of the Law, ought not to be contracted; as if I should give a Man, who is free from Taxes, my Estate in Trust, in order to cheat the Tax-gatherers.

IX. As for such Paçts as are added by way of Confirmation and Security to Contracts already completed, the most usual is that by which one Man gets another to be bound for him, so as to be responsible, in case he should fail. This personal Security is required in these three Cases:

First, Between Man and Man for the performance of something valuable, which is call'd Suretyship. Secondly, In criminal Affairs, which is commonly call'd Bail. Thirdly, In publick Concerns, where Security is given by ³ Hostages.

For the right understanding the nature of Suretyship, we must look back to the last Section of the second Chapter of this Book, to which we add, that being bound for another, we make our selves so far liable, as that if he does not pay the Debt, we must. But then recourse may be had to the principal Debtor ⁴, and the whole, with the Charges, may be recover'd of him. Now since Suretyship is only an additional Confirmation to a Contract ⁵, the Surety cannot naturally be oblig'd to more than the Principal ^b; so that if the Principal was obliged only Conditionally, the Surety cannot be obliged, unless the Conditions be made good, nor can he be confin'd to such a Time or Place which the other was not obliged to. And whatsoever ⁶ Exceptions the Debtor might make, the

⁶ See above in Chap. 2. f. 6. Vid. D. lib. 2. t. 14. de pactis, L. 7. f. 6. Vid. Leg. 58. & lib. 18. t. 1. De contrab. empt. L. 72. t. 4. De rescindendâ vendit. L. 1, 2. & C. lib. 4. t. 45. Quando licet ab emptione Discedere, L. 1.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § ix.

¹ See above, lib. 2. c. 4. § 18. and § 12. of this Chapter.

² See lib. 8. c. 9. § 12, 13. following.

³ See ibid. § 6.

⁴ The Digests say, Fidejussor in judicio sistendi causâ locuples videtur dari, non tantum ex facultatibus, sed etiam ex conveniendâ facilitate, Digest. lib. 2. tit. 8. Qui satis dare cogatur, &c. Lib. 2. princ. But when once a Man is taken by us for a Surety, we ought to be satisfied, unless he become poor thro' some sudden Accident. Qui ex causâ improbat ab arbitro probatos, alios improbatos probat: multoque magis si suâ voluntate accepit fidejussores, contentus his esse debet. Quod si medio tempore calamitas fidejussoribus insignis, vel magna iroribus accidit; causâ cognitâ ex integro satisfilandum erit. Ibid. Leg. 10. § 1.

⁵ The Words of the Law are, Fidejussores ita obligari non possunt, ut plus debeant, quam debet is, pro quo obligantur. Nam eorum obligatio, accessio est principalis obligationis: nec plus in accessorio potest esse, quam in principali re. At ex diverso, ut minus debeant, obligari possunt. Itaque si reus dæmon avocatus promiserit, fidejussor in quinque rellâ obligatur: contra vero obligari non potest. Item si ille purè promiserit, fidejussor sub condicione promittere potest: contra vero non potest. Non solum autem in quantitate, sed etiam in tempore plus vel minus intelligitur, plus est enim statim aliquid dare, minus est, post tempus dare. Inst. lib. 3. tit. 21. This Maxim is carried so far, that if the Surety hath answer'd a bigger Sum than what the Debt amounts to, he is obliged to no more. Illud enim non est in universis, qui pro aliis obligantur: quod si fuerint in duriores causam adhibiti, placuit eos omnino non obligari: in leviores planè causam accipi possunt. Propter quod in minorem summam rellâ fidejussor accipietur. Ibid. Leg. 8. § 7.

⁶ The Words of the Digests are, Ex persona rei, & quidem invito reo, exceptio & cætera rei commoda fidejussori, cæterisque accessionibus competere potest, Digest. ubi supra Leg. 32. Si is, qui fidejussorem dedit, ideo non fuerit, quod Republicæ causâ abfuit, iniquum est fidejussorem ob alium necessitate solum obligatum esse, cum ipsi liberum esset non sistere, lib. 2. tit. 11. Si quis cautionibus, &c. Leg. 6. The Author quotes also Lib. 2. tit. 14. De pactis, Leg. 32. lib. 3. tit. 3. De Procur. & Detentoribus, Leg. 51. lib. 14. tit. 6. De Senatuc. Maced. Leg. 9. § 3. lib. 16. tit. 2. De Compensationibus Leg. 4. 5. Inst. lib. 4. tit. 14.

^a Moncony's Itiner. Tom. 1. p. 465. compared with Olearius Itiner. Persic. l. 5. c. 23. ^b Fidejussores ita obligari non possunt, ut plus debeant, quam debet is, pro quo obligantur, &c. Instit. l. 3. t. 21. de Fidejussoribus. ^c Vid. lib. 2. t. 11. D. si quis cautionibus & lib. 2. t. 14. L. 32. D. de pactis, lib. 3. l. 3. L. 51. D. De procurat. lib. 14. t. 6. L. 9. 3. de Senat. Macedon. l. 16. t. 2. l. 4. l. 5. D. De excepç.

the Surety can plead to his Advantage. ⁷ One that orders another to trust a third Person, does the same thing as if he made himself a Surety; for by such an Order he is presumed to interpose his Credit. But if he gives Order for 1000*l.* and the Person takes up but 500*l.* he will stand responsible for no more than was taken up; for the meaning of the Order was, that he should have Credit as far as 1000*l.* But tho' the Surety cannot be obliged to more than the Principal, yet he may sometimes ⁸ be obliged to less; as when he undertakes for only Part of the Debt, or for the whole, under certain Restrictions, or upon Condition that the time of Payment should be prolonged, or a more convenient Place assigned for it.

The End and Design of Suretyship makes it appear, that the Surety ought to be a Man of Substance and Credit, and able to answer the Creditor's Suite, which indeed is suppos'd by the Creditor's Acceptance of him. And therefore Vulcan (in Homer. Odys. viii. v. 352, 353.) when Neptune offer'd to be a Surety for Mars, replies, That the Security was as bad as the Debt; for if Mars should run away, how should he be able to seize upon Neptune among the Gods?

X. But yet it is not impossible but the Surety may lie under a greater and stricter Obligation than the Principal; for he interposes himself of his own Accord, the more to confirm the principal Contract, without whom the Creditor had not enter'd into it. And indeed Necessity forces some People to contract a Debt, but nothing but Generosity, and an Ostentation of Kindness, and a Confidence in his Riches engages the Surety in another's Concern. And therefore the Creditor has sometimes more Reason to blame the Sureties, than the Principal; for it was upon their Account that he trusted at all, and they certainly are to be blam'd, who without the utmost Necessity derive a Burthen upon themselves, which they ought to have known they were not able to bear. And therefore wise ¹ Men every where dissuade us from Suretyship, unless we would involve our selves in unnecessary Evils ². The Romans kindly provided for the easiness of Women by the Velleian Decree ³; and by the Roman Law the Principal satisfied the whole Debt ⁴ by giving up all he was worth, though not sufficient to discharge the Debt ⁵; ⁶ which Favour was not indulg'd the Surety ⁷. For he was look'd upon as call'd in for the Relief of the Creditor, that in case ⁸ the Principal should prove insolvent, the Debt might be recovered of him. Tho' indeed this way of satisfying a Debt, by parting with all a Man is worth, is altogether unknown to the Law of Nature; unless common Humanity may plead, that if a Man be brought to want by some fatal Calamity, and not by Luxury or Idleness, it ought to suffice, if we strip him of his Patrimony, and not proceed any farther against his Person.

Besides, the ⁹ Surety may be more strictly oblig'd than the Principal, in Case he takes upon him by Oath, or under a Penalty, what the other barely promis'd. Thus it is the Custom in some Places, in default of Payment at the time appointed, to oblige the Sureties to appear at such a certain Place, and not to depart thence, 'till ¹⁰ the Debt be satisfied, and this they call a Pledge. Tho' by reason of some Abuses, which proceeded from it, it is now generally disus'd.

IX. But

⁷ So the Digests order, Alibiteri autem fidejussor tam futuræ quam præcærenti obligationi potest, dummodo sit aliqua, vel naturalis, futura obligatio. Digest. lib. 46. tit. 1. De fidejussor. &c. Leg. 6.

⁸ See Note 2. of this §.

MR. BARB. NOTES on § X.

¹ CHILON'S Greek is, 'Επίθε, παρὰ δὲ δῖα. Diog. Laert. l. 1. p. 73. Prov. vi. 1. &c. xi. 15. xvii. 18. xxii. 26, 27. xxvii. 13. Excluf. xxix. 24, 27. Be a Surety, but at your peril, was the Saying of CHILON.

² The Velleian Law is set down in the Digests, Velleiano senatusconsulto plenissime comprehensum est, ne pro ullo sæmine intercederent. Nam sicut moribus civilia officia adempta sunt feminis, & pleraque ipso jure non valent: Ita multo magis admittendum eis fuit id officium, in quo non sola opera nudamque ministerium earum versaretur, sed etiam periculum rei familiaris. Digest. lib. 16. tit. 1. Leg. 1. § 1, 2.

³ They were only discharged for the present. Such a Cession kept them indeed out of a Gaol, or released them from it; but it did not hinder, but if afterward they got any thing, Payment of what was remaining after the Sale of the first Goods, might be demanded. It is true, that in this last Case, it was not allowed to impoverish the Debtor quite a second time; he was only condemned to pay what he could, over and above a comfortable Subsistence. Qui bonis cesserint, nisi solidam creditor receperit, non sunt liberati. In eo enim tantummodo non beneficium eis prodest, ne judici detrahantur in carcerem. Cod. lib. 7. tit. 71. Qui bonis cedere possunt, Leg. 1. Cum eo quoque qui creditoribus bonis suis cessit, si postea aliquid adquisierit, quod idoneum emolumentum habeat, ex integro in id quod facere potest, creditores experiuntur. Inhumanum enim erat, spoliatum fortunis suis in solidam damuari. Inst. lib. 4. tit. 6.

⁴ The Words of the Institutes are, Sane quædam exceptiones non solent his [fidejussoribus] accommodari. Ecce enim debitor, si bonis suis cesserit, & cum eo creditor experiatur: defenditur per exceptionem, si bonis cesserit. Sed hæc exceptio fidejussoribus non datur: ideo scilicet quia qui alios pro debitore obligat, hoc maxime prospicit, ut cum facultatibus lapsus fuerit debitor, possit ab iis, quos pro eo obligavit, suam consequi. Inst. lib. 4. tit. 14. De Replicationibus, § 4. See more about the Cession of Goods, in MR. DAUMAT'S civil Laws in their Natural Order. Part. 1. lib. 3. tit. 5.

⁵ See lib. 3. c. 7. § 3. above.

⁶ By the Roman Law, when one has answered for a Pupil in an Engagement contracted without the Allowance of his Guardian, or for a Prodigal, who is debarred of the Management of his Estate, or a Mad Man: In these and the like Cases, where the Obligation of the Debtor was purely natural, and no Action lay against him, the Engagement of the Surety is nevertheless good and valid. MARCELLUS scribit: Si quis pro pupillo sine tutoris auctoritate obligato, prodigove, vel furioso fidejussor sit: magis esse, ut ei non subveniat, quoniam his actio mandati non competit. Digest. lib. 46. tit. 1. Leg. 25.

⁷ Godartien. This was antiently in use among the German Princes, as MR. HERTIUS observes, and gives some Examples of it. MR. VIETRIARIUS, in his Univerſion jus Civile privatum, lib. 3. tit. 21. § 9. teacheth us that the same Custom is still kept up in the Dutchy of Holſtein.

^a D. Lib. 16. t. 1. L. 1. f. 1, 2.

^b P. C. Lib. 7. t. 71. L. 1. & Inst. L. 4. t. 6. De actimib. f. 40.

^c P. Inst.

lib. 4. t. 14. De Replicationib. f. 4.

XI. But because Suretiship is only an Addition to another Man's Debt, it is most natural for the Creditor to make his Demands first to the Principal, and upon Failure there, to apply to the Surety. "This the Roman Law calls Beneficium Excussionis & Ordinis". The Condition of a Surety deserves Pity, for his Kindness ruins him, and his good Nature breaks him. "But the Creditor cannot with any Face apply to the Surety, but when he cannot recover his Debt of the Principal, Quint. Decl. 275." And if the Surety pays the Debt, the Creditor must make over to him all the Right that he had against the Principal; if that can be of more Service to him towards the Recovery of the Debt, than if he sued in his own Name, especially if any Pawn had been given for Security in Part, it must be given up to the Surety. But if several had bound themselves for Debt, all jointly, and not each for the whole, in Failure in the Principal, the Burthen ought to be divided amongst them, and each obliged to pay his ⁴ Proportion; unless one should prove insolvent, for then the Burthen must lie the heavier upon the rest. For a Number of Sureties were therefore provided, that if this or that should fail, the rest might be Security to the Creditor ⁵. Those who entirely take upon themselves in their own Name another's Obligation ⁶, so as to be esteem'd as Principals in the Eye of the Creditor, differ in some respect from Sureties. Whether such as these can recover of the Person for whom they engaged, what they laid out in his Service, and what Method they ought to take to do it, is to be determined according to the nature of the Kindness; for this Act in them may be a Free Donation, or a Commission, or a Loan, or a Recompence, or such like.

'Tis usual also for a Surety to provide for himself by ^c Counter-Security, whereby he may recover what he lays out for the Principal, if the Principal himself proves deficient ⁶. The Person that gives this Security owes the same Obligation to the first Surety, as the first Surety owes the Creditor; and has the same Action against the Principal, as the first Surety himself had.

XII. As for Bail ^d or the Obligations that those lie under, who engage for Criminals, 'tis observable that many of the Antients were of Opinion, that a Man was so far Master of his own Life, as to have Power by his bare Consent to engage it for another, so far as even to forfeit it for another's Crime. Andocides (orat. de myster.) relates, that Munthitens and Apsephion sat by the Altar humbly praying that they might not be put to the Rack, but that their Bail might be taken, which was no sooner granted, but they mounted their Horses, and fled to the Enemy; leaving their Bail, who were forced to undergo those Tortures which they themselves ought to have suffered. The Story of Damon and Pythias (whom Diod. Sic. in excerpt. Pieresc. calls Phintias) is well known as related by Cicero in Offic. l. iii. c. 10. Of whom Manil. Aitr. l. ii. v. 1. says,

*Et duo qui potuere sequi vadimonia sponsi:
Optavitque reum sponsor non posse reverti,
Sponsorumque reus timuit ne solveret ipsum.*

Once Death was strove for, 'twas a generous strife;
Not who should keep, but who should lose a Life
Was their Dispute, contending to deny
Each other the great Privilege to die.
The Surety fear'd the guilty Friend's Return;
The guilty Friend did his own Absence mourn.

Mr. CREECH.

Mr. BARR. NOTES on § XI.

¹ See JUSTINIAN'S Novels, 4. c. 1. Ut creditores primo loco convenienti principalem. QUINCTILIAN'S Words are, Etiam cum istud periculum est sponsoris, miserabile est; bonitate labitur, humanitate conturbat ----- Non enim aliter salvo pudore ad sponsorem venit creditor, quam si recipere à debitore non possit. Declam. 273. But we ought to observe by the antient Roman Law, the Creditor had his Choice to take either the Principal or Surety, as he pleased. Jure nostro est potestas Creditori, relicto Reo, eligendi fidejussores, nisi inter contrahentes aliud placitum doceatur. Cod. lib. 8. tit. 41. De fidejussoribus & mandatoribus, Leg. 5. See also Leg. 3. Mr. HERTIUS also says, that it was antiently a Custom in Germany. But as for what he adds, that it was used among the Jews, he ought to have brought good Proofs, for the Text he quotes is nothing to the Purpose, as the Reader will be convinced by seeing it: Take the Garment of him who is a Surety for a Stranger, and take a Pledge of him for a strange Woman. Prov. xx. 16. xxvii. 13.

² They are Terms used by the Interpreters, and not by the Roman Law itself. The Reason of the first is obvious: The other is taken from Excutare, which signifies in the Roman Law to seek whether any one be able to pay, and then to seize on him.

³ The Law is, Potuisse sane, cum fisco solveres, desiderare, ut jus pignoris, quod fiscus habuit, in te transferretur; & si hoc ita factum est, cessis actionibus uti poteris: quod & in privatis debitis observandum est. Cod. lib. 8. tit. 41. De fidejussoribus & mandatoribus, Leg. 11.

⁴ By the Roman Law the Creditor might apply himself to either of the Sureties, as he pleased, and make him alone to pay; for it supposes all the Sureties to be obliged to pay the whole, which yet is not true, unless all the rest prove insolvent. But the Emperor Arrian ordained, that if, at the time of the Process, the Sureties were solvent, the Creditor could demand of each no more than his Share. See Institut. Lib. 3. tit. 21. § 4. And this consisted in what the Lawyers call Beneficium Divisionis. See Mr. NODD, in his Probabil. Juris, lib. 2. c. 1.

⁵ This is what is called Expromissor; as for Example, Digest. Lib. 12. tit. 4. De Corditi. causâ datâ, &c. Leg. 4. & lib. 50. tit. 17. De diversis regulis Juris, Leg. 110. § 1. One single Surety is call'd Adpromissor. See Digest. l. 45. tit. 1. De verborum obligation. Leg. 5. § 2. & lib. 46. tit. 3. De solutionibus & liberationibus, Leg. 43. This last Law will be quoted in the next Chapter § 1. Note 5. Nevertheless these two Terms, as well as Fidejussor, are sometimes confounded by an Impropry of Speech, common to all Languages.

⁶ Our Author, as Mr. HERTIUS observes, confounds a subsidiary Security, call'd Fidejussor succedaneus, with a Surety to indemnify, call'd Fidejussor indemnitatis, a Counter-Security, as also divers others have done, as appears by Mr. THOMASIU'S Discourse De fidejussore indemnitatis, Printed at Hall in 1703. § 2. This subsidiary Surety is a second Security, which answers for the first, and in respect to whom this last is look'd upon as a principal Debtor. The Roman Law calls him Fidejussor Fidejussoris. Digest. 46. tit. 1. Leg. 8. § 12. & Leg. 27. § 4. And the first Surety is call'd Fidejussor principalis. lib. 2. § 2, 4. As for the Surety of Indemnity, the Lawyers mean by him a Person that is not obliged purely and barely for the whole Debt, but only for so much as the principal Creditor has not paid, i. e. if he can recover only one part of his Debt, the Surety shall indemnify him as to the other. See Digest. ubi supra, Leg. 63. & lib. 45. tit. 1. De verb. obligat. Leg. 116.

^a Add. Phæd. l. 1. fab. 16.

^b Expromissores.

^c Fidejussor indemnitatis.

^d Vades.

^e But

¹ But that a Surety ſhould by his bare Conſent make himſelf liable to a Punishment, which otherwiſe ought to be inflicted on a Criminal, does not ſeem agreeable to thoſe Rules of vindictive Juſtice, which ought to obtain in human Societies; indeed if a Man knaviſhly interpoſes himſelf, that the Criminal may have an Opportunity of eſcaping Juſtice, he ought to ſuffer as much, as it is the Concern of the Magiſtrate that the other had not eſcap'd his Hands; which may ſometimes be capital, eſpecially if he who thus eſcap'd be like to do more Miſchief ².

Farther than this, ſuch a ſubſtituted Death is not lawful in the civil Court: For no Man has ſo much Power over his own Life, as to expoſe it at Pleaſure for no publick Advantage, but only to hinder another from ſuffering what he deſerves. Beſides, the end of Punishments would be fruſtrated by this means, for the deſign of them is either to amend the Delinquent, or to deter others; but the Surety is not the Delinquent, as having net by any Act of his derived the Guilt upon himſelf: And as for others, they will not be deterr'd from offending by ſeeing an innocent Man ſuffer, but will either be moved with Compaſſion, or ſtruck with Admiration of ſuch Love and Conſtancy, as does not reſiſt even Death for the ſake of a Friend ^{b c}.

It appears therefore that Bail can be no farther admitted in criminal caſes, than as a Security to the Magiſtrate, whoſe Duty it is to proſecute, that the Damages of the Delinquent ſhall be made good, or his Fine paid, or if he be abſent, that he ſhall make his Appearance, ſo that nothing in the mean time may be decreed againſt him, as if he were convict; or if he be in Priſon, that he may not be forc'd to plead in Chains. And even in thoſe Caſes, the beſt way is for the Magiſtrate to let the Surety know beforehand, what Security he expects from him, that ſo he may conſider whether his Circumſtances will permit him to venture ſo much upon the Honesty of his Friend.

The Obligation that Hoſtages lie under, hardly ever taking place but in Leagues and civil Government, will be diſcuſs'd more conveniently hereafter. B. viii. c. 8. ſ. 6.

XIII. Another uſual way of Security is to give the Creditor ſome certain Thing in Pawn, till the Debt be paid; the deſign of which is not only, that the Debtor may be incited to a more ſpeedy Payment for want of his Goods ^d; but that the Creditor ^e in Caſe of Failure may have ſomething equivalent, and being in Poſſeſſion of the Pawn, need not to be at the Trouble and Expence of going to Law. And therefore the Pawn ought to be as much or more Worth than the Debt it ſelf. And ſince it is deſign'd for the Security of Debts, which bear either a vulgar or eminent Price, 'tis neceſſary that the Pawn ſhou'd have the ſame Faculty. So that we cannot approve of the Egyptian Cuſtom ^{f g} of Pawning the dead Bodies of their Parents, altho' whoever refus'd or neglected to redeem them, was proſecuted with the utmoſt Ignominy, and deny'd Burial after Death ². And for the ſame Reason it ſeems inhuman to ſeize upon the dead Body of a Debtor, that ſo his Relations might be ſhamed into a Payment of that which otherwiſe they were not oblig'd to.

By the way, 'tis worth obſerving, that in the Kingdom of Pegu a Man may Pawn his Wife and Children to his Creditor; but if the Creditor lies with either the Wife or the Daughter thus Pawn'd to him, he loſes his Debt, and is liable to no other Punishment ^h.

XIV. Things given in Pawn are either ſuch as yield Increate, or ſuch as do not; as for the former, 'tis uſual to allow the Creditor ⁱ the Profits, or a

Mr. BARP. NOTES on § XII.

¹ See lib. 2. c. 4. § 17, 18.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XIII.

¹ The Words of the Inſtitutes are, Pignus utriuſq; gratia datur, & Debitoris, quo magis ei pecunia credatur, & Creditori, quo magis ei in tuto fit creditum. L. 3. tit. 15. See alſo about this whole Matter Mr. THOMASIU'S Diſcourſe, De diſtinctione emptioem cum pacto retrocedi & contract. pignor. cap. 2.

² JUSTINIAN forbid it under a rigorous Punishment, Novel. 60. cap. 1, & 115. cap. 5. § 1. as Mr. HERTIUS obſerves.

Mr. BARP. NOTES on § XIV.

¹ Called Pactum ἀντιπρωτε, as the Author ſpeaks, and the Digeſts expreſs it thus, Si ἀντιπρωτε, id eſt, mutui pignoris ulus pro credito, facta ſit, & in ſandum & in ædes aliquis inducatur: eouſque retinet poſſeſſionem pignoris loco, donec illi pecunia ſolvetur; cum in uſuras fruſtus percipiat, aut locatio, aut ipſe percipiendo, habitandove. Dig. lib. 20. t. 1. De pignoribus & hypothecis, &c. Leg. 11. § 1. See Mr. NOODT'S Obſervations, lib. 2. c. 9. Mr. THOMASIU'S in his Diſcourſe De Accurata diſtinct. &c. c. 2. § 9, &c. maintains, that by the Natural Law, independant on the Civil, the Word ἀντιπρωτε is underſtood of itſelf, a containing the End of the Contract. It imports that the Creditor ſhall have the Benefit of the Fruits, be what they will, without giving any Account. We ſhall examine the Reaſons of that able Lawyer in the Place noted. The Uncertainty of the Produce of ſuch Things as are engaged, is a thing of great Weight; for, as Cicero ſpeaks in a Place quoted by Mr. HERTIUS, The Fruits of the Earth are always at the Mercy of the Winds and Tempeſts. Totæ autem res ruſticæ ejuſmodi ſunt, ut earum ratio, neq; labor, ſed res incertiſſimæ, venti, tempeſtateſq; moderentur. In Verrom, lib. 3. c. 98. & ult. See Cod. lib. 4. tit. 42. De Uſuris, Leg. 17.

^a V. 1 Kings 20. 39.

^b Add. Anth. Matth. de crimin. ad l. 48. D. d. tit. 14. c. 2. ſ. 13, &c.

^c V. Græc. L. 2.

c. 21. ſ. 11. n. 2.

^d Vid. Lib. 13. t. 7. l. 35. ſ. 1. De action. pignerat. &c.

^e V. Inſtit. L. 3. t. 15. Quibus modis recontrahitur obligatio, ſ. 4.

^f V. Diodor. Sic. L. 1. C. 93.

^g V. Herodot. in Euterp. & Lucian. de Luctu. p. 306, 307. Ed. Anyſt.

^h Gaſpar. Balb. Itiner.

certain proportion of them in lieu of Interest. As for those which do not yield Increase, they generally bargain, that if they be not redeem'd by such a Time, the Creditor shall have the Property of them²: And this is not naturally unjust, especially if the Pawn does not exceed the value of the Debt, and the Interest of it; or if, provided it exceeds it, the overplus be return'd to the Owner. Tho' this the Roman Lawyers³ never allow of^a; for thus needy necessitous People might quickly be stript of all they were worth, through the Avarice of their Creditors, being often forc'd to leave in Pawn much more than the value of the Debt.

But it is reasonable, that⁴ if the Pawn be not redeem'd by such a Time, it should be look'd upon as sold at a fair Rate stated then, or some time before, by some honest Man^b.

In short, as the Creditor ought to restore the Pawn upon Payment; so while he has it in his Custody, he ought⁵ to look after it as carefully as his own, and if it may be the worse for using, he ought not to put it to any Use, unless Leave be expressly given him by the Bargain. And therefore if it receives any Damage, or happens to be lost through his Fraud, or want of, at least, common Diligence, he is obliged to make it good.

XV. It is a receiv'd¹ Opinion, that a Pawn deposited can never become one's own by Prescription^c; and the Reason is, because the Redemption of a Pawn is such an Action as cannot be exercised often, but once only. Besides Prescription was first introduc'd to put an End to Sutes, which could not otherwise be determined, and to settle Property which would otherwise be uncertain. But in the Case before us there can be no Question in whom the Property of the Pawn is, when I possess it as another's, and it evidently appearing upon what account he lent it with me, I cannot presume that he had ever relinquish'd it.

But yet the Case may so happen, as that the Debtor may fairly be debarr'd the Power of Redemption; as^d if when he would have redeem'd it, he had been hindred, and has now pass'd it over in Silence so long, as to create a Presumption that he never designs it; or if it be very much to the Creditor's Disadvantage to have the Payment continually put off, it cannot be thought unjust in him to dispose of the Pawn as his own; especially if by length of Time the Value of the Money has been chang'd, so that the Creditor would receive less than he lent, should he admit of a Redemption. As suppose a Man had lent another 1000*l.* 100 Years ago, and had received in Mortgage a Farm, which was then worth the Money; in the mean time the Value of Money has sunk half in half, and therefore now, if the Creditor be forced to receive back his 1000*l.* he would receive only enough to purchase half the Farm; whereas, at the time of Contract it would have purchased the whole.

XVI. The Roman Lawyers distinguish between a Pawn properly so called, and a Mortgage^e; the former is the actual Delivery of some moveable, the latter is the bare Assignment of something immoveable, for Security of the Debt: For barely to assign over moveables as Security, without putting them into the Custody of the Creditor, would be ridiculous; for they might be removed away, and so not ² These Restrictions are no ways necessary, according to Mr. THOMASIVS, ubi supra § 13, 14. The Debtor, says he, is suppos'd, in this Case, to sell his Estate for the Sum lent; for which Reason he looked upon it himself as an Equivalent. And so after the Time is expired, the Creditor becomes full and irrevocable Proprietor of the Thing pawned, and 'tis the worse for him, if he finds it less worth than the Money lent; as it is also just, that if he sells it for more, he should have the Benefit, at least, if it be not otherwise agreed on, or the Laws of Charity do not oblige him to recede from his Right.

³ See Cod. lib. 8. tit. 35. De pæctis pignorum, & de Lege Commissoriâ in pignoribus rescindendâ.

⁴ The Words of the Digests are, Poteſt ita fieri pignoris datio, hypothecæve, ut ſi intra certum tempus non ſit ſoluta pecunia, jure emptoris poſſideat rem juſto pretio tunc æſtimandam: hæc enim caſu videtur, quodammodo conditionalis eſſe venditio. Digest. ubi supra, Leg. 16. § 9.

⁵ En igitur, quæ diligens Paterfamilias in ſuis rebus præſtare ſolet, à creditore exiguntur. Digest. lib. 13. tit. 7. De Pigneratitia actione, Leg. 14. See Mr. NOODT's Probabilia Juris, lib. 1. c. 4. lib. 4. c. 3. & Objere. 2. 13. But if without his Fault, the Pawn be lost, or destroyed by a Mischance, he still preserves his Right, who remov'd it only from the other Goods of the Debtor. Quam [diligentiam exactam] ſi præſtiterit, & aliquo fortuito caſu rem amiſerit, ſecurum eſſe, nec impediri creditum petere. Institut. lib. 3. tit. 15. § 4. Mr. THOMASIVS ubi supra, § 17, 18. expreſſes himſelf a little differently, and ſuppoſes, as I think, without Neceſſity, that in Things that yield a Profit, the Right of the Creditor to the Thing pawned, is a kind of Property, tho' revocable.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XV.

¹ The Interpreters of the Roman Law are not agreed about this; and the common Opinion, for the most part, is, that Prescription prevails in the Case of Pawns. See GROTIUS, lib. 2. c. 4. § 15. to which Place the Author alludes.

^a V. C. L. 8. t. 35. De pæctis pignorum, & de lege Commissor. in pignorib. rescind.

^b V. D. L. 20. t. 1. De pignorib. & hypothecis, &c. l. 11. f. 1. & l. 16. f. 9. Añ. l. 10.

^c Grot. l. 3. c. 12. f. ult. puts this Case.

^d V. C. L. 4. t. 24. de Pigneratitia.

^e V. Instit. L. 4. t. 6. De

actionib. f. 7.

answer the End for which they were assigned¹. This way of Mortgage is very useful among Subjects of the same State; for it being absolutely necessary that they should frequently borrow of one another, and as necessary that the Payment should sometimes be put off for a considerable Time, there would not be moveables enough for sufficient Security; and it would be too hard to oblige the Borrowers immediately to part with their immoveables, as their Houses, or Land². And therefore it suffices to assign such an immoveable for Security, as can't be taken away, and of which the Law at any time can give Possession.

In the State of Nature such Mortgages are needless; for if the Debtor refuses Payment, the Possession of the Mortgage assigned in Security must be detained by Force of Arms. Whereas in that State, without such a particular Assignment, it is lawful to seize on any thing that belongs to the Debtor.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XVI.

¹ Their Words are, Pignoris appellatione eam propriè rem contineri dicimus, quæ simul etiam traditur creditori, maxime si mobilis sit. At eam quæ sine traditione nuda conventionione tenetur, propriè hypothecæ appellatione contineri dicimus. Institut. lib. 4. tit. 6. De Action. § 7. In fine, as to this whole Matter of Pawns and Mortgages, we may consult Mr. DAUMAT'S Civil Laws in their Natural Order, Part 1. lib. 3. tit. 1. See also Mr. NODD'S Probab. Jur. lib. 1. cap. 8. & lib. 4. cap. 10, 11. & Obj. 2. 8. where he corrects some Laws, and there we may see, among other things, that according to the Preterian Law, a Mortgage was made and concluded also by a single Agreement.

² Compare Exod. xxii. 26, 27. Deut. xxiv. 6. Job xxii. 6. xxiv. 3. Prov. xx. 16. & D. L. 20. t. 1. l. 6, 7. D. de Pignor. &c. Diodor. Sic. l. 1. c. 79. C. lib. 8. t. 17. L. 8. Authent. Agricultores quæ res pignori oblig. poss.

CHAP. XI.

By what means Obligations founded upon Compact may be dissolved.

- | | |
|---|---|
| I. The most natural Way of dissolving an Agreement is to perform the Things agreed on. II. What if one pays a debt for one who knows not of it? III. To whom must we pay? IV. What must be paid? V. To whom and by whom may Compensation be made? VI. Where it may be used. VII. A Debt is paid by a Release. VIII. How an Obligation is made void by a disagreement. | IX. The Knavery of one Party frees the other from his Obligation. X. As also a Change of that Condition on which the Obligation was founded. XI. How an Obligation ceases by Time. XII. And how by Death. XIII. Of Delegation. XIV. Of Confusion. XV. Of Novation. |
|---|---|

WE come now to see by what means Obligations thus founded upon Compact may be dissolv'd. The most natural Way is¹ the Performance of the Covenants; for that being done, the Obligation ceases of course. And here we may observe, that some Obligations are² so inherent in a Person, that they cannot be perform'd by any other³; Whereas some may be done by Proxy, it being all alike to the Party concern'd, by whom they be perform'd. Of such a Nature are all those Contracts which relate to common mercenary Work, such as may be done as well by one Man as by another; as also those which³ concern consumable Commodities, which if we do but get our selves possess'd of, it is indifferent by what Hand they come to us. In such Cases, altho' it be most natural for the Debtor himself, or some other by his Order, to pay and perform according to Agreement, yet the Creditor ought to acquiesce, if any other Man discharges

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on Chap. XI. § I.

¹ Tollitur omnis obligatio solutione ejus quod debetur, Instit. L. 3. t. 30. Quib. mod. tollitur oblig. princip. See Digest. Lib. 46. tit. 3. De Solut. & Liberat.

² See what is said Lib. 1. Chap. 1. § 19. upon the distinction of a communicable and incommunicable Power.

³ As when one gives another a Garment, or a Chest, &c. to make, for it implies, that the Taylor or the Carpenter should do the Work themselves, or procure it to be done by some other of their Trade; unless it be agreed, That he that takes the Work should do it himself, or there be some great Inequality between his own Ability and the other Workman's, whose Assistance he use, Si cui locaverim faciendum, quod ego conduxeram, constabit habere me ex locato actionem. Digest. Lib. 19. tit. 2. Locati conducti, &c. Leg. 48. Irene. Inter artifices longa differentia est, & ingenii & naturæ, & doctrinæ, & institutionis. Ideo si navem à se fabricandam quis promiserit, vel Insulam ædificandam, Fossamve faciendam, & hoc specialiter actum est, ut suis operis id perficiat; si fidejussor ipse ædificans, vel fossam fodiens, non consentiente stipulatore, non liberabit reum. Lib. 46. tit. 3. De Solut. & Liberat. Leg. 3.

^a See above in B. 1. c. 1. f. 19.

⁴ for the Debtor; I say, for the Debtor, for whoever pays ⁵ upon his own Account, and not the Debtor's, does not release him ². But in case of Suretiship, if the Principal discharges the Obligation, ⁶ he releases both himself and the Surety. Whereas if the Surety pays the Debt, the Principal is indeed releas'd from the Creditor, but at the same Instant becomes indebted to the Surety ⁷, even altho' this Payment was made without his Knowledge.

II. But if a Man pays a Debt for another without either being his Surety, or having his Order for it, can he recover what he has thus paid of his own Head? In which Case we must distinguish whether he made this Payment against the other's Will, or only against his Knowledge. In the former Case 'tis plain ¹ he cannot recover it; For how can any one impose an Obligation upon me against my Will, which ought to be founded upon Consent? But because no Body is presum'd to throw his Money away, we ought to consider further, whether he design'd what he thus paid ² as a Gift to the Creditor, or not: If he did; the Debtor is not concern'd in it: But if he did not design it as a Gift; we ought to suppose, that he did it to transfer the Creditor's Right and Title against the Debtor upon himself. And altho' the Creditor, at the Payment, knew not of his Design ³ but receiv'd the Money as paid in the Name of the Debtor; yet if he who paid it cannot recover it of the Debtor, the Creditor ought in Equity either to refund what he thus receiv'd, and still preserve his Action against the Debtor, or else to give up his Title to the other; especially if he may be presum'd to have made his Payment in hopes it would have been acceptable to the Debtor. Upon which account the Roman Law allows him ³ an Action for Business done ⁴: But since the Debtor may put in his Exceptions, that it was not acceptable to him, and that he is not willing to owe this other Person such a Kindness, his best way would be to ⁴ suppose that his Creditor has given up his Title to him, and to deal with him accordingly. But if a Man should lay out any Expence upon another's Goods, without his Knowledge, he ⁵ may keep the Goods as a Pledge till the Expences be repaid him, unless the Improvement is capable of being taken away from them.

III. No Payment or Satisfaction of any Obligation ought to be made but to the Creditor himself, or whom he has order'd to receive it in his Name ¹; and if I pay another by Mistake, the Creditor's Title nevertheless stands good; but

⁴ If the Debtor does not at all consent. Nec interest quis solvat: utrum ipse qui debet, an alius pro eo, liberatur enim & alio solvete, sive sciente sive ignorante debitore, vel invito eo solutio fiat. The Reason is, say the Lawyers, because he can do better for the Person who is ignorant of what is done for him, than the contrary. Solvete pro ignorante & invito cuique licet: cum sit jure civili constitutum, licere etiam ignorantis invitoque meliorem conditionem facere. Digest. Lib. 46. tit. 3. De solut. & liber. Leg. 53.

⁵ For as the Roman Lawyers speak in the Law, here quoted by our Author, What a Man pays in his own Name does not free the Debtor, Dig. l. 5. tit. 3. leg. 31. Moreover, we ought to observe, that according to the Style of the Roman Lawyers, which is very suitable, and followed by our Author in this Place; the Terms, Debt, Creditor, Debtor, and Payment, do not only respect the Obligation of those who owe a Sum of Money, or some other Thing capable of an Equivalent, but in general, those Engagements which we may be under upon any other Account, as in a Contract of Hiring, or Trusting, &c. Creditorum appellatio non hi tantum accipiuntur, qui pecuniam crediderunt, sed omnes, quibus ex qualibet causa debetur. Digest. Lib. 50. tit. 16. De verborum signif. Leg. 11. Credendi generalis appellatio est: ideo sub hoc titulo Prætor, & de commodato & de pignore edixit: Nam cuiusque rei adsentiamur alienam fidem secuti, mox recepturi quid ex hoc contractu, credere dicimur, Lib. 12. tit. 1. De rebus creditis, &c. Leg. 1. Solutionis verbo satisfationem quoque omnem accipiendam placet, solvere dicimus eum, qui facit, quod facere promisit, Lib. 50. tit. 16. de verb. signif. Leg. 176. See also, Lib. 46. tit. 3. de solut. & liberat. Leg. 54.

⁶ So the Law is, Item si reus solverit, etiam ii, qui pro eo intervenierunt, liberantur. Idem ex contrario contingit, si fidejussor solverit; non enim ipse solus liberatur, sed etiam reus. Institut. ubi supra. In omnibus speciebus liberationum etiam accessiones liberantur; puta adpromissores, hypothecæ, pignora: præterquam quod inter creditorem & adpromissores confusione facta reus non liberatur. Digest. Lib. 46. tit. 3. De Solut. & Liber. Leg. 43.

⁷ See Digest. Lib. 17. tit. 1. Mandati vel contra Leg. 29. & 40.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § II.

¹ Especially if the Debt were not very lawful or clear. See Mr. DAUMAT'S Civil Laws in their Nat. Order. Part 1. Lib. 4. Tit. 1. Sect. 3. § 2. We may also consult the rest of that Title, where the whole Matter of Payments is handled.

² But that is not to pay for another, and so this Case is nothing to the purpose.

³ The Author refers us to this Law, Cum pecuniam ejus nomine solveres, qui tibi nihil mandaverat, negotiorum gestorum actio tibi competit. Cum ea solutione debitor à creditore liberatus &: nisi si quid debitoris interfuit, eam pecuniam non solvi. Digest. Lib. 3. tit. 5. De negotiis gestis, Leg. 43. But there he only is spoke of, who pays at the Request of the Debtor; whereas our Author is treating of the Case where payment is made against the Will of him whose Debt is acquitted; for it is certain, as Mr. HERTIUS observes, that by the Roman Law no Man could have an Action for Business done, against a Man for whom he has paid against his Will. See Digest. Lib. 3. tit. 5. De negotiis gestis, Leg. 8. § 3. as also, Lib. 17. tit. 1. Mand. vel contra, Leg. 6. § 2. Leg. 40. & Cod. Lib. 2. tit. 19. De negotiis gestis, Leg. 24. Here is some Confusion in the Sense, which makes one suspect that the Author, or Printers, have left out some Words, if not a whole Sentence. See the next Note

⁴ The Author should have said, Against his Will, and his Prohibition, and he hath written unawates, pro ignorante, for pro invito; and perhaps he put the one for the other, if there be not a greater Omission here, for the Word ignorante is met with again in the next Sentence, and we can't see why the Author should pass clearly from the first Member of the distinction to the last, and not particularly treat of this.

⁵ See Lib. 4. Chap. 13. § 13. I don't see well what this Period does here, having no relation almost to the Subject.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § III.

¹ The Words of the Digests are, Solutam pecuniam intelligimus utique naturaliter, si numerata sit creditori. Sed & si jussu ejus alii solvetur, vel creditori ejus, vel futuro debitori, vel etiam ei donaturus erat: absolvi debet. Digest. Lib. 46. tit. 3. De Solutionibus, &c. Leg. 49.

² Nam quod quis suo nomine solvit, non debitoris, debitorem non liberat. D. L. 5. t. 3. l. 31. princ. De negotiis gestis, l. 43. & ult.

³ V. L. 3. t. 5.

then I may recover of the other what I thus paid him². The Creditor is here presum'd to be capable of managing his own Concerns³, and to have a perfect Understanding of the Affair in hand. For otherwise it would be to throw Money away, rather than to make Payment of it.

IV. Besides, the very Thing must be paid that was bargain'd for, and not another¹ in its stead²; it must be paid entire, not mangl'd; not partially, nor piecemeal; at the³ Time and⁴ Place appointed: especially if it be the Creditor's Interest to have it paid here rather than there, and at such a Time rather than at another; for the Time is part of the Price. Yet any of these Conditions may be superseded by a new Agreement, which the Creditor is sometimes forc'd to comply with, through the Poverty or Knavery of the Debtor: being willing to receive Part rather than nothing, at another Place rather than no where, and after the Time expired rather than never. Tho' sometimes Equity requires that the Payment be put off and accepted in Parcels, when it can't be perform'd immediately, or all at once. Thus the Athenians having made a Vow to sacrifice to Diana as many Goats as they should kill Enemies, when they could not procure so many in the whole Country, they decreed to sacrifice 500 every Year^b. Sometimes too there is no other Way of ending the Sute, than by forcing the Debtor to pay an Equivalent.

'Tis manifest that the Creditor only can remit the Debt, and not his Servant or Steward, without his express Order. But if the Debtor's Steward transacts with the Creditor, and compounds for less than the whole, the Gain does not redound^c to the Steward, but to his Master; and it would be Theft and purloining in the Steward, if after having compounded with the Creditor, he should bring the whole Debt in his Accounts, and put what he got by Composition in his own Pocket.

The Creditor is suppos'd to be satisfied, if he accepts of a Pawn as Payment, or takes it in Trust till Payment be made, or if it be sold, and the Price receiv'd in lieu of the Debt. And if a Man owes Money by several different Bonds, and⁶ pays part, the Payment ought in Favour to be applied to the most burthensome^c. The Way which Vitellius^d took to pay his Debts was very scandalous; when he went to Germany he was so intangled, that his Creditors would scarce dismiss his Person upon any Security; who a little after, when he was made Emperor, and return'd to Rome, hid themselves. But he order'd them to be brought before him, and told them, That he had restor'd them Safety for their Money, and demanded back the Bonds and Instruments of Contract.

² The Words of the Digests are, Indebitum est non tantum quod omnino non debetur, sed & quod alii debetur, si alii solvatur. Digest. Lib. 12. tit. 6. De conditione indebiti. Leg. 65. § 9.

³ So we can't pay a Pupil without the Consent of the Guardian; Pupillo solvi sine Tutoris Auctoritate non potest. Digest. Lib. 46. tit. 3. De Solut. & Liberat. Leg. 6.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § IV.

¹ See the Law quoted above, Chap. 7. § 1. Note 3. So that he who owes Money can't, unless the Creditor agree to it, make over any Debt to him in payment: Enum, à quo mutuam sumpsisti pecuniam, in solutum nolentem suscipere nomen Debitoris tui, compelli juris ratio non permittit. Cod. lib. 8. tit. 43. De Solutio. & Liberation. Leg. 16. See what hath been said Chap. 7. § 3. Note 1. and § 6, 7. upon the several Species in which a Payment of Money lent, may be made. See Mr. THOMASUS's Discourse, De pretio affection. in res fungibiles non cadente, Chap. 2. § 3, &c.

² At least, if (as the Roman Lawyers say) there be not any ground to contest the other part of the Debt, for in this Case the Judge may and ought to oblige the Creditor to receive what the Debtor offers him without prejudice to the rest: Quidam nihil macerant, neque eum qui decem peteret, cogendum quinque accipere, & reliqua persiqui: neque eum, qui fundum suum diceret, partem duntaxat judicio persequi. Sed in utraque causa humanius facturus videtur Prætor, si actorem compulerit ad accipiendum id, quod offeratur: cum ad officium ejus pertineat lites diminueret. Digest. Lib. 12. tit. 1. De rebus creditis, Leg. 21. Moreover, as it ordinarily behoves the Creditor to be entirely satisfied, he is not obliged to be contented with part of Payment, unless it be otherwise agreed on, Quia sæpe & solutio & exactio partium, non minima incommoda habet. Digest. Lib. 10. tit. 2. Famil. cretiscandæ, Leg. 3. See Lib. 22. tit. 1. De usuris, &c. Leg. 41. § 1. Lib. 20. tit. 1. De pignor. & hypoth. Leg. 19. Vinnius on the Institutes, Lib. 3. tit. 30. princip. Num. 5. & seq.

³ The Words of the Digests are, Is qui certo loco dare promittit, nullo alio loco, quam in quo promissit, solvere, invito stipulatore, potest. Digest. lib. 13. tit. 4. De eo, quod certo loco dari oportet, Leg. 9.

⁴ The Time was one part of the Bargain. See Chap. 1. § 10 above. Yet Payment may be made before the Time, a longer Time being granted ordinarily for the advantage of the Debtor, that he may discharge his Debt with less Inconvenience to him. Quod certa die promissum est, vel statim dari potest: totum enim medium tempus ad solvendum promissori liberum relinquunt. Digest. Lib. 46. tit. 3. De solut. & liber. Leg. 70. Yet sometimes the Term is fixed for the Creditor's Benefit, and in that Case he may refuse Payment. See Digests, Lib. 46. tit. 1. De verb. oblig. Leg. 122.

⁵ Mr. HERTIUS quotes, Digest. 17. Tit. 1. Mandati vel contra, Leg. 10. § 3. Leg. 20. and Lib. 26. Tit. 8. De administratione & periculo Tutor. vel Curat. Leg. 53. princ. But in the last he treats of Tutors and Curators, who trade with their Pupils Money, and in the two first of them who take upon them a Commission freely, so that they can't be applied, but by an Analogy or Accommodation, to what our Author says of them who are the Servants or Stewards of the Debtor, Ministri aut Dispensatores.

⁶ That is to say, If, for Example, of two Debts one be contended and the other clear, the Payment ought not to be made to the first, but the last. In like Manner Payment ought rather to be made of a Debt, which, if it be not discharged, will bring some Trouble on the Debtor, or a Condemnation to Damages and Loss, or concerns his Reputation, than of another from which the like Consequences are not to be feared, and so of a Debt with a Security rather than without one; of a Debt which is ow'd in his own Name, rather than where he is only a Security; rather of a Debt for which he has given a Pawn or a Mortgage, than upon his bare Promise: rather of a Debt for which the Time is come, than for that whose Time is not come; rather of an old, than new Debt; rather of a real and single Debt, than of a Conditional. Quotiens quis debitor ex pluribus causis unum debitum solvit: est in arbitrio solventis dicere, quod potius debitum voluerit solutum: & quod dixerit, id erit solutum. Possumus enim certam legem dicere ei, quod solvimus. Quotiens vero non dicimus id quod solutum sit, in arbitrio est accipientis, cui potius debito acceptum ferat, dummodo in id constituit solutum, in quod ipse, si deberet, esset soluturus, i. e. in id debitum, quod non est in contraria aut in illud, quod pro alio quis fidejusserat, aut cujus dies nondum venerat. Et magis quod meo nomine, quam quod pro alio fidejussorio nomine debeo, & potius, quod cum pœna, quam quod sine pœna debetur ---- potior habebitur causa ejus pecuniæ, quæ sub infamia debetur ---- quæ sub hypotheca, vel pignore contracta est ---- vetustior contractus ante solvetur. Digest. Lib. 46. Tit. 3. De solut. & liberat. Leg. 1. 4, 97.

^a Vid. Martial, L. 6. Ep. 30.

^b Xenophon αἰὲ ἀναλ. τῶ Κλέπ. p. 178. Otherwise concerning the Time of Payment that of l. 105. of D. B. 46. tit. 3. De solutio. &c. us'd to be observ'd.

^c V. D. ubi supra, l. 1, 4, 97.

^d V. Xiphilin.

ad ann. 69.

V. The Obligation is sometimes released by ¹ Compensation, which is by opposing Debt to Debt, or when a Man ceases to owe me, because I apparently owe him as much of the same Kind. For since as much (especially in consumable Commodities) is the same, and where the Debts are mutual, if I receive, I must immediately refund as much: Therefore to abridge such needless Payments, 'tis most convenient for each Party to pay himself by retaining his own ²; especially since there is no Paying and Receiving without some Trouble in it: And it would be very imprudent in me to pay first when I need not do it, and so to put it in the other's Power to be behind hand in his Payment to me ^b.

But this Compensation does not take place, but between those who are Creditors and Debtors to each other; for ³ if I have so much due to me from a third Person, I cannot obtrude that upon my Creditor for Payment, unless this Third and he be join'd in such a Partnership, as to have all their Obligations and Rights in common; for then their Goods may be look'd upon as one and the same Patrimony. Nay, if they be Partners in one Sort of Commodity only, ⁴ Compensation will take Place, if one be my Debtor and the other my Creditor for that Commodity; for so far they are to be esteem'd the same Person. So, if I owe Money to him who is my Debtor's Heir; or, if the Creditor of him whose Heir I am, is indebted to me, ⁵ Compensation may take Place. And thus I may oppose Debt to Debt, altho' my Creditor is against it; for with what Face can he demand me to pay him, when he declines paying me?

Since this Way of Compensation cannot be put in Practice, but between those who are mutually in Debt to one another, it follows, that I cannot oppose to my Creditor what he owes another, ⁶ whose Agent I am, without his express Orders. For tho' a Man intrusts me with the entire Management of his Affairs, I am not therefore to reckon his Things as my own, and by that Means make Compensation for my Debts; for perhaps he had rather have another Man his Debtor than me. Nor if I trust my Affairs to another, do I thereby take his Debts and Obligations upon my self; thus v. g. should Caius enjoin me to exact his Dues of Seius, whose Debtor I my self am; neither can Seius, without Caius's Leave, compensate his Debt with mine, and under that Pretence refuse Payment (for what has Caius to do with my Debt?) Neither can I take the Debt upon me instead of Seius. So one that is indebted to a Minor cannot make Compensation of that which the ⁷ Guardian owes him: nor can the Guardian release his Debt by opposing it to that which his Creditor owes the Minor ^c.

On the other hand, if one that is bound for another, be call'd upon for the Debt, ⁸ he may oppose by Way of Compensation, not only what the Creditor owes to him, but also what he owes to the principal Debtor; and this even against the Knowledge and Will of the Principal: For since the Creditor cannot refuse such a Compensation from the Principal himself, why should not the Surety have the Advantage of it? And it would not be fair in the Principal to be against it, since he is oblig'd to repay what the Surety thus lays down for him.

VI. But in consumable Commodities Compensation does not regularly take place, but in those of the same Kind, and that too, not 'till the Time of Payment is come, or ² past ^d; and therefore

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § V.

¹ The Words of the Digests are, Compensatio est debiti & crediti inter se contributio, Digest. Lib. 16. Tit. 2. De compensationibus, Leg. 1. Si causa, ex qua compensatur, liquida sit, & non multis ambagibus innodata, sed possit judici facilem exitum sui prestare, Cod. lib. 4. Tit. 31. Leg. 14. § 1.

² The Digests so direct, Unusquisque creditorem suum, eundemque debitorem, potentem summovet, si paratus est compensare. Ideo compensatio necessaria est, quia interest nostra potius non solvere, quam solutum repetere, Digest. ubi supra, Leg. 2, 3. Dolo facit, qui petit quod redditurus est, lib. 44. tit. 4.

³ The Digests so order, Creditor compensare non cogitur, quod alii quam debitori suo debet: quamvis creditor ejus pro eo, qui convenitur ob debitum proprium, velit compensare, Digest. de compensationibus, Leg. 18. § 1. See also Leg. 16. princip. & Cod. Lib. 4. Tit. 31. De compensationibus, Leg. 9.

⁴ So the Digests speak, Si duo rei promittendi socii non sint: Non proderit alteri, quod stipulator alteri reo pecuniam debet, Digest. Lib. 45. tit. 2. De duobus reis constituendis, Leg. 2.

⁵ This hath Place by the civil Law, when the Heir will not enter upon the Inheritance, till an Inventory is made, because he will not represent the Dead in all Things, but will only be obliged to expend so much as may be the Value of the Inheritance. See Cob. Lib. 6. Tit. 30. De jure deliberandi, Leg. 31. § 4, 9. Upon the whole, a Compensation is made at all Times, when the Debtors or Creditors come into the Rights or Obligations of a Third.

⁶ For then is he Procurator in rem suam, as the Roman Lawyers speak. In rem suam Procurator datus, post litis contestationem, si vice mutuâ conveniatur, æquitate compensationis utetur, Digest. Lib. 16. Tit. 2. De compensat. Leg. 18.

⁷ So the Digests, Id quod pupillorum nomine debetur, si Tutor petat, non posse compensationem objici ejus pecuniæ, quam ipse Tutor suo nomine adversario debet, Digest. ibid. Leg. 23.

⁸ The Digests say, Si quid a fidejussore petatur, æquissimum est eligere fidejussorem, quod ipsi, an quod reo debetur, compensare malis: sed & si utrumque compensare velit, audiendus est. Ibid. Leg. 4. See the precedent Law.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § VI.

¹ In Reality, the Compensation ought to answer the Debt, for the Debtor is obliged to render the Thing in that Manner. Cum quid mutuum dederimus, etsi non cavimus, ut æquè bonum nobis redderetur, non licet debitori deteriore rem, quæ ex eodem genere sit, reddere: veluti vinum novum pro veteri. Nam in contrahendo, quod agitur pro cauto habendum est. Id autem agi intelligitur, ut ejusdem generis & eadem bonitate solvatur, Digest. Lib. 12. tit. 1. De rebus creditis, &c. Leg. 3. As to the Quantity, altho' the Debt be on each side unequal, so that a Compensation can't be fully made, yet the Compensation may make the Debt less, and so acquit him of the greatness of it. Si constat pecuniam invicem deberi, ipso jure pro soluto compensationem haberi oportet ex eo tempore, ex quo ab utraque parte debetur, utique quoad concurrentes quantitates, ejusque solius, quod amplius apud alterum est, usuræ debentur, si modo petitio earum subsistit, Cod. Lib. 4. tit. 31. De compensationibus, Leg. 4.

² So the Digests speak, Quod in diem debetur, non compensabitur, antequam dies veniat, quanquam dari oporteat, Dig. Lib. 16. tit. 12. De compensat. Leg. 7.

³ V. Grot. l. 3. c. 19. f. 15. &c.

^b L. 2, 3. D. d. l. Dolo facit, qui petit quod redditurus est.

^c V. D. ibid. L. 23.

^d V. l. 7. D. h. t.

Things of a different Sort or Quality can't be paid by Compensation, as a Bushel of Wheat for a Bushel of Oats, or a Hoghead of Rbenish for a Hoghead of Port Wine; nor Things of a different Species, as this Horse for that Ox; nor of a different Kind, as a Sheep for a Goose; nor a Species for a Thing indefinite of the same Kind, or for an indeterminate Quantity, as Bucephalus for a Horse, or a Vessel of Oyl. Yet the Roman Lawyers admit of Compensation, where the Particulars are not assign'd, but the same Sort and Quality is owing on each side, as if I had promis'd you a Horse in general, and you happen to be Executor to one that leaves a Horse to me in Legacy. But, yet even in the former Cases, each Party may rate their Debt, and then pay them by Compensation. And yet, where Debts are thus reciprocal, the Obligation is rather³ suspended, than taken away, by withholding what I owe another, till he pays what he owes me. But Work for Work, or Work for Goods, will not admit of Compensation at the very Instant that it ought to be perform'd; for that would frustrate the very⁴ End and Design of such Contracts.

But if each Party release the other, the Obligation ceases upon another Principle, viz. Mutual Disagreement; so also if I cease to be oblig'd, because another, who ought first to perform his Part, omitted it, it is not by reason of Compensation, but because the Condition, upon which the Obligation was founded, does not appear. But if my Work has been neglected by the Party that had undertaken it, I may rate it, and so bring it into Compensation. Nay, I can oppose to a Debt an equivalent Damage, or a Fine adjudg'd to me for any Injury done by my Creditor. But if two Persons be at Law, and while the Cause is depending, strike up a Bargain, neither can oppose the Law-sute, or the Charges of it, to the other^a; v. g. suppose I am at Law with another for an Estate, and during the Sute sell him a House, he can't impute to me as Payment the Estate, or the Expences he has been at about it; for the Estate does not as yet appear to be his, and the Nature of the Thing shews, that the Bargain was made without any Regard to the Cause depending.

As for that Sort of Compensation, which cancels former Favours by subsequent Injuries, Seneca discourses largely of it^b. So also equal Injuries may, by Compensation^c, be put up on both sides, provided the Right of the Magistrate be not infringed.

VII. The Obligation ceases also when the Creditor, or he who has a Title to it, forgives it; for 'tis evident any Man may recede from his own Right, and when the Right has been made over to another, there too the Obligation ceases upon that other's forgiving it. And as at first I cannot stand oblig'd, if the other Party refuses to accept of it; so neither can I continue bound, if he thinks fit to cancel the Bond. But this only in Case no Third Person is injur'd by it; for otherwise he alone cannot release me, altho' I was immediately oblig'd to him only.

This Release is perform'd either expressly, or tacitly; to the former belongs what the Roman Law calls^d Acceptilatio, an Acquittance or Discharge, by which the Person acknowledged himself to have receiv'd what indeed he had not; as also the^e

³ This is a Term borrowed from the Roman Law, which allows Retention in several Cases, where the Things due on both sides are not of a sort. See CUJACIUS's Observat. viii. 2. xv. 12. xviii. 10. Vinnius upon the Institutes, Lib. 4. tit. 6. De actionibus, § 13. and Mr. NOODT's Probabilia Juris, Lib. 3. Chap. 9.

⁴ For Actions are not capable of being put in the place one of another, as Things are; they can't be reduc'd to an Estimation respectively, so that it be all one to a Person, whether he do what he hath promised or not, provided he be dispens'd with, to do or give what he hath promised in his Turn; and likewise it be indifferent either to receive the Thing it self which is due, or another of equal Value. So when any one engages to do any thing for us, we can depend upon nothing, because he'll endeavour always to evade his Engagements under a pretence of some Compensation due to him from us, and for which he will labour to get quit with us.

⁵ The Digests thus speak, Si duo dolo malo fecerint, invicem de dolo non agent. Digest. Lib. 4. tit. 3. De dolo malo, Leg. 36. Vero atque uxore mores invicem accusantibus, causam repudii dedisse utrumque pronunciatum est. Id ita accipi debet, ut ea lege quam ambo contempserunt, neuter vindicetur. Paria enim debita mutua pensatione dissolvuntur, Lib. 24. tit. 3. Leg. 39. It appears by the first Law, That if in an Exchange, for Example, I have given a blind Horse, and the other hath given me a lame one, we are quit. In like manner, If a Man hath stolen from another, and the other hath stolen from him again, there's nothing can be demanded from each other, provided that the Things stolen were of equal Value. Quotiens ex maleficio oritur actio, ut puta ex causa furtiva cæterorumque maleficiorum, si de ea pecuniarie agitur, compensatio locum habet, Digest. Lib. 16. De compensationibus, Lib. 10. § 2. The other Law imports, That if an Husband being desirous to be divorced from his Wife, for her scandalous Behaviour, is accused by her, and convicted of the same Faults, or such as are as contrary to conjugal Fidelity as those he blames her for, neither of them may pretend to any Advantage to dissolve their Marriage. This is just, but if Adultery be committed on both sides, the Woman's Crime affords a much stronger Reason for their Separation: See Chap. 1. of the following Book. But 'tis not the same with punishments inflicted by the Laws, which are only some pecuniary Fines laid on the Parties. When two Persons have committed a like Crime one towards the other, the Magistrate hath nevertheless a Right to punish them both. See Digest. lib. 48. tit. 5. Ad legem Juliam de Adulteriis coercendis, Leg. II, § 4. & XIII. § 5.

Mr. BARR. NOTES on § VII.

¹ The Law is, Item per acceptilationem tollitur obligatio. Est autem acceptilatio, imaginaria solutio. Quod enim ex verborum obligatione Titio debetur, si id velit Titius remittere, poterit sic fieri, ut patiatu debitorum hæc verba dicere: Quod ego tibi promisi habesne acceptum? Et Titius respondeat, Habeo. Quo genere, ut diximus, tantum eæ solvuntur obligationes, quæ ex verbis consistunt, non cæteræ, Instit. Lib. 3. Tit. 30. § 1.

² The Words of the Digests are, Est autem prodita stipulatio, quæ vulgo Aquiliana adpellatur, per quam contingit, ut omnium eorum obligatio in stipulatum deducatur, & ea per acceptilationem tollatur. Stipulatio enim Aquiliana renovat omnes obligationes. Ibid. § 2.

^a A. Grotius well observes, l. 3. c. 19. s. 19.

^b Epist. 81. & de Beneficiis, l. 6. c. 4, &c.

Stipulatio Aquiliana, which by a Sort of Novation, brought the Debtor to Articles of Agreement, and then releas'd him by a Discharge; all which tedious Forms and Circumstances the Law of Nature knows nothing of, but makes the Obligation to cease upon the bare Consent of the Party signified³.

Besides, the Obligation is presum'd to be⁴ remitted, if I designedly deliver up (not in Trust, or such like) the Instruments or Deeds, without which the Debt cannot be made out^a; but if I have several Instruments, and each of them is capable of proving the Debt, then⁵ the Obligation is not suppos'd to be cancelled upon the Delivery of one only.

As for what the Roman Law observes, that by Delivery of the Deeds the Creditor is judg'd to enter tacitly into Compact not to demand the Debt; that Nicety is unknown to the Law of Nature, which supposes the Obligation cancell'd, not only by real Payment, but by the bare Remission of it.

The Obligation is suppos'd to be tacitly forgiven, if the Creditor, directly or indirectly, hinders the Discharge of it: Thus if I bargain with a Man to do any certain Work, and am my self to call upon him when I would have him perform it, my not calling upon him is presum'd to be a Release, as is also my substituting another to do it for him.

VIII. But as the former Methods take place, where one Party only is oblig'd; so where both are concern'd, if nothing be yet perform'd, the Obligation may cease upon each Party's dissenting and receding from the Bargain¹; for 'tis natural that the contrary to that which causes the Obligation should be capable of making it void, provided it be not of such a Nature, as, when once contracted, never to be rescinded; for no doubt a positive Law may, in certain Cases, forbid that what has been once agreed upon should be² retracted, altho' nothing yet be perform'd in it. But if part has been perform'd, and one Party done something of his Duty, then 'tis plain³ bare Dissent is not sufficient to take away the Obligation; which in this Case cannot be cancell'd, unless he who perform'd releases the other, or has amends made him some other Way^b.

IX. Moreover, an Obligation is released, or rather broke off, by the Perfidy of either Party; so that if one does not perform his Part, neither is the other oblig'd to make good his^c: For when a Man takes upon him any Duty, not absolutely and gratis, but upon the Prospect of the other's doing something on his side, the Obligation to make good his Undertaking is only conditional, as if he had said, I'll do this, in case you will first do that. Now whatever is founded upon a Condition, fails of Course, if the Condition does not appear¹. And therefore the superstitious Exactness of the Indian, if it be true, was more than he was oblig'd to; who, when another had taken away his Wife against all Right and Reason, would not however break off with him, because he had taken a solemn Oath, that he would never, upon any Account, do any harm^d. But this² holds only where the Non-performance lies on his side, who ought to perform first. How far, or whether the Fear, left, after I have done my part, the other should not perform his, frees me from the Obligation, has been discours'd of before^e.

But if one Party has performed in part, and the Contract happens to be broke off before Completion, how shall he have Right done him? In this Case we must distinguish according to the va-

³ Whereas the Roman Lawyers affirm, That there is here a difference between real Contracts, Contracts of bare Consent, Contracts by Writing, and verbal Contracts, or Stipulations, (see Chap. 3. § 6. above) there are none but the last, according to them, to which Acceptation can be applied, as appears by this § of the Institutes, Quo genere, ut diximus, tantum esse solentur obligationes, quæ in verbis consistunt, non etiam ceteræ.

⁴ See the Law of the Digests, quoted above, Lib. 3. Chap. 6. § 2. Note 7.

⁵ Several able Lawyers are of another Opinion, and that with Reason, as Mr. HERTIUS saith; for they draw Consequences from what hath been done, rather than what hath not, and they presume, that every wise Person will not do any thing but will have some Effect, and they can't see what he can propose to himself, who gives up an obligatory Note (supposing that there be good Proof that the Bill was fairly given up) but that every Man should believe that the Creditor would forgive the Debt, unless the contrary can be made fully to appear.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § VIII.

¹ So the Institutes direct, Ex obligationes, quæ consensu contrahuntur, contraria voluntate dissolvuntur. Nam si Titius & Seius inter se convenerint, ut fundum Tusculanum emptum Seius haberet centum aureis; deinde re nondum secuta, id est, neque pretio soluto neque fundo tradito, placuerit inter eos ut discederetur ab ea emptione & venditione, invicem liberantur. Instit. ubi supra, § 4.

² In Case of Marriage, for Example.

³ As it is in a Bargain of Sale, the Buyer hath already paid for the Goods, and hath not receiv'd them, or the Seller hath delivered his Goods, but hath not taken the Money. Sed non poterimus eadem ratione uti post pretium solutum emptione repetita, cum post pretium solutum infectam emptionem facere non possumus. Digest. Lib. 18. tit. 5. De rescindenda venditione, &c. Leg. 2. Ab emptione, venditione, locatione, conductione, cæterisque similibus obligationibus, qui integris omnibus consensu eorum, qui inter se obligati sunt, recedi posse, dubium non est. Aristoni hoc amplius videbatur, si ea, quæ me ex empto tibi præstare oportet, præstitissem, &c. consentiremus ne quid tu mihi eo nomine præstares, Lib. 2. tit. 14. De Pactis, Leg. 58.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § IX.

¹ ἄλλοι δὲ σπονδὰς εἶναι ἀποσφραγίστας, ἀλλ' οἱ ἀσφραγίστας ἐστίν. Not those that defend themselves, but those who are the Aggressors break the Truce. Thucyd. Lib. 1. Chap. 123. Edit. Oxon.

² So the Law is, Nec adversario tuo transactione uti concedendum est; nisi ea, quæ placita sunt, adimplere paratus sit. Cod. Lib. 2. tit. 3. De pactis Leg. 22. Frustra sibi fidem quis postulat ab eo servari, cui fidem à se præstitam servare recusat. Decretal. Lib. 6. tit. ult. De regulis Juris, Leg. 75. We know the common Maxim, Frangenti fidem fides frangatur eadem.

^a Lib. 2. t. 14. L. 2. D. de Pactis. ^b V. l. 58. D. de Pactis, ubi supra. ^c V. Grat. L. 3. c. 19. f. 14. ^d Id
Philosof. L. 3. c. 9. de vita Apollon. Tyanæi. ^e B. 3. c. 6. f. 9. riety

riety of Circumstances. For if I have perform'd what I ought, and the other refuses to perform his part, I have a Right to force him to it by any lawful Means: But if after having perform'd part, I begin to be tired, and neglect to make an end of it, I cannot oblige that other to make any Allowance for my partial imperfect Performance, 'till I finish the whole according to the Agreement; nor can that trite Saying be objected here, that no one ought to grow rich at the Loss of another, for no Regard is to be had to the Loss which a Man by his own Fault brings upon himself³. And if he whom it concerns to have my part of the Covenant fulfilled, is the Occasion why it is not, it is the same thing to me as if it was fulfilled. Nor if he should afterwards repent of his Breach of Faith, and be willing to compleat his Contract, shall I be obliged to comply with it. For one Violation entirely breaks off the Contract, and frees the other from his Obligation; thus, should I hire a Servant for a Year, and pay him his Wages beforehand, and, for no Fault of his, should turn him off before the End of the Year, I should not be able to oblige him to return me part of the Wages proportionable to the Remainder of the Time. Nay, if each Party has perform'd equally, yet even then, neither can break off the Bargain before the Time appointed: and if one should give back, the other would have a Right to force him to compleat it; or to make as much Amends, as it was his Interest to have the Compact exactly perform'd.

X. Obligations also expire, when the¹ Person, in whom they are founded, changes². Thus the Magistrate, having promised Protection to the Subject, is no longer oblig'd to it, than he continues in his Office: and the Subject having sworn Allegiance to the Magistrate, is freed from the Obligation, if either he ceases to be a Subject, or the other to be a Magistrate. But such an Alteration in the Subject Matter as would have prevented the Obligation, had it existed at the making of it, will not be sufficient to dissolve it afterwards, provided the Party be not thereby render'd incapable of performing it³. For unless Provision had been made at first for such Accidents, the Right, which was irrevocably given, shall continue firm, altho' perhaps the other be a little burthen'd by it. For he enter'd into Contract freely and of his own accord, and may thank himself for not having foreseen those Inconveniences, that might probably have been prevented. Thus when⁴ a People have given up their Liberties to an Arbitrary Power, altho' afterwards they change their Minds, and shew a greater Inclination for another Form of Government, yet they cannot therefore shake off their Allegiance. And thus many, if they had known the Inconveniences of a married State, would never have embrac'd it; who yet having enter'd into the Bond, whatever happens,⁵ must endure it.

XI. Time puts a¹ Period to those Obligations which were limited to a Day; and if the Parties desire to have them continued, they must covenant again de novo, which needs not always be done expressly, but may sometimes be tacitly perform'd². But such an Obligation as is void after such a Time, and yet has no room to exert it self in before the Time expired, is absurd: As if I should make my self indebted to you 100*l.* for three Years, yet so as that you shall have no Right to demand it before the Time be lapsed; for vain is the Obligation that has no Effect before it expires, nor leaves any behind it after.

But it is another Thing, if I covenant, That unless you demand it within the Compass of three Years, it shall not be due: For that will be a Condition annex'd to the Obligation, which not ap-³ The Words of the Digests are, Qui operas suas locavit, totius temporis mercedem accipere debet, si per eum non stetit, quo minus operas præstat. Digest. Lib. 19. tit. 2. Locati, conducti, Leg. 38. princip. See also Leg. 19. § 9, 10.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § X.

¹ See the next Chapter § 20. at the end. Mr. HERTIUS quotes a Law here, in which it is said, That if one make a Promise to any one to give so much, either to thee or to another, and that other comes to be adopted, or banished, or carried into Slavery, or changes his Condition in any other Manner, the Engagement is null, as to him, because it contains a tacit Agreement or Condition, that he remain in the same State. Cum quis tibi aut Titio dari stipulatus sit, magis esse ait, ut ita demum recte Titio solvi dicendum sit, si in eodem statu maneat, quo fuit cum stipulatio interponeretur. Caterum sive in adoptionem, sive in exilium ierit, vel aqua & igni ei interdictum, vel servus factus sit: non recte ei solvi dicendum, tacite enim inesse hæc conventio stipulationi videtur. &c. Digest. Lib. 46. tit. 3. Leg. 38. But such a Change of State hath no Connexion with such a Promise, but by Reason of the Niceties of the Civil Law.

² So a Person in Commission, after his Commission is expired, is not obliged any longer to him, whose Affairs he before was engaged to manage. It is the same with a Tutor or Guardian, in respect to his Pupil's Affairs. See Digests, Lib. 14. tit. 3. De inlittoria Actione, Leg. 20. Cod. Lib. 5. tit. 37. De Administratione Tutorum vel Curatorum, &c. Leg. 26. and tit. 39. Quando ex factis Tutoris, vel Curatoris Minores agere, vel conveniri possunt, Leg. 1. Mr. HERTIUS quotes these Laws.

³ See what Mr. BAYLE says, in his Answer to the Questions of a Provincial, Tom. 1. Chap. 60. upon this Question, Whether Gebhard Truchbes may justly take Possession of the Archbishoprick of Cologne, seeing he has been married?

⁴ This can't happen in the Life of the first Prince, unless he has excessively abused his Power, and in that Case he from whom he keeps it hath a Right to put him out: but if after some Generations, the Alteration of the State, or the Genius of the Nation requires another Form of Government, why may not the People introduce it? The Publick Good, for whose Safety it is, or ought to be established, makes here a tacit Condition or Exception, which obliges us not to judge of the Engagement of a People in a Body, with Relation to the Establishment of a Sovereign Power, after the same Manner as we regulate the Engagements of private Persons one to another. We shall speak of the Grounds of my Assertion in another place.

⁵ See the famous Mr. BAYLE's Answer to the Quest. of a Prov. Tom. 2. p. 40.

Mr. BARB. NOTE on § XI.

¹ See Lib. 7. Chap. 6. § 15. following. This Author, in his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, Lib. 1. Chap. 16. § 7. adds this Restriction, Provided, that during the Time agreed on, he was in a Condition of requiring the Performace of the Engagements of the other Party.

² Vide L. 14. t. 2. l. 13. f. ult. D. Locati, &c.

pearing, the Obligation will cease, Thus 'tis usual for a Surety to bind himself for such a Term only, to oblige the Creditor to demand his Money be- times, and while the Debtor is able to pay, lest o- therwise he should remain bound for ever.

XII. By Death those Obligations expire, which were founded in the Person of the deceased; for the Subjeſt being gone, the Accident must necessa- rily follow, and the Performance be render'd ¹ im- possible in Nature. But yet in Japan the Bonzy persuade Men, That those who give them Money here shall receive ten-fold in the other World: And upon this Account give their Creditors a Note under their Hand, which they keep carefully, in order to be buried with them ². But generally the Obligati- on that lay upon the deceased is communicated and continued to the Survivors; and this, either when the Survivor takes it upon him, of his own accord to preserve the Reputation of the deceased, or for other Reasons; or when the Goods of the deceased, being made over to the Heir ³ the In- cumbrances also go along with them.

But if a Man dies, and leaves not enough to satisfy his Debt, the Creditor's Action seems to die with him; for what can any one do to a dead Carcase ³? Tho' among the Egyptians, the Credi- tors used to bury the Bodies of their Debtors in their Houses, which afterwards the Heirs of the deceased, if they were able, redeemed and interred honourably. Among whom too it was usual for the Children to pawn their Parents dead Bodies; but if they did not redeem them again, they were treated with the greatest Ignominy, and after Death were denied Burial ^o.

XIII. By Delegation a Man substitutes his Debtor to his Creditor to make Payment for him ¹; or I make over to my Creditor the Debt another owes me: And here the Creditor's Consent is necessary, but not the Consent of the ² third Debtor, whom, in this Case, I can make over unknown to him, and against his Will: For 'tis the same thing to whom a Man pays, but not the same from whom he is to demand a Debt.

XIV. There is no need to say much of Confu- sion; for since the same Man cannot be his own Cre- ditor and Debtor. it follows, if a Man becomes Heir to his Debtor, his Action ceases, ¹ not finding an Object to exert it self upon.

XV. ¹ Novation seems to belong peculiarly to the positive ² Civil Law, and not to the Law of Nature and Nations; for old Obligations may be alter'd by Consent of Parties, as suppose that the Loss of a Thing, thro' the Delay of the Debtor, should not be imputed to him, that no Penalty or Usury be demanded for Delay, that Pledges be re- stored, Sureties releas'd, the Creditor, for the fu- ture, declaring himself willing to depend entirely upon the Credit of the Debtor; but those that deal according to the Simplicity of the Law of Na- ture, need not here suppose a new Obligation su- per-indue'd upon the former; for indeed nothing is here transacted, but only the Creditor gives up part of his Right, or several Pretensions are blend- ed into one: But that one Action should enjoy

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XII.

¹ Vide Val. Max. Lib. 2. Chap. 6. f. 10. and Pomp. Mel. Lib. 3: Chap. 2. says of the Old Gauls; The Management of their Concerns, and the Demand of their Debts were put off to the other World.

² See Lib. 3. Chap. 1. § 11. and Lib. 4. Chap. 10. § 13. above.

³ To which the Law of Solon has Regard, which forbids the Dead to be used contumeliously. Vid. Plut. Solon. p. 139. Vid. Lib. 47. tit. 10. Lib. 1. f. 4, 6. and Lib. 27. D. de injuriis, &c.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XIII.

¹ Delegare est vice sua alium reum dare creditori, vel cui jufferit. Digest. 46. tit. 2. De novationibus, & delegationibus, Leg. 11.

² It is by the Roman Law, Delegatio debiti, nisi consentiente, & stipulante promittente debitore, jure perfici non potest. Cod. Lib. 8. tit. 42. De Novat. & Delegat. Leg. 1. But our Author puts another Sense upon the Term Delegation, than the Law- yers do; for he understands by it, the Translation or Resignation of a Debt, which in the Roman Law is looked upon as a kind of Sale, which a Man may make without the Consent of the Debtor. Nominis autem venditio, & ignorante, & invito eo, ad- versus quem actiones mandantur, contrahi solet. Cod. ibid. See also what Mr. HERTIUS says here, and Mr. WEBER, Pro- fessor also at Giesſen, in his Notes upon the Abridgment, De Offic. Hom. & Civ. printed in 1710. Lib. 1. Chap. 16. § 9.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XIV.

¹ So the Digests affirm, Aditio Hereditatis nonnunquam jure confundit Obligationem, veluti si creditor debitoris vel contra debitor creditoris adierit Hereditatem. Digest. Lib. 46. tit. 3. De solution. & liberat. Leg. 95. § 2. "Confusion happens "there, where Right and Obligation meet, and joining in the same Person vanish by that means." The Examples produced by Mr. HERTIUS to shew that the Notion of Confusion is of a more large Extent, concern only the Decisions of the Roman Law, about which we may consult Mr. TITIUS's Jus privatum Romano-Germanicum, Lib. 5. Chap. 16. § 9.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XV.

¹ The Roman Laws mean by it, an Act by which the Creditor and Debtor, without any new Cause change the Nature of a Debt, by adding some new Obligation to the old. Novatio est prioris debiti in aliam obligationem, vel civilem, vel naturalem, transmissio atque translatio: hoc est, cum ex precedenti causa ita nova constituitur, ut prior perimatur. Novatio enim à novo nomen accepit, & à nova obligatione. Digest. Lib. 46. tit. 2. De novationibus, & delegationibus, Leg. 1.

² Mr. TITIUS, Objerv. 415. on Pufendorf, maintains the contrary; for he says, That Novation, as every other lawful Act, is made by the mutual Consent of Parties, and in Consequence of that Liberty which all Men naturally have, to determine and change, as they see fit, their Engagements one to another. See what Mr. HERTIUS says about it.

³ Vide Bern. Varen. de relig. Japan. p. m. 35.

^o Vide Diod. Sic. L. 1. c. 92, 93. Lucian. de luctu, p. 306, 307.

one Privilege more than another, is entirely owing to some positive Law; for in the Law of Nature those Things that are equally due, may be equally demanded. But, as for what the ³ Roman Law delivers concerning such a Novation as is got by a Contest at Law (and which they call necessary, as they call the other voluntary) may be apply'd in some Respects to the Law of Nature; for he that ⁴ casts his Adversary, has an Action against him for what the Court adjudges, let the Merit of his former Cause be what it will: So when any Controversy is decided by War, let that be as it will, after the War is at an end, not only the first Pretensions may be demanded, but also that which was determined by the Peace ⁵.

³ In the Digests, Aliam causam esse novationis voluntariæ, aliam judicii accepti, multa exempla ostendunt. Digest. ubi supra, Leg. 29.

⁴ Judicati actio. See Cod. Lib. 7. tit. 54. De usuris rei judicatæ, Leg. 3.

⁵ To these several Ways of entering into an Obligation, our Author might have added another, viz. When a Thing which was due in Specie, as our Lawyers speak, so that it can't be discharged by an Equivalent, is destroyed, without any Fault of the Debtor, or by any Delay in returning it. The Roman Law gives an Example of a Slave who dies before he is put into the Hands of him to whom he was promised, or to whom he was bequeathed, by a Person to whom he was Heir. Si ex Legati causâ, aut ex stipulatu hominem certum tibi debeas, non aliter post mortem ejus tenearis tibi, quam si per te steterit, quominus vivo eum tibi dares: quod ita fit, si aut interpellatus non dedisti, aut occidisti eum. Digest. Lib. 45. tit. 1. De verborum obligationibus, Leg. 23. see also 72. § 1. and 83. § 7. and Cod. Lib. 4. tit. 2. Si certum petatur, Leg. 9. and the Jus privatum Romano-Germanicum, by Mr. TITIVS, Lib. 5. Chap. 16.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Interpretation of Compacts and Laws:

- | | |
|--|--|
| I. The Reason of the Order. II. The Necessity of a right Interpretation. III. The Words are ordinarily to be understood according to the common Usage. And IV. Words of Art according to the Art. V. Conjecture is sufficient, when Words are dubious. VI. Or seem to contradict one another. VII. Conjectures must be taken from the Matter treated on. VIII. From the Effect, or IX. From the Coherence, Original, and Place. X. How the Sense may be gathered from the Reason of them. XI. Some Words have both a large and strict Signification. XII. Some Things are favourable, others odious. | XIII. Rules are to be made from these Distinctions. XIV. An Example of Two who came to the Goal together. XV. How this Order is to be interpreted. No Man must wage War without the Command of another. XVI. Of these Words, Carthage shall be free. XVII. A Conjecture when a Law must be enlarged. XVIII. Of Tricks to evade a Law. XIX. A Conjecture when the Law ought to be restrained upon the Account of some Defect in the Will of the Lawgiver. XX. An Observation upon this Conjecture. XXI. Or upon the Account of some Accident inconsistent with his Will, as where it is either unlawful. XXII. Or too grievous in Respect of the Performance. XXIII. What if two Laws are contrary one to another. |
|--|--|

SO much for Pacts in general, and partly in particular; let us now proceed to the Interpretation of them, for since in all Obligations certain Signs are made use of to express the Minds of the Parties, and the Laws and Heads of the Contract; and since these Signs may sometimes be taken in different Senses, 'tis highly necessary to have some Rule to find out that which is true and genuine. Now altho' we design to treat hereafter of those Pacts which presuppose civil Government; and most of what we have to say upon this Head has Relation to such an Establishment; yet since it would not be so convenient either to divide the Matter, or to reject the whole to the end of the Book, it will not, I hope, be thought so much against Method to treat of all together in this place, as Grotius ² has done before me, who has handled this Subject with the utmost Nicety.

II. If then we consider for what End Obligations are made, we shall find that every Man is bound to that which he intended, when he enter'd into the Obligation. It is here suppos'd that he enter'd into it freely, and of his own accord, and that the Matter is such as he lay under no Constraint to perform it otherwise: And therefore I don't see how a Man can possibly be obliged farther than he himself intended; in this Sense is that of Cicero¹ to be taken; In Obligations regard is to be had not so much to the Expression as to the intent of the Party.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on Chap. XII. §. I.

¹ The Original is here obscure, the Word Pleraque seeming to refer to Pactorum, and so it ought to be rendred, The most of these Pacts; but then his Words are not true, for Laws are not properly Pacts, as our Author proves, Lib. 1. Chap. 6. § 2. and the contrary appears in this Chapter, for the Rules here laid down may be applied as well to Pacts as Laws.

² Lib. 2. Chap. 16.

Farther, such is the Nature of Man, that his internal Actions are not in themselves visible to another, and may differ from his external Signs and Actions: And yet we lie under a Necessity to distinguish clearly what every Man is obliged to, or what may lawfully be demanded of him; for there would be no such Thing as Obligation, if any one might free himself, by affixing what Sense he pleas'd to his Signs, and by pretending that he meant different from what others went away with. And therefore right Reason dictates that he, to whom the Obligation is made, should have a Right to compel him, from whom 'tis due, to the Performance of it, in that Sense which the right Interpretation of the Signs made use of importeth. For tho' the Man himself is chiefly concerned in what he meant; yet others must act by Signs; for else the Matter would be to no End or Purpose, which in Morality is absurd. Consonant to this was the old Form us'd in making Leagues, Sine dolo malo, utique ea hic hodie rectissime intellecta sunt; Without any fraudulent Design, according² to the Sense which the Words at present bear.

The true End and Design of Interpretation is, to gather the Intent of the Man from most probable Signs. These Signs are of two sorts, Words, and other Conjectures, which may be considered separately, or both together³.

III. As for Words¹, the Rule is, *Unless there be reasonable Objections against it, they are to be understood in their proper and most known Signification; not so much according to Grammar, as to the general Use of them*².

When Tiberius had us'd a Word which was not Latin, Capito said, that, in Honour of the Emperor, it ought to pass current for the future, altho' no body before him had made use of it: But one Marcellus reply'd, That Cesar might, if he pleas'd, naturalize Men, but Words he could not. Procopius^b having said, That the Emperor had rais'd an Army partly among his own Subjects, and partly among the Allies, subjoin'd, That formerly by the Name of Allies were meant only the Barbarians, who were not Slaves; for they were never conquered but had obtain'd the Privilege of Citizens, with Arms in their Hand, and were so called from the Alliances which they made. But now there is none but may have a Title to this Name: The Way of the World is not to keep Words strictly to that Sense which they did originally bear; for Men change at Pleasure the Things themselves, little regarding by what Names they were first called. The Locrians^d arriving at the extreme Part of Calabria, found that Country possess'd by the Sicilians, who alarm'd with their unexpected Arrival, receiv'd them, and struck up a League in these Words, That the Locrians should preserve an Amity with the Sicilians, and permit them to enjoy the Country in common with them, as long as they should tread upon that

Mr. BARR. NOTES on § II.

¹ CICERO'S Words are, Semper autem in fide, quid senseris, non quid dixeris, est cogitandum. De Offic. Lib. 1. Chap. 13. But these Words are a part of a large Passage, which are neither found in the most antient Editions, nor the most part of the Manuscripts.

² This is well expressed, saith the Author after GROTIUS, in the Form of the Treaties of the antient Romans, Ut illa palam prima postrema, ex illis tabulis ceræe recitata sunt, sine dolo malo, utique ea hic hodie rectissime intellecta sunt, illi Legibus Populus Romanus prior non deficiet. Tit. Liv. Lib. 1. Chap. 24.

³ That is to say, So that the Conjectures be drawn hither from the Words alone, or something contained in them.

Mr. BARR. NOTES on § III.

¹ The Author supposes that such as interpret Compacts and Laws, should understand the general Rules of Criticism, which are absolutely necessary to discover the Sense of all Sorts of Words, whether delivered by word of mouth, or written. Such as these Maxims, for Example, 1. To understand a Man, who speaks not distinctly, or has an Impediment in his Speech, we must be accustomed to hear him. As also to decypher a Deed, we must learn to read the Writing of him that made it. Whereupon the Roman Law determines, that if a Man at the Point of Death says, I make my Servant Cratinus (for Cratistus) free, and he is his only Servant, he ought to have his freedom according to the Will of the Testator. Qui habebat servum Cratistum, testamento ita cavuit: Servus meus Cratinus liber esto. Quæro an servus Cratistus ad libertatem pervenire possit, cum testator servum Cratinum non habebat, sed hunc servum Cratistum? Respondit, nihil obesse, quod in syllaba crasset. Digest. Lib. 40. tit. 4. De manumissis testamentis, Leg. 54. princip. Mr. THOMASIVS, Instit. Jurispr. Divin. Lib. 2. Chap. 12. § 22. shew'd me this Example. He also observes in § 25. following, That the Emperor Justinian, Col. Lib. 1. tit. 17. De veteri Jure civil. &c. forbids with Reason, Leg. 1. § 13. Leg. 2. § 22. Leg. 3. § 22. to use short Writing in copying out Laws. And it were to be wish'd that none had transgress'd his Prohibition. 2. We ought to be well acquainted with the Language of him that speaks or writes. 3. We should know his Style, and the Style of the Time in which he wrote. 4. We ought to be acquainted with the Opinions and Customs to which he alludes. 5. We should endeavour to discover his Sentiments and Disposition, his Character, his Capacity, End and Intention. 6. We should see if the Deed be not forged, nor any thing put to it or taken from it fraudulently; if there be no Fault crept into the Writing, either thro' the Mistake of the Author, or Negligence or Ignorance of the Copier. For, to bring an Example of the last Case taken out of the Roman Law, "if the Clerk of a Notary hath filly copied out the Heads of a Contract, it shall not tend to the Prejudice of him upon whose Account it is made." Si Librarius in transferendis Stipulationis verbis errasset, nihil nocere, quinimus & reus, & fidejussor teneatur. Digest. Lib. 1. tit. 17. De diversis Reg. Jur. Leg. 92. 7. We must understand the Matter which is treated of. 8. Lastly, There are a great Number of other Circumstances which ought to be minded, and some of which are set down a little lower by our Author, but which may be better discovered by Use, and by reflecting upon particular Cases, and upon every Passage, than by general Rules. See the Writers upon the Art of Criticizing, but chiefly the excellent Work of Mr. LE CLERC, entituled, Ars Critica, where we may find a compleat System of that useful and necessary Art. Mr. THOMASIVS, and others which he mentions in the forementioned Chapter of his Jurispr. Divin. furnishes us with several Examples, which relate to Compacts and Laws.

² Inasmuch that an antient Roman maintains, That Tiberius, as potent an Emperor as he was, could not make one foreign Word become a Denizen of Rome. DIO CASSIUS, Lib. 59. See above, Lib. 4. Chap. 1. § 6. and THEMISTIUS ORAT. 23. sive Sophista, p. 287. Edit. HARDUIN, upon the Word Sophista, as also PROCOPIUS Hist. Vandal. upon the Word Allies.

^a Usus, quem pene arbitrium est & jus & norma loquendi. Hor. Use is the true Standard of Speaking, Words are like Money, none will pass but what has the publick Stamp upon it. Quint. Instit. Orat. l. 1. c. 6. ^b H. 9. Vandal. l. 1. ^c The Signification of the Word Sophister, in process of Time, changed like Money, Themist. Orat. 23. ^d Polyb. l. 12. c. 4.

Earth, and wear these Heads upon their Shoulders. These Terms being agreed upon, the Locrians came to take the Oath, having first put Earth in their Shoes, and fastened the Heads of Garlick upon their Shoulders, so as not to be seen. But when they had taken the Oath, they threw the Earth out of their Shoes, and the Heads of the Garlick from their Shoulders, and watching their Opportunity, fell upon the Sicilians, and drove them out of the Country. The Bœotians ^a made a League with the Spartans, and one of the Articles was, That they should deliver up Panaetum; which they did indeed deliver up, but first demolish'd it.

Leucippus ^b having borrowed of the Tarentines the Use of a Place for a Day and a Night, and not being willing to restore it, when they demanded it by Day, he put them off to the next Night; and when by Night, to the next Day.

When Alibomet took Eubœa, he told a certain Person that his Head should be safe, but immediately cut him in two in the middle.

A petit Prince of the Indies fled to the King of Persia for Protection, and when his Sovereign demanded him by his Ambassador, the Persian, during the Audience, order'd him to be put in a Basket, and hung upon a Tree, and then deny'd that he was upon his Land ^c. Thus a certain Person deny'd positively that he had laid Hands on a Priest, for he had only cudgell'd and kick'd him. Thus Tamerlan having artick'd with the Garison of Sebastia that no Blood should be shed, nevertheless order'd all the Prisoners to be buried alive. But these Quibbles, as they are too gross and frivolous, so, as Cicero observes, instead of taking it off, they rather bind the Perjury upon the Conscience ^d.

IV. As for Terms of Art, which are ¹ above the Reach of the common People, the Rule is, That they be taken according to the Definition ² of the Learned in each Art. The Logicians, says Cicero, use not the same Words as other Men; they have Terms of their own, as indeed all other Arts have; v. g. the Word Army; suppose it had been stipulated between two Crowns, that one should not pass thro' the other's Territories with an Army, what Number of Soldiers would come under that Denomination? Grotius ^e defines an Army to be such a Number as dares invade a foreign Country, or face an Enemy in the Field; for we find in all Histories the open Actions of an Army oppos'd to what is done by Stealth in the Manner of Robbers; yet it cannot be so universally defined, how great a Multitude constitutes an Army, as to hold good at all Times, and in all Places: For both the Enemy's Strength, and our own, must be considered. If we have to do with a poor State, a small Force may be esteem'd an Army, which yet against some flourishing Kingdoms would be deem'd little better than a handful of Foragers. And therefore when Vegetius ^f describes an Army ^g to consist of Legions and Auxiliaries, and a competent Number of Horse to carry on a War, he does not describe an Army in general, but as it was then amongst the Romans; for an Army may be compos'd of only natural born Subjects, or of Allies and Foreigners only; or it may consist of only Foot, or only Horse. Cicero ^h tells us, that Craffus deny'd any Man to be rich, who was not able to maintain an Army at his own Charge, which he ⁱ defines to consist of six Legions, and a great Number of Auxiliaries. Polybius ^j says, the Roman Army generally contain'd 16000 Romans, and 2000 Auxiliaries; tho' sometimes it did not amount to that Number. In the Digests ^k, he who has one Legion under his Command, is said to be General of an Army. Besides, another Question might be moved upon this Word; as, Whether the afore said Article be violated, if one marches a great Number of Soldiers thro' the other's Territories, not in a Body, but in separate Parties? Now since a Man may be said to have an Army, either if he has all his Forces united together in one place, or has them so dispersed as to be able to draw them together upon short Warning, it ought to be farther considered, for what End this Article was made; for if it was only for our own Security, 'tis plain the Article is not violated by the Army's marching in small Bodies; but if it was for the Security of a Neighbour, such a Passage as this breaks the Article. And the same may be applied to a Fleet, if in any Treaty it be provided, that no Fleet shall be suffer'd to pass in such a part of the Sea; for here not only the Number of Ships, but their Bigness and the maritime Strength of the People concern'd is to be consider'd ^l. And so in respect of a Fort prohibited to be rais'd within such a Distance; the Word may signify either a high and regular Fortification, or any fortified Place whatsoever, altho' consisting of low pitiful Buildings. And therefore, if the Design of the Article be to prevent any fortified Place from giving Umbrage to our Territories, 'tis plain that it is against the Treaty to throw up so much as a little Bulwark of Earth, with small Huts to lodge Soldiers in ^m.

But if ⁿ Terms of Art happen to be differently

MR. BARRÉ'S NOTES on § IV.

¹ This is what CICERO observes about Logick, in the Passage quoted by our Author after GROTIUS. Qualitates igitur appellati, quas vocantur Græc. vocant: quod ipsum apud Græcos non est vulgi verbum, sed Philosophorum, atque id in multis. Dialecticorum verò verba nulla sunt publica: suis utantur: & id quidem commune omnium serè est Artium, Academic. Quest. Lib. 1. Chap. 7.

² Unless he that speaks understands neither any Art, nor the Terms of it; for then we must judge by the Connexion of a Discourse, or some other Circumstances, what Sense he had in his Mind.

³ His Words are, Exercitus dicitur tam Legionum, quam etiam auxiliorum, nec non etiam Equitum, ad gerendum bellum multitudo collecta. De re militari. Lib. 3. Chap. 1. Edit. Plantin. Scriver.

⁴ This Reflection, as Mr. TILLOTSON observes, Observat. 419. is nothing to the Purpose, for he treats not of the Manner how one may express himself clearly to make his Mind known, but only gives some Rules to discover another's, when 'tis darkly expressed.

^a Thucyd. l. 5. c. 42. Edit. Oxon. ^b Strabo, l. 6. p. 183. Edit. Genev. ^c Olearius, Itin. Pers. l. 4. c. 30. ^d Off. 3.

^e 32. Fraus enim adstringit, non dissolvit perjurium. ^f Ubi supra. ^g De re militari, l. 3. c. 1. ^h Paradox. 6. ⁱ To the same place. ^j L. 6. ^k Lib. 3. t. 2. l. 2. f. 1. D. de his qui not. infam. &c. ^l To this belongs that of Florus, l. 1. c. 11. n. 10. Edit. Grav. The Spoils of Antium are in being, which Mænius fix'd in the Forum, having taken the Enemy's Fleet, if it may be call'd a Fleet. For there were six Ships with Stems, and that Number then was enough to enter into an Engagement with. Add. Alber. Gent. de jure belli, l. 3. c. 20. ^m Add. Alber. Gent. d. l. c. 21.

defined by different Persons, to avoid Quarrels, it will be convenient to express in common Words in what Signification the Word under Debate shall be taken.

V. When a single Word or Sentence is capable of several Significations, Conjectures are necessary to find out the true. Both of these Cases the Rhetoricians call ambiguous. But the Logicians are more nice, who, if the Variety of Significations lies in a Word, call it equivocal, if in a Sentence, ambiguous. An Example of the former we meet with in Tertullian ^a, who tells us that the Word Roman in 1 Cor. xi. 5, &c. ought to be extended to Virgins also. Altho' sometimes it is oppos'd to Virgin, as in Cicero ^b, To Morrow she will be a Woman. ^c Cicero gives this Example of the latter: A certain Man had bequeath'd a Legacy in these Words; Heres meus uxorum argenteorum pondo centum novem, &c. quæ volent, dato. Let my Heir give his Mother in Law 100 Weight of Plate at Pleasure. Upon this the Lady demanded the finest and best wrought Plate: But the Heir interpos'd that the Choice was left to his Pleasure. The Ambiguity had been avoided by the Addition of the Word His or Her. The Roman Law in such a Case ^d gives the Legatee the Option, and indeed there is Reason for it. For had the Option been design'd to be left at the Discretion of the Heir, there had been no need of the Clause at Pleasure. For if a Thing is enjoin'd me at large ^e, and I have several Ways of satisfying the Obligation, 'tis left to my self to choose which way to do it. But when a Clause is added concerning the Choice, 'tis designed in Favour of the Party which is to receive, that the other may not obtrude some pitiful, worthless Thing upon him ^f.

As for the famous Decision of the Duke of Osuna, Viceroy of Naples, who decreed the whole Inheritance to the Son against the Priests, who were left Heirs, with a Clause, To give the Son what they would strictness of Justice does not plead in Behalf of it, so much as the odious Covetousness of that sort of People; which are always hankering after other Mens Estates.

Another Instance we have in the Answer Charles V. gave the French Ambassador, when he demanded the Dukedom of Milan; That which pleases my Brother the French King, pleases me also. Which the Ambassador in great haste gave his Master Advice of, as if he had gain'd his Point ^d.

VI. Besides, when we meet with a seeming Repugnancy in the Terms, Conjectures are necessary to work out the genuine Sense, by reconciling, if possible, those Terms that seem to be repugnant. But if there be a clear evident Repugnancy ^e, the latter Contract vacates the former: For no Man can will Contradictions, and it is the Nature of Acts, which depend upon the free Will of the Agent, or over which no Man has acquir'd a Right, to be disclaim'd by a contrary Motion of the Will. And this Change of the Will, in order to annul an Act, is sometimes required on one side only, as in making Laws, Wills, and Testaments, &c. and sometimes on both sides, as in Contracts, which, unless the Law interposes, can't be dissolv'd without the Consent of both Parties ^f. From hence, by the way, it appears how Lycortas might have excus'd his Neglect, in not mentioning, when he went to renew the League between the Achæans and the King of Egypt, which, of the many Leagues that were between them, he would have renew'd: for he might have said, that those which were never broken needed not to be renewed, and in the renewing of those which had been broken, he ought to be presum'd to mean the last ^f.

For an Instance of two Laws, that seem to thwart one another ^g, One enacts, That a Statue be erected in the Gymnasium in Honour of the Person that kills the Tyrant: Another says, That no Woman's Statue shall be plac'd in the Gymnasium: Now a Woman kills the Tyrant. In this Case I should judge in Favour of the Woman. For the Reason of the first Law was,

MR. BARB. NOTES on § V.

^a CICERO'S Words are, *Paterfamilias, cum Filium hæredem faceret, uxorum argenteorum centum pondo Uxori suæ sic legavit: Hæres meus uxori meæ uxorum argenteorum pondo centum, quæ volent, dato. Post mortem ejus causa vacans. Et pretiosè clarata petit à Filio Mater. Ille se, quæ ipse vellet, debere dicit. Cic. de inventione, Lib. 2. Chap. 40. See ad Herennium, Lib. 1. Chap. 12. and Quintil. Lib. 7. Cap. 9.*

^b The Words of the Law are, Quotiens servi electio vel optio datur, Legatarius optabit, quem vellet. Sed & homine generaliter legato, arbitrium eligendi, quem acciperet, ad Legatarium pertinet. Digest. Lib. 33. tit. 5. De optione vel electione legata. Leg. 2. prim. § 1.

^c 'Tis a Maxim of the Roman Law, Cum illa aut illa res promittitur, rei Electio est, utram præset. Digest. Lib. 23. tit. 3. De jure dotium, Leg. 10. § 6. See also Leg. 18. tit. 1. De contrahenda emptione, Leg. 25. princ. and Lib. 17. tit. 1. De action. Empti & Venditi, Leg. 21. § 6. Indeed it belongs to him only who lays the Obligation, to explain himself clearly and without Equivocation or Reserve, as to what he requires of another. Quidquid adstringendæ obligacionis est, id nisi potest verbis exprimitur, omisso intelligendum est. Ac fere secundum promissorem interpretatur: quia stipulatore locum fuit verbis tantè concipere. Digest. Lib. 45. tit. 1. De verborum obligationum, Leg. 99. And we may lay this down as a general Rule. That when there is in a Deed any Obscurity or Doubtfulness, which can't be cleared by the Intention of the Contractors, or any other Circumstance, the Interpretation ought to be against him, who ought to have explained himself, or made the other have delivered himself fully. Inasmuch that he who is obliged, might and ought to speak clearly, the other hath a Right to explain the Clause for his own Advantage. Nec rursus promissor ferendus est, si ejus intererit, de certis potius casus forte, aut benevols actum. Digest. ibid. So that all Obscurities and Ambiguities in a Bargain of Sale, or Living, must be interpreted against the Seller or Landlord. Veteribus placet, passionem obscuram, vel ambiguam venditori, & qui locavit nocere: in quorum fuit potestas. Legem oportius considerari. Digest. Lib. 2. tit. 14. De pactis, Leg. 39. See also Lib. 18. tit. 1. Leg. 21, 33. Lib. 50. tit. 17. De diversis regulis Juris, Leg. 172.

MR. BARB. NOTES on § VI.

^a Ubi duæ contrariæ leges sunt, semper antiquæ obrogat Nova. Tit. Liv. Lib. 9. Chap. 34. Where two Laws thwart one another the new one abrogates the old. At πρῶτον πρὸς ἀρχαίας ἐκείνην ἢ πρὸς ἀρχαίῳ νόμῳ. Digest. Lib. 1. tit. 4. De constitutionibus Principum, Leg. 4. See also the Canon Law in the Decretals, Lib. 1. tit. 3. De Rescriptis, Chap. 3. and a Passage in Plutarch, which will be quoted Note 6. on § 9.

^b See the foregoing Chapter, § 8.

^c Tyrannicidæ imago in gymnasio ponatur: contra Mulieris imago in gymnasio ne ponatur. Mulier Tyrannum occidit. Quint. Inllit. Orat. Lib. 7. Chap. 7.

^d De velandis Virginibus, c. 4. ^e Apud Quintil. Inllit. Orat. l. 6. c. 3.

^f Ad. Auth. ad Horn. l. 1. c. 12. Quint.

^g File Polyb. excerpt. leg. 41.

that

that the Youth which is train'd up to Valour in the Gymnasium, should by such sort of Honour be stir'd up to imitate brave Actions: The Reason of the latter is, because the Virtues proper to Women are not generally the Object of Mens Imitation. But, in this Case, since a Woman has outdone her Sex, she deserves the rather to have her Statue put up in the Gymnasium; for such Bravery in a Woman would be a greater Incitement to Emulation in the Men. There is another Example in ⁴ Cicero de Invent. Lib. ii. Cap. 49. One Law says, Whosoever kills the Tyrant let him be rewarded as a Conqueror at the Olympick Games, and let him demand what he pleases of the Magistrate, and let the Magistrate grant his Request. Another Law runs thus: Upon the Death of the Tyrant, let his five nearest Relations be put to Death. Alexander, who had exercised Tyranny over the Phereans in Thessaly, being kil'd by his Wife Thebe, She, for her Reward, demands her Son, whom she had by the Tyrant. Some were of Opinion, that by the Law the Son ought to be put to Death ⁵.

But sometimes the same Law seems to clash with itself; ⁶ as for Instance, the Law says, That a Woman, who has been debauch'd, may choose either to marry the Man who has injur'd her, or to have him put to Death. Here is a Man that has debauch'd Two, whereof one chooses his Death, the other demands him in Marriage: In this Case, the Reason of the Law will decide the Business: For here the Law, by permitting the Woman to choose the Death of the Man, did not suppose that many would desire it; but the Good of the poor Woman was herein consulted, lest she should for ever continue without a Husband; for the Man, after the Heat of his Love was over, might cast her off, as not likely to deny others those Favours which she had so unlawfully granted him: nor would it be easy to find one who would willingly marry her that had been deflowered by another. And therefore she that demanded the Man in Marriage ought to be preferr'd: For this answers best the Design of the Law, which had the Convenience of the Woman, rather than the Death of the Man in its Eye; and after this rate, one of them, at least, will be provided with a Husband, whereas otherwise both will be forced to remain single. Besides, when there is as much to be said on the one Side as on the other, the more favourable Sentence ought to prevail.

But sometime the Words clash in some particular Case, as in this Instance; there is a Law, ⁷ That a Man, who has behaved himself honourably in the War, shall have whatever he demands; here are Two such, who both demand the same Virgin; since both cannot be satisfied, which must be preferr'd? I answer, He that made the Demand first. But if both demanded together, they must draw Lots; for tho' the Law gives an unlimited Liberty of demanding, yet it must be supposed to be restrain'd to those Things which can conveniently be granted. Another Example is propos'd by ⁸ Philstratus in the Life of Secundus. He that raises a Sedition, is to be hang'd; he that quells it, to be rewarded: The same Man both raises a Sedition, and quells it, and demands his Reward. In which Case Secundus with good Reason argues thus, Provided you first suffer Punishment for raising the Sedition, you shall then, if you please, receive the Reward for quelling it. In such Cases as these, where Words are ⁹ evidently obscure, we are forc'd to have recourse to Conjectures.

These Conjectures are sometimes built upon such good Grounds, as that the genuine Sense forces itself upon us, even against the receiv'd common Signification of the Word. To this purpose is that Distinction of the Rhetoricians between the Letter and the Design. As for Instance, ¹⁰ The Law makes it capital for any Foreigner to presume to mount the Walls: 11 But in a Siege a Foreigner mounted the Wall, and beat down the Enemy that was ready to scale it. Now the Letter is against the Foreigner, the Design for him; according to which no doubt Judgment ought to be given; for the Design of the Law was to prevent any Foreign-

⁴ TULLY'S Words are, Ex contrariis autem Legibus controversia nascitur, cum inter se duæ videntur Leges, aut plures discrepare, hoc modo: Lex est, Qui Tyrannum occiderit, Olympicarum præmium capito, & quam volet sibi rem à Magistratu deposcito, & Magistratus ei concedit. Et altera Lex, Tyranno occiso, quinque ejus proximos cognatione Magistratus necato. Alexandrum, qui apud Phereas in Thessalia tyrannidem occuparat, Uxor sua, cui Thebe nomen fuit, noctu, cum simul cubaret, occidit. Hæc filium suum, quem ex Tyranno habebat, ubi præmii loco deposcit. Sunt qui ex Lege Puerum occidi dicant oportere. Res in judicio est. De Invent. Lib. 2. Cap. 49.

⁵ They had done wrong, for besides that the first Law was manifestly barbarous and unjust, the End was, without doubt, to destroy all that had any Relation to the Tyrant, as Men to be feared, or whom he might have for his Associates; for there is all the appearance imaginable, that the Mother who had so much Courage and Zeal for the Publick Good, as to stain her Hands with the Blood of her Husband, would have had no regard to her Son's Life, if she thought him to be of the same Temper as his Father.

⁶ This is the Subject of SENECA'S Fifth Controversy: Lex: Rapta raptoris, aut mortem, aut indotatas nuptias optet. Una nocte quidam duas rapuit: altera mortem optat, altera nuptias. Most of the Declainers, whose Fragments SENECA relates, would condemn the Ravisher to Death.

⁷ I do not know from whence this Example is taken; the Law indeed is found in SENECA, Controvers. 31. and in the Excerpt. Controversj. Lib. 10. Declam. 2. As also in AULUS GELLIUS, Noct. Attic. Lib. 9. Chap. 16. but the rest of the Case is altogether different.

⁸ PHILOSTRATUS'S Words are, Ὁ ἀρξίας γάλας, ἀποθνήσκω, ἢ ὁ πάσαις γάλας, ἢ ἰχθυὸν δωρεάν. ὁ αὐτὸς ἢ ἀρξίας ἢ πάσαις, δειπῶ τὸν δωρεάν. πῶν δὲ ὑπόθω, ἡδὲ ἰσραχολόγησον. ἀκύν, ἔρη, πὶ ἀρξίπρον; τὸ κινῆσαι γάλας. πὶ δειπῶν; τὸ πάσαις. ὅτις τὸν ἢ ὅτι ἡσίαι; πμωρίαι, τὸν ἰφ' αἰς τὸ πτωτικῶς δωρεάν, εἰ δύναιται, λάβε. Philostrat. de Vitis Sophistarum, in Secundo, Lib. 1. Cap. 26. Ed. Olear. 1709.

⁹ In the Examples of apparent Contradictions brought by our Author, the Terms are not obscure; but, on the contrary, very clear. But the Intricacy proceeds from this, That they conclude not in themselves the Exceptions which the Lawgiver would have made to the Law, if he had foreseen certain Cases which are drawn from some other Thing, than the Words taken literally, and in their full extent.

¹⁰ Περί ἡρώ, ἢ θανάτου; which the Latins render, Ex Scripto & sententia scripti: or, as QUINTILIAN, Lib. 7. Cap. 6. and the Author of the Rhetorick, dedicated to Herennius, Lib. 1. Chap. 11. Ex Scripto & voluntate statum.

¹¹ QUINTILIAN'S Words are, Peregrinus, si murum ascendit, capite puniatur. Cum hostes murum ascendissent, peregrinus eos depulit. Petitur ad supplicium. Quintil. Lib. 7. Cap. 6.

ner from mounting the Walls as a Spy; which Reason in the present Case ceases ^a.

But we must take notice that sometimes a Repugnancy is suppos'd, when indeed there is none, viz. when Words are taken in a larger Signification than the Speaker design'd them. A notable Instance of this we meet with in Josephus ^b; where King Zedechias would believe neither Jeremiah nor Ezekiel, because he thought they contradicted one another: for the one asserted that he should be carried away into Babylon; the other, " that he should never see Babylon with his Eyes. The two Prophets were very consistent with each other; for he was carried away to Babylon, but his Eyes were first put out.

VII. Grotius has assign'd three common places, from whence we may trace out the Design, where the Words are obscure or ambiguous, viz. The Subject matter, the Effects, and the Circumstances.

As for the former ¹ 'tis in the Mouth of every Civilian, That Words ought to be understood according to the Subject matter of them ^c; as ² if a Man promises to defend you in the Possession of the Goods you buy of him, his promise is not suppos'd to extend to any extrajudicial Violence ^d. I fancy this Rule may be applied to the Vow of Jephtha in Judges XI. 31. and to that of Agamemnon in Cicero ^e who having vow'd to offer up to Diana the most beautiful Creature that should be born that Year, sacrific'd Iphigenia, who indeed was the most beautiful which that Year produc'd: But he who talks of sacrificing is presum'd to mean a Subject fit to be made a Sacrifice of ^f.

So if a Truce be made for Thirty Days, it must be understood of natural Days consisting of Twenty four Hours: not of artificial, or the space of the Sun above the Horizon. And therefore it was a frivolous Quibble of Cleomenes, who had made a Truce with the Argives for so many Days, but the third Night finding them sleeping and unprovided by reason of the Truce, set upon them, and slew some, and took others; and when he was upbraided for his Perjury, denied that the Nights were comprehended in the Treaty ^g. In vain also did Mycerinus King of Egypt endeavour to convict the Oracle of Falshood; for the Oracle foretold that he should live no more than six Years: but he order'd Candles to be lighted up, and revell'd by Night as well as Day, as if by thus using the Night as Day he could make Twelve Years out of Six ^h.

Thus the Word Arms denotes sometimes the Weapons of War, sometimes the Warriors themselves, according as the Subject matter of the Discourse directs. For if it be an Article, that neither Party shall use Arms against a Third, 'tis plain Soldiers or an Army is meant by it: but if upon the Surrendry of a Garrison it be stipulated that they deliver up their Arms, not the Soldiers, but the Weapons are suppos'd by it ⁱ.

The Platæenses having promis'd to restore the Theban Captives, ought to have restor'd them alive, not dead ^k. For the Treaty was concerning ^l living Men, and not the Carcasses of them.

It was a wretched Fetch of Labeo's, who having by the League a Title to half of Antiochus's Fleet, cut every Ship in two, and so depriv'd the King of his whole Navy ¹. Thus the m Campanians struck up a League with their Enemies, and one Article was, that they should have half their Arms restor'd them; but they cut each Weapon in two, and so deliver'd them half.

Xiphilinus ⁿ tells us of two Soldiers, who having got a Hoghead of Wine amongst their Plunder, and being commanded to divide it, cut it in Two with their Swords. Rhadamistus swore to Mitbridates, that he would not either by Sword or Poison do him any Harm; but presently after he smother'd him in his Bed ^o.

VIII. Secondly, The Effects and the Consequence do very often point out the genuine meaning of the Words. For where Words, if they be taken literally, are like to bear none, or at least, a very absurd Signification; to avoid such an Inconvenience ¹ we must a little deviate from the receiv'd Sense of them ^p. And therefore it was absurd in the Athenians ^q, having promis'd to relinquish the Territories of the Bœotians to deny the Ground that they had encamp'd upon to be the Bœotians. With the same Cavil did Alexander elude the Conditions that Darius propos'd to him. Darius had offer'd him all the Land that ¹² See Jeremiah xxxviii. 17. &c. and Ezekiel xii. 13.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § VII.

¹ The Words of the Digests are, Quotiens in Stipulationibus ambigua Oratio est, commodissimum est, id accipi, quo res, qua se agitur, in tuto sit. Digest. Lib. 45. tit. 1. De verborum obligationibus, Leg. 80. See also Lib. 50. tit. 17. De diversis Reg. Jur. Leg. 67.

² So the Code assures us, Expulsos vos de fundo per violentiam à Nerone, quem habere jus in eo negatis, profitentes, nullam vobis adversus eum, ex cuius conditione fundum possidetis, actionem competere probatis, Cod. Lib. 4. tit. 49. De actionibus empti & venditi. Leg. 17. See other Examples, Lib. 19. tit. 2. Locati, conducti, Leg. 15. § 4. and Lib. 39. tit. 2. De damno infecto, &c. Leg. 49.

³ So Ovid speaks in the Passage quoted by our Author, but not mentioned from whom; Hæstor erat tunc cum bello certaret, at idem Tractus ab Æmonio non erat Hæstor equo, Ovid. de Trist. Lib. 3. El. 11. v. 27, 28. Sic Pericles cum quibusdam hostibus ita pactus legitur, ut ipsi ferrum deponerent; postea eisdem pacti violati insinulavit, argutatus eos non deposuisse fibulas terreas quas in laciniis vestimentorum gerebant. Lex est, qui nocte cum ferro deprehensus fuerit, alligetur: cum annulo ferreo inventum magistratus alligavit, Quint. Inst. Orat. Lib. 7. Cap. 6.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § VIII.

¹ Thus the Roman Lawyers say, In ambigua voce Legis ea potius accipienda est significatio, quæ vitio caret: præsertim cum etiam voluntas Legis ex hoc colligi possit. Digest. Lib. 1. tit. 3. De Legibus, & Senatufconsultis, &c. Leg. 19. Cicero says again very well, Nullam esse Legem, quæ aliquam rem inutilem, aut iniquam fieri velit, De Invent. Lib. 2. Cap. 47.

^a Add. l. 39. t. 4. l. 15. D. de Publicanis, &c.

^b Archæol. Jud. l. 10. c. 10.

^c Vid. lib. 45. t. 1. l. 10. D.

^d L. 19. t. 2. l. 15. f. 4. D. locati, & l. 39. t. 2. l. 43. D. damni infecti, &c. L. 4. t. 49. c. l. 17. de act. empt. & vend.

^e Off. 3. c. 25.

^f Add. Everhard. loc. legal. 40. which is about the Subject-matter.

^g Plut. Apopht. Læon. p. 223.

Such another Trick the Thracians used against the Bœotians, Strab. l. 9. p. 277.

^h Herodotus, Euterpe.

ⁱ Id.

^k Thucyd. l. 2. init.

^l Val. Max. l. 7. c. 3. tho' Livy, l. 38. c. 38. says nothing of the cutting of the Ships.

^m Polyæn. l. 6. c. 15.

ⁿ Epist. Dion. in Caracalla, ad ann. 217.

^o Tac. Ann.

^p There is an Example of this in the League whereby Lewis XII. of France, took the City Bologna, and its petty Prince Bentivoglio, into his Protection; which he afterwards cavilled at, in a manner very unbecoming a King. Guiccard. Hist. l. 5. p. m. 134. & p. m. 146.

^q Thucyd. l. 4. c. 98.

lay between the Euphrates and the Hellespont; to which Alexander reply'd, He offers very liberally all on that side the Euphrates, where is it then that he speaks to me? I am already beyond the Euphrates; and therefore the whole of the Dowry he offers is less than what I am already Master of: drive me hence, that I may be assur'd that what you offer is your own ^a. As if it was the same thing to possess a Place by Force of Arms, and to possess it peaceably, and with the Concession of the former Master.

Lewis XII. agreed with the Pope's Legat, that the Bishopricks void by the Death of the Bishops in France should be at the King's Disposal. But a French Bishop happening to die at Rome, the Pope immediately nominated a Successor, and the King as soon another; which occasioned great Differences. In this Case, were I Judge, I should not scruple to pronounce in favour of the King; for to render an Office vacant, 'tis no matter in what Place the Incumbent dies: and if such a Cavil had been admitted, the King's Right might have been invaded several ways ^b.

At Bologna it was enacted, that Whoever drew Blood in the Streets should be severely punished ^c. Upon which Law a Barber was indicted for opening a Vein in the Street, and it had like to have gone hard with him, because it was added in the Statute, that the Words should be taken precisely, without any Interpretation. ² In Quintilian we have this Case, A poor Man and a rich Man were Friends: The rich Man in his Will made another Friend his Heir, but bequeath'd to the poor Man as much as he in his Will had bequeath'd to him. The poor Man's Will is produc'd;

by which it appears, that he had made the rich Man Heir of all; and therefore he demands the whole Inheritance. He that was the written Heir was for giving only so much as the poor Man was worth ^d. And indeed, this is to be said for the written Heir, that if he did not obtain the Cause, his being made Heir would have had no Effect. Which was the chief Reason why the Falcidian ³ Law, and ⁴ Pegasian Decree assign'd the Heir a ⁵ Dodrans over and above; for so the Heir and Legatee were both provided for. As for the Interpretation of the Laws of the Land, that of Cicero ⁶ must every where take place: All Laws, says he, ought to be referr'd to the Benefit of the Commonwealth, and ought to be interpreted according to the publick Advantage, not according to the Letter; for no one would have the Laws regarded for the sake of the Laws themselves, but for the sake of the Commonwealth.

IX. Besides, Thirdly, it gives great Light to the Interpretation of obscure Passages to compare them with others that have some Affinity with them; as to consider what the same Author says ¹ in another Place, where he handles the same Matter; or to ² compare them with what goes before and follows in the Context. For in a doubtful Point the Author must be suppos'd to be consonant to himself: And therefore, if ³ in one Place he has express'd his Mind clearly, we ought to presume, that he is still of the same Mind in another Place, unless it expressly appears that he has chang'd it. Thus if two Men should bargain for Wheat, without mentioning the Quantity, it would be ⁴ an imperfect Bargain: But

² QUINTILIAN'S Words are, Pauper, & dives, amici erant. Dives testamento aliam amicam omnium bonorum instituit heredem: pauperi iussit dari id quod ille sibi testamento daret. Aperta sunt tabule pauperis: omnium bonorum instituerat heredem. Petit totam divitis hereditatem. Ille, qui scriptus est heres, vult dare tantum, quantum in censum habet pauper. Declam. 332.

³ See Lib. 3. Chap. 4. § 5. Note 1. above.

⁴ In the Time of Nero, in the Consulship of Trebellius Maximus, a Decree of the Senate was made, That an Heir in Trust, who was obliged to resign to the Lawful Heir, should be discharged of all the Debts and Disbursements, which, as well as the Rights, Names, and Actions, should pass with the Goods to him, for whose advantage the Trust was made. But since the Heirs thus put in Trust, had little or no Advantage by the Inheritance, which they were to make over; and so scarce any one cared to trouble themselves with a Trust, it was ordered by another Decree of the Senate, in the Time of Vespasian, in the Consulship of Pegasus, That he that was obliged to resign to the Heir, or another Party, should keep a fourth Part. The Emperor Justinian united these two Decrees afterward, and called them by the Name of their Author, the first, The Trebellian Decree, and the other, The Pegasian. The more ancient Name, which was the Trebellian, remained only, and from thence it was called, The Trebellianick Quarter, or singly, The Trebellianick, viz. the fourth Part of the Inheritance which was to remain to the Heir who was to resign. See the Institut. lib. 2. tit. 23. De fidei commissariis hereditatibus, &c. and the Digests, Lib. 36. tit. 1. Ad Senat. consultum Trebellianum; as also Mr. DAUMAT'S civil Law in their Nat. Order, Part 2. L. 5. tit. 4.

⁵ In all the Editions of the Original our Author has it, quartam partem. Yet we ought to observe, that in the Roman Law the Trebellianick fourth Part is called the Falcidian, because the Trebellianick is much the same as to the Heir who is to resign, as the Falcidian is, as to the true and real Heir. See Digests, Lib. 28. tit. 6. De vulgari & pupillari substitutione, Leg. 41. § 3.

⁶ CICERO'S Words are, Omnes Leges, Judices, ad commodum Reipublicæ referre oportet, & eas ex utilitate communi, non ex scriptis, quæ in literis sunt, interpretari. ----- Neque enim ipsi [qui Leges scripserunt] quod obisset, scribere volebant, & si scripsissent, cum esset intellectum, repulsum iri legem intelligebant. Nemo enim Leges Legum causa jalvas esse vult, sed Reipublicæ, quod ex legibus omnes Reipublicam optimè putant administrari. De Invent. Lib. 2. Cap. 38.

Mr. BARR. NOTES on § IX.

¹ It is a judicious Maxim in the Roman Law, That every part of a Law ought to be interpreted by the Tenor of the whole Law: Indivisibile est, nisi tota Lex perpensa, una aliqua particula legis proposita, judicare, vel respondere. Digests, Lib. 1. tit. 3. De Legibus, &c. Leg. 24. See also about Compacts, Lib. 45. tit. 1. De verborum Obligat. Leg. 134. § 1.

² The same Lawyers observe also, That we must explain one Law by another, the Ancient by the New; and on the other side, the New by the Old, unless the last have manifestly abrogated something preceeding. Non est necum, ut priores Leges ad posteriores trabantur. ----- Sed & posteriores Leges ad priores pertinent, nisi contrariæ sint: ilque multis argumentis probatur. Digests, Lib. 1. tit. 3. De legibus, &c. Leg. 26. and 28. Further, Mr. HERTIUS makes a pleasant Mistake. As the Author says, Cum illis Locis ubi idem de simili agit materia; he quotes thereupon with a for, a Law, which imports, that when the Intention of the Contractor fully appears not, they must follow the Custom of the Country where they treat: Aut, si non appareat quid actum est, erit consequens, ut id sequamur, quod in regione, in qua actum est, frequentatur. Digests, Lib. 51. ut. 17. De Reg. Jur. Leg. 34.

³ CICERO observes well, That to discover the sense of a Writing, we must examine the Works of the same Author, his Actions, Words, Opinions, and Conversation: Qua in Sententia Scriptor fuerit, ex cæteris ejus scriptis, factis, dictis, animo atque vita ipsa fieri oportebit. De Invent. Lib. 2. Cap. 40.

⁴ The Words of the Digests are, Imperfecta erit stipulatio. ----- Si quod pondere, numero, mensura continetur, sine adjensione ponderis, numeri, mensuræ stipulatus effem. Digests, Lib. 45. tit. 1. De verborum obligat. Leg. 115. princip.

^a Q. Curtius, l. 4. c. 11.

^b F. Marsel, Legat. l. 1. c. 38.

^c Everhard, loc. legal. 8. ab absurd.

^d Declam. 332.

i f by their former Dealings it appear'd, that such a Sort and such a Quantity was thought of and design'd, it is as good as if it had been actually express'd a. This may be illustrated from Homer b in the Duel between Menelaus and Paris. They had agreed, that the Conqueror should enjoy Helen; Paris being worsted, provided for himself by Flight, and Agamemnon proclaim'd Menelaus Conqueror, and that therefore Helen, according to Articles, ought to be his. And the Poet makes Jupiter of the same Opinion, who declares himself c, Ἄλλ' ἤπει νίκη μὲν ἀξιοζήλας Μενελάε.

Brave Menelaus gains the Victory.

Besides, he that imposes the Conditions must be the best Interpreter of them; for he on whom they are imposed, has no Power of adding to them. But the Conditions (as Hector express'd them) had no relation to Slaughter or Death, but to Victory only; for Helen was not to be adjudged to him that prov'd the better Man, but the Conqueror, and not he that slays the other is such; for a Brave Man may fall by the Hands of a Coward. On the other side it might be argued, that in Decrees, Laws, Leagues, and Pacts, a latter Condition takes place 6 of a former: and that the last Condition that Agamemnon had added, was κατὰ πέρην, expressing the Death of the Conquer'd d, and so Priamus seems to have understood, in saying,

Jove and the Gods eternal only know, Which of the Two is doom'd to Shades below e.

Besides, the former Condition is included in the latter, for he that kills, conquers, but not vice versa. And therefore the Condition which Hector propos'd, Agamemnon did not annul, but explain'd f; did not change, but added to it that which was of the greatest Moment, that the Victory should consist in the Death of the Adversary; for that is undoubtedly Victory, whereas the other may bear a Dispute: As therefore where Laws are really repugnant, the Judges embrace that which is evidently clear, in preference to that which is obscure; so we look upon that Pact to be better and more valid, which is decisive of the Controversy, and liable to no Exception 7 g.

X. But that which helps us most in the Discovery of the true meaning of the Law, is the Reason of it, or the Cause which moved the Legillator to enact it 1. This ought not to be confounded with the Mind of the Law; for that is nothing but the genuine Meaning of it; for the finding out of which, we call in the Reason of it to our Assistance. And this is of the greatest force, when it evidently appears that some one Reason was the only Motive that the Parties went upon, which is no less frequent in Laws than in Pacts. And here that common Saying takes place, that The Reason ceasing, the Law itself ceases. But if several Reasons concur together, and only one ceases, the others do not immediately expire, or become less able to support the Efficacy of the Law. Nay, sometimes the general Reason of the Thing seems to draw one way, and the absolute Will of the Legislator another; and in such a Case 2 the Will of the Legislator must be deem'd by the Subjects a Reason, which if it be but clearly signified, altho' not altogether so congruous to the Laws of Prudence, yet suffices to create an Obligation. From these Premises may be rightly infer'd, that a Present made 3 in Prospect of Marriage may be revoked and demanded back, if the Marriage does not succeed; especially if it sticks on that Side to whom the Present was made. Tho' generally in such Presents as pass among the Living, the Reason of them 4 has not the force of a Condition (unless it be expressly mention'd) so as to make the Fact null, where that does not appear. And therefore the Olynthii were not unjust in refusing to restore the Land which Amyntas King of Macedon had given them, when, being defeated by the Illyrians, he had had lost all Hopes of defending his Kingdom b.

Yet in some Cases, the Law itself may sustain the Place of a Condition i. And therefore Cicero k, to the 5 Interdict which l, amongst others, had these Words in it, 6 From whence you, or your Family, or your Agent, &c. rightly argues:

5 And again, Triticum dare oportere stipulatus est aliquis. Facti questio est, non juris. Igitur si de aliquo tritico cogitaveris, id est, certi generis, certæ quantitatis: id habebitur pro expresso. Ibid. Leg. 94.

6 PLUTARCH'S Words are, Ἐν τῷ δόγματι καὶ νόμῳ, ἐν τῷ συνθηκῆς καὶ ὁμολογίας, κατέστιται τὰ ὕστερα κηρύσσων, καὶ βιβαιοτέρῃ καὶ σιμύτῳ. Plut. p. 742. D. Ed. Wech.

7 PLUTARCH'S Words are, Ὡσαύτῃ δὲ ἐν τοῖς ἀλλοθινοῖς ἀντινομίαις εἰ διακασθῆ τῷ μὲν ἀμειστοτήσῃσι ἔχοντι παρσιδύλαι, τῷ ἀσπιστῶν ἐλάσει: εἰς τὴν ἐλάσει τὴν ἀσπιστῶν καὶ γινόμενον πᾶσι ἀγροῦν ὁμολογίας, βιβαιοτέρῃ καὶ κατέστιται κηρύσσων. Ibid. pag. 743. A.

MR. BARB. NOTES on § X.

1 See what will be said, § 19. Note 5. about the Cases where the Law ought to be restrained, because the Reason, which effectually determined the Lawgiver, or Contractors, takes not place.

2 See how the Author explains this in his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen. Often, tho' we see not the Reason of a Law, the Will of the Lawgiver is sufficient to impose, on them that depend on him, an Obligation to conform to it. L. 1. Chap. 17. § 8. See also Mr. THOMASIU'S Jurisprud. Divin. Lib. 3. Chap. 12. § 151.

3 See above in Book IV. Chap. 9. § 4. Note 6.

4 So the Digests order, Et generaliter hoc in donationibus deserviendum est: multum interesse, causa donandi fuit, an conditio. Si causa fuit, cessare repetitionem. Si conditio, repetitioni locum fore. Digest. Lib. 39. tit. 5. De Donation. Leg. 3.

5 This is what is called Interdictum. See the Institutes, L. 4. c. 15. and FRANCIS HOTOMAN upon CICERO'S Oration for Cæcina, Chap. 4. There are several sorts of it, and this of which he treats is called, Interdictum unde vi.

6 CICERO'S Words are, UNDE TU, AUT FAMILIA, AUT PROCURATOR TUUS, Cicero pro Cæcina, Cap. 19.

a De verb. oblig. l. 94. D. conf. Ziegl. ad Grot. d. l. f. 7. b Iliad. Γ. ε. Δ. c Iliad. Δ. ε. 13. d Homer. Il. 3. v. 281. e Homer. Il. 3. v. 309. f Ibid. v. 91, 92. g Plut. Symp. l. 9. qu. 13. p. 743. A. h V. Diod. Sic. l. 15. c. 9. i Vid. Cod. l. 8. tit. 56. de revo. donat. k Orat. pro A. Cæcina 19. l V. Instit. l. 4. c. 15. § D. L. 43. t. 16. De vi & de vi armata, l. 1. princip.

altho' one Servant be not a Family, yet if that one Servant dispossession me, 'tis plain I ought to be restored from the Reason of the Edict^a. Nor is there any Difference whether my Agent, or any body else in my Name, dispossession another: He adds, the Reason is the same in this Case, whether your Agent (as the Word signifies one that manageth all your Concerns in your Absence with full Power, as your Attorney or Substitute) or your Neighbour, or Client, or Freed-man, or any other disturb me upon your Account and Intreaty^b.

Another Instance of a Case which may be decided from the Reason of the Law^c, The Law is, that those, who in a Storm forsake the Ship, shall lose all; and the Ship and the Lading shall be theirs that stay in it. But in a very dismal Tempest all forsake the Ship, except one sick Man, who is not able to get out and escape; the Ship by chance comes safe to Port; the sick Man seizes it as his; the Owner puts in his Plea against him. Now the Reason of the Law was, that those who had expos'd their Lives to save the Ship, should have some Encouragement; but this the sick Man can't pretend to, who neither stay'd in the Ship upon that Account, neither contributed any thing to the saving of it.

XI. Besides, the same Word admits of sometimes a more loose, sometimes a more strict Interpretation, which may happen upon several Accounts. Sometimes the Name of the Genus is peculiarly apply'd to one of the Species; as in the Words *Adoption*¹ and *Cognation*². In the Names of Animals, where the Word is not of the common Gender³, the Masculine includes the Feminine, and vice versa. Sometimes Art gives a Term a larger Signification than common Use: As Death in the Roman Law is extended even⁴ to Banishment, which in popular Use signifies only the Separation of the Soul from the Body. Hither may be refer'd the Ambiguity in the Words, mine, thine, yours, &c. which Martial^d plays with;

Carmina Paulus emit, recitat sua carmina Paulus: Nam quod emit, possis dicere jure tuum.

You Verses buy, your Verses you recite:
For what you buy, that justly is your Right.

XII. Moreover, in Promises and Pacts, as also in Privileges, some Things are favourable, some odious, and others of a middle or mixt Nature.

Those are favourable which carry an Equality along with them, or which equally oblige each Party, and which tend to promote the common Advantage; and the greater and the more extensive the Advantage is, the better Title have they to Favour. Those also are favourable which make for the Preservation of Societies, and without which some Act would be to no End or Purpose. Besides, to avoid an Inconvenience is more favourable than to gain a Convenience¹, and greater Favour is allow'd to that which makes for Peace, than that which makes for War; and a defensive War is still more favourable than an offensive.

On the other side, those are odious, which lay the Burden on one Party only, or on one more than the other; that also which carries a Punishment along with it; or makes any Act of no Effect; or changes any thing in former Constitutions; and such as tend to the Destruction of Friendship and Society.

Those that are of a mixt Nature (as suppose former Constitutions are changed, yet for the sake of Peace) according to the Greatness of the Good, or the Change, are sometimes odious, sometimes

⁷ CICERO'S Words are, Si me Villicus tuus solus dejecisset, non familia dejecisset, ut opinor, sed aliquis de familia. Restituitur diceres te restituisse? ----- Non enim alia causa est æquitatis in uno servo, & in pluribus: non alia ratio juris in hoc genere dumtaxat, utram me tuus procurator dejecerit, is qui legitime procurator dicitur omnium rerum ejus, qui in Italia non sit, absente Reipublicæ causâ, quasi quidam pene dominus, hoc est, alieni juris vicarius.

⁸ Indeed, as the Law to which the Author here refers us, imports, all Cases can't be expressed in Laws, they ought to be applied to Cases perfectly alike, and where the same Reason takes place evidently. Non possunt omnes articuli singillatim aut Legibus aut Senatûs-consultis comprehendî: sed cum in aliqua causa sententia eorum manifesta est, is, qui jurisdictioni præest, ad similia procedere, atque ita jus dicere debet. Digest. Lib. 1. tit. 3.—De Legibus, Leg. 12, 13. See also Leg. 27.

⁹ So the Author ad Herennium speaks, Sit Lex, quæ jubeat, eos, qui propter tempestatem navim reliquerint, omnia perdere; eorum navim, ceteraque esse, si navis consecrata sit, qui remanserint in navi. Magnitudine tempestatum omnes perterriti navim reliquerunt, scapham conscenderunt, præter unum ægrotum: is propter morbum exire & fugere non potuit. Casu & fortuito navis in portum incolomis delata est: illum ægrotus possidet; navim petit ille, cujus fuerat. Cap. 11.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XI.

¹ Under the Term of Adoption is contained the Adoption properly so called, by which the natural Father releases his Son from under his paternal Authority, and transfers him to his Adoptive Father; and Abrogation is by which a Son, who has lost his natural Father, and was under his own Power, submits himself to him who is willing to become a Father to him. See the Institut. Lib. 1. tit. 11. De adoptionibus.

² Cognati in the Roman Law is spoken generally of all the collateral Kindred, but more particularly Cognati are the collateral Kindred on the Mother's Side, and Agnati of the Father's Side. See Institut. Lib. 1. tit. 15. De Legitimâ Agnatorum tutela, § 1.

³ The Words of the Digest are, Verbum hoc, si quis, tam masculos quam feminas complectitur. Digest. Lib. 50. tit. 16. De verborum significatione, Leg. 1.

⁴ So the Digest speaks, Deportatio enim mortuorum loco habendus. Digest. Lib. 37. tit. 4. De bonorum possessione contra tabulas, Leg. 1. § 8. See above Lib. 3. Chap. 6. § 3. Note 5.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XII.

¹ QUINCTILLIAN'S Words are, Incommoda vitantis melior, quam comoda petentis est causa. Institut. Orat. Lib. 7. cap. 4. pag. 539. Edit. Ludg. Bat. 421. Edit. Obrrecht.

^a Vide Cicer. ubi supra, c. 19, & 20. ^b Add. Lib. 1. t. 3. l. 12, 13. & Lib. 27. de legibus. ^c Which is put by the Aut. ad Heren. l. 1. c. 11. ^d L. 2. Ep. 20. Id. l. 6. Ep. 12. Jurat cupillos esse, quos emit, juos Fabullus; nunquid, Paule, pejerat?

favourable; yet, cæteris paribus, Favour ought to take place ².

XIII. Upon these Distinctions Grotius builds the following Rules.

1. In Cases that are ¹ not odious, Words are to be understood according to the full Propriety of popular Use; and if in popular Use there be several Significations of the same Word, the largest is to be taken. Thus sometimes the Masculine is to be taken for the Common Gender: as if Leave be given to kill any Game in such a Forest, except Bucks, under that Name ² Does also ought to be comprehended. In such Cases too an indefinite Word is to be taken ³ universally; as if it be stipulated in a Treaty, That the Captives shall be return'd on both sides, it must be understood of all and every one of them. So Cicero ⁴ argues in the aforesaid Interdict, that the Words, From whence a Man has been ejected, ought to be extended even to him who is hindred from coming to his own ⁴. For this Sense is not repugnant to the Nature of the Words; and in Favour a Man ought to be put in Possession of his own; for to Dispossess is to hinder one from continuing in Possession ^b, but a Man continues in Possession, altho' he sometimes goes out upon necessary Occasions. And therefore it is the same thing whether a Man actually turns me out of my House, or, while I am out upon necessary Business ^c, hinders me from coming in ^e. From the Force of this Rule it is, that, in a doubtful Case, if it be a Matter of Favour, the Year begun is look'd upon as compleat, where another's Right is not injured by it ^d. And against this did Caligula ^e offend, in denying those, whose Ancestors had obtain'd the Freedom of Rome for themselves and their Posterity, a Title to it, unless they were their Sons, ⁶ affirming that Posterity ought not to be understood beyond that Degree ^f. Yet I am afraid Dido made use of too favourable an Interpretation, who when she had purchas'd so much Ground, as she could cover with an Ox's Hide, cut the Hide into thin pieces, and so seiz'd upon more Ground than she had really bargain'd for ^g. By the same Trick did Ivavus buy as much Land as he could en-

² This Distinction of Things favourable and odious is equally uncertain and useles. The Definitions given them by Grotius and our Author have no Foundation; for the Promises and Compacts, as well as Privileges, devolving upon Things allowable and innocent, as we may here suppose, are all indifferent in their Nature, and by Consequence ought not to be extended or restrain'd farther than the Intention of the Author requires. There are in these Definitions Things which do not well agree together: For we say, for Example, that what tends to the publick Advantage is favourable, and what contains any Trouble in it is odious; for we know, that the Infliction of Punishment makes for the publick Advantage. There are no Causes favourable or odious; for what they have of that Nature proceeds not from the Thing it self, but depends only upon the Intention either of the Legislator, or Contractors, or Testator. In the Roman Law, for Example, the Liberty of a Servant (see the Instit. Lib. 1. tit. 6. Quibus ex causis manumittere non licet, § 2.) is a Thing favourable, as also the Portion of a Woman (see the Digests Lib. 23. tit. 3. De jure Dotium, Leg. 68, 70.) On the contrary, Second Marriages pass for odious with most People (see Novel. Justiniani 2. Chap. 2. § 1.) I have also said that this Distinction is useles: Indeed in the Examples alledged by our Author, the Interpretation which he gives, may either be given independently upon what he believes odious or favourable, or is directly contrary to his Rule. Mr. TITIVS, Objer. 428, 429. See what shall be said in the following Notes. The Author whose Opinion I have related, follows Mr. THOMASIVS in this, none of whose Works I had seen when I put out my first Edition of this Book; see his Jurispr. Divin. Lib. 2. Chap. 12. § 159, &c. and the Appendix following it, where he defends himself against the Professor of Hamburgh named Vincent Placcius, who had criticized upon what he maintain'd, that he could not give a good Definition of favourable and odious.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XIII.

¹ That is to say, according to Mr. THOMASIVS, ubi supra, § 173. in Things of a mixt Nature, which are both favourable and odious. We must add, Provided the favourable most prevail.

² That's true, but that is not because a Thing favourable is treated of, but by reason of the usual Signification of the Word Cervus, i. e. a Buck. Mr. TITIVS observes very well, That when indeed we speak of a Buck, or any other Creature in the Masculine Gender, which is the more noble, it comprehends the Female as well as the Male, unless there be some Circumstance which shews plainly that we speak of the Male in Opposition to the Female. But I am not of the Opinion of that Author, who affirms, That according to the Opinion of GROTIUS and PUFENDORF, the Word Buck is only applied to the Males. Because (says he) this Clause, Except the Bucks, imports a Change of what before it was wont to signify, and consequently includes something Odious. This Change was made after the first Agreement, and not a Restriction added on a sudden and in the Agreement itself, as that is, which is treated of in this Example.

³ This is not because a Thing favourable is treated of, but because in ordinary Speech these indefinite Expressions are equivalent to universal, unless there be otherwise some Reason to restrain them, as there is not here. For why is it, that in a Treaty of Peace we would keep any Prisoner taken in War? According to the Principles of GROTIUS (as THOMASIVS observes) he that having the greater Number of Prisoners, would exchange them only Man for Man, for otherwise it would be a Thing odious, because he would give more than the other. This last on his part affirms, That, according to the Agreement for Peace, he treated for the most favourable Thing, and so the Terms are to be understood in the most extensive Sense that they are capable of. Thus thro' the Contrariety of Reasons, nothing is determined by these Terms Favourable and Odious. Moreover, it sometimes leads us to an Interpretation plainly contrary to the Sense of him that speaks: As Mr. THOMASIVS shews by this Example, "Suppose (says he) a Magistrate forbids the Carriage of Corn out of his Country, under severe Penalties, and one carries out Meal." In this Case, according to GROTIUS's Rule, he that carries out Meal ought not to be punished; for besides that his former Liberty is abridged, the Prohibition is accompanied with a Punishment, and so a Thing absolutely odious is treated of.

⁴ This is determined in the Digests: Si autem cum dominus veniret in possessionem, armati eum prohibuerant, qui incausant possessionem, videri cum armis dejectum, Lib. 43. tit. 16. De vi & vi armata, Leg. 3. § 8.

⁵ The Words of the Digests are, Sive autem corpore, sive animo possidens quis dejectus est: palam est, eum vi dejectum videri. Idcircoque si quis de agro suo vel de domo processisset, nemine suorum relicto, mox revertens, prohibitus sit ingredi vel ipsum prædium: vel si quis eum in medio itinere detinuerit, & ipse possiderit: vi dejectus videatur: admissi enim ei possessionem, quam antea retinebat, est non corpore. Ibid. Leg. 1. § 24. Besides, what our Author says is sufficient to shew, that we need not examine whether the Thing treated of is favourable or not, for the Sense of the Words, drive out, may be proved by other Principles. Mr. THOMASIVS says here, that all depends upon the Reason of the Law, for (adds he) the Roman Law would by it prevent all ways of private Persons thus acting one by another. Francis Hotoman nevertheless affirms, That Cicero is a little cavilling in the Business of Cæcina, as appears by his Notes on that Orator's Harangue before quoted. See Mr. SCHULTING's Discourse, De Jurispr. M. Tall. Cicero. pag. 283.

⁶ Nothing is more common, than to understand by the Word Descendants, all those who descend in the Right-line for several Degrees, without needing a favourable Construction, to extend it farther than the first Degree. And the Determination of the Roman Law is positive, as to the Privileges granted a Person and his Descendants, as appears by the Law quoted by our Author. Immunitates generaliter tribuntur eo jure, ut ad posterum transmitterentur, in perpetuum succedentibus durat. Lib. 50. tit. 6. leg. 4.

^a Orat. pro Cæcina, c. 23. ^b Add. l. 3. f. 7. D. h. t. ^c Add. L. 19. t. 2. l. 29. D. locati, &c. ^d V. Bussier's Hist. Franc. l. 19. p. 39. ^e Suet. c. 38. ^f Add. L. 50. t. 6. l. 4. D. de jure inhumanitatis. ^g Juz. l. 18. c. 5. Virg. Æn. l. 1. v. 371. & Cæcia ad h. l.

compass with the Hide of a Horse, which he afterwards cut into several small Thongs, and encompassed Land enough to build a City upon ^a.

2. In a Matter of Favour ⁷, if he that speaks be learned in the Law, or speaks by the Advice of those that are, his Words are to be taken in the most comprehensive Signification; so as not only to import as much as they do in common Use, but to include that Signification also which is used amongst the Lawyers, or which the Civil Law has impos'd upon them.

3. On the other hand; Words shall be taken in a stricter Sense than the Propriety requires, if otherwise Injustice or an Absurdity would follow ⁸.

4. Altho' it be not absolutely necessary for the avoiding Injustice, to take the Words in a stricter Sense than their Propriety demands; yet if there be a manifest ⁹ Advantage in such a Restriction, we ought to stop at the narrowest Limits of their proper Signification, unless Circumstances persuade otherwise.

5. In an odious Matter a figurative Speech may be admitted ¹⁰ to avoid a Grievance; thus in a Donation, or when a Man recedes from his Right, Words, altho' deliver'd at large, are usually confin'd to those Things only, which were suppos'd to be then thought of. And therefore Cicero argues right, that ¹¹ tho' a Man bequeaths to his Wife all the Money he has, yet his Debts are not therefore bequeath'd unto her; for there is a great deal of difference between ready Money, and such as is due upon Bonds. Thus Aurelian, when he set out on his Eastern Expedition, promis'd the People Crowns of two pounds Weight, if he return'd Conqueror: And when the People expected Crowns of Gold, which Aurelian ^b was neither able nor willing to bestow, he gave them only Crowns of Bread ^c. Nay, tho' a Man expresses himself universally, if afterwards a particular Enumeration follows, the ¹² Law won't allow any thing to be made over, but what was particularly express'd. And when one Nation has stipulated to send another ¹³ Auxiliary Forces, it is suppos'd that they are to be sent at the Expence of him to whom they are promis'd, unless it was expressly otherwise agreed between them. And thus a League made for the Defence of a Dominion, when the Lord is in Possession of it, does not extend to the Recovery of it, when he is ejected ^d. Sometimes the Odium of the Person justifies a strict and almost quibbling Interpretation: Thus the Lady that betray'd the Capitol, and had bargain'd for her Pains to have what the Sabines carried upon their left Arms, meaning their Bracelets, was buried under their Shields ^e ¹⁴.

XIV. Grotius applies these Rules in a few Examples: As thus, It is demanded, if a Reward be propos'd to him that first gets to the Goal, and two come in together, whether it be due to both or to neither? Indeed the first, in this Case, may signify either him who out-runs all the rest, or him whom none out-runs: And therefore if the Reward was only a Wager between the Parties, and both come to the Goal together, they must draw Stakes. And the same holds, if two Spectators, as is usual, had laid a Wager on this or that Man's Head. But if the Reward was propos'd by a third Person to encourage their Industry, then those who come in together ought to divide it, if it be capable of Division; or else to enjoy it both together; or, if that cannot be, to draw Lots for it, or to run again; for 'tis hard that both should be deprived of the Reward, because neither was worse than the other: Besides, the Rewards of Virtue ought not to be confined to so strict an Interpretation; and therefore it would be generous in the Patron to give the whole Reward to each that performs equally ^f ¹. But what Augustus gave the Robber Coracota (who having heard that such a Sum of Money was laid upon his Head, surrender'd himself) proceeded rather from the Greatness of the Emperor's Soul, than that it was due from him ^g.

XV. In the Treaty which put an End to the second Punick War, there was a Clause, That the Carthaginians should not wage War, either in Africa, or ⁷ But why should not this have place in a Donation, for Example, which is a Thing odious, according to Grotius and our Author. The Donor knowing all the Force and Extent of the Terms which he uses, may be suppos'd to use them without Restriction, unless there be some probable Reason to make us think he had something less in his Mind, and in that Case 'tis not because a Thing odious or chargeable is treated of, that the Signification of the Terms are restrained, but upon the Account of what the Donor's Mind was most probably, as our Author himself speaks, a little lower, after Grotius.

⁸ This and the following Rules are not peculiar to Things favourable, as is easy to observe. They concern all Acts done with Deliberation.

⁹ Grotius says, A manifest Equity, or Profit; and the first Word is apparently omitted, either by the Carelessness of the Author, or Fault of the Printers. As for the Rule it self, if Equity requires that the Signification of a Word should be restrained, it is for that Reason, and not because a Thing favourable is treated of. But Profit has no Influence here, farther than 'tis evident that the Lawgiver or Contractors would procure it.

¹⁰ Provided, that there be Reason to believe, that he that speaks would not subject himself or others to this chargeable Consequence; for if he intends it, why should we oppose his Design?

¹¹ Cicero's Words are, Non si Uxori Vir legavit omne argentum, quod suum esset; idcirco quæ in nominibus fuerunt, legata sunt; multum enim differt in arcine positum sit argentum, an in tabulis debeat. Topic. cap. 3. When he speaks of his Money, he means not ordinarily his Debt, to the Sense of the Testator is taken from the Signification of the Terms, and not from the Nature of the Legacies or Gifts themselves.

¹² But then the Enumeration it self shews, that he that speaks did not take the universal Particle in its full Extent.

¹³ In this Example 'tis clear, that the Promise to send Succours, does not contain, according to the ordinary Use of the Words, and common Practice, an Engagement to furnish the Troops at his own Expence. So that, when a Thing favourable is treated of, it can't be extended to an Agreement, unless it be explained in other Terms. As for the Example following, I can't see why the Author alleges it here.

¹⁴ See Mr. Buddeus's Discourse, entitled, Jurisprudentiæ Historiæ Specimen, § 11, &c. among his Selecta Juris Naturæ & Gentium, where he examines this Case.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XIV.

¹ See Mr. THOMASIU's Discourse, De Prioritate & Posterioritate temporis dubiâ atque incertâ, which are amongst those at Leipzig, Chap. 3. where the Question propounded in this §, and several other curious ones are handled.

² Apud Saxonem Gramm. l. 9. & Polyd. Virg. Hist. Angl. l. 5:

^b See above in B. 3. c. 5 f. 10 and Mr. Barbeyrac's ¹⁰ Note upon it.

^c Which were called Siliginei. Panis Siligineus, White Bread. V. Fl. Popinum in Aurel. c. 35.

^d Vid. Guicciard. Hist. l. 15. p. m. 433.

^e Tarpeia. V. Plat. Romulo, & Liv. l. 1. c. 11.

^f V. Liv. l. 26. c. 48.

^g Dio. Cass. l. 56.

out of Africa, without Leave of the Roman People ^a. Ought this to be understood of an offensive War only, or of a defensive also? Certainly only of an offensive War; for otherwise that Clause would be odious, as inconsistent with the very Being of the State of Carthage. Besides, 'tis hard to retrench one's natural Liberty, so far as not to permit him to defend himself against an Injury ^b. Nor was it the Design of the Romans ^c by this Clause to expose the Carthaginians to the Insults of their Neighbours, or to render them entirely dependent upon their Arms for Protection; but only so to tie them up, as that they should not enlarge their Territories, or increase their Strength by War. Indeed when the Romans made such a League with Antiochus, they inserted this express Clause ^e, That if any Nation, against whom Antiochus by these Articles is debarred from waging War, should set upon him first, he should then have Liberty of Warring against them ^d.

XVI. The Romans promis'd the Carthaginians, that Carthage should be a free City: And a little after demanded of them that they would demolish it, and build another at a greater Distance from the Sea; pretending that the Spot of Ground, upon which the City stood, was not Carthage ^d. Here tho' the Freedom which the Romans promis'd can't be understood of a full and entire Liberty, that having already suffer'd no small Diminution; yet, at least, so much Liberty ought to be understood, as that they should not be oblig'd, at another's Command, to destroy their native Country, and betake themselves elsewhere. Indeed Liberty, or a Privilege of being govern'd by one's own Law ⁱ, is the Attribute of a People, not of a City, as it consists of Walls and Houses; yet since it was said that Carthage should be free (not the Carthaginians, by which way of speaking the Romans might have colour'd over their Cheat) the natural Meaning of the Words intimate, that the People should enjoy their Liberty in the City Carthage that then was, and also that the Buildings themselves should be secure. Polybius ^e relates, that the Senate had promis'd, that They should have their Liberty, their Larvs, all their Lands, the full Possession of all their Goods, both publick and private; and that the Carthaginians presently suspected why there was no Mention made of the City. But indeed 'tis evident, that the Romans here were guilty of more than Punick Perfidiousness.

XVII. There are other Conjectures founded upon something else than the Signification of the Words in which the Thing is express'd, which make it necessary sometimes to enlarge, sometimes to restrain the Meaning. Yet it is observable, that we have oftner Reason to restrain than to enlarge it. For the Want of any one Cause is enough to hinder the Effect of a Thing, whereas all must necessarily concur to produce it: Thus, in such Acts as create an Obligation, the Meaning must be restrained, if it appears that any one of the Causes be absent; whereas to enlarge it, there must be a Concurrence of them all.

And this Enlargement is not so easily admitted here, as when I just now said, that in a Matter of Favour, the Words may bear another, tho' less receiv'd Signification than usual: For there (since the only use of Words is to express one's Mind) such a Sense of the Words, not being entirely dissonant to common Use, might probably have been in the Mind of the Speaker. But the Case before us supposes us to make Use of Conjectures, to prove that the Mind of the Speaker is such as his Words won't admit of, and therefore we ought to be very certain of it.

Nor can a Law extend to a Case, which proceeds upon a Reason only like that which the Law is founded upon, for the Reason ought to be exactly the same. Nay even that is not always enough, for sometimes the bare Will of the Legislator determines it self at Pleasure, even against or without Reason, and yet is sufficient to produce an Obligation.

To justify then such an Enlargement, we ought to be sure that the Reason, under which the Case in Debate comes, was the ¹ only Cause and Motive that induc'd the Legislator to enact the Law; and that this Reason has been consider'd by him so generally, as that he would have apply'd it to the present Case, had he foreseen it, because otherwise the Law would have been useless or unjust.

Hither may be refer'd what the Rhetoricians say about Reasoning, when a Thing, for which there is ² no Provision made by any particular Law ^f, is infer'd, by a Parity of Reason, from a like Case which is provided for: or, as Quintilian

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XV.

¹ This Reason alone hath so great Force, that 'tis not necessary to alledge what the Clause contains hurtful or odious.

² Si qui sociorum populi Romani ultro bellum inferent Antiocho, vim vi arcendi jus esto: dum ne quam urbem aut belli jure teneat, aut in amicitiam accipiat. Tit. Liv. Lib. 38. cap. 38. "If any of the Allies of the Roman People set upon Antiochus, let him have Liberty to repel Force by Force, provided he takes no City, either by the Right of War, or by Treaty." See also Polyb. Excerpt. Legat. 35. cap. 4.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XVI.

¹ As Nicias and Themistocles say in Thucyd. Lib. 7. Chap. 77. "Men make up the State, and not Walls and Ships without Men in them." Ἄνθρωποι γὰρ πόλιν, ἢ πλοῖα. Add. Just. Lib. 2. cap. 12. n. 14.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XVII.

¹ There is no Necessity that the Reason of the Law should be single, to authorize the Extent of it; for there is often more than one thing which causes Laws to be made, and in one and the same Thing several Ends may be propos'd, either equally, or so as some may be principal, and others subordinate. In this Case, if he that speaks has equally propos'd to himself diverse Reasons, which he had in View, they must all be joined in extending it, in such a Manner, as the like Case, to which the Law may be extended by virtue of one of those Reasons, agrees with all the other. But when there is a principal one, there is no Necessity that the Case should also agree to the other subordinate ones, as Mr. THOMASIVS observes, Instit. Jurispr. Divin. Lib. 2. Chap. 12. § 90.

² See the Laws quoted above, § 10. Note 8.

^a Liv. l. 30. c. 37. Polyb. l. 15. c. 18. The like Article we find in the Peace which Flaminius gave to King Philip, Liv. l. 33. c. 30. ^b Add. Livy, l. 42. c. 41. ^c Add. Livy, l. 42. c. 23. ^d Vid. Appian. de Bello Punic. p. 45. Ed. Steph. ^e Ex. Legat. 142. ^f Vid. D. l. 1. f. 3. De legib. l. 12, 13, & 27.

has it, When a Thing not written is gathered from a Thing written: which he illustrates by these Examples ³. To take a Plough in Paron is not lawful, he takes the Plough-share. The Exportation of Wool is prohibited, he exports Sheep. He that slays his Father must be sew'd up in a Leather Bag, he has slain his Mother. A Man ought not to be dragg'd out of his House to Justice; he drags him out of his Tent ².

Hither too may be referr'd the Case defended by Lucian ^b; the Law is, Whosoever kills the Tyrant shall be rewarded: A certain Man climbs into the Citadel to kill the Tyrant, but missing him, kills his Son, and leaves the Sword in the Body: The Tyrant coming in, and finding his Son slain, out of Grief falls upon the same Sword, and dies: He that slew the Tyrant's Son demands the Reward, as the slayer of the Tyrant. Erasmus ^c takes the other side; yet certainly the Reason of the Law is for having the Reward given, not only to him who slays the Tyrant with his own Hand, but to ⁴ him also who is the immediate Occasion of it ^d. Since there is no doubt but the Legislator would have decreed the Reward to him also, had such a Thing come into his Mind.

The Law says, that whosoever kills his Wife shall be put to Death; but a certain Man, being willing to get rid of his Wife, and at the same time to escape the Law, kept his Mule three Days without Water, and the fourth Day pretending to ride out for his Diversion, put his Wife upon the Back of the Mule; who as soon as he came to the River, ran eagerly into it, and threw the Woman, who perish'd in the Waters.

Thus the Brethren of Joseph vainly thought, that they should be guilty of a less Crime in throwing him into the Pit, where he must die of Hunger, than if they had actually cut his Throat ^e.

It was stipulated between two neighbouring Nations, when there was no other sort of Fortifications, That such a Place should not be Walled in; which therefore ought not to be enclos'd with so much as a Pile of Earth, if it evidently appear'd, that the Reason why Walls were prohibited, was to render it incapable of holding out against Force.

A Man leaves his Estate to Titius, after the Death of the Child his Wife was then big with: He thought his Wife had been with Child, but it proves otherwise; and therefore Titius has a fair Title to the Estate: For 'tis evident, that the Reason why the deceas'd did not absolutely make Titius his Heir, was, because he thought he might have a Child; and therefore had he known that no Child would have been born, he would have made him such without any Condition ^f ⁵.

It would have been too hard, says Lyfias ^g, for a Lawgiver to have crowded into his Law all the Words of the same Signification, and therefore what he has express'd of one, he is suppos'd to have understood of all the rest. Thus the Law, in Exod. xxi. 33. is rightly extended to every tame Animal, and the Word Pit to every Ditch ⁶.

XVIII. Besides, it is of great Use to enlarge the Meaning, so as to leave no Room for any sort of Cavils, and so to prevent ¹ the Quirks, that crafty designing Men have found out to evade the Law ^h. Of these Cheats the Roman Lawyers make four sorts; one by a Commutation of ² Things, another by a Commutation of ³ Persons;

³ QUINCTILIAN'S Words are, Hic status [Syllogismi] ducit ex eo, quod scriptum est, id quod incertum est: quod quoniam ratiocinatione colligitur, ratiocinativus dicitur ----- Quod in toto, idem in parte: Aratrum accipere pignori non licet, vomerem accipit ----- Quod in parte, idem in toto. Lanæ vendere Taranto non licet, oves cecit ----- Majoris pugnae est ex scripto ducere quod scriptum non est. Instit. Orat. l. 7. c. 8.

⁴ AS SENECA expresses it, Herc. Octavo. v. 859, 860. Quicquid in mortem trahit Telum est abunde, i. e. "Whatsoever kills, is Weapon sufficient." But we ought to observe, that to a moral Imputation, it is not sufficient, that what a Man has done, should be, by Accident, the Cause of what happens, as Erasmus very well proves, and it may have place here. See Mr. THOMAS'S Instit. Jurisprud. Divin. Lib. 2. Chap. 12. § 98, 99. and what I have said above at Lib. 1. Chap. 5. § 3. Note 4.

⁵ SENECA says, Scriptum Legis angustum est, interpretatio diffusa est: quaedam vero tam manifesta sunt, ut nullam cautionem desiderent. Senec. Controv. 27. See Lyfias, Orat. 10. contra Theomnest. 2. cap. 2. and Libanias Declam. 31.

⁶ QUINCTILIAN'S Words are, Nulla tanta providentia potuit esse eorum, qui leges componebant, ut omnes species criminum complecterentur. Nam & semper caventes Nequitia vicissit; & Jus ita multiplex atque diffusum esset, ut pro incerto haberetur ignorantum. Egerunt ergo, ut rerum genera complecterentur, & spectarent ipsam Aequitatem. Multa ergo invenientur frequenter, quæ Legum verbis non tenentur, sed ipsa vi & potestate teneantur. Quin. Declam. 331. "It was impossible for those that made Laws, to provide particularly against all sorts of Crimes: For, after all their Care, Knavery would find out Evasions; and the Law would be so voluminous and confused, that instead of Uncertainty we should lie in entire Ignorance. They therefore took care to have general Heads, and to have regard to Equity. And therefore we frequently find Things, which are not express'd in the Letter of the Law, but yet come under the Force of it." See also Cicero De Invent. Lib. 2. Chap. 42. and Orat. pro Cæcina c. 18.

MR. BARB. NOTES on § XVIII.

¹ The Digests say, Contra Legem facit, qui id facit, quod Lex prohibet: in fraudem vero, qui, falsis verbis Legis, sententiam ejus circumvenit. Fraus enim Legi fit, ubi, quod fieri voluit, fieri autem non vetuit, id fit: & quod distat a verbo dicitur dicitur, i. e. dictum à sententia; hoc distat fraus ab eo, quod contra Legem fit. Digest. Lib. 1. tit. 3. De legibus, &c. Leg. 29, 30.

² The Digests enact, Sed si fraus sit Senatusconsulto [Macedoniano] adhibita, puta frumento, vel vino, vel oleo mutuo dato, ut his abstractis fructibus uteretur pecunia, subveniendum est Filiofamilias. Digest. Lib. 14. tit. 6. De Senatuscons. Macedon. Leg. 7. § 8. See also Leg. 3. § 3.

³ See the Digests, Lib. 24. tit. 1. De donationibus inter virum & uxorem, Leg. 5. and Lib. 35. cap. 7.

^a Vide D. l. 9. t. 2. ad Leg. Aquil. l. 7. f. 7. ^b In Declam. quæ inscribitur Tyrannicida, Tom. 1. p. 693, &c. Edit. Amst. ^c In the Answer which he has made to Lucian's Declaration, Tom. 1. pag. 914, &c. ^d Is there any difference whether you kill him your self, or afford the Cause of his Death? ibid. ^e Joseph. Archæol. Jud. l. 2. c. 3. Gen. xxxviii. 21, 22. ^f *Add. L. 5. t. 2. l. 28. D. de inoff. test. In a Law many Things are excepted, though not express'd; the Letter is narrow, but the Meaning extensive; but some Things are so plain as to need no Exceptions, M. Senec. l. 4. contr. 27. What? was this provided for by the Letter? By no Means? Upon what therefore do we proceed? The Design. Which could it be apprehended without Speaking, there would be no need of Words, but because it cannot, Words were found out, not to binder, but to declare the Design, Cic. pro Cæcin. c. 18. Every thing is not express'd in Writing, but some are evidently supposed to be tacitly excepted, Id. de Invent. l. 2. c. 42. Lyfias, Orat. 10. c. 2. contr. Theomnest. ^g Orat. 1. contr. Theom. ^h As also to answer any Cavils whatsoever, Vide *l. 29. l. 30. D. de leg. ubi supr. & D. l. 10. t. 4. l. 19. ad exhibend. & Lib. 35. t. 1. l. 76. D. de condit. & demonstrat. & l. 48. t. 5. l. 33. f. 1. D. ad L. Jul. de adult.

third by Commutation of the Contract; the last in the Way of Contracting ^a.

Licinius Stolo ^b having made a Law that no one should possess above 500 Acres, he himself, nevertheless, purchased a Thousand, and to palliate his Crime, made over half to his Son: For which Reason he was accus'd by Popilius Læna, and was the first that fell by his own Law; teaching us that no Man ought to prescribe to others but what himself is willing to perform. By the Voconian Law no Man can bequeath above half his Goods to a Woman; and therefore when a certain Man had made two Women joint Heirs, his Relations impleaded the Will ^c.

The Rhodians had a Right to Tribute from the Isle of Pharos, but when the Receivers came to demand it, the Queen of the Place detain'd them under some pretence of Ceremony, till she had cast Moles into the Sea, and join'd Pharos to the Continent; and then she drove them away, as having Commission to levy Taxes upon Islands, but not upon the Continent ^d.

The Athenians, when a certain Harlot, by Name Læna, i.e. Lioness, had slain the Tyrant, for fear of profaning the Temple with the Statue of a Harlot, they erected the Effigies of the Animal whose Name she bare ^e.

The Rhodians, because it was unlawful to pull down a Trophy, did therefore hide the Trophy, that Artemisa had erected to their Disgrace, by building a House over it ^f.

When the Spartans demanded to have the Athenians Decree, which hindred the Megarenses from trading with them, abolish'd, and Pericles objected that the Law forbid any Decree of the People to be pull'd down; one of the Commissioners reply'd, We do not desire you to pull it down, but to turn it out of sight, and that none of your Laws forbid ^g.

The King of Portugal, for certain Reasons, for-bad the Clergy the Use of Mules, but they plead'd their Privileges; upon which the King commanded all the Smiths, upon pain of Death, not to shoe any Mule; and so the Clergy quitted them of their own Accord ^h.

Tiberius, because it was esteem'd unlawful to strangle Virgins, order'd them first to be defiled by the Executioner, and then to be strangled ⁱ. The Corinthians were forbidden by the Law to give away their Ships, and therefore they sold them to the Athenians for five Drachms a piece ^k.

By a Decree of the Senate, no Slave could be Evidence against his Master, and therefore Tiberius, a crafty Evader of the Law, gave each of the Slaves their Liberty, that he might make use of them against Libo, without breaking the Decree of the Senate ^l.

Tiridates refus'd to lay aside his Sword at Nero's Command, but put a Lock upon his Scabbard ^m.

Robert Carnarosse, a wealthy Scotchman, bought his Preferment of the King, who then wanted Money, and yet by a Trick eluded the Law against Simony; for he laid a great Wager with the King, that His Majesty would not give him such a Preferment ⁿ.

In the Reign of Philip II. of France, the Bishop of Beauvais appear'd in the Field against Otho IV.; but to avoid shedding Blood, he fought with a Club, not a Sword: But did such a Quibble excuse the Prelate, or rather aggravate his Guilt ^o?

XIX. But sometimes the meaning of the Words are to be restrained, and although general Terms be made use of, yet they ought to be taken with some Exception or Limitation ¹; either, 1st, Because of some Original Defect in the Will of the Speaker; or, 2^{dly}, ² Because of some Accident which happens inconsistent with his Design.

1. An Original Defect is in the Will; First, When an Absurdity proceeds from it. For no Man in ^a The Words of the Digests are, Julianus, minoris factam venditionem nullius esse momenti ait. Digest. ibid § 5. See Chap. 2. § 10. Note 1.

^b The Words of the Digests are, Si, quum esset tibi contracturus, mulier interzeverit, ut cum ipsa potius contraham: videtur intercessisse. Digest. Lib. 16. tit. 1. De Senatuscons. Velleian. Leg. 8. Mr. THOMASIVS, Instit. Jurispr. Divin. Lib. 2. Chap. 12. §. 102. says, There is no great Difference between the last sort of Fraud and the preceding. He observes also, that there are some sorts of Frauds, that can't be reduced to either of these Kinds.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XIX.

¹ CICERO'S Words are, Non ergo omnia scriptis, sed quedam, que perspicua sunt, tacitis exceptionibus caveri. Cicero de Inventione, Lib. 2. Cap. 47.

² Mr. THOMASIVS, Instit. Jurispr. Divin. Lib. 2. Cap. 12. § 104, 105. finds fault with this Division, as neither exact, nor just. "For, says he, every Interpretation ought to be made according to what the Person, who speaks the Words, willed and intended, at the Time when he spake or wrote them; and not before or after: And so it can never lawfully be founded upon the Inconsistence of a Case which has happened after the Will of the Legislator or Contractors, thro' any Opposition, or Original Defect in the Will. Moreover, Terms are ordinarily restrained, because we presume, that the Lawgiver or the Contractors have spoken no more than what was in their Mind, and never thought of the Case treated of. So that a Restriction supposes always a Case happened since, which is not agreeable with the Will of him, whose Words we examine. Consequently no Man can see how the Original Defect of a Will can be opposed to the Inconsistency of a Case, which happened afterwards by the Will of the Lawgiver or Contractors." See also Mr. TITIVS on Pufendorf, Observe. 438. where he observes several Defects in this Division of Grotius, which our Author has carefully followed.

^a L. 8. f. 14. D. ad Sctum Vellei. ^b Val Max. l. 8. c. 6. f. 3. Idem refert Plin. 18. c. 3. ^c Quintil. Dec. 264. Fraudes circa eludendam legem Papiam Poppæam memorat. Suet. August. c. 34. & Tib. c. 35. in fin. & Tacit. An. XV. 19. The Trick that the Romans used to let fall the private Sacrifices, which otherwise would pass over to the Heir, as an Incumbrance, with the Estate, Salmasius gives an Account of, ad Plauti Bacchi, Act. 4. Scene. 9. voce coemptionalem senem. ^d Amm. Marcellinus, l. 22. c. 16. ^e Laëtan. de falsa rel. c. 20. ^f Vitruv. de Architect. l. 2. c. 8. ^g Plat. Partic. l. 2. c. 28.

^h Sulpitius, who had been against the Law to restore the Banish'd Citizens, having afterwards changed his Mind, was for it, but would not own it was the same Law he was before against; for he was not for the Return of the Banish'd, but of Those who were forced from their Country: As if the Controversy had been what Name they ought to have been called by, or as if all, who were forbidden the Use of Fire and Water, did not come under the Denomination of Banish'd. Auctor ad Herenn. l. 2. c. 28. ⁱ Vide Tacit. Ann. 5. c. 9. & Suet. Tiberio, c. 61. ^k Herod. Erato, p. 230. Edit. H. Steph. Add. L. 44. t. 7. l. 54. D. de obligat. & action. ^l Tacitus Ann. 2. cap. 30. Though Dio ascribes the Trick to Augustus, lib. 55. Critias used a more impudent Trick against Theramenes. Xen. Gr. rer. l. 2. p. 275. Edit. H. Steph. It was a poor Trick to avoid the Name of Aleutores, which was branded by the Law, to call themselves Tesserarii; between which there is much the same Difference, as between a Thief and a Robber; as Amm. Marcell. says, l. 28. c. 9. ^m Xiphilin. Epit. Dion. ⁿ Buckton. rer. Scot. l. 14. ^o B. Hist. France. l. 8.

his Wits can be supposed to will Absurdities: And I am mistaken, if upon this Principle, that noted Dispute between Protagoras and Euathles ^a may not be decided; for altho' they agreed in general Terms, that the Master should have no Right to his Reward 'till the Scholar had gain'd a Cause, yet when the Master had sued for his Reward, and the Judges had given Sentence in Favour of him, the Scholar ought by no means to have defended himself by that Exception: For when they enter'd into Contract that was not thought of; and it is absurd for any one to make such a Pact as should cut him off from any Possibility of obtaining what might be due to him by it. Something akin to this is that which they tell of Aristides, who had promis'd a Penny to him that should tell him the Truth: To whom says a Sophist, You will not give me the Penny. What must Aristides do in this Case? if he gives it, he gives it to one that did not tell the Truth; but if he does not give it, he refuses it to one that did. In such Cases as these, that Rule of the Civilians ought to be apply'd; that In a general Discourse the Person of the Speaker is always excepted. And therefore Epimenides the Cretan cannot be prov'd a Liar from his own Saying, Κρητες ἀει ψευδαι, the Cretans are always Liars ^b. Nor can I approve of that of Lucretius ^c,

*Denique, nil sciri si quis putat, id quoque nescit
An sciri possit, cum se nil scire fatetur.*

He that says, Nothing can be known, o'erthrows
His own Opinion, for he nothing knows.
So knows not that -----

MR. CREECH.

For he that says, Nothing can be known ^d, professes himself to know this one Thing, That nothing can be known ^d. In the Schools we have this Example of an Inconsistency ^e, A Man dream'd that there was no Credit to be given to Dreams. Now whatever Genius had infus'd this Dream into him, design'd so much Credit should be given to this, as that none should be given to any other ^f.

Besides, Secondly, The Will is thought to be originally defective ^g, When the Reason ceases, which alone fully and efficaciously moved the Will; for if the Reason of the Law be added, or if we be sufficiently satisfied of it, the Thing is no longer consider'd Simply, but as it comes under the Reason. An Example of this we have in the Law that forbids Patrons to lay an Oath upon their Bondmen not to marry, or to breed up Children, where it is added, that although in the Law no Person ^h is excepted, yet it is to be understood of those only who are capable of having Children; and therefore if a Man should lay such an Obligation upon an Eunuch, he would not come under the Penalty of the Law. For the Reason of the Law was, lest the ⁱ Patron out of Covetousness should put a stop to Propagation; which Reason in the Case of an Eunuch, ceases.

But, Thirdly, the Will is originally defective, If there be a Defect in the Matter: For the Matter which he is about, is always supposed to be in the Mind of the Speaker, although his Words seem to be of a larger Extent. Thus, if an Estate be given to a Man and his Heirs Male, his Grandsons by his Daughter are not supposed to be meant by it: for the Nature of such a Settlement interposes, which plainly excludes Women, and the Descendants of them.

XX. Yet as to the Second Head Grotius remarks ^g, That under the Reason may be comprehended some Things which do not actually exist, but are consider'd in a moral Possibility only; and when this happens, no Restriction must be admitted.

The Meaning is, that a Covenant where the Parties had a certain Reason in View, as suppose the avoiding Danger, or an Inconvenience, does not only hold good in those Cases where such Inconveniences would have follow'd, but in those also where they may probably be suspected: For Instance, should two Nations enter into a Treaty that no Army or Fleet should pass within such Limits, altho' the Reason of this Article be, that one should not actually do the other any Harm, yet it won't be lawful to send an Army or a Fleet thither, although there be no Design of injuring the other. And thus, if the Law forbids that any one should walk the Streets with Torches; tho' the Reason of the Law be to prevent any Mischief from them, yet it would be no Excuse for a ⁴ Very well. But if he has any good Reason why he believes that he knows nothing, he may make use of that very Reason to prove, that there are other Things which he may know, and consequently 'tis false, that he knows nothing.

⁵ Here again, according to Mr. THOMASIVS, we must distinguish, if there be one or more Reasons, how it might happen, that the Legislator or Contractors could have more Things in View, and if, supposing he had several Reasons, he that speaks, had regard to them on the same Account, or no. If divers Reasons had an equal Force upon his Mind, so that one alone is neglected, we may restrain the Terms in which the Law or Bargain is conceived. But if there be one principal Reason, so long as that is in force, 'tis of no Importance, that one or several subordinate Reasons may be offered to make it defective, a Restriction can have no place for that Reason only, but on the contrary, as soon as that Reason ceases, all the other lose their Force. There is another Exception also, which makes a second Head, from whence some infer a Necessity of restraining the Terms, which of themselves extend to one certain Case (besides what the Author, after GROTIUS, speaks of in the following §, and above, § 10.) which is this, That 'tis not sufficient that the Reason of the Law ceases in certain Cases, which happen very rarely, but it must be of that Nature as to happen often. For Example, the Reason why a Child, who is not yet of Age, can't be a good Witness, is because he is not in a Condition to dispose of his Goods with Discretion and sound Judgment. If therefore there be any Child, whose Judgment is above his Age of Minority, which is a Prodigy, the Will of such a Child is nevertheless null, according to the general Law. See Mr. THOMASIVS, ubi supra, § 153, 154. and what I have said in my Treatise of Games, Lib. 3. Chap. 9. § 3.

⁶ The Digests thus speak, Quamvis nulla persona Lege excipiatur, tamen intelligendum est, de his Legem sentire, qui liberos tollere possunt. Itaque si castratum Libertum iurjurando quis adegerit, dicendum est, non puniri patronum hac lege. Digest. Lib. 37. tit. 14. De jure Patronatus, Leg. 6. § 2.

⁷ Thus, if a Freeman dies without Children, all his Goods, or at least a part, return to his Patron, or him whose Slave he was, for so the Word Patronus signifies. See Instit. Lib. 3. tit. 8. De successione Libertorum.

^a Apud Gellium, l. 5. c. 10. Diog. Laert. l. 9. § 56. Apul. Florid. l. 3. Sext. Emp. adversus Math. l. 2. ^b See Titus i. 12.
^c L. 4. v. 471, 472. ^d He acts absurdly, who says, He is silent; for by saying, He is silent, he is not silent; and so destroys his own Assertion, Apul. Apol. p. 529. Edit. in Usum Delph. ^e Laëtant. l. 3. c. 6. ^f So in the Example propos'd by Gellius, l. 9. c. 16. this Restriction ought to be made, That the Law may not deprive Brave Men of their Reward. ^g L. 2. c. 16. f. 25

Man to say, that he would use them so carefully as to do no Harm with them ¹.

'Tis also a Question, whether Promises carry this tacit Condition along with them, That Things continue in the same Posture that they are? Which in general is denied; for since this Condition is Odi-ous ²; as being apt to render the Act null, it ought not easily to be presum'd, if it be not actually added; unless it appears plainly that the present posture of Affairs was included in that one only Reason which we have been talking of. For thus we frequently read in History, that Ambassadors have return'd home without opening their Commission, upon such Revolutions, amongst those to whom they were sent, as may be presum'd to make void the whole Reason of their Embassy ³.

XXI. 2. That an Accident is inconsistent with the Design of the Person, may be made to appear; either, First, From natural Reason; or, Secondly, From some Sign of the Will.

In order to make this Discovery from natural Reason, Aristotle ^b thinks that the Understanding ought to be endued with a true Sense of Equity, and the Will with an hearty Inclination to judge according to Equity ^c. And he rightly defines ¹ Equity to be a Correction of the Law, where it is deficient, by reason of its being too universal. Or, in other Words, A dextrous Interpretation of the Law, shewing that such a particular Case ² ought not to be brought under it, because an Absurdity would follow: Which may all be apply'd to Wills and Pacts, mutatis mutandis. And here Grotius ^d well observes, that Equity has no Place in the Law of Nature, since that Law does not speak more universally than the Nature of Things requires. But yet that the Law of Nature, not as it is in it self, but as it is ³ generally express'd by Men, may want the Assistance of an equitable Interpretation: for Instance, when that Law says, that Every Man ought to have his own; we must in Equity qualify it with this Condition, that he be in his Senses, and that no superior Right interposes. For since, in Laws especially, all Cases cannot be foreseen, or by reason of their infinite Variety express'd ^e ^f; it is therefore necessary for them, whose Duty it is to apply particular Cases to the general Decrees of the Law, to have a Liberty of excepting such as are so peculiarly circumstantiated, that the Legislator himself would have excepted them, had he been present, or had he foreseen such Cases ^g.

There is an Example in Cicero; it was a Law among the Rhodians, that if any Ship of Strength should be found in the Haven it should be confiscated. A great Storm, notwithstanding all the Seamen could do, drives a certain Ship into the Rhodians Haven: the Questor seiz's upon it, and the Owner pleads, from the reason of the Thing, that it ought not to be confiscated. Again,

The Law ⁴ forbids the Gates to be opened at Night, in Time of War; nevertheless a Man opens them, and receives in some Allies, who, if they had been kept out, would have been cut in pieces by the Enemy, which was encamp'd hard by ⁵.

However this Liberty must not be indulged too far, lest any one should rashly make himself Judge of the Legislator's Design; for sometimes he wills and commands that the very Letter of the Law should be put in Execution. And therefore we ought to have Reason very evidently on our side; when we act counter to it; as we certainly have, when we find that the precise adhering to the Letter is unlawful, i. e. repugnant to the Law of God or Nature: For to such, no Man can be oblig'd; indeed no Man in his Senses can be presum'd willing to oblige another to it ^h.

Sometimes Equity is taken in another Sense, as when any Cause is said to have the Benefit of Equity, or the Rigour of the Law is allow'd to be softened in Favour of the Criminal; for even private Men are said to have Recourse to Equity, when they don't so rigidly insist upon their Right against their Adversaries, but remit something of it.

Lastly, Causes are sometimes said to be left to

MR. BARB. NOTES on § XX.

¹ See another Example of this Author's mentioning. Lib. 7. Chap. 6. § 11. following.
² 'Tis not because the Condition is odious, but because, if we suppose it included in every Engagement, there is still something which may be relied upon ordinarily with some Certainty.

MR. BARB. NOTES on § XXI.

¹ His Words are, Και ἔστι νόμος ἡ εὐνομία ἢ τὸ ἔπιθετον, ἢ τὸ ἀποκρίνον, ἢ ἡ ἀρετὴ διὰ τὸ καθ' ἑαυτὸν. Ubi supra. Lib. 5. Cap. 14. See his Magn. Moral. Lib. 2. Cap. 1, 2. And a little Treatise of Grotius, De Equitate, at the end of the last Editions of his Book De Jure Belli & Pacis.

² Equity, or an Interpretation according to Equity, hath a place in being extended, as well as restrained. And here we may apply in general, the Saying of an ancient Poet:

Ὅτι νόμος ἀσπίς ἐστίν, ἢ δὲ ἔσται τὰς νόμους ἀπὸ δακτύλου, συκαράντος μὴ γαλιότατος

Laws are a fine Thing without Contradiction;
But he that will apply himself nicely to the Letter of the Laws,
Seems to me a Sycophant or Caviller.

Τὸ καλὸν ἕσσεν καὶ κατὰ τὴν ἔξω τὴν νόμον.

What is good, is better than the Law.

³ The Author, thro' Mistake, says here, minus, for, nimis, but it may be a Fault in the Printing, tho' it remains in the last Edition of 1706.

⁴ In quo genere (sive Totius) non simplex voluntas scriptoris auctoritas, quæ in omne tempus, & in omni fortuna imperabit, sed ex quodam facto et eventu, ad tempus interpretanda dicitur. Ut in eam, qui, cum Lex aperiri portæ non esset, aperuit quodam in bello. & auxilia pro loco in oppidum recepit, ne ab hostibus opprimerentur, si foris essent, quod pro munere habere haberent. De Invent. Lib. 2. Cap. 42. See also Cap. 32.

⁵ So the Digest, again, Quædam personam durum est: sed ita Lex scripta est. Lib. 40. Tit. 9. Quæ & à primis maximi liberi non sunt. Et. Leg. 12. § 1. which is very hard, but so it is Written. See Lex M. in Lib. 2. Tit. 1. Chap. 12. The Lawyer say also, that we can't always know the Reasons for which Laws are made, nor ought we always to enquire after them. Non omnium, quæ à magistratibus constituta sunt, ratio reddi potest: & ideo rationes earum, quæ constituntur, inquiri non oportet; aliquam multa ex his, quæ constituta sunt, subvertuntur. Digest. Lib. 1. Tit. 3. D. Inqui. Et Leg. 20. 21. See Mr. NooDR's Observations, Lib. 1. Chap. 2. and Mr. LE CLERC's Reflexions upon it, in his Biograph. Critique. T. 11. p. 222.

^a Vide Tac. Hist. L. 2. c. 1. Where Titus upon Galba's Death returns back. ^b Nicom. l. 5. c. 10. ^c Vide D. L. 47. t. 2. De furtis L. 61. f. 5. ^d Al Campanella Pol. e Xen. Hæparch. To commit to Writing every thing that ought to be done, is as difficult as to know all future Things. ^f See above, Section 17. towards the End. ^g Vide L. 1. t. 3. L. 3. 4. 5. 6. 10. 11. 12. 13. D. de leg. h Grat. ad Hebr. c. 4. 15. Circumstances are such as render the observing of the Law a Breach against the chief Laws of Nature. Add. V. Max. l. 3. c. 7. n. 1. c. 8. n. 6.

Equity, when the Civil Law takes no Cognizance of them, or when the Nicety of the Law is not regarded, but the Thing is left to the Arbitrage of honest Men.

XXII. Moreover, a general Law ought to be restrain'd; if, altho' it be not absolutely unlawful to stick to the Letter, yet upon weighing the Thing in Candour and Prudence, it appears to be too grievous and burthensome, either in respect of the Condition of human Nature absolutely consider'd, or in regard of the Person and Thing in Debate, compar'd with the End of it. For some Things seem intolerable to Mankind in general, others to some certain Persons; some Business is such, as to take much Pains about it would be folly. And an Exception against those is still the more reasonable, if the Law be not only positive, and the Matter of it such, as makes it probable, that the Legiflator would not, at the great Inconvenience of the Party, demand the Observance of it; but also if the Neglect of it does not tend to the Dishonour and Contempt of the Authority that enacted it^a.

And therefore, without doubt, 'tis a foolish piece of Superstition in the Abyssines, so to weaken themselves by Fasting in Lent, as, for want of Strength and Courage, not to be able to resist the Inroads of their Enemies; infomuch that their Country has sometimes been over-run at that Time without Resistance^b.

Thus a Man that lends a Thing for a certain Time may demand it back before the Time expired, if in the mean while he happens to be in great Want of it himself; for by the Nature of such a beneficial Act no Man can be presum'd willing to oblige himself to his great Inconvenience.

So if a Prince has promis'd to assist his Ally with Forces, he may be lawfully excused, as long as he is in Danger at home, and wants those Forces for his own Defence: For since every Prince is, in the first place, oblig'd to protect his own People, all the Promises, which he makes to Foreigners, are understood to extend no farther than the Safety of his own Kingdom admits.

And thus a Grant of Immunity from Taxes and Tribute ought to be understood of ordinary annual Taxes only, not of those extraordinary Subsidies, which the urgent Necessity of Affairs may require, and which the Publick can't subsist without. From hence it appears, that Cicero^c is too free in saying, that such Promises are not to be kept, as are usefess to the Persons to whom they are made; nor if they be less beneficial to him, than prejudicial to the Maker. For whether a Thing be useful, or not, to the Person to whom it is promis'd^d, it is not always for the Person promising to judge; unless he has Authority over him, or has him placed under his Care. Nor is any Prejudice or Burthen redounding to the Person promising, sufficient to release him from his Promise (for the Performance of every free Promise has some Burthen going along with it) but such and to much as, according to the Nature of the Act, ought in reason to be presum'd, excepted. As in the Example brought by Cicero^d, If you had promised to appear immediately as Advocate for another, and in the mean time your Son falls dangerously Ill, it would not be a Breach of Duty not to perform what you have promis'd^e.

XXIII. But, Secondly, There are also some Signs of the Will, from whence it may be certainly collected, that a Case ought to be excepted from the general Expressions of the Law; as when the Words of the Legiflator in another place, though not directly opposite to the Law now supposed to be before us (for that would be a Contradiction) yet by some peculiar Incident and unexpected Event of Things, happen to oppose it in the present Case; or, which amounts to the same Thing, when there are two different Laws, which don't interfere, and which easily may and ought to be observed at different Times, but can't both of them be satisfied, when by some Chance they call for our Obedience at the same Instant^f. In this Case, we must observe some certain Rules to know which Law or Pact ought to give place to the other, where both cannot be fulfilled. Grotius lays down these:

1. That which is only permitted gives place to that which is commanded^g¹. For a Permission includes a Liberty, but a Command carries along with it a Necessity of acting.

2. That which ought to be done at this present time, is preferable to that which may be done at any other time: Or when, at the same time, I lie under two Obligations, whereof one can't be satisfied but at this Instant, the other at any time hereafter; the

Mr. BARR. NOTE on § XXII.

¹ But, as Mr. FRED. GRONOVIUS observes, in a Note upon Grotius, 'tis no more than what CICERO means, for he speaks of a Thing hurtful, in the Judgment of all Persons of Understanding, and not only in the Imagination of him that made the Promise. It is certain, that in all TULLY's Discourse there is nothing that can hinder us from explaining his Notion in this Manner.

Mr. BARR. NOTES on § XXIII.

¹ That is to say, Commanded or forbidden. Plus enim valet sanctio permissioe. Auctor ad Herenn. L. 2. C. 10. See Quint. Decl. 374. The Law which forbids is more powerful than that which permits. This is reserved in the Power of the Magistrate: And one who forbids can do more than all who allow: For that which permits leaves us to our Liberty, whereas that which forbids binds us under a Penalty. Nam id quod imperatur, necessarium: illud, quod permittitur, voluntarium est. Cic. de Invent. Lib. 2. Cap. 49. These last Words are part of a long Sentence, from whence GROTIUS takes all his Rules, which he draws up into a better Order. I will recite Cicero's Words upon every Rule, as our Author does, but not quite thro'. It is true that he gives us the entire Passage at the end of the Chapter, but besides he engages himself upon an usefess Repetition; as he has placed it, it seems to contain something new, whereas it is no more than the Result of what he has said. Moreover, as Mr. TULLIUS observes, Objerv. 441. this Rule is true only when the Permission is general, and the Commands or Prohibitions particular. For, says he, 'tis certain on the contrary, that a particular Permission refers to a general Command, the Permission in this last making an Exception to the Command, as in the first Case the Command restrains the Extent of the Permission. There are, nevertheless, Cases, where the Permission and Prohibition are in one Sense general, as the Terms alledged by Ziegler in his Notes upon Grotius, will shew, pag. 395. "It is permitted to every Citizen to have a Concubine, but forbidden every Soldier to have a Woman in the Camp". The Prohibition is general, as to Citizens in the War.

² CICERO's Words are, Deinde ex lege utrum statim fieri necesse sit: utrum habeat aliquam moram & sustentationem: Nam id, quod statim faciendum est, perfici prius oportet. Cicero, De Inventione, Lib. 2. Cap. 49.

^a Add, Grat. ad Mat. c. 12. c. 3. ^b Fr. Alvarez. Desc. Eth. c. 13. ^c Off. 1. ^d D. 1. ^e Add. Sen. de Benef. l. 4. c. 35. ^f Char. de la Sageffe, l. 1. c. 37. §. 5. ^g A Command is of greater Force than a Permission; for that which is commanded, is necessary; that which is permitted, voluntary. Auth. ad Heren. l. 2. c. 10.

former

former shall be perform'd, the latter put off to some other Opportunity. From whence it follows, that no Man can be enjoin'd two Things, which cannot both be perform'd together, and which neither of them admit of Delay. From hence we may give an answer to the Enquiry of Plutarch ², Why it was not lawful for the Flamines Diales to bear any other Magistracy? For since the Duties of the Priests were certain and settled, and the Duties of other Magistrates uncertain and not settled, the same Man, being both Priest and Magistrate, would not have been able to provide for Business of so different a Nature, if they happened to interfere in the same nick of Time: So that one must necessarily have been neglected for the Performance of the other. It seems that those Priests had not found out the Secret of making an Honour and a Gain of the Priesthood, and yet of throwing the Duty and Burthen of it upon their Curates.

3. An affirmative Precept gives way to a ³ negative; or when an affirmative Precept can't be satisfied but at the Expence of a Negative one, then the Performance of the affirmative shall be deferred or put off, 'till it ceases to clash with the other which is negative. The Reason of this is taken from the Nature of the affirmative and negative Precepts: For the Obligation of these is perpetual, uniform, and equally binding; whereas those presuppose an Opportunity of being put in Execution; which is presum'd not to offer it self, if it can't be done without the Violation of some Law: And therefore Things, in such a Posture of Affairs, are esteem'd morally impossible. Hence it is, that no Man can injure another, or break his Word, to promote the Advantage of a Friend, or to get wherewithal to be grateful, or generous: For 'tis a strange sort of Piety to steal Leather, and then give the Shoes in Alms to the Poor. Mahomet in the Alcoran forbids any one to give Alms of ill-gotten Goods. However, I can't say, that Schach Abas King of Persia was in the right in disposing of no Money so freely to charitable Uses, as that which he had raised from the Stews; For this, said he, was paid willingly, whereas the other Taxes were extorted with Sighs and Groans from the Subject: Yet, methinks, it was not so decent to pitch upon Money rais'd after that Manner for such Uses ^b. To this Head, in some Respect, belongs what Leo of Modena ^c tells us of the Hebrews, that whatsoever was forbidden the Men, was also forbidden the Women; but as for the affirmative Precepts, the Rabbies declar'd, that none of those which were confin'd to a certain Time, oblig'd the Women, by reason of the Weakness of their Sex, and their living under the Government of their Husbands.

4. In Covenants and Laws, which are in other respects equal ⁴, that which is particular and applicable to the present Case take place of that which is general. For generals must be reduc'd to particulars, before they can be apply'd. As for what Grotius subjoins ⁵, That a Prohibition, which has a Penalty annex'd, ought to take place of that which has none; and that which has a greater, of that which has a less, is not so clear; for a Prohibition that has no Penalty, either fix'd or arbitrary, annex'd to it, is of no Force at all. And that Rule, Of two Evils to choose the least, can't properly be apply'd to moral Evils or Sins: For when it happens, that one of two Prohibitions must needs be violated, then that whose Violation is of least Concern is suppos'd to be permitted; for Example, one Law is, That no Man shall appear abroad in Arms on a Holy-day; another, That no Man shall stay at home upon hearing the Signal of a Tumult. In this Case the latter is to be look'd upon as an Exception to the former; as if the Law had been, That no Man should appear abroad in Arms on a Holy-day, unless he be commanded by the Magistrate in Case of a Tumult.

5. When two Duties happen to interfere at the same Point of Time ⁶, that which is the more honest and profitable is to be preferr'd. For the other Obligation is only upon Condition, that it can consist with an Obligation of greater Moment

6. When two Covenants, one upon Oath ⁷, the other not, can't be performed both together, the former ought to take place of the latter; unless the latter was added as an Exception and Limitation to the other; for an Oath added to a Covenant excludes all such Restrictions and tacit Exceptions, as are not necessary from the Nature of the Thing, and which, if there be no Oath, may be more easily admitted ^d.

³ Deinde utra Lex jubeat, utra vetet. Nam saepe ea, quae vetat, quasi exceptione quadam corrigere videtur illam, quae jubet. That Law which forbids, seems, by some sort of Exception, to correct that which commands. Cic. de Invent. Lib. 2. c. 49. See above Lib. 1. Cap. 3. § 8. and Lib. 2. Cap. 6. § 2. and Lib. 3. Cap. 7. § 5. But we are to distinguish here, whether the Laws which forbid, or command, are general, or particular. See above, § 1.

⁴ And again Cicero says, Deinde utra Lex de genere omni, utra de parte quadam; utra communiter in plures, utra in aliquam certam rem scripta videatur. Nam quae in partem aliquam, & quae in certam quandam rem scripta est, promptius ad causam accedere videtur, & ad judicium magis pertinere. Ibid. The more particular a Law is, the more does it seem to make to the Case in hand.

⁵ In which he follows Cicero, as in the other Rules. Deinde in utra Lege, si non obtemperatum sit, poena adficiatur, aut in utra major poena statuatur. Ibid.

⁶ Primum igitur Leges oportet contendere, considerando, utra Lex ad majores, hoc est, ad utiliores, ad honestiores ac magis necessarias res pertinet. Ex quo conficitur, ut, si Leges duae, aut si plures, aut quotquot erunt, conservari non possint, quia discrepent inter se, ea maximè conservanda patetur, quae ad maximas res pertinere videatur. Ibid.

⁷ This Rule is true, if we suppose all things else equal; for if he treats of two Agreements directly opposite one to another, the last in Date ought to mention whether the first were upon Oath, or not; for if the Agreements were only different, a Particular is of greater Force than a General. Our Author following Grotius, blindly establishes a Maxim here which he has confuted elsewhere. I mean, that Opinion of Grotius, in which he affirms, That an Oath added to a Promise produces a new and particular Obligation, by virtue of which a much stricter Interpretation is to be made of such Engagements, than of those that are made without calling God to witness. Titius Oshere. 445. Mr. Thomasius, who also rejects our Author's Maxim. 17tit. Jurispr. Divin. Lib. 2. Cap. 12. § 141. adds, That he knows not what these Words mean. Unless the Agreement without an Oath hath been annexed to another, by way of Exception or Limitation, and it were to be wished, that he had brought some Example. I observe also, that our Author omits this Restriction quite, in his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, Lib. 1. Cap. 17. § 13.

^a Quæst. Rom. in fin. p. 291. C.

^b Olearius, Itin. Pers. l. 5. c. 31. The Law which forbids is of greater Authority than that which commands; for every Law that forbids is therefore stronger, because it corrects that which permits or commands, Mar. Victorin. in exp. in 2. Rhet. Cic.

^c De Rit. Hebr. p. 5. c. 5. f. 1.

^d Medea in Euripides, ver. 743. having desired Ægeus to entertain her, and not to deliver her up, when her Enemies should demand her, would needs have it confirm'd by Oath: Which Ægeus approved of, For so, says he, it will be the safer for me, if I can make such an Excuse to your Enemies.

7. An Obligation imperfectly mutual⁸ gives place to one that is perfectly mutual, and binding on both sides⁹. Thus what I own upon Contract, ought to be paid before what is due from me upon free Promise, or upon Gratitude, or any such Respect, if both can't be perform'd together. And therefore Phocion, when he was ask'd a Largeſs for a certain Sacrifice, reply'd, Ask the rich, for I ſhould be aſham'd to give to you, and not to pay this Man (pointing to Callides the Uſurer) what I owe him^a.

8. The Law of Generoſity gives place to the Law of Gratitude, cæteris paribus: Altho' each implies an imperfect Obligation. For the Debt of Gratitude has more Favour to plead in its Behalf than that of Generoſity; for that requires that we ſhould give becauſe we have receiv'd; whereas this is built upon no ſuch Foundation. And therefore, in this Caſe, becauſe the Neceſſity of Gratitude interſeres, the Object of Generoſity is ſuppos'd to be wanting. And this holds ſo far, that even Generoſity towards our own Relations, unleſs it be due upon ſome cloſer Obligation, gives place to the Duty of Gratitude.

9. Where the Laws were made by ſubordinate Powers, that of the Inferior yields to that of the Superior, if both can't be obey'd. Thus we ought to obey GOD, rather than Man^b. And the Command of a King carries more Weight with it, than that of the Maſter of a Family.

10. The more noble, uſeful, or neceſſary the Matter of one Law is, than that of another, the greater Weight ought the Law to have with us.

11. The cloſer Tie there is between any Perſon and us, the more ought Obligations due to him, to outweigh thoſe due to others, cæteris paribus^c.

Cicero^d has a Paſſage very pertinent to the Matter in hand: Contrary Laws, ſays he, admit of Diſpute, when two or more ſeem to claſh. As thus, one Law ſays, That whoſoever kills the Tyrant, ſhall be rewarded as a Conqueror at the Olympick Games, and may demand what he pleaſes of the Magiſtrate, and the Magiſtrate ſhall grant his Requeſt. Another Law enact's, That upon the Death of the Tyrant his five neareſt Relations ſhall be put to Death. Alexander, who had exercis'd Tyranny over the Phæreans, was ſlain in the Night by his Wife Thebe, and ſhe, for her Reward, demanded her Son, whom ſhe had by the Tyrant. Some were of Opinion that the Son by the Law ought to be put to Death; the Thing may bear a Diſpute. Now, in ſuch Caſes it ought to be conſider'd, which of the Laws conduce to greater, i. e. to more honeſt, more profitable, and more uſeful Ends. And that ought to be obſerved which has the greater Ends to ſupport it. Then we ought to conſider which Law was made laſt, for the laſt is of greateſt Obligation. Then which of the Laws commands, which permits only; for that which is commanded is neceſſary, that which is permitted, voluntary. Then which Law is penal, and which is enforced with the greater Penalty; for that ought to be moſt obſerved, which can be violated with the leaſt Impunity. Then which commands, which forbids; for that which forbids is often an Exception to that which commands. Then which ſeems deſign'd to bind in general, which in part only: Which to conclude in common ſeveral Things, which ſome particular one only; for that which binds in part, or ſome certain particular Thing only, ſeems moſt capable of being applied and brought into Court. Then by the Law what ought to be done immediately, and what admits of Delay; for that which can't be put off, ought to be obey'd firſt.

⁸ I wonder that our Author was not aware, that all theſe following Rules are contained in the fifth, of which they are only the Conſequences; and therefore he himſelf hath left out the three laſt, in his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, Lib. 1. Cap. 17. § 13.

⁹ See the Explication of this Diſtinction, Lib. 3. Cap. 4. § 9. above.

¹⁰ See Mr. BUNDEU's Diſcourſe, entitled, De comparatione obligationum, quæ ex diverſis hominum ſtatibus oriuntur; in the ſelecta Jur. Nat. & Gent. pag. 680, & ſeqq.

^a Plut. Phocione, 745. C. D. ^b Añ. iv. 19. c. 14, 15. Where he talks of the Degrees of Society.

^c Gal. vi. 10. 1 Cor. viii. 13. 1 Tim. v. 7. Clc. Off. 1. ^d L. 2. de Invent.

C H A P. XIII.

Of the Way of deciding Controversies in the Liberty of Nature.

- | | |
|---|--|
| I. What is due to others is willingly to be performed. II. In a State of Nature there is no Judge. III. Controversies, which can't be decided by Conference, are to be referred to Arbitrators. IV. There is a Covenant between an Arbitrator and the contending Parties. | V. Arbitrators, in a Doubt, are bound to judge by Law. VI. Arbitrators are not to judge of the Possession. VII. Of the Mediators of a Peace. VIII. What if Deeds be lost. IX. Of Witnesses. X. Of the Execution of the Sentence. |
|---|--|

BY the Law of Nature every Man is oblig'd to perform, and to pay, of his own Accord, what by any Title is due from him; and if any one has designedly damag'd or offended another, the same Law moreover obliges that the Delinquent should seriously repent, and give Security to live in Peace and Friendship for the future. And as this Repentance, where it is not extorted by Force, but proceeds from the Principle and Consideration of Justice, is a sufficient Indication of the Offender's Amendment: So on the other side, after such Satisfaction is made, and Security given, the Party injured ought to forgive him, and to live peaceably with him for the Time to come. And if a Man thro' Passion and a Desire of Revenge refuses it, he must be answerable for the Breach of the Peace, and the Consequences of it^a. For it is inhuman and brutish, not to be satisfied with any thing less than the Blood of the Offender: And when a Misunderstanding is once begun, to continue it on for ever. It was a cursed Speech of Cato's^b, who, when he met a young Man just slusht with the Ruin of his deceased Father's Enemy, took him by the Hand; and Thus, said he, ought we^c to appease the Ghosts of our Parents; not with Kids, or Goats, but with the Tears and Destruction of their Enemies.

II. But all Men are not of such a happy Temper, as to be willing, of their own Accord, to perform their Duty: And besides, several Controversies may arise, concerning the Certainty and the Quantity of a Debt, and the rating of a Damage, the Competency and Exercise of certain Rights, the fixing Boundaries, the Interpretation of Pacts, and other Pretensions; and yet in the Liberty of Nature^d no Man can take Authority upon him to determine and compose such Controversies. Indeed Hobbes^e makes every Man his own Judge in a State of Nature^d; by which he can mean nothing else, but that he who has no Superior to govern him, may manage his Business as he pleases, and appoint Means for his Preservation, according to his own Discretion. For if another Man should take upon him to judge of my Affairs, yet, since he has no Authority to determine me by his Opinion, it will depend intirely upon my Will and Pleasure, whether, or how far, I shall be concluded by him; and so ultimately the Management of my Actions will lie in my own Breast; which yet I ought to govern according to the Rules of Nature.

As to what remains; tho' every Man may, in that State, either neglect or defend his own Right, either put up, or return an Injury; yet he can't, in his own Cause, give Sentence so as to oblige him, with whom he has the Controversy, to stand to it. For tho' he designs never so justly, nay, tho' he protests upon Oath, that he decrees what seems to him to be right; yet since the other may have as great a Respect for his own Opinion, if they happen to disagree, nothing can be done by reason of that Equality, which is essential to the State of Nature. Almost all wicked Men think fit to be² Judges in their own Case, Arist. Pol. iii. c. 9.
³ No Mortal ever thinks an Injury against himself small, most think them greater than really they are, Salust. Catil. c. 51.

III. But yet the Law of Nature by no means allows, that every Man should immediately fly to Arms, and put the Controversy to the Decision of the Sword, before milder Methods have been attempted^f. And therefore the Parties ought first

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on Chap. XIII. §. I.

^a See Lib. 2. Chap. 5. § 19. above.

^b See what Mr. HERTIUS says upon the Notions of the Pagans upon that sort of Revenge, in his Discourse, De Herede Occisi Vindice, Sect. 1. § 4. in Tom. III. of his Opuscul. & Commentat.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § II.

¹ In which Sense that of Thucydides, Lib. 1. may be admitted; βιάζεσθαι γὰρ, οἷς ἀν' ἑσέ, ἀναγκάσει ἐξείναι ἀποβῆσθαι. They that may use Force have no need to go to Law.

² ARISTOTLE'S Greek is, Σταθὲν εἴ οἱ πλείους ἐπιλαὶ κερταὶ ἀπὸ αἰτίας.

³ SALUST'S Words are, Neque cuiquam mortalium injuriæ suæ parvæ videntur. Multi eas gravius æquo habuere. SENECA, as Mr. HERTIUS observes, says, That every one in that Respect has a Royal Spirit in him. We desire that all Things may be allowed us towards others, but are not willing others should be permitted any thing towards us. Regis quisque intra se antrum habet, ut licentiam sibi dari velit in alterum, in se nolit. De Irâ, Lib. 2. Chap. 31.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § III.

¹ Nam cum sint duo genera decertandi, unum per disputationem, alterum per vim, cumq; illud proprium sit hominis, hoc belluarum, confugiendum est ad posterius, si uti non licet superiore. De Offic. Lib. 1. Cap. 11. "There being two Ways of Contending, one "by Argument, the other by Force, and that being proper to Men, this to Brutes, Recourse is to be had to the latter, when "the former is refused." See Justin, Lib. 8. Cap. 1. n. 4. &c. When, without trying to compose Matters amicably, Arms are taken up, then that of Ovid takes place, Injustum rigido jus dicitur ense. Trist. l. 5. El. 10. v. 43.

^a C. Pontius in Livy, l. 9. c. 1. argues excellently to this Purpose.

^b Vide Plutarch in the Life of Cato the Elder,

p. 344. E.

^c De Cive, c. 1. f. 9.

^d How far this is true, may be seen in B. 2. c. 2. l. 3.

to endeavour, by some friendly Debate between themselves or their Agents, to compose the Difference ^a. Indeed even after Arms have been taken up, and each Party, by the Calamity of War, has been induced to hearken to gentler Accommodations, we generally find that the Difference is at last adjusted by Treaties and Negotiations. If the Thing and the Temper of the Parties admit of it, the Dispute may easily be decided by Lot ^b. But if neither a Debate is able to put an End to the Controversy, nor either Party thinks fit to trust that to Chance, which each, in Reason, thinks to be on his side; the only Thing they can do, is to pitch upon an Arbitrator, and each bind himself to stand to his Award ^c. And here Grotius ^d well observes, that in a doubtful Case, altho' each Party ought to come to Terms, rather than go to War, yet the Plaintiff is more oblig'd to it than the Defendant; for the Defendant's Plea is the more favourable even in the Law of Nature.

IV. From the Design of appealing to an Arbitrator, it appears how he ought to be qualified. For therefore recourse is had to him, because a Man's Judgment, by reason of that natural Affection which every Man bears to himself, is suspected to be partial in his own Cause ^e. Upon which Account the Arbitrator must take care not to sacrifice Right to Affection, nor to be bias'd in Favour of one more than the other, any farther than the Merits of the Cause incline him. And if he behaves himself thus impartially, he ought not to regard the unjust Resentments of him that is cast. Bias ^f used to say, that he had rather judge between those that were his Enemies, than his Friends; for, in the latter Case, let him judge how he would, one of his Friends would turn his Enemy; whereas, if both were his Enemies, one probably would become a Friend. And therefore it is manifest, that a Man who has any Interest in the Success of either Party, ought not to be an Arbitrator between them; for fear he should not be able to observe so exactly that Indifference and Impartiality which he ought ^g.

From hence it follows, that there ought to be no Pact or Promise between the Arbitrator and the Parties, whereby he may be prejudiced in Favour of either of them ^g. Nor ought he to expect ^h any other Reward for his Sentence, than the Satisfaction of having judg'd right. Absurd therefore was the Arbitrage which Maximilian and the Venetians submitted to Leo X. whilst each of them privately tamper'd with him to declare of his Side ^h.

Now altho' the contending Parties enter into Compact with the Arbitrator, about taking upon him his Office (for as no Arbitrage can be exercised without the Consent of the Parties, so no one can be forced to be Arbitrator against his own Consent) yet it is not from the Force of that Compact, that he becomes obliged to judge according to what he thinks is agreeable to the Laws of Conscience and Equity; or they to stand to his Award. For the Law of Nature, which can receive no Enforcement from any Compact, obliges him to judge according to Justice; and they are obliged to submit, without any Reserve, to his Determination, because otherwise the Design of going to an Arbitrator would be frustrated, and there would be no End of such Appeals.

For suppose they should agree to submit themselves to his Arbitrage, not absolutely, but upon Condition that he should decree according to Justice, how would they ever be able to decide the Matter? For the Parties, being supposed to be in a perfect Liberty of Nature, are as yet equal; and each has Power to enquire whether the Arbitrator has perform'd the Condition, in judging according to Justice. And therefore, if, after the Sentence be given, it should seem unjust to either Party, or should really be so, another Controversy would arise about it; which since neither this Arbitrator, nor the Parties could be able to determine, it would be render'd necessary to apply to another. And if with this other they enter into the same conditional Compact, and a Doubt should arise about the Justice of his Sentence also, they would be forced to apply to another for Relief, and so on in infinitum.

From hence it follows, that the Pact, which the Parties enter into, when they consent to stand to the Award of an Arbitrator, ought to be conceiv'd simply, and not upon Condition that he pronounces Sentence ⁱ according to Justice; for else, as was said before, there might be an Appeal from

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § IV.

¹ ΠΑΡΑΧΩΣ ΔΕ ΤΡΟΧΟΝΤΩ Ο ΔΙΑΜΟΝΙΟΣ, Ο ΔΙΑΜΟΝΙΟΣ ΔΕ Ο ΜΙΣΘΩ. Arist. Pol. l. 4. c. 12. "An Arbitrator is every where to have a "Trust reposed in him." Upon the same Principle depended the Answer that Amasis King of Egypt gave the Aleans, when they were to be Arbitrators in the Olympick Games, and had sent to him to advise them, how they might perform the Office with greatest Justice; Let none of the Aleans, said he, be concern'd in the Games. Hither may be refer'd that scandalous Decree of the Roman People, who in the Controversy between the Aricinians and the Ardeates, adjudged the Land to themselves. Livy, Lib. 3. Cap. 72. Add. Just. l. 8. c. 3. n. 15. where is a like Example of Philip of Macedon, See Diodorus Siculus, Lib. 1. Chap. 95.

² PLINY gives this Commendation to Trajan, as to the Causes on which he gave his Sentence, Nec aliud tibi sententiæ tue pretium, quam bene judicavisse, Plin. Panegy. c. 80. n. 1. You had no other Reward of your Determination than that you judg'd well.

³ The Digests speak to this Purpose, Qualem autem sententiam dicat Arbitrator, ad Prætorum non pertinere, Labeo ait, dummodo dicat, quod ipsi videtur. Et ideo, si sic fuit in Arbitrum compromissum, ut certam sententiam dicat, nullum esse arbitrium, Lib. 4. tit. 8. De receptis, qui arbitrium receperunt, ut sententiam dicant, Leg. 19. princ. Whence it comes, that according to those Lawyers, the Sentence of an Arbitrator ought to end the Matter entirely, and not to be remov'd to the Judgment of another Arbitrator. Idem Pedius probat, ne propagentur arbitria, aut in alios interdum inimicos agentium transferantur, sua sententia finem controversiæ cum imponere oportet. Ibid. Leg. 32. § 16. Further, as to what concerns the Agreement of Parties, and the Qualities or Duties of Arbitrators, as to the private Affairs of the Members of the same State, we may consult the whole Title which I have quoted, as also Mr. DAUMART's Civil Laws in their Natural Order, Part 1. Lib. 1. tit. 14. and the Publick Law of the same Author, Lib. 2. tit. 7.

^a Vide Grot. l. 2. c. 23. f. 7. ^b V. eund. d. l. f. 9. ^c V. Grot. d. l. f. 8. ^d D. l. f. 11. ^e Vide L. 2. t. 1. l. 10. D. de jurisdic. Plut. de adulat. & amic. discernè Every one is the greatest Flatterer of himself. ^f Diog. Laert. l. 1. f. 87. Aut. Gell. l. 1. c. 3. ^g Compare Hobbes de Cive, c. 3. f. 14. ^h Gaucciard, Hist. l. 11. about the end; and l. 12. p. m. 245.

one ⁴ Arbitrator to another, and from him to a third, and so on without End. Besides, that there can lie no Appeal from the Arbitrator is plain, because there is no superior Judge to receive it, which obtains even in civil States, where the Parties by Consent pitch upon an Arbitrator, provided the Cause be such as it does not concern the Government to intermeddle with: And if any Country admits of such an Appeal, it is by reason of some positive Law. Indeed, in some places, those extraordinary Judges who have Causes laid before them, to be examined and decided out of hand, without the tedious Forms of Law, come under the Name of Arbitrators. And from these nothing hinders but that an Appeal may lie to a Superior.

But when we say that the Parties ought, right or wrong ⁵, to stand to the Sentence of the Arbitrator, it must be understood with some Restrictions. For tho' I can't fly off, because he decrees otherwise than I expected; yet his Sentence shall not bind me, if it manifestly appears that he tamper'd with the other Party, and receiv'd Bribes of him, and concerted Matters to my Disadvantage. For he who evidently ⁶ takes part with either side, ceases to bear any longer the Person of an Arbitrator ³.

If it be thought fit to ⁷ refer a Cause to more than one, 'tis best to have an uneven Number; for else they may divide into equal Votes, and so leave the Business undecided.

V. Moreover, Grotius ^b would have it consider'd, whether the Arbitrator be chosen as a Judge, or as having Authority more at large of giving Sentence, not according to the ¹ Rigour of the Law, but according to Reason and Equity. For sometimes both Parties appeal to the Law; and there the Arbitrator, as if he were a Judge, ought to weigh the Merits of the Cause, and to determine according to Law. Sometimes one Party only insists upon the Rigour of the Law, and the other, in Favour and Compassion, desires a Mitigation of it; or, in other Words, appeals to Equity: Where by Equity

I don't mean that dextrous Interpretation of the Law, mentioned in the foregoing Chapter, which even a subordinate Judge ought to make use of: but an Abatement of the Rigour of the Law, upon the Dictates of Humanity, Charity, Compassion, &c. which none but the supreme Judge ², or an Arbitrator chosen on purpose, has Authority to apply.

If it be doubtful under which of these two Qualifications the Arbitrator is chosen, he ought to suppose himself tyed up to those Rules, which a Judge would be obliged to follow; for it is for want of a Judge and Judicature that he is called in: And, in a doubtful Case, we ought to take that side which is clearest ³. Besides, an Arbitrator can't so easily act unjustly, if he has a limited, as if he has an absolute Power delegated to him. Indeed to persuade a Mitigation of the Rigour of the Law is properly their Business, who voluntarily, without entering into any Engagements, interpose as common Friends between the contending Parties.

Now as he that judges between Fellow-subjects, judges according to the municipal Laws of the Place; so he who judges between those who acknowledge no common municipal Laws, ought to judge according to the Law of Nature; unless the Parties submit their Cause to the positive Laws of some particular State.

VI. The same Grotius ^c observes also, that an Arbitrator, chosen by the supreme Authority, ought to take Cognizance of the Merits of the Cause, and not of the Possession; for it belongs to the civil Law to determine that, whereas, by the Law of Nature, the Right of Possession follows the Property. Concerning which my Opinion is, that altho' by the Law of Nature and Nations it does not seem necessary, that if a Man be turned out of Possession he should immediately be put in again, before the Merits of the Cause be heard, especially if it can be immediately determined; yet, in many Cases, the Arbitrator ought to make Enquiry who was in Possession, that he may know whom it chiefly concerns to make out

⁴ Ad eo summum quisque cause sue Judicem facit, quemcumque elegit. Plin. Nat. Hist. Præf. f. 47. "Every one makes him, whom he has chosen, the chief Judge of his Cause." Ἦν ὁ τις ἑαυτὸν ἀπὸ συνθέτου δικαστῆς, ὃ ἀρχαῖον ἐπιπέσειον δυνάμει, ἐκ τῆν δίκων ὁ ἰσχυρὸς ἐς ἑαυτὸν ἐπιπέσειον δικαστῆρον. Lucian Abdicat. l. 1. p. 715, &c. Edit. Angl. "If any one pitches upon those to be Judges in his Case, whose Opinion he was not otherwise obliged to stand by, after having made the Choice, he ought to submit to their Determinations." From hence may be brought a Reason of that in QUINCTILIAN, Declam. 372. Judicia tamen judicis rescindi non possunt. "One Decree cannot make void another."

⁵ This is said formally in a Law, where the Arbitrators spoken of are opposed to another sort of Arbitrators, to whose Judgment we are not bound to submit, unless it be conformable to the Rules of Equity. Arbitrorum enim genera sunt duo, unum ejusmodi, ut sive æquum sit, sive iniqum, parere debeamus; quod observatur, cum ex compromisso ad arbitrium itum est; alterum ejusmodi, ut ad boni viri arbitrium redigi debeat. Digest. Lib. 7. tit. 2. Pro Socio, Leg. 76. See the following Laws.

⁶ The Law of the Romans grants in this Case an Exception of Fraud. Arbitrorum ex compromisso sententiæ non obtemperant, si sordes, vel evileus gratia eorum, qui arbitrati sunt, intercessit; adversus filiam tuam agentem ex stipulata, exceptione doli mali uti poteris. Cod. Lib. 2. tit. 56. De receptis Arbitris, Leg. 3.

⁷ So the Digests direct, In impari enim numero idcirco compromissum admittitur, non quoniam consentire omnes facile est, sed quia, etsi dissentiant, invenitur pars major, cujus arbitrio stabitur. Lib. 4. tit. 8. De Receptis, &c. Leg. 17. § 6.

MR. BARR. NOTES on § V.

¹ GROTIUS quotes here a Passage of Seneca, De Benef. Lib. 3. Cap. 7. where he does not treat of Arbitrators, but such subordinate Judges, as the Prætor or Governor ordered for the Parties, who were obliged to follow the Forms prescribed them strictly, or the Maxims of Equity, according to which the Cause respected an Affair of strict Justice, or of Honesty. See Mr. NODD'S Treatise, De Jurisdict. & Imperio, Lib. 1. Cap. 13.

² This is what the Emperor Constantine expressly speaks of, in this Law quoted by Mr. HERTIUS: Inter acquitatem jusque interpositam interpretationem nobis solis, & oportet, & licet inspicere. Cod. Lib. 1. tit. 14. De Legibus, &c. Leg. 1. See the preceding Chapter, § 21. Note 5.

³ So the Digests speak, Semper in obscuris, quod minimum est, sequimur, Lib. 1. tit. 17. De Div. Reg. Jur. Leg. 9.

^a Vide L. 7. t. 2. l. 76, &c. D. pro Socio.

^b Vide Grot. L. 3. c. 20. f. 46. n. 24

^c D. l. f. 48.

his Title. ¹ For the Plaintiff ought to have very clear Proofs to support his Pretensions, whereas it is enough for the Defendant to confute the Arguments of his Adversary; tho' sometimes it may be convenient, over and above, to shew his own Title also. However 'tis not sufficient for the Arbitrator to give Judgment concerning the Possession only, for that is generally out of dispute, and seldom brought before him; but his business is to examine into the Merits of the Cause, and by a final Determination to put an End to the Suit. But while the Cause is depending, no Innovations ought to be made; and, if the Plaintiff can't make out his Pretensions, Judgment ought to be given for the Party in Possession.

VII. But Mediators, who, interpose between contending Nations, either preparing, or actually engaged in War, and endeavour, by their Authority and their Arguments and Intreaties, to bring them to Terms of Accommodation, are not properly *Arbitrators*². These having so pious a Design in hand cannot be obstinately rejected, without the greatest Inhumanity, even altho' they should appear to be more intimately allied to either Party. For the other still has Liberty either to accept or refuse what they offer: And it is the chief Business of a Friend, where he cannot join in the Quarrel, to endeavour to bring it to an amicable Composition. Besides, it is frequently the Interest of a Prince, to prevent War from breaking out between Nations; for some Sparks of the Fire, kindled in his Neighbourhood, may possibly reach him; and, besides, it may be dangerous for him to have both, or either of the Parties entirely ruined; and therefore, as he values his own Safety, he ought to endeavour might and main to hinder the Flame from coming to a Head. And the more earnestly ought Christians thus to labour in composing Differences, because even the Alcoran^b (how senseless soever it be in other things) does wisely in commanding, that if two Mahometan Nations go to War, the rest shall interpose, and force the Aggressor to make Satisfaction, and after that oblige both to live in Friendship and Amity for the future.

'Tis certain, that if it be the Interest of several to have the Quarrel made up, they may enter into Compact jointly to labour for Peace; and if their Endeavours should prove unsuccessful, they may then mutually prescribe to one another, how far each shall make himself a Party in the War. But this only, in case none of them has any Pre-engagement upon him to assist either of the Parties, in case of War; for such an Obligation can't be limited by a Treaty made afterwards with a third Person.

Moreover, two or more, whom it concerns to have an End put to the War, after having weighed the Pretensions of each side, may lawfully agree upon what Terms a Peace ought to be concluded, and then offer them to the Parties with a Manifesto, that they will join Forces against him that refuses them. For a Prince does not, by this Means, obtrude his Arbitrage upon another against his Will; nor decides another's Quarrel by his own Authority (both which are Enroachments upon the Liberty of Nature) nor are those Terms offer'd to the Parties so, as if they were oblig'd to comply with them. But since, by the Law of Nature, a Man may join Forces with him, who, he thinks, has receiv'd an Injury, especially if the Consequence of it is likely to redound to his Damage; by such a Method as this he openly declares for Equity and Peace, that he is desirous others would act fairly, and that he is not willing to enter into a War, before the adverse Party has rejected the Proposals of Peace^c.

And this sort of Mediation is the more commendable, if it puts an End to a War, that would prove destructive to one or both Parties; yet he, who makes himself a Mediator, should take care that he be able to compel by Force, that Party which refuses to stand to his Determination^d.

VIII. How the Form and Process of a Debate before an Arbitrator is to be manag'd, common Sense will best direct, according to the different Circumstances of the Thing; for it would be impertinent to give tedious Directions how each Party ought to open his Cause, how to state the Question, how, after the Arguments on both sides have been weighed, the Sentence ought to be pronounced: We need only observe, that if the Pretensions on one side cannot be made out but by Deeds, and they happen to be lost, the Arbitrator has nothing to do, but, with the Consent of the other Party, to give him his Oath^e: I say, with the Consent of the other Party; for else, in the Liberty of Nature, no Man is obliged to put the Issue of his Cause upon another Man's Conscience. It is also in the Power of the Parties to refer themselves to the Decision of a Lot, or a² Duel, as has formerly been practis'd among many Nations.

However, I do not see how the³ Loss of my Deeds can extinguish my Right; indeed I cannot have Justice done me in the civil Court, being

Mr. BARR. NOTES on § VI.

¹ See the D. de appoint. Ex parte controversiæ Possessionis hic est, tantum, ut prius prononciat Judex, uter possideat: ita enim fiet, ut h. 7. dicitur eod. de possessione, Pettitoris partibus fungatur, & tunc de Domino queratur. Lib. 41. tit. 2. De acquirendâ, vel amittendâ possessione. Leg. 35. Besides, as there are sometimes great Presumptions for one of the Parties, Equity requires, if he hath been, for Example, dispossessed by an unjust Force, he should be again put in Possession without a strict Examination of the Petitioner, which may be long and intricate, that the Detainer, during that Time, may not enjoy peaceably the Fruits of his Force, and the Advantage of the Possession. See Mr. TITIVS's Observ. on LAUTERBACH, Obs. 1071.

Mr. BARR. NOTES on § VII.

¹ The Words of VELLEIUS PATERCULUS are, Festinationem itineris ejus [Cæsaris] aliquandiu morata Mussilia est, fide melior, quam consilio prudentioris interpositæ principum armorum arbitria captans, quibus illi debent interponere, qui non parentem coercere possunt. Lib. 2. Cap. 50. See Mr. BOECLER's Discourse, entitled, Quies in turris, which is the 34 of Tom. 1. pag. 996, &c.

Mr. BARR. NOTES on § VIII.

¹ See Lib. 4. Chap. 2. § 21. foregoing.

² See Lib. 8. Chap. 8. § 5. following.

³ See Lib. 3. Chap. 6. § 16. foregoing.

⁴ Vide Galerianum. Hist. l. 4. where is debated whether Hercules Duke of Ferrara should perform the Part of an Arbitrator or Mediator, between the Venetians and the Florentines. ⁵ Cap. de Clausuris. ⁶ Vide L. 3. l. 4. c. 19. at the End. Jur. l. 6. c. 6. n. 1. ⁷ Vide Vell. Patere. l. 2. c. 50. Leg. l. 9. c. 14.

not able to produce sufficient Evidence; but, in the Liberty of Nature, 'tis enough to justify me in the Prosecution, if I be fully convinced of my Right, tho' I be not able to make out my Pretensions to another ^a.

IX. This Arbitrators have in common with Judges, that, in the Examination of Matters of Fact, they ought to shew themselves equal to the bare Asseveration of each Party, i. e. when they contradict one another, to believe neither. But when Deeds ^b, Arguments, and undeniable Instruments can't be produced, they must then give Judgment according to the Testimony of Witnesses ^c.

And these Witnesses ought to shew themselves indifferent towards either Party, and not to let Favour, or Hatred, or Revenge weigh more with them than their Conscience ^d. Thuanus ^e relates, that heretofore in Great-Britain an English Man could not be a Witness against a Scot, nor a Scot against an English Man, by reason of the Enmity between the two Nations: But Cambden ^f tells us, that this obtain'd only between the bordering Scots and English; so that if never so many English Men should, with their open Eyes, see a Scot commit Murder, their Testimony would signify nothing, unless some Scot or other testified the same Thing.

And therefore as my Adversary may refuse to admit of my near Relations as Witnesses ^g; so may I except against my profess'd Enemies. Indeed sometime Relations are excus'd upon a Principle of Humanity, for fear they should be forced to offer Violence, either to their Affections, or to their Conscience. And ^h therefore the Roman Law never oblig'd the Client to be Evidence against his Patron, nor the Patron against his Client ⁱ: But besides this, there was another very good Reason why Servants should not be allowed to give Evidence against their ^k Masters ^h; for, as Cicero says, If that which is done in our own House, and among our selves, were permitted to be publicly exposed and brought against us, the Master would be the Slave, and the Slave Master. Indeed Theodoric ^l forbid the Abuse of this Law by an Edict; for some bought up other Peoples Servants, who were conscious of their Crimes, lest they should be brought as Evidence against them. Lastly, it is very reasonable, that ^m no Cause should stand or fall by the Credit of any one single Witness ^k, not only because one may more easily be deceived or corrupted than many, and there is no Falseness so impudent, but may get the Assistance of one Witness ^l; but also because an able understanding Judge may discover the Witnesses to be false, by opposing to one another the Examinations of several ^m, whereas one may easily be consistent with himself; and altho' by this Means some Crimes must remain unpunish'd in this World, and some must lose their just Right, who perhaps have but one Witness to support it; yet this Inconvenience is not so great, as if every one's Life and Fortune lay at the Mercy of any one Man's Impudence and Villany; for 'tis better that a few guilty Persons should escape Punishment, than that many innocent should suffer ⁿ.

Yet Selden ^o observes, that against a Gentile the Jews admitted of one Witness as sufficient. And Gratius ^p takes notice, that one Witness was enough, not to condemn, but to inform the Court, and, in pecuniary Matters, to put the Defendant to his Oath. At this Day, among the Moors the Evidence of two honest Men is sufficient, but if the Witnesses be suspected, then twelve Persons are required; for they think as much Credit may be given to twelve, let them be ever so profligate, as to two, be they ever so honest ^q ^r. The Hebrews admitted none to be Witnesses, but such as were of good Reputation; mad Men were excepted against, and Children, till they were thirteen Years of Age; and Thieves, even after they had made Restitution; those too who lived by Gaming, and Publicans who exact more than their due, and such as deal in those Things which deserve Stripes. Among the Turks, those who have made

MR. BARR. NOTES on § IX.

¹ For as Iseus says, Orat. 7. p. 504. 505. Ἄ κριμύτερον καὶ τὸ εἶναι μάρτυρας ἢ εἶναι. "Arguments are better than Witnesses." And, in Orat. 3, he shews, That in Matter of Inheritances particularly, Deeds are preferable to Witnesses. Philos. Jud. de Deed. p. 764. Ed. Par. "If Arguments and Writings be wanting, the Controversy must be decided by Witnesses." See Lex Wisigoth. l. 2. t. 4. c. 3.

² There were, nevertheless, certain Cases excepted, as well for the Criminal as for the Citizen. See Mr. NODD's Probabilia Juris, Lib. 3. Chap. 5, 6. as also the Interpreters on CICERO'S Orat. pro Milone, Chap. 22.

³ Pro Rege Deputar. Chap. 11. Lucian in Astin. Tom. 2. Page 80. Edit. Anst. "Servants must needs know both the Good and the ill Things of their Masters." There is such another Passage in LYSIAS, Orat. de furo. Oloro. inano. Plant. Barch. At. 4. Sc. 6. ver. 20, 21. I know I am a Slave, and therefore I am ignorant of even that which I know." See a Passage in ISOCRATES TRAPEZ. de fide quaestionum, pag. 634, &c. and Aristot. Rhet. ad Alex. Chap. 17. Hither may be refer'd the History, or rather the Fable, of Arion, in Gabriel. Sionit. de urbibus & moribus Oriental. c. 3. See Lex Wisigoth. Lib. 5. Tit. 4. Chap. 14. with which may be compared, ibid. lib. 3. tit. 4. chap. 10. and lib. 6. tit. 4. chap. 3. and Capitulare Caroli, lib. 7. chap. 280. Edictum Regis Theodor. chap. 48, 46, 101.

⁴ So the Code orders, Et nunc manifestè juremus, ut unius omnino testis responsio non audiatur, etiam si præclaræ curiæ honor fulgeat. Lib. 4. Tit. 20. De testibus, Leg. 9. § 1. See also the Digests Lib. 48. Tit. 18. De quaestionibus, Lib. 20.

^a Vide Comestag. de Unione Lusitan. l. 5. p. m. 222. To this Purpose is that of Quintilian, Declam. 312. The Condition of Man is miserable, since it seems necessary to have a Witness for every thing we do: Truth has so little Power, and False so little Esteem, as that scarce seems sufficiently proved, which is attested by Two. ^b Vide Sact. Guid. c. 7.

^c ----- cum sint præmia falsi
Nulla, ratam debet testis habere fidem. Ovid Trist. l. 3. El. 10. v. 35, 36.

Add. Lex Wisigoth. l. 2. t. 4. c. 12.

^d Lib. 50. ^e Ad. ann. 1585. ^f V. Aristot. Pol. L. 2. c. 6. ^g Plut. Romul. Lex Wisigoth. l. 5. t. 7.

^h Unles for Incest, as Cicero says, Orat. pro Milone, c. 22. ⁱ Edict. c. 101. And therein re Abuse, d. l. does well call it a foolish Law, If the Accuser brings a Multitude of his Relations as Witnesses, the Accus'd shall be found

Guilt. ^k See Numb. xxxv. 30. Deut. xvii. 6. and xix. 15. ^l Plin. Nat. Hist. l. 8. c. 22. ^m Vide

Susan Hist. v. 51. ⁿ Val. Max. l. 4. c. 1. f. 10, 11. ^o De Jure N. & G. Jo. Heib. l. 7. c. 6. ^p On Deut. xix. 16. ^q What Qualifications are necessary for Witnesses, may be seen in. L. 22. f. 5. l. 2, 3. f. 1, 2, 3, 4. 4.

^r See above, in B. 3. c. 6. f. 16.

a Pilgrimage to Mecca are equivalent to three Witnesses^a. ⁶ Add to this, that one Eye-Witness is worth Ten that have the Fact by Hear-say only. And therefore their Testimony is of no Weight which is built upon the Authority of others.

But tho' the Oath of a Witness creates a great Presumption of the Truth of what he asserts, yet, in the Law of Nature, nothing hinders but that a sworn Witness may be convicted of Perjury; and, if he be so convicted, the Sentence founded upon his Testimony comes to nothing^b: Yet it seems absurd, that the Party concern'd should be permitted to make void the Evidence, by swearing on the other side; for this would not only lay open a great Gap for Perjury, but by reason of contradictory Oaths, the Controversy would remain as uncertain as before. And therefore it is according to its usual Silliness and Impicy, that the Alcoran^c commands him who accuses his Wife of Adultery, and has no Witness to prove it, to swear four times, and the fifth time to imprecate the Curse of GOD upon himself, if what he affirms be not true. And on the other side, it allows the Woman to be clear, if she denies the Charge four times upon Oath, and the fifth time with an Invocation of the Curse of GOD.

X. As for putting the Sentence of the Judge in Execution, we need not say much; for in a State of Nature, if a Man does not of his own Accord perform what is due to me, I may, by all the Power that I myself have, or my Friends can supply me with, force him to it. How far we may carry such violent Proceedings shall be shewed more fully hereafter, when we come to discourse of War. Only here we may observe, that in such an Execution I not only acquire the Property of the Thing adjudged to me, when by any Method whatsoever I have got Possession of it; but moreover, if I cannot get Possession of the Thing itself, I may seize upon any Thing of the same Value, the very Charges of the Execution being reckon'd in, so as to become the rightful Owner of it^d. Indeed the Goods of a Debtor, who becomes such either by his own Contract, or by the Thing it self, or by his Injustice, are look'd upon, in the Law of Nature, as tacitly mortgaged for the Debt; and, if it be not discharg'd, may be justly seized for it; nor is the bare Detention of the Thing enough for the Creditor, for that frequently, has more Trouble than Profit in it; but he must also have full Liberty to dispose of it as he pleases: For my Right is not satisfied, if instead of the Thing, with the Property of which I ought to be invested, I receive nothing but the Custody of another Man's Goods; yet, in such a Case, I ought to signify with what Design I make such Seizure, whether in order to extort from the Debtor my Dues the sooner, or to take the Goods thus seized upon in part of Payment; indeed it seems but reasonable to give the Debtor Liberty to receive his Goods, upon Payment of the Debt. But this Way of Execution is proper to the State of Nature, and has no place in a Civil Constitution^e.

⁶ Pluris est oculus testis unus, quam auriti decem. Plaut. Trucul. Act. 2. Sc. 6. v. 8. "The Ears are less faithful than the Eyes." Lucian de Domo.

⁷ Ὁ δὲ θεὸς ἢ παρὰ τοῦ ἀκούοντος πολιτῶν ἀναξίον ἐπιφέρει νόμον, ἀλλ' ἢ μὴ μαρτυρεῖν, ὅτι φέρεται τὸ δικασθῆναι αὐτὸς παρὰ τὸ δικασθῆναι παρὰ τοῦ. Philo Jud. de Corrupt. Linguarum, pag. 340. B. C. Edit. Paris. "In a well-regulated Commonwealth the Laws take Care, that what is given upon hear-say shall not go for Evidence. For such a Testimony is naturally liable to Corruption. The Eye is apprised of the Things themselves, and in a manner intermeddles with Business, and perceives all by Light, by which every Thing is illustrated and discovered: but the Ear has less Credit, as having to do not with the Things themselves, but with Rumours, which do not always mind the Truth, Id. de Jndice. p. 719."

^a Vide Chr. Richer. de moribus Turcarum.

^b The Attick Laws allow, that, after the Sentence, an Action of Perjury may be brought against the Witness, as is plain from Demosth. Orat. in Euergum, in the Beginning. Add Plat. de leg. l. 11. about the End.

^c Cap. de Lumine.

^d For as Grotius observes, l. 2. c. 7. s. 2. Expletive Justice, when it cannot get the Thing it self, demands an Equivalent, which morally speaking is the same.

^e Vide L. 41. t. 2. l. 5. D. de acquir. possess. l. 47. t. 8. l. 2. f. 18. D. de vi bonorum raptorum, § L. 4. t. 2. l. 13. D. quod metus causa, § L. 48. t. 7, & c. L. 7, 8. D. ad l. Juliam de vi privata.

OF THE

LAW of NATURE

AND NATIONS.

BOOK VI.

CHAP. I.
Of MATRIMONY.

- | | |
|--|--|
| I. The Coherence. II. Matrimony the Propagation of Mankind. III. Whether there be an Obligation to marry. IV. A wandering Lust opposite to the Law of Nature. V. Mankind not to be propagated but by Marriage. VI. What Obligation may be laid on Men to marry by the Laws of Nations. VII. What it is by the Law of Nature. VIII. How far the Laws of Nations may order concerning Marriage. IX. The disorderly Marriages of the Amazons. X. The Laws and Rights of a regular Marriage. XI. Whence arises the Man's Power over the Wife. XII. Whether it be bestowed immediately by God. XIII. Whether it necessarily implies a Power of Life and Death. XIV. Whether Consent, not Bedding, makes the Marriage. XV. No Woman may marry more than one Husband. XVI. Polygamy in use among many People. XVII. XVIII. Whether it be repugnant to the Law of Nature. XIX. The true nature of Marriage is for one Man and one Woman to be joined together. | XX. It is not lawful rashly to part Man and Wife. XXI. Adultery and wilful Desertion make a Marriage void. XXII. Whether an intolerable Ill-nature is a Reason for Divorce. XXIII. The Opinion of some Men, about the Sense of the Law of God about Divorce. XXIV. Particularly of Mr. Milton. XXV. Marriage requires suitable Qualifications of Nature. XXVI. An Error concerning Matrimony. XXVII. A marry'd Woman can't rightly marry another. XXVIII. Marriages with near Kindred, why forbidden? XXIX. How it comes to pass that Men are ashamed of their Genitals. XXX. Of Nakedness. XXXI. The original of natural Shame. XXXII. Marriages between Parents and Children wicked. XXXIII. The Opinion of the Jews about it. XXXIV. Of the Marriages of Brothers and Sisters. XXXV. Of the other Degrees forbidden. XXXVI. Of secondary Wives. |
|--|--|

IT follows in course that we examine the Original and Nature of human Government, and that we observe what Precepts of the Law of Nature and Nations do presuppose it. But in as much as Government cannot otherwise be conceiv'd than between several Persons, and since the Holy Scriptures inform us, that in the Beginning GOD Almighty created one only human Pair, the Original Parents of our Race; it may seem ne-

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on Chap. I. § I.

¹ The Connexion is something different, and perhaps better in his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and a Citizen, lib. 2. chap. 2. where the Author follows the Notion, which he had before propounded: Lib. 1. Chap. 1. § 7. and says, That he passes to the Consideration of the Accessory States; i. e. to them which are consequent upon some human Act, which he reduces to four: viz. Marriage, the Relations of Father and Mother, Master and Servant, and the Members of a Kingdom.

necessary, ² before we proceed in our Enquiry about Civil Power, to consider the Relation of Matrimony; which being the Source of Private Families, does, by consequence, supply Matter for the composing of all Sovereignties and States. For as the Body of Man is made up of divers Members, each of which consider'd by it self, hath likewise in some sort the Appearance of a Body; so States are form'd out of lesser Societies, of which some are call'd Simple and Primary, others Compound, and as it were Collegiate. Of the first Sort are three, according to the threefold Power of a Husband, of a Father, and of a Master. And these bear the Name of Simple, not because they consist of no more than two Persons, as some maintain ^a, but because they are not compounded of inferior Societies. For why may not one Father have more Children, and one Master more Servants, and yet the Societies thus constituted be as truly simple, as if each Father had but a single Child, each Master but a single Servant ^b?

II. To go on then; so soon as Man was rendered obnoxious to Mortality, lest the Duration of so noble a Species should be confin'd to a single Age, or should require the constant Miracle of new Creations to preserve it in Succession, it pleas'd the most wise GOD to provide against these Inconveniences ^c; by enduing the two different Sexes with a natural Power of Propagating their Kind. And lest they should forbear so necessary a Work, either out of Negligence, or upon Apprehension of the great Pain of Bearing, and the great Trouble of Educating their Off-spring; he implanted in each Sex a most passionate Love, a most ardent Propension towards the other, with a most deep and tender Affection for their Common Issue; that so they might not only willingly, but joyfully contribute their Service to the Preservation and the Continuance of Human Race ^e.

III. The first Point of Enquiry concerning Matrimony must be, Whether Men, in all respects fit for such a Condition, lie under any Obligation of entering upon it? For about this Action, as likewise about others, to which Men are inclined by a natural Appetite, as Self-preservation, and the Love and Education of Off-spring, many have rais'd a Scruple, as if they were not under the Care and Cognizance of the Law of Nature. For, say these Authors, what need was there of a farther Engagement to such Performances, as the Sensitive Appetite, and Instinct did with sufficient Strength incite and drive us to before? But indeed their Dependence on natural Instinct is so far from proving them to be uncommanded by the Law of Nature, that it rather argues a more peculiar and more earnest Care in Nature to have them observ'd with the utmost Strictness, as the immediate Causes of the Safety and Welfare of Mankind; whilst distrustful, as it were, the bare Force of Reason, she assists and seconds it with so violent an Instinct, that Men cannot, without great Difficulty, bend the contrary way ^d. Where should we find a Man ^f who would venture the common Vexation of Children, were he not led to desire them, as well by a Natural Inclination ^e, as by the sober Advice of Reason? especially since the means of obtaining them are such, as would ² PLATO says, That if we will make good Laws, we must begin to regulate Marriages well. Γαμποὶ δὲ νόμοι πρότερον κινδυνώσκειν πειράσκει, καὶ οὐκ ἂν πείσεται πρὸς ἰσότητά παρὰ πύλας. De Legib. lib. 4. p. 835. Edit. Wech. Ficin. See also Dion. Halicarn. Antiq. Rom. Lib. 2. Cap. 24. p. 91. There is a Fragment of Hierocles's, which deserves, to be recited here, where that Philosopher says, That nothing is more necessary to be treated on than Marriage, because Mankind is born for Society, and Marriage makes the first and most simple of all Societies; for, adds he, there can't be a City without Families, nor can any Family be complete, unless the Head of it be marry'd. Ἀναγκαιωτάτος ὄντιν ὁ πρὸς τῷ Γάμῳ λόγος. Ἄπαν γὰρ τὸ ἡμῶν τὸ γένος ἔσται πρὸς κοινωνίαν. Πρώτη δὲ τῆς κοινωνίας οὐκ ἔστιν ἡ κοινωνία, ἢ κατὰ τὴν γάμον. Οὐτε γὰρ πόλεις ἂν ἦσαν, μὴ ἔντων ἕκαστον. Οὐκ ἔστιν ἡμετέρας τῆς πόλεως ὁ πρὸς τῷ ἀγαθῷ. Hierocles De Nuptiis apud Stob. Serm. 65. p. 300. Ed. Hier. Needham.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § II.

¹ Some Divines having quarrell'd with our Author for what he says here, he answers them thus in his Specimen Controversiarum circa jus Naturale, &c. Chap. 3. § 7. When God, who knows all things, foresaw that Man would inevitably become subject to Death, he dispos'd things by this infinite Wisdom from the Beginning after this manner: That diversity of Sexes should be of use both in the state of Integrity, and of Sin: In the state of Integrity, it was to raise up an holy Seed, to increase the number of the Worshipers of GOD; but after they had sinned, it was to propagate a corrupt Race, that Death which is the Consequence of Sin, might not quite destroy Mankind in the space of one Generation only; the Creator not judging it fit to form a new Root of Innocent Men, and choosing rather, that the Earth should be inhabited by a corrupt Generation, than remain a Desert.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § III.

¹ And would not the Women also reject it on their Part for many Reasons? See Mr BAYLE in his News Letters upon Mr. P. MALMBOURG's Critical History of Calvinism, Let. 16. and Mr. LOCK's Essay upon the Human Understanding. Lib. 2. Chap. 21. § 34.

² Vid. Joh. Frid. Horn. de Civitate, l. 1. c. 1. f. 2. ^b In beginning thus with Matrimony, PLATO himself is our Guide and Director. Let us hear his Managers of the Question, LL. l. 4. Athen. Come, tell me by all that's Good, what Point ought first to fall under the Legislator's Care? Will not Nature teach him to settle, before all things, by good Laws the Affair of Generation and the Origin of Mankind? Clin. Yes no doubt. A. But the Affair of Generation takes its Rise from the Union and Community of Wealth. C. It doth so. A. Why then, if Nuptial Laces be in the first place establish'd, they cannot but have a good Influence on all the future Regulations of the State. ^c My Lord BACON, De Augment. Scient. l. 7. c. 2. observes, that amongst Animals the Pleasure of Generation is greater than that of Feeding.

*Procidit ille maximas mundi parens,
Cum tam rapaces cerneret fati minas,
Ut damna semper sibi reparare nova.*

The wise Creator knew the World was frail,
And order'd quick Succession to repair
Still with new Race the Breaches made by Fate.

----- *Calibem vitam prebet
Sterilis juvenentus; hoc erit, quicquid videt, Unius ævi turba.*

----- Let our barren Youth
Experience their mistaken Chastity,
And all you see must prove a short liv'd Crowd,
A People of a single Age -----

Senec. Hippol. v. 465, &c.

⁴ Ald. Oppian, Cyneget. l. 3. v. 107, &c. Halicut. l. 1. v. 702, &c.

⁵ Vid. Euripid. Medea v. 1090, &c. Hippol.

appear both tedious and despicable to a wife Man, unless attended with some delightful Charm ^a? We acknowledge that there is a great Difference between Instinct and Reason, and that in most Cases those Powers take quite contrary Roads, and that therefore the Licentiousness of the former is to be bridl'd, and controll'd by the Authority of the latter; which to compass and effect is an Argument of a great and worthy Soul. But altho' Instinct hath not in it self the Force of an Obligation, yet it many times happens, that we may, by some superior Engagement, be obliged to undertake a Performance which bare Instinct before inclined us to.

And hence we may infer the falseness of that Position ^b, which asserts, that a Mother who kills her Child to avoid publick Infamy, and so stifles her Instinct of Natural Affection, by another Instinct of Aversion to Shame, is not guilty of a Sin against the Law of Nature. For the Infant's Life was guarded by that Law, as well as by the Instinct of the Mother; and it was her Duty to have known, that her Disgrace was an Evil which ought not to have been weigh'd against the Death of an Innocent, brought into the World by her free Consent. If the Care of her Reputation was dearer to her than the Pleasure of being a Mother, she ought to have consider'd this before she chang'd her pure and spotless Condition. But afterwards, it would be barbarous Injustice to conceal the Sin of the Parent by sacrificing the Child.

When Marriage is once contracted, in as much as the Gift of Fruitfulness is not confer'd by human Power ^c, a greater or a lesser Number of Children equally answers the Obligation of Nature. Nor should the Wife's Barrenness raise any Scruple in the Husband, as if he had been wanting in his Duty to the World ^d.

IV. To carry on our Enquiries as clearly as may be, this in the first Place we take to be most evident, that all those impure Pleasures are repugnant to the Law of Nature, which aim at no other End than the Satisfaction of Brutal Lust. For the more warmly the Appetite of Love stirs in human Breasts, the more is Nature and Reason concern'd to provide, that the Irregularities of its Motions do not prejudice that comely Order, which is the very Life of Society; and that it be rather made to contribute to the Maintenance of Decency and Peace. Whence appears the most detestable Sinfulness of those Pollutions which we so justly call Unnatural ^e.

But the Sin of Uncleanliness is not confin'd to those gross Degrees; many grievous Violations of Chastity there may be in what we are wont to term the ordinary way of Nature; and these happen as often as we pursue our Pleasure, without regarding the only just End of it, the due Conservation of our Race. It hath indeed been asserted, that many Nations of old thought it a part of natural Liberty to prosecute an amorous Entertainment, without being ^e tied by the Rules of Matrimonial Strictness. But 'tis sufficiently manifest, that if all Men should make a constant use of this irregular Freedom, human Society could not long subsist, either in a graceful, or in a quiet Condition ^f. And therefore, according to Bishop Cumberland's most true Rule

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § IV.

¹ PLINY speaks of the two sorts of infamous Copulations, as well as of the Abortions which Women cause by Medicines, to hide their unchast Lives, as Crimes unnatural, and more than beastly. In hominum genera caritatis gratia, etiam in excogitata, omnia scelere naturæ; fœminis vero abortus. Quantum in hac parte nulli nocentiores, quam sine lege. Nat. Hist. Lib. 10. Chap. 63. see Phœnyliæ, Æschines's Orat. in Timarch. Diogenes Chrysoſtom. Orat. de Palæſtrac. Salluſt. P. 7. 9. quæſt. Tho. Hyde, Martia. Lib. 1. Epig. xci. In Peru (as Garcilasso de la Vega reports in his History of the Incas, Lib. 3. Chap. 13.) the Name of Sodomy was so abominable, that if any one in the heat of a Quarrel reproached another with that Vice, he liv'd in disgrace all his Days: Yet it was so common among the Greeks, that Plato (de Legibus, Lib. 7.) found it very hard to banish it out of his Commonwealth. The Turks also, who otherwise detest it, allow it with such fair Breasts as they have made their Prisoners, as if War licensed them to do what they list with them. Scipio Annimat. Diss. Lib. 5. Chap. 5.

² Mr. BARBEYRAC's Second Note upon this Section is chiefly contained in the Letter. ^d and ^e following.
³ The matter is clear in it self, and will not bear Enlargement. Mr. THOMASUS in his Jurisp. Divin. Lib. 3. Cap. 2. had granted, that by the Law of Nature only it could not be prov'd that Bestiality, Sodomy, wandering Lusts, &c. in a word, all Use of the natural Parts only for Pleasure, is unlawful absolutely; and that to prove it a Crime, recourse must be had to the Laws of God which are purely positive and general: but that able Lawyer afterwards rectify'd his Opinion by distinguishing what's just from what's honest, and so in the main agreed with our Author. See his Fundamenta Jur. Nat. & Gent. Lib. 3. Chap. 2. § 6, 7, 21, &c.

^a Add. Val. Max. l. 7. c. 2. f. 1. Extern. Montaigne Essays, l. 3. c. 5. p. m. 137. Cartes de Passions. Art. XC.
^b Vid. Grawinkel ad Grot. l. 1. c. 1. f. 11. ^c Genes. xxx. 1, 2. ^d Senec. l. 2. Cont. 13. Franklin's debt not come at all Pleasure, nor at the time fix'd for it in our Account; Nature is absolutely at her own Disposal; and not tied up by human Laws: Sometimes she hastens and outruns our Wishes; sometimes she proceeds slowly, and disappoints them with her Delay. Nature doth not work by Form, nor is Chance confin'd to Rules and Prescriptions. The Law may appoint a set Day, but Nature takes no notice of the Expiration. ^e Thus Mr. Salluſt. De J. N. & G. sec. Heb. L. 5. c. 4. shews from the Jeruzalem Rabbies, that before the Mosaic Law it was allowable for a Woman, not yet married nor betroth'd, to bestow herself, either gratis, or upon Consideration of a Reward, without the Confinement of Cohabitation. Whereas the succeeding Institution absolutely forbid circumcised Persons to use any Community of Bed, without entering on a married State: though if this were practis'd between a circumcised Person and a Heathen, it was, in some Cases, adjudg'd lawful. To which purpose they cite, Deut. xxiii. 18. Levit. xix. 29. Genes. xxxviii. 14. &c. Add. Grot. ad Genes. xx. 9. The Reason given by Maimonides for this Prohibition is, that the Contentions and other Evils usually occasion'd by these irregular Liberties, might be avoided, and that Good of certain Notes and Distinctions of Families procur'd. 'Tis not necessary to appeal to the Testimony of Heathen Writers, yet see Epiet. Enchir. c. 47. Plaut. Cureul. Act. 1. Sc. 1. c. 33, Sc.

P. H. Quin leno hic habitat. P. A. L. Nemo hic: prohibet nec vetat, Quin quod palam est venale, si argentum est, emas. Nemo ire quenquam publica prohibet via, Dum ne per fundum septum facias semitam. Dum tece abſtineas nupta, vidua, virgine, Juventute, & pueris liberis; ama quod lubet.

P. H. "As I take it, here lives my worthy Procurer. P. A. L. "We have a fair Market; if you bring Money in your "Pocket, you are free to buy any thing but prohibited "Goods. No Body hinders you from travelling in the "High-way, so long as you don't break Hedges and In- "closures: and in the same manner so long as you re- "frain from Wives, Widows, Virgins, Youth, and Free- "men's Sons, you may chuse love as you list.

That

^a That in which it is impossible for all Men to agree cannot be according to right Reason.

Nor was the Command of Natural Law, as to this Point, so quite worn out amongst those very Nations, which allow'd a publick Security to such Practices, as that they really approv'd of what they permitted, or absolv'd the Actors from all Marks of Disgrace. 'Tis a famous Aphorism of Ulpian, that a Whore is Vile, or Wicked, by her Profession; and the Romans thought it a sufficient Punishment to these loose Ladies, to make them shew their License in Publick before the Magistrates, and thus to stand infamous on Record ^b. The Principle then, on which those States and People proceeded, who conniv'd at such youthful Disorders, was, by the means of these publick Traders in Lewdness, to preserve and guard the private Chastity of Virgins and of honest Matrons. In warmer Climates, the Extravagance of wild Gallants ^c might have injur'd the most sacred Modesty, had it not been diverted by a Tribe of forward Nymphs, who were proud of their Addressees, and met them in their irregular Designs. This, however, is manifest, that the same Nations which extenuated rather than defended these Immoralities, as no more than harmless Failings, and pardonable Slips of Youth, did yet, at the same time, assert in the highest Degree the just Honour of the Marriage-Bed, and esteem'd Faithfulness to it, as a Mark of singular Sanctity and Goodness.

V. A diligent Observer of human Nature will easily discover how extravagantly Unreasonable it is, that Mankind should be propagated by Chance-Beds, without Confinement, and Rule ^d. Such a Life, they tell us, the People of Attica led before the time of Cecrops, cohabiting like a Herd of Beasts, under no regard to Decency or Distinction. Whoever was made a Mother by so wide a Provision, presented her Medley Off-spring to any one of the many Fathers who would be pleas'd to own and to accept it. When Cecrops, by the institution of Matrimonial Laws, had banish'd this barbarous Custom, he pass'd, in Fables with the common People, for a kind of an Hermaphrodite; either because he taught them to know their Fathers, as well as their Mothers; or because, by the conjugal Tie, he incorporated as it were two in one ^d.

Who is there that can pretend to be insensible how little Difference would be left between Beasts and Men, should the Ordinances of Marriage be universally cancell'd and repeal'd? Indeed the Beasts would then have the Advantage of the Comparison ^e. They are frequently observ'd to use some sort of Constancy in their way of Love, and some Semblance of Conjugal Fidelity. And if the fair Mistress raise a Quarrel in the Herd, 'tis only at certain Seasons of the Year, when they feel a Warmth beyond their ordinary Temper. But Men would be perpetual Rivals; and human Race would be confounded and destroy'd by so wild a Method of its Preservation. Again, How miserably weak and helpless would be the Condition of the breeding Mothers? Or, if they weather'd out that Danger, how great would be the Trouble, how high the Charges of Education, above their single Strength, or single Fortune? It is plain, the Men would not be over-forward to assist them under either of these Burthens; not in the First, unless they knew themselves to have been the Cause of their Pain; not in the Second, unless they could be assur'd, that the Child to be provided for was their own. And 'tis not likely, that they should be able to obtain any Certainty in these Points, without the regular Restraints of Marriage. For what Aristotle ^f reports of a Nation in Africa ^g, where the Wives are held in common, but the Children distinguish'd and appropriated, by the Likeness of Features, is at best a very deceitful Method. Tho' indeed Theocritus ^h makes the Tokens of an Adulteress τένια ἔπος' ἐνόματα πατρὶ, Children unlike the Husband; and Horace's Wish for the Roman Chastity is, Laudentur simili prole puerpera, "Let the Women deserve Commendation, for picturing the legal Father in the Child.

Lastly, Since without Matrimonial Prescriptions we cannot well suppose any such thing as Families, nor without Families any publick States; and since therefore the whole Order and Harmony of civil Life is founded on these Regulations, it is most clear that were Men entirely releas'd from such Bonds, they must live in an unsoeiable, separate Condition, little better than Brutal. And therefore Horace shew'd his true Judgment in deriving the Calamities of his Country:

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § V.

^a Dialy. Lib. 41. vers. 382.

^b Of the Law of Nature, c. 5. f. 46. ^c Tacitus of Vitellia, Ann. L. 2. c. 85. That Youth in Quintilian (Decl. 14.) was arriv'd at the highest Pitch of Impudence, who forms a publick Accusation against his Miss, for giving him a Potion that suppress'd his Love. Amongst other of his Rants, this is one, I had just enough to furnish my self with a moderate and sparing Measure of unforbidden Joys, sufficient for the Necessities of Life. Therefore instead of a Wife, I was content with a Mistress, and with a single Mistress, which is a most certain Sign of Frugality and good Management in Pleasure. ^e V. Cicero pro Caelio. c. 17. &c. Epist. Enchir. c. 47. Add Mason. in Stobaeus, Serm. VI. Grot. in Math. v. 27. The Mahometans allow Fornication with their Maids; which the more virtuous Indians do, in all Shapes, and on all Accounts, detest. Plutarch (de Virtut. Mulier.) reports, that among the People of Cbios, for the space of seven hundred Years together, there was no mention made of Adultery, or any other unchast Practice; though the Island was famous for Beauties. ^d Athenaeus, l. 13. c. 1. ^e Quintil. Instit. Orat. l. 9. c. 2. "Tho' Dido in Virgil complains of her late unhappy Match, "yet her real Thoughts could not but break out, and she declares in the midst of the Lamentation, that a Life absolutely without Marriage was the proper Condition of Beasts, not of Men.

*Non licuit thalami expertem sine crimine vitam.
Degerere more feræ?*

Æneid. 4. 550.

^f P.L. B. 2. c. 2.

^g Who perhaps are the same that Nicol. Damascen. (de Mor. Gent.) calls Limyrii.

^h Ilyl. 17.

*Fœcunda culpa secula nuptias
Primum inquinavere, & genus, & domos:
Hoc fonte derivata clades
In patriam populumque fluxit.* L. 3. Od. 6. V.
[17, &c.]

First those Flagitious Times
(Pregnant with unknown Crimes)
Conspired to violate the Nuptial Bed;
From which polluted Head
Infectious Streams of crowding Sins began,
And thro' the spurious Breed and guilty Nation ran.

My Ld Roscommon.

To all which Considerations we may add, that without a Successor, in way of Marriage, no Man could be born to an Estate or Inheritance; and should we take away these Advantages, human Life would be depriv'd of its chief Ornaments, if not of its necessary Supports. 'Tis remarkable what Justin^a relates of the Parthenia amongst the Spartans; they were born, as the Irony of their Name imports, from promiscuous and irregular Embraces, and being grown up to a Sense of their Shame and of their Poverty, fearing to starve at home thro' Defect of Paternal Fortunes, they were necessitated to leave their Country, and ramble abroad in a Body, to force a Maintenance and a Seat³.

VI. In as much then as it appears evident, beyond Dispute, that in order to the keeping up a comely and a regular Society amongst Men, it is necessary, that the Propagation of human Kind should be settled and limited by Matrimonial Constitutions; we are in the next place to enquire what Obligation particular Persons, of proper Years and Abilities, have, to engage in a married State. And here we may first take a View how the Matter before us hath been order'd by the Laws of People and Governments, and then how far it seems to be determin'd by the bare Law of Nature. It was the Doctrine of the ancient Jews, as Mr. Selden^b informs us, that by the Divine Precept of Increase and Multiply, all their Males were bound to Marry before they had completed twenty Years; unless upon account of some natural Defect, or because they had devoted themselves to a Life of Chastity, and constant Study of the Law. And this Command they said extended to all the Posterity of Noah. They added, that he who buried his Wife, without seeing a Son and a Daughter (and those as Perfect by Nature as their Parents) had not yet fulfill'd the Precept. But that in case a Man's Son and Daughter were dead, and had left Children of both Sexes, the Grandfather was then free. That otherwise, upon Defect of Issue of either Sex, Men were oblig'd to contract new Marriages, so long as their Age would give them leave. And therefore, that if a Man had either taken a barren Wife, or one that was not yet old enough to be a Mother, he did not answer the Law, unless he took another immediately capable of Bearing. Leo Mutinensis^c observes farther, that altho' the bringing of a Son and Daughter into the World, seem'd to be sufficient for the full Observance of that Divine Command, yet a Man of convenient Age and Strength was still bound to seek a married Life, for the avoiding Fornication^d. But whether this Injunction extended to Women, as well as to the Men, was a Point not very well settled and agreed amongst them. It is most probable, that their Judgment was to this purpose, that the Women were not indeed oblig'd to any determinate Time, because it is not in their Power to marry when they will; but that upon the first fair Offer made them, they stood engag'd to contribute their Assistance to the World. 'Tis a Saying amongst the same Doctors, that He who neglects the Precept about the Multiplication of Mankind, ought to be looked upon as a Murderer^e.

Many other Nations have, in their publick Institutions, declar'd themselves to the same Purpose^f. Plutarch recites a Law of Lycurgus, by which it was Enacted, that old Bachelors should be excluded from the solemn Sports and Dances of the Women; and that in the Winter Season they should go naked up and down the Forum, singing a Song in Dishonour of themselves, the Burthen of which was, that They owned themselves to be thus justly punish'd, for disobeying the Ordinances of their Country. And that, besides all this, they should have none of those honourable Marks of Respect and Duty paid them, which the younger Spartans were otherwise oblig'd to pay to the elder. Upon this last account Dercyllidas, a Famous, but unmarried General, desiring a younger Person, according to Custom, ³ Servius (ad 3. Æn. v. 551.) & Lactantius (de fals. relig. c. 20.) vary somewhat in the Relation of this Story. Hither may be refer'd most of the common Arguments urged against PLATO's Community of Wives. Add. Stob. Serm. LXV. "Cyrus, King of Persia, having by a Publick Ordinance commanded the promiscuous Use of Wives and Women, his Subjects "rose in Rebellion and expell'd him the Kingdom. Procop. Hist. Pers. l. 1. c. 5. Agath. l. 4. Plato de LL. l. 4. p. 835. Every Man, who arrives at the Age of thirty Years, ought to choose him out a Wife; considering with himself, that Mankind is by a kind of natural Desire prompted to a Pursuit of Immortality; there being no Person who is not Ambitious of keeping a perpetual Name and Memory with succeeding Ages. Now the Way by which human Race obtains an endless Duration, is by leaving an uninterrupted Course and Series of Posterity. It cannot but be highly criminal, for a Man to rob himself of Immortality through his own Default; yet whoever neglects the Affairs of Marriage and Issue, voluntarily throws away his Title to this invaluable Benefit. CICERO (de Finib. &c. l. 3. c. 20.) observes, that in order to a Man's living as his Nature directs and enjoins, it is convenient, that he apply his Mind to the Choice of a Partner, and the Desire of Posterity. PHILIP BALDEUS (de Helat. Ind. Gent. p. 2. c. 5) reports of the People of Benjin, "that they look on it as the basest Reproach to want Children: Such a Par-son (they say) is not worthy to see a Man first in a Morning.

^a L. 3. c. 4. ^b De J. N. & G. lib. 5. c. 3. ^c De rit. Hebr. p. 4. c. 2. ^d Plato (de LL. l. 11.) delivers the like Opinion, and adds, One of each Sex is the least Number of Children that ought to pay for sufficient. ^e Yet the Sect of the Essenes amongst them utterly forswore the use of Women. Vid. Plin. N. H. l. 5. c. 17. Solin. c. 38. ^f Varro, in Leg. Mænia apud Nonium in Eunuchare. He that destroys his Country, his greater Parent, is most inexorably guilty: And this every one does so far as in him lies, who either disables himself from being a Father, or defers to act as such. See the Sayings of Musonius, Hierocles and Antipater in Stob. Serm. LXV. Add. Arrian in Epictet. l. 3. c. 7. J. Poilux l. 3. cap. μετ' ἀγαυοι, mentions Suits at Law carried on at Athens and Lacedemon, against Celibacy and late Marriage.

to resign his Seat to him at a publick Solemnity, the Youth refus'd, with this smart Reason, Because, says he, you have brought no Son into the World, who might hereafter give place to me ^a. At Rome the Censors somtimes impos'd a Mule (for that Reason call'd Uxorium) upon such Men as had grown old in a single Life ^b. And good Metellus speaks home to the Business, in Gellius, Could we, my Country-men, says he, do together without Wives, we need not give our selves these unnecessary Troubles. But since Nature hath so order'd Matters, that human Life can neither be very free and easy with them, nor possibly subsist without them, we ought rather to consult our perpetual Safety, than our present Conveniency ^c.

It follows from the same Principles ², that it is sinful and unjust to emasculate Persons; at least, without their Consent. Domitian forbid the Performance of this Operation by an express Law ^d. After which, those who had so ridiculous a Design on themselves, or on others, were oblig'd to ask leave of the Emperor, or the President of the Province ^e. Upon what account the Eastern Monarchs were so fond of employing Eunuchs in their nearest Offices, may be seen in Xenophon ^e. To whose Reasons, we may add this one farther, that the Prince could, without Envy or Offence, make himself Heir to these Childless Favourites, and so ingross all they had got in his Service ^f. Amongst the Jews, an Eunuch was not permitted to be a Judge in any Case; upon the Opinion of their excessive Spitefulness and Cruelty. And, in the Indies, 'tis a common Saying, that To castrate Beasts makes them more tame and humble; but the same Experiment tried on Men makes them more Insolent and Intolerable ^g ^h.

Some observe that Eunuchs were first made in those Countries, where Polygamy was permitted; the Number of Men being superior, or at least equal, to the Number of Women. Others maintain that they owe their Original to the Right of War; when a Conqueror sparing the Lives of those he overcame, thought fit to put them into this unmanly Condition, that having lost the Springs of private Interests and Affections, they might, with the more Security be trusted in his Service ⁱ.

VII. If we consider barely the force of natural Law, we shall conclude, that in as much as Matrimony is the great Source ^j, and the main Foundation of a Social Life ^k, Men are so far

Mr. BARP. NOTES on § VI.

² See Cod. Lib. 8. tit. 58. De infirmis pœnis caribus, &c. & Sozomen. Hist. Eccles. Lib. 1. Chap. 9.
³ *Vid. Casaubon. ad Sueton. Domit. cap. 7. & Justin. Mart. Apol. 2. Ad Deuteron xxiii. 1. Joseph. Antiq. Jud. Lib. 4. c. 8. Lib. 27. f. 28. D. ad L. Aquil. Novell. 142. & ib. Dion. Godofred. l. 4. f. 2. l. 5. D. ad Cornel. de Sicariis. Euseb. Evangel. Præp. l. 6. c. 8. In Syria and Osiroene many castrate themselves like the Priests of Cybele. But King Abgarus commanded the Hands of all those, who had abused themselves in this manner, to be cut off: after which Order, the Infamous Practice ceased in that Country. Quintil. Institut. Orat. l. 5. c. 12. For my own part, when I contemplate Nature, there is no Man who seems not more fair and comely to me than our Eunuchs; who are thus abused, purely to render them more beautiful. Providence can never be so negligent of its Work, as to let Infirmiti pass for Excellency: nor can that which would be monstrous, if produced by Nature, be harsher if produced by Art. Let this Cheat, this feign'd Alteration of Sex, delight the Votaries of Lust; yet Vice and Immorality will never be able to gain such an Empire, as to make that Good, which they make Costly and in Request. How Hermetius revenged himself on Panionius, who had thus dismembred him. See HERODOT. URAN.
⁴ See BRISSON. Select. Antiq. Jur. Civil. Lib. 2. Chap. 21. and *Mr. BYNKERSHOEK'S Observat. Jur. Rom. Lib. 4. Chap. 5. p. 355.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § VII.

¹ CICERO fully owns it, and would have every wise Man to marry and have Children, as well as concern himself with the Government of the State. Cum autem ad tuendas, conservandasque homines, hominem natum esse videmus, consentaneum est huic nature, ut sapiens velit gerere, & administrare Rempublicam, atque ut à natura vivat, uxorem adjungere, & velle ex eâ Liberos. De fin. bon. & mal. Lib. 3. Chap. 20. See also PLATO DELEGIBUS, Lib. 4. p. 825. PYTHAGORAS says, that we ought to bring Children into the World, that we may leave after us new Adorers of God. *Ὅτι δὲ τεκνοποιᾶν, δὲ γὰρ ἀναγκαῖον τῶν τῶν ἀγαθῶν ἕνεκα, & ὅτιον, Jambl. de Vit. Pythag. Chap. 18. Num. 83, see also PLATO, ibid. Lib. 6. p. 773. & also HIEROCLES in Stobæus. Serm. 65. & 73. to engage Men to marry; and GATAKER on *Marcus Antoninus, Lib. 8. § 31.

^a Μὴ μὲν ἀγαθῶν, &c. Phocylides.

To live unmarried is to die unmourn'd.
 Add to your Race; see Nature's Gift return'd.

^o Valer. Max. l. 2. c. 9. Festus in Uxorium, & ibid. Jos. Scal. Plutarch reports the same in his Life of Camillus. ^c Postdomus called the Myrians, who admitted no Women amongst them, Ælius, Men without Life, Strabo, l. 7. p. 205. Of the Lex Papia Pappæa, see Lips. ad Tacit. l. 3. Ann. c. 25. & Jacob. Godofred. Which Law the Christian Emperors repealed probably by Advice of the Church-men. Vid. L. 8. t. 58. C. De infirmis pœnis caribus, & Sozomen. l. 1. c. 9. The Speech of Augustus in Dion. Cassius, l. 56. is remarkable on this Subject. Ælian. (V. H. l. 6. c. 6.) recites a Law of the Spartans, enacting, that "If a Man had increas'd the Commonwealth with three Children, he should be releas'd from keeping Watch; with five, from all publick Duties and Charges." See likewise a long Passage of Hierocles in Stobæus, in Serm. 73.
^d Vid. Sueton. Domit. c. 7. Statius, IV. Sylv. ver. 187, 188.

Qui fortem ætat interire Sexum.

Forbids the nobler Sex to feel Decay.

Add. Martil. l. 6. Ep. 2. ^e Cyropæd. l. 7. p. 116 Ed. H. Steph. ^f Heliodor. Æthiop. l. 8. in fin. The Eunuchs are the Ears and Eyes of the Persian Courts; who having neither Children nor Kinsmen to engage their Minds, depend entirely on him that employs them. Claudian. in Eutrop. l. 1.

----- Eunuchus nulla pietate movetur,
 Nec generi nativæ cavet.

----- An Eunuch feels no Tie
 Of Duty, Nature, or of Progeny.

^f Heliodor. l. 9. Eunuchs have ever a great deal of Jealousy in their Tamper; and therefore they make the better Keepers of Women; being then employ'd to hinder others from Pleasures, which they are themselves incapable of enjoying. ^h See Grotius upon Deuteron. xvi. 18. ⁱ Plat. de Leg. Lib. 4. p. 835.

bound to enter upon it, as they stand engaged to all Duties necessary for the attaining of that End: yet Nature lays this Injunction on us in the manner of an Affirmative, Indefinite, Unlimited Command; so as not to oblige necessarily all Men, and at all times; but requiring due Occasion before it exacts our Performance. Now in fixing the Occasion of Matrimony, we are not to rest in the fitness of Age and of Ability, but are likewise to suppose that the Match offer'd us, is answerable to our Birth and Condition, and that we have both competent Wealth to maintain, and competent Prudence to govern a Family ^a. The Laws of the Islanders prohibit Marriage to Persons of extreme Poverty ^b. Sometimes too it happens, that the Condition of the present Times, or the strict Care of a Function incumbent on us, will not give us leave to think of changing our State of Life ^c. And therefore it is not only unnecessary, but senseless and ridiculous, that those young Fools should run a Marriage-hunting, who have neither Means nor Wit to keep a Family from starving; and who, at the best, are only able to stock the Nation with a young Succession of Beggars. Those again deserve not only Excuse, but Commendation, who decline a married State, that they may with more Ease and Opportunity improve and cultivate their Minds, for the publick Service of the World. For since the two great Uses of Matrimony are the Preservation of Race, and the avoiding those fouler Lusts which would stain and disgrace human Society; so long as neither of these Ends is like to be prejudic'd, we ought not to blame a Resolution of single Life in such Persons as probably foresee, that they shall be able thus to do more good to their Country, and to Mankind, than in another Condition. If therefore a brave and generous Soul should either be insensible of the idle Stings of Love, or able easily to master and suppress them ^d, and at the same time, capable of benefiting the World otherwise than by advancing its Stock and Breed; we cannot in reason imagine, that Nature lays any Obligation upon him to let the Charms of the fair Sex hinder or divert his worthy Designs ^e: Especially since there are so very few, who can pretend to this Gift of Chastity; so that the World is in no Danger of coming to an untimely End by their Resolution. Much less ought those Persons to fear Reproach and Censure, who having serv'd Mankind by a former Marriage, decline a second Engagement for the sake of their Children. Tho', on the other side ^f, the Law of Charondas, in Diodorus Siculus, l. xii. c. xii. seems a little too hard, excluding all those Men from the publick Councils of the State, who had brought a Mother-in-law into their Family. The Reason he gave for so severe a Decree was this, He esteem'd it impossible, that a Man should be able to advise well for the Interest of his Country, who had been so far from consulting the good of his own Children. If his first Marriage prov'd successful, he ought to rest satisfied with that Happiness; if unfortunate, he could not be reckon'd in his Wits, for running on a second Danger. But indeed, a second Marriage does not always prove injurious to the Children of a former Bed. And as to the other Part of the Objection, it may be easily retorted. We have something like it in the old Greek Epigram, Ἔστις ἀπαξ γήμας, πάλι δούλεα λέκτρα δικάει,

Ναυηγὸς πλώει δις βυθὸν ἀργαλέον.

*He that escapes one Wife, and ventures on,
Courts a new Ship-wreck, when but half undone.*

To which Harry Stephens has given this ingenious Answer,

Ὅστις ἀπαξ γήμας, πάλι δούλεα λέκτρα δικάει,
Ὅχι βίος κομρῆς ἄξιον ἐδεμῆς.
Ἐὶ κακὴ ἡ προῶτη, πάρα δούλερον ἐκαυῆσαι,
Ἐὶ δ' ἀγαθὴ, ἀγαθὴν ἐλπίδα ἐν τίτ' ἔχει ^g.

*When a stout Widower tries the second Hit,
'Tis hard to blame his Memory or Wit.
This may be Good, if one was bad before;
If Good, kind Heav'n may have as good in store.*

On the other hand, it sometimes falls out; that besides the general Ordinance of Nature, a Man may be obliged by a particular Reason to enter on a married State. As for Instance, suppose a Royal Family should be reduc'd to one only Person, that Person is highly and peculiarly bound to seek an honest and lawful way of increasing his Race, to hinder the Confusion which must follow in the State, upon Default of Succession; and because, as Euripides ^h says, Male Children are the Pillars of great Families. And what we have thus settled, in regard to the Obligation of Matrimony, seems more agreeable to the Nature and Condition of Men, than the Rule which Bishop Cumberland ⁱ lays down, and so largely insists on, that Since the Earth is now well stock'd, Men are left at their Liberty, to choose either a married, or a single Life.

VIII. From these Considerations Judgment may be made, how far the Laws of particular States have Power to streighten, or to loose, the natural Necessity of Marriage. And this in the first Place, is evident beyond Dispute, that ³ We know that most of the Fathers of the Church have much out-run themselves on the Subject of second Marriages, of which I have given several Examples in my Preface. We may also consult Mr. HERTIUS.

^a Plin. l. 1. ep. 14. When I reflect on the common Custom of the World, and the Laws of our State, which command us, in Marriage, to have a considerable regard to Wealth and Fortune, I think it is very proper to mention, that the young Lady's Father is Master of a very fair Possession. And besides this, the Hopes of a very fruitful Bed ought, in my judgment, to go a great way in determining our Choice, and to be reckoned amongst the chief Conditions of a Bride. Add. Orat. M. Hortali. Tacit. An. l. 2. c. 37. ^b Arngim. Jon. Descrip. Island. c. 8. ^c See 1 Corinth. vii. 26. ^d Ἐκαὶ τὸ μὴ ἱρᾶν, as Philostratus speaks, Apoll. T. l. 8. c. 3. A lover of Abstinence from Love. ^e Add. Arrian in Epictet. l. 3. c. 22. p. 311, 312. Ed. Wolfii. Corn Nep. Epamin. c. 10. ^f Add. Charron de la Sageffe, l. 1. c. 42, & 46. f. 2, 3. Bacon's Essay 8. ^g Iphigen. in Taur. v. 57. ^h De Leg. Nat. c. 6. f. 9.

a civil Legislator may, by Virtue of his Sovereign Authority, constrain all his Subjects, who are capable by Nature, and have means of procuring a sufficient Maintenance, to engage in Matrimony by such a time. But to compel a Man to marry for the Propagation of a Race of Beggars, is equally Impolitic and Inhuman. Yet it looks more mild, in this Case, to enforce an Ordinance rather by Rewards to the Compliers, and Subtraction of Benefits from the Recusants, than by direct and positive Punishment. Of this sort was the famous Jus trium liberorum^a amongst the Romans; and that Spartan Law mentioned by Aristotle^b enacting, that He who had increas'd the State with three Children, should be free from the Trouble of keeping Watch; and he that had one above that Number should stand farther exempted from all kinds of Burthens. After the same manner Strabo^c informs us, that the Persian Kings propos'd a yearly Prize to those who had been Fathers of most Children.

It is no less evident, that a Prince or State would act most ridiculously, as well as most unjustly, should they in general forbid Matrimony to all their Subjects: Or should they allow this Privilege to the First-born only of every Family, and enjoy strict Celibacy to all the rest^d. For it is impossible, that in so great a number, all should be able to lead a Life of Severity and Continence. Nor would these Constitutions be a more merciful way of retrenching the exuberant Flood of Subjects, than the cruel practice of exposing Infants so common in antient Greece, or the other of procuring Abortion, which Aristotle^e himself adviseth.

But if it appear upon common Reason or Experience, that any particular Office in a State can be more conveniently discharg'd by an Unmarried, than a married Person, the civil Laws may fairly restrain such an Employment to Men that are content to live singly^f, and may oblige them to quit the Honour, when they change their Condition. Provided still, that the Number of Men, privileg'd to forbear Matrimony by the Gift of Continence, be sufficient to fill these Offices with a constant Supply. For it must not be suppos'd that the design of such an Ordinance is either to licence irregular Lusts, or to do Violence to any Man's natural Temper; in as much as no Man is compell'd to act in this Capacity, who judgeth himself unfit for the Service. And it must be a farther Proviso, that as to the great Business of Posterity, due Care hath been taken of it another way, so that it may not suffer by these Restraints.

In the same manner, it is lawful to forbid an Ambassador, a General, or a Soldier, when sent on a Long or Dangerous Adventure, to carry his Wife with him, in the Expedition^g.

Farther, since the natural Obligation to Matrimony is undeterminate, and admits of some Latitude, the civil Legislator may fairly fix the Age of the Persons who shall be thus join'd together; or assign a Period taken from some other Consideration. Thus in the Lex Papia Poppæa amongst the Romans it was order'd,^h that no Woman under Fifty, should marry a Man of Sixty; and no Man under Sixty, a Woman of Fifty. Which we find afterwards repealed by Justinianⁱ. So Plato^h limits the time of a Man's being a Father, from Thirty to Fifty-five Years of Age, and of a Woman's being a Mother, from Twenty to Fortyⁱ. Amongst some People, it was unlawful for a Man to Marry, before he had given some signal Proof of his Valour upon the Enemy. As Strabo tells us of the Carmanians, no one of whom was permitted to have a Wife, till he had taken off the Head of an Enemy, and presented it to his Prince^k.

And, what is more, though Persons are naturally free to marry whom they please, yet a Government, if it seem for the Interest of the State, may in some Cases restrain and limit this Privilege; for instance, it may be order'd, that no Subject shall marry a Foreigner, none of the Nobility a Plebeian. Arrian in his History of the Indians reports, that the several Orders of the People were forbid Marrying one into the other. A Husbandman could not give his Daughter to an Artificer, nor an Artificer return the Compliment in the same manner^l.

Lastly, it may be enacted by civil Powers, that Marriages shall not be contracted but with the intervening Consent of publick Authority; especially between Persons of considerable Figure and Importance in the State. The force of which, and of the like Laws may amount to this Effect, that all Matches contrary to such Injunctions shall either be declar'd Void, or shall be divested of certain Privileges, with which they would be otherwise attended. Thus, in Livy^m we find the Campanians petitioning, "That they might have the Liberty of marrying Roman Dames, and that, if they had formerly been so happy, they might still keep them unmolested; and that the Children, already born

MR. BARB. NOTES on § VIII.

¹ See what Mr BAYLE says in his Answer to the Questions of a Provincial, Tom. 1. p. 542, &c. about Gebardb Truckes, Archbishop of Cologne; who, having married Agnes de Mansfeld, and embraced the Lutheran Doctrine; would have kept his Electorate and Archbishoprick.

² The Author doth not recite this Law exactly.

^a Vid. J. Lips. Excurs. in Tacit. Ann. III. 25. L. 15. p. 504. Ed. Cal. Herodot. L. 1. p. 36. Ed. H. Steph. Polit. 7. c. 16.

^b Polit. l. 2. c. 7. Ælian. Var. Hist. Lib. 6. c. 6. ^c Vid. Dig. Lib. 23. t. 2. De ritu nupt. Leg. 19. Pliny (l. 6. c. 22) reports of the People of Taprobane, "That, in their Choice of a King, they do not only require, that the Person be Good and Merciful, but likewise that he be advanced in Age, and without Children; and if after his Admission, he happens to obtain Issue, they depose him from the Government, lest the Kingdom should become Hereditary, Solin. c. 66. ^d Vid. Sueton. in Claud. c. 23. & Cod. Lib. 5. t. 4. De nuptiis, Leg. 27. ^e Plato de Rep. Lib. 5. p. 657. Ed. Wech. ^f Add. Aristot. Polit. 7. c. 16. & Michael Piccart, ibid. Tacit. Germ. c. 20. ^g Strab. l. 15. p. 500. ^h Add. Abrah. Roger. de Bramin. p. 1. c. 11. ⁱ We find the same account in Hieron. Ojor. de Reb. Gest. Emanuel. l. 2. & Montagne, L. 3. c. 5. p. 630. ^j Ed. Paris. 1657. Fol. ^k L. 38. c. 36.

“to them, might be acknowledged so, their just and lawful Heits: And, in Dionysius Halicarnassens ^a we meet with a Decree of the Senate, upon the Commencement of a War with the Latines, “Giving leave, on both sides, to the Latin Women, that had married Romans, and to the Roman Women that had married Latines, “either to tarry with their Husbands, if they thought fit; or else to return into their proper Country, leaving behind them their Male Issue, “and carrying with them their unmarried Daughters. The Effect of which was, that almost all the Roman Dames quitted their Husbands, and return’d to the City: whereas all the other Women, two only excepted, prefer’d their Roman Husbands to their Latin Friends ^b.

IX. We are, in the next Place, to enquire by what Heads of Conditions, with regard to the Law of Nature, the Matrimonial Covenant is compleated; and likewise what Right accrues to both the Persons from such an Union. And here we suppose before-hand, that all Human Persons, whether of one Sex, or of the other, are naturally equal in Right: and that no one can claim the Sovereignty over another, unless it be obtain’d by the free Act of one of the Parties. For though, in Strength of Body and of Mind, we are allow’d to have the Advantage of the Fair Train; yet this Superiority is not of it self sufficient to justify us in setting up for their Masters and Governors. Therefore whatever Right a Man holds over a Woman, in as much as she is by Nature his Equal, he must acquire, either by her Consent, or by the Sword, in a just War. Yet since it is most natural, that Marriages should be founded on mutual Good-will, the former way seems more proper for the winning of Wives, the other for the procuring of Slaves. And therefore, in those Countries where it is usual to marry their fair Captives, the Men lay aside the severe Authority of Masters, for a more gentle and more agreeable Sway ^c.

If then, we suppose all Mankind thus plac’d in a Condition of natural Equality and Liberty, it may happen that a Woman, as well as a Man, shall desire Issue peculiarly for herself, over which she may preside and command. Now to accomplish this End, it is necessary, that a Covenant pass between a Man and a Woman, for their mutual Assistance in serving Posterity. If this Covenant be Simple, not join’d with any Agreement about constant Cohabitation, but respecting barely the Procreation of Children, it confers on neither Party any Sovereignty or Right over the other, except they may challenge on either side, the promised Assistance, with regard to Posterity. And, in this Case, if it was expressly intimated in the Covenant, that the Woman desir’d Issue properly for her self and her own Management, the Children shall be under the Government of the Mother. Such a kind of simple and irregular Marriage we may call Amazonian, if any Credit is to be given to the Stories of those warlike Dames ^d. In the same manner, when Thalestris courted Alexander the Great ^e, and, as some tell us, the Queen of Sheba King Solomon, the Off-spring could not fairly be reckon’d spurious, but, in their way, honest and legitimate. So Travellers report of the Inhabitants of the Kingdom of Congo, that their main Strength consists in Companies of Women, who live by themselves in certain Territories assign’d them by the Prince; and at set times choof some that they like best among the Men, for the sake of continuing their Breed: If the Child prove a Boy, they send him back to his proper Father, if a Girl, they keep her in their own Train, and educate her under the Severity of Martial Discipline ^f.

Now though it must be confess’d, that this kind of Coupling is Barbarous at least, if not Beastly; yet, amongst the most civiliz’d Nations, there are often to be found Instances of Marriages, in which either both Parties are declar’d Equal, or else the Husband is oblig’d to submit to the supreme civil Authority of the Wife. As when a Queen, who enjoys a Crown in her own Right, takes a Husband, and yet retains her Superiority in the Government ^g.

X. But we may take our leave of these irregular Matches, and proceed to examine those which appear more suitable to the Condition of human Nature ^h. This then we take for granted, that the matrimonial Covenant ought to begin at the Man, not at the Woman, that the Courtship should be us’d not on her side, but on his; this Method agreeing best with the Genius and Character of both Sexes. For tho' it be, in many Places, usual for the Relations of the Woman to make the first Offer to the Man, yet this is only to direct his Aim in the Attack, and to fix a particular Mark for his Addressee.

MR. BARB. NOTES on § X.

¹ The Notion which the Antient Lawyers had of Marriage, was taken partly from their Idea of Friendship, and partly from the Relation, which they had conceived to be between a Father and his Daughter. See Mr. NODD’S curious Chapter in his Probab. Juri. Lib. 2. Chap. IX.

^a L. 6. init. ^b Senec. de Benef. l. 4. c. 35. I promised you my Daughter in Marriage, afterwards you appeared to be a Foreigner; under that Character I may not enter into such a Relation with you: The same Law which lays this Prohibition on me, protects me from the Centure. ^c Add Deuterom. xxi. c. 10, &c. ^d Vid. Arrian. de expell. Alexand. l. 7. c. 13. Procop. H. G. l. 4. Palaphat. de Jab. narr. l. 1. c. 33. Jornand. de Reb. Getic. c. 8. Steph. Cleric. Quest. Acad. 2. Justin. l. 2. c. 4. Diadorus Siculus, l. 2. c. 45. reports, “That the Sovereign Dames oblig’d their Husbands to perform all the servile Employments, even those which, in other Places, belong particularly to the Maids.” He tells us the same of a People in Libya, whom Hercules utterly destroyed, thinking it a Reproach to Mankind, That a Nation should be oblig’d to continue where the Government was in the weaker Sex, l. 3. c. 53. & 55. ^e Vid. Curtium, l. 6. c. 5. ^f Vid. Edward Lopez, de Regno Congo, l. 2. c. 9. Add. Alvarez Descript. Æthiop. c. 133. Idem Vid. de N. l. c. 19. Michael Glycas, Ann. part 2. tells of the Agilæans, “That amongst them the Women bear Rule over the Men, and are very communicative of themselves, without any Danger of their Husband’s Jealousy: that they till the Ground, build the House, “and perform all the nobler Labours of the other Sex. ^g See the Articles of Marriage between Philip and Mary in Tuan. l. 13. ad ann. 1553. & 1554. Those of Mary Queen of Scots, ibid. l. 20. ad ann. 1571. & l. 27. ad l. 1. Ad. Marian. Hist. Hispan. l. 24. c. 5. Diador. Sic. l. 1. c. 27. mentions a Decree that pass’d among the Ægyptians in Honour of Isis, importing, “That the Queen should enjoy a greater Degree of Power and Dignity than the King: and that, amongst private Persons, in the Nuptial Writings, the Wife should be invested with the Command, and the Husband be oblig’d to obey.” Add. Guicciardini, l. 6. p. 178. where he speaks of the Government of Capite. admitted with joint Authority by Ferdinand and Isabella.

This Principle being suppos'd, it is clear, that the Man, when he makes his Suit, is desirous of such Issue as shall be true and genuine, not spurious or adulterous. And therefore we ought to abhor, as contrary to Reason and Nature, the licentious Practice of many Nations in this Point. Travellers tell us, that the King of Calecut hath two Wives, each of whom is constantly waited upon, with all Familiarity, by ten of the Idolatrous Priests; and that the King esteems it an Honour to be thus abus'd; though he hath the Prudence, not to let his own Illegitimate Race succeed to the Crown, that Dignity being reserv'd for his Nephews^a. Indeed the Women are in that Country, for the most part, held in common^b; whence it comes to pass, that the Fathers neglect the Care of their Children, and all Inheritances descend by the Mother's side^c. Buchanan^d, to the Discredit of his own Country, reports a Law of Evenus, or Ewen, the Third King of Scotland, by which it was order'd, that the first Night of a Nobleman's Marriage should be the King's Fee; and that the Nobleman, besides taking the same Liberty with the Commoners Wives, should again command their Company whenever they pleas'd. Till Milcolomb the Third, at the intreaty of his Queen Margarite, chang'd this scandalous Indulgence into a Fine of half a Mark, to be paid by the Husband, in lieu of parting with his Bed the first Night^e. At this time of Day, in the Kingdoms of Pegu and Arraca, at the Nuptial-feast, one of the Guests presents the Bridegroom in his Addressee to the Bride; yet it is Capital for him to be catch'd a second time, using the same Freedom^f.

We may conclude farther, that nothing is more repugnant to that Decency and good Order which ought to be kept up in the World, than to lead a wandering desultory Life, without any fix'd Abode, without any certain Seat of one's Fortunes and Concerns^g. The Education of the common Off-spring is then certainly carried on with most Convenience, when the Parents unite their Assurances to so good a Design; and their Minds are by these sweet Pledges knit together in a stronger Band of Affection^h. Besides, a constant Cohabitation cannot but afford vast Delight and Satisfaction to an agreeable Couple: and then the Husband is by this means much more secure of his Wife's Chastity, than if they dwelt at a distance. Such Matrimony then, as is regular and perfect, conformable to natural Reason and to the Ends of civil Life, besides the Covenant of Fidelity to the Bedⁱ, doth imply an Agreement on the Woman's side, that she will constantly dwell with the Man, and unite in the strict Society of a Family; as well for the Education of the Children, as for mutual Aid and Pleasure^j. The Custom amongst the Chinese, for the Women to bind their Feet so very streightly, that they cannot go without great pain, seems to have been first introduc'd on this politick Account, that being disabled from gadding abroad, they might be oblig'd to fix with the greater Application on the Care of Domestick Affairs^k.

^a See the Author's Abridgment of a Man's and Citizen's Duty. Lib. 2. Chap. 2. § 4.

^b Mr. MONTAGNE speaks well to this purpose: A good Marriage is a pleasant Condition of Life, full of Constancy, Fidelity, and an infinite number of profitable and solid Duties, and mutual Obligations. Every Woman who has a true sense of it, Optato quam junxit lumine tæda, Cat. would not be Mistress of her Husband: if she be entertained in his Affections as his Wife, she is much more honourably and surely received. When he shall be in a Passion, or Hurry, as he must needs be; to whom would he rather with some Disgrace to befall, his Wife, or his Mistress? If any Misfortune happen to him: to whom would he with the greatest? These Questions have no doubt in a good Marriage. That we see so few good Ones, is a sign of its great Price and Value. If it be well order'd and manag'd, there is no finer piece of Society. 'Tis to this Association, that this Saying is most fitly applied; Homo Homini Deus, aut Lupus. We must be endowed with the best Qualities to come into it. They that take this Affair in hand, and carry with them Hatred and Contempt, do unjustly and unprofitably. Marriage hath on her part, both Profit, Justice, Honour, Constancy, an equal and universal Pleasure. Love is grounded on Pleasure only; and is therefore more Dangerous, Lively, and Sharp. Essays, Lib. 111. Chap. 11. Pag. 630, &c.

^c Vil. Aloyf. Cadamust. Navig. c. 75. we meet with the like Account in Ludov. Rom. Navig. l. 5. c. 7. ^d Vid Pet. de Valle, Itiner. P. 3. Ep. 7. ^e The Practices of the Colchians, reported by Busbequius, in his third Epistle, are very filthy. ^f Rev. Scotie. l. 4. ^g Li. L. 7. Polydor. Virg. Hist. Angl. l. 10. Comp. Sueton. Caligul. c. 40. & Boxhorn. Not. ^h Ludovic. di Barthema, Itiner. p. 2. c. 11. Of the Inhabitants of Canich, see Paul Venet. l. 2. c. 38. ⁱ Xenophon had reason to call a Man's Home or his Fire-side, the sweetest and the most sacred Possession that he enjoys. Cyropæd. l. 7. p. 116. Ed. H. Steph. Add. Aristot. Oecon. l. 1. c. 3. ^j Genes. xxix. 32. Lyfius, Orat. 1. c. 2. "So soon as the fore me a Child, I admitted her into the full Trust and Care of all my Affairs; judging this the firmest Band that could unite and engage us to each other."

Conciliat animos conjugum partus fere.

Senec. Herc. Oet. ver. 407.

"Children are commonly the means of uniting and endearing a married Pair."

^k Domesthen. in Neer. "The Reason of our taking Wives is to obtain Issue, and to see our Family Affairs under a faithful Directress." Add. Xenoph. Oeconom. & Columell. de R. R. l. 12. præfat. ^l Comp. Martin. Hist. Sim. l. 3. c. 28. Plutarch. Præcept. Conjugal. "As Physical Humours and Qualities are said to diffuse themselves whole through the entire Mass, so ought the Bodies, the Wealth, the Friends and Acquaintance of a married Couple to be thoroughly mixt and blend-ed together. When the Roman Lawgiver forbid either of the Pair to give any thing to the other, the meaning was not to exclude them from a Participation of Benefits, but to shew that they ought to hold all things Common between them." Quintil. Declam. 249. "Ye know that Marriages are the things which hold a Commonwealth together, which preserve Race and Issue, and confirm and regulate the Decent of Patrimonies and Inheritances, and maintain Domestick Safety and Peace. Without this Security at Home, who would venture to travel into foreign Parts, or so much as take a Journey to a distant Estate; to go on publick Embassies, or to engage in military Expeditions?" See Montaigne's Essays, lib. 3. c. 5. p. 630. 631, 632. Edit. Paris. Fl.

From what hath been observ'd before, it appears why the Husband, and not the Wife, ought to have the Privilege of choosing their seat of Residence; for it is he that admits her into his Family, of which he himself is the Head and the Director. Though no Man, commonly speaking, will be so hard as not to ask his Wife's Consent in this point; especially if she brought him a considerable Fortune.

It is farther evident, that without a Breach of the Matrimonial Contract, the Wife cannot against the Husband's Consent ramble abroad, lodge apart, or deny him reasonable Favours, unless upon extraordinary Occasion.

Upon the same Principles is founded that Presumption in civil Law, that Children born in Lawful Wedlock are really the Husband's, unless there appear some very strong Argument to the contrary, sufficient to overthrow the favour of the Presumption ^a. The English Laws are particularly complaisant to the fair Sex, obliging the Husband to own a Child, born after he hath been absent many Years, provided he hath been all the while within the Bounds of the Island ^b. And they ground this Indulgence on two Reasons, first, because the Wife hath solemnly given her Faith, that she will be true, which she is presum'd not to have broken; and, secondly, because it is in the Husband's power to secure his Wife's Honesty; and what Right or Power any Person enjoys, he is always suppos'd duly to exercise ^c.

And hence, the Opinion of the Vulgar is not altogether unreasonable, when they fancy, that the Wife's dishonesty casts some kind of ignominious Blemish on the Husband ^d: As if, either out of Folly or Meanness of Spirit, he had neglected to use his Authority ^d. Domitian struck a Gentleman's Name out of the List of Judges, for receiving his Wife again, after he had put her away upon an Accusation of Adultery ^e. Some give another Reason why a Mark of Shame should be fix'd on this Misfortune; and that is, because it looks disgraceful in a Husband not to be Master of those good Qualities which might engage his Wife's Affection, and secure her Fidelity. A Man that lies under this unhappy Censure, and cannot conveniently redress the wrong which he suffers, would do well to consider Euripides's wife Aphorism, that

----- Ἐν σοφίᾳ γὰρ
Τὰδ' ἔστι θηπιᾶν, λαιθόλειον τὴ μὴ καλᾷ.

It is a great Part of human Wisdom, to cover those things with Secrecy, which look ill if they come abroad ^f.

Charvon's ^g Remark will not, in all Cases, hold strictly good, that 'tis a vulgar Error and Folly to upbraid a Man with his Wife's Dishonesty; as if this were to make him suffer for the Crime of another, which 'tis not in his Power to prevent.

^h It may not be amiss, on this Subject, to throw in an occasional Observation, that those Marks of Reproach, which the common People fix on the Heads of such unfortunate Husbands, are no new Invention, nor confin'd to the Customs of our Western World: For we read that the Emperor Andronicus caus'd the largest of the Stag's Horns he met with, to be fastned on the Gate of the Market-place, on pretense to shew the Vastness of the Beasts he had kill'd in Hunting; but really as a silent Rebuke to the Immorality of the City, and the Lightness of the Dames ^h. But as She cannot properly be called an Adulteress who suffers in her Honour by Compulsion and Force ⁱ, so to keep a Wife who hath been thus injur'd, doth not, in it self, appear any way foul or reproachful ^k.

XI. We are farther to examine, whether by the meer Law of Nature, from the Principal Contract of true and perfect Matrimony, there ariseth any proper Sovereignty or Dominion of the Husband over the Wife. Indeed in holy Scripture it is expressly said, that the Will or Desire of the Wife shall be to her Husband, and that ^a It was one of P Y T H A G O R A S's Maxims, that care should be taken, that Women should not break their Nuptial Fidelity either through the negligence or ill-behaviour of their Husbands; "Αἰ τε γυναῖκες μὴ νεβόσωσι τὸ γένος ὑποβρίβη ἢ κακίᾳ ἢδ' αὐαῖ- κείνων. Jambl. de vita Pythag. Chap. 9 Numb. 48.

^b If any one desires to see more of this trivial Usage, of which the Gravity of our Author would not permit him to say more, let him consult S A L M A S I U S's Notes upon Tertullian de Pallio, p. 338, 339, &c.

Juvenilis ardor impetu primo furit;
Languescit idem facile, nec durat diu
In Venere turpi, seu levis flammæ vapor:
Amor perennis conjugis castæ manet.

Senec. Octav. v. 189, &c.

" The Fire of Youth in Love's dishonest Joys,
" At the first Blaze is Fury, Flash, and Noise;
" But spends in Smoak, and what it gave destroys.
" Whilst the chaste Passion of a lawful Dame
" Burns with a gentle, but an endless Flame.

^a See above, lib. 4. c. 11. f. 10. & vid. Gell. l. 3. c. 16. Plin. Hist. Nat. l. 7. c. 5. Where he treats of the time of going with Child, which must be examin'd, before the Child brought forth is delivered to the Husband. ^b See Chamberl. Present State of England, p. 1. c. 16.

^c 'Tis a saying of Gyges in Herodot. (Clio p. 3. Ed. H. Steph.) Every one ought to keep an Eye on his own Concerns. P L A T O observes (in Alcibiad. l. p. 441. Ed. Wich.) "That the Wives of the Spartan Kings are publickly watched and overseen by the Ephori, lest any Heir should be obrudged upon the Crown, who is not truly of the Race of Hercules. Whereas in Persia the King seems, in Excellency of Nature, so much above his Subjects, that there is no Danger of counterfeiting his Strain: And therefore his Wives are under no Guard, but that of their own Reputation.

^d Sueton. Dom. c. 8. So by the Attic Law, "A Man was reckon'd base and scandalous who kept his Wife, after he had discover'd her Dishonestly, Demosthen. in Nær. Add. Dig. lib. 48. t. 5. ad Leg. Jul. de Adulter. leg. 2. f. 6. & leg. 29. prin. In TACITUS (Ann. lib. 2. c. 85.) Labeo the Husband of Vistilia was cited to give an Account why he had forborn

" to see the Law executed upon his Wife, after she had been openly convicted: and he could not otherwise excuse himself than by pretending that the sixty Days, which the Law allow'd him for considering time, were not yet expired.

^e Eurip. Hippol. Coron. Add. Plutarch. de Anim. Tranquil. p. 467. E. F. ^f L. 1. c. 39. n. 11. ^g Nicet. Acominat.

de Imper. Andronic. l. 2. ^h Vid. Gratian, Caus. 32. Qu. 5. c. 2, &c. ⁱ Yet we are to commend the Proceeding of David in 2 Samuel xx. 3.

He shall rule over her ^a. But this being enjoin'd the Woman by way of Punishment, seems to bear the Face of a Positive Institution. To discover, then, how the Law purely natural directs in this Point, we may first observe, that to be bound to follow the Will of another in some certain Business, is not altogether the same thing as to be subjected to his Dominion; because the former may result from a simple Pact. For there are many Pacts, especially of this kind, I give you this to do such, or such a thing; I do this, provided you will do so, or so for me; in which it was at first in the Power of either Party to choose, whether he would enter into the Agreement, or not. Yet the Covenant being once consented to on both sides, one Party must follow the Will of the other (as to this particular Business) and not vice versa. Whence it appears, that how far soever the Wife may be obliged to submit to the Husband's Will in the Affairs proper to Matrimony, yet it doth not presently follow, that he must needs have the sovereign Command over her, in other Actions and Concerns.

Again, the End of Marriage is not like that of Commonwealths, the Defence and Security of Men (for how weak an Union, as to any mutual Safety, is that which consists only of two Persons?) but is directed wholly to the Propagation of Human Race. Therefore as a Commonwealth cannot be understood without a sovereign Ruler, so it should seem that Marriage, without any Superiority of Government, might subsist well enough under the common Force of Contracts, assisted with the Engagements of Friendship and the Charms of Love. It must be confess'd, that a separate Family hath somewhat in it much like a State or Community, which not regularly allowing of more than one Head, the Wife when she is admitted into it, ought, one would think, to yield a full Submission to the Lord and Director of the Society. But it may be urg'd, in Answer to this Objection, that a Family, if increas'd with a numerous Train of Servants, hath two Ends and Designs, one common, the other proper. The common End consists in mutual Defence and Security, arising from the united Strength of so many Persons. In this respect, tho' some supreme Sway be necessary, yet, in as much as the Wife is but little concern'd in that Affair, the Unity of the Family may be very well kept up, altho' she be join'd to her Husband by no severer Bands than those of Affection and the Matrimonial Covenant. Thus we find the Patriarch Abraham exercising a Sovereignty over his Domesticks, and yet treating Sarah with the kind Equality of a Sister ^b. Though, at the same time, her dutiful Behaviour towards him is highly commended in the holy Scriptures; and it is said particularly, that she call'd him Lord ^c. The proper or peculiar End of Marriage seems likewise attainable, without any Inconvenience, although neither of the Parties should bear any such absolute Authority over the other, as must include the Power of Life and Death, and of the most rigorous Restraints; but the Ties of Friendship and the Obligation of the free Contract, may very well serve to hold Man and Woman together. Yet this Contract (the Husband having the better Part in the Terms and Conditions, and the additional Advantage of his Sex) seems to be form'd in the manner of those Leagues and Covenants which we call Unequal; so that the Wife is bound to Obedience, and the Husband rather to Protection. Not that it is repugnant to the Law of Nature, for a Wife to be subjected to her Husband in the way of strict Political Government. For the Fear of supreme Authority, and the Endearments of Conjugal Affection are really no more destructive of each other, than the Sovereignty of the Prince extinguisheth the Love of the Subject. And this full Political Authority, as it may be acquired by any Husband, by means of a new Covenant annex'd to the Matrimonial Agreement, so we find it in some Nations, allowed to all Husbands in general, by Virtue of a publick Custom or Constitution. Cesar ^d tells of the Antient Gauls, that they had the Power of Life and Death, as well over their Wives, as over their Children. Amongst the Germans, the Husbands were empower'd to execute the Punishment of Adultery; not as an Indulgence to their Rage and Resentment, but as an Effect of their just Power and Command ^e. How the Case stood at Rome, Gellius thus informs us from a Speech of old Cato's A Husband (except after a Divorce) is a Judge, a Censor, and a kind of sovereign Prince over his Wife: if she acts any thing perversely, or scandalously, he sets a Mulct upon her; if she drink Wine to Excess, if she commit any dishonesty with another Man, he cendemns her to a suitable Punishment. Again, says that grave Senator, should you apprehend your Wife in the Act of Adultery, you might kill her without farther Process or Trial; on the contrary, should she find you guilty of the same Crime, she hath no Right to touch you with a Finger. Tacitus hath recorded a later Instance of this antient Custom ^f. He reports that Pomponia Gracina (Wife to the famous Plautius, who triumph'd for his Victories in Britain) being accus'd as a Favourer of foreign Superstition, was remitted to the Judgment of her Husband: And he, according to the old Institution, calling an Assembly of her Relations, took supreme Cognizance of her Life and Honour. We must not omit the most remarkable Practice of the Saccæ, a People of Scythia, among whom, as Ælian tells us the Story ^g; "When a Young Man seeks him out a Wife, he is oblig'd, in the first

MR. BARB. NOTES on § XI.

^a Martial, L. 8. Ep. 12. v. 3, 4.
*Inferior matrona suo sit, Præce, marito,
Non aliter fuerint fãmina virque pare.*

Should Manly Empire not controul the Fair,
Husband and Wife were an unequal Pair.

Plin. Paneg. c. 73. Many worthy Men have been hindred from being Chief in the State, by their not being Chief in their own Families.

^a Genes. iii. 16. Ephes. v. 22, &c.

^b See Genes. xvi. 2, 5, 6. xxi. 10, 11, 12.

^c 1 Pet. iii. 6.

^d De B. G. l. 6. c. 19.

^e Tacit. Germ. c. 19. What he says of their Power over their Servants see afterwards, cap. 3. f. 4.

^f Ann. xiii. 32. Add. Euripid. Medea, v. 230, &c. Varren, Descrip. Japon. lib. 13. Lex

Wigibornum, L. 4. t. 4. c. 3.

^g V. H. l. 12. c. 38.

“ place, to engage her in single Combat ; and if “ he gets the better, he leads off his Captive in “ Triumph, and ever after acts the Sovereign o“ ver her : if the Victory fall on her side, she is “ the Queen, and he the Slave. And this Con“ tention is not design’d to endanger the Lives of “ the Combatants, but only to determine the Ma“ stery between them.

What Power the Husband hath over the Goods of the Wife, is likewise to be adjusted, either by the Contract and Agreement of the Parties, or by the Decision of the Civil Laws. These Engagements are to be strictly obey’d in the several Points which they have settled ; as for Instance, whether the Woman shall bring a Portion at Marriage ; whether or no the Couple shall join Purfes, and mix their Effects in the Common Stock, whether the Husband shall have an absolute, or limited Disposofal of his Wife’s Fortune ; and the like Questions.

Amongst the Japonesse the Women marry without Portions : Indeed, the Maids Parents, if of the wealthy Sort, send a Sum of Mony as a formal Present to the Bridegroom on his Wedding-day, but he presently returns it in the same ceremonious manner ; the reason they alledge for their Custom is, that they may not give the Women an occasion of Insolence and Pride. And there they have this mortifying Proverb, That a Woman, so long as she lives, hath not so much as a House that she can call her own : Before Marriage she is a Dependent on her Father’s Family, in Marriage on her Husband’s, in Widowhood on that of her Children ^a. It was a Custom with the old Thracians, that the fairest of their Maids should be expos’d to publick Sale, and be given in Marriage to the highest Bidder : On the other side, that those whom Nature had been less kind to, should expend their Fortunes to buy themselves Husbands ^b. The Affyrians likewise dispos’d of their Virgins in the way of Sale ^c.

Where the Civil Laws have not defined these Matters, or where the Parties live in a State of Natural Liberty, the Husband and Wife may settle any such Point as they please, by particular Contract.

XII. For the further Illustration of this Subject, it will not be amiss to examine the Doctrine laid down by Hornius in his first Book de Civitate ^d. First of all, he rejects the Opinion of those who assert, that the Husband hath, by Nature, a Sovereignty over the Wife. And thus far we approve his Censure, if the Persons, against whom he disputes, did maintain the Husband’s Sovereignty to be the free Gift of bare Nature, without any intervening Contract, or without the Wife’s voluntary Submission. For this indeed would be repugnant to the Natural Equality of Mankind ; and a fitness or ability to govern, cannot, of it self, confer a Right of Government.

Hence he proceeds to affirm, That there can be no Sovereignty, publick or private, of one Person over another, but that which ariseth from the express Appointment and the most solemn Intervention of Almighty GOD. Now as to this Position, we cannot but observe, that when Enquiries are thus made into the Origin and Fountain of Dominion, what we search for is the nearest, the immediate, and the second Cause ; the first and universal Cause of all things being ever presuppos’d. And therefore, tho’ it appear most evidently, that God hath commanded such an Order to be introduc’d among Men, yet the main Question will be still behind, what Contracts are required to put Men in a way of conforming to the divine Precept. For he must have little Knowledge of Letters, who can imagine, that when we say God is the Author of such or such a moral Institution, we mean that he produceth it, as he did at first the Heavens and the Earth, without the Intervention of any thing formerly created. That God expressly order’d the making of the Jewish Tabernacle, is no manner of Reason why we should not say, that the Workmen were the next and immediate Cause of the Fabrick. Thus although it be enjoin’d by the Divine Oracle, that the Woman shall be in Subjection to the Man, yet to make him actually and immediately her Sovereign, it is necessary, that she promise Obedience to him by her own free Covenant. To say the contrary would not be less ridiculous, than to pretend, when God bids us have Dominion over the Beasts of the Earth ; that there is no need of our using any outward means to obtain it, as by Hunting, &c.

The Argument this Author afterwards makes use of is certainly most trifling and childish. The Wife, says he, hath no such thing as Conjugal Sovereignty, and therefore she can confer no such thing on the Husband. As if, by the Agreement of several Persons, a new moral Quality could not be produc’d, which did not actually exist before ^e. To constitute a Dominion, it is by no means necessary, that it must be first really possess’d by one Party, and then translated on another (as physical Substances cannot be given away, unless they had before a full and formal Being) but this Superiority then ariseth, when any Person divests himself of that Power of resisting another which his natural Liberty gives him, and engageth his Faith, that he will submit, in all things, to the Will of him whom he thus chooseth for his Governour.

Farther : Although in the Holy Scriptures the Subjection of Eve is said to have been enjoin’d her as a Punishment for seducing her Husband ; yet it doth not hence appear, that the Husband’s Sovereignty, after the Fall, hath not for its nearest and immediate second Cause the Agreement between Man and Woman. For, since a necessity of Obedience doth not always include an unhappiness of Condition (as the most blessed State of the holy Angels is not impair’d by their yielding the

Mr. BARB. NOTE on § XII.

[†] See what the Author says, l. 7. c. 3. § 4. following.

^a Bern. Varen. Descrip. Japon. c. 12.

^b Solin. c. 15. Thus Scythæ in Xenoph. Exp. Cyr. Lib. 7. f. 20.

^c Ælian. P. H. l. 4. c. 1. Herodot. Clio. Add what the Roman Laws deliver concerning the Prohibition of Donations between Husband and Wife. Lib. 24. t. 1. D. De donat. inter Vir. & Uxor.

^d Cap. 1.

the strictest Service to God) the Punishment attending the Woman's Inferiority seems to be this, that she bears the Yoak unwillingly, with inward Grudgings at her Station, and a Natural Desire of Command. And therefore it is no Contradiction to say, that the Superiority of the Husband naturally springs from the Consent of the Wife; and that GOD Almighty in way of Punishment to the Woman, hath made her Subjection troublesome and uneasy.

The following Distinction looks but like an impertinent Niceness, Whatever Will, or whatever Voluntary Act we can now conceive in the Woman, belongs purely to the Act of contracting Marriage; and consequently is to be understood of that Consent and Approbation by which she acquiesceth in the future Government of such a particular Husband. This is no more than to say, that the Husband's Sovereignty is not produc'd by the Consent of the Wife, but being before establish'd by GOD's Command, the Wife voluntary enters under it. As a Traveller doth not build his Inn, but freely makes use of it, when he findeth it built to his hands.

It is sufficient in the whole to observe, that the Dominion of one Person over another, consider'd as a Moral Entity, doth not exist without the Concurrence of some human Act, and cannot be understood without Subjection and Obedience: And that the Woman, for this reason, lies under no Obligation to obey, before she hath by her own Consent submitted to the Rule and Authority of an Husband. And though that she should thus submit herself, be indeed agreeable to the Divine Will, yet this doth not hinder, but that her own Covenant, and her Subjection consequent upon it, are the immediate and nearest Cause productive of the Husband's Power.

XIII. Nor can we grant what the same Author maintains, that the Husband, besides the Command of the Family, and of Conjugal Affairs, is invested with an absolute Power of Life and Death, in which Right the Summ of his Authority consists. For though this Power be meant as it is unrestrain'd by Civil Constitutions, and as it amounts not to a licentious Excuse of Murder and Parricide, but to a lawful Authority of inflicting condign Punishment on capital Crimes: yet that every Sovereignty, as it is seated in a proper Person, not precariously obtain'd, nor circumscribed by a Superior, doth import the Power of Life and Death, is an Assertion that we should not be inclin'd to assent to, without very good Proof. Certainly the End of Matrimony requires no such absolute Authority. And if it be objected, that all grievous Enormities ought to be brought under Human Cognizance, we will only ask, who shall punish a sovereign Prince, or who the Father of a Family, living separate from all civil Government? We confess, that if the Wife prove guilty of Intolerable Wickedness, she may (in this Natural State) be expell'd the House as an Enemy, and may be kill'd by the Right of War. And we have already granted^a, that even this most strict political Power is not repugnant to the Nature of Marriage, though we are very far from allowing it to be essentially necessary.

XIV. We are oblig'd here to explain that common Maxim of the Lawyers, that Consenting, and not Bedding, makes a Marriage. Which will bear these two Senses, that a Couple, whatever Freedom or Familiarity they may use², cannot be Husband and Wife, unless they have pass'd their mutual Consent to live in Wedlock^b: Or, that so soon as both Parties are come to an Agreement, the Matrimonial Contract ought to be esteem'd perfect, even before the Ceremony of the Bed. Our Judgment on this Point is this, that as it is requisite to the full transferring of Propriety, that the Thing be plac'd under the Power of another, in such manner, that he may dispose of it at his Pleasure; so to make a Wife, it seems necessary, that the Woman deliver her self as it were into the Possession of the Man, for the common Ends of Matrimony: But it is by no means essential to this Agreement, that the Bed begin it. It is said Rebecca became Isaac's Wife after he had brought her into his Mother Sarah's Tent^c. And I question whether we ought to call it Adultery, when a Woman betroth'd to a Man in his Absence, but not led home to his House, nor given into his Possession, is bedded by another Person: although we suppose, that the former Engagement, as made by Proxy, had in the Eye of the Law the full Force of consummated Marriage. On the other side, it would be absurd to say, that Tobias's Wife had not a Title to that Name the three first Nights^d. Or that our Women are not Wives, when the Priest hath perform'd the solemn Office, 'till the Evening-Diversions of the Bride-Chamber.

According to the Opinion of the Jews^e, Consummation, as well as Consent, was, before the Law, required to the completing of Matrimony. Yet, by their Law, Consent alone render'd a Marriage valid^f. Grotius observes^g, that no Proceeding was made in the Nuptial Affairs, 'till

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XIV.

¹ So the Digests affirm. Nuptias enim non concubitus, sed consensus facit. l. 35. t. 1. De conditionibus & demonstrat. Leg. 15. & de Regul. Juris. Leg. 30.

² Or, as QUINCTILIAN, Decl. 247. expresseth it, Familiarities and Meetings without proper Rites can never make a Wife. Vid. Can. 5. caus. 27. quest. 2. & Cod. Lib. 5. t. 5. l. 8. de incest. & inutil. nupt. Leg. 8.

³ The three first Nights. The History of Tobias mentions no such thing. Moreover, the thing appears certain in it self, if we suppose the Story true; for the Text says only, that after Tobias had driven away the Evil Spirit, they both of them slept that Night. Chap. viii. 10.

^a Sect. 11.

^b And therefore Aeneas pleads for himself in Virgil,

----- Nec Conjugis unquam Prætendi tædas, aut hæc in fœdera veni.

I ne'er pretended to the lawful Claim
Of Sacred Nuptials, and a Husband's Name.

^c Genes. xxiv. ver. ult. ^d See Tob. viii. 10.
^{xxii. 23, 24.} Add. l. 8. C. de incest. & inutil. Nuptiis.

^e Vid. Selden de J. N. & G. l. 5. c. 4.
^f Ad. Matrh. l. 18. ^g Æn. 4. v. 338, 339. & Deuter. 10.

'till the Solemnity had been usher'd in by the hearing of Divine Service in a publick Assembly: Which most religious and most decent Institution, the Jews probably receiv'd from antient Tradition, and do still observe; and from them, it was admitted into the Christian Church. For this Reason, though at the settling of the Contract they oblig'd the Man to swear to preserve the Virgin's Honour, 'till the Day of Marriage; yet for the greater Security, they shut her up from him in the Apartment of the Women, till the time of that finishing Ceremony ^a.

XV. We are in the next place to enquire, whether by the Law of Nature the Matrimonial Bond be limited to a single Man, and a single Woman? Or, which is the same thing, whether Polygamy be naturally allow'd? Polygamy is of two Sorts; either when one Woman promiscuously admits of many Men, or when one Man is at the same time join'd in Marriage to many Women. To the former kind belongs the famous Platonical Communion of Wives: A Custom propos'd by Plato in Idea ^b; but really practis'd by ^c many Nations. Diodorus Siculus ^e reports of the Taprobanians in India, "That the Men did not confine themselves to strict Wedlock, but possess'd the fair Sex in common, and educated the Children (in whom they reckon'd themselves all concern'd) with Care and Love. Nay, the Nurfes oiten chang'd their little Infants, so as to hinder them from knowing their own Mothers." Cesar ^f tells us of the Antient Britains, Ten or Twelve of them together have Wives in common amongst them; especially Brothers with Brothers, Fathers with their Sons. But every Woman's Children are attributed to him, who first married her, when a Virgin. Where it is plain, that great Author cannot mean, that one Woman had, at the same time, ten or twelve Husbands, as Mr. Selden, amongst others, imagines; but that so many Men having each of them married his proper Wife, afterwards agreed upon that friendly Way of possessing them. Lycurgus, as Plutarch ^{*} delivers, "Endeavouring to prevent the vain womanish Passion of Jealousy, thought this the best Expedient, to allow honest Men the Freedom of each other's Bed: Laughing at those who resented, in so high a manner, these petty Injuries, as to pursue their Revenge by Mur-thers and War. He look'd on it as no indecent Custom for a Man, step'd into Years before his Wife, to recommend her to the Arms of a young and virtuous Friend; and, when there appear'd Hopes of having a Child by so good a Father, to challenge the Blessing to himself. On the other side, a good and upright Man, who esteem'd a married Woman for her own Virtue, and for the Comeliness of her Children, was encouraged to beg of her Husband, without Ceremony, the Favour of a Night's Lodging; That he might transplant into his own Garden some Slip of so goodly a Tree. Indeed Lycurgus was of Persuasion, that Children were not so much the Propriety of the Parents, as of the whole Commonwealth; and therefore he would not have them begotten by the first Comers, but by the best Men that could be found. He censur'd the Lawgivers of other States, who whilst they spared no Pains or Charge in promoting and improving the Breed of their Dogs, and of their Horses; yet, being themselves Old and Infirm, shut up their Wives from other Men. Whereas a little Reflexion would have taught them, that the Virtues and Vices of Children, their Success or Miscarriage, do chiefly redound to those who have the Care of their Education." And this Institution of the Spartan Founder, the Historian judgeth to have been set on foot, φυσικῶς ἢ πολιτικῶς, Agreeably to Nature and to Polity ^d.

The Stoicks ^e too were of Opinion, that wife Men ought to communicate their Beds, as well as their other Possessions: Because by this means all esteeming their Children their own, would love them with equal Tenderness; and there would be left no room for jealous Fears, no Suspicion of Adultery or Dishonesty ^f. The borrowing and lending of Wives, amongst the Romans, is a Practice much talk'd of by Authors ^g. Solon, in his Laws, permitted an Heirefs, whose Husband prov'd impotent, to call in the Assistance of his nearest Kinsman ^h.

Yet we are not to make the least Doubt but that all these licentious Indulgences are repugnant to the Law of Nature ⁱ. For the natural and regular End of Marriage is, the obtaining of Children, whom we may with Certainty call our own. But what room can there be

MR. BARR. NOTES on § XV.

^a Add. Diod. Sic. l. 2. c. 58. Of the Ischyophagi, l. 3. c. 15. Of the Hyllophagi, l. 3. c. 24. Of the Nomades, c. 32. which are likewise mention'd by STRABO, l. 7. Of the Garamantes, vid. Plin. l. 5. c. 8. Solin. c. 43. Of the Troglodyte Agatharcid. c. 30. Pompon. Mel. l. 1. c. 8. Of the Agathyrsi, Herodot. Melpom. p. 161. Ed. H. Steph. Of the Gindani and Nomades, ibid. Of the Inhabitants of Thule, SOLINUS reports (I know not with what Credit) that They hold their Women in common, and are Strangers to fixt Matrimony, c. 35.

^{*} De B. G. l. 5. c. 14.

[†] Lib. 5. cap. 11. The same Custom is mention'd, tho' not so distinctly, by XIPHILIN. Epit. Dion. in Ner. in Boudicca's Speech; and again in Sever. STRABO reports somewhat like this of the Sabæans: "Their Possessions (says he) lie in common to all of the same Blood and Family, but the eldest bears the chief Sway. One Wife serves them All: He that comes first hath Admission to her Bed, placing his Staff before the Chamber-door; But the Nights she passeth with the Eldest. They punish Adulterers with Death, and such they esteem every Intruder into another Family, lib. 16. p. 538. Vid. l. 11. p. 353, 354. de Massaget. & Tapyr. Of some Inhabitants of the Kingdom of Calecut, Ludovicus Romanus (Navig. l. 5. c. 8.) informs us, "That every Woman is at the same time married to Seven Husbands, who lodge with her by turns. When she is brought to Bed, she presents the Child to which of the seven Fathers she pleaseth, and no Appeal lies from her Determination, Vid. & Pet. de Valle Itiner. p. 3. Ep. 7. Juan. Buen. de Mir. Gent. l. 3. c. 7. reports of the Lithuanians, from Æneas Silvius, "That the Women, by Consent of their Husbands, have their Sparks, whom they call Assistants of their Bed; whereas on the other side, for the Husbands to use the like Liberty, would be accounted highly infamous.

^a Comp. Genes. xxiv. 67. Deuteron. xxi. 13. ^b Vid. l. 5. de Repub. & Marcil. Ficin. in Præfat. ^c L. 2. c. 58. ^d The same Law is mention'd by Xenophon, de Reb. & Leg. Lacedæmon. ^e In Diog. Laert. Zen. ^f Aid. Thom. Campanell. de Civit. Solis. ^g Vid. Plutarch, Num. & Cat. Min. So Cato is commonly said to have lent his Wife Marcia to Q. Hortensius. Vid. & Lucan. l. 2. v. 328. ^h Plutarch, Solon. ⁱ Comp. Mat. xxii. 25, &c. for for Distinction in this wild and confus'd Mixture? Again, The business of Nature not requiring so numerous a Concurrence, all these additional Helps and Services proceeded not from Necessity, but from Lust. Besides, a most material Objection against these Irregularities is, that the kind and endearing Titles of Relation are sunk and extinguish'd in them. Plato ^a proposeth by way of Remedy to this grand Inconvenience, that the civil Laws shall supply the Defect of natural Kindred; that all Persons shall esteem their Seniors in Age, as their Parents; their Juniors, as their Children; their Equals, as their Brothers and Sisters. But this is a most idle and vain Expedient; for to have no certain Father, no certain Child, &c. is, with regard to mutual Affection, the same thing as to have none at all. 'Tis well urg'd by Laſtantius ^b: If all, says he, are concern'd in every Child, who can love a Child as his own, when he must needs be ignorant, or at least doubtful, whether it be his own, or no? On the other side, Who would reverence a Man as his Father, when indeed he is uncertain to whom he owes his Being? Whence it comes to pass, that he must take a Stranger for his Father, and his Father for a Stranger. And it was a good Answer to one, admiring there should be no such thing as Adultery heard of in Sparta, That their very Matrimony was Adultery. Farther still; the main Difference betwixt the conjugal Union of Mankind, and the wild Freedom of coupling amongst the Beasts is, that the Wife engageth her Faith to be true to the Husband's Bed. Which Engagement, if he voluntarily release, and madly betray his own Honour to new Rivals, he is unworthy the Name, not only of a Husband, but of a Man; and is to be look'd upon as a most vile Disturber of human Decency and Society. As for the Excuse of Ly- cungus, and others of those antient Lawgivers, that so fair a Soil as a young Wife ought not to lie fallow, under the Neglect of an unactive Husband, their most ready and most honest Way of preventing such Mishaps, had been to prohibit Marriage between Persons of improper Years. And then for the Point of Jealousy, by it they must mean, either that senseless Passion, which torments a Man's Head without good Suspicion or Reason; or else a due and proper Vigilance and Caution, in order to the preserving a spotless Bed: The former kind of Jealousy, the most foolish, and the most miserable Disease of human Minds ^c; their Community of Wives could not cure; and the other being the just Effect of Reason and Prudence, it ought by no means to have taken away ^a ^d. Nor shall I ever be persuaded, that to lay all Possessions in common, and to give each Man the Privilege of calling every Thing his own, is the surest Method of preserving Peace and Friendship in the World. Every one must indeed acknowledge, that it is much more for the publick Benefit to have a State fill'd with healthy and vigorous, than with diseas'd and weakly Subjects; and at the same time, that the Parents Constitution hath a considerable Influence on the Child's. Yet, did this Rule hold true more generally than it doth, it were by no means worthy of so high Regard, as that in consideration of it we should dissolve the sacred Ties of Marriage, and shake the main Foundation of all good Order amongst Men ^e.

XVI. The other kind of Polygamy ^f, and that which more properly claims the Name, being the joint Relation of many Wives to one Husband, hath been the Practice of many Nations in antient and in modern Time. The Mosaical Law was so far from forbidding this

^a Mr. BAYLE, in his News-Letters against Maimbourg, Lett. xvii. § 5. maintains strongly, "That if we follow Reason, as distinct from Grace, and the Light of Faith, a Man need not more to scruple to lend his Wife than his Book, and that without the ridiculous Fear of Cuckolding. Reason would rather advise a Community than Propriety of Wives." I own, that here, as well as in many other Things, Men, for the Good of Society, might, by a certain Instinct, which prevents the Use of Reason, be led to it. If Hunger and Thirst did not often put us in mind of our Nourishment, we should often forget, or neglect to satisfy that natural Necessity; and so the World might be unpeopled. In like manner, were it not for that unquiet, and raging Passion, called Jealousy, which always attends the Love of a Woman, the Community of Women would be easily introduced, or at least Husbands for the most part would be very careless of the Honour of their Wives, and easy to permit them to communicate their Favours to others besides themselves. Not that Reason would incline them to it, but the contrary; because, as Men are ordinarily made, there are few that consult, or hearken to Reason, so that they must be led to their Duty by Sense. With Aristippus's good leave, as a Philosopher (cited by Mr. BAYLE, § 4.) he had very superficial and popular Ideas. If he us'd his Reason but a little, he might have discover'd without Revelation, that Man is a Creature made for Society, and that no Society can subsist without Order, and that Community of Women (as Mr. BAYLE owns) would breed Confusion in civil Society; so that Men must not be judg'd of as Beasts, by looking upon their Propagation, as a Thing absolutely indifferent, and as to which every one may regulate himself only according to his own Fancy. In his Case 'tis certain, that a Woman ought to be a Common Good, as the Water of a River; and so it would be a sordid Passion to be displeas'd, that another should quench his Thirst at the same Spring. But since, by God's Appointment, Man ought to propagate his Kind in a Manner suitable to a reasonable and sociable Creature, Jealousy in it self, and reduced to its just Bounds, is neither more unjust nor unreasonable, than the Inclination, which leads both Sexes to join together; and we may say, that Nature hath wisely put into Men that nice Humour, as a faithful Guardian of the Chastity of Women, which several Husbands would little trouble themselves for, and would have them loosed without it. All that is meant, is this, when a Woman is unfaithful to her Husband, without any just Cause from him, Reason requires, that he comfort himself, and say with the Comedian,

*If my Wife deceive me, she shall lament it;
I've done no Wrong, and can't repent it.*

*They'll call me Fool not to revenge it.
But I should be hardy to hasten my End.*

^a L. 5. de Repub. p. 658. A. Ed. Wsch.

^b Div. Instit. l. 3. c. 20.

^c Vid. Oppian. Cyneget. l. 3.

^d Vid. Senec. Herc. Oct. v. 233, &c.

^e The Argument which some are not ashamed to bring from our Ways of promoting the Breed in Horses, is too filthy and scandalous to deserve a Refutation. Add Aristotle's Discourse against Plato, on this Subject, Polit. 2. c. 2. It is a worthy Saying of his in the same Work, l. 7. c. 16. For Persons who are truly and properly Man and Wife, to seek another Partner, and another Bed, ought to be reckon'd amongst the vilest and most infamous of Offenders.

^f Vid. Grot. l. 2. c. 5. § 9.

Custom, that it seems in several places to support it ^a. And GOD, by the Prophet Nathan, reckons amongst the peculiar Favours and Blessings he had bestow'd on David, that He had given him his Master's Wives into his Bosom ^b. Mr. Selden ^c assures us, that the Jews esteem'd it lawful for a Man to marry as many Wives as he pleas'd, provided he could maintain them, and yield a Supply in all things answerable to their Relation. Yet it was the Advice of their sagest Rabbies, that for the avoiding the Inconveniences of Number, no Person should exceed Four, except the King. He that acted contrary to this Rule, was adjudg'd guilty of notorious Impudence, and of Disobedience to the Institutions of his Ancestors. The High Priest was allow'd one Wife at a time, tho' he was not hindered from marrying another, in case of the Death, or Divorce of his first. By the Prohibition of Deuteron. xvii. 17. they were persuaded, that their King ought not to go beyond Eighteen. If the Men of their Nation liv'd in a Country, where Polygamy was not tolerated, they thought them oblig'd to conform; as particularly in the Roman Empire, the Laws of which expressly restrain'd them from the Use of such a Liberty ^d. As for the modern Jews, we are inform'd by Leo Mutinensis ^e, That those of them who live in the East, still keep up their antient Practice of Polygamy; whereas in Germany they are not allow'd this Privilege, and in Italy very rarely; and only in case a Man hath liv'd with his present Wife many Years without Issue ^f.

Tacitus ^g observes of the antient Germans; They are almost the only People amongst the Barbarians, who are contented with single Marriages. Indeed some few Persons of extraordinary Merit are advanced to the Favour of more Ladies than one; but then they are courted to this Liberty, not out of Lust, but upon account of their singular Virtues and Worth. Thus Cesar ^h tells us of Ariovistus's two Wives, chosen out of different Nations.

The Grecians, according to their regular Frame and Constitution, admitted but of one Wife; yet we find in one of the Athenian Decrees an Exception to this purpose, That to increase the Number of Men, at present deficient, it shall be lawful for any Person to have Children by another Woman, besides her that is in a more strict sense, his Wife ⁱ. And hence Atheneus ^j urging the Improbability of the common Story, that Socrates had two Wives, inasmuch as this was contrary to the primitive Ordinance of Cecrops, and was not objected to him by the Comedians, who handled him so reproachfully on other Occasions; at last concludes, that if the matter of Fact were really true, it must proceed from a particular Order of State, dispensing with the antient Strictness, by reason of the present Scarcity of Subjects. In Gellius ^k, among the several Causes alledg'd, why Euripides should get the Title of the Woman-Hater, this is brought as one, that he had two Wives together (the Athenian Government at that time allowing it) who made him quite weary of Matrimony, and quite out of love with the Sex. Amongst the Spartans, we find in Herodotus ^l, that when their King Anaxandrides refus'd to put away his Wife, on the account of Barrenness, he was compell'd by the Authority of the Ephori, to admit another to his Bed, who did not lie under the same Imperfection. Every Body knows, that the Romans were content, each Man with his single Wife ^m. Yet Suetonius ⁿ reports, that it was once in Julius Cesar's Head, to introduce a Law, to give Men Licence to marry what Sort, and what Number of Wives they thought fit, for the better stocking the Commonwealth. Socrates, the Ecclesiastical Historian ^o, reports of the Emperor Valentinian, that whilst his Wife Severa was living, he admitted to the same Honour the most beautiful Lady Justina; and publish'd an Order through his whole Dominions, permitting every Man to follow his Example; To have Two lawful Wives. Paulus Diaconus ^p gives the same Relation; and Zonaras mentions the Emperor's Two Wives, though he says nothing of the Law enacted on that Occasion. But in as much as the other Historians, Ammianus, Zozimus, and Orosius, together with the Christian Fathers, who so often discuss the Questions concerning Matrimony, are absolutely silent in this Point; Baronius ^q concludes the double Marriage of Valentinian, and the Law in Justification of it, to be perfect Forgeries.

Mahomet in his new Institution allow'd of Polygamy; craftily accommodating his Doctrines to the Temper of the People, whom he intend'd to deceive. For as the Force of Love is stronger in the Men of those Eastern Parts, so the Women, either by their natural Genius, or by the Power of Education, live in such perfect Subjection to their Husbands, that their Jealousies and Quarrels are seldom considerable enough to disturb the Peace and Union of the Family. Yet the wealthier Men shut up their Wives in separate Houses, or confine them to distinct Towns, to prevent Dissention ^r. Boccaline ^s will have this Indulgence to have been a Device, to dispose Men the better for a Life of Slavery; whilst dividing their Riches amongst so large a Progeny, they must continually grow weaker, and more absolutely at the Command of the Government. A Thought very ingenious indeed, and of refin'd Policy; and such as probably never enter'd into Mahomet's Head, who died so long a time before the Establishment of the Turkish Tyranny and Empire. As for the Indians, Travellers inform us, that the chief Reason why several of their Princes have refus'd to imbrace the Christian Faith, hath been because, amongst other Conditions, it was required of them, to admit no more than one Woman to their Bed ^a.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XVI.

^g Tacit. de Mor. German. c. 18.

^a See Deuteron. xxi. 15. xvii. 16, 17, & loc. Ambrosii, apud Gratian. Caus. 32. quæst. 4. c. 3, 7. ^b 2 Sam. xii. 8. ^c De Rit. De Uxore Hebraic. l. 1. c. 9. ^d L. 8. C. de Jud. &c. Add. Selden. de J. N. & G. 5. c. 6. ^e De Rit. Hebra. p. 4. c. 2. f. 2. ^f Here Mr. Selden observes, that in the first Edition was added, Indulta tamen Romani Pontificis impetrato, "Yet not without procuring the Indulgence or Dispensation of the Pope"; which Words are omitted in the Paris Edit. 1637. ^g De B. G. l. 1. c. 53. n. 4. ^h Ding. Laert. Socrat. l. 2. § 26. ⁱ L. 13. c. 1. ^k L. 15. c. 20. ^l Terpsichore, p. 190. Ed. H. Steph. Vid. Potter Archaeol. Græ. l. 4. c. 11. p. 599. ^m Vid. Cod. lib. 5. t. 5. l. 2. de Incest. Nupt. & lib. 9. t. 9. l. 18. C. ad L. Jul. de Adult. ⁿ C. 52. ^o L. 4. c. 26. ^p L. 11. ^q Tom. 4. ad. A. Chr. 370. §. 125. ^r Richer. de Morib. Turc. ^s Ragg. di Parnass.

XVII. Whether or no this Practice be repugnant to the Law of Nature, is a Point not fully settled amongst the Learned. It shall be our Business to propose fairly the Arguments on both sides, leaving the decisive Judgment to be pass'd by the Reader. Those then, who maintain Polygamy, as we now understand it, to be in it self agreeable to natural Law, argue in this manner: The regular End of Matrimony, that is, the Certainty of Off-spring, and the Benefit of mutual Assistance, is as well answer'd under these Allowances, as under the strictest Confinement. It is an idle Objection, which some make, That at this rate the conjugal Faith will not be reciprocal, a Condition which Reason it self requires as essentially necessary to every Covenant. For mutual Faith doth by no means suppose, that the Performances on each side must needs be equal. Nor doth the true Intent of Matrimony demand, that the Man should confine his Desires so streightly as the Woman. The Reason why one Woman ought to take up with one Man, being the great Danger of the Uncertainty of Issue; which Hindrance doth not lie in the way of the other Sex. Yet is not the Husband less oblig'd to make good his Faith to every Wife; which Performance consists in the yielding her all due conjugal Help, Kindness, and Support. As for the main End of Marriage, the obtaining of Children, one Man is, in this respect, equal to many Women; at least to such as are Moderate and Virtuous ^a. And therefore it is chiefly Lust and Intemperance which makes Women so averse to Polygamy. Indeed, if a Wife, at her first Contract with her Husband, bind him under an Engagement to admit no Partners with her of his Bed (as Laban ^b bound Jacob in Behalf of his Daughters) such a Covenant is faithfully to be perform'd ^c. Where no such Condition is made, there the Wife ought to rest satisfied with a competent Share in the Husband ^d. Nor doth she in this Case suffer any Injury; for she can have no more Right over her Husband's Body, than what she obtain'd by the Matrimonial Compact: But in that Compact she receiv'd a Right only to a Part of the Man, and voluntarily agreed to this imperfect Possession. And therefore she hath only Reason to complain of her Husband, when, as Plautus ^e says, He lets his own Field lie fallow to plough another Man's. Nor doth this Allowance of Polygamy, as some object, reduce the Women into the Condition of Slaves. Nor is it any Crime, to place the weaker Sex in an inferior Degree to the stronger, to whom they owe their Defence and Support ^f. The Reasons alledg'd on the other side, taken from the fatal Effects of Jealousy, the Danger of Domestic Quarrels, the Hatred of the rival Mothers transmitted to their various Race, do not amount to a Proof, that Polygamy is naturally unlawful; but then the same Inconveniences appear, as in all, so especially in second Marriages, which no one will upon this account term unlawful. Nor are the Troubles and Misfortunes of this kind equal in all Places; but they are chiefly to be discover'd in those Countries, where either the Women have too high and commanding Spirits, or the Men too low and servile. In many Nations the Wives, either by their natural Disposition, or by Custom and Education, pay a more strict and quiet Obedience ^g. And besides, it is no difficult Task, for a Man of tolerable Prudence and Discretion, to keep the Family-peace amongst several Women ^h.

XVIII. Those, who deny Polygamy to be agreeable to the Law of Nature, chiefly insist on the Seventh Commandment in the Decalogue, Thou shalt not commit Adultery; which must be acknowledg'd to affect the Man, as well as the Woman, And therefore, say they, if the Prohibition lies on both Parties, the Husband must be guilty of Adultery, whenever he receives into the Covenant of Marriage, or into the Possession of his Bed, another Woman, against the Consent of Her to whom he first plighted his Faith, and gave the Power over his Body ⁱ.

In return to this Argument, Antonius Mattheus ^k, the Civilian, affirms, that Adultery cannot be committed, either by Polygamy, or be-

^a Add. Abrah. R. de Bravin. p. 1. c. 13. & Alex. de Rhodis Itinerar. p. 2. c. 11. Add. Nouv. Memoires de la Chine. Tom. 2. l. 4. & WILL. BOSSMAN'S Voyage to Guinea, Lett. 19. & Mr. BAYLE'S Nouvelles de Avril, 1685. as also LYSTER'S Book, entituled, Polygamia Triumphatrix.

^b Especially, if they imitate Zenobia, Queen of the Palmyrenes, who would not admit the Embraces of her Husband upon any other Account, than the obtaining of Children. Trebell. Poll. in xxx. Tyran. cap. 30.

^c Add. Lib. 45. t. 1. l. 121. f. 1. D. de Verb. Obligat.

^d See Genes. xxx. 15, 16. Herodot. Thalia, pag. 120. Ed. H. Steph.

^e The Persian Wives take their turns and Courses with their Husbands. Asinar. Act. 5. Sc. 2. Add.

^f lib. 48. t. 5. l. 13. f. 5. D. ad l. Jul. de Adult. & ad eam Grot. in Flor. Spars. ad Jus Justinian.

^g Women are seldom so very ambitious of Honour, as to be satisfied with the Excuse which Ælius Verus (in Spartian) gave his Lady, when she complain'd of his Mistresses: Give me leave, says he, to satisfy my Inclinations by some other means: A Wife is a Name of Dignity, not of Pleasure. Add. Plaut. Mercat. Act. 4. Sc. ult. Gratian, Cauf. 32. Qu. 6. c. 2, &c.

^h 'Tis a Saying of Euripides in Sappho, ver. 40. That Women who are wise, will transact every Thing by Men.

ⁱ Vid. Benzo, Hist. Nov. Orb. p. 1. c. 37.

^j The Reasons urg'd by Dionys. Golofred. (ad Lib. 1. t. 9. l. 7. C. de Judicis, &c.) will be found upon Examination, very slight and trivial.

^k Gratian. Cauf. 32. Quæst. 5. cap. 15, 16, 23. Vid. Bæcker. ad Grot. l. 2. c. 5. f. 9. Hobbes hath made some kind of Reply to this, in his Sixth Chapter de Gibe. f. 16. and in his 14th Chapter, f. 9. which we shall elsewhere take occasion to examine in lib. 7. c. 1.

^l De Crimin. ad L. Jul. de Adulter. c. 1. l. 13.

tween a married Man and an unmarried Woman ^a, but only with another Man's Wife ^b. Nor will he allow every Violation of the Marriage-Covenant to be the Sin of Adultery: For we never call him an Adulterer, who maliciously forsakes his Wife, who refuseth to give her Maintenance, and the like; yet such a Man, without doubt, breaks his matrimonial Faith. He ^c adds, " altho' it be unjust in the Husband, to require a stricter Chastity of his Wife, than he practiseth himself; yet this by no means proves the Sin on both sides to be equal. For every one knows, that the Wife is, upon many Accounts, oblig'd to a much severer Degree of Moderation and Purity; in regard, as well to the Modesty of the Sex, as to the Danger of confus'd Amours, and of a supposititious Breed; as likewise to prevent the Scandal her Lightness would bring, not only on her own Family, but on the Government under which she lives. For if it be reckon'd so very disgraceful to be born of Parents, one of whom is a Native, the other a Foreigner, in so much that in most Countries a Name of Reproach is fix'd on Persons of this motly Race; how much fouler an Infamy would it prove, as well to the whole State, as to particular Men, should it be left uncertain, whether the Subjects are born in Adultery, or in lawful Marriage? In Leviticus ^d Adultery is defin'd, The coming to another Man's Wife, the polluting another Man's Bed. Nor can it on any account appear probable, that a Law against Adultery, directed to a People who actually used Polygamy, should forbid this Practice, without declaring as much in express Words. Those Expressions of holy Scripture ^e, and of the primitive Fathers ^f, which seem to make the coveting, or desiring another Man's Wife, to be Adultery, are to be understood in the same Sense, as when he that bates his Brother ^g, is stil'd a Murderer."

Others choose to answer thus, " The Commandment alledg'd doth indeed bind Men, as well as Women: And therefore for one Husband to dishonour another's Bed, is no less sinful, than for a Wife to defile the Bed of her proper Husband. But then Polygamy doth not make the Husband guilty of this Trespass against his Neighbour. It is true, if in the Original Contract between the Parties it was expressly provided, that the Man should transfer the whole Power over his Body to the Woman, then in case he brings an Usurper to her Bed, whether under the Name of an Harlot, or of a Wife, he certainly violates his Faith given in the former Matrimony. But we have no such Charge of Perjury to lay against him, if at the first Marriage he reserv'd to himself the Liberty of adding a second Consort, as a Partner to her whom he then receiv'd. Nor can he be said to defraud her, in as much as he bargain'd to " allow her only a Share in himself." To this it is reply'd, That we must not suppose the Woman would thus consent to her own Loss and Injury, unless either compell'd by Force, or Fear, or mov'd by Weakness and Defect of Judgment; neither of which Causes are able to found a Right in the Man. But the Assertors of the other Opinion will not grant, that there is any Injury in the present Case. " All the Right and Title, say they, that one Person can have to the Body of another, must arise from Covenant, and from the Consent of that other Party. And consequently, if so much be perform'd, as was fairly covenanted for, there ought to be no Complaint of Injurious dealing. It is no good Consequence to say, that because, in just and true Matrimony, the Husband receives the full and perfect Possession of the Wife; therefore the Wife obtains the same absolute Title to the Husband. Nor will such an unequal Covenant prejudice the natural equality of Mankind. For to save this, it is not necessary, that the mutual Performances amongst all Persons should be exactly alike: If so, it would be repugnant to the Law of Nature, that one Man should be born a Prince, another a Subject, and both by virtue of an antecedent human Covenant, not made by themselves, but by others. Will any one be so extravagant as to maintain, that 'tis a Breach of natural Equality, unless the Wife be allow'd her Turn of Governing, as well as the Husband? And there is the same Difference observable in the Care of the common Off-spring: How little Trouble doth this bring to the Father, in comparison to the grievous Pains undergone by the Mother? Would it not be a most ridiculous Proposal, for the Women of State to desire a Part in the supreme Administration? And yet we must not say, that the Men are guilty of Injury and Tyranny for excluding the fair Sex from this honourable Privilege. Should any People be of such a Temper, as to desire the Establishment of a stricter Government (which the bolder Patrons of Liberty are wont to call, the Treatment of Slaves) if they too freely indulge the Reins to the new Power, they act foolishly, and transgress that ruling Prudence, which is the best-lov'd Sister of natural Law. So that to commiserate the Condition of the Wives in Turky, &c. is as absurd and impertinent, as to bestow our Pity on Husbandmen and Artificers, and condoling with them, that they should be so unfortunate, as to live in more uneasy Circumstances, than the Nobility. The Reason why a Husband cannot honestly admit another Man to partake of his Bed, is built upon a different Bottom. On the whole it may be concluded, that a Woman lies under no restraint of Conscience, from agreeing to this Kind of Matrimony, in a Country where the Practice is publickly receiv'd. Especially, since

Mr. BARB. NOTE on § XVIII.

¹ So the Digests speak, Periniquam videtur esse, ut pudicitiam vir ab uxore exigat, quam ipse non exhibeat. Lib. 48. tit. 5. Ad Leg. Jul. de adulteris coercendis, Leg. 13. § 5.

^a S. 12. ^b L. 6. f. 2. D. h. t. ^c Levit. xviii. 20. xx. 10. ^d Matt. v. 28. ^e Produced by Gratium, cap. 3, 4, & 1. quæst. 4. caus. 32. & c. 5. quæst. 6. caus. ealem. C. 4. 10. De eo qui cognov. Conjugam. Uxor. fæc. ^f 1 John iii. 15.

“ if it were in any degree Vicious, yet the bare Force of the weaker Sex could never prevail to the beating down a publick Custom; nor would all of them join in the Attempt: Some being ever more kind and friendly than others, and more unwilling to engage against the Men ^a. The Example of the Heathens, and of the Mahometans (who are allow'd four Wives, and as many Concubines as they can maintain) may indeed be of no great Force in the Argument; because it appears, that those People are guilty of many Violations of the Law of Nature; but the Polygamy of the Fathers, under the old Covenant, is a Reason, that ingenuous Men must confess to be unanswerable. As to the Saying of the Apostle, 1 Cor. vii. 4. it doth not seem to teach the primary Design and Use of Matrimony, but only the secondary and indirect End, the avoiding Fornication: which End belonging in the same degree to the Man and to the Woman, Humanity and Equity enjoin, that the same Provision should in this respect be made for both Parties; and then it follows, that the Husband ought not to deny his Wife conjugal Favours. But the communi“ cating his Favours to others besides her, doth not here seem to be forbidden.

XIX. However it be, this is very clear and certain, that the most decent, the most proper, and the most peaceable Way of Wedding is, for one to live contented with one. This then is, without all doubt, to be esteem'd the highest, and the most perfect Kind of Matrimony; and the Laws and Conditions of it are most religiously to be observ'd, as well by the Husband, as the Wife ^{1 2 3}. It is worth remarking, that where several Wives are allow'd to one Man, he seldom fails to single out a Beloved, whom in all respects he prefers to the rest ^b. Thus Nature it self seems, out of Multitude, to lead us into Unity. 'Tis a wife Observation that of Salust ⁴, The Relation, says he, of a Son-in-law, is but slightly esteem'd amongst the Numidians, and the Moors ⁵: And the reason is, because they marry each as many Wives, as they think agreeable to their Fortune and Grandeur; some Ten, some more, and their Princes with a far wider Liberty. Thus the Mind is divided and distracted with Number, and all are despis'd, because all cannot be lov'd ^c.

⁶ Grotius ^d assigns these Reasons for the

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XIX.

¹ Euripid. Andromach. v. 464, &c.

Οὐδέ ποτ' εἴδιδουσα
 Αἰχίρ' ἰταμίωσεν ἑσπέρην,
 Οὐδέ' ἀμυμμάτερον κορπεῖ,
 Ἴδεν ἢ κίμων,
 Δοσμητίς τε λύπαις.
 Τὴν μὲν μοι σιγήτω πόσις γάμοις
 Ἀκατάβητον δὴν ἀνδρός.

-----Ne'er will I commend
 More Beds, more Wives than one; nor Children curs'd
 With double Mothers, Banes and Plagues of Life.
 Let each good Man possess his single Bride,
 And check the Intrusion of a Rival Dame.

Isoocrates Nicol. p. 59, 60. Edit. Paris. “ I cannot but greatly condemn those, who having entred upon a Married State for their whole Life, neglect afterwards to stand to the Agreement; but giving a Loose to their Pleasures, injure those dear Partners; from whom they expect nothing but Kindness and Comfort. In other Bargains, they are wont to practise Justice and Honesty, and yet make no scruple to violate the nuptial Contract, which ought to be so much more strictly observ'd than all others, as it is of more sacred Obligation, and of nearer and more important Concern.”

² Plaut. Mercat. Act. 5. Sc. 1. v. 8.

*Nam uxor contenta est, quæ bona est, uno viro;
 Quæ minus vir unâ uxore contentus fiet?*

A good Wife is contented with one Husband,
 And why should not an Husband with one Wife?

Plutarch. de Præcept. Conjugal. “ They say, that a Cat, upon smelling certain Essences or Perfumes, is driven to Madness. Did the same Effect hold in Women, ought not Men to abstain from using such Perfumes, rather than cause so great Misfortune for the sake of a worthless Pleasure? Why, the Dishonesty of a Husband is as likely a Means to throw his Wife into Distraction, as the most offensive Smell could be: And consequently, it is most unjust, on the account of an idle Satisfaction, to bring so grievous Affliction on an innocent Person; and not rather to preserve the Nuptial-Bed uncommunicated and unstain'd.”

³ Clytemnestra in Eurip. Electra, v. 1035, &c.

Μᾶλλον ἢ εἴν ζωστικῆς, ἢε ἄλλας λίγας
 Ὅταν δ' ἰσπρίθω ἴσθδ', ἄμαρ πάλιν πόσις,
 Τῆσδιν παρσόντις λίγας μιμνήσκω δίλει
 Γυνὴν ἢ ἀνδρα, καὶ ἀπὸν κλέσται αἰλον.
 Καπεταί, ἐν ἡμῖν ὁ φόβος, λαμπρωσίται,
 Οἰδ' αἶπις πῶν δ', εἰ κλύσο' ἀνδρες κακῶν.

Women are Fools: 'tis own'd; and by a Woman:
 But when Men take Advantage of the Folly,
 Slight home, and scout abroad for lawless Love;
 No wonder if the Dames return the Wrong,
 Seek out new Mates, and practise as they're taught.

⁴ Salust's Words are, Etiam antea Jugurthæ filia Boccho nupserrat. Verum ea necessitudo apud Numidas, Maurosque levis ducitur, quia singuli pro opibus, quisque quam plurimas uxores, denas alii, plures alii habent, sed Reges eo amplius. Ita animus multitudinè distractitur, nullam pro fœcia obtinet, pariter omnes viles sunt. In Bell. Jugurth. c. 82.

⁵ Claudian de Bello Gildon, ver. 442. makes this Reflection on the same People of Africa:

-----Connubia mille:
 Non illis generis nexus, non pignora curæ;
 Sed numero languet Pietas.

-----A Thousand nuptial Bands they wear,
 Blood is no Union, nor their Race their Care;
 But Love expires in Number.-----

⁶ We may here add the Reflexions of the famous Mr. BAYLE, in his News-Letters upon the Occasion of F. Maimbourg's critical History of Calvinism. It is certain from the Experience of all Countries, where Polygamy is allow'd, that the Peace of Families is not so great in them, as among Christians. And as for those Banterers, that would have Women to be taken upon tryal, and if Men did not like them, leave them: I answer them, That if this Liberty were permitted Husbands only, 'twould be unjust; and if it were granted to both Sides, the Husbands would be catch'd; for when they would keep to their first Market, their Wife would not agree to it, and so they'd see themselves obliged to leave Things as they were, to avoid greater Trouble.-----As a Servant never does his best but for two or three of the first Weeks, so it would be in the Service of new Husbands, who take Wives upon tryal. Women would not pass all their youthful Days in such Tryals. This being so, our Banterers would get so little by it, that they'd find it the shortest and best way to keep to the Christian Institution, tho' there were no Command from God to authorise it. lett. xxii.

^a Ijiah iv. 1. ^b Genes. xxix. 29. Deuter. xxi. 15. Esther ii. 17. Cant. vi. 7, 8. ^c To the same purpose Amm. Marcellinus (l. 23. c. 12.) speaks of the Parthians, Their Affection grows cool and languid, by the unbounded Variety they make use of in their Pleasures. ^d De Verit. Rel. Christ. Procop. Hist. Vandal. l. 2. Be Ye concern'd for your Children, say the Barbarians, who are chain'd to the Necessity of a single Bed: As for Us, who, if we please, can have Fifty Brides together, we are in no fear of wanting Posterity. Eurip. Androm. v. 177, &c.

Reception of single Marriage amongst Christians; That the Wife, bestowing herself entirely on the Husband, may receive the equal return of his whole Heart and Affection: That the Family-Affairs may be carried on with more regularity under a single Mistress; and that many Mothers may not create Feuds and Quarrels amongst the Children. To which we may add, that after the sufficient Multiplication of Mankind, Polygamy ought, amongst all Nations of tolerable Civility, to be restrain'd on this politic Account, that by too great a Number of Children the nobler Family must in time be reduced to Poverty, the meaner to Beggary, and the State oppressed with an idle Swarm of baser Populacy: which if not prevented and thrown off (as it cannot always be) will at length overturn all Order and Government, and sink the Commonwealth under its own Weight ^a. We are told that the Turks themselves, in the Point of Marriage, do not now take the same Liberty as they formerly us'd, and as their Law allows: The Cause of which alteration is, not perhaps so much the Increase of bestial Lust amongst them, as their Experiences of the Inconveniences and Mischiefs attending Polygamy.

XX. Another Controversy, no less warmly manag'd, is, Whether Matrimony, by the Law of Nature be a Society, or Partnership, capable of being dissolv'd; and consequently, Whether Divorces be by the same Law allowable? And here we shall take the same Course as before, to lay down the Strefs of what both Parties urge upon the Point, leaving the considerate Reader to pass Judgment for himself. First of all, it is taken for granted, that according to the common nature of Covenants, one Party cannot recede, unless the other hath either broken the Agreement, or else yielded his Consent to this Release.

It will therefore be repugnant to the Law of Nature for either of the married Couple to depart from the other unconsenting, only for the Improvement of Condition, or Satisfaction of Humour, without being able to alledge any Breach of the matrimonial Pact on the other's side. Nor, can the ¹ Indulgence of the Roman Law ^b, in some Cases of Partnership, be brought to justify a Desertion of this kind. For, besides that the relinquish'd Party is most certainly endamaged ²; an Union enter'd into upon account of Gain, may much more easily admit of Separation, than this most strict and sacred Tie between Man and Wife. For in Marriage the Parties acquire a Right over the Bodies of each other, which ought not, on either side, to be taken from them against their Will. And indeed, tho' there should be a mutual Consent of the Parties, yet it would be both indecent and unsafe to allow the dissolving of Marriage, without ³ very weighty Cause: In as much as this Liberty of frequent Divorces must exceedingly shock the Strength, and Credit of Families; and the Grace and good Order ⁴ of the whole Commonwealth ^c. And the same Reason will hold in Esposals, which although no farther Progress hath been made in order to their Consummation, yet ought not to be broken off by the Act and Motion of the Parties contracted, unless some extraordinary Occasion fall out; or some of those Conditions are found defective, on the supposal of which the Validity of the Covenant dependeth ^d. Dionysius Halicarnassensis exceedingly commends the Institution of Romulus, by which he order'd one sort of Marriage ^e, solemniz'd with the greatest Ceremony, to be incapable of Divorces. This Law (says the Historian) engag'd the Wives ^f (who had no Re-

MR. BARR. NOTES on § XX.

¹ The Words are, Sed etsi convenit, nō intra certum tempus societate abeat, & ante tempus renunciatur, potest rationem habere renunciatio.

² They suppose on the contrary, that he that withdraws, doth it either because the other Party hath broken some Condition, to which he was obliged by the Contract; or because he hath suffered some Wrong, Nec tenebitur pro jocio, qui ideo renunciavit, quia conditio quedam, quā societas erat coita, ei non profuitur; aut quid, si ita injuriosus & damnosus socius sit, ut non expediat eum pati? Digest. ibid.

³ The very Nature and End of that Society proves, that it ought to continue a long time; for we marry not only to have Children, but to bring 'em up. Now a Woman is capable of Conception, and usually finds her self big a considerable time before a Child which is born, is able to provide for its Needs; so that the Husband ought to remain with her till her Children are grown up, and of Age to subsist, either of themselves, or with such Goods as he gives them. We see, that by the admirable Wisdom of the Creator, this Rule is constantly observ'd by the Creatures destitute of Reason. Amongst the Beasts, which feed on Grasse and Herbs, the Society of the Male and Female remains no longer than the time of Copulation; because the Milk of the Dam is sufficient to nourish the Young, till they can feed upon the same Herbs. But as to Lion, and other Beasts of a Prey, seeing the Dam is not able to provide for her young Ones, the Male also hunts for them. We may observe the same thing in all Birds, unless it be tame Fowl, who live in such Places as afford them plenty of Food. But tho' the Conjugal Union of the Husband and Wife continues longer than that of other Creatures, yet there is nothing in that Union (as I think) that can require them to remain together all their Lives, after they have brought up their Children, and put them into a way of Living: That depends, as all other voluntary Engagements do, upon the Contract of Marriage, unless they live in such a State where the positive Laws command, that that Contract should be for Life. This is taken out of Mr. Lock's Treatise of Government, Part. II. Cap. 7. § 2. &c. See also ALGERNOON SIDNEY'S Discourse of Government, Chap. 2. § 4. in fin.

⁴ This would produce many Adulteries; for a Man, who in his Anger, or some other Passion, hath put away his Wife for a small Cause, may be reconcil'd to her, when she is married to another, and the Familiarity he has had with her, may easily afford him a means to maintain the antient Conversation in private. Besides, were the Women left thus to the Humour and Inconstancy of Men, what must Children suppose, when they see their Mother expell'd for no Cause, or for Trifles? And how can they have any Respect afterward for them from whom they have receiv'd their Beings?

⁵ The Ceremony was called, Confarreatio, because the married Couple, after a solemn Sacrifice had been offer'd by the Pontiff, who had join'd them with a set Form of Words, eat of the same Barley-Cake which had been used in the Sacrifice. See LIPSIVS on Tacit. Annal. Lib. 4. Chap. 16.

⁶ DION. HALICARNASSEUS'S Greek is; ὅστις ὁ νόμος τὰς τιγαυήρας ἐντάλας τὰς γυναῖκας, ἢ ἀνδράσιν ἰστέον ἐπέθετο, ὡς ἐκ τῆς τῆς γυναικῶν τῆς ἀρετῆς, ἢ τῆς ἀνδρῶν, ἢ ἀναγκῆς τῆς ἀναγκαίης χροναίῃ, ἢ γυναικῶν κατὰ τὴν Lib. 2. p. 95. Ed. Sylb.

^a It is a most barbarous Way which the People of Angola in Africk use, to get rid of their vast Stock of Men, occasion'd by Polygamy, when they sell their superfluous Numbers to the Americans for Slaves.

^b Vid. Nal. Max. l. 2. c. 9. f. 2.

^c Add. Gell. l. 4. c. 4.

^d Digest. Lib. 17. t. 2. l. 14. § 70

fuge,

fuge; nothing to trust to in Case of a Rupture) to yield a ready Compliance to the Temper of their Husbands: And it obliges the Husbands, on the other side, to use their Wives as a necessary Possession, which they could not, on any account, throw up, or desert. And one may reckon among the chief Causes of the Decay and Corruption of the Roman State, their too frequent Practise of Divorces, either upon so slight Pretences, or upon none at all ^a. Amnianus Marcellinus reports of the Saracens what seems very agreeable to their barbarous Customs. They hire Wives, says he ^b, to serve a present Turn: And to make some shew and semblance of Matrimony, the Woman presents her Mock-Husband with a Spear and a Tent; at the fix'd Day, she may, if she pleaseth, break up and seek a new Mate. Vivenius ^c informs us, that the Dutch, now and then, contract this kind of Marriage in Japan; having liberty to release themselves at their leaving the Island. The like is practis'd in many other Parts of the Indies, and the Kingdom of Persia ^d. How vile doth the Roman Liberty appear in Juvenal ^e?

*Cur desiderio Bibula Sertorius ardet?
Si verum excutias; facies, non uxor, amatur.
Tres rugæ subeant, & se cutis arida laxet,
Fiant celsuri dentes, oculique minores;
Collige sarcinulas, dicet libertus: & exi;
Fam gravis es nobis, & sæpe emungeris; exi
Ocyus, & propera; sicco venit altera naso.*

These Truths with his Example you disprove,
Who with his Wife is monstrously in love:
But know him better: For I heard him swear.
'Tis not that she's his Wife, but that she's fair.
Let her but have three Wrinkles in her Face.
Let her Eyes lessen, and her Skin unbrace;
Soon you will hear the saucy Steward say,
Pack up, with all your Trinkets, and away;
You grow offensive both at Bed and Board;
Your Betters must be had to please my Lord.

Mr. DRYDEN.

For really, as Claudian ^f observes,

*Fœmina cum senuit, retinet connubia partu;
Uxorisque decus matris reverentia pensat.*

A Matron for her fruitful Bed we praise:
And the Wife's Charms the Mother's Awe repays.

And how scandalous was that Law of Charondas, mention'd by Diodorus Siculus ^g, giving Liberty

^g PUBLIUS SYRUS'S Latin is, v. 252, 425.

*Habent locum maledicti crebræ nuptiæ,
Mulier, quæ multis nubit, multis non placet.*

Many Marriages are next to many Curses. A Woman that marries often, displeaseth often. Tacit. Ann. 2. c. 86.

Mr. BARR. NOTES on § XXI.

¹ St. Paul allows a Dissolution of Marriage, upon this account, 1 Cor. vii. 15. If an Unbeliever (either a Man or Wife of a Christian) departs, let him depart; a Brother, or a Sister, is not under an Obligation in such a Case; i. e. he is not so bound to him, as either to recall him, or live without marrying.

² Senec. de Benef. l. 3. c. 16. Who is now ashamed of breaking the Nuptial Union, when so many Ladies of Eminence and Quality reckon their Years, not by the Number of Consuls, but of Husbands; and are divorc'd in hopes of marrying, and marry in hopes of being divorc'd?
^b L. 19. c. 3. ^c Japon. c. 13. ^d Olear. Itin. Pers. l. 5. c. 22. Petrus de Valle Itin. P. 2. Ep. 17. ^e Sat. 6 v. 141, &c. ^f In Eutrop. l. 1. v. 72, 73. Add. Martial. L. 10. Ep. 41.
^g L. 12. c. 18. p. 83. Ed. Rhodom. ^h Hist. Gotb. l. 4. ⁱ Vid. Plutarch. Amator. p. 769. & in Solon. p. 89.
Aristot. Oecon. Lib. 1. c. 4. Diog. Laert. in Pythag. Laſtant. l. 5. c. 23. Gratian. Caus. 3. Quæst. 5. c. 1, &c. ^k Vid. Selden. de Uxore Hebraica, l. 3. c. 6, 7. Montaigne's Essays, L. 3. c. 50.

to Husband, or Wife, after a Divorcé, to choose a new Partner, provided they did not pitch on a younger than the former?

Besides all this, to put away a Wife looks heinous in the Eyes of all the World, and loads the Woman with so much Reproach, that it would appear most Base and Unworthy to proceed in so severe a manner, unless upon some extraordinary Grounds and Provocation. And this may extend it self as well to the Business of Contracts, as of the more solemn and perfect Marriage. Thus when Radigis, in Procopius ^h, having espoused the celebrated Brittia, broke off the Match without being able to allege any Crime on her side; the Historian tells us, She, unable to bear the Scandal, bent all her Thoughts and Resolutions on Revenge. For Modesty and Chastity are so highly priz'd, and so nicely regarded by these Barbarians, that a Woman turn'd off and deserted most infallibly lesseth her Reputation, though her Virtue be really safe and unshain'd. It was a wise and rational Choice, when the Daughters of Pollio and Agrippa, "standing for the Place of Governess over the Vestal Virgins, the former Lady was prefer'd on this account; because her Father and Mother had liv'd "in a long and peaceable Marriage, without Separation; whereas Agrippa, on the other side, "had filled his Family with Jealousies and Dissensions ⁹.

XXI. We are farther to examine, whether we may apply that to Matrimony, which holds good in all other Covenants, that in case the Heads and Conditions, especially the chief of them, are broken on either side, the injur'd Party hath the Power of receding from the Agreement. And here we may venture to take the Affirmative Part, if the Question be put concerning the necessary and essential Terms of the Contract. Thus the principal Design of Marriage is the procuring of Children, in order to the effecting which, it is requisite, that there be the nearest and most familiar Communication between Husband and Wife. And therefore if we regard barely the Law of Nature, either Person may quit and renounce the Relation, in case the other prove guilty of base ¹ Desertion, or of voluntary and obstinate ⁱ Unkindness, as to the Affair of the Bed. This last Omission would bear an Action of Law amongst the Antient Jews ^k; and the conjugal Debt as well as others might be recover'd by Process in open Court.

Again, the Intent of Marriage is not only that we may obtain Children, but that we may obtain such as shall indeed be our own. "On this account,

" says

“ says Josephus, Moses absolutely forbid Adultery; “ thinking it would be every way more happy, “ that the Husband should keep the Possession of “ his Bed secure and undisturb’d, and that the “ Production of genuine Illæ would be alike ad- “ vantageous to private Families, and to the pub- “ lick State. (Antiqu. III. 10.)

Nay, and after this End hath been provided for, every honest Man is willing to keep his Bed to himself, and doth not think it either decent or safe, to take Passengers a-board, though the Vessel be first laden to his Desire. Very few Hus- bands have so high Notions of Courtliness and Complaisance, as to be concern’d at Ovid’s Cen- sure, that,

*Rusticus est nimium, quem ludit adultera Conjux,
Et notos mores non satis urbis habet* ^a.

He that won’t lend his Bed’s a stinky Clown, Unpractis’d in the Freedom of the Town.

It is therefore to be esteem’d a just Cause of Divorce, if a Wife voluntarily expose her Honour to another Man. As on the other side, if she be overcome by the Usurper, in the way of Force and Violence, we can on no Pretence call her Vir- tue in Question ^b. And though it be commonly reckon’d a more heinous Crime, to assault her Chastity thus, by main Strength and Power, than to ensnare or betray it by Flattery and Charms ^c; yet the Truth is, the former indeed offers the more grievous Injury to the Wife, but the latter to the Husband ^c.

It appears then, that the reason why Adultery and wilful Desertion are accounted sufficient Causes of Divorce, doth not arise from any particular positive Law of God (as if these two Excep- tions were added to that O. dinance which makes the Bond of Marriage perpetual) but from the common Nature of Covenants, which is such, that when one Party hath broken the Agreement, the other is no longer oblig’d to keep it. And the Force of these Causes is so extensive, as to justify the injur’d Person, not only in refusing to coha- bit with the perfidious Wretch, but likewise in passing to a second Marriage; whatever the Ca-nonists urge to the contrary. Indeed those grave Prohibitors, when they are to gratify a Friend in this Point, do not scruple to find out a way of eluding their own Decrees, by declaring the former Marriage to have been originally null and void; an Evasion which they can ground on many plausible Scruples.

But altho’ Marriage be chiefly enter’d into up- on the Design and Hopes of Children, yet the bare Inability of either Party (otherwise fit for a Con- jugal Seat) towards promoting this End, doth not seem a sufficient Ground of Separation; in as much as it is a thing surpassing all human Power to bestow the Blessing of Increase. Yet Cicero Ruga, the first Man of the Romans that put away his Wife (523 Years after the building of the City) is reported to have taken his principal Motive from the Oath, which the Censors required of every mar- ried Man, in this Form, Se habere Uxorem libero- rum querendorum causa; That he engaged in that Condition on the account of Issue ^d.

XXII. But the chief Point of the Controver- sy on this Head is still behind, and may be thus frated: According to the true regular way of contracting Marriage, the Wife consents to a constant Cohabitation with the Husband, prom- ising, according to her best Strength, to assist and comfort him, as well with Sweetness of Con- verse, as with the Participation of Business and Cares, and engaging farther to be guided and directed by him, as the Lord and Governour of the Family. In requital for which, the Hus- band, on the other side, is oblig’d ^e to pro- tect and defend his Wife, to treat her with Honesty and Civility, and to pay her many o- ther friendly Regards of the same kind. Now the Question is, whether the signal and enor- mous Violation of these inferior Duties gives a full and fair Reason for a Divorce? And here, if we regard barely the Law of Nature, ma- ny venture to hold the Affirmative. For since a Father hath the Power of discarding an un- dutiful Son, who, at least in natural Considera- tion, seems more nearly related to him than a Wife; why may not he banish his Wife, as a rebellious Member of the Family, when her Manners are intolerable ^f, and her Amendment despe-

^a ‘Tis in this sense the Law of the Digests is to be expounded: Persuadere autem est plus quam compelli, atque cogi sibi parere. As at ^c.

^a Amor. l. 3. & l. 4. v. 37, 38. Martial, L. 6. Ep. 90.

Mæchum Gellia non habet nisi unum, Turpe est hoc magis, uxor est duorum.

One Spark serves honest Gellia at a Time.
But her two Husbands are a fouler Crime.

Add. Abr. Roger de Bramin. p. 1. c. 13. ^b Add. Valer. Max. l. 6. c. 1. s. 2. extern. Lic. l. 38. c. 24. Xenophon in Hieron. p. 578. L. 48. t. 5. l. 13. s. 7. & 39. princ. D. ad L. Juliam de Adult. Ælian. V. H. l. 12. c. 47. ^c L. 11. t. 3. l. 1. s. 3. D. de Servo Corrupto. To inveigle and persuade is more than to force and compel. ^d Vid. Gell. l. 4. c. 3. Valer Maxim. l. 2. c. 1. s. 4.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XXII.

¹ Thus Achilles, in Homer. Il. 9. v. 340, &c. speaks;

“*Η μῆτις εὐχέσθ’ ἀλόχως μέεσπον ἀνδρώπων
Ἀρσῆσαι; ἐπειθ’ ὅτε τις ἀγάσας, ἢ ἐχέεσπον,
Τὼ αὐτῶ φιλίαι ἢ κίσεται.*”

The Wife and Good will cherish and defend
The Partner of their Bed, their nearest Friend;
Their second Self,-----

² The Law of THEODOSIUS and VALENTINIAN deserves to be recited here. They alledge first, that the Marriage Bonds ought not to be broken without good Reason, in consideration of Children. The Reasons which they mention, and for which they allow the Use of that sharp Remedy, but some times necessary, are these; If a Husband or Wife are convict- ed of Adultery, Assassinating, Poisoning, or Treason; if they are Forgers of Wills, Sacrilegious, Thieves of any Sort, Harbourers of Robbers; if an Husband has to do with a Whore in his Wife’s sight; if a Woman goes to a Feast with unknown Persons, without the Knowledge and Consent of her Husband, and if she lies abroad without very good Reason desperate? Especially if we reflect on the Remark of Fulgentius, that a Wife, the nearer she is join'd to Man by the Law, the more certainly she proves to him, either Honey, by the Sweetness of her Temper, or Poyson, by her froward and malicious Disposition; being really, either a continual Comfort and Refuge, or a perpetual Plague and Torment. An honest Man, says old Simonides, can have nothing in this World better than a good Wife, nothing worse than a bad One ^a. On the other hand, in case the Husband treats the Wife with unreasonable Severity, and denies her the Respect due to her Sex and her Relation, so as to shew himself, not so much a kind Partner, as a troublesome and vexatious Enemy, it should seem very equitable, that she might be relieved by a Divorce ^b.

Another Scruple immediately ariseth upon this, Whether it be allowable, by the Law of Nature, on the account of intolerable Manners, or of barbarous Treatment, entirely to dissolve the matrimonial Bond? or, Whether the other conjugal Duties, as the Propagation of Race, &c. may not still be continu'd, though the cohabiting in the same Family be broken off? In as much as the former Covenant, bearing a regard to Children, seems to be Essential to Matrimony, the latter only Additional. Thus much then is certain, that several Pacts may be made between the said Parties, under this Condition, That in case one of them should be violated, the others shall nevertheless stand Good. Nay, one and the same Pact may be divided into many Heads, and Provision may be made, that although one of the Heads be transgress'd, yet the Parties shall proceed in performing the rest. If the Marriage was contracted under such a Form, it seems reasonable, that the Wife, although she hath by her unpeaceable Carriage forfeited her Title to a continual Cohabitation, yet may still lie under the Force of that Part of the Covenant, which obligeth her to consult Succession. But, because it is by no means probable, that she, who is unfit for the first of these Privileges and Duties, should with any Convenience be admitted to the other; that a Man should desire Issue by the same Woman, whom he is constrain'd to hate: and not rather entertain an absolute Aversion to the Body, which lodgeth so froward a Guest: It is the common and regular Practice for the Parties to contract, by one and the same Agreement, for their living together, and for their mutual Care of Posterity: And thus the two Conditions are in so close a manner united and interwoven one with the other, that in case either be broke, both naturally fall asunder. It is therefore contrary to the Law of Nature, that the Reason before alledg'd should cause a Separation from Bed and Board, and yet continue some part of the Marriage Obligation, so as to hinder the Parties from disposing of themselves another way. Unless such a Separation be enjoin'd only for a time as a Punishment to obstinate Perverseness, and to try, whether there is any probability of Reforming. For it is absurd to say, that the Tie of a Covenant remains in force, whilst no part of the Debt arising from that Covenant can, or ought to be discharg'd. And tho' we should acknowledge, that the Party, who gave Occasion to this Mischief, is justly enough punish'd, yet the innocent Party is in the mean while injured, suffering thus for the Fault of another, and being oblig'd to live in a State of Celibacy, probably inconvenient, perhaps intolerable.

Thus far then, in the Consideration of natural Law, the Man and the Woman are upon the same Ground. And for this Reason Plutarch ^c calls that Order of Romulus, σφοδρὸν, very hard and severe, which forbid a Woman to desert and turn off her Husband, yet gave the Husband leave to discard his Wife, either upon her poisoning the Children, counterfeiting the Keys, or committing Adultery ^d. Amongst the Athenians we find either Party might upon sufficient Cause, separate ^e from the other: Though they distinguish'd these two kind of Divorces by different Names. For a Man to put away his Wife was term'd ἀπὸ πέρμειν; four, or is present at Plays at her pleasure; if an Husband lays Snares for his Wife's Life, or she for his; if an Husband beats his Wife. The Words of the Law are: Solutionem Matrimonii difficiliorē debere esse favor imperat liberorum. Causas autem Repudii hūc saluberrimā Lege apertius signamus. Sicut enim sine justa causa dissolvi matrimonia justo limite prohibemus, ita ad eorū necessitate p̄gion, vel p̄gion, quamvis infans, attamen necessario auxilio cupimus liberari. Si qua igitur maritum suum adulterum, aut homicidam, aut veneficam, aut certē contra nostram imperiam aliquid molientem, vel falsitatis crimine condemnatum invenerit, si sepulchrorum dissolutorem, si sacris adibus aliquid subtrahentem, si latronem, vel latronum susceptorem, vel abscōrem, vel plagiarium, vel ad contemptum sui, domūque suae, ipsā inspiciente, cum impudicis mulieribus (quod maxime etiam casus exasperat) certum inuentum, si suae vitae censum, aut gladio, aut alio simili modo insidiantem, si se verberibus (quae indignis aliena sunt) adflicentem probaverit; tunc repudii auxilio uti necessarid permittimus libertatem, & causas infidii Legibus comprobare. Vir quoque pari sine claudetur ----- nec ullo modo expellat fugalem, nisi adulteram, &c. ----- aut extraneorum virorum, se ignorante et nō lente, concivicia adpetentem, aut ipso invito, sine justa, & probabili causa foris scilicet permittentem, vel Circusibus, vel theatralibus ludis, vel arenarum spectaculis in ipsis locis, in quibus haec adjuvent celebrari, se prohibentes, gaudentes, &c. Cod. Lib. 5. tit. 17. De Repudiis & Judicio de moribus sublato, Leg. 8.

^a V. Fulgent. Myth. l. lib. 1. Si vult den inter Poet. Lyric. Edit. H. Steph. p. 227. Euripid. Orest. v. 602, &c.

Blest is the Man, and sweetly runs his Life
Where smiling Fortune ties the nuptial Band;
But he whom inauspicious Hymen joins,
Wretched abroad must prove, and curs'd at home.

^b Add. L. Theod. lib. 5. t. 17. l. 8. C. de Repud.
^c Euripid. Andromache. v. 672, &c.

^e In the Life of Rom. p. 89. See Mr. Davies's Note upon

Whether the Man from a Disloyal Dame,
Or the Chast Dame from an Injurious Man
Suffers Reproach; each finds a just Relief.
Him his own Strength can vindicate; and Her Parents and Friends combin'd protect from Wrong.

^d Potter. Ant. l. 4. c. 12.

for a Woman to quit her Husband, was ἀπολείπει. The reason of this variation in Terms is manifest; the Woman was receiv'd into the Man's Family, and therefore she could not properly ἀποπέμπει, send him away, or move him out of the House, tho' she might, ἀπολείπει, forsake him, and retire to a place of Ease and Security.

We have only this to observe farther, that upon whatever Reasons Divorces are tolerated in a Commonwealth, it is highly expedient, that the Cause be heard and approv'd by the proper Magistrate; and that a Point of so very great weight and moment be not left to be decided by the private Conscience and Discretion of the married Pair. For, the Reason which Bodinus^a offers to the contrary, Because this publick way of proceeding must necessarily impair the Credit and Character of one of the Persons, doth not seem to conclude with any Force to the purpose^b.

XXIII. With regard to the divine Law, either as originally declar'd, or as renew'd by our Saviour, the Difficulty is much greater. This is evident, the Jews thought Divorces not only permitted, but commanded (in case the Wife displeas'd her Husband) by the 24th Chapter of Deuteronomy. And farther, there is a place in Philo Judæus^c which seems to imply, that Barrenness was judg'd a sufficient Cause for the like Separation. Nor are we to doubt but that the thing was frequently practis'd in that Nation, although their sacred and profane History, for more than 700 Years, have recorded none, or very few Instances of this kind. For it is not indeed the Custom to register, in publick Annals, Matters which are done according to general Use, but such only as appear singular and extraordinary. In Isaiab^d, and Jeremiah^e, amongst the many Ways of representing and reproving the People's Sins, we find Similitudes taken from a Divorce, as an Action very well understood by the Vulgar. Josephus^f takes Notice of it, as a thing very unusual, and differing from the ordinary Law and Practise, that Salome, Wife to Costobar, Prefect of Idumea and Gaza, should send a Bill of Divorce to her Husband; whereas, regularly, it was not allowable for the Woman to leave the Man, unless he put her away: Excepting only one Case, when the Husband falsely reported, that his Wife did not prove a Virgin at their first Familiarity; here the Woman had her Choice, whether she would stay, or depart; and the Husband, if she chose the former, was oblig'd to keep her^g. Josephus^h reports the same of Herodias, Aristobulus's Daughter, the Lady who was the Subject of St. John Baptist's Reproofⁱ.

But, that our Saviour absolutely took away this ancient Liberty of Divorce, is the Judgment of most Divines; grounded on Matth. v. 32. xix. 8, 9, &c. Mark x. 4, 6, 12. Grotius^k is of Opinion, that it was, from the Beginning, most pleasing to GOD, that the Bond of Marriage should be perpetual; but, whereas the Old-Covenant-Men were not oblig'd to this Strictness, our Saviour, under the new Covenant, ratified by an express Law what was before most agreeable to the divine Will. Mr. Selden's Explication^l of the same Places of Scripture is to this purpose: "There were amongst the Jews two Sects, the Sammeans and the Hillelians, who maintain'd contrary Notions on the Point before us. The former asserted, That a Man ought not to quit his Wife, unless upon some Discovery of Baseness and Dishonesty: The latter, That any Dislike taken of the Woman, was enough to justify a Divorce. Our Saviour then, as an Arbitrator between the two disputing Parties, declares in Favour of the Sammeans; That it was not Lawful upon slight Pretences, to dissolve an Union instituted by GOD himself; but only upon the commission of foul and scandalous Crimes, comprehended, according to the Genius of the Hebrew Language, under the general Term of Fornication^m. He adds, that amongst the most ancient Christians, Adultery was not esteem'd the only lawful Cause of Divorce: As appears from L. 8. C. de Repudiis, enacted by the most Religious of all the Emperours. Till by the Superstition and the Corruption of the Papal See, the Bond of Matrimony was declar'd indissoluble during the Life of the Parties. *Buxtorf*ⁿ hath endeavour'd to make out, contrary to the current of the Jewish Writers, that in the Words of Moses, Deuteron. xxiv. 1. 2, 3, 4. this one Prohibition only is contain'd, "That a Man shall not receive again to his Bed a Wife which he hath once put away: But that the Custom itself, of putting away Wives, is in that place, neither approv'd by Moses, nor plainly condemn'd; but left as it were indifferent. And, says he, the Observation of our Saviour, that this Permission was given by Moses, because of the Hardness of their Hearts, sufficiently makes it appear, that the Mosaical Indulgence doth not amount to an Approbation, but signifies only a bare Toleration, or Connivance, exempting from civil Punishment^o.

XXIV. Mr. John Milton^p, provoked, as it should seem, by the Misfortune of his own Family, hath with great Pains endeavour'd to make out, that, even by the Principles of the Christian Religion, an intolerable Disposition, a Dis-

Mr. BARB. NOTE on § XXIII.

^a See 1 Sam. xxv. 44. and Mr. LE CLERC's Note upon it.

^a De Repub. l. 1. c. 2.

^b Add. Plat. de LL. l. 11. p. 974. Ed. Wech. Charron de la Sageff, l. 1. c. 46. n. 12.

^c Selden de J. N. & G. l. 5. c. 7.

^c De Leg. Special. p. 782. B. Ed. Paris. Herodot. lib. 5. p. 190. Ed. H. Steph.

the whole Passage runs thus; "Men who take Wives, being uncertain of their Fruitfulness, in finding them afterwards to be barren, they do not dismiss them and force them to lead a separate Life, are very excusable; in as much as being won by a long Familiarity and a Course of mutual Love, they cannot easily do Violence to those Affections which are so deeply rooted in their Minds. But they who choose Women of known Barrenness, seeking only, like Beasts, to satisfy their lustful Inclinations, are to be reckon'd amongst the most impious Offenders, as contradicting and opposing GOD himself, who hath established the Laws of human Succession.

^d Ch. L. 1.

^e III. 1. 6.

^f Antiq. L. 15. c. 9.

^g Vid.

^h Phil. Jud. de Special. Leg. p. 789. D. Ed. Paris.

^h Ant. Jud. L. 18. c. 7.

ⁱ Matth. xiv. Mar. vi.

^k L. 2. c. 5.

^l De Uxore Ebraea, l. 3. c. 22.

^m Vid. Val. Max. l. 9. c. 2.

ⁿ De Sponsal. & Divort.

^o Add the excellent Dissertation of Grotius on this Point, on Matth. v. 31, 32.

^p In his Book of the Doctrine and Discipline of Divorces.

parity, or Contrariety of Mind, is a sufficient Reason for Divorce; nay, that Persons, so unhappily pair'd are indeed under an Obligation to separate. We hope we shall not seem tedious, if we venture to run over his chief Arguments. In the first place, then, he lays down this Assertion to build upon; God, in the first Ordaining of Marriage taught for what End he did it, in Words expressly implying the apt and chearful Conversation of Man with Woman, to comfort and refresh him against the Evils of solitary Life: not mentioning the Purpose of Generation 'till afterwards; as being but a secondary End in Dignity, though not in Necessity. Now this Bottom we take to be false. When God was pleas'd to give Man a Helpmeet for him ^a, and afterwards commanded the primitive Couple to increase and multiply ^b, he did not hereby ordain two different Ends of Marriage; but the latter Words seem design'd to describe the chief Fruit arising (through the divine Benediction) from the mutual Assistance first mention'd. And indeed, if the bare Delight of Conversation had been the principal Intent of the Creator, what need was there of a Difference in Sex? For take away the Procreation of Off-spring, together with the Pleasures which by the Appointment of Nature sweeten and recommend it, and Men alone would have been more agreeable Companions, and more able Assistants to each other. And thus we see, that Boys and old Men, those who have not felt the Passion of Love, and those who are past it, agree in preferring the converse of their own Sex to all the Charms and all the Entertainments of the Fair. But Mr. Milton seems to dream of some more delicate and more refin'd Pleasures; and frames the Idea of a Wife suitable only to the Genius of a wife and learned Husband: He would have her able to be the Companion of his Studies, or to refresh him with her Wit, when he comes from severer Meditations, to compose his Cares with sweet Discourse, and charm away a melancholy Fit. Whereas although there is no considering Man, who would not infinitely prefer the Pleasure of the Mind, to the short and empty Gratifications of Sense: Yet, it is so very difficult to find a Woman of this philosophical and elevated Temper, that there is scarce any Man eminent for Wisdom and Learning, who might not sue for a Divorce, on this Pretence. And therefore, if there be any Person of so mortified a Spirit, as to think the continuing of his Name and Race so mean and worthless a Design, and who feels no Pains, that the Fair only can cure, he should on all Accounts be advis'd to lead a single Life: For, 'tis no wonder, if Coldness and Gravity prove so ill Companions for Charms and Beauty. Lastly, whatever the Assertors of these Opinions pretend, 'tis impossible they should give any other Reason, why the Conversation of Women was rather instituted as a Help for us, than that of Men like our selves; except, that Nature hath wisely fix'd in the difference of Sex sweeter Engagements, and more peculiar Propensions. It may then, on the whole Matter, be the safer way not to endeavour the bringing this high and Platonical Strain of Notions into practice (but, considering the ordinary Temper and Capacity of the female Sex) to judge her a very convenient and proper Partner, who is able to sustain a Share in the Concern of Children, both as to their Birth and Education, and in the Care of directing the Family; altho' she be able to afford little Assistance in deep Speculations and in studious Enquiries. Juvenal's Advice hath something in it besides Satyr,

*Non habeat matrona, tibi quæ juncta recumbit,
Dicens genus, aut curtum sermone rotato
Torqueat enthymema, nec historiam sciat omnes,
Sed quædam ex libris, & non intelligat: Odi
Hanc ego, quæ repetit voluitque Palæmonis artem, Serenata semper lege & ratione loquendi,
Ignotæque mihi tenet antiquaria versus,
Nec curanda viris Opicæ castigat amica
Verba: Solacisimum liceat jecisse marito.*

Sat. 6. v. 447, &c.

O! what a Midnight Curse has he, whose side
Is pester'd with a Mood and Figure Bride!
Let mine, ye Gods! (if such must be my Fate)
No Logick learn, nor History translate;
But rather be a quiet, humble Fool:
I hate a Wife, to whom I go to School.
Who climbs the Grammar-tree, distinctly knows Where Noun, and Verb, and Participle grows;
Corrects her country Neighbour, and abed,
For breaking Priscian's, breaks her Husband's head.
Mr. DRYDEN.

Strabo ^c reports of the Brachmans, that they never communicate their Philosophy to their Wives: lest, if they prove wicked, they should divulge some Secrets which ought to have been conceal'd from the Profane; or, if they happen to be good, they should desert their Husbands. For the equal Contempt of Pleasure and Pain, of Life and Death, is no good Principle to fit a Person for a State of Subjection ^d.

This Remark will hold good in general of Mr. Milton's Arguments, that they prove just nothing at all, in case it be apparent, that our Saviour declar'd Adultery to be the only sufficient Cause of Divorce ^e. To seem hard in some particular Instance, is no Objection against the express Words of a Law. We are not presently for repealing those human Constitutions, which appearing useful and beneficial to the Commonwealth in general, do yet turn to the Prejudice of one or two private Persons: Because these are look'd upon as Inconveniences which 'tis impossible to avoid.

Mr. BARR. NOTES on § XXIV.

^a JUVENAL there pleasantly Laughs at the learned Women of his time, who fallily pretended to Arts and Sciences, or the Defects of that small Number of Women, who are, or might be truly knowing.

^a Genes. ii. 18.
v. 640, 641.

^b Ibid. i. 28.

^c L. 15. p. 490. Ed Gen. Casaub.

^d Euripid. Hippol. Coron.

-----From a Woman wife above her Measure Protect me, Heaven.-----

^e Vid. lib. 5. c. 12. f. 21.

The only Point he gains is this, that if the Saying of Christ will bear another Interpretation, it should seem more agreeable to the Gospel Clemency and Goodness, to follow a milder Sense, than that which is at present receiv'd. The whole Strength of his Reasons may be thus represented in short. "Incorrigible Disparity of Mind, or Stubbornness of Temper, rendering a Woman unfit to live in Society with such a particular Man, and hindering the chief Benefit of Matrimony, mutual Help and Refreshment, is a much weightier Cause of Divorce, than any natural Defect, any Distemper, any uncleanness of Body; which yet were allow'd as lawful Pleas by the Jewish Dispensation^a. No Partnership can oblige Persons concern'd, in Contradiction either to the chief End of its Institution, or to the Intentions and Hopes of both, or of either Member. Now it was the Design of the wise Creator, not to give Man a domestick Torment, but a kind Help to join with him, not only in the bringing of Children into the World, but in the Education of them, and in the whole Business of Life; which End intolerable Sowness of Temper doth plainly pervert and destroy. It looks absurd and unreasonable, that the Canon Law should without Scruple declare Impotency a sufficient Cause of dissolving Matrimony, and yet allow no Regard to the Manners and Dispositions of the Parties: especially since the former may immediately be discover'd; whereas 'tis usual craftily to disguise and conceal the latter, 'till the poor Man runs ignorantly into the Snare, whence he can never be releas'd. It is against the Law of Charity: nay, it is most barbarous and inhuman, to confine and chain down a Man to such Miseries as are not to end 'till his Death; and which would admit of an easy Cure, did not the Severity of this positive Ordinance stand in the way: in as much as God Almighty, in his Laws and Commands, seems to have mercifully accommodated himself to the Infirmity of human Nature. The Holy Scriptures prescribe Matrimony, among other Reasons, for the avoiding of Temptations to Incontinence. But now the Man who can find in Marriage no Rest or Comfort to his Mind, who is perpetually reiz'd and disturb'd by an untoward Partner, must needs be assaulted with stronger Temptations, than if he liv'd in Celibacy. For his Heart will be ever full of Discontent; and because his Wife is so unpleasing an Object, he will seek to bestow his Love and himself elsewhere. Maimonides, amongst the Reasons of the Law about Divorce, assigns this for one, That the Peace and Tranquillity of particular Families might by this means be the more surely preserv'd^b. Which Reason affecting Christians as much as Jews, it cannot seem probable that GOD design'd to lay a heavier Yoak on the former, than on the latter^c. We are commanded in Holy Scripture to remove from us all Obstacles of Piety: Amongst the chief of which we may fairly reckon the Frowardness of an incorrigible and inseparable Companion. It is repugnant to Nature, that two Minds directly opposite, and admitting of no Possibility of Union, should be tied together in a Bond never to be broken. The Christian Emperours^d have declar'd it as their Judgment, that the Plotting of either Party against the Life of the other, is a good Reason of Divorce: and how many Mens Lives have been unhappily shortned by these continual Grievs and Discomforts? Marriage is a Society: But human Societies, inasmuch as they are held together in a Moral Bond, consist rather in the Union of Souls, than of Bodies. Should we say otherwise of Marriage, we should degrade it below the coupling of Beasts, in which we frequently observe some sort of Affection and Good-will in the Mates to each other. When therefore the Soul doth not find in Matrimony that sweet Agreement which it sought, so ill-match'd a Pair live rather in the Misery and Hardship of a Prison, than in the Comfort of Society. Solemn Oaths, if either in themselves improper, or tending to the Prejudice of a Third Party, are capable of a Dispensation; and hath not the Marriage-Covenant a good Right to the same Favour? Nor will it signify any thing to answer here, that unhappy Matches are laid on Men by Divine Providence, for the Tryal and Exercise of their Patience: For Diseases and other Calamities are most certainly sent from Heaven; and yet the Application of human Remedies was never forbidden in such Cases.

After this, he holds a long Dispute concerning the Permission of Divorce among the Jews. "For," says he, if it be in the Nature of the Fact Adultery for either Party, after a Divorce, to marry again, it follows that Moses establish'd Adultery by a solemn Law. But to inagin this of Institutions which had God for their Author, would not only be absurd, but most profane and impious.

He likewise reprehends these Authors who affirm, that the Jews had not a Law of Divorce, but rather a Dispensation. "A Dispensation, he observes, is of two Kinds, either properly so called, or improperly. The latter is rather a particular and exceptive Law, absolving and disengaging from a more general Command, for some just and reasonable Cause: as that mention'd Numb. ix. 6, &c. and Deut. xxv. v. 5. and that in Leviticus, of marrying the Brother's Wife, upon his Decease without Issue. A Dispensation, properly so called, obtains only in particular Cases rarely happening, and therefore not specified in ^a Deuteron. xxiv. 1. ^b So Bodinus, De Repub. l. 1. c. 3. affirms, Never was any Law more just and holy than the Divine Ordinance of Divorces, either to curb the Pride of Women, or to restrain the Anger and Violence of Men. ^c Varenius Descript. Japon. cap. 12. reports of the Japonesse, Divorces are very frequent in this Nation, though the nobler Persons still keep the rejected Wife in their Family, and take care of her Maintenance and Support. On this account, the Women apply their Endeavours to discover their Husbands Temper and Humour, by which means they may in all things gratify and please them, and be ever laying new Engagements on their Minds. And being once thrown off, they dissemble the Injury, and make not the least Complaint, that by the Sweetness of their Conversation, and Readiness of performing all kind Services, they may recover themselves in their Affections. ^d See the Law already quoted in Sect. 22.

“ the Law, but left to the Decision of Charity, and “ to the Prudence of the Judges: As upon ex“ treme Hunger, it was lawful for David and his “ Followers to eat the Shew-Bread ^a: So that this “ sort of Dispensation is nothing else but the inter“ preting a Law according to Equity.

Here 'tis worth our Notice that he confounds Dispensation and Equity with each other; whereas there is really a wide Difference between 'em. But, as to the Argument, this is certain, whoever will maintain the Jewish Divorces to have proceeded in the way of Dispensations, it lies on him to prove, that there was then extant some general Law, declaring Matrimony not to be reversible upon account of Manners and Temper; which Law must either have been a Branch of Nature's Ordinances, or a Divine Positive Institution. As for those Words in Genesis ii. 24. ^b, and those two shall be one Flesh, some are of Persuasion, that they express indeed a most strict Partnership, and such as, to break off on a slight account, could neither be decorous nor advantageous to Mankind. But it doth not hence follow, that the Knot cannot be untied upon Reasons which subvert the very End and Design of Matrimony: As it would be ridiculous thus to argue, GOD joins Man and Wife together, therefore it is not in the Power of Man to join himself to whom he pleaseth: or, therefore no human Covenant ought to intervene. But what ought to be infer'd is rather this: God joins the Parties by the Mediation of their Deed and Covenant; therefore it is his Will they should not be separated, unless that Covenant be on one side or the other transferr'd.

Mr. Milton proceeds to enquire into the Opinion of those who assert, that Divorces were by the Divine Law permitted only, and not approved. This he takes to be an irreverent Reflection on Almighty God; in as much as it betokens Infirmary in a Governour, to allow his Subjects in any Practice, to which he does not really give his Approbation. And why must the Jews alone have been so notorious for Hardness of Heart, as not to be able to comply with the suppos'd primitive and general Ordinance, when so many Christian Nations and Ages have yielded a ready Obedience to it?

On those Words of our Saviour, from the Beginning it was not so, some thus descant: “ In the “ State of Innocence ^a human Manners were “ more perfect and excellent, than to give occa“ sion to any signal Trouble and Disagreement:
 “ And therefore the Necessity of applying Di“ vorce as a Remedy to unhappy Marriages, is a “ remarkable Evidence of the impair'd Condition

 “ of our Nature.

To conclude; Mr. Milton farther censures those who alledge, that this Liberty of Divorce was therefore granted to the Jews by Moses, because they had been accusom'd to it in Egypt. For now, when the Weight of the Egyptian Yoak was still upon their Shoulders, must needs have been the most proper time of teaching them to forget the Customs of that Country. As we see so many strict and excellent Laws given them against Idolatry, which they had seen practis'd every Day, during their Servitude and Confinement.

But these Matters we leave undetermin'd, as not tending directly to our main purpose.

XXV. The necessary Qualifications required by the Law of Nature, in Persons rightly contracting Matrimony, are a Fitness or Ability, both Physical and Moral. By the former we understand such a Constitution of Body as is capable of attaining the chief End of Marriage, the Procreation of Issue ¹. Therefore such Persons as labour under a perpetual and incurable Impotency, such as Eunuchs, and the like, ought not to aspire to the conjugal Honour. It was certainly an unnatural Custom in Egypt, to allow the Eunuchs Wives, because they laid claim to some inferior Degree of useless Pleasure ^c. And here a Doubt may arise, whether we can properly call it Matrimony, when an antient Couple are link'd together without any Prospect of a Blessing from the Bed. Dionysius, in Plutarch ^d, when his aged Mother desired him to bestow a Husband upon her, replied, It was in his Power to do Violence to the Laws of his Country, but not to the Laws of Nature ^e. Yet in most Commonwealths these sort of Matches are tolerated; in as much as the other End of Matrimony, mutual Assistance and Comfort, will hold as strongly here as in any other Case ^f. Perhaps we shall not speak improperly if we call these ² Honorary Marriages, as we term those Offices Honorary, in which a Title only is conferr'd, without Action or Business. Nero, when he deserted his Wife Oetavia's Bed, excused himself with saying, sufficere sibi Uxoriam Ornamenta ^g, He was contented with the bare Ornaments and Badges of Marriage; in Allusion to the Triumphalia Ornamenta ^h, sometimes bestow'd on Persons without the real Solemnity of a Triumph. The Case of David and Abisbag ⁱ seems to fall under this imperfect Matrimony. Tho' Solomon, in all Ap-

^a A fine Explication! As if Men had remain'd so long in a State of Innocence, as to make use of Divorce. Our Lord explains these Words very fully, when he says, Mat. x. 6. God created Male and Female, that they twain might become One Flesh, and be no longer twain, but One Flesh, i. e. the Creator intended, that Marriage should be so ilreight and fast an Union, as never to be dissolv'd but by Death, or by something extremely contrary to the Nature of that Society, such as Adulteries.

Mr. BARR. NOTES on § XXV.

¹ SOSIMUS, l. 5. c. 28. speaking of the Empress Mary, Wife of Honorius, says, Και το παρ' ημετων εις μεζην ευδωρα, εβραυς εδωκεν, ης εδωκ' ημεσιν ημω. To put a Virgin in the Marriage-Bed before the proper Age, is no less than to do an Injury and Violation to Nature.

² See the Paræmia Juris Germanici of Mr. HERTIUS, Lib. I. Chap. 67.

^a 1 Sam. xxi. 6. Matt. xii. 3, &c.

c. xxiii. v. 1. Genes. c. xxxix. v. 1.

^b See Mr. Le Clerc's Comment upon the Place.

^d In Apophthegm. p. 175. E. Ed. Wech.

^c Grot. ad Deuter.

Quintil. Declam. 306. p. 464. Ed. Ludg. Bat. There may be some kind of Unchastity even in Marrying. Idem Declam. 2. p. 23. in fin. An old Husband is (often) the most humble Instance of Slavery; and is the more charm'd and overcome with the Magick of the Fair Sex, the colder his own Powers are in the Reception of it. Comp. Val. Max. l. 7. c. 7. f. 4.

^e V. Lib. 5. t. 4. l. 27. C. de Nuptiis.

^f Sueton. Ner. c. 35.

^h Sueton. August. c. 38.

ⁱ 1 Kings. 1.

pearance, esteem'd the Marriage good and valid; in as much as he gave capital Judgment on Adenijah, for begging her for his Wife; because this Attempt of marrying the King's Widow (which in the Jewish Constitution was accounted unlawful) shew'd he was driving on some Design against the publick Peace and Establishment ^a.

XXVI. It is farther supposed in Matrimony, as in all other Covenants, that the Parties contracting it have sufficient Use of Reason; that there is no Error, no Flaw ^b in the Essentials, and that no unjust Fear is on either side occasion'd. In this last Point, the Jewish civil Laws were very particular; by them, if the Woman was compell'd by Force or Fear, the Espousals were revers'd; but not on the other side, if the Man alledg'd Compulsion, because there could not be the same Presumption of any Violence or Fright offer'd him: And if the Conditions had displeas'd him, he might afterwards have reject'd her ^c. In like manner, if there were a Mistake, either as to the Person, the Object of Consent, or in any Quality, either relating to Matrimony it self, or ^d serving as a Condition on which the Consent was built (especially in case of Guile or Deceit used on either side) the Contract was manifestly void. Thus a Wife pretending Virginity, and afterwards discover'd defective, was by the Divine Law, not only turn'd away from her Husband, but made liable to severe Punishments. Tho' the barbarous Nations appear not to have been over curious in this Point of Purity ^d. Thus, again, if a Man in the Covenant of Marriage expressly inserted a Clause, importing that he took such a Woman for his Wife only in case she were of Noble Blood, of such a Fortune, or the like; he shall not be obliged to consummate the Match till the suppos'd Condition be made appear. But if, neglecting to enquire into the Truth, he shall have proceeded to Consummation, he shall by this Act be judged to have tacitly renounced the conditional Clause; and therefore if things do not afterwards come up to his Hopes, he hath no good Reason for Divorce. For the Contract did not run in these Terms, If you do not bring me such a Fortune I'll divorce you; but, if you do not bring me such a Fortune, I'll not marry you; which are manifestly different. He then, who in the Affair of Matrimony thus feels the Charms of the Portion more than of the Lady, is very ridiculously Senseless, if he let the Business be finish'd before he hath good Security for that which was his chief Aim ^e. Much less shall it be lawful to break off a Match, or to forbear consummating it, when a Man hath catch'd at the Bait of a supposed Fortune, without bargaining for any particular Summ. And therefore the Ephori in Sparta did very justly in fining the Gentleman, who having been contracted to Lysander's Daughter in her Father's Life-time, refused her, when that Great General was found to die in so poor a Condition ^f.

What we have been offering holds good only, in natural Law. For it is in the power of civil States to enact, that no such Clause, belonging indirectly to Matrimony, shall hinder or deter the due Consummation of it.

XXVII. A moral Ability of contracting Matrimony is wanting in Women already dispos'd of to other Men. For the Right of the Husband over the Wife continues so long as he doth not actually renounce it. Therefore to marry another Man's Wife, not duly loos'd and separated from him, is not only unlawful, but void, and ineffectual: Because it was not in the Woman's power to make this second Engagement, whilst the first continu'd in force; and to cohabit with this new Husband, is to live in constant Adultery. For the same reason, in Countries where Polygamy is prohibited, a Man cannot without Sin proceed to another Marriage, whilst he is held by the Bonds of a former.

By the Jewish Law it was criminal for a Man to take his Wife again, whom he had put away ^g. The reason of which Institution no doubt was to prevent the frequency of Divorces on slight and petty Occasions, by cutting off all Hopes of Re-union, when Passion should grow cold ^h. Yet some, from Jerem. iii. 12. collect, that it was lawful to receive again the dismiss'd Woman, provided she had not contracted a new Marriage.

It is remarkable in the Turkish Alcoran, that a Man is allow'd to take home his Wife, even after he hath three times dismiss'd her; but not unless she has been in the mean time married to another, and been discarded by him likewise. The Mahometans esteem this as the highest Infamy and Reproach, and therefore the famous Bajazet thought he could not bestow a heavier Curse upon Tamerlain, who sent to defy him to War, than by replying, If he does not come as he threatens, may he fetch his Wife back, after he hath three times sent her off ⁱ. It is another Precept of the Alcoran, that a Man who puts away his Wife, shall fix a certain Time, during which, it shall be un-

Mr. BARR. NOTE on § XXVI.

^a See what Mr. BAYEE says in his Answer to the Provincial's Questions, Tom. II. p. 40, &c. on the account of Madam de Mazarin.

^a Grot. ad Reg. d. l. c. 11. 17. ^b See above in L. 3. c. 6. f. 11. ^c Selden de Uxore Ebrae. l. 2. c. 4.
^d See the Customs of the Barbarians, Diad. Sic. l. 5. c. 18. of the Armenians and Lydians, Strab. l. 11. of the Babylonians, Herodotus in Clio; of the Thracians, Idem Terptich. of the Adriamachidae and the Nisomones, Id. Mel. mor. See also Joseph's soul fancy in Diog. Laert. l. 2. Add Bohori's Notes on Sueton. Calig. c. 40. towards the End. J. l. l. 13. c. 5. n. 4. Paul. Venet. l. 2. c. 37. of the Inhabitants of Tebeth and Cathay. Constantine the Great abolish'd the like Immodesty amongst the Phoenicians; as we are told by Saxomon, Hist. Eccles. lib. 1. cap. 8. lib. 5. cap. 9. ^e Especially since the Managers of Matches usually answer the Character which we find in Libanius (Progymn. p. 6.) They come armed with a great many shafts & Flourishes and fine Sayings, and by lessening what's present, and magnifying what's absent, easily prevail on the kind and credulous ^f Vid. Aelian. V. H. lib. 6. c. 4. ^g Deuteron. xxiv. 4. ^h Grotius (ad. d. l.) gives this Reason, Beccae pub. Practice looks like lending one's Wife to another Man, and might yield Shelter and Countenance to the most scandalous Debaucheries.
ⁱ V. Laonic. Chalcondil. l. 3.

lawful for her to choofe a new Husband: That he may thus use Deliberation in determining whether or no to take her again into Favour.

^a Josephus ^a mentions a Jewish Ordinance forbidding a Man to marry Her whom he hath persuaded to leave her former Husband; since this Irregularity could not but breed high Difcontentments and Troubles. On the same good Reason are these Christian Canons founded, which deny an Adulterer the liberty of marrying the Woman whom he thus defiled ^b. In this Point Euripides's ^c Observation seldom fails,

-----*The Wretch that stains another's Bed,
And takes the vile Adulteress to his own,
Condemn'd to wed her for his Punishment,
Is wildly vain, if he expects she'll prove
In her new Vows more chaste than in her old.*

XXVIII. Persons allied within such a Degree of Blood, or Affinity, are likewise under a Moral Incapacity of contracting Marriage ^d: in so much that it is not only from the Beginning unlawful to strike such a Match; but this Engagement, tho' actually concluded, is ever esteemed Vicious and Defective. This is an Opinion generally receiv'd by all Nations of Manners and Civility; yet to assign a solid Reason for it, such as shall flow, like other Precepts, from the social Nature of Man, seems at first sight a Point of no ordinary Difficulty. Some Enquirers are content to fly to the Abhorrence of human Affections in this Case. "All Persons, say they, who are not corrupted by ill Education, or Wicked Habits, do find in their very Senses, a Repugnancy and Aversion to such Impurities; which is a plain Argument that those Things are prohibited by the Law of Nature." But indeed this repugnancy of Affections is not equally to be discover'd amongst all People, nor always, even amongst those who pretend to the Art of Culture and Refinement; And when Authors urge it for a Reason, it would not be altogether absurd to answer them, that the Abhorrence may perhaps arise not so much from any in-bred Principle, as from long Use and Custom, which often counterfeit Nature. Nor in our Searches after natural Law, is it very safe to rely upon the bare Judgment of our Senses and Affections; since at this rate we might conclude, that those Things are by the same Law commanded, towards which our Senses and Affections are carried on with a vigorous Inclination; whereas, on the contrary, it is manifest that those Acts to which we are so violently prone, Reason and Nature do really disallow.

Plutarch ^e enquiring why the Romans did not take Wives from amongst their near Relations, thus proposeth his Reasons after his doubting manner. Was it that they might spread their Kindred more widely, and increase the Number of their Alliances; giving Wives to some, and taking them from others? Or did they it, to avoid conjugal Discords? which, should they arise between Persons allied by Blood, would destroy not only the Love between Husband and Wife, but the very Principles of natural Affections? Or, because they knew the weaker Sex to stand in need of many Defenders, were they therefore unwilling to marry their Kinswomen, that they might be ready to Assist and Protect them, if injur'd by their Husbands? The first of these Reasons, The spreading and improving of Alliances, is confirm'd by the Approbation of St. Augustin, and of Bishop Cumberland ^h. But on this way of arguing we may observe, that as an Act less useful, or profitable, is not always unlawful, so the Profit here alledg'd is not attainable by this only Method: In as much as a far greater Advantage may result from the quite contrary Practice; that is, if the nearest Relations would still match themselves to each other, their Estate and Wealth would be hindred from passing out of the Family. And on this account in the Divine Law, Numb. xxxvi. 3. Women possess'd of an Inheritance in immoveable Goods, are commanded to take Husbands only from amongst their Kindred; lest the Land should run out of one Tribe into another. Yet in case they would quit their Title to the Inheritance, they were allow'd to marry any Persons of their own Nation.

The Women of the Tribe of Levi were not concern'd in this Injunction, as being incapable of holding Land ⁱ. In Peru, during the Command of the Yucas, it was provided by Law, that every Man should choofe his Wife out of his own City, and his own Family: After the Marriage was concluded, a House was built for the new Couple at the common Charge, and the nearest Relations presented them with Furniture ^k. It was one of the Attic Laws ^l, that Heiresses should be taken in Marriage by their nearest Kinsmen, to preserve the Riches of their Ancestors in the same Line ^m. But the seeming Hardship of this Ordinance was sufficiently made amends for by another, which commanded, that if the Circumstances of such a young Woman were but very mean and inconsiderable, the next of her Kindred should nevertheless be obliged to wed her, or else to give her a Fortune suitable to her Birth and Quality ⁿ.

XXIX. In order to the settling of these Questions, it is in the first place necessary, we examine how it comes to pass, that altho' the Propagation of so noble a Creature as Man, be in it self a Work of Honour and Credit; yet amongst

Mr. BARB. NOTE on § XXVII.

^a This Law of Josephus is not conformable to Scripture, and the Translation which our Author follows, doth not agree with the Greek.

^a Jud. Antiq. l. 4. c. 8.

^b Gratian. Cauf. 31. qu. 1. c. 1, 2, &c.

^c Electra. v. 921, &c.

^d Vid.

l. 38. t. 10. l. 4. f. 3, 4, 5. D. de gradibus & affinitibus.

^e Quæst. Roman. 108. p. 289. D.

^f For Instance, because there often happen Quarrels between the Husband's Mother and his Wife, therefore a Man (according to this Argument) ought not to marry one that ow'd a natural Reverence to his Mother; that is, his Sister.

^g V. Augustin De Civitate Dei, l. 15. c. 16. cited by Gratian. Cauf. 35. qu. 1. c. 1.

^h De Leg. Nat. c. 8. f. 9.

ⁱ Vid. Grot. ad Matth. i. 16.

^k Garcilasso de la Vega Comment. Reg. l. 4. c. 8.

^l V. Sim.

Petit. in Leg. Attic. l. 6. t. 1.

^m Many Suits of Law filling out amongst the Pretenders to these Heiresses, the young Women got the Title of Emidrus.

ⁿ We find a Law of Charondas much to the same Purpose, in Dial. Sic. l. 12. c. 8.

all civiliz'd Nations, as well the Instruments, as the Act of this good Service, should be guarded with so tender a Sense of Modesty, as nothing but a Face harden'd by habitual Wickedness can conquer, or suppress? To which purpose we have a most remarkable Story, recorded by Plutarch^a and Polyanus^b, of the Milician Virgins, who being, ' by some strange and unknown Cause, driven to a mad Desire of hanging themselves, and their Distemper admitting of no Stop nor Remedy; it was at length decreed by a solemn Law, that the Bodies of those who dispatch'd themselves, in this desperate way, should be carried naked through the common Market. And by this means, whilst the Fear of Death could make no Impression on the Frenzy, the Sense of Shame restor'd them to their Wits. It is farther remarkable, that whatever Nations, in ancient, or modern Times, have entertain'd a Custom of going naked, or of performing in open view the secret Affairs of Marriage, have been censur'd and condemn'd by the rest of the World, as wild and barbarous^c. Now the reason of all this is not so easy to come at. For as to the immediate Instruments of this Work of Nature, they lie under no Scandal of Deformity, and they serve to a great and worthy Design: And therefore, the Egyptians and Athenians paid religious Regards to them, in their mysterious Worship^d. The Act it self, as it is agreeable to Nature, so is it of absolute Necessity, and every way proper for the producing of so brave and generous an Effect. And therefore, why should the Exercise of it before others create more Shame in a Man, than Eating and Drinking; since the human Species can no more be preserv'd without the former Means, than the Individuals without the latter? Nor will Plutarch's Distinction satisfy the Doubt. There is no Pleasure (says he^e) which we can more innocently enjoy, than that which we receive from Food and Nourishment. All Men are agreed on this Truth, as they shew by their daily Practice. For they eat in full Company, and in open View; whereas in their Love-Affairs they seek the Shelter of the Night: Because in these latter Ceremonies, to be publick and communicative is esteem'd as brutish and unnatural, as to be private and secret in the former. As to this Point of Openness and Secrecy, it was a severe Return which a Scotch Lady, in the Emperor Severus's Time, gave Julia Augusta, when reproach'd by her for the Custom of holding Wives in Common amongst the Britains; We (says she) obey the Necessities of Nature much better than you Roman Dames: for we do that openly with the best of our Men, which you do privately with the Worst of yours^f.

Neither do they thoroughly clear up the Matter, who have recourse to the Holy Scriptures, where the natural Shame is recorded to have been the immediate Consequence of the Fall. For the chief Question still returns, Why the Passion of Shame should fix on these Parts for its peculiar Residence, when our Hands, and our Tongues are as readily dispos'd to aid our sinful Lust, and disorderly Desires? Nay in as much as the primitive Transgression came by the Act of Eating, one might imagine that this Opinion of Impurity should rather fasten upon the Mouth as its original and proper Seat.

XXX. The Author of the Treatise de Principiis justis & decoris, touching on this Subject now before us, in the first Place lays down this for a Principle; Every thing which causeth Shame is not a Sin, nor forbidden by the dictates of natural Law^g. He instanceth in Poverty, mean Cloaths, innocent Mistakes, Deformity, and the like; which frequently put us to the Blush, tho' we can by no means lay any moral Turpitude to their Charge. "He proceeds to observe, that the reason why "we would avoid such things, is because they are "the Tokens of some Infirmity or Imperfection; "from which Censures every Man desires to keep "himself at as great a distance as possible. In the "same manner, altho' to discover the Secrets of "the Body be not in it self sinful, yet a Man "ought not certainly to use such a freedom in "open view, whensoever it would prove an Of- "fence and Blemish to natural Honesty; which "is very often the Case. A Man hath then on- "ly good reason to be ashamed, when he possesseth or discloseth such Imperfections, as may "make others justly despise him, whilst appear- "ing thus below the Character which he sustains: "To be ignorant of a Point of Learning is no "Blemish in him who hath wanted the Benefit of "Education; but one who hath made a long Pre- "tence to Study, and yet can shew no Fruits of "his Proficiency, may well be ashamed of the "Neglect. Plain Behaviour fits decently enough "on a Countryman, but would be a faulty Stiff- "ness in a Person of Breeding. Thus then, he "who uncovers in publick Sight those Parts of "the Body which the Custom of the Nation bids

Mr. BARB. NOTE on § XXIX.

¹ See several Examples of the like Nature, in Mr. BAYLE's Answer to the Questions of the Provinc. Tom. 2. p. 92, 93 in the Margin.

^a De Virtute Mulier. p. 249. C. ^b Strategem. l. 8. c. 63. ^c Thus Pompon. Mela reports of the Messynians; that their Love-Affairs are promiscuous and open. And Apollonius Rhodius in Argonaut. l. 2. has left this Character of the same People;

The Manners and the Notions they pursue,
Are the reverse of ours; in publick View
What we perform, or at the crowded Bar,
They act by Stealth, and make a silent Care;
But what our Modesty at Home conceals,
Their Tribes proclaim, and every Street reveals.
Like Beasts, beyond the Power of Shame to move, Stretch'd on the Ground they ply their common Love.

Vid. Diod. Sic. l. 14. c. 31. & Xenophon. Exped. Cyr. l. V. Of the Massagetans Herodot. in Clio, towards the End; of the Nasamonies in Melpomen. ^d Vid. Diodor. Sic. l. 1. c. 88. ^e Conviv. Sapiens. p. 153. F. ^f Xiphilin.

Epit. Dion. in Sever. Add. Montaign's Essays, l. 2. c. 12. & Charron de la Sageffe, l. 1. c. 22.

^g P. 59, &c.

“ him conceal, is an Offender against natural “ Honesty and Decorum ^a. But he may take
 “ the same Liberty in a Country where the Men “ go naked; as suppose in the Caribbies, without “ the Imputation of Obscenity, or of Sin ^b.
 “ Thus it is accounted Impudence to do some “ things in the Presence of Strangers, without “ desiring particular Leave, which we make no “ Scruple of practising before our Equals and our “ Acquaintance ^c. Thus a Teacher of Ana“ tomy lays open such Objects to our View, as it “ would not be decent for him so much as to name, “ were he not engag'd in his proper Business and “ Exercise. The same Judgment we are to make
 “ of the Point before us: “ For altho' a Nation,
 “ which doth not censure these unseemly Free“ doms, must needs have cast off all modesty ^d,
 “ and this is not without a grievous Sin in their “ Fore-fathers, from whom the loose Opinion is “ deriv'd; yet the Custom being once firmly es-“ tablish'd, and such a Way of living exempted,
 “ by universal Consent, from all Marks of Dis“ grace, the whole People may then openly ap“ pear in the same Manner, and yet contract not “ the least Guilt. In as much as they do not ap“ prehend, or acknowledge in this Practice, any “ Imperfection, or Infirmity deserving Shame;
 “ more than we do in the Custom of our Women
 “ to go with their Faces unveil'd, which in some “ Countries would be reckon'd a scandalous “ Breach of Modesty ^e. We may farther observe,
 “ that even in those Nations where the appearing “ Naked is prohibited, the most secret Parts are “ sometimes disclosed without Sin, as when they “ are recommended to the Care of Physicians, or “ when Surprise, or Necessity, in regard of Time, “ or of Want, hinders their Concealment; or “ when Children are wrapt in their Swadling-“ Cloaths. Because, in these Cases, the Mark
 “ of Impudence ceaseth; the Discovery being “ made without any lascivious Design ^f.

In another part of his Work he repeats the same Argument; “ The uncovering the secret Parts “ (says he) is not in itself foul, or indecent, but “ is only render'd such by means of the Cir“ cumstances; which Circumstances are taken, “ either from the Lust of others, or from their “ Honour or Worth, or from our own Reputati“ on, which we are oblig'd to support and pre“ serve. But in as much as the external Tokens “ of Reverence and Respect are capable of great “ Variation, many Actions are (by the same “ People) construed as an Affront to our Neigh“ bour, or a discredit to our selves, which, upon

 “ the change of Circumstances, would appear “ harmless and inoffensive. Upon the Approach “ of our Saviour, we find St. Peter ^g hastning to “ gird on his Fisher's Coat; whereas he was not “ ashamed to work naked with the Companions
 “ of his Business. Because the Dignity of Christ,
 “ and the Honour St. Peter ow'd him, requir'd a “ grave and modest Appearance and Carriage;
 “ which, in the Opinion of civiliz'd Nations, are “ inconsistent with Nakedness ^h. We transact
 “ many things in secret with Decency and Con“ venience, which if perform'd openly, would “ be reproach'd as Infamous; neither do we “ reckon it dishonourable, to let the Company “ know on what account we retire. Lastly, many “ Actions pass unblam'd in Men, which would “ look inexcusably impudent in the other Sex.

From St. Paul's manner of Speech, 2 Cor. xi. 17.
 he infers, “ That when upon the Formality of “ begging Pardon, or desiring Leave of others,
 “ we say, or do a thing fairly, or civilly, which “ would otherwise be rude and indecent; the Im“ propriety here doth not affect the Thing abso“ lutely consider'd in it self, but depends wholly on “ the Circumstances, which if taken away, leave
 “ no Ground for Censure: For all that is here “ done, is that the other Party waves and remits
 “ the Reverence, which was owing to him. He “ judiciously inserts this Caution, provided, that by the general Custom of the Nation, all Men are allow'd to indulge each other in these petit Liberties. For o“ therwise particular Persons do by no means wipe “ off the Blemish, when they give themselves a mu“ tual Dispensation in such Points: As a Company “ of wild Sparks could not avoid Shame and Re“ proof, should they, by joint Consent, go naked
 “ in a Place of Manners and Civility. Lastly, He “ makes no doubt but that our first Parents, before “ they sinn'd, had, in respect of Shame ⁱ, the in“ nocent Insensibility of Children: But that im-

Mr. BARB. NOTE on § XXX.

^a This is a false Supposition, for what should Adam and Eve be ashamed of, when they alone were in the World, and made one: or the other by the Creator? When then the sacred Historian says, They knew that they were naked, it signifies only in the Style of the Eastern People, Their Conscience accus'd them for the Sin they had committed, in eating of the forbidden Fruit. See Mr. LE CLERC upon Gen. iii. 7. The Example of Infants, alledg'd by Mr. VERTHUYSEN, shews, that Shame is only the Effect of Education and Custom, wisely establish'd to prevent divers Inconveniences.

^b All women's Case, as Herodotus expresseth it, L. 1. p. 3. Ed. II. Steph. when she throws off her Garments, lays aside her Modesty.

^c In some Parts of Abyssinia, the Women go quite naked, without having any irregular Influence on the Men. Franc. Alvarez Descript. Æthiop. c. 32. Al. J. Len. Hist. Amer. c. 8. & Rocheport Descript. Ind. Antill. pt. 2. c. 9. If I mistake not, amongst some of the Indians, to go with the Walle cover'd, fell under the same Penalty as Adultery.

^d And since Cladius did not put out the wife Edict, which was so long under his grave Deliberation (Claud. Suet. c. 32.) we will make a Scruple of offending the Company with some kind of Sounds, which we reckon not quite so improper Musick when we are alone. Al. Drogen. Laert. in vitam Metrol. l. 6.

^e Since amongst all civiliz'd People, it hath been, even in Death, a Caro deponitur nuda, to fall in a decent and modest Posture. ^f Plato (in Diag. Laert. 3.) speaking of unwritten Law, proceeding from Custom, instanceth in Ἐπισημοῦς ποδῶν ἐν τοῖς δημοῖς, not to appear naked in publick Places.

^g A Pagan might well be ashamed of his Size amongst a People of larger Dimensions; yet in his own Quarters, he is not affected with the Disgrace.

--- Ubi tota Cobors pede nuda est amplior uno;

Where the whole Troop make but a Foot in height.

Sir Th. Herbert (Travels, p. 21.) reports of Women amongst the Casars, that if you give them any thing, they uncover all, in violation of Civility.

^h Hence amongst the Romans, Sons, grown up to the Condition of Men, never talk'd with their Parents, nor Sons-in-Law with their Father-in-Law, Val. Max. l. 2. c. 1. f. 7. So in Uzey, L. 3. c. 26. The Deputies command L. Quintus, whom they found stripp'd at his Country-Work, to hear the Orders of the Senate in his Clam. In the same manner, within our own Houses, and in private, we are not ashamed of the meanest Apparel, which yet we could not appear in at a Wedding, or solemn Meeting, without great Indecency and Offence. See Matt. xxii. 12.

mediately

mediately after their Offence, this guilty Passion seiz'd upon their Mind, by which they apprehended their Nakedness to be indecent, as we, when we grow up to Years of Reason, make the same Judgment. His Inference from the whole is this, "That no Degrees of Marriage are forbidden by the Law of Nature; tho' to abstain from some is most agreeable to natural Honesty."

XXXI. For our part, tho' we do not think this way of arguing ought altogether to be condemn'd, yet we choose to fix the Shame, now under our Examination, principally on these two Reasons: First, because Man is a Creature of high and proud Conceits, fondly desirous of Honour and Grace, and abhorring any thing that seems to lessen him in these respects. Now through those Out-lets of our Body Nature casts off the useless Relicks of what we eat or drink: and these Relicks we have a great Aversion to, not only upon account of that Uncomeliness, but in as much as they seem to upbraid us with our mean Condition, whilst the greatest Delicacies of Taste, by being once receiv'd within us, are so vilely chang'd and corrupted. And hence our lofty Imagination engageth us to be very industrious in concealing so manifest Tokens of our Infirmary^b. Nature (says Tully^c) seems to have had a most kind regard to the Dignity of our Body, by exposing only those Parts to sight, which appear beautiful, comely, and agreeable; and by covering and concealing those which would be foul and offensive, if laid open to view, and serve us only for the meer Necessities of our Being. This exquisite Diligence, which Nature hath shown in the human Fabrick, Men have imitated in their modest Customs and Manners^d.

Our second Reason is, since our Affections being deprav'd and corrupted by the Fall, our irregular Lusts endeavour violently to make a Sally through those Passages; and since the due Restraints, and the legal Methods of Propagation, are the very Hinges on which human Order and Society seem to turn; Nature, to preserve her own Dignity, and to cut off, as much as possible, all Occasion of loose Desires, hath invented this Passion of Shame, engaging Men carefully to cover and to guard those weak Places, left lying continually open, they should tempt and invite the Enemy; and restraining the Pursuit of unlawful Pleasures, whilst Modesty confines the Exercise of those which are lawful, to the Privacy of Darkness and Retirement. Hence our first Parents, after the perfect Harmony of their Affections was disorder'd and impair'd, when they found the unreasonable Inclination of Sense, vigorously striving to force a way through those defenceless Parts of the Body, could not but conceive the deepest Shame at this wretched Discovery of their own Imperfection; which, in some measure, to disguise and conceal, they had recourse to the² Shelter of Apparel. That this Original Shame of Nakedness should, amongst many Nations, seem to have been quite subdu'd and effaced, was probably the Effect of Necessity: when Men being driven on uninhabited Coasts, and having worn out their present Garments, found no Supply of new ones, nor yet wanted them, by reason of the kind Temper of the Climate. Thus their Shame dropt off by degrees with their Cloaths; or perhaps they express'd, for a little time, some Marks of it in wearing a thin Covering round their Middle, which soon left them quite naked.

It's farther observable, that our Shame is ever increas'd to a high degree, by the Presence of those Persons to whom we naturally owe a Reverence, or towards whom we ought to carry our selves with Gravity and Caution; such as are especially our Parents, and our Children. So that he who cannot be hereby deterr'd from daring to offer, under these awful Restraints, the open Freedom and Familiarity of the conjugal State, is fairly judg'd to have an invincible Forehead, and to be well prepar'd for the Commission of the greatest Villanies, being possess'd with harden'd Impudence, The most violent Distemper of human Minds, as it is term'd by the wise Tragedian^e.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XXXI.

^a TULLY'S Words are, Principio, corporis nostri magnam Natura ipsa videtur habuisse rationem, quæ formam nostram, reliquamque figuram, in quâ esset species honesta, posuit in promptu; quæ partes autem corporis, ad Naturæ necessitatem datæ, ad speciem essent deformem habituræ ac turpem, eas contexit, atque abdidit. Hanc naturæ tam diligentem fabricam imitata est hominum verecundia. Quæ enim Natura occultavit, eadem omnes, qui sanè mente sunt, remouent ab oculis, ipsique necessitati dant operam, ut quam occultissimè parcant: quarumque partium corporis usus sunt necessarij, eas neque partes, neque earum usus suis nominibus appellant: quodque facere turpe non est, vobis occultè, id dicere obscenam est. Itaque nec aperta actio rerum ullarum petulantia vacat, nec orationis obscenitas.

^b The Original Hebrew may be explain'd as if the sacred Historian had said, That Adam and Eve made themselves a kind of Cabin, to hide themselves in, after they were sensible of the Fault they had committed. See Mr. LE CLERC upon Gen. iii. 7. For these irregular Desires, of which our Author speaks, could not yet be thought to have place in them, unless we will say, that the Love, which Adam and Eve had one for another, was unlawful after they had sinned. See the Note upon the foregoing §.

^c The Greek is, Ἄνθρωπος ἡ φύσις αὐτῶν ἐν ἀνθρώποις νόσσην ἡσυχίαν ἀναδέεται.-----

^a Compare Montaign's Essays, l. 1. c. 35. & Charron de la Sageffe, l. 1. c. 6. & 14. ^b See 1 Cor. xii. 23, 24. ^c Offic. l. 1. c. 35. ^d This seems to be taken out of Xenophon. Apomnem. l. 1. where Socrates is speaking of Providence. Add. Ambros. Offic. l. 1. c. 18. Herodotus (Euterp. p. 64, towards the End) reports of the Egyptian, that They eat their Food in the publick Streets; but retire Home when they have Occasion to get rid of it; upon this Principle, That whatever was foul and indecent, yet necessary, was to be perform'd at Home in secret, and every thing which was not foul, abroad. Yet we may remark (by the bye) that the same People were jested upon, for tempering their Clay with their Hands, and their Bread with their Feet. In Salus's Persick Rofary (c. 8.) this Reason is given why the Ring should be worn on the Left-Hand, tho' less Honourable than the Right; Because the Right-Hand is a sufficient Ornament to it's self. Aloys Cadamuri (Navig. c. 10.) tells us of the Azenagians, the Inhabitants of Senega, that They are as much ashamed of their Mouth, as of any other Part of the Body; and therefore they ordinarily go with a Cover upon it, which they only take off on the account of Eating. They take it for a kind of Sink always sending out Stench and Nastiness. Leo Africanus (l. 1.) gives much the same Relation, and by him the People are call'd Senegates. ^e Eurip. Medea, v. 471, 472. Huart (Trial of Wit, C 1) gives another Reason for this Modesty, which we have not leisure now to examine.

XXXII. This Shame or Modesty may be assign'd as one of the principal Causes, why we esteem Marriages between Kindred, in a direct Line, to be forbidden by the Law of Nature: especially since there never did, and probably never will any such Case happen, as shall render these Matches necessary for the Preservation of human Race ^a. And with regard to this Restraint, we are to expound the Reason urg'd against those Marriages by Grotius: ^b The Son (says he) being superior by the Law of Matrimony, could not pay to his Mother, if at the same time his Wife, that Reverence which Nature requires; no more could the Daughter, in the like Case, to her Father; because, altho' the conjugal Pact would keep her still his inferior, yet so near a Familiarity must needs prejudice her natural Duty ^c. For take away the Force of this Original Modesty, and it will not appear so very absurd, for a Mother to marry her own Son; since it is agreeable enough, that a Husband should pay Respect and Honour to his Wife on account of her extraordinary Virtue, Wisdom, or Birth. Tacitus observes of his Father and Mother in law (Agricola and his Lady) vixerunt mirâ concordia per mutua charitatem & invicem se anteponendo: They liv'd in wonderful Agreement, thro' the Engagements of mutual Affection, and by their kind Care of giving each the Preference to the other. Much less inconsistent would it be, for a Woman to pay to the same Man the Duty of a Daughter, and of a Wife, did she not find a Restraint from the above-mentioned Principle.

The Reason alledg'd by Socrates in Xenophon ^e, appears very poor and insipid, as if nothing deserv'd Blame in these Matches, but the great difference of Age, the effect of which must either be Barrenness, or suspicious and unrefembling Issue: For are there not many Marriages in which the Years of the Couple stand at as wide a distance as those of Parents and their Children?

We cannot on this Head, but recommend the chaste and pious Regard of the Roman Laws, which out of Reverence to the bare Name of a Father, allow'd no Man to marry ³ his Adopted Daughter, tho' all the Right of Adoption had been formally taken off and revers'd ^d. And the Emperour Claudius acted much beyond his ordinary Capacity, when a Woman refusing to acknowledge her Son, and the Arguments appearing dubious on both Sides of the Cause, he oblig'd her to a Confession of the Truth, by ordering the young Man to demand her in Marriage ^e.

Some have attempted to shew the high Indecency of such a Practice, from the strange Confusion it would cause in the quite contrary Names and Titles of Relation. Thus Myrrha argues with herself in Ovid,

*Nec, quot confundas & jura & nomina sentis?
Tunc eris & matris pellex & adultera patris?
Tunc soror nati, genetrixq; vocabere fratris?*

Mr. BARR. NOTES on § XXXII.

^a Mr. LE CLERC supposes, that the common use of Sodomy, which they had been brought up to, might contribute much to this. for he proves very well that they could not be carried to it by this Motive, that Mankind should not perish. See his Note on Gen. xix. 31.

^b GROTIUS does not mean so: He only speaks of a Respect which is inconsistent with Inferiority, or at least with the Equality which Marriage introduces. It seems, as if God by Moses, the Jerush Lawgiver, had given us that Reason, when he commanded, Levit. xviii. 7. Thou shalt not uncover the Nakedness of thy Father, or of thy Mother, she is thy Mother, thou shalt not uncover her Nakedness. Beside, Marriage being instituted for the Propagation of Mankind, it is not convenient that any one should be married to a Person to whom he gave a Being, either mediately or immediately, and so the Blood return again, as we may say, to the Fountain from whence it came. Lastly, besides that no good Reason can be given to justify Marriages in the ascending and descending Line: If these sort of Marriages were not abhorred, every Family almost would become, as I may say, a Stew, and there would be but little Union in Families, from whence would arise infinite Disorders, and very troublesome Inconveniences. This I think is all that can be said to prove that this sort of Incest is contrary to the Law of Nature as well as the civil Law. See the Institut. Lib. 1. tit. 10. § 1. So far is the Reason which our Author so much depends on, from having that Weight which he imagines, that it has no Foundation, since, as I have already observed, the Shame of which he speaks is the only Effect of Education and Custom. Besides, he is not aware that this Reason is not good but with respect to them who use Cloathing; for those People who go Naked, not being sensible of any Impressions of Shame, as he himself owns; according to his Principle, Incest would not be unlawful in those Countries, because it would be no Obstacle to that Respect which Children are ought to have to them that gave and preserved their Lives.

^c The Words of the Digests are, Quintianus nefas existimatur, cum quoq; uxorem ducere, que per adoptionem filia neptisq; esse coepit, in tantum, ut, esse per emancipationem adoptio dissoluta sit, idem juris maneat.

^a And therefore the Daughter of Lot (Genes. xix. 31) were too forward in their Conclusion. Though Grotius is of Opinion, that they thought their Practice absolutely blamable, having heard that it was usual with their Neighbours the Arabians, as it was likewise with the Perhians.

^b B. 2. c. 5. l. 12. n. 2. ^c Aponnem. l. 1. ^d Fid. L. 23. t. 2. l. 55. princ. D. de ritu nuptiarum.

^e Sueton Claud. c. 15. ^f Metam. 10. v. 346, &c. So Oedipus in Seneca (Phœniss.) v. 134, &c.

*Avis gener patrisque rivalis sui,
Frater sororum liberorum, & fratrum parens.*

Son-in-Law to his Grandfather, Rival to his Father, Brother to his Children, and Father to his Brothers.

Thyestes in the Agamemnon of the same Poet, v. 34, &c.

----- *Verba est natura retro
Avis parentem --- patri virum, Natis nepotes miscui.*

----- I've turn'd the Course of Nature back,
Confounded all Relations, wildly mixt
The Names of Father, Grandfather, and Son, Husband, and Grandson.

Ibid. *Per scelera natus, nomen ambiguum suis,
Idem sororis natus & patris nepos.*

Conceiv'd in sinful Love, and born a Riddle;
Puzzling his Friends to fix his doubtful Name,
Son to his Sister, Grandson to his Father.

We meet with what follows amongst the ancient Epitaphs;

*Herfilius hic jaceo, necum Marulla quiescit,
Quæ soror & genetrix, quæ mihi sponsa fuit.
Vera negas, frontem trabis, hæc ænigmata Sphingis Credis? Sant Pythio vera magis Tripode.
Mater pater è nata genuit, mihi jungitur illa,
Sic soror & conjux, sic fuit illa parens.*

Here Herfilius, and next in deep repose Marulla lies, his Mother, Sister, Spouse.
Start not, or frown to see the Sphinx renew;
The Pythian Tripod never told to true.
Shamed by her Sire, she weds their common Son,
And blends the three Relations into one.

Canst thou be call'd (to save thy wretched Life)
 Thy Mother's Rival, and thy Father's Wife?
 Confound so many sacred Names in one;
 Thy Brother's Mother, Sister to thy Son?

MR. DRYDEN.

And Philo Judæus^a inveighing against the Persians, who allow'd the Marriages between Mother and Son, thus expresseth himself: Nothing could have been invented more grossly Impious; to abuse the Bed of the deceased Father, which claim'd a most religious Respect; to pay no Reverence to the Mother; to have the same Man become her Husband and her Son; on the other hand, to see the Mother assume the Name of a Wife; to bear their common Children call'd the Brothers of their Father, and the Grandsons of their Mother.

No less unnatural and detestable is the Custom of the Ile of Ceylon, where a Father, when he hath provided a Match for his Daughter, forestalls the Husband in the Office of the Bed; giving this ridiculous Reason, that 'tis but just he should gather the Fruits from a Tree of his own Planting^b.

XXXIII. The Jews, in this Point, had recourse, not so much to Natural Reason, as to the Original Prohibition of GOD. They taught, that from the Beginning of the World, six Kinds of Conjunctions were Divinely forbidden; with a Mother, or Mother-in-Law, with another Man's Wife, with a Sister by the same Venter, with a Male, and with a Beast. And all this (except the Case of a Sister) they deduce from those Words in Gen. ii. 24. Therefore shall a Man leave his Father (that is, say they, the Bed of his Father, and consequently shall abstain from his Mother-in-Law) and his Mother (that is, he shall observe Decency and Distance towards his proper Mother) and shall cleave to his Wife (thus both Males are excluded, and Women Married to other Men) and they two shall be one Flesh; therefore unnatural Desires towards Beasts are here likewise forbidden, in as much as 'tis impossible for Man and Beast to make one Flesh. This is Mr. Schlen's Account of their Doctrine^c. It was a very strange and singular Fancie of theirs, which the same Author reports^d, that a Gentile becoming a Profelyte of Justice, immediately lost all Relation to his Gentile Friends, of what Nearness and Degree soever. Thus, if several Persons of the same Family, as suppose a Mother with a Daughter, were admitted together into the Jewish Communion, they imagined that their Right of Kindred straight expired, and that they ought to live as Persons entirely disengag'd from each other, For by this Act of embracing and acknowledging their Religion, they conceiv'd Persons to be absolutely regenerated, and put into the Condition of Infants^e. Thus their new Man having extinguish'd all the Ties that were upon him from his first Nativity, lay, in that respect, under no restraint or Limitation as to Marriage. And this Notion they pretended to found on the divine Law. Yet, by the Traditions of their Wife-men, a Profelyte was forbidden to marry his Mother, his Daughter, or his Sister, tho' a Profelyte as well as himself. And if any Person, during his Continuance in Paganism, had wedded into such Degree, at his Conversion he was oblig'd to release himself by Divorce. The Case was not the same with a Slave, when receiv'd into their Worship under that Condition. For as they imagin'd him likewise to have no remaining Alliance of Kindred, or Blood; so further, they judg'd it no Sin for him to pass beyond the above-mentioned Bounds of Marriage, which confin'd all Freemen, as well Gentiles, as Jews. The Reason of this difference was, because they esteem'd a Servant as No-Body, in civil Consideration: And thus the State was not concern'd in regulating such inferior Marriages, but they were confirm'd or dissolv'd, at the Master's Pleasure. Yet the Roman Laws enjoin the same decent Regard to Kindred^f in the Marriages of Slaves, as of free Subjects.

'Tis remarkable what Travellers report of the Chinese, that they decline marrying Women of the same Name with themselves, tho' not allied to them by Blood. And that, on the other hand, provided their Names be different, they never regard any nearness of Birth between Husband and Wife; so that a Niece and an Uncle is a very allowable Match^g.

XXXIV. We are now to examine the other Degrees of Consanguinity, those in a transverse Line; and afterwards to pass on to the Case of Affinity. To begin with Brothers and Sisters; there is commonly so very remarkable a Modesty between them, that they are unwilling to be, at the same time present in a Place, where the Endearments of Love and Courtship are carrying on: Nay, it may be observ'd, that Brothers themselves are usually averse to talking with each other on these Points of Pleasure, tho' only in Sport and Jest^h. Yet the Reason why we cannot positively affirm that Marriages, in seem to have obscurely hinted at this Opinion, when, in his Character of the Jews, he says, Those who pass over to their Profession, use the same Customs; and one of the first Lessons which they are taught, is to despise the Gods, to lay aside all Duty and Regard to their Country, utterly to neglect and undervalue their Parents, Children, and Brothers. Hist. l. V. c. 11. p. 1. D. unde cognati. l. 8. / 14. l. 2. 3. D. de ritu nuptiar. l. 22. de reg. juris. Selden l. V. c. 16.

^a Philo Jud. de Leg. Special. p. 778. C. Ed. Par.

^b And the same vile Excuse is alledged for his Incest by Charbon in Berrier's Description of the Empire of the Mogul.
^c L. P. c. 1, 2. ^d C. 16. ^e Tacitus

^f Charbon seems to have obscurely hinted at this Opinion, when, in his Character of the Jews, he says, Those who pass over to their Profession, use the same Customs; and one of the first Lessons which they are taught, is to despise the Gods, to lay aside all Duty and Regard to their Country, utterly to neglect and undervalue their Parents, Children, and Brothers. Hist. l. V. c. 11. p. 1. D. unde cognati. l. 8. / 14. l. 2. 3. D. de ritu nuptiar. l. 22. de reg. juris. Selden l. V. c. 16. ^g Phil. Martin Hist. Sinic. l. 1. p. 116.

^h For which Plato assigns this Reason (de LL. l. 8. p. 912. A. Ed. Wech.) *That all the Talk of the World lies that way; Persons, in their very early Age, bearing these Doctrines ever insinuated, sometimes in Jest, sometimes in more serious Application; and particularly in the Tragedies on the Stage, where Narrations are commonly made, that sick-wild Wretches, as Thyestes, Oedipus or Macareus, who have committed Incest with their Sisters, were seen in a terrible Manner to be their own Executioners. Simplificus on Epictet. c. 47. speaks to the same Purpose. Since Law and Custom have forbidden the Familiarity of Brothers and Sisters, the Inclinations are no less powerfully suppressed, than if the Command of Nature it self had laid this Restraint upon them; except when Persons are transported with Frenzy, and tortured by the Furies of a wicked Conscience. *Group. Charon de la Sageité, l. 2. c. 8. p. 6.

the first Degree, are of themselves repugnant to the Law of Nature, is this; because as the Origin of Mankind is recorded in the holy Scriptures, such Matches must necessarily have been made between the first Children of our first Parents. For it is by no means to be suppos'd, that GOD would appoint such a Case in which the Law of Nature could not but be violat'd; and yet we see him commanding the Propagation of Kind, and at the same time providing no other way of performing that Duty, besides these Contracts between Brothers and Sisters. Nor can we say that the Creator lay under any Obligation of forming one only human Pair. Some have express'd great Contempt of this Argument, as rash and impertinent, but their Censure will be of little Force, 'till their Reasons are more considerable. They tell us, GOD was pleas'd Mankind should draw their Descent from one Head, that He might establish a firm Alliance amongst them on the score of their Kindred. But would not the Alliance have been sufficient, should several Pairs have been at first produced, all having the same Nature, and the same immediate Author of it? And would not they have been able, by Intermarriages, to keep up the near Relation amongst their Posterity? They urge farther, that if the Beginning of human Race had been otherwise settled, Wars must have immediately followed, and the World have perish'd in its Infancy. But of what Consequence is this Objection, when, even according to the establish'd Method, we see one of the first Brothers falling by the Hands of the other? Therefore the Prohibition of these Marriages seems to have taken its rise from some positive Ordinance^a: The Ground and Occasion of which might be, First, the great Modesty discoverable between Parties thus related; and, Secondly, this Consideration, that in as much as their Circumstances engage them to live together in a free and unobserv'd manner, were they farther allow'd to unite in a wedded State, too frequent Opportunities would be offer'd of Adultery, and other shameful Disorders^b.

It may contribute to the Illustration of this Point, to reflect again on the Opinion of the antient Jews, as collected by Mr. Selden^c. They therefore, amongst these six Kinds of Conjunctions originally forbidden by GOD, reckon the Marriage of a Brother with his Sister by the Mother's Side. But they add, that this Command did not exercise its Force till Mankind being sufficiently multiplied, Plenty of other Women might be had, and there was no need of breaking in upon this Degree. 'Tis an old Tradition with the Eastern People, that all Adam's Children, except Seth, were Twins, and that it being necessary amongst them for a Brother still to marry his Sister; yet they carefully abstain'd from Sisters of the same Birth. Farther, the Jews believ'd a Sister, by the Mother's Side, to be more closely allied to her Brother, than if by the Father's only. (And thus Deuteronomy xiii. 6. Thy Brother the Son of thy Mother, is emphatically spoken, as a nearer Degree of Relation.) They thought the primitive Command affect'd only Sisters in the former Sense, not in the latter; for these they judg'd might be taken for Wives by the purest of the Gentiles, those who observ'd the Precepts of Noah, and govern'd themselves by the Law of Nature and of Nations. And hence, they say, it came to pass that Abraham married his Sister Sarah; no Restraint being yet laid, in that Particular, from the positive Law. For lest any should imagine, that the Term of Sister is there put for any Kinf-woman, the Patriarch himself explains his own meaning, Truly, says he, she is my Sister, for she is the Daughter of my Father, but not the Daughter of my Mother^d. Yet that such Matches were not usual in those Countries, is evident from this, that Abraham imagin'd he should avoid being taken for Sarah's Husband, if she pretended to be his Sister. Unless we are rather inclin'd to say, that he hoped they would take the Word in the fullest and most vulgar Sense, for the Sister by both Sides.

A Difficulty ariseth on this Subject, from 2 Sam. xiii. 13. where Tamar answers her Half-Brother Amnon, soliciting her to his Bed, Speak to the King, for he will not withhold me from thee. Here on the one Side, it is not probable that Tamar was ignorant of the divine Law, which expressly forbids the Marriage of a Brother and Sister by the same Father, as well as by the same Mother. And on the other Side, it would have been in vain for her to think of finally escaping the Violence of her Brother's Passion, by depending on this Reserve, that whatever she might seem to promise him, he could not at last wed her, without a manifest Violation of the divine Command; which yet is Josephus's Opinion^e. The Jewish Doctors therefore give this Answer to the Case before us. They suppose Maacah, the Mother of Tamar and Absalom, to have been taken Captive by David, in the War against the King of Gesur, and to have born him Tamar, whilst she continued a Gentile, and Absalom, after she was made a Profelyte. Since then they were persuaded that Persons, by embracing their Religion, were releas'd from all former Kindreds; and because the Child of an Israelite, by a Gentile Wife, follow'd the Mother, not the Father, and was likewise reckon'd a Gentile; they concluded that Tamar, when she became a Profelyte, lost all the Relation she had to Amnon, during her Gentile Condition; and that accordingly she believ'd she might be given in Marriage to him, without transgressing the divine Ordinance; her Nearness of Blood being extinguish'd in her Regeneration.

To touch on the Customs of other Nations in this Affair, we find Byblis in Ovid, complaining that the Laws of Marriage should be stricter amongst Men than amongst the Gods;

^a See Mr. Barlecyne's 1st, 2d and 3d Notes upon § xxxii. of this Chapter.

^b Add Cumberland de L. N. c. 8. f. 9. Selden de J. N. & G. l. 5. c. 1. & 3.

^c 438, 535, 558, &c.

^d L. V. c. 11.

^e Genes. xx. 12. Vid. Grot. ad loc. dist

^b Vid. Ovid Metamorph. IX.

^c Antiq. Jud. VII. 7.

----- Dii nempe suas habuere sorores.
Sic Saturnus Opim junctam sibi sanguine duxit ;
Oceanus Tethyn, Junonem rector Olympi.
Metam. IX. v. 496, &c.

In Homer ^a the Daughters of Æolus are represented as married to his Sons. Theocritus ^b commends King Ptolemy and his Queen, for resembling the Matches of the Gods, in being Brother and Sister. Lucian ^c reports the same of Mausolus and Artemisia ; in Arrian ^d, Indicus, the Carian, is said to have married Ada his Sister. Amongst the old Peruvians the Thians alone were permitted to marry their Sisters, and all other Men forbidden to take the same Liberty ^e. On the other hand, the Romans abhor'd this Practice as most odious and unnatural. Plutarch ^f, giving the reason why the Women, in that Nation, saluted their Relations with a Kiss, hath left this Remark, When the Laws had prohibited the Marriage of near Relations, they yet allow'd them to proceed to this innocent Expression of Love ; and this became a mutual Pledge and Mark of their Alliance. For in ancient Times the Romans abstain'd from wedding their Kinswomen, in any Degree of Blood ; as they at present forbear their Aunts and their Sisters. It was late before the Marriage of Cousin-Germans was dispens'd with ^g.

The Athenians, by the Constitution of Solon, might marry their Sisters by the Father's side, not by the Mother's. Thus Plutarch ^h relates a Match between Themistocles's Son and his Daughter by another Wife. Demosthenes ⁱ reports the same of his Grandfather. Cornelius Nepos, in his Life of Cimon ^k, observes that General to have made the like Marriage, which, he says, Was agreeable to the Athenian Customs ^l. Yet there is a Passage, in the Oration of Andocides against Alcibiades, which seems to overthrow all this: Reflect, says he, upon the Examples of our Ancestors ; with what Bravery and what Wisdom they proceeded, when they sent so great a Man as Cimon into Banishment, for violating the Laws, in taking his own Sister to his Bed ^m. Plutarch, in Cimon's Story, delivers himself with no Certainty on this Point ; he tells us, Some censur'd him for using too much Liberty with his Sister, tho' only in Sport : Others affirm'd, that the matrimonial Contract had really pass'd between them, and that the reason was, because the young Lady, on account of the Poverty of the Family, could not find a Husband abroad.

The Lacedemonians, on the contrary, married their Sisters by the Mother's side, not by the Father's ; as Philo Judæus ⁿ informs us.

It appears from Pluto ^o, that he esteem'd Matrimony between Brothers and Sisters lawful ; in as much as he forbids it only in the ascending or descending Line of Kindred.

Amongst the Egyptians, Diodorus Siculus ^p observes, this kind of Marriage was establish'd by an express Law, and was grounded on a superstitious Conceit, that the same Practice had succeeded fortunately with Isis. Achilles Tattius ^q reports the same Custom of the Phanicians.

Others of the Antients declar'd an absolute Dislike of this Freedom. It is one of Phocylides's Precepts ^r, Μὴδὲ κασιγέτρης ἐς ἀπόγαγον ἐδιδίμαι ἐπιθεῖν,

 Nor climb thy Sister's interdicted Bed.

And indeed that these Matches were very unusual through all Greece, may be gather'd from Hermionæ's Speech in Euripides, where she thus upbraids Andromache, Τοῖσπερ πῶρ τὸ βεβήκατον γῆναι, &c. v. 103, &c.

Thus the Barbarians with incestuous Love, Fathers their Daughters, Sons their Mothers wed, Brothers their Sisters ; and no Law restrains Their sinful Passion.-----

Or if they were once permitted in Greece, it is certain they grew entirely out of use with Posterity ; as that Passage of Senatus Empiricus ^s sufficiently proves ; The Egyptians contracted Marriage with their Sisters ; which, amongst us, is disallowed by Law. The same Author says in another place ^t ; In our Country we esteem it contrary to all Right and Decency, to make a Wife of a Mother or of a Sister ^u. Yet he chargeth both those Practices on the Persians ; as do likewise Strabo ^x, Lactantius ^y, Curtius ^z, and Lucian ^a. Tho' the Answer given by the Judges to Cambyses, in Herodotus ^b, plainly shews, that the wiser Men, even in the Persian Nation, were of a very different Opinion.

It may not be improper to conclude our Search into the present Controversy, by returning to the Jews. They then, in their Prohibition of Marriage between Brothers and Sisters, thought it made no difference whether the Sister, in such a Case, came by Adultery, or by a lawful Bed : nay, if she was born of a Mother-in-Law, in a dishonest way, the Rule held against her in this respect ^c : Though, otherwise, as to the Crime of Incest, they held it could only be committed by Matrimony, not by Adultery, nor by unmarried Pollution. Thus, amongst them, he did not pass for an Incestuous Person, who had defil'd a Mother and her Daughter, but he only who had actually wedded both. Thus too a Man might marry her whom his Father, Brother, or Uncle, had been too familiar with, tho' he could not wed his Mother-in-Law, nor his Uncle's Widow, nor so much as his Brother's Relict, unless in the extra-

^a Odyss. 10. ^b Ibid. 17. towards the End. ^c Dial. Diogen. & Mausol. ^d D. Euseb. Alexand. l. 1.
^e Garcilasso de la Vega. l. 4. c. 9. ^f In Qu. Rom. p. 265. C. ^g See the Rest in Ibid.
^h In Themistocle. in fin. ⁱ Contra Eubulid. ^k C. 1. ^l See Bardet's Notes on this Place.
^m To this agrees Athenæus, l. XIII. c. 21. ⁿ De leg. Special. p. 779. E. Ed. Paris. ^o De LI. l. 5.
^p L. 1. c. 27. ^q l. 1. ^r V. 170. ^s Pyrrhon. Hypotyp. l. 1. c. 14. p. 31.
^t L. 3. c. 24. ^u Ad Selden. de J. N. & G. l. 5. c. 11. ^x l. 15. c. 505. E. Gen. Consul.
^y In Proæm. ^z L. 8. c. 2. l. 10. ^a De Sacrific. p. 364. Edit. Amst. ^b Tham. Ibid. What is relatted of the Thracians, the Inhabitants of Mount Libanus, I know not with what Credit, by Levi Broderick Im. Oriental. l. 2.
c. 15. in fin. ^c Ad l. 54. D. de Rota Nupt.

ordinary Cafe of his dying without Issue ^a. And so on the other hand, a Man might take her to Wife, whose Mother, Sister, Grandmother, Aunt, Daughter, or Niece he had corrupted. It is true, by the Traditions of their Rabbins, these Marriages were judg'd unlawful; yet the contracting Party was only corporally punish'd, and the Contract still allow'd to stand good. From all which we may infer, that the Jews, in stating the Notion of Affinity, held it to proceed not from a bare Nearness of Blood, unless caus'd in a regular and matrimonial way ^b.

Nicetas Acominatus reports, that the Emperour Andronicus Comnenus having a Design of joining in Marriage Alexius and Irene, both incestuously begotten on Theodora, and consulting his Judges on this Point, one of them gave his Opinion that The Parties being illegitimately born, were not to be esteem'd of Kin to each other, but had lost all Right and Alliance of Blood; and were in the Condition and Distance of Strangers. But the Historian censures these Judges, as Men of greedy and fordid Tempers, who made a Gain of dispensing with GOD's Commands, and would sell their Voices for the Feasts and Favour of great Persons.

XXXV. As for the other Degrees, forbidden ^c in Leviticus xviii. it will be still more difficult to find a Reason why they should hinder Marriage, on the bare Consideration of the Law of Nature. Though it must be own'd, that such Matches have been condemn'd and detested by many Heathens. St. Paul ^d calls it Such Fornication as is not so much as named amongst the Gentiles, that a Man should have his Father's Wife. Phocylides ^e sets it down as one of his Moral Lessons,

Μητρικῆς μὴ ψαδὲ γε δεύτερον λέλειπα γονῆθι,
Μητέρα δὲ ὡς πῖμα πλὴ μπητέρως ἴχνηα ἔῶσαι.

Make not thy Father's injur'd Bed disgrace
Thy Step-dames Vows; but with Respect confesse
A Mother her, that fills thy Mother's Place.

The Story of Stratonice is well known, whom Seleucus her Husband gave away to his Son Antiochus, when the young Prince was fallen in Love with her beyond Cure. It was a remarkable Saying of Seleucus on this Occasion, that if his Wife express'd an Abhorrence of so unusual a Practice, be begg'd his Friends to inform her, that whatever Action was pleasing to the King, and beneficial to the Publick, she ought to esteem right and just ^f. Yet Appian ^g doth not stick to call this Love of Antiochus, ἀδελφικὴ πάθος, A sinful extravagant Passion. It ^h is said to be the ordinary Custom amongst the Tartars, for a Son to marry his Mother-in-Law, when left a Widow by his Father ^h.

The antient Jews, as Grotius observes ⁱ, founded the Prohibition of these Degrees chiefly on two Reasons: First, on that natural Modesty which hinders Parents from holding Familiarity with their Issue, either by themselves, or by such Persons as are in Blood, or Affinity, nearest to them. Which Argument, as it is of good Force in the ascending and descending Line, so, in as much as the Shame there alledg'd is exceedingly weakened, and almost brought to nothing in the collateral Kindred, especially beyond the second Degree, it can here by no means amount to a Precept of the Law of Nature. Yet are we to esteem those civil Constitutions most just and well grounded, which extend the Prohibition to a wider Compass; on purpose, as it were, to fence in and secure those Degrees which the Dictate of Nature, or the positive Ordinance of GOD had before forbidden. Their second Reason was, Left too great occasion should be offer'd to Fornications and Adulteries between Persons thus related, and constantly conversing with Freedom together, if such Pieces of Wantonness might be made good by the Remedy of Marriage. This Argument, like the former, is sufficient to give Occasion to a positive Law, not to evince any Precept of Nature. The Jews apply it well, to account for that seeming Difficulty in the xviiith of Levit. where the marrying an Aunt is forbidden, and not the marrying a Brother's Daughter, though both seem equally distant in Degree. For they observe, that young Men frequenting the Houses of their Grandfather and Grandmother, and sometimes dwelling with them, are very much in the Company of their Aunts; whereas they come not so often to their Brother's Houses, nor have there the same Privileges and Freedoms. Yet the latter of these Degrees was esteem'd unlawful by the Romans, as appears from the Case of Claudius, when designing to marry Agrippina ^k.

Many there are notwithstanding who assert, that in the Place of Scripture but now mention'd, not such particular Persons are forbidden, but in general all such nearness of Degrees: whose Arguments, were there occasion, might perhaps find an Answer.

Those who maintain that all the Degrees, mention'd in the xviiith Chapter of Leviticus, are likewise repugnant to the Law of Nature, urge the Words of the 24th Verse, For all these Abominations have the Men of the Land done which were before you, and the Land is defiled. "For, say they,

MR. BARB. NOTE on § XXXV.

^a The Pythagorians mightily approved the old Laws of the States of Greece, by which it was forbidden to have any Amorous Conversation with a Mother, Daughter, or Sister, and to satisfy his Desires with any Woman whatsoever in a Temple, or in the sight of the World; for, say they, it is good and profitable to put as great an Oblacle to it, as possible. Ἐπιανθίου δὲ ἀπίης ἱστορίαι, ἢ τὰ τελευτὰ τῆς αἰωνοπαράστατον νομίμων ἐν ταῖς ἑλληνικαῖς πόλεσι, τὸ οὐτε μητέρας ἀφίενθαι, μητε θυγατέρας, μητε ἀδελφῆς, μητε ἐν ἑσέ, μητε ἐν τῆς φανερῆς, καλῶν τε γὰρ τῆς, ἢ σύμφορον, το ὅς πλείοντα γυναικῶν καλῶματα τ' ἀφίενθαις ταύταις. Jamblich. in Vit. Pythag. § 210.

^a Comp. l. 1. f. 3. D. de Concubin. l. 4. f. 8. D. de Gradib. § Affin. ^b Selden. ibid. ^c V. Grot. L. 2. c. 5. f. 13, 14. ^d 1 Corinth. v. 1. ^e V. 168, 169. ^f Plutarch in Demetr p. 907. Ed. Wech. ^g In Syriacis, p. 127 Ed. H. Steph. Add. Senec. Controvers. l. 6. Decl. 7. Valer. Max. l. 5. c. 7. f. 1. Ext. Cicero, pro Cluent. c. 6. expresseth a grievous Abhorrence of Marriage between a young Man and his Wife's Mother, O incredible Villany of a Woman, says he, and never heard of till this time in the World! Add. D. L. 23. t. 2. l. 12, 15, §c. De ritu Nupt. Haythou. de Tartar. c. 48. Paul. Venet. l. 1. c. 15. ^h In the Places abovesited. ⁱ V. Tacit. Ann. XII.

* in as much as every Transgression presupposeth a Law, those Gentiles in contracting such Marriages must needs have violated, either some natural Law, or some divine positive Ordinance universally binding Mankind: The latter is hardly to be made out, and the former must therefore be admitted. To this Mr. Selden^a answers, that the Word^b these is to be restrain'd to those Sins which the Heathens were capable of committing. And as an Argument that it doth not extend to every Particular there mention'd, he observes, that one Case there prohibited^c is the marrying of two Sisters together, which could not be before vicious, having been practis'd by so righteous a Man as Jacob. (Though to this Remark of Mr. Selden it might well be added, that the Quarrels and Emulations between those Sisters, Jacob's Wives, was probably the Reason of this positive Prohibition.) In the same manner Anram, Moses's Father, married Jochabad his Aunt; another of the Degrees here forbidden^c.

By the Turkish Alcoran^d, a Mussulman is restrain'd from wedding his Mother, his Step-dame, his Daughter, his Sister, his Aunt, his Niece, his Nurse, his Foster-Sister, his Wife's Mother, his Wife's Daughter by a former Husband, his Son's Wife, two Sisters, a Daughter to a Woman whom he hath abused, and, lastly, another Man's Wife, unless taken for a Slave in War^e.

^f It may not be from the purpose to observe, that many have imagin'd the Force of Affinity to cease, on the Death of the Person in whom it was founded. It is a saying of Euripides^f.

----- New Affinities efface the old.

Isocrates^g, speaking of a Gentleman who had married his Aunt, says, He took so much Delight and Satisfaction in my Father's Friendship, that losing my Aunt without Issue by her, he took my Father's Cousin-German for his second Wife, to keep up the Affinity between our Families^h. *Florus*ⁱ tracing out the Cause of the Quarrel between Caesar and Pompey, observes, that upon the Death of Julia, Daughter to the former, and Wife to the latter, the Band being broken asunder which had so long held them together, they soon discover'd their mutual Jealousy, and appear'd the most violent of Rivals. Marriages, says Philo the Jew^k, are the Ties and Engagements which unite the Families of Strangers; and when they are dissolv'd, the Affinity breaks off with them.

lies of Strangers; and when they are dissolv'd, the Affinity breaks off with them.

XXXVI. It will be convenient to add a Word or two about those inferior, or secondary Wives in use amongst some Nations: Such as do truly plight their Faith to their Husband, and are united to him in the strictest manner of Society; yet so as that upon account of their unequal Condition, or Birth, or for other Reasons, they are not admitted to the full Honours of their Character, nor acquire the same Rights for their Children, as other lawful Mothers^l. Of these Mr. Selden^m hath treated at large; and from him it appears, that their Difference from just and proper Wives is introduc'd purely by positive Law, or by the particular Covenant of the Parties, who to the principal matrimonial Pact may add any thing at their Pleasure, which doth not contradict and overthrow it. The chief Reasons on which this Practice seems to have been founded are these, the Preservation of noble Families, the Fear of injuring former Childrenⁿ, and lastly, the avoiding of those great Expences, which a Wife, in the higher or more perfect Degree, might challenge by the Custom of the State. In order to the keeping up of great Families, it is convenient that they marry into equal Fortunes and Honours: For the better procuring of which it hath been enacted, in many Commonwealths, that in case a Man take a Wife beneath himself, the Marriage shall not have all those Effects and Privileges, which it would otherwise, in course, enjoy. And then again, nothing more weakens a Family, than the dismembring of an Estate into too many Parts; wherefore to prevent this Misfortune, some have thought it proper to take up with these secondary Wives, whose Children, if their Portions are not over large, have yet no Reason to complain. And as to the third Point, he is a notorious Fool, who makes himself a Beggar to maintain the Pride and Grandeur of a Wife.

On the whole, it is clear how injuriously we deal with these inferior Wives, if we allow them no better a Title than the vile Name of Concubines^o. For Concubines are properly such, as exercise conjugal Freedom without conjugal Faith, and differ only in Degree from common Strumpets: Nor do they exempt themselves from the Scandal by entering into a private Engage-

³ This critical Remark, alledg'd by Grotius before § 14. destroys the whole System of them who ground your Divine positive general Laws upon it; though they can't shew, how they have been publish'd to all People.

⁴ Yet among the Tartars, on the contrary, Fathers marry their deceased Sons with the deceased Daughters of some other, and imagin, that by that Posthumous, or rather Imaginary Contract, the Parents of that Son, or Daughter, contract a true Alliance or Affinity. Marc. Paul. Venet. Lib. 1. Chap. 58.

Mr. BARB. NOTE on § XXXVI.

⁵ See Cujacius Observ. Lib. V. Cap. VI. where he treats of the Notion that the Romans had about them, and shews us, how they were look'd on as Concubines.

^a L. 5. c. 11.

some remarkable Things concerning the Degrees of Consanguinity amongst the Indians, in Abr. Roger. de Bramin. p. 1. c. 12.

^d Chapt. of Wives.

^c Add. Selden. de J. N. & G. &c. l. 6. c. 11.

^f Med. ec. 76. & in Orest. 1083.

^g In Aeginetic.

^h Cicero pro Quint. c. 6. The Affinity could by no means be broke off, whilst the Children were alive. Idem Philipp. XI. c. 4. concerning Dolabella, who had formerly married his Daughters; And this Gentleman, O ye heavenly Powers, was once my Friend!

we are told of the Tartars, that amongst them 'tis an usual thing for different Parents to make Matches between their deceased Sons and Daughters; fancying that by this posthumous way of Marriage, a Relation is no less contracted between their surviving Friends, than if they had actually celebrated their Nuptials in their Life-time.

ⁱ L. 4. c. 2. n. 13.

^k De Legat. ad Caium. On the other side

^l Vid. Selden. de J. N. & G. l. 5. c. 7.

^m V. Grot. l. 2. c. 5. § 15.

ⁿ So in Julius Capitolinus towards the end, the Emperor

Marcus, upon the Death of his Lady Faustina, took the Wife of his Procurator for a Concubine, Ne tibi liberis superinduceret novercam, That he might not bring so numerous a Family of Children under the Power of a Mother-in-Law ment, and confining their dishonest Service to a single Person ^a. But the Faith of the Marriage-Bed is infinitely more sacred and solemn, than to be brought into Comparison with the strictest of these illegal Compacts, founded on the base Prospects of Lucre or of Lust ^b.

Busbequius ^c remarks somewhat very particular of the Turkish Emperours, that after Bajazet, none of them enter'd into just and proper Matrimony. For he, after his Defeat by Tamerlain, falling together with his Wife into the hands of the Victor, took no part of the Barbarous Treatment more to heart, than the Affronts and Dishonours put upon the Sultanes before his Eyes. In regard to this Accident, his Successors abstain from conjugal Engagements; and as to the Affair of Issue, make use of Women in the Condition of Slaves, who are not capable of suffering so much Injury and Dishonour. But indeed the Turks in general pay no less Affection and Kindness to their Sons by Concubines or Harlots, than to those who are born of their legal Wives; nor have the former any less Degree of Right to the Goods and Estate of their Father.

Abbas, King of Persia, took another way of preventing these Indignities: For, carrying with him into the Field all his Female Train, he commanded the Eunuchs, that had the Custody of them, to cut off the Heads of all his Wives, in case he lost the Battle ^d.

The Chinese, when they despair of obtaining Issue in just Marriage, have recourse to the Remedy of Concubines; esteeming it the most miserable thing that can befall a Man, to be at a loss for Children, who might mourn at his Decease, and perform the decent Honours of his Burial ^e.

We have only this Observation to add, that as the publick Laws of Commonwealths are wont to invest other Contracts with certain Rites and Solemnities, upon want of which they pass for invalid in civil Cognizance; so in some States there are such Ceremonies annex'd to Matrimony, as if omitted make it illegal, or at least deprive it of some Effects which would otherwise have sprung from it, according to the local Customs and Constitutions ^f. Now although the Law of Nature be a Stranger to these Formalities, yet inasmuch as it commands all Subjects to obey the Ordinances of the Government under which they live, it would be idle and ridiculous for such Persons, as have not the Power of making or of reversing civil Laws, to plead the Indifference of natural Law in the present Case.

^a Vid. Ælian. V. H. l. 10. c. 18.
Vid. L. 32. t. 3. l. 49. l. 4. D. de Legat. and L. 5. t. 27. l. 3. C. de natural. liberis, Concubinage is call'd unequal Marriage.
Ad. Godofred. ad l. 1. d. 17.

^b Yet sometimes we meet with the Word Concubina in no disgraceful Sense.
^c Epist. 1.
^d Petrus della Valle Itin. P. 2. Epist. 5.
^e Martin. Hist. Sin.

l. 6. c. 1. p. 201.

^f V. Constitat. Sicul. l. 3. t. 20.

CHAP. II.

Of paternal Power.

- | | |
|---|--|
| I. The common Opinion of the Original of paternal Authority. II. According to Hobbes, the original Power over Children is in the Mother. III. And from her is derived to others. IV. On what Reason paternal Authority is grounded. V. How far the Father has more Right than the Mother. VI. How great the Power of the Father is, as such, over his Children; | VII. Both in their Infancy and Childhood. VIII. How far Children are capable of being govern'd at this time. IX. Whether a Father may sell his Son. X. Of the Obligation of Children made free. XI. What Power Fathers have over their Children, out of civil Societies; XII. What Power in civil Societies. XIII. How this Power is lost. XIV. Whether Children ought to have their Parents Consent to their Marriages. |
|---|--|

Children are the proper Fruit of Matrimony; as they are likewise the proper Subjects of paternal Dominion, that most antient, and, at the same time, most sacred Kind of Government; by Virtue of which the Children are engaged to acknowledge the Superiority, and to reverence and obey the Commands of their Parents. The Origin of this Power, Grotius ^a, and most Writers refer to the Act of Generation, by which the Parents do, in some measure, resemble the divine Creator, whilst they make a Person really exist, who before had no Being. But in as much as both the Parents equally contribute to this signal Benefit, they say that both originally acquire a Right over their Issue; but that, in case they contend for the Sovereignty, and by reason of their contrary Commands cannot both be obey'd together, the Father's Authority is to carry the Precedence; not only on the account of the Advantage he hath in Sex, but likewise because the Mother herself is placed under his Direction and Sway.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on Chap. II. § I.

¹ QUINCTILIAN expresses this very well in this Passage of his, Declam. VI. quoted in part by GRONOVIVS: Duo [Pater & Mater] unum creabamus, videamus, quod ire debuerit. Pateram quidem fortiter dicere, Pater iusti. Hoc nomen omni Legge majus est-----Necesse habuit parere-----Sint jam jura paria, jedeat melius inter duos Jdex: Non comparabo Personas, quomais apud omnes Gentes plus juris habeat Pater: Sit jam Natura communis, non impatib, quod nomen dedi, quod familiam, quod impensar, &c.

^a L. 2. c. 5. f. 1.

II. Mr. Hobbes ^a takes another Road in tracing out this paternal Rule: “Tho’, says he, this be a true Consequence, A Man is the Father of another, and therefore hath the Dominion over him; yet it is not so clear and manifest as to shew its own Necessity, as those do where one of the Terms is included in the Definition of the other; but must be made out by other Arguments and Proofs. Besides, since all sovereign Power, if regularly establish’d, is indivisible, so that no one can, at the same time, serve two Masters, unless in Subordination; and since two Persons concur to the Act of begetting, that Act should seem an improper Foundation for Sovereignty; which may therefore be more conveniently deduc’d from a State of Nature, in the following Method. During such a State every Man hath a Liberty of practising against every Man, what he thinks may conduce to his own Preservation: ¹ and consequently the Conqueror is the Lord and Master of the conquered. Whence we may infer, that by the Law of Nature the Right of governing an Infant is first in the Power of the Mother; who, if she resolve to nourish and breed him up, ² as she is in Duty obliged to do, is suppos’d to do it upon this Condition, that he shall not prove her Enemy when grown up, i. e. that he shall pay Subjection and Obedience to her. (According to his Hypothesis, those are mutual Enemies, who are neither subject one to the other, nor own a common Master.) For it is by no means to be presum’d that I would give a Person Life, on purpose to put him in a Capacity of growing up to my Prejudice, and of gaining strength in time to repay my Kindness with Hostility. Thus therefore a Woman becomes, at the same Minute, a Mother and a sovereign Mistress. Nor is the Excellency of Sex a sufficient Argument why we “ should attribute this Right of Governing to the Husband, rather than to the Wife: For the Inequality is not so great between them, as that the Man can immediately establish his Rule over the Woman without Opposition; but, in a State of Nature, he must fairly win her by a Course of War. Farther, ³ the Woman, by carrying the Child so long about her, and nourishing it with her Substance, ⁴ doth certainly contribute, if not the most noble, yet the most laborious and troublesome Share to the Production of Issue ^b. Lastly, in as much as in a State of meer Nature, where no Commonwealths and no Families are supposed, ’tis impossible to know who is the Father of the Child, but by the Mother’s Attkveration; it follows that the Child belongs to whom she pleaseth, and therefore primarily to her self. On which account it was enacted by the Roman Constitution, that Issue brought forth without Matrimony ^c should follow the Venter, or the Mother ^d.

III. From the Mother this Dominion, according to Mr. Hobbes, may pass to other Persons several ways: “First, if the Mother renounce her Right by exposing the Child; the Person who finds, and breeds him up, shall enjoy the same Right which the Mother had over him before. For the Life which the Mother at the first gave him, she, as far as she is able, takes away again by this Act of exposing him: And consequently the Obligation he had to her, for her former Kindness, is entirely cancell’d by this Injury. On the other side, to the Person who sav’d and educated him, he owes all possible Returns, and ought to acknowledge him, both for his Parent and his Master ^e. Here, though we should grant that such a Child ought still to preserve an Inclination of paying Duty ^f to his Mother, and, upon her Sorrow and Repentance, to return

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § II.

¹ Our Author elsew here has confuted this Principle of Mr. HOBBS. See B. 1. c. 6. f. 10. and B. 2. c. 2. f. 5, &c.
² Mr. BUDDIUS sets down this (as is certainly her Duty to do) as Mr. HOBBS’s Opinion, but it is plainly contrary to Mr. HOBBS’s Notion, as the Course of his Reasoning makes it evident; and Mr. HOBBS explains himself without Reserve, De Civ. Chap. 9. § 2. where he says, that a Mother may either bring up or nourish her Child, SUO ARBITRIO ET JURE, at her own pleasure. See also his Leviathan. In general, our Author mixes his own Notions and Arguments too much with Mr. HOBBS’s, without Distinction, which ought to be carefully observed.
³ This is our Author’s Reason, tho’ Mr. BUDDIUS attributes it to Mr. HOBBS in the Place before quoted.
⁴ This our Doctors and modern Physicians will not allow, as most Men know.

Mr. BARB. NOTE on § III.

¹ These are our Author’s Words to the end of this Section, and agree with his Principles, only we must add, that what he says of the Mother, must equally be applied to the Father.

^a De Civ. c. 9. ^b Quintil. Declam. 338. It is otherwise in the Case of the Men, who are made Parents by a slow and transient Pleasure, and are enac’d to their Children only by that outward Satisfaction. But the Mothers love with a much stronger Passion, remembering their ten Months Trouble, their Long Course of Cares and Dangers. It is a saying of Medea, in Ennius (or rather in Euripides, v. 250, 251. from whence it was borrowed) I had rather be Three times under the Sword, than once under the Hawks of the Midwife. Yet they tell us of the Women of Paria in America, that they bring forth without any Pain or Weakness, and immediately after their Delivery return to their ordinary Work and Employment. Much the same is reported of the Women of Chili; and ’tis added, that the Spanish Dames, if they live there any considerable time, contract the same Hardiness. Orestes in Eurip. v. 552, &c. when it makes for his Cause, gives his Father much the Advantage of his Mother.

My Father planted me, and his fair Dame
 Was but the Soil that bred and brought me forth,
 More tied I judg’d my self to succour Him
 That gave me Life, than Her that gave me Food

^d By the Law of the Lycians, if a Free-Woman married a Slave, the Children were adjudg’d Free: but if the greatest Man in the State wedded a Foreigner or a Strumpet, the Issue was accounted base and servile. The same People took their Names from the Mother, not from the Father, Herodot. Cho. p. 44 Ed. H. Steph.

So far I died as Death was in Your Power:
 And if a kind Deliverer hath restor’d me
 To Light and Life, I own him for my Father;
 And boast to be the Comfort of his Age.

Liban. Orat. 13. A Man who takes another out of the Water, where he was ready to perish, may well be esteem’d a Father to the Person he hath preserv’d.

which naturally accrue to Men; before we can render them unequal to us, or subject them to our Dominion, it seems necessary for us to seek out some other Title: Especially since in the Method of bringing a Child into the World, the Parents have no little Regard to their own Pleasure and Satisfaction; and therefore cannot rate the Kindness at so vast a Price, and set it so highly on the Child's Score, as to demand back, in Consideration, a full Subjection and Obedience, whether the Child be willing, or no. It is a Saying of Laërtius ^a, He that begets a Son, hath no Power to make him be conceiv'd, to make him be born, to make him live: Hence it appears, that he is not so properly the Author of his Son's Being, as the Instrument.

The Right then of Parents over their Children seems to be founded on these two Titles or Claims: First, it ariseth from that Duty which Nature (in enjoining Man to be a sociable Creature) lays on them to take care of their Offspring; she having at the same time, to stir up their Diligence, wisely implanted in them a most tender Affection towards these little Pictures of themselves. For take away from the Parents all Care and Concern for their Childrens Education, and you make a social Life an impossible and unintelligible Notion. But this Care cannot duly be exercis'd, unless the Parents have Power to direct and govern the Actions of the Child, in order to the procuring his Benefit and Safety, which he himself, through Defect of Years and Judgment, is incapable of apprehending and of providing for ^b; and consequently Nature doth hereby enjoin Parents actually to make use of such a Power and Dominion, so far as it is necessary to the Accomplishment of so important a Work. For whoever obligeth a Person to the Prosecution of an End, is, at the same time, suppos'd to have given him Authority to apply all Means that shall appear requisite for its Attainment. And this Power of the Parents, resulting from the Duty lying on them to provide for their Issue, doth necessarily create in the Children an Obligation to submit themselves to their Parents Direction, without which Act of Submission the former Benefit cannot be obtain'd, and the Authority is to no Purpose.

Secondly, The Sovereignty of the Parents seems likewise to be built on the presumed Consent of the Children, and consequently on a tacit Pact. For, as the Parent, by the very Act of breeding up the Infant, doth declare himself ready to fulfil the Obligation of Nature, and to consult, so far as in him lies, the well educating of his Charge; so the Infant, on the other side, tho' on account of the imperfect Force of Reason, he cannot expressly promise those reciprocal Duties, which answer to the Parent's Obligation, yet by virtue of this Care, employ'd by the Parents about him, he contracts as firm an Engagement towards them, as if he gave his full and express Consent ^c. And this Engagement begins to exert its Power so soon as he arrives at the Knowledge and Apprehension of any thing that his Parents have done for him. It being fairly presumed, that had he, at his coming into the World, been furnish'd with the Use of Reason, and made capable of understanding that his Life could not be preserv'd, without the kind Provision of his Parents, join'd with their Command over him, he would gladly have yielded Obedience on so commodious Terms. Which Consent of his, ² being rationally suppos'd, hath the same Validity as if it had been openly declar'd ^d. In the same manner, as a Person, who hath had any Business perform'd for him by another, in his Absence and without his Knowledge, is suppos'd by a kind of silent Covenant to contract an Obligation of refunding the Charges. It is clear therefore, that the Power which Parents have over a Child, is then actually constituted, when they apply themselves to nourishing and educating him, and rendering him, so far as they are able, a useful Member of human Society.

³ Some indeed have maintain'd, that the Obligation between Parents and Children can by no means be deriv'd from their tacit Consent and Covenant, upon this Argument: Consent, whatever the Subject or Occasion of it be, doth not take place, except in Actions that were free before the Consent pass'd; but now it is not a matter of Freedom in the present Case, for the Parties to perform the mutual Duties of Education on the one side, and of Obedience on the other. But this way of Reasoning cannot weaken what we here assert. For it doth not imply the least Contradiction, for a Duty to arise at the same time from a Precept of the Law of Nature, and from tacit Consent and Pact. It is not certainly free for a Man not to obey GOD; yet GOD hath been pleas'd to enter into Covenant with his faithful Servants. A Subject is no doubt oblig'd to perform all due Offices in the State under which he lives; and yet, when he is to be lifted in the Military Order, not only his Consent is required, but his Oath. And thus, why may we not as well affirm, that whilst the Parent actually undertakes the Education of the Child, the Child's tacit Consent is to be understood? the Effect of which Consent amounts to this, that he shall not afterwards have Reason to complain, that the Parents Authority was obtruded upon him against his Will, and without sufficient Grounds and Title.

V. When the Question is carried farther, and it is demanded to which of the Parents this Right over their Issue doth most properly belong, a Distinction or two will decide the Point. For ² This Supposition is equally ill grounded, and superfluous. We can't presume a Consent of a Child who is not in a Condition, either to give it, or refuse it. The Author also here, as well as elsewhere, confounds a presumed Consent with a tacit one. See what I have said above in my Note upon Lib. 3. Chap. 6. § 2. In that alone, that Nature puts Infants into such an Estate, wherein they have an absolute need to be help'd and directed by others, and charges Fathers and Mothers with that Care; it sufficiently imposes upon the First an Obligation to submit to the Power of the Latter.

³ It is JAMES THOMASIVS, the Father of the present Mr. THOMASIVS, in his Discourse, De Patriâ Potestate, § 49.

^a Divin. Instit. l. 5. c. 18.

^b See Sirac. VII. 23. XXX. 1, &c.

^c Act. L. 3. c. 5 l. 2. D de negot. gestis.

^d Com. Senec. Consol. ad Marciam. C. 18. in fin.

the Persons concern'd, either live under some Commonwealth, or not; and again, the Parents either are, or are not, engaged to each other by Covenant. Without the Bounds of a Commonwealth, or in a State of natural Liberty, if the Parents were not united by any lasting Contract, the Child is under the Care and Command of the Mother. Because, in such a Condition of Life, it being as probable that one Man should be the Father as another, the Mother can only determine the Controversy; at least, the thing cannot be otherwise known, with so much Truth and Certainty, as Matters of Fact demand^a. On this Principle, the Roman Laws award to the Mother Issue begotten^c in common^b. But if a Covenant hath pass'd between the Parents, by which they settled these Affairs, it will appear thence, which of the two is to bear Rule over the Children; for that two Persons should both hold the supreme Authority over a third, without Subordination or Division, is no regular Practice. This Covenant then between the Parties, either terminates in the bare Procurement of Issue, or it includes farther the Sovereignty of the Man over the Woman, and so falls in with just Matrimony; where no doubt the Command over the Children is lodg'd in the hands of the Father. But in Covenants of the former kind, though they usually take their Beginning from the Man, who seeks Children for himself, not for her, and consequently bargains to have the Rule and Disposal of them; yet it may so happen, that quite contrary to this Order, the Woman calls in the Man for an Assistant to her design of Issue; not the Man the Woman. This was the Case with the antient Amazons; and is still with any sovereign Princess, that marries without quitting her Rights; the Man being here not so properly a King, as the Husband of a Queen. Nor ought we to think that Pacts of this Sort are therefore repugnant to the Law of Nature, because in them, one of the Couple seems to renounce that Care of the Children, which Nature hath equally laid on both the Parents: For the Precept of Nature, in this Point, doth not precisely require that both Father and Mother shall apply themselves, in the same strict Degree, to the Work of Education; but is satisfied if by Compact the main Charge be committed to either. In the same manner, as the Mother is not so necessarily oblig'd to give her Infant Suck, but that she may make use of a Nurse^c; and as the Father acts upon good Prudence, when he delivers his Children into the Hands of able Instructors, for the forming of their Mind and Manners.

But in civil States, which for the most part have been erected by the stronger Sex, as the Men in common Course are the Heads of the respective Families, so the private Dominion over the Children belongs to the Father²; so that here, the Mother's Commands are in themselves little better than Counsels, and borrow their full Force of obliging, from that Share of Power imparted by the Husband to his Wife. For as it is generally found convenient to admit the Woman to a Part in the Government and Direction of the Family; so the Father's Power over the Children doth by no means exclude the Mother's inferior Authority and Care. Not but that the Constitutions of particular Commonwealths may settle this Matter otherwise, as shall be judg'd expedient. Peter della Valle, in his Travels^d informs us, that amongst the Inhabitants of Babylon or Bagdet, the supreme Power over the Sons is held by the Father, and over the Daughters by the Mother.

If, upon the Father's Decease, the Government of the Family remain with the Mother, it is but just that she exercise the same Authority over the Children which the Father formerly enjoy'd^e. And in Case she marry a second Time, and the new Husband be intrusted with the Care of his Predecessor's Children, they are to pay him the like Reverence and Duty as was challeng'd by their proper Father. Yet we are told a very odd Custom of the Chinese in this Particular, that if a Wife, after she hath buried one Husband, proceed to a second Match, her Children send her off, covered only with a single Garment, as an ignominious Mark of her light Disposition; and the Reason of the Custom is, that according to the Inclination of that People, the Children cannot bear a Father-in-Law, much less respect and obey him^f.

VI. The next Step we take, must be to enquire how far this Power of Parents over their Children extends; or what are the proper Bounds and Measures of it. And here it is necessary to distinguish, first between those Fathers of Families, who live under no publick Government, and those, who are the Subjects of a Common-

MR. BARB. NOTES on § V.

^a Valgæ nupti (say the D. zēst) dicuntur, qui patrem demonstrare non possunt, vel qui possunt quidem, sed eum habent, quem habere non licet, quæ & spurii appellantur. Lex Naturæ hæc est, ut qui nascitur sine legitimo Matrimonio, matrem sequatur, nisi Lex specialis aliud inducit. Lib. I. Tit. I. De Statu Hominum. Leg. XXIII, XXIV.

^b By the Roman Law Wives had no Authority over their Children, although ULPIAN seems to attribute some to them, Dignif. Lib. XXVII. Tit. X. De Curatoribus furioso, &c. Leg. 4. Pietas enim Parentibus, etsi inæqualis est eorum potestas, a patre debetur. See about this MR. NOBLET's Observations, Lib. 2. Chap. 15.

^c Comp. L. 3. t. 1. f. 31, 32. Instit. de rerum divis. & L. 41. t. 1. l. 7. f. 13. D. de acqui. rer. dom. ^b The Egyptians followed a contrary Opinion. They accounted none of their Sons spurious, although born of a Slave; imagining that the Father alone was the Author of the Generation, and that the Mother contributed no more than Place and Nourishment. Diodor. Sic. l. 1. c. 80. p. 72. Ed. Rhodom. To the same purpose speaks Theages, the Pythagorean, in his Treatise of Virtues, The Father produceth the Form, and the Mother only supplies the Matter. Opuscula Mythol. Eth. & Phys. Printed at Amsterdam in 1688. p. 683, 684.

^e The contrary Opinion is maintain'd by Plutarch, de Educat. &c. and by Phavorinus in Gill. l. 12. c. 1. Add Ferdinand Pinto's Travels, chap. 54. where he tells us how Strict and Religious a Point the Japanese esteem it, for a Mother to give her Infant Suck, In the Alcoran, the Women are commanded to perform this Office to their Children for the two first Years, ^d P. 1. Epist. 17 ^e Comp. Gen. xxi. 21. with xxiv. 4.

^f Neuhof. in Legat. p. 281

wealth: And again, between that Power, which the Father holds, as he is a Father, and that which he bears, as he is the Head of a separate Family. The Power which a Father enjoys, on the bare Score of his being a Father, inasmuch as it accrues to him as a necessary means of discharging the Obligation towards his Issue, which Nature lays upon him, must consequently be so great, as sufficiently to answer and effect that Design. Now the Obligation, or Duty of a Father, as such, chiefly turns on this general Performance, that he duly educate his Children; that is, nourish, protect, inform, and govern them, in order to the rendering them useful to themselves and others, till they are able to consult their proper Benefit, and are grown Masters of their own Wills and Actions. (For, as to the Act of begetting, that is not so properly a Part of the paternal Duty, as the Occasion of it.) Parents ought to apply more Diligence and Caution in fulfilling this Obligation, the more Truth there is in that ¹ saying of Plutarch ², Good Institution is the Fountain and Root of all Honesty and Virtue. Especially if they take this Observation of Plato ³ along with it, which commonly holds true; Persons, says he, who are naturally endued with the most excellent Wits, if they happen to be spoilt in the Breeding up, commonly prove the very worst of Mankind. Can you think that all those barbarous Villanies, all that horrid Wickedness, which we see in the World, proceed from mean and lazy Dispositions, and not rather from brave and generous Spirits perverted by ill Education? Or do you suppose, that a natural Weakness and Feebleness of temper does ever prove the Cause of any very great Good, or very great Mischiefs?

It is plain then, that the Power of the Father doth by no means reach to so extravagant a Degree, as that he may destroy the Child whilst in the Mother's Belly ⁴, unless the Mother must otherwise infallibly perish ⁵, or after the Birth ⁶ expose or make away with it, much less after the increase of Growth and Years. For altho' it be very true, that the Infant hath his Rise and Original from the very Substance of the Parents, yet he is immediately plac'd by Nature, ⁷ in a Condition of Equality with them ⁸; at least so far as to be capable of receiving Hurt and Injury &c. Therefore the Opinion deliver'd by Aristotle in his Pellicicks ⁹ is to be exploded as unjust and inhuman. As to the exposing and the preserving of Children, says he, let it be order'd by Law that nothing lame or defective be suffer'd to grow up. If any Nation think it not allowable to expose their Infants, there certain Bounds are to be set to the Number of Births; and if the Business of Generation happen to exceed the due Limits, it will be convenient to procure Abortion, before the Fœtus is arriv'd at Life and Sense; for such a Period of its Growth is to determine, whether the Act of destroying it be harmless, or sinful. Lycurgus did not expect more Mercy in his Spartan Discipline. We learn from Plutarch, that, when a Child was born, it was not left to the Parents Choice to preserve and nourish him. But he was carried immediately before an Assembly of the Seniors, who considered and surveyed him. If they found his Limbs strong and well set together, they order'd he should be bred up: But the weakly and misshapen Infants they adjudg'd to be carried away and thrown into a kind of Whirl-pool near the Mountain Taygetus; as if to live, when Nature had provided them so infirm or so unsightly a Body, could neither be for their own Good and Credit, nor for the Advantage of the Commonwealth ¹⁰. Indeed this unnatural Practice

MR. BARP. NOTES on § VI.

¹ PLUTARCH'S Greek is, Πῶς γὰρ ἐν βίῳ καλοκαγαθίας, τὸ νόμιμον τυχὴν τοσούτου. PLATO'S Greek is, καὶ τὰς ψυχὰς ἐπιμαρτυροῦντας τὰς ἀποφασίσεις, κακῆς παιδαγωγίας τυχούσας, διαστρέφουσιν κακῶς γιγνέσθαι, ἢ εἴτε τὰ μέγιστα ἀδελφώματα, ἢ τὸν ἀκέραιον ποσειδά, ἐν σαύκῳ, ἀπὸ δὲ ἐκ τῶν μακίστων πόσεισι περὶ διακομιχῆς γιγνέσθαι, ἀδελφὸν δὲ εὐνοῦ, μέγιστον ἐπὶ ἀγαθῶν ἐπὶ κακῶν αὐτῶν ποτὶ ἴσασθαι. Further, we may find several excellent Precepts about the Education of Children in Plutarch's Treatise before quoted, as also in MONTAIGN'S Essays, Lib. 2. Cap. 8. of the Affection of Fathers to their Children. In CHARRON, of Wisdom, Lib. 3. Cap. 14. but especially in that excellent Treatise of Mr. LOCK, which has been several times printed, but the best Edition is in 1708. because the Author has made several Additions to it, to which Mr. COSTE, who has translated it into French, has added several excellent Notes in diverse Places.

² This detestable and inhuman Custom was very common heretofore among the Greeks and Romans. See Mr. NOODT'S Julius Paulus, where he sits this Matter to the bottom. The Law of the Digests, quoted by our Author, where the Lawyer Paul condemns this abominable Custom, as contrary to the Rules of Humanity, Civility, and natural Justice, tho' 'twas not punish'd by the civil Laws; deserves to be set down here at length. Necare videtur, non tantum is, qui partum persequat, sed & is qui abijcit, & qui alimenta denegat, & is qui publicis bonis misericordiae causâ exponit, quam ipse non habet. He kills a Child, not only, who strangles it, but he that casts off all Care of it, and denies it Food, and he that lays it in a publick Road; that it may find that Mercy from others, that he is wholly devoid of. Digest. Lib. 25. tit. 3. De agnoscendis, & utendis Libereis, &c. Leg. 4. See about this, Chap. 8, &c. of Mr. NOODT'S Treatise before quoted.

³ See above, Lib. 1. Cap. 1. § 7.

⁴ De Liberor. Educat. p. 4. B Ed. Wech. ⁵ De Republ. l. 6. p. 6-6. Ed. Wech. ⁶ Law de LL. l. 7. calls a Child, A Creature more intractable than a Beast. Liban. Declam. 20. Education is one of the highest Goods of human Life. Horat. L. 4. Ode 4. v. 33.

*Doctrina sed vim promovet insitam,
Residue cultus peccora robant:
Utique desecere mores,
Dedecorant bene nata culpa.*

But Learning feeds the in-born Flame,
And Culture gives great Souls a firmer Frame:
If Generous Morals once decline,
Baseness and Vice attain the noblest Line.

⁴ Vid. L. 47. t. 11. l. 4. D. de extraordin. crim. & L. 48. t. 8. l. 8. D. ad L. Cornel. de Siciariis, & tit. 19. l. 33. f. 5. D. de pœnis. ⁵ Vid. Ant. Matth. de crimin. ad l. 47. D. t. 5. f. 5. Grot. in Flor. Sparf. ad l. 30. D. de pœnis, and the Father of a Man. Vid. Philo. Jud. de Special. Leg. p. 794, 795. Ed. Paris. Laëtant. Dis. Instit. l. 6. c. 20. Diad. Sic. l. 1. c. 77. Add. Grot. ad Exod. xxi. 22. Leg. Wisigoth. l. 6. t. 3. c. 7. Selden. de J. N. & G. l. 4. c. 1. It is a most absurd and most barbarous Custom which they practise in Formosa, where it is reckon'd scandalous for the Women to conceive before their Thirty fifth or Thirty sixth Year. And if they breed sooner than that time, by miserable Pains and Beatings they procure Abortion. ⁶ L. 7. c. 16. (21.) ⁷ I know not whether we may venture to credit the Account given by Diodor. Sic. l. 1. c. 80. of the Method taken by the Taprobanians, to make Experiment of the Temper of their Children.

of exposing Infants was so frequent and almost so universal a Custom with the Antients, that Strabo^a mentions it as something very particular in the Egyptians, that they breed up all their Children^b. So Dionysius Halicarnassens^c sets it down as a remarkable Opinion of the Aborigines, They refuse to make away with any of their Infants, thinking this one of the highest and most execrable Villanies. And Tacitus, in his Account of the Jews^d, makes their Abhorrence of this Cruelty one part of their Character^e.

Nor doth it appear reasonable to extend the paternal Authority, as such, to the Power of Life and Death, even in the Case of Faults committed; but rather to fix its Bounds within the Exercise of moderate Correction: Because its whole Care and Business is taken up about so tender an Age, as can scarce be imagin'd capable of such grievous and incurable Offences, as demand capital Punishment^f. It seems the more proper way of proceeding, when a Child of obstinate and incorrigible Perverseness rejects and despiseth his Father's kind Labours on his account, to cast him off, as unworthy of all Care and Notice. And thus to abdicate, or disinherit a Son, may pass for the severest Penalty that a Father, by virtue of his being a Father, can inflict^g.

VII. Of this paternal Power strictly taken, we must understand that Place of Grotius^h, where he divides the Age of Children into three Periods: First, "Of imperfect Judgment and Choice; Secondly, When they have attain'd to Maturity of Judgment, but still remain as Members of their Father's Family, and have not undertaken the separate Management of their own Affairs; Thirdly, When they have left their Father's Family, either to join themselves to some other, or to erect one of their own. Which Distinction Ziegler seems to have condemn'd on no very good Reason. For though, as he observes, the Holy Scripturesⁱ press the Duty of Obedience on Children, without making any such Difference, yet they do by no means forbid that grown Persons should be treated in another way of Management than Infants; nor do they require that a Son, when arriv'd at a State of Discretion and Maturity, should ever remove out of his Father's House. "During the first Period of Age, then" (says Grotius) all the Actions of the Children ought to be regulated and directed by their Parents; for he who cannot govern himself, falls of course under the Government of another; and the Parent, according to Nature, is the most proper Person to exercise this Authority over the Child.

VIII. It is here made a Question, whether a Child, under this imperfect Period of Reason, be by the Law of Nature capable of Propriety, or of being the Master of any Goods or Possessions, in such manner as to exclude the Claim of his Parents? On which Point it may be proper to distinguish between Goods gotten by private Industry, and those which are left or made over by the Liberality of others, as in Legacies, Donations, &c. In that tender Age, what can a Child be suppos'd to get by his own Industry? Certainly not so much as his Parents have laid out on his Education. This therefore the Father may fairly challenge, in requital of his Pains and Charges. For tho' he were oblig'd indeed, by the Law of Nature, to support and maintain his Offspring, yet he was not, in the least, prohibited to make what Fruit and Advantage he could of his Labour. One might as well say, that Parents are forbidden to take any Delight or Comfort in their Children; a Satisfaction so very great, that most, who are so happy as to enjoy it, esteem it invaluable, and beyond all Compensation or Equivalent^j. For the same Reason, it would be a high Degree of Impudence, for a Son, in his State of Minority, to require a Reward for the Service he does his Father. 'Tis a wise Saying of Sophocles^k,

*Good Children should forget the Toils they bear
To help their Parents*^l.

In Peru the Children were obliged to assist their Parents with their Labour, till the Age of five and twenty^m.

In the other Case, when any thing is to be transferr'd on the Child, in way of Gift or Legacy, at first view such a Donation may seem invalid, because Acceptance is a necessary Condition required in the Receiver, which cannot be perform'd without deliberate Consent, and therefore not without the full use of Reason. But because it would be an intolerable Hardship to make Children incapable of these Advantages, on account of their Immaturity, when for that very Reason they have more need of the Assistance of others, it is most agreeable to Equity, that another Person should accept this Bounty in their Name, and should likewise have the Goods in Charge, till the Children are capable of being their own Managers. And for this Trust no Man is so fit as the Father. Whence it appears, that it is by no means natural for the Father to acquire a Property over a Possession of this kind, tho' it be very equitable, that he take not only the Care, ^a See what we have said, L. 4. Cap. 11. § 7, 11.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § VIII.

¹ The Greek of Sophocles,

-----Τὰς μάταια τῶν
ὀφθ' ἐπὶ σωτῆ τῆς, δὲ τῶν ματαίων ἔχου.

^a L. 15.

^b Add Dionys. Sic. l. 1. c. 80.

^c L. 1. p. 13.

^d Hist. l. 5.

^e Yet Curtius,

l. 6. c. 1 reports that the Spartan Custom was practis'd by some of the Indians. They bring up their Infants, says he, not at the Pleasure of the Parents, but according to the Order and Direction of Officers appointed to superintend this Affair: who command all such Children to be kill'd, as they find either extremely slow and heavy, or uselefs and defective in any Part of the Body. Strabo, l. 15 gives the like Account of the Catheans. It is common, amongst the Chinese, for the Parents to kill their Children, especially the Female, without falling under Censure or Punishment. And, holding the Transmigration of Souls, as most other People of the East do, they think they do them a Kindness, by preparing their way to a happier Birth and a more advantageous Condition.

^f Thus the Roman Youths, whilst they wore the Prætexta, were not liable to Fines and Amercements, but receiv'd corporal Correction. Plin. N. H. l. 9. c. 23.

^g L. 2. c. 5. f. 2.

^h Ephes. vi. 1.

Col. iii. 20.

ⁱ Vid. Senec. Consol. ad Marciam c. 17.

^k In Oedip. Col. p. 289. Ed. H. Steph.

^j Garcilasso de la Vega, l. 4. c. 19.

but the Profits of them, as Helps towards maintaining the Child, till arriv'd at proper Years of Inheritance. And hence too we may discover the just and solid Grounds of those Distinctions, in the Roman Law, between the ² Peculium Profectitium, Adventitium, and Castrense of Children; the Stock or Wealth they get by labouring under their Parent, by the Bounty of others, and by the Military Pay.

IX. Another Enquiry that may be rais'd on this Subject is, Whether the paternal Power and Duty can be made over by the Father to a Substitute? On which Point we are to know, that altho' the Father's Authority and Obligation took their Occasion and Rise from a ¹ Personal Act, which is incapable of being transferr'd ², yet this doth not hinder him from recommending his Office to a Deputy, the Advantage or Necessity of the Child so requiring. But then he would do well to keep Plutarch's Advice always in mind: Those Parents, says that wise Author, do justly deserve Censure, who having committed their Sons to the Care of Masters and Instructors, never trouble themselves to make Trial of their Proficiency. This is a very scandalous Mistake in Education. They ought, at proper Distances of Time, to enquire into the Boy's Parts and Improvement, and not to pl. ce all their Hopes in the Faith of a mercenary Teacher. Besides, the Master himself will by this means be engaged to use more Diligence and Application, when he finds that so frequent a Judgment will be pass'd on his Pains.

Farther, it is not, in the least, repugnant to the Law of Nature, for a Father to resign his Child to be adopted by some other honest Person, when 'tis likely to prove to the Child's Advantage ^b. But that he should pawn, or ³ sell his Child, Nature seems not to allow in any Case; except when he cannot otherwise feed and support him. For then he ought rather to sell him into some easy Servitude, whence there is Hope of being releas'd, than to let him perish with Hunger. Ælian ^c hath recorded a memorable Constitution of the Thebans to this purpose: No Man, under Pain of Death, shall expose an Infant, or cast him out into an uninhabited Place. But if the Father be reduced to extreme Poverty, the Law directs him to carry the Child, immediately after the Birth, to the Magistrate, who upon receiving an easy Price shall deliver it, whether Male or Female, to another Person, taking Security of the Buyer that he shall honestly breed up the Infant, and for his Pains shall take its Service when grown to Man or Woman's Estate. The Defence of which Law is grounded on this Rule, that Nature is suppos'd to give us a Right to every thing, which appears absolutely necessary to our fulfilling her Commands. ² In the same manner the Emperour Constantine ^d permits a Father, in the Case of extreme Want ^e, to sell his Son or Daughter, so soon as they come into the World, lest they should otherwise starve; yet ordering, at the same time, that whoever would repay their Price to the first Buyer, should have the Power of redeeming them into Freedom ^f. And when, in an Edict of Theodorick, and a Law of the Wiso-Goths, we find a Prohibition against Selling Children for the sake of Food ^g: it is meant of Food for the Occasions of the Parents, not for the necessary Sustainance of the Children. Yet Romulus granted Parents a very unreasonable Privilege, when, as Dionysius Halicarnassens ^h informs us, He allow'd a Father to make Money, by selling his Son Three times; thus giving him more Authority over his Son, than over his Slave. For a Slave once sold, and then obtaining Liberty, is ever after at his own Command and Disposal. But a Son, tho' twice sold, and twice recovering his Freedom, return'd under his Father's Dominion, and was not exempted from it till he had pass'd the third Sale. Numa in some measure softened the Rigour of this Law, by excepting from Sale those Sons who had contracted Marriage, provided they had done it by their Father's Orders, or with his Consent. The De-

² We call a Peculium, the Goods, that a Slave, or Son hath gotten of his own; what a Son hath gotten by War, or his Father, Mother, and other Relations have given him, while he follow'd that Business, belong absolutely to him; so that he can dispose them, as his own Goods, as he sees fit, and his Father hath nothing to do with them. This is call'd Peculium Castrense. See Digest. Lib. 49. tit. 17. 'Tis the same with that which a Son has gotten in any other Employment, where he has a Salary from the Publick, and this is called Peculium quasi Castrense. See Code. Lib. 3. tit. 28. De inofficioso Testam. Leg. 37. This is Peculium Militare. Peculium Civile, or as the Code expresses it Paganum, consists in the Goods, which a Son gets, who is not in publick Business, either by his Industry, or by some Gift, or Will, or by his Attendance upon the Laws, or by managing a Thing, of which his Father has only the Profits. This the Interpreters call Peculium Adventitium. Or in the Advantage that a Son makes of the Goods of his Father, or by their means, and this was absolutely in the Disposal of the Father, and is call'd Peculium Profectitium. See the Instit. Lib. 2. tit. 9. Per quas personas cuique acquiritur, § 1. an Mr. DAUMART'S civil Laws in their natural Order, Part. 2. Lib. 2. tit. 2. § 2.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § IX.

¹ LIBANIUS'S Greek is, Ὅτι γὰρ πρὸ πατρὸς ἐστὶν ἡ ἐξουσία καὶ τὸ νόμιμον νόμιμον.

² These Quotations might have been put into a Note.

³ This Law of Constantine is the second, and last in the Title of the Code before quoted. The Words are, Si quis propter nimiam paupertatem, egeat utique, victus causa (i. e. for the Life of the Child, not of the Parent) filium, filiamve sanguinolento vendiderit, venditione in hoc tantummodo casu valente, emptor obtinendi ejus servitii habeat facultatem: Liceat autem ipsi qui vendidit, vel qui alienatus est, aut exilibet alii ad ingenuitatem eum propriam repetere, modò si aut pretium offerat, quod potest valere, aut mancipium prosequimodi præstet.

^a Liban. Declam. 20. p. 523. Edit. Morell. No Law can recall the Act of a Father, and cause him not to have begotten.
^b Add. Gell. lib. 5. cap. 19. Euripides, Ion. v. 1535, 1536.

If that Friend want a Fortune, 'tis but fair
 He give his Son to this who wants an Heir.

^c V. H. l. 2. c. 7. ^d V. C. l. 4. t. 2. ^e V. Grot. l. 2. c. 5. f. 5. ^f Cap. 94, 95. in Edict. Theodorici.
^g leg. Wisigoth. l. 5. t. 4. c. 12. ^h V. C. l. 4. t. 2. ⁱ L. 2. c. 27.

cemviri durst not quite take it away, but left it to wear off by gradual Difuse ^a, till it was at length exprefly revers'd in the Code. Yet the old Custom was still kept up of felling a Son three times, tho' only in way of Fiction and Formality, at the Ceremony of giving him his Freedom. Tho' this too was afterwards taken off by Justinian ^a. It appears from Plutarch ^b, that amongst the Athenians, at least before Solon's Time, a Father was allow'd to sell his Son for the Payment of his own Debts ^c. And we are lately rold of the Muscovites, that a Father makes this advantage four times, after which the Son is releas'd from his Authority ^c. The Chinese make a frequent Practice of felling those Children, whom they think they shall not be able to maintain; but with this good Condition, that any of them shall have the Privilege of buying themselves into Freedom, at the same Rate at which they were first fold.

X. ^a In order to our understanding what Power the Father hath over the Son, during the second Period, in our Division of Age, we must remind our selves of what was before slightly hinted, that Fathers are invested with another kind of Sovereignty, as they are the Heads of their respective Families. Now this Authority is different, according as the Persons live either within, or without the Limits of a Commonwealth. Separate Families, as they very much resemble States and Kingdoms, so they are govern'd by their Heads, in a Way bearing some Proportion to regal Power. For we are not willing to give them absolutely the Name of Civitates, as ² Mr. Hobbes hath done ^d; because Families and publick States are instituted on ^a We find a Law in the Code made by Dioclesian and Maximian, where it is said, That Fathers shall not have any Power to put their Children under the Authority of any other, either by selling them, or Gift, or Pawn, or any other manner, nor under a Pretence of Ignorance of him, who has either of those ways got him into his Power. Liberos à Parentibus, neque venditionis, neque donationis titulo, neque pignoris jure, neque alio quolibet modo, neque sub prætextu ignorantie accipientis in alium transferri posse, manifestissimi juris est, Lib. 4. tit. 43. De Patribus, qui filios suos distraxerunt. Leg. 1.

^b Comp. Matth. xviii. 25. ² Kings iv. 1. Philostratus, in vit. Apoll. Thyran. l. 8. c. 3. p. 401. Ed. Mrell. reports of the Phrygians, That 'twas an ordinary thing with them to sell their own Sons; and not to regard them, if they happen'd to be led Captives into Slavery. Add. Plutar. Lucull.

From these Places it appears, that among the Jews a Debtor, who found himself unable to pay, might become a Slave to his Creditor with his Children; or might sell himself and Children. See Mr. Le Clerc upon Lev. xxv. 39. and Deut. xv. 12. Lastly, there was printed in 1708. a Book intitled Dissertatio Juridica, De Jure patrio, Auctore Abrab. à Kerckraad, where we may find a Collection of all that this Author has put into his Lectures, about the paternal Power, principally in relation to the Customs and Notions of the Romans. It may serve as an Historical Dictionary upon this Subject.

^a L. 8. t. 48. l. ult. C. de Adoption. Perfic. l. 3. c. 6.

^b In vit. Solon.

^c Sigisfr. Baro in Herberstein. Add. Olear. Itin.

^d De Cive, c. 5. f. 12.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § X.

^a The Three following Paragraphs are otherwise plac'd in the Original, This is the Eleventh, the next the Twelfth, and the Third the Tenth. Our Author, without any Reason, as appears from his Abridgment, De Officio Hom. & Civ. speaks of the Third Age of Children before he treats of the Second.

² Since Mr. Hobbes, an English Knight of the same Nation, named ROBERT FILMER, hath published a Book, entitled, Patriarcha, to prove, that all Government ought to be Absolute and Monarchical, and for a Foundation of his Opinion asserts, That the paternal Power is the same as royal Authority, and is entirely Despotick. ALGERNOON SIDNEY in his Treatise of Government, and Mr. Lock, in the first Part of his Work upon the same Subject, have quite overthrow the Consequences, which FILMER has drawn from his false Principles. Mr. SIDNEY has not dwelt long upon it; but Mr. Lock having taken pains in his Second Part to overthrow the Principle itself, we have thought it convenient to give an Abridgment of the Reasons he there gives. First then, this able Writer observes, that all the Obligations that Infants have, being founded on Generation, to which the Mother concurs, and contributes as much at least, if not more, than the Father, it follows, that both of 'em have an equal Right and Power over those who spring from their Union. So that to speak exactly, we ought to call that Authority the Power of the Parents, and not of the Father, as we do ordinarily, since the Impropriety of the Expression might be an Occasion for Men to imagin, that all the Authority over the Children resides only in the Father. The Laws, which God hath given both to the Jews and Christians, do plainly contradict this Mistake. Honour thy Father and thy Mother, Exod. xx. 12. Children, obey your Fathers and your Mothers, Eph. vi. 1, 2. This is the uniform Language of the old and new Covenant. From whence it follows, that the Power which they have over their Children can't be a Foundation for monarchical Government. But, suppose we grant that, it will not thence follow, that Kings have an absolute and despotick Power, because the paternal Power is not so, as will appear from the Consideration of its Nature and Extent. All the Rights of the Father and Mother consist in governing their Children, till they are able to govern themselves by the Laws, which are the Rule of the Parents Conduct, and in a certain Honour, which they owe their Parents, till they are of Age to understand and practise the Law. Altho' all Men are naturally equal, and every one is born free, i. e. has a Right to dispose of his Person, Actions, and Goods, as he sees fit, according to the Laws under which he lives. None of Adam's Posterity found himself in this State, when he came into the World. The Defect in the Use of their Reason, and the Impossibility that Children are in to preserve themselves, and provide for their Wants, obliges them necessarily to submit to the Direction and Power of their Father and Mother, who by the Law of Nature are tied to maintain and bring them up, not as their own Work, because they contributed to their Production only as bare Instruments, but as the Work of the Creator, to whom they must give an Account. If a Child never attains to such a competent degree of Reason, as to be able to order himself aright, as it happens to such as are born Innocents and Lunaticks, he depends always upon the absolute Will of the Father and Mother; but this is rare, and out of the common Course of Nature. So that the Bonds of Subjection of Infants are like their Swaddling-Cloath, and their first Garments, which are only necessary upon the account of their tender Years. When they come to the use of Reason, their Age removes them from their Father's Jurisdiction, and makes them Masters of themselves; so that then they are equal to their Father and Mother, in respect to that State of Liberty, when a Pupil becomes equal to his Guardian, after the Time of his Minority, appointed by the Law. The Liberty of Children, become Men, and the Obedience of their Father and Mother before that, are not more inconsistent, than is, according to the most zealous Defenders of Monarchy, the Subjection that a Prince is under, during his Minority, in respect to the Queen-Regent, his Nurse, his Tutors, or Governours, with the Right he hath to the Crown, which he inherits from his Father, and the Authority of a Sovereign, with which he shall one Day be invested, when his Age will render him capable to manage it himself, and govern others. It is otherwise so true, that the paternal Power doth not appertain to the Father by any particular Privilege of Nature exclusive of the Mother; and that he is but in the quality of a Governour or Tutor of his Children; that if he abandons them, and renounces all paternal Kindness to them, he deprives himself of the Power he hath over them, which is so inseparably annex'd to the Care that he ought.

on different Ends and Designs, and consequently many Parts of civil Sovereignty are excluded from this private Dominion. And indeed Mr. Hobbes himself elsewhere confesseth ^a, that A Family is not properly a Commonwealth, unless it be of that Power, by its own Number or other Opportunities, as not to be subdued without the Hazard of War. Yet Family Rule, in this separate Condition, so nearly approacheth to the Legislative Authority, as to have the Power of Life and Death in Criminal Cases, as likewise the Management of Arms, and the Care of Leagues and Alliances. This Dominion of the Father over the Children, now grown up, is establish'd by tacit Compact; the Father extending his Commands beyond the Affair of Education, and the Children freely putting themselves into a State of farther Obedience. For the Laws of Equity and Gratitude direct, that a Son should yield his Strength and Service chiefly to him, to whom he owes all that he now is or enjoys; till such time as with his Father's Consent he be releas'd from the Subjection.

XI. But after the erecting of Commonwealths of these Rights which before belong'd to Fathers of Families, some were contracted, others quite taken away. Yet so much Authority was almost in all places allow'd, as appear'd sufficient for Educating the Children: Except that even this was much retrench'd under Plato's National Government; and in the Persian Conflitation, if we admit Xenophon for a true Historian ^b. In many Nations the Privileges of Family Rule were little impair'd. Thus at Rome the Fathers had the Power of Life and Death over their Children, which they exercis'd in a kind of Judiciary manner, calling a Council of their Relations and Friends, and causing Sentence to be executed according to their Determination ^c. Justinion ^d calls this Right Proprium Civium Romanorum, Particular to the Roman Citizens, and not pretended to by other Men; for which Position Bodinus ^e hath fallen heavily upon him; alledging that the Persians and ancient Gauls ^f made use of the same: And that the Abrogation of it in the Roman State was the Cause of ought to take of them to nourish and bring them up, that it passeth from him to the Person who brings up an expos'd Child; for the single Act of Generation is a small thing, if we go no farther. In certain Places of America, when a Man and Wife part, which happens there often, the Children go along with the Mother; and are not these Children indispensibly obliged to obey the Mother, as much as those who among us lose their Father in their Non-Age? And can we say, that a Mother can prescribe such Laws to her Children, as shall be perpetually obliging, and by which she may dispose of all that belongs to them, and constrain them under some corporal Punishment, to conform themselves implicitly to her Will? Certainly a Father and Mother can dispose of their Goods as they see fit, when they put their Children into a Condition of subsisting of themselves; but the Power they have, as the Authors of their Being, doth not extend so far, as to be Masters of their Lives, Liberties, and Goods, whether they have gotten them by their own Industry, or are bestow'd on them by others. God himself allows Children to withdraw themselves from the Parents Jurisdiction, when he says, Gen. ii. 24. Matth. xix. 5. Eph. v. 31. That a Man shall leave his Father and Mother, and be joined to his Wife. But tho' Children as soon as they come of Age to see what the Laws of Nature and Civil Society, of which they are Members, demand of them, are not obliged to violate those Laws to please their Parents, yet they are bound to honour their Father and Mother, as the Instruments which God made use of to give them Life, and acknowledge the Care they have taken in their Education. They ought to have for them a particular Esteem, Affection, and Respect, and shew them in all their Discourse and Behaviour; do or say nothing that may offend them, or trouble them in the least, defend them, assist them, and comfort them by all possible and lawful Means, and conform themselves to their Will, when it may be done without any great Inconvenience to them. There is no Person of any Age, Rank, or Dignity, that can exempt a Child from these Duties towards them, from whom he hath receiv'd his Life, and to whom he has such great Obligations; but he is not for all that bound to pay them an absolute Obedience and Submission. The most powerful Monarch ought to obey his Mother, tho' he is not to follow her Will in the Government of his State, or royal Family. We ought therefore to distinguish well between these two sorts of paternal Right, viz. of directing a Child till he comes to the use of his Reason, and that which requires only Respect and Acknowledgment. The first is really only a Duty to Fathers, rather than a Power; the Authority which it gives ends with the Wants of the Child, and when it is most in force, it may be alienated in some sort; as when a Father trusts the Care of his Son's Education to another; for by putting him into that Person's Hands, he discharges him of a great part of the Obedience due to himself and his Mother. But as to Respect and Acknowledgment, nothing can release a Child from it; and the Mother has as good a Right to require it as the Father; so that if the Father orders his Son, not to honour his Mother, the Son ought to disobey his Father. This Duty may be more or less enlarg'd, according as the Father or Mother has taken more or less Care, and shew'd more or less Kindness to the Child. But it can never be entirely abolish'd; and in civil Societies themselves, Fathers and Mothers preserve their Right to require it, as well as to order them in their Education, inasmuch that every Subject has not only as much paternal Power over his Children, as a Prince has over his; but also the Sovereign himself ought to have as much Respect to his Father and Mother, as the meanest of his Subjects has to his. Hence it appears that Sovereignty and paternal Power are two different things, which have neither the same Foundations, End, nor Extent. 'Tis true, that as several Persons cannot live together without some Order, and some sort of Government, so we may easily conceive, that in the first Ages of the World, when any Family was about to withdraw itself, and settle in a Place uninhabited, the Father became, as it were, the Prince over his Children, tho' at the Age of Discretion; and it seems as tho' that Authority were conferr'd by the express or tacit Consent of the Children, who could find nothing more advantageous to them, than to put themselves under the Government of their Father only, and give him the Right, which every one naturally has, to execute the Laws of Nature. They were accustomed from their Infancy to be guided by their Father, and leave their little Quarrels to him; and 'twas natural for them to continue their Subjection to his Direction and Authority, when they were become Men. Who could they better choose for their Governour than He, who after he had given them Life, had carefully nourished and brought them up, and shew'd them so much Kindness? If then Fathers became Kings of their Families by this means, 'twas not by virtue of their paternal Power. And tho' royal Authority actually began by the Fathers of Families, it does not follow, that the Right of Sovereignty is founded on the paternal Power, and consequently belongs to the Prince, and the Prince only, since it is evident from the highest Antiquity, that Fathers were the only Persons in Families that offer'd Sacrifices. This is an Extract of Mr. Locke's Part 2. of his Treatise of Government; and we ought to remember this, when our Author treats of the Original of sovereign Power.

^a Leviath. c. 20. ^b De Educat. Cyri, l. 1. ^c Vid. Val. Max. l. 5. c. 8. f. 2. 3. 5. Senec. de Clement. l. 1. c. 15. 'Tis a Saying of Turmus in Livy, l. 1. c. 50. That there can be no shorter way of deciding a Point, than between the Father and the Son; because, if the latter oppose or disobey the former, he is to expect the Plagues of Divine Vengeance. ^d Instit. L. 1. t. 9. f. 2. De Patria Potestate. ^e De Repub. l. 1. c. 4. ^f So Cæsar Comm. de B. G. l. 6. c. 19. And some Footsteps of that antient Custom remain'd till the Year of Christ 1301. amongst the People of Bordeaux, by whose Laws, Fathers and Husbands had supreme Power of Life and Death over their Children and over their Wives: And if a Husband happened to kill his Wife in any Violence of Anger or Grief, upon declaring his Repentance by a solemn Oath, he was discharg'd without Punishment.

the same People the Son ever makes use of a lower Seat than his Father, and placeth himself at his side, not over against him. And indeed, that Children can never requite the Kindness of their Parents is a Truth in every Body's Mouth ^a. Though Seneca ^a hath for Opposition's sake, endeavour'd, in a long Dispute, to prove that a Son may sometimes even outdo a Father in Benefits: And Alexander, provoked once with some Complaints against his Mother, could not forbear saying, that She made him pay very dear for his nine Months Lodgings ^b. But how vast soever the Merits of our Parents be acknowledg'd, this is certain, that it will not bear them out in imposing an unlawful Command; and therefore it was a brave Reply of the same Prince to the same Mother, urging him to put an innocent Person to Death, and reminding him of the Pains she had undergone for his Sake: My good Mother, says he, demand some other Reward for your Trouble; the Life of a Man is too precious to admit of any Equivalent ^c. Mr. Hobbes ^d is of Opinion, that this filial Reverence ariseth not only from the Law of Gratitude, but likewise from the Force of a tacit Compact; it not being presumed that he who releaseth another from his Rule and Dominion, intends so far to make him his Equal, as not to reckon it to him as a Favour: But a Person, thus dismiss'd from Subjection, is ever supposed to promise, that he will constantly pay his Benefactor all those external Marks, at least of Honour and Esteem, which Superiors are wont to receive from their Inferiors.

Yet it was, no doubt, a Strain of Superstition in the Jews, when they would not allow a Son to let his Father Blood, to open a Sore for him, or to draw a Thorn out of his Flesh ^e.

Amongst those who live in a Commonwealth, it may happen, that upon account of some Office or Dignity born by the Son, the Father shall be oblig'd to do him Reverence, yet not so as to quit his Prerogative of private Respect ^f. Thus Fabius Maximus commended the Action of his Son the Consul, who, as Fabius came riding towards him at a publick Meeting, ordered him to alight and make his Approaches to him on Foot ^g.

Whether this perpetual Duty and Obligation of Children, remaining after their Father's Power is expired, arise from the Act of Generation, or from the faithful Care and Labour of Breeding them up, is a Controversy that hath divided learned Men. Those who contend for the former, are wont to tell us, that the Kindness of giving Life is not only, in its self, the greatest good that can be bestow'd, but is likewise the Occasion of all others; and that, by this Action of conferring a Being, the Parents do, in some measure, resemble the Almighty Creator. Some, again, give their Judgment in favour of Education; as that which properly makes a Man deserve his Name, and which is not perform'd without a long and difficult Course of Application and Expence. They illustrate their Opinion by this Observation in Nature, that amongst Brute Creatures the Male is not discover'd to have the least Regard for the Young which he begets, and the Dam's Tenderness ceaseth with her Care, when they are able to provide for themselves; whereas the Affection between human Parents and Children is perpetual: which must needs be a Token that the great Dearness on the one side, and the Obligation to Duty on the other, do not chiefly result from that Act of the Parents which they exercise in common with Beasts, but from their peculiar Diligence in forming and managing their Off-spring, in order to a Life of Decency and Society. Aristotle is cited in Defence of the former Notion, A Father, says he g, is the Cause of the Son's Existence (which seems the greatest of Benefits) and of his Nature and Institution. And again ^h, Men stand engaged in the highest Degrees of Friendship and Piety towards the Gods, and towards their Parents. For, from these they receiv'd the noblest of all imaginable Goods, their Being and Education. On the latter of which Passages we may remark, that although the conferring of Life be first named, yet it is not expressly compared with the other Benefit. Philo Judæus ⁱ is produced on the same side; it is a Saying of his, We can never return our Parents equal Favours; since we can't repay, in the same manner, their Kindness of first bringing us into the World. And thus too, the Father in the Declamation ^k; We first produced you out of our own Life and Substance, and opened to your Prospect this vast Scene of divine and human things. We made you capable of seeing and of enjoying the Sea, the Earth, the unwearied Course of the Stars, the Heavens with all their sacred and shining Glories.

Yet we cannot but deliver it as our Persuasion, that the Benefit of Educating is a much stronger Ground and Spring of filial Obligation, than the other of Begetting. Plato ^l seems to countenance this Opinion, Parents, says he, ought either not to have brought their Children into the World, or not to refuse any Pains in training and instructing them. In another place ^m he introduceth Demodocus thus speaking of his Son; The Act (of planting shall I call it? or) of begetting my Son, was the easiest imaginable; but the breeding him up was a Task of Difficulty and ^a Aristot. Ethic. ad Nicom. 8. 16. Οὐδὲν ἰσοπλάγιον τῷ πατρὶ κατὰ τὴν φύσιν ἔστιν ἄλλο τι πλεονέκτημα ἢ τὸ εὖ αἰετὶ βίοναι. No Person can fully requite the Benefits of his Parents; but he who serves and respects them to his utmost Ability, may be pronounced Honest and Just. Vid. Xenoph. Apomn. l. 2. p. 431, 432. Ed. Steph. Stobæ Sermon. 77.

^b Nam, quod ad jus publicam attinet, non sequitur [Pater] jus potestatis. V. D. L. 36. t. 1. Ad Senatus Consultum Trebell. l. 6. princip.

^a De Beneficiis, l. 3. c. 29, 30, &c.

^b Arrian. de reb. gest. Alex. 7.

^c Amen. Marcellin. l. 14. c. 10. Add.

Gell. l. 2. c. 7.

^d De Cicero, c. 9. f. 8.

^e Constant. L'Empereur in Babakama, c. 8. f. 3. Add. Selden. de

J. N. & G. l. 7. c. 2.

^f Plutarch. Fab. & in Apophthegm. Valer. Max. l. 2. c. 2. f. 4. Add. Bæcler in Grot. l. 2.

c. 5. f. 6.

^g Ethic. VIII. 13.

^h Ibid. c. 14.

ⁱ Allegor. l. 1. p. 58. in fin. & l. 2. p. 62. D. Ed. Paris.

^k Quintil. V.

^l In Criso p. 34. B.

^m Theag. init.

Trouble ever filling me with Fears on his account. And Socrates, in the same Dialogue, declares it as his Judgment, I know not any Business in which a prudent Man ought to shew more Caution and Diligence, than in forming his Son's Mind to Goodness and Virtue ^a. So the Father pleads in Quintilian ^b, I do not now, says he to his Son, set to your Score these vulgar Favours of lending you Life, and Light, and Liberty; but whatever Bravery you have shew'd, whatever gallant Action you have perform'd, this I charge upon you as my Merit; 'tis my Strength with which you have conquer'd. That Soul of yours, so unshaken, so undaunted under the greatest Dangers, had its Rise and Original from mine. It hath been my long employment to render you a Man of Abilities and Courage; in your early Years by my Precepts, and since, by my Example ^c. It is not indeed easy to imagine or allow, that a Parent hath conferr'd any considerable Benefit on his Child, should he cast him away when he first comes into the World ^d; or afterwards entirely neglecting his Culture and Education, should let him grow up like a Beast, to lead a Life useless to others, and shameful to himself ^d. Juvenal's ^e Reasoning is very just and true,

*Gratum est quod patriæ civem, populoque dedisti,
Si facis, ut patriæ sit idoneus, utilis agris,
Utilis & bellorum & pacis rebus agentis.
Plurimum enim intererit, quibus artibus, & quibus Moribus instituas.-----* (hanc tu

The State and People will your Zeal commend,
In giving that a Man, and these a Friend;
If fit to aid the publick Good; if skill'd
In rural Labours, or the martial Field,
Or grave Debates of Peace. Th' important Stake
Now waits your Care, what early steps you take;
What Scheme of Arts or Manners is design'd,
To fix his Pains, or cultivate his Mind.

⁶ Aristotle himself (who was cited to countenance the other side of the Question) hath left this Saying on Record ^e, that Parents, who take Care to see their Children duly inform'd and instructed, deserve much higher Honours, than those who barely lend them a Being: the latter make them capable of living, the former of living benevolently and happily.

Nor doth that Consequence, on which the other Opinion is built, seem to hold; Life is the greatest Good; therefore the Act of the Parent in giving that, is the most fit and proper to raise an Obligation in the Child. For before I can charge any Action of mine on another, as a considerable piece of Merit, it is necessary that I know to what Person I do the Kindness, and whether it will certainly reach him. Again, it will be convenient for me to reflect and consider, whether I really intended the thing as a Favour; how much it stood me in; whether I undertook it more for the sake of doing Good to the other Party, than for my own Pleasure, or Use; whether I was engaged in the Performance upon Reason and Deliberation, or was drawn to it by the Force of Passion, or Allurements of Sense. Lastly, whether the Action be capable of benefiting the other Person, without the Addition of some farther Services. Whoever diligently weighs these several Points of Enquiry, will be easily inclin'd to acknowledge, that the Kindness of Educating is much more proper to found an Obligation, than the vulgar Office of Begetting.

Yet we do by no means approve of all that Seneca hath urged on this Head, in his Discourse of Benefits ^f. For he is not to be born with, when he calls the Life of a Man, whom GOD hath endued with an immortal Soul, a Thing common to us with the wild Beasts, with the smallest, and with some of the foulest of Creatures; and, the Happiness of Flies and of Worms. But some Parts of his Argument may be admitted without Cen-

⁴ Senec. de Benef. l. 3. c. 31. Vis scire, quam non sit magnum beneficium, vitam sic dare? Exposuisses; nescire injuria erat genuisse. Quo quidem colligo, minimum esse beneficium. Patris Matrisque concubition, nisi accessisset alia, quæ profecerentis hoc initium muneris, & aliis officiis ratum facerent. Non est bonum vivere, sed bene vivere.-----Tu me mihi rudem & imperitum dedisti: ego tibi filium, qualem genuisse gauderes.

⁵ Sat. 14. v. 70. &c. He also speaks well to this purpose. Sat. 7. v. 184, &c.

*Quantumque domus, veniet, qui ferula domum
Componat; veniet, qui pulmentaria condit.
Hos inter suntus sestetia Quintiliano
Ut multam, duo sufficient: res nulla minoris Constabit Patri, quam Filius.-----*

⁶ Solon hath left us this wise Law, Plutarch in vita Solon. Ὁ γὰρ ὁ γὰρ ἄριστος παρρησιῶν το καλόν, ἢ τίμιον ἕνα δόλιος ὄντι, ἀπὸ ἡδονῆς, ἐξ ἡδονῆς γυνώσκου, τὸν τε μηδὲν ἀπέρχεται, οὐ παρρησιῶν ἀπὸ πρῶτος ἐπὶ γυνώσκου, ἢ ἀποκρίσσει, ὡς ἀπὸ το γυνώσκου πεποιμένον ὄντι.

That he that contemns the Honesty and Sanctity of Marriage, and desires Women only to satisfy his Desire, and not to have Children, has this Reward, that he has no Right over the Children that proceed from such a Conjunction, whose Life he has made an Eternal Disgrace.

^a Euripid Hecub. Good Institution is the Spring of Virtue. Phædr. Fab. l. 3. fab. 15.

^b Declam. 258.

^c Add. Declam. 278. &c.

^d Si res nulla minoris constet patri, quam filius; If his Son stands him in the least Charge of any thing he possesseth. By the Law of Solon, in Plutarch, Children basely born were not oblig'd to maintain their Parents. The Reason of which Exception was grounded on this Consideration, that he who forsakes the honest way of Marriage, plainly shews that he seeks a new Partner, not on the account of Issue, but of Pleasure; and therefore his Vice is his Reward; and he can by no means complain of any Ingratitude in such Children, because he hath injured and disgraced them by making their very Nativity a Reproach. Add. Vitruv. l. 6. Præfat.

^e In Deg. Lucret.

It is worth observing in Martinus Hist. Sin. l. 4. c. 2. what mighty Respect and Veneration the Chinese pay to their Masters; who, as Juvenal says, ought to be Parentis loco, to be honour'd and obey'd as second Parents. The same Historian, l. 6. c. 1. reports, That the Son, in China, never riseth to a higher Degree of Honour than what had been formerly born by the Father; and if, for his signal Services to the State, he be advanced farther, the Dignity, with which he is to be invest'd, is first to be preferr'd, by a kind of posthumous Promotion, on his deceas'd Father: That People esteeming Duty with Reverence to Parents, the first and chiefest of Virtues.

^f L. 3. c. 30, &c.

sure. ⁷ Look, says he, upon my Nativity, as it appears barely in it self, and you will find it to be a short and uncertain Favour, a Subject lying equally open to Good and Evil. No doubt it was my first Step to all the Benefits I enjoy, but it was not therefore the greatest, because the first; nor, because the greatest, without it could never have been. And again, barely to live is the least Degree toward living well. I would thus talk with my Father: Suppose, as you first gave me my Life, so I had served yours: in this I should certainly exceed your Kindness, for I conferr'd my Favour when you was sensible from whom you received it, and I to whom I did it; and then, I did not consult my own Pleasure, at least not my Pleasure alone, in the Performance. Would you conceive how small a Boon you bestow'd on me in my Birth? Fausy your self to have immediately cast me out to perish naked and helpless; in this Case your Act of Begetting me had been a manifest Injury. From all which I infer, that the Acquaintance of my Father and Mother had proved but a slender Kindness to me, had it not been follow'd with other good Offices which ratified and confirm'd it ^a.

XIII. Lastly, As the Father ought not, without weighty Reasons, to expel the Children his House; so they on the other hand shall not, according to the regular Course, pass into another Family without his good Leave. Yet in case they have just Grounds for their Departure, and yet cannot prevail on their Father's Perverseness to give Consent, I should be of Opinion, that their Duty doth not hinder them from removing, so as to concert their own Affairs, contrary to his Humour; especially when they freely resign all future Dependence on him, for their Fortune and Inheritance. For as civil Constitutions do wisely countenance and strengthen the Authority of Parents, so they are not wont to encourage impertinent Obstinacy and Moroseness. Nor doth it seem to be in the Power of those who are Heads of separate Families, to retain their Children, when they have reasonable Occasion to remove; inasmuch as, in regular Commonwealths, it is not usual to deny a Free-Subject the Liberty of transplanting himself, when tied to Residence by no particular Obligation.

XIV. To the same Head belongs that common Question, Whether Children may dispose of themselves in Marriage against the Consent of their Parents ^b? For the Solution of which we ought carefully and distinctly to consider what is incumbent on Children by Virtue of their natural Duty; and what on account of the Obedience which attends their State of Subjection: and again, what Rights belong to Fathers strictly, as such; what as they are the Heads of Families. Paternal Power, as such, we have already observ'd to be just so great as is sufficient to the Government of the Children, till able to be their own Managers. This therefore does not seem to extend it self so far as to the reversing of a Matrimonial Contract: An Affair supposed to be carried on by Persons of mature Age and Reason. Indeed the Duty of filial Piety and Reverence requires, not only that the Children apply themselves to their Parents for Advice in these Proceedings, but likewise that they may make a Conscience of opposing so awful Directions ^c. Yet if they happen to break their Duty in this Point, it doth not follow that the Act must be null and void. For an Obligation to hear and to respect Another's Advice, doth not presently divest a Man of the Power to govern his own Concerns. The Liberty of a Son, as Quintilian observes, if it be at all allowable, is so in the matrimonial Affair: For who can love by the Eyes, or by the Rules of another?

But what shall we say of that other Power, which the Fathers hold as they are the Heads of Families? Its true, in many Commonwealths, the Laws have variously restrain'd the Liberty of Marriage. Thus, in some Places, no Person of the Royal Family can contract, without the King's Approbation; such Matches often proving of very considerable Consequence to the Publick. In Japan the Prince chooseth Wives for his Nobles ^d. In several Countties Marriage Con-

⁷ Senec. de Benefic. Lib. 3. c. 30, 31, 34. Sed vide, ne illud verius sit estimari, an id quod potui, & id quod feci, meum sit, mearum virium, mea voluntatis. Illud quod natus sum, per se intueri quale sit: animadvertes exiguum & incertum, & boni malique communem materiam: sine dubio primum ad omnia gradum, sed non idem majorem omnibus; quia primum.-----Putam vitam pro vita reddidisse. Sic quoque munus tuum vici, cum ego dederim sentienti, cum sentiens me dare: cum vitam tibi non voluptatis meae causa, aut certe per voluptatem dederim.-----Ego vitam dedi statim illi usuro: tu nescituro an viveret.-----Paternum munus & simplex est & facile.-----In quo consortem habet, in quo spectavit Legem patriam, premia Patrum, domus ac familiae perpetuitatem, omnia potius, quam cura cui dabit.

Mr. BARB. NOTE on § XIV.

¹ Quintil. Declam. 270, 376. Nasquam tamen libertas tam necessaria, quam in matrimonio.-----Quis enim amare alieno animo potest?

^a A little after he styles Generation a Vulgar Benefit: the Office of a Father, Easy, slight, and of little Value; regarding any thing else, rather than the future Person to be produced.

^b V. Grot 1. 2. c. 5. l. 10.

^c Non æquum est pugnare, pater cui tradidit ipse, Ipse pater cum matre, quibus parere necesse est: Virginitas non tota tua est: ex parte parentum est. Tertia pars patri data, pars data tertia matri: Tertia sola tua est: noli pugnare duobus, Qui genero sua jura simul cum dote dederunt. Catullus, 60.

^d 'Twould be Rebellion to resist those Arms
On which your Parents have bestow'd your Charms.
Your Virgin Jewel is not all your own,
A third each Parent claims, a third alone
Remains to you; forbear with Two to Fight,
Who, in their Portion, give the Son the Right

Thus Hermione most dutifully speaks in Euripides, Andromach. v. 987, 988.

----- My Marriage is my Father's Care,
His Judgment guides my Choice.-----

And Xenophon Cyrop. L. 8. tells us that Cyrus would by no means engage in Nuptial Affairs without the Consent of his Parents.

^d Varen. Descript Japon. c. 12. Add. Conflit. Sicul. l. 3. t. 21.

tracted between a Subject and a Foreigner, between a Noble Person and a Commoner, are declared void. But as in all States and Governments, a Liberty of marrying and of removing is ever suppos'd, except where there is either an express Law to the contrary, or a Custom equivalent to a Law; so in separate Families, where most of the Reasons fail, on which the civil Constitutions, about this Affair, are built; the Father of the Family doth not seem to have a Right of prohibiting or of reversing his Childrens Marriage, when not defective in any thing but his Consent: provided still, that they are willing immediately to leave his House; for it would be unreasonable to bring a Person to live under his Eye whom he professeth to dislike ^a. Yet if a Father see his Authority slighted by his Children, without very sufficient Grounds for their Non-compliance ^b, he may, as a Punishment of that Neglect, exclude them from all present Benefits and all future Expectations ^c.

What Rights those Fathers of Families, who live not in a separate Condition, but under some Commonwealth, do in this respect enjoy, must be discover'd by the Customs and Constitutions of different Nations. Amongst the Ja- ponese, Marriages are intirely directed by the Parents, or, if they are dead, by the next Relations ^d. And in Peru, under the antient Government of the Yucas, all Matrimony engaged in, without the Parents Approbation, was declared null, and the Children illegitimate ^e. This in general is certain, that as the Laws of a particular Country may pronounce a Contract invalid, either because defective in Form, or because transacted between Persons to whom such particular Agreements are prohibited; they may, in like manner, suspend the Validity of Marriage without the Consent of the Parents; so that if destitute of this necessary Condition, it shall pass in civil Estimation for null and insignificant ^f. For the Agreement of the Parties to cohabit like Man and Wife, can no more render Matrimony good, when contrary to Law, than the Bargain of a Minor and the Delivery consequent upon it, both undertaken without his Guardian's Influence, can effectually and irrevocably pass away his Estate. Though Parents are to be admonish'd, that when the Government allows them so high a Prerogative, they should be very cautious, and very merciful in putting it in Execution ^g.

^a Genes. xxvi. 34, 35.

^b Vid. L. 23. t. 1. l. 12. f. 1. D. De Sponsal.

^c Vid. Leg. Wisogoth. l. 3. t. 2.

^e 8. Leg. Burgundion. t. 13. c. 5.

^d Varen. Descrip. Japon. c. 12.

^e Garcilasso De la Vega, l. 6. c. 36.

^f Vid. L. 23. t. 2. l. 2. D. De Ritu Nuptiarum, § L. 48. t. 5. l. 7. D. ad L. Jul. De Adulter.

^g Ad. Bacler. §

Ziegler. ad Grot. l. 2. c. 5. f. 10.

C H A P. III.

Of a Master's Power.

- I. What is the Relation of Master and Servant.
 II. Servitude was not ordained by Nature.
 III. Nor by God immediately.
 IV. The Original of Servitude seems to have been from Contract.
 V. War made the number of Servants greater.
 VI. What is the Duty of Captives to their Masters.
 VII. They are almost of the same Nature with other Goods.
 VIII. Yet an Injury may be done them.
 IX. Of the Children of Servants.
 X. The Inconveniences of Servitude.
 XI. How many ways a Servant may become free.

AS the Husband and Wife (whence proceeds the common Off-spring) make the principal Parts of a Family; so Servants come in for inferior, secondary Members, to bear the Burthen of common Labour and Business. Now these being usually treated in a way of severer Discipline, give Occasion to the forming of a new Species of Government on their account; different from that which is exercis'd over Children, who demand a milder and more indulgent Sway. Yet we are persuaded, that neither this Society, between Master and Servant, can claim the Name of a Commonwealth or civil State, as Mr. Hobbes^a is inclined to call it; not only because it generally consists of fewer Persons than are necessary for mutual Preservation, in a Condition of natural Liberty; but likewise because a Master furnisheth himself with Servants, not so much for the sake of reciprocal Defence, as that by means of their Labour, he may, in a more ample and more convenient manner, discharge his Domestick Affairs.

II. As to the Original of this kind of Society, we must, in the first Place, discard that old Opinion which makes Nature her self to have actually establish'd the Relation of Master and Servant amongst Men. It is true, we discover a strange Variety of Parts and Capacities. To give one Instance for all; we observe some Persons of so quick and piercing Sagacity, as to be able always to apprehend their own Interest and Benefit, and, at the same time, of such Vigilancy, as to prosecute their Affairs by their own free Motion, without the Admonition or Compulsion of others. Some again are of so heavy Dispositions, as not to see their own Advantage, any farther than they are guided; being much fitter for the Labours of the Body, than the Employments of the Brain; and farther, so given over to Supineness and Sloth, as unless they are forced and drag'd to Application; they can manage no Concern with tolerable Care; nor so much as save or spend by the Direction of their own Judgment. The latter Kind are those whom Aristotle calls Slaves by Nature; not that Nature by her own immediate Act sets them in such a Condition of Bondage, without any human Deed or Covenant intervening: but because by forming them with so much Disadvantage in their Frame, she hath rendred it more convenient for them to live under absolute Subjection and Controul, than to undertake the Government of their own Proceedings^b. It was a Saying of Agefilaus, that the Asiaticks were the worst of Free-men, and the best of Slaves: which Passienus turn'd upon the Emperor Domitian, when he observ'd, that there was never a better Servant, and never a worse Master^c.

III. Hornius, in his first Book De Civitate^d, jars upon the old String, in contradicting the general Opinion of the^e Lawyers, who derive the Origin of Servitude from the Law of Nations. He says, The Manner only of this Institution is to be refer'd to the Practice of Mankind; a Custom having prevail'd amongst most People, to impose such a Condition upon their Captives in War. But we should always distinguish the Cause of the Society, from the Cause of the Sovereignty; the latter not being deducible from Custom, nor from the Law of Nations, but being establish'd by GOD himself. For since all Victory is from GOD, and by his Providence the Conqueror gets into his Hands the Person of the Enemy, it follows, that the Life of the Captive might immediately be taken away: But since Humanity would scarce have suffer'd, that the Victor should always exercise this Rigour on an unarm'd and suppliant Person, it was thought convenient to forbear Execution, and to retain his Power over the Prisoner, who might thus be of good Use in the Affairs of Life. But

Mr. BARBEYRAC's NOTES on Chap. III. §. II.

^a This Opinion is contuted at Large, Lib. 3. Chap. 2. § 8. What our Author adds here, is an Abridgment of what he has there said, to which it is better to refer the Reader.

^b Their Words are, Servitus autem est constitutio Juris Gentium, quâ quis domino alieno contra naturam subicitur. Servi autem ex eo appellati sunt, quod Imperatores captivos vendere, ac per hoc servare, nec occidere solent: qui etiam mancipia dicti sunt, eo quod ab hostibus manu capiuntur. Servi autem aut nascuntur, aut fiunt: nascuntur ex ancillis nostris: fiunt autem Jure Gentium, id est, ex captivitate; aut Jure Civili, cum liber homo major viginti annis ad patrimonium partem paulam seu censuali passus est. Instit. Lib. 1. Tit. 3. De Jure personarum, § 2, 3, 4. We see that our Author makes two things, the Causes of Servitude, viz. Poverty and Force.

^c De Civitate, l. 3. f. 12.

^d V. supra L. 3. c. 2. f. 8.

^e Tacit. Ann. 6. c. 20.

^f I. l. c. 2.

indeed, as the Occasion of Mens engaging in War was ever partly their own Defence, and partly the Vindication of their Rights; so upon their obtaining the Victory, when they thought good to spare the Lives of the conquer'd, it was at their Pleasure, either to put them in a State of Slavery, or only to keep them in Hold till such time as by Ransom or Compact they should be deliver'd. All which Privileges and Proceedings, together with the Authority over Persons thus brought into Subjection, were not immediately appointed by GOD himself, but were approv'd by him upon human Institution. Nor is that Assertion true, "The Victor still retains that Power of Life and Death over the Captive, which he once procur'd; and consequently, his Right is the same, before he receives him into Fealty and Service, and after he governs him as a Part of his Family. For these are quite different things. The conquering Party may, by the Right of War, dispose how he pleaseth of his Prisoner, either kill him or save him: but this was never before term'd the Power of Life and Death, which denotes a lawful Authority of inflicting capital Punishment, in case of an antecedent Crime. Lastly, what the same Author lays down, "That all Sovereignty, of what kind soever, imports a Power over the Life of the Subject, and therefore we must not seek for Distinctions in the Power it self, but in the Exercise of the Power; and by consequence, the Authority of the Husband over the Wife, of the Father over the Children, of the Prince over the People, is one and the same with that of the Master over the Servant; except that the ways of Treatment are more kind and gentle in the former Instances, than in the last; is an Argument, that "we can by no means prevail with our selves to allow.

IV. In our Judgment, the Origin of Servitude ought thus to be traced out: In the early Ages of the World, when Men began to quit their primitive Plainness and Simplicity, to cultivate the Method of Living, and to enlarge their Fortunes and Possessions, it is very likely the wiser and richer Sort invited those of less Parts, and less Wealth, to assist them in their Business, for Hire. Afterwards, when both Parties found their Benefit in this way of proceeding, the meaner Tribe were by degrees persuaded to join themselves perpetual Members to the Families of the greater; under these Conditions, that the latter should engage to supply Food and all Conveniences of Living, and the former should bind themselves to undertake all proper Labours and Employments, as their Patrons should direct. So that the first rise of Servitude is owing to the voluntary Consent of the poorer and more helpless Persons, and is founded upon that common Form of Contract, Do, ut facias; I promise to give you constant Sustenance, upon Condition you assist me with your constant Work. What Power Nature allows a Master over Servants of this kind, may be easily discover'd from the Ends of forming such a Society. He may enjoin them what Task he pleaseth, in Proportion to their Strength and Skill. He may likewise correct their Sluggishness, by such Methods of Severity as are most likely to prevail on their particular Dispositions; tho' he cannot, on this score, proceed to capital Punishments: so that the highest Degree of Penalty he can inflict on their Idleness is to expel the lazy Drones from his Family, and leave them to their own beggarly Condition. Nay

Mr. BARE. NOTES on § IV.

¹ GROTIUS, Lib. 2. Chap. 5. § 30. distinguishes Servitude into 1. Perfect, and 2. Imperfect. The first he there treats on, the other is only for a certain Time, or on Condition, or for certain Things, according to certain Rules, or by the Laws of the Country, or by the Agreement of the Persons concerned: See the Examples alledged by him. I shall content my self in reciting only what our Author speaks in his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, Lib. 2. Chap. 4. § 2. about hir'd or domestick Servants. The Master, says he, owes his Servant the Wages agreed on, and the Servant is oblig'd to do the Work faithfully for which he is hired by his Master. Farther, as in this Contract, the Condition of the Master is more advantageous than that of the Servant, the Servant ought to respect his Master according to his Station in the World, and when thro' Malice or Negligence, he discharges his Business ill, his Master may correct him with Moderation, but not inflict any corporal Punishment on him, unless it be inconsiderable, much less put him to Death by his own Authority. Mr. TITIUS, Onerat. DXXIX. affirms nevertheless, that this Chastisement, as moderate as our Author supposes it, is not a direct Consequence of the Rights of a Master over his Servant; for besides, says he, that such a Permission seems what ought not to be allowed to Masters in any well-govern'd State, the End of the Relation does not naturally require, that a Master should have so great a Power over his Servant; 'tis sufficient that the Servant be oblig'd, some way or other, to make good the Damage he has caused thro' his own Fault. But if he has deserv'd Blows for doing some Wrong, or Injury to his Master, his Master shall not inflict them by way of Punishment, for that belongs only to the Magistrate, but by a Right of War, which allows us to revenge the Injury done us with Moderation. But yet our Author, in all this Matter, without doubt supposeth, that no Servant or Slave is bound to obey his Master, if he command any thing contrary to the Law of Nature, or the Nation he lives in. See GROTIUS, Lib. 2. Chap. 26. § 3.

² We ought to observe, that one of the principal Reasons for the Institution of the Sabbath, was to procure Ease to Servants and Slaves: See GROTIUS, Lib. 3. Chap. 14. § 1. and Mr. LE CLERC's Notes on Exod. xx. 10. and Deut. v. 14.

³ See GROTIUS, Lib. 3. Chap. 14. § 4. where to speak by the bye, there is a false Quotation about Slaves, Thou shalt not oppress thy Servant, nor rule over him with Rigour, Lev. xxv. 17. 43, 53. and not out of Deut. xv. 17, 45, 53. and likewise the first words, which are at ver. 17. are not spoken of Slaves, for there it is said, Thou shalt not oppress one another, and 'tis spoken upon the account of selling of Lands, which the Lawgiver forbids, upon any Pretence whatsoever, longer than the Year of Jubile. The same Fault is found § 2. Num. 2. where Deut. 18. is quoted for Lev. 25. But to return to our Subject. We ought to observe these two Laws chiefly, viz. Exod. xxi. 20, 21, and 26, 27. The first imports, That if a Master beats his Servant that he die, he shall be punished as a Murderer, but if he lives only a day or two, the Master shall be exempted from that Punishment: And the Reason is because if the Slave dies not presently, 'tis to be supposed, that the Master had no Design to slay him, and so 'twas thought a sufficient Punishment to lose what his Slave had cost him, and his Service, which he might have had of him, which is meant, as Mr. LE CLERC expounds them, by these words, For the Slave was his Money. The other Law requires, That if a Master has smitten the Eye of his Servant, that it perishes, or his Tooth, he shall let him go free as a Satisfaction for that Loss; which without doubt hath place, when the Damage is more considerable, with greater Reason: See the same Commentator.

doth it appear, that he can transmit them to another Master, without their Consent; they being really in the Capacity of ^a perpetual Mercenaries, or Hirelings, working for the Advantage of him that employs them, whilst continuing in that State, but not at his disposal, when obliged to leave it. Lastly, if Persons, in this limited Order of Servitude, commit any grievous Offence against the Members of another Family, their Master cannot, even on this account, proceed to take away their Life. Yet lest he should engage himself in Quarrels, by defending their Injuries and Crimes, he is allow'd, or rather he is oblig'd to expel them his House; which is a kind of delivering them up to Punishment. But if they prove guilty of any heinous Practice against the Master himself, and his Family, he may then justly kill them; yet not by Virtue of his Sovereignty, but as Enemies, by the Right of War ^a.

And according to these Measures, the Condition of Servants, and the Power of Masters are, for the most part, ^b described in the Old Testament.

V. The Convenience of discharging inferior Offices and Labours, by the Hands of others ^b, being thus found out; in succeeding times, when Wars grew frequent in the World, it pass'd by degrees into a Custom, to indulge Captives with Life and corporal Liberty, upon Condition that they should yield perpetual Service to the Conqueror ^c. Thus Diodorus Siculus ^c reports of the ancient Egyptian King Sesoftris, that he perform'd all his publick Works by the Help of Captives; fixing this Inscription on the Temples which he built, None of the Natives have here employ'd their Labour. Now these Slaves of War were of course treated with severer Discipline, being supposed still to retain some Sparks of hostile hatred. Besides, an Act of Cruelty was judg'd somewhat excusable, when practis'd upon those who had formerly made an open Attempt on the Life and Fortune of their present Master; and the License in this Point improv'd so far, that it was esteem'd a harmless matter to kill them, either in Violence of Passion, or upon committing any Offence ^d. This Privilege being once introduc'd, was extended, tho' upon less Pretence, to the Children of the Vassals; and to their Slaves, if they happen'd themselves to be inferior Masters. Yet in some Commonwealths, it was quite taken off by publick Decrees, and in others very much abridg'd and restrain'd. The primitive Institution therefore of Servitude was not founded on War, but on voluntary Consent; tho' the Chance of War supplied Occasion, not only to the increasing the Number of Slaves, but to the rendering their Condition more hard and grievous ^e.

VI. Let us see how Mr. Hobbes ^f derives the Sovereignty of Masters, and the Subjection of Servants, from his State of War. And, first, we must discard that fundamental Error of his, that from the Condition of Nature, which he calls a War of every Man upon every Man, there can result to any Person a Right of invading another, and of reducing him into Servitude upon gaining the Victory. Yet thus much is Sense; that as, by the Right of War, an Enemy may fairly be kill'd; so the Conqueror may, if he pleaseth, give him his Life, upon his Promise of perpetual Service. In which Contract and Compulsion, the Good which the vanquish'd receives, is the Security of his Life, which, by the Right of War, might have been taken away; and the Good which he engages to bring to the Victor, is his Service and Obedience, and those, as far as possible, absolute. For he that obligeth himself to perform the Commands of another, before he knows the Particulars, is bound, without any Limitation or Exception, to do all that the other Party shall enjoin. Tho' the Law of Humanity affords some Relief and Temper to this rigorous Justice ^g.

Farther, Mr. Hobbes ^h rightly observes, that not every Captive in War is thus supposed to covenant with the Conqueror. For some do not obtain an absolute Grant of Life, but a temporary Reprieve to cease at the Conqueror's Pleasure; which was the Case of those whom the Romans preserv'd to adorn their Triumphs, and to entertain their Amphitheatres. Nor is so much Trust and Credit given to every Captive, as that his Master should venture to leave him such a Degree of natural Liberty, as might enable him, were he so inclined, either to run away, or to refuse working, or to attempt any Mischief or Damage against the Family. Such a One therefore per-

^a If thy Brother be waxen poor, and sells himself to thee, thou shalt not constrain him to serve, as a Slave, but he shall be with thee, as an hired Servant, or a sojourner to the Year of Jubile, Lev. xxv. 39, 40. CHRYSIPPUS, as SENECA tells us, did say, That a Slave is a perpetual Servant. Servus, ut placet Chrysisippo, perpetuus mercenarius est. De Benef. Lib. 3. Chap. 22.

^b Exod. xxi. 21, &c. Deuteron. xv. 17, 43, 53, &c. Sirac. xxiii. 25, &c.

MR. BARB. NOTE on § V.

¹ See BUSBEQUIUS. Et. 2. 3. & CHRISTOP. RICHERIUS, de Meritis Orientalium. As to the Original of this Custom, 'tis an Assertion of PLINY, that The Lacedaemonians invented Servitude (l. 7. c. 56.) which cannot be admitted, except in one of these two Senses, either that they were the first in Greece who introduced this Practice, or that they made Slaves of their Countrymen the Greeks, as well as of the Barbarians, when taken in War. The former Sense is favour'd by that Place of HERODOTUS (Erato, towards the End) where speaking of the Island Lennos, its being seiz'd by the Pelagi-gians, he adds, Neither they nor any other of the Grecians had then Slaves.

^a Yet after another Manner than the Old Germans, who kill'd their Slaves, as Tacitus says, Not out of Discipline and Severity, but pure Heat of Passion.

^c 36 p. 52. Ed. Rhetor.

^b Hence Aristotle (Polit. 3.) calls a Servant, ὀργανον ἢ ἑταῖρον.

^d AId. Grot. l. 3. c. 7. §. 3.

^e AId. Beecler ad Grot. l. 2. c. 5. §. 27.

^f De Civib. c. 8. §. 1.

^g Vid. Grot. l. 3. c. 14.

^h Ubi supra, l. 2. §. 4.

forms Service, not upon account of mutual Faith and Contract, or by virtue of a moral Tye, but upon meer Force, like brute Creatures; being kept in Fetters, or under close Confinement. The Obligation therefore of a Slave of War towards his Master, doth not spring from the bare saving his Life, nor deferring his Death; but is built on his Exemption from Chains and Imprisonment. By this Act the Master expresseth so much Confidence in him, as to leave him possess'd of corporal Liberty; by which means, if no moral Bonds and Engagements had pass'd between them, the State of War would still continue; and the Slave might not only make his Escape, but might fairly slay his Preserver.^a From all which it is clear, that there is a great Difference between those Slaves who are secur'd in Prisons, Work-houses, and the like, and those who are tied by Covenant to their Master: the former serving not out of Duty, but to avoid Punishment; and consequently, not acting against the Law of Nature, should they either run off, or assault their Master's Life. For to hold a Person in Chains, or Durance, is a Sign, that we do not think him sufficiently ensured to us by any Obligation, or moral Restraint.

Yet that Assertion of Mr. Hobbes cannot pass for Truth, that the Master hath altogether the same Right over the Slave, whom he thus keeps in Bonds, and him whom he holds only by Articles; in as much as his Right over both is supreme. For that kind of hostile Privilege, which the¹ Victor reserves to himself over his Prisoner, is a different thing from his proper Sovereignty: Since by means of the former the Captive may, at any time, be deprived of his Life, under Pretence of the State of War, from which he seems to be not yet perfectly exempted; whereas the highest Degree of sovereign Rule or Dominion doth not directly include a Right over the Life of the Subject, except on a criminal Account.

VII. But altho' Dominion, which is properly the Right of governing another's Person, when establish'd with the free Consent of the Subject, cannot regularly be transferr'd without his good-liking; Men having usually peculiar Reasons why they chosse to submit to this Person rather than any besides: yet in those kinds of Dominion which are grounded upon Force, it hath been ever judg'd allowable for the Sovereign to alienate them by his own sole Will and Act. Yet so long as the Subjects enjoy any Remains of Liberty, we cannot in Strictness say, that the Men themselves are thus alienated or made over, but only the Right of governing them, as being join'd with some Use or Advantage. Every Sovereign may indeed, as Mr. Hobbes^b remarks, say of his Subject, Hic meus est; This Man is my Property yet 'tis in a quite different Sense that we call a Thing our own. For by the former Expression I mean no more, than that I, and none else, have the Right of governing such a Person; yet so as to be my self under some kind of Obligation to him, and not empower'd to exercise that Right upon him, in an unlimited absolute manner. But, on the other side, the Property I claim over a Thing, implies a Right of using, spoiling, and consuming it, to procure my Advantage, or to satisfy my Pleasure; so that what way soever I dispose of it, to say it was my own, shall be a sufficient Excuse. It must be confess'd, that although the Law of Humanity doth by no means allow us to extinguish all Marks of primitive Equality in a Slave, who, whatever he may have formerly design'd, is now in a Condition of Peace and Kindness with us, so as to use him in the same manner as a Beast or inanimate Creatures, towards which we cannot stand under any Engagement; yet the barbarous Cruelty of many Nations hath proceeded so far, as to reckon their Slaves in the Number of their Goods and Possessions, and to treat them not in a way of Sovereignty, but of arbitrary Violence,^c calling them their own in the same Sense, as their Cattle. Amongst these People, if a Master perform'd the least Good towards his Vassal he did it purely for his own sake, lest he should suffer by losing him; and the poor Wretch was pitied only upon account of his Price.^c But all this is not enough to prove what Mr. Hobbes affirms, that whatsoever the Slave possess'd before his entering on that Condition, doth then fall to his Master: which can be admitted only in this qualified Sense, that as much as the Slave was, before his Captivity, able to get by his Work, so much his Master may now claim, and oblige him to make good. When a Man voluntarily engageth in Servitude, he may indeed deliver up his little Possessions, as well as himself, into his Master's Power. But there is no constant necessity of thus proceeding. And as for these Persons, who in ancient Times sold themselves into Slavery, it is probable, that they retain'd not only the Price given, but likewise their former Goods, at least, in the manner of their Pecul um; so as to have themselves the Property and Management of them, though their Masters had the chief Advantage; or else, that they surrendred them up to their Children, or aged Parents, whom before they were obliged to maintain. Tho' indeed the² Jewish

Mr. BARB. NOTE on § VI.

¹ The Captive having deserv'd to lose his Life, as we suppose, 'tis no Injury to him to make him a Slave; and if he find his Slavery more unsupportable than Life is sweet, he may procure his Death at any time, by disobeying his Master; as Mr. LOCK says in his second Treatise of Government, Chap. IV. § 23, in the Original.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § VII.

¹ In the Roman Law, a Runagate Slave is said to rob himself. Ancilla fugitiva quemadmodum sui factorem facere intelligitur, ita partum quoque contrahendo, furtivum facit. Digell. Lib. 47. Tit. 2. De Furtis, Leg. 60. See also C. L. Lib. 6. Tit. 1. De Serv. fugit. Leg. 1. and Quintilian. Declam. VI. The poor Man, that by the Chance of War had been made a Captive and Slave, had reason to say, Meipsum perdidit; I have lost my self.

² Vid. Selden. De J. N. & G. sec. Hebr. l. 6. c. 7.

^a See Lock's Treatise of civil Government, c. 3. s. 2. De Servitude, p. 241. Ed. Morcell.

^b Ubi supra, l. 4.

^c A. L. Dio. Chrysost. Orat. 15.

Doctors held it unlawful for a Man to sell himself, except under danger of Starving. Amongst the Romans it was a known Trick with Sharpers, to suffer themselves to be sold, for the sake of going Sharers in the Price: And for their Punishment they were condemn'd to real Servitude. The Sham was this; Caius, suppose, pretended Seius to be his Slave, and accordingly offer'd him to Sale, tho' indeed a Freeman: Seius being, upon Bargain, to receive a good part of the Gain, consented to the Proceeding. But the Man being once pass'd off to the Customer, and the Price deliver'd; a third Person was suborn'd to claim Seius in the Court as a Freeman, by preferring an Action against the Purchaser; who (Caius being, in the mean time, slipt out of the way) was thus doubly gull'd of his Money, and of his Man ^a.

If a Man be compell'd to Servitude by the Right and Course of War, the Goods which are taken with him shall be the Victor's. But those which are not taken with him shall be as if he were naturally dead: At least till such time as he recovers his Liberty. Thus much is most certain, that what the Slave gets during his Servitude, he gets for his Master. For to whom any Person fully belongs, to him shall belong whatever that Person can procure or produce. And in this Sense Mr. Hobbes says truly enough, that the Slave hath nothing which he can retain as his own, in Prejudice to his Master's Title. Yet what his Master peculiarly assigns or allows him for Management or Use, he may keep and defend, against his Fellow Servants; as Victuals, Cloaths, Lodgings, Vails, and the like ^b.

VIII. When the same Author ^c adds, that a Slave cannot be injur'd, the Words are not fit to be receiv'd without much favourable allowances, large abatements, and Limitations. The Argument which he makes use of, the Slave having subjeck'd his Will to the Will of his Master, whatever the latter does, is done with the Will of the former, and therefore can be no Injury to him; only proves thus much, that the Slave ought not to complain, whatever Work is enjoin'd him by his Master, provided it lie within the Compaſs of his Strength, tho' never so contrary to his Inclination: No more than a Subject can pretend he is unjustly dealt with, when an absolute Prince doth not manage things to his good liking. That this Subjection of Will amounts to nothing more, we will elsewhere fully evince. In other Matters, who will deny but that it is an Injury to a Slave, to set him a Labour above his Ability; ^d to beat him for not performing such an impossible Task; or to deny him necessary Food ^e? The Jews were so inhuman, as to think themselves not obliged to furnish a Gentile Slave with Cloaths, or Victuals, tho', at the same time, they exacted from him the hardest Services, with all imaginable Cruelty ^e. The reason of this barbarous Rigour might probably be, because they had themselves suffer'd the like Treatment in Egypt ^f. And as for that Command in Leviticus xxv. 43. prohibiting Severity, they confined it to Persons of their own Nation. The Romans in their Customs and Laws, as to the Point of Food, express'd more Kindness ^g. It was a noted Saying of Cato's, that to quarrel with Servants about their Bellies, looks scandalously mean ^h. Yet, in other Respects, the Roman Masters were remarkably unmerciful: As in selling their Slaves, when grown aged and unfit to Work; a Practice which Plutarch ⁱ justly censures, upon this Argument, that it is natural for Men to express some kind of Clemency and Beneficence, even to brute Creatures, which have undergone Labours for our Advantage ^k. On the whole, Aristotle's reasoning will ever hold good; We owe, says he, some Friendship even to a Slave; not as he stands in that Relation, but on the account of his being a Man: Since there is a common Right, which each Person may claim in regard to every other Person, with whom he is capable of partaking in Laws, or Covenant ^l.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § VIII.

^a We ought always to remember, that they are Humane Creatures: Theano's Greek is, ἵνα μὴ διὰ τὸ κτῆνος ἐξέμεται, μὴ ἀδυνατούντων διὰ τὴν ἐξουσίαν, εἰς τὸ πρὸς ἀποδοῦναι τῆς φύσεως. To the Quotations of the Author may be added what Petronius makes Trimalchion say, Amici, & servi homines sunt, & æquè unum lactem biberunt, etiam si illos malus sætus oppresserit, Chap. 71. upon which the Commentators have heaped up many Authorities. But the Jews believed, that they were not oblig'd to use any Kindness to Slaves, except of their own Nation: See Selden de Jure Nat. & Gent. sc. Lib. 6. Chap. 8. Further, Our Author in his Abridgement of the Duties of a Man and Citizen. Lib. II. Chap. 4. § 5. says, That if we sell or alienate a Slave in any other manner, we ought not designedly, and without his desert, to put him into the Hands of such as will use him inhumanly. I will also add here, that there was a Law among the Greeks, which allowed Slaves, when they were used hardly by their Masters, to require that they might be sold to such as would use them better: See Plutarch de Superflit. & Pollux. Lib. 7. § 13. The Emperor Antoninus Pius commanded much the same thing in a Law above quoted, Digest. Lib. 1. Tit. 6. Leg. 2.

^a We have an Instance of this Trick in Plautus, Perf. Act. 4. Sc. 4. & 9. ^b V. Plin. L. 5. Epist. 16.
^c Ubi supr. f. 7. ^d Theano (Epist. 3. in Opusc. Mythol. &c. p. 746.) makes it necessary to the just use of Servants, that They be neither broken by Labour, nor by Want. ^e Vid. Selden. de J. N. & G. sec. Hebr. l. 6. c. 8.

^f Exod. v. 13, 14. ^g Vid. L. 1. t. 6. l. 1. f. 2. D. De his qui sui vel alien. jur. sunt. & L. 7. t. 6. l. 1. f. 3.
^{C.} De Latin. Lib. Toll. ^h Plat. in Cat. M. ⁱ Ibid.
^k Plaut. (Menæchm.) If you are desirous of keeping a Slave securely, you must tie him to you with large Commons. You may easily pin down a Fellow's Nose to a full Table. Juvenal (Sat. 14. v. 125.) censures the Miser, that Servorum ventres medio castigat intquo,

With scanty Measure shrinks his Servants Guts.

It was a commendable Decree of Claudius, which Suetonius mentions (c. 25.) When certain Persons had exposed their sickly and crazy Slaves, in the Island of Æsculapius, being weary of providing for their Cure; he ordered all those who had been thus exposed, to be declared free, and not to return to their old Masters, if they happened to recover: at the same time Enacting, that such Persons as chose rather to kill their Slaves, than thus to dispose of them, should be held guilty of Murder. We meet with the same Account in Dion. Cassius, l. 60. ^l Ethick. ad Nicom. 8. 13. Add. Oeconom. l. 1. c. 5. Senec. De Ira, l. 3. c. 4. De Clement. l. 1. c. 18. & Epist. 47. Arrian. Epictet. l. 1. c. 13.

As

As the other Rights of Fathers of Families hath been moderated and restrain'd by national Constitutions; so it hath happened to this Authority over the Slaves, which, in different Countries, we find more or less restrain'd. But where it remains absolute and unlimited, we must suppose it not to have been thus appointed by civil Ordinances, but to have been pass'd by, and left as it formerly stood, before the Erection of Commonwealths. Yet it is observable, that the Laws of some States do encourage the Cruelty of Masters, and impose greater Hardships on the Slaves, than the Law of Nature permits, under the most absolute Command. We have a famous instance of this in the Roman Custom, of dragging the whole Family to Punishment, when the Master happened to be kill'd: Which Cassius in Tacitus ^a endeavours to defend, by Arguments drawn from Use and Convenience. The Emperor Adrian, in some Measure, lessen'd this Severity, by decreeing, That upon such a Misfortune, not all the Slaves should be arraign'd for Murder, but those only who were so near in the House, as to be able to hear and apprehend the Mischief ^b.

IX. About the Off-spring of Slaves there are two Points of Enquiry, Whether it necessarily follows the Mother? And whether it assumes the same Condition of Servitude? As to the former Question, it is a Rule in the Roman Laws, which holds of Slaves as well as of Beasts, that Partus sequitur ventrem ^c, the Birth goes along with the Bearer. This Grotius ^e judgeth not to be altogether consonant to the Law of Nature, in case the Father can by sufficient Tokens be discovered. "For, says he, since we may observe, "even in some brute Creatures, that the Sire, "as well as the Dam, expresseth a Care for the "young; we may hence infer, that both have "an equal Interest in their common Issue: and "therefore if the municipal Laws are silent in "this Point, the Father's Claim is as good as the "Mother's ^d. But we do not think this Argument of any Force; having before made out, that the original Right over the Child is in the Mother; and only transferr'd to the Father, according to the Tenour of the matrimonial Covenant.

As for the other Difficulty; since in a Condition of perfect Slavery, not only the Works, but the Persons belong to the Master, their Children will likewise fall under his Dominion, as every thing else which they produce ^e. Now why the Maid's Master should have a better Title in the Case, than the Mum's, there are several Reasons to be given. As first, considering the Life and Familiarity of Slaves, to point out the true Father, might prove a Matter of Difficulty ^f. Again, the Mother is, on account of her Burthen, rendred for some time, unfit to perform her usual Work; and consequently brings a Loss and Prejudice to her Master, which ought thus to be repair'd. To which we may add the common Maxim, that Things planted belong to the Proprietor of the Soil ^g. If the Master himself have Issue by his Female Slave, the Condition of it shall be such, as either his Pleasure, or the Laws of the Country shall determine. And by them likewise Judgment is to be pass'd on a Child, which was conceiv'd by the Mother, whilst in a State of Servility, but born after she had obtain'd her Freedom; or vice versa. Tho' Humanity ever inclines to the favourable side, and declares ^h for the Child's Liberty ^g.

It is easy to shew, that the Master doth no Injury to his Slave's Off-spring, ⁱ by dooming it to the same Subjection. For since the Mother

MR. BARB. NOTES on § IX.

^a Partum Ancille Matris sequi conditionem, nec statum Patris in hac specie considerari, expresse videtur, Cod. Lib. 3. tit. 5. De Rei venditione, Leg. 7. See also Lib. 7. tit. 16. De liberali causa, Leg. 42. And about Beasts, what is said above, Lib. 4. Chap. 7. § 4.

^b See above in B. 4. c. 7. f. 5.

^c The Roman Law agrees here with the Laws of Humanity; for it requires, that the Child be Free, if the Mother be so when it is born, tho' she conceived it, when she was a Slave; and, on the contrary, if she were Free, when she conceived it, the Child was Free, tho' the Mother was a Slave, when it was born; it being unreasonable, that the Child (as JESUITUS says) should suffer the Misfortune which happened to the Mother, while it was in her Womb. Sufficit enim, si in ventre Matris eo tempore, quo nascitur, licet ancilla conceperit. Et à contrario, si libera conceperit, deinde ancilla facta peperit, parit, eam, qui nascitur, liberum nasci: quia non debet calamitas Matris ei nocere, qui in ventre est. Much more, when the Mother was a Slave at the time of Conception, if she was made free while she was big, and again became a Slave, the Child must be account ed Free. Ex his illud quaeritur et, si ancilla prægnavit manumissa sit, deinde ancilla postea facta peperit, liberum, an servum pariat? Et Martianus probat, liberum nasci: sufficit enim ei, qui in utero est, liberam Matrem esse, in hoc tempore parturisse, ut liber nascatur. Quod & eorum est. Instit. Lib. 1. tit. 4. De Ingeniis.

^d Mr. BUDDEUS (in his Philos. Pract. Part. 2. Chap. 4. Sect. 12. § 5. and Chap. 5. Sect. 6. § 12.) affirms, That this is unjust, and that the Children that are so born, are obliged only to acknowledge him their Mother's Master. I shall leave it to the Reader to examine whether the Reasons of that able Professor are strong enough to overthrow GROTIUS's and our Author's; especially as this last has laid them down with a Temper in his Abridgment of the Duties of a Man and Citizen, Lib. 2. Chap. 4. § 6. where he says, It is evident, that these Children of a Slave being reduced to Servitude by their mothers, the Master can have no reason to use them worse, than perpetual Mercenary Servants.

^a Ann. 14. c. 45.

^b In Spartian. Add. L. 29. t. 5. D. de Senatusconsulto Silaniano. Cod. 1. 8. 1. xxvi. 16. (The Scythians put out the Eyes of their Slaves, as we are told by Herodotus, Melpom. in the Beginning. L. 2. c. 5. f. 29.)

^c Vid. Edit. Reg. Theodorici. c. 67.

^e Add. Grot. ad Exod. xxi. 4. where he shews, that the Marriage of Slaves were disannull'd at the Pleasure of their Masters. Xenophon (Oeconom.) laying it down for one Rule, that Servants should not wed without their Master's Consent, gives this Reason for it; because As those who are Good, will be so, so those who are Living and hath nothing of her own, 'tis impossible she should maintain the Child, but with her Master's Goods. And in as much as the Master is obliged to furnish such an Infant with Food, and other Necessaries, long before he is capable of making any Requital for his Labour; and since, when he first begins to Work, his Pains are scarce equivalent to his daily Maintenance, he cannot escape Servitude, unless by the Master's particular Dispensation. And this Reason will hold, not only whilst he is supposed to continue, as it were, in the Master's Debt, but ever after; because the Condition, on which the Master first undertook to keep him, was, that he should perform perpetual Service: and, to this Condition he is presumed to have yielded a tacit Consent; especially if it be consider'd, that his very Birth is owing to his Master's Favour; who, by the Right of War, might have put his Parents to Death. And as for that natural Freedom, with which all Men are in common invested, it then only takes place, when no Act or Agreement of our selves or others, hath rendred us obnoxious to a State of Inferiority.

Faithful, so those who are Bad, improve in Knavery. ^f Vid. Plaut. Catin. § Part. the same sort of Servile Issue (LL. l. vi. p. 975. A.) If a Female Slave bear a Child to another Slave, or to a proper Freeman, and that Child be set at Liberty, the Child shall belong to her Master. If a Master, or a Mistress, be convicted of having a Child by their proper Slave, the Father and the Child shall, in the former Case, be driven to another Country by the Magistrates, in the latter Case, the Mother and the Child shall be banish'd by the Magistrates.

And thus we seem to have clearly stated the Case of Children born to perfect Slaves, such as were Captives in War, and thence reduced to this Condition. As for those of the other Kind, who engage themselves in Servitude by their own free Motion, if there be no express Law or Covenant to the contrary, Equity and common Favour incline to this Resolution concerning them; that the Food of their future Issue is contained, or implied, in their own Maintenance, which their Master owes them as a just Debt: and consequently their Children are not involv'd in a necessity of Slavery ^a.

X. Let us, in the next place, examine what Inconveniences do really attend a State of Servitude, which, in the Opinion of most People, passeth for the greatest Misery incident to Mankind, and such, as one ought rather to die than endure ^b. The full Sum and Notion then of personal Servitude amounts to this; that a Man, for the sake of Food, and the other Necessaries of Life, shall lie under an Obligation to perpetual Labour; which if taken in its true natural Extent, extract'd from the barbarous Cruelty of some Masters, and the unreasonable Rigour of some Laws, doth not imply any extravagant Degree of Hardship and Severity. For that perpetual Obligation is well requited by a perpetual certainty of Maintenance, for which those who work by the Hire, are often at a Loss, either through want of Business, or wilful Idleness ^c. Some have thought, and not altogether without reason, that the Prohibition of Slavery among Christians hath chiefly occasion'd that Flood of thieving Vagrants, and sturdy Beggars, which is usually complain'd of. Tho' there are States which have, in a great measure, put a stop to this Nuisance, by erecting publick Workhouses, and compelling lazy Rascals to a Life of Honesty and Industry ^d.

Mr. Hobbes, in his Book De Cive ^e, stating the Difference between Liberty and Servitude, expresseth himself to this purpose: "Liberty is nothing else but the absence of all Impediments of Motion. Those Impediments may be either natural and external, or moral and arbitrary. With regard to the former kind, Things are said to be more or less free, as they have more or less space to move in; as a Man in a wide Prison is more at liberty, than another under close Confinement. And thus a Person may be free to proceed one way, and not free to proceed another: as when a Traveller is hindered, by Hedges and Mounds, from diverting out of the Road into the Corn-fields or Vineyards. This Species of Liberty may be term'd physical or corporal; in which Sense all Servants and Subjects are free, who do not suffer Bonds or Imprisonment. Moral Impediments do not absolutely hinder Motion, but by Accident: that is, by our intervening Choice, whilst we judge it better for us to abstain from such a Motion, than to perform it. Thus a Passenger in a Ship is not restrain'd from throwing himself headlong into the Sea; yet, if he be in his Senses, he'll think a safe Cabin preferable to a Leap amongst the Waves. In like manner, whatever Penalties are denounc'd against any Action, a Man that fears not the Danger, sticks not to break the Command. And this is that intrinsic Liberty of the Will, inseparable from it, which Slaves no less than all other kind of Subjects enjoy. We must search therefore elsewhere to discover a Difference. And first, altho' scarce any Master is so severe, as to hinder his Servant from doing those things which are necessary for the Preservation of his Life and Health, which are the chief Objects and Pursuits of human Care; yet Free-

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § X.

^a There are some that affirm, that Slavery is not quite abolish'd among Christians. Mr. THOMASius says, he has proved it in his publick Lectures on the Institutes (Not. in Huber. de Jure Civitatis, p. 396.) and he publish'd in 1701. a Discourse, De Hominibus propriis Germanorum, which proves it in respect to Germany, where he affirms nevertheless, that the manner of Servitude hath been different from the Customs of the Romans. Mr. HERTIUS has a Discourse also upon these Hominis proprii in Tom. 2. of his Comment. and Opuscula.

^a Comp. Boetler. ad Grot. l. 2. c. 5. f. 29.
Bread, than to stand waiting at another's Table in a golden Girdle.
Pharf. l. 3. c. 152.

^b Rosar. Perfic. Sadi. Cap. 1. It is better to sit down feeding on one's own

^c Vid. Arrian. Epicet. l. 3. c. 26. p. 257. Lucan

Non tibi, sed domino gravis est, quæ servit egestas

Want in a Slave turns to the Master's Loss.

Add. Grot. l. 2. c. 5. f. 27.

^d Add. Bodin. De Repub. l. 1. c. 4. Busbeq; Epist. 3. p. 118.

^e C. 9. f. 9.

“men are, for the most part, allow'd to provide for themselves in these respects, with more Plenty and more Ease, than Persons of that low precarious Condition, whose Constitution often suffers by their hard Fare, and unreasonable Labour². Again, Freemen do in this shew their eminent Advantage above Slaves, that they are admitted to the more honourable Offices in Families and Commonwealths; and that they possess Superfluities in a far larger Measure. Both which Privileges are wonderfully pleasing to Men of lofty Spirits and Designs. For the Trouble of Business is soften'd and sweeten'd by the Honour and Credit of an Employment; and to swim in Affluence, is ever esteem'd a most valuable Happiness; as well, because we seem by this means to be well provided for, against all future Accidents and Occasions; as because our Life will thus pass the more smoothly, and we shall have larger Ability of doing Kindnesses, and gaining a numerous Party by our Benefactions. But the main Distinction of all is this, that free Subjects are only engaged to obey the supreme Power, and the general Laws of the State, and fearing no Punishment, but what is by them particularly denounced, in all other things they follow their own Fancy with full Delight and Satisfaction. But Slaves are obnoxious to the private Commands, and to the coercive Power of their fellow Subject, and are compell'd to bear his Humour, though the most froward or imperious; which is the greatest Hardship, by reason of their near Abode, and frequent Intercourse with their Master. And to render their Bondage still more grievous, the publick Laws do seldom afford them Relief against their Master, unless in Cases of most barbarous Severity and Cruelty. The more soft and gentle a Man's Nature is, the more must he be afflicted under these uneasy Circumstances³. We may add, that the Yoak of Servitude is much the more galling on account of human Pride; which encourages every Man to think himself worthy of Command; and thus when the Slave esteems himself altogether as fit, if not fitter, to bear Rule than his Master, he fancies that Fortune hath done him a mighty Injury, and desires on any Terms to change his Condition^b.

XI. A Slave may obtain Freedom several ways: As first, if his Master formally release him; for what Right the Slave before transferr'd on his Master, the Master may restore to him again. Though it be customary, in many States, that the Slave, thus releas'd, shall still yield some kind of Duty and Reverence to his Master^c. In case the Master own'd a Superior, he cannot otherwise bestow Liberty, than in a way consistent with the Rights of that Superior, and with the publick Laws. Secondly, if his Master renounce and discard him: which, in Commonwealths, is reckon'd a kind of Punishment; and differs not from Manumission or formal conferring of Liberty, in the Effect, but only in the Manner and Design. In both Cases the Master resigns his Right; but in the former, by way of Reward; in the latter, by way of Punishment: for that it is a real Grievance and Affliction to lose a wealthy and convenient Master, even free Servants are often sensible. Thirdly, in case a Slave be made a Captive, whether alone, or together with his Master, his new Servitude extinguisheth his old. But if the Master be only made a Captive, the Slave falls into the same State and Condition as he would do, were his Master naturally dead, at least till such time as the Master be restored to Liberty. Fourthly, a Slave may be releas'd upon uncertainty of a succeeding Possessor^d; as suppose his Master dies without making over his Right to any other; because then he is under no Engagement of performing Service. For no Man is supposed to stand oblig'd, unless he can know the Person to whom the Debt is to be paid. But whether a Man, thus releas'd, can claim the Privilege of a free Subject in a Commonwealth, is a Question that the particular Laws and Customs must determine. Some tell us, that amongst the Turks, the Act of setting a Slave at Liberty will hold good only against his old Master, but that any other Person may again compel him into Service. Another Case when a Slave may be releas'd, upon the uncertainty of a succeeding Possessor, is, if his Master dye, either in a natural or civil Sense, without an Heir. For the Goods of such a Man are adjudg'd derelict, and pass to the first Seizer; yet his Slave cannot be forced into a new Service by the same Claim. Things may be laid hold on by any Man, if no other hath already a Right over them; but Persons cannot be challeng'd by any other Title, than what ariseth from their own Consent, or ² It is a Saying of TULLY (De Orator. l. 2. c. 6.) Mibi liber esse non videtur, qui non aliquando nihil agit. I don't look upon him as properly Free, who hath not sometimes the Privilege of doing nothing.

³ Yet there is a great Difference in Masters. In Terence (Eunuch. Act. 3. Scen. 2. v. 33.) a guess is made from the Slave, that his Master is poor and miserable. But on the other side, as Juvenal observes (Sat. 5. v. 66.)

Maxima quæque domus servis est plena superbis;

Great Families are plagued with haughty Slaves.

^b In Xenophon (Cyropæd. l. 8.) Chrystantas seems to establish some such kind of Difference. In the same manner, says he, as we think it reasonable to be obey'd by those under our Command; let us yield a ready Obedience where it is our Duty. Yet there should be this Difference between Subjects (as we are) and Slaves, that whereas those are compelled to their Labour and Service, we ought to perform our Devoirs with Readiness and willing Compliance. Add Dion. Chrysost. Orat. 14. De Servitute.

^c Lex Wisigoth. l. 5. t. 6. c. 17, & 21.

^d Vid. Grot. l. 2. c. 9. f. 1.

from some antecedent Deed, in which they are concern'd. And therefore, that Right being now extinct, which the Victor by War obtain'd over his Slave, natural Liberty returns: And this, although the Disposition of the Person should make it more proper for him to continue in Servitude; for the Fitness of a Man's Temper, or Inclination can by no means give another a Right of dragging him into Bondage, nor is it always lawful for me to force a Person upon that which is really for his Interest and Advantage. Fifthly, When a Slave, not by way of Punishment

¹ or on account of any preceeding Offence, is thrown into Irons, or otherwise deprived of corporal Liberty, he is by this Act releas'd from his former Obligation by Compact; for his Master is supposed to take off his moral Bonds, by thus imposing natural. It is inconsistent with Covenant, not to believe the Party covenanting, and that Faith cannot be violated, which was not given. And hence a Slave under this Treatment may, if Opportunity favour him, without incurring the least Guilt, make his Escape.

Mr. BARR. NOTE on § XI.

² We must take great notice of this Restriction, for it may serve to rectify Mr. HOBBS's Notions, especially if he were of that Opinion, which another Author of that Nation charges him with, Richard Cumberland, De Legibus Naturæ Chap. 9. § 14. See what has been said above, Lib. 3. Cap. 6. § 9. and Chap. 7. § 5. Our Author has borrow'd all this Paragraph of Hobbes.

THE

LAW of NATURE

AND NATIONS.

BOOK VII.

CHAP. I.

Of the Causes and Motives inducing Men to establish civil Societies.

- | | |
|---|---|
| I. Introduction. II. Man naturally loves himself more than Company. III. Yet the love of Company does not immediately infer the love of civil Society. IV. Many Vices in Man prejudicial to civil Union. V. Whether civil States arose in the World by natural Consequence. VI. Whether Indulgence was the Cause of civil Establishments. | VII. The true Origin of civil Government. VIII. The bare reverence of the Law of Nature not sufficient to secure the Peace of Mankind: IX. Nor the sole force of Arbitrators; or of Co-venants. X. Difference in Opinion greatly prejudicial to the Peace of the World. XI. Men need a much more severe Restraint, than the Law of Nature only. |
|---|---|

AFTER those which are term'd Primary Societies ¹, we come now to treat of a Commonwealth ², which is the last and most perfect Form of Society, and that whereby the best Provision is made for the Safety of Mankind, since their Increase. What induced Men to quit their primitive way of living, in separate Families, will be evident, upon our Enquiry into the Nature of civil Society, and the Disposition of those who compose it. For the better Illustration of which, it will be of great Use to examine the Accounts that are commonly given of this Matter.

II. And here the Generality have recourse to the peculiar Frame of human Nature, by which Man is supposed to be so strongly inclined to a civil State, that he would neither be willing nor able to live without it. This they confirm by Arguments drawn chiefly from the Miseries of a separate Life; the wearisome Condition of Solitude; the Ends of Speech, which would be lost without Company; the natural desire of Conversation; the Advantage of uniting together; and the like: which we have before ^b alludg'd, to prove Man a sociable Creature, from the relation that there is between Society ¹ and

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTE on Chap. I. § I.

¹ See above in B. 6. c. 1. f. 1.

§ II. ¹ This is not the immediate Cause of the forming of civil Societies, as it appears by what our Author says at the third Section, and in the long Note on the seventh; yet it is certain, that Mankind naturally love Society: and he himself proves it in his second Book. But if any one has a mind to see a larger and more exact account of this Matter, at all some Thoughts quite new, and express'd in the most lively and justest Manner in the World; he need only read a Book translated from English, and printed at the Hague in 1710. entitled, Essai sur l'usage de la Raillerie & de l'Enjoûment dans les Conversations qui roulent sur les matieres les plus importantes, p. 94, &c.

^a Civitas.

^b B. 2. c. 3. f. 15.

the nature of Man. Mr. Hobbes ² on the contrary represents Man as a selfish Animal, whose Kindness chiefly terminates in his own Person and Interest ³, and whose Love for Society and other Men is Secondary, being entertain'd with a View of serving his own Pleasure or Profit by their Assistance ³. For no one (as he argues) was ever determin'd in the Choice he made of another's Company, by the bare Consideration of his being a Man, but by some Prospect of Honour or Advantage from his Acquaintance, preferable to what he could expect from the Acquaintance of any besides. This he endeavours to illustrate, by deduction from particular Societies. "They who unite in a Body for the promoting of Traffick, are led to it purely by the Hopes of advancing their Goods more in Conjunction with others, than they could by their private Industry: and what ever disappoints, or puts an end to these Hopes, prevails with all, but Fools or Madmen, to put an end likewise to the Society. So where any are joint Commissioners in a publick Office, they contract a sort of Law Friendship, implying in it more of mutual Fear than Love; and consisting rather in Forms and Ceremonies, than in any sincere Union of Minds, and Combination of Affections. So that such Men may sometimes bandy together in a Party or Faction, for the sake of carrying on some private Ends; but to a generous and dis-interested Friendship they are commonly utter Strangers. Nor will any one of these, if he dare rely on his own single Strength for accomplishing his Aims, ever trouble himself about Associates. Again, when Persons meet upon the common Design of passing the Time away pleasantly, 'tis a mighty Satisfaction that each takes in making himself and the Company merry: in which he cannot succeed without exposing the Faults or Follies of other Men, in Cases suppos'd not to reach himself. (For prudence would never allow him to censure that in another, of which he was not himself acquitted in his own Conscience: according to Juvenal's Rule;

" Loripedem rectus derideat, Æthiopem albus ⁴.

" Let him cry filthy Black whose Skin is white;
" And Bandy-legs, who treads himself upright.)

Mr. T A T E.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § II.

² De Cive, c. 1. § 2.

³ Here we may observe, as well as in other Places, that our Author agrees with the Sentiments of Mr. Hobbes.

⁴ Sat. 2. v. 23.

^a Jæus, Orat. 2. No Man values others more than himself. Euripid., Mædia v. 85, 86.

-----All agree
In this first Maxim of Philosophy:
That Love begins at Home.-----

Isocrates, de Pace, p. 285. Ed. Paris. In my Opinion, 'tis the common Desire of Mankind to advance their own Profit; and their common Labour to possess more than these about them. ^b Arrian, Epictet. l. 2. c. 22. "Suppose in a Dispute who was the chief Philosopher, One should tell you, he heard a judicious Friend say, that you were certainly the Man: Would not your Heart swell with the ample Testimony, and enlarge its Dimensions at the blast of Fame? But what if another ill-natur'd Critick should give such Instructions as these; Why do you lose your time in hearing this Pretender to Wisdom? What does he know? Perhaps he has learn'd his first Principles, but I will venture him for getting a Step farther: Why, you'd be Thunder-struck with this mortifying Sound; you'd be put to't to keep your Colour; and would have only Spirit enough to say, I'll shew him what a Man he has affronted, and what a Philosopher he has under-rated. Add. Charron de la Sageſſe, l. 1. c. 36. § 6.

" Therefore, for any one to deride others, is, in effect, to declare his Contempt of them in respect of himself, and a certain malicious Design of setting off his own Lustre by their Blemishes. Even with them who keep within the Bounds of innocent Mirth and inoffensive Raillery, there is none but aims more at his own Satisfaction, than that of other Men: nay, such as make a Profession of diverting those about them, mean nothing more than, by shewing their Wit, to recommend themselves to the Company. Besides, most Men have naturally an itching Desire to be examining, censuring, and exposing the Words and Actions of others; which, if they have frequent Occasion of gratifying, they look upon it as a notable Ingredient in the Pleasure and Happiness of Life. And this Humour 'tis a difficult thing to suppress, or keep within Compass, by the Provision made against it by Laws and Penalties ^b. Lastly, suppose some, that pretend to more Knowledge and Wisdom than ordinary, met together to confer about Matters of Learning; each Man is for prescribing his own Opinion to the rest, and finding his Abilities or Authority disputed,resents it as the most heinous Affront. Whence it plainly appears, that all Society, or Intercourse, between such Men, is founded on the Design either of supplying their Wants, or of gratifying their Vanity, or of finding Diversion and Entertainment. The same is asserted upon another Argument, taken from the Definition of the Will, and of what is good, honourable, and profitable. Societies are introduced among Men by their voluntary Consent. Now where there is an Act of the Will, there is of necessity an Object of that Act; which Object is always some supposed good to the Agent. For be a thing never so good in it self, yet if it be not so likewise with respect to us, it loses all its Influence on our Powers of acting. Thus, for Instance, did Matters go never so well with the King of Persia, I should not look upon my self as having any Share in his good Fortune, All good is attended with some Pleasure, either of the Mind alone, or of the Body in Conjunction with it. That of the Mind is either the Passion of Glory, or what may ultimately be resolv'd into such a Principle. That which affects the Body is Profit: which proves all Society to have first commenced upon the Score either of Profit or Glory; that is, upon account of Love to our selves, exclusive of all others. However 'tis certain, that Glory cannot be a lasting Foundation of Society for any number of Men; because, in Glory, as in Honour, where the Title to it is general, there is in effect no Title at all: the very Nature of Glory consisting in the Opinion of some Advantage⁵, which, upon Comparison, we appear to have above the rest of the World. Neither does our joining in Society with others give us any farther occasion of Glory, than our Alliance with Men of great and extraordinary Virtues, may seem to argue a Parity of Worth in our selves. For otherwise a Man is valued in Proportion to that Ability he has of supplying his own Wants, without depending on the Aid of his Fellows⁶. It must be confessed, that by mutual Assistance the good of human Life is highly promoted. Yet to have the Service of other Men at our Command, would seem much more easy and agreeable: As amongst the other Conveniences and Helps of Living, that is still prized above the rest, which serves to more Purposes, and is purchas'd, or preserv'd with less Cost and Trouble. Whence we may conclude, for certain, that Man would be more inclin'd to Empire than to Society; that is, would much rather command absolutely, being himself exempted from all Obedience, than be oblig'd to any such exchange of good Offices, as seems to be required in a sociable Life: were it not that he is restrain'd from acting after such an arbitrary manner, by the Danger which he apprehends from so violent Resolutions⁷.

III. But altho' it cannot from hence be concluded (as we have before observ'd¹) that Man is not by Nature a sociable Creature; yet allowing him a natural Desire of Society, since this may be gratified by the primary Societies already described, this infers not his Desire of civil Society, any more than his general Love of Employment bespeaks his Affection for that of a Scholar, in particular. ^b Aristotle says, That Man may be rather term'd a conjugal Animal than a civil; as a Family, in Necessity as well as in Time, is antecedent to a Commonwealth; and as the Propagation of Race is the most common Labour of Animate Beings. This is what Mr. Hobbes proves in the following manner. Civil Society consists not in a bare Assembly of Men; but in an Assembly combined together by mutual Leagues and Covenants. The Force of these Covenants ignorant People and Infants do not at all apprehend; nor is their Use discover'd by those who never felt the Mischief of living without them. So that the former are utterly incapable of instituting a civil State, as being ignorant of its Nature; the latter are wholly regardless of it, as not being any way sensible of its Benefit, or at best they live under it in a manner, that testifies no Esteem of its Excellence and Worth. And therefore all Men being born Infants, are by Birth unqualified for civil Society, and so a great Number of them remain to their dying Day: And the rest are formed and adapted to it by the Force of Discipline, not of Nature. Neither is the Credit of this Doctrine shaken by that known Maxim of Aristotle, that Man is born, or is by Nature, a political Creature. For, sometimes, affirming a thing to be such or such by Nature, we denote it to be actually endow'd with some Quality, without any antecedent Act of his own, or of any one else, by which the Quality might be introduced. In which Sense a Fish is endued with the Faculty of Swimming, a Bird of Flying, and an Oak of bearing Acorns. Sometimes the same Expression signifies a fitness in the Thing to receive some Perfection by Culture and Discipline; the Reception of which Nature seems to intend, or at least to approve, as agreeable, or, however, no ways repugnant to its Temper and Frame. Thus, a Horse has the natural Faculty of prancing, which an Ass has not; a Parrot of prating; a Field of bearing Corn, and a Hill Vines; a Man of discoursing, and of learning divers Arts and Sciences: In which Sense, also, we shall hereafter demonstrate him to be a political Creature, notwithstanding his being born an Infant: since we are wont to take our Measure of what does, ^c or does not, agree to Man by Nature, from what he appears to be in his grown Estate, and under his full Use of Reason². Aristotle³

⁵ See B. 8. c. 4. l. 11.

⁶ See the History of CALVISIUS SABINUS in SENECA'S Epist. 27.

MR. BARR. NOTES on § III.

¹ B. 2. c. 2. l. 7. &c. and C. 3. l. 16. &c.

² This is according to our Author's own Observation; that the Words by Nature do not here import the actual Existence of some Quality in a thing, with which it is endow'd by Nature, independent of any antecedent Act or Operation of his own, or of any other else; but only an aptness or Disposition to receive certain Perfections, by Improvement and Education, with which Nature designs to adorn it, or which at least she seems to approve of, as being agreeable, or however not contrary to it: Make and Constitution. Besides, we must observe, that ARISTOTLE sometimes uses the Words ζῷον πολιτικόν in a large and general Sense, to denote simply a social Creature, or one made for Society, and not strictly for such a one as has a natural Inclination for Society, and is exactly by Nature framed and fitted for it. The word sometimes is an Addition of mine: I know not whether I have in this closely followed my Author, but thus he ought to have express'd himself at least: For in the Passage which himself has quoted in the beginning of this Paragraph, it evidently appears that ζῷον πολιτικόν is a Creature made for civil Society, since 'tis oppos'd to ζῷον συνδραστηρικόν, or a Creature made for the Society of Marriage.

³ Arrian. Epist. l. 3. c. 24. "No Creature is engaged with so deep an Affection to another's Person, as to his own Profit. whatever stands in the way of this, whether Father, or Brother, or Son, or Lover, or Beloved, he hates and rejects with Curies and Scorn. For so has Nature appointed, that the strongest Charm should be our own Interest. This is our Father, our Brother, our Kinman, our GOD. Wherefore if we refer to one and the same End, our Profit, our Piety, our Honesty, our Country, our Parents, and our Friends; all are secured. But if we measure our Profit by one Standard, and our Friends, our Country, our Relations, our Justice it self by another; in this Case, Profit turns the Scale, and all other Considerations sink and are out-weighed. For I and Mine, are words which never fail to draw the animal Nature after their Charm. Did you never observe (says he a little before) Wheels playing and faconing upon each other as the very Patterns of Love and Affection? But would you know how long-lived this Endearment is? The Experiment will cost you no more than a Bane. Tully, Off. 3. That every Man should procure the Necessities of Life, for himself rather than any besides, is an allow'd Privilege, and such as natural Inclination does by no means oppose. ^b Ad Nicom. l. 8. c. 14. Vid. Digby & Origine Mandi, c. 9. l. 8. l. 85. ^c Vid. Cumberland de LL. Nat. c. 2. l. 2.

says in the same Work ^a, that a Man is by Nature a political Creature, and therefore would desire the Company of others, though he did not stand in need of their Assistance. But now his Affection for civil Government can never be infer'd from the bare desire of Company; since this, as was observ'd, may be equally gratified by primary Societies, such as may well be suppos'd without admitting a Commonwealth. So again, the Philosopher ^b proves Man to be a political Creature from the Reasons of Speech, which else had been assign'd him to no Purpose: whereas, the use of Speech is not confin'd to a Commonwealth; Men having lived and conversed together, long before the Institution of Government. In like manner, is to be understood that Passage in his first Book of Ethics to Nicomachus ^c: That God may deserve the Name of perfect, which appears to be sufficient; and that we call sufficient, which answers not only to the Wants of a single Man in a solitary Life, but those of our Parents, our Wife, our Children, our Friends, and fellow Subjects: Ἐπειδὴ οὐτεὶ πλιπὸς ἀνθρώπου, Because Man is by Nature a political Creature. And yet, there is room for the several Relations of Parents, Children, Wife, and Friends, without supposing a Commonwealth.

IV. For the clearing up of this whole Matter, we ought to consider, what that Condition is which Men enter into, upon their erecting a civil State; what Qualities they are which may entitle them to the Name of political Creatures; and lastly, what there is in their Frame and Constitution which seems (if we may so speak) to indispose them for a Civil Life. First then, whoever enters into a Community, divests himself of his natural Freedom, and puts himself under Government, which, amongst other things, comprehends the Power of Life and Death over him, together with Authority to enjoin him some things to which he has an utter Aversion, and to prohibit others, for which he may have as strong an Inclination; so that 'tis possible he may often, in obedience to this Authority, be oblig'd to sacrifice his private Good to that of the publick. Whereas, were Man to follow his natural Inclinations, he would be subject to no Body, but live wholly at his own Discretion, and make his private Satisfaction and Interest the scope of all his Actions. Some weighty Motives there must needs have been, and such as amounted almost to Necessity, that could persuade him to overcome these so very soothing Desires. Man, therefore, first embraced civil Society, not as led to it by the Bias of Nature, but as driven by the Fear of greater Evils. The name of political Creatures, or good Members of a State, may be truly applied to those who promote the common Welfare to the utmost of their Power, and freely prefer it to any private Consideration; nay, and even measure their private ^d Good by the Relation it bears to that of the publick; and, lastly, at all times, demean themselves with Kindness and Courtesy to their Fellow-subjects ^e. But no one, now, is so little acquainted with human Nature, as not to know how ill-qualified the Generality are for discharging such a Part, it being evident, that very few do acquit themselves in all Points of their Duty; that Nothing, besides the Fear of Punishment, could keep the greater Number in any tolerable Order; and that very many continue all their Life long, impolittick Animals, or, which is the same thing, evil Subjects. Nay, it may be affirm'd, that no Creature is more fierce and unruly than Man, or exposed to more Failings, which tend to the Disturbance of Society. Beasts sometimes contend about their Food, and then 'tis only in the Case of Scarcity; sometimes again they enter the Lists, at the Instigation of their Lust, which yet has only its Seasons of returning. But be they of never so savage a Disposition, they seldom express it against their own Kind. Whereas Men quarrel with Men, not only as excited by the Stings of Hunger, and by a Lust so vigorous as never to be out of Season, but by other Vices and Passions, unknown to Beasts, and often repugnant in Nature one to the other. Of these, the chief are an endless Thirst after Things superfluous ^f, and Ambition, the most pernicious of all Evils; of which, as no Creature seems to have any Sense, excepting Man, so he has the most lively and tender Sense imaginable: while, in the mean time, 'tis the Pri-

MR. BARB. NOTE on § IV.

^a That it is to be understood in a negative Sense, and not always in a Positive; I mean, that if a thing is but in the least prejudicial to the Welfare of the State, a Subject ought to forbear doing it, what private Advantage soever he might make of it to himself. But for all that, there may be some things that a particular Member may make an Advantage of, which are neither prejudicial nor serviceable to the State; and in that Case, why should he not mind his private Interest? 'Tis in this Sense, that we must take the following Passage of CICERO de Offic. Lib. 3. Chap. 27. Pote! autem quod inutile Republice sit, et cuiquam civi utile esse? Can a good Citizen think that advantageous to himself, that is prejudicial to the State?

^b L. 3. c. 8. p. 345. ^c Polit. I. 1. c. 2. ^d C. 5. ^e Arrian. Epistol. A. 2. c. 10. What then is the Duty of a good Citizen? That he measure nothing with respect to his own private Advantage; that he consult about nothing, as if he were a Land disfranchis'd from the rest of his Kind. But, that he so behave himself, as the Hand or Foot, if they were endued with Reason, and understood the Order of Nature, would never entertain any other Motion or Desire, than what was directed to the good of the whole Body. Herodotus observes of the Persians in Clio, that those who sacrificed amongst them, did not put up Prayers for themselves and their own private Happiness; but in behalf of the whole Nation, and of the King in chief. ^f Ennius in Catullus. "The Love of Money, and afterwards, that of Empire were the source of all our Mischiefs. Covetousness, subverted Fidelity, Probity, and other worthy Endowments of Soul; introducing in their stead, Pride, Cruelty, "Providence" together with a common Sale and Market of all things. Ambition engaged its numerous Votaries to "set up false Colours; to have one thing in their Mouth, and another in their Mind; to measure Friendships and "Enamours, not by Reality, but by Advantage; and to endeavour more the keeping a good Face, than an honest Heart."

vilege of Brutes to be moved at nothing, but boldly Sufferings. Add to this, that quick Resentment of Injuries, and eager Desire of Revenge; an Evil less common and less active in Brutes. And, what is worst of all, Men pursue the Ruin of each other with so much Industry, that of all the Mischiefs to which human Condition lies open, the most Part are owing to their own Malice. Nor may it unreasonably be ascribed to the peculiar Care of divine Providence, that Men advance to Maturity so much slower than Beasts; to the End that they may, by length of time, be in some measure broken of their fierceness and haughtiness of Temper, and brought to an Accommodation with different Dispositions. Otherwise, supposing Man to be put immediately in Possession of his full Strength, the Forest could shew nothing so untractable ^a. What Mr. Hobbes ^b observes, concerning the Genius of Mankind, is not impertinent to our present Argument: that all have a restless desire after Power; not because they really wish to be advancing still to higher Degrees of Command, or that they may not, in their own Temper, be satisfied with a moderate Portion of it; but because they have no way of being secured in the Possession of what they already enjoy, but by farther Acquisitions: the old Stock being ever spending, and therefore ever requiring new Supplies. And this End being accomplish'd, there again succeeds a fresh Desire, either of Fame by new Conquests, or of ease and sensual Pleasure. Moreover, Competition for Riches, Honour, Command, or any Prerogative and Power above others, inclines to Contention, Enmity, and War: the way, by which any one Competitor may arrive at his Hopes, lying through the Death, or Defeat of his Rival. It may farther be urged, that whereas in Brutes of all Kinds, there appears visibly a great Affinity of Desires and Propensions; with us, there is not more Diversity of Men, than there is of Opinions and ways of living; each of which is cry'd up, with a wonderful Perverseness, by the several Patrons of them, in Preference to all besides: a Thing sufficient, of it self, to make Disturbances in any Multitude; who are to unite in a Society ^c. So far it is therefore from true, that Man is by Nature a political Creature, or by Birth is fitted for the Discharge of civil Duties; that 'tis as much as can be done, to train up some few, by long Discipline, to a tolerable Behaviour in this Respect ^d. Not to mention the Vices of the vulgar Sort (who are the greater Part of Mankind) so often enlarged upon by other Authors ^e. So that a thorough Knowledge of human Malice and Fraud, in order to the avoiding and disappointing them, makes up a very considerable Part of civil Prudence ^f. From what has been said may be sufficiently gather'd the Sense and Import of this Expression, that Man is by Nature a political Creature: by which is meant, not that all and each of us are fitted by Nature for sustaining the Part of good Citizens; but that some, at least, by the Force of Instruction and Discipline, may be so formed as to acquit themselves well, under that Character; and that since Men have increas'd and multiplied, civil Societies are absolutely necessary to their Safety; for which as they are by a natural Principle engaged to provide, so they have the same natural Obligation to enter into regular States and Governments, the chief Benefit of which Institutions is, the habitual Exercise of an orderly, decent, and friendly Life.

V. Hornius ^g calls a Commonwealth the Work of Nature, and accounts for its Rise in a natural way: As, that the first Pair, from whom descended the whole Race of Mankind, were united by the Bonds of conjugal Love, and their Children by those of natural Affection, to them and to each other; that these Engagements founded a Family, which by constant Increase from new Births, with that Love of Society implanted in Men by Nature, and improved by Neighbourhood and Alliance, at length furnish'd out a civil State; it being absurd and senseless to imagine, that Men were once dispers'd in Woods and Deserts, and there led a Vagabond Life like the Brutes about them. But admitting the Origin of Commonwealths, according to this natural Account; yet to exclude all Com-

^a See Proverbs xiii. 24. xxxiii. 13, 14. Ecclesi. xxx. 1, &c. 12.

^b Leviath. C. XI

^c Euripid. Phœnij. v. 502, &c.

If what is Good, or Beauteous, always fore
The same conspicuous Marks to mortal Eyes,
Men would be Friends, the World a peaceful Scene,
But Name and Species only join us now:
Differing in thing, and clashing in Desire.

^d Plato de LL. l. 6. p. 864. Ed. Weck. We affirm Man to be a mild and tractable Creature. And indeed, if, besides the Frugeness of Nature and Birth, he obtain the Benefit of good Institution, he becomes most gentle, lively and civil. But upon an insufficient Education, he grows the fiercest Animal of all that the Earth breeds. Arist. Pol. l. 1. c. 2. As Man, if properly perfected, is the best and noblest of living Creatures, so, if estranged from Law, and Justice, and Virtue, he is the worst and most contemptible. Idem. ad Nicom. l. 2. c. 1. in fin. 'Tis not an indifferent Matter whether a Person has been thus or that he be torn'd from his Youth: but rather 'tis a Point of the greatest Consequence, and upon which all depends. Idem. l. 7. c. 1. in fin. Of Men, left to himself, would do a thousand times more Mischiefs to a Beast. Add. Sen. Epist. 103. Pol. l. 1. c. 13. A Man exceed other Creatures in Craft and Cunning, so they may many ways render themselves the worst of all that breathe. Other Animals being govern'd wholly by bodily Pleasure, are by that alone led into Fallings and Disorders: but Mankind, who are distracted with Variety of Opinions, offend as often through Perverseness of Judgment, or a heat of Thought, as through Frailty and Imperfection of Nature. Laërtius de Vita Dei, c. 12. What could be more fierce and cruel than Man, if living under no Restraint of a Superior, he might evade or despise the Authority of Law. Plotin. in Clem. p. 884. D. Ed. Weck. Were Power added to Passion and Inclination, Man would be the wildest thing in Nature. ^e And Mornay de Ver. Relig. Christianæ, c. 16.

^f See Bacon's Adv. of Learning, b. 2. c. 2.

^g De Civitate, l. 1. c. 4. t. 6.

parts, and all other Motives from a Share in their Institution, is no less irrational than to say, that because a Seed grows up to a Tree, and because a Tree is cut out into Planks and Beams, and these, rightly framed and compacted together, compose a Ship, therefore a Ship is the Work and Product of Nature; without allowing the Labour of the Artificer, or any other particular Cause, to conspire in erecting that sort of Fabrick. We therefore readily acknowledge it for false and fabulous, whatever is fancied of a great Number of Men first assembled together, when dispers'd into Woods and Deserts, and after that reunited into one Commonwealth. But then their Opinion is better grounded, who suppose Mankind, from the primitive Couple, or from four Families after the Deluge, to have fallen immediately into the Order of civil State. For, however a Father might keep his Children under his Care, and the same common Roof, till such time as they came to Years of Maturity: yet since, in those first Ages of the World, they lived altogether on Tillage and Pasturage, when Children were married, the Father had no Reason to detain them longer. On the contrary, we are inform'd by Scripture, that it was usual for them, when arrived at an Age proper for taking the Care of a Family upon them, to separate and choose out new Habitations; especially while the World was yet unstock'd, and while the Pleasantness of the Scene invited them to distant Quarters ^a. Nor was it peculiar to Sicily of old, to have such Inhabitants as Homer ^b describes;

Τοῖσιν δ' ἔτ' ἀγοραὶ, &c. —

*No Councils they, nor Courts of Justice hold,
But on some Mountain's Top in Caves grow old.
Each o'er his Wife and Children Empire bears,
And none beyond his Cave extends his Cares.*

There is, it is granted, a natural Affection between Brethren; yet not such as excludes their Desire of living rather upon the Level, than with any Distinctions of Superiority amongst them; neither such as does convince us, that their Friendship could not be long-lived enough, supposing their Effects to be distinct and separate. So that, according to this Account, the Propagation of Mankind must rather tend to the increasing their Division, than to the uniting them in Society. But when the wiser Part began to consider, that, by their assembling into one Body, the Inconveniences attending separate Families might be removed, they hereupon thought it not sufficient to agree together upon entering upon the same Covenant, and submitting to the same common Power, unless, for their better Convenience and Security, they likewise agreed to contract their Dwellings, and, for the future, confine them to the same Place. And, in this Sense are we to interpret those Authors, who suppose Men, from being dispers'd about in the Woods, to have been afterwards assembled and united together by the first Founders of civil Government.

VI. Some make the Wants and Necessities of Men to be the principal Cause of their framing political Societies; upon a Prospect of living in better Fashion and greater Plenty, when united together, than they could possibly do in a Condition of Solitude. In which Account thus much is certain, that were Men left alone, each to shift for himself destitute of all Help from others, no Creatures could be more exquisitely miserable. On the other side, 'tis undeniable, upon the Institution of Commonwealths, human Life grew refined to a Degree of Luxury and Delicacy ^c. But notwithstanding this, it seems evident to us, that Necessity was not the sole, or the principal Cause of Commonwealths, howsoever Plato ^d may favour that Opinion: Since the Arts of making Wine, of providing Cloaths, and of turning Ground to Pasture and Tillage, being even then known, while Men lived as yet in separate independent Families; there seems already to have been a sufficient Provision made for all the Necessaries of Life ^e. For let us suppose a Father of a Family possess'd of a large Portion of Land, and well stock'd with Servants and Cattle, what could such an one want for his Support? What, at least, that might not be supplied by the means of Commerce ^f? In like manner, as it is now usual, for different Nations to import from each other any sort of Commodities, for Use and Pleasure; without thinking it necessary for that Purpose, to unite together under the same Government and Constitution. And Instances may be given of People living for many Ages, under civil Establishments, in a Condition no way superior, for Plenty and Abundance, to that of the Fathers of Families in antient Time ^g. So that all that mighty Plenty and Luxury, which now reigns in some Parts of the World, seems to derive its Origin from great Cities, rather than from Commonwealths.

^a See Genes. xiii. 5, 6, 9.

^b Odyss. L. 9. v. 113, &c.

^c Lactantius, de Opif. Dei, c. 4. n. 20, 21.

If each Man alone had sufficient Strength to ward off all Dangers, and stood in need of no Assistant: what Society would there be in the World? What mutual Reverence or Respect? What Order? What Reason? What Humanity? What would be more vile than Man? What more extravagant? What more fierce and cruel? But now wwhile each single Person is poor and indigent, and cannot subsist without the help of his Fellows, all desire Society for Ornament and Defence of common Life.

^d De Repub. l. 2. p. 598, &c. Ed. Wech.

^e See Genes. xiii. 2. xxiv. 35.

^f Vid. Cornel. Nep. Attic. c. 13.

^g Who therefore might make the same Boast with him in Valerius Flaccus, l. 6. ver. 330.

----- *Nec mœnia nobis
Vestra placent, seror Arctoïis nam liber in arvis, Cuncta tenens mecum: omnis amor iacturaq; plaustris
Sola; nec hac longum victor potiere rapina:
At epulæ quodcumque pecus, quæcumque ferarum.*

I your Imprisonment of Walls disdain,
Who live a Freeman on our northern Plain.
Of little Wealth I boast, but what I wear;
And if the Plough goes well, shall never die with Care.
No other Prize can tempt a Victor's Toil:
Nor shall this long remain an envied Spoil.
Nature purveys for me; the fiercest Beast
True Venison yields, and every Flock a Feast.

Because,

Because, in the Cities, the meaner People, having no Income from Cattel or Land, are forced (for a Livelihood) upon improving divers Arts and Inventions. Which, likewise, are not a little promoted by a Sort of Vanity, common to great Towns, of vying one with the other in Drefs and Finery, and thereby of running out into Extravagance; for the Support of which more Trades are intended, than for the Relief of Man's real Necessities: which yet civil Life could very contentedly be without¹.

VII. Therefore the true and leading Cause, why the Fathers of Families would consent to resign up their natural Liberty, and to form a Commonwealth, was thereby to guard themselves against those Injuries, which one Man was in Danger of sustaining from another¹. For as nothing, next to Almighty God, can be

¹ See our Author's Dissertation De Statu Hominum Naturali, f. 6.

MR. BAYLE'S NOTES on § VII.

¹ This is the Opinion of Mr. DE LA BRUYERE (in his Caractères at Chap. du Souverain & de la République, p. 319.) "Twas the Injustice, says he, of the first Men, that was the Original and only Source of War; and that put them under the Necessity of submitting to some Power that might settle and establish their Rights and Pretensions: For if they would have been contented with their own, and not have invaded the Rights of their Neighbours, the World would have enjoy'd an undisturb'd Peace and Liberty." Mr. BAYLE (in his Nouvelles Lettres à l'occasion de la Critique generale du Calvinisme de Mainbourg, Lett. XVII. Sect. 2.) adds to these some closer Reasons. 'Tis worth the while to regard either to the good or evil to come. They had no other Thoughts than to remedy the Mischiefs they had experienc'd, or which they look'd upon to be near at Hand.-----I cannot persuade my self, that Communities were form'd, because Men forelaw, by consulting the Ideas of Reason, that a solitary Life would be no Honour either to their own Species, or to their Creator, or to the World in general. 'Twas the present Satisfaction, and the approaching Hope of living securely, or else Force, that produced the first Commonwealths; without Mens having had in view Laws, Trade, Arts, Sciences, the enlarging of States, and all the other things in which the Beauty of History consists. They did not foresee these Consequences at the Beginning, and tho' they had foreseen them by the Light of an Understanding free from Passions, it would not have touch'd 'em in the least.-----Mankind are too cold and remiss, when they are spurrd on by nothing but Reason; and the Affairs of human Societies would have been but in a very sad Condition, had Men been tempted to have liv'd together only upon this Consideration; that it is not reasonable for a Creature proper for Society, to live in Solitude. As the nature and frame of our Constitution is, 'tis only by the means of Senle that we must be wrought on and determin'd". We cannot, in my Opinion, but approve of these judicious Reflections: And that the original of States and Empires is partly to be attributed to Force, is what we may with great Probability conclude, from the manner in which the Holy Scripture speaks of Nimrod the most antient King, and the first Conqueror we have any account of. This Nimrod, says Moses, began to be a mighty one in the Earth: He was a mighty Hunter before the Lord; wherefore it is said, Even as Nimrod the mighty Hunter before the Lord. And the beginning of his Kingdom was Babel, and Erech, and Accad, and Calneh, in the Land of Shinar, Gen. x. 8, 9, 10. The very Name of Nimrod may give us to understand so much, since it is deriv'd from a Word which in Hebrew signifies to rebel, and in Arabic to be obstinate, fierce, insolent, as Mr. LE CLERC has observ'd. 'Tis probable, that before this Off-spring of Cah, there was no Family but what liv'd in an entire independent State; so that the Members, of which it was compos'd, were subject to no Body but to their Chief or Father of a Family. But when Nimrod, contemning paternal Authority, set himself up as a Sovereign over People, who either wanted Strength or Courage enough to oppose him, or else who chose rather to submit to his Power than expose themselves to worse Inconveniences, by going to settle in some distant place; then a sort of Kingdom was form'd. And therefore our Author is too indeterminate, and too imperfect in his Notions, in maintaining that it was only the fear of being injur'd and insulted that gave Birth to all civil Societies. The very Causes of this fear, as Mr. TITIVS observes (Observation DXLVII. Numb. 3, 4.) were not in those Days so great, as necessarily to induce Men to form Political Governments. For why could they not then have been able to have sufficiently provided for their Quiet and Safety, by several of 'em joining together in Treaties and Confederacies, for the defence of each other against such as should pretend to molest them in the Enjoyment of what they had purchased by their Labour and Industry? These Treaties and Alliances being founded on the mutual Advantages of the Parties concern'd, each would have been induc'd to have observ'd 'em by his own proper Interest; as our Author says himself a little farther in the ninth Section. This is so very true, that a long time after Mankind began to increase and multiply, there were Nations, that for several Age liv'd without Laws, without Magistrates, or without any form of Government. See GRONOVIVS's 2 Note upon GROTIUS, Lib. I. Cap. I. Sect. 1. Nay, even to this Day there are several Examples of it to be found among the People of Africa and America. See la Continuation des pensées diverses of Mr. BAYLE, Artic. cxviii. Besides, those who refer the Rise and Settlement of all States to one general and uniform Principle, such as some suppose Fear to be, others the Necessities and Occasions of Life, others some other Motives (See Lactantius Inst. Divin. Lib. 6. Cap. 10. Numb. 13, &c. Edit. Cellar. and Tacitus Annal. Lib. 3. Cap. 26.) seem to suppose that in the first Ages of the World, several Fathers of Families met together, to consult in what manner they might most commodiously provide for their Security, or for their Necessities; and that upon mature Deliberation, they agreed that it was absolutely necessary for 'em to form among themselves a civil Society. Now this Notion is not agreeable either to History, or to common Experience, which demonstrate that all human Institutions of Government had but small Beginnings; that they are at first very rude and defective, and that it is by degrees, and in a long Series of time, that they arrive to any tolerable Perfection. But tho' one could find out, in the Monuments of Antiquity, some Footsteps of such an Assembly, it would be mighty difficult to suppose, that these Fathers of Families did immediately form an Idea of civil Societies, and did foresee and nicely weigh the Advantages and Inconveniences of it. This is a thing that requires a long Experience, and it is very unlikely that the Plan of so beautiful a Building was design'd and finish'd all at one time; since even now that it has been form'd so many Ages ago, the generality of Mankind know nothing of its Use, its Structure, or its Beauties: it being a Knowledge that even Persons, who have had some Education, do not attain to but by Study and Experience. Our Author himself (in his Introduction to the History of the States of Europe, Chap. 1. Sect. 3.) acknowledges that the first Governments were very small and very defective, and that the different parts of Sovereignty were not establish'd but by little and little, and one after another. In my Opinion, there is not Reflexion enough made here upon the Simplicity of those Times in which civil Societies began; and it seems to me, that it is the posture of Affairs at present that our Author has his Mind fix'd upon too much. The World not being as yet very full of People; and Sensuality or Luxury not having as yet infinitely increas'd the Wants, or rather the Desires of Mankind; every one could easily get enough to satisfy himself, and nothing but the most excessive and unruly Malice in the World, could induce a Man to take away his Neighbour's Goods by force. Besides, tho' Ignorance and Rusticity are not, without Dispute, the Parent of Virtue and Regularity, nor were those of the golden Age, certainly, better than the People of the succeeding Ages (as Mr. LE CLERC has shewn us in his Comment upon Hesiod's Theogony, v. 211.) yet since they were not in those times Masters of any great Cunning; and the Rules and Stratagems of War, together with those destructive Instruments that make up what is wanting in the strength of the Body, and render the Wickedness of Mankind more bold and enterprising, were not yet found out, 'twas no difficult matter to secure themselves against Insults, especially by several joining together in a defensive Al-be more beneficial to Man, than Man himself; so nothing is able to work him greater Mischief; as Cicero shews at large in his second Book of Offices, cap. 5, &c. Now Man being infested with various Evils, has found out for each a proper Remedy. Sickness and Disease he prevents or removes by the Succours of Physick; Hunger, by tilling and manuring the Ground; against the Severities of Weather he is defended by Houses, Cloaths, and Fire; and by Weapons or Stratagems, against the Fury of wild Beasts. But for redress of those Evils, which Men, at the Suggestion of depraved Nature, delight to bring upon each other, they had recourse to themselves, as the surest Defence, by joining together in one Body, and erecting a civil Society ^a. And when they were once reduced to such Order, as to be secure from mutual Injury, they must of course enjoy a greater Share of those Benefits, which it was in their Power to confer upon each other ^a. And this Account is seconded by those who deduce the Original of Commonwealths from Fear. By which we are not to understand the violent Disorder of one in a Fright and Consternation; but only a wary Provision against future Evils. Of which Aristophanes ^b rightly observes, Ἡ ἐπιδόξου σώζει πάντα, Caution preserves all things. And by this Exposition of the word Fear we avoid all the Force of what is objected, that, had Men been really afraid of each other, they would have been so far from uniting together in a civil State, that they would not have endured each other's Sight, but one flying this way, and another that, would thereby have remain'd in a perpetual Separation. As if Fear implied in it nothing but Flight, and not also Diffidence, Suspicion, and Caution. Nay, this is one Property of being afraid, the providing against the probable Grounds of Fear. Thus, going to sleep we shut the Doors, for fear of Thieves; when they are shut, our Apprehension is over. We go armed in a Journey for fear of Robbers; and being well armed, fear no more. To which Purpose Thucydides ^c observes, that the Custom of wearing Swords, which was generally receiv'd in the barbarous Nations, continued likewise among some People of Greece, by the Necessity of antient Times; when as yet they had no Walls to defend them from Enemies abroad, and could not liance. It will, perhaps, be objected, that if People had not in those Days a great deal of Cunning in carrying on an Attack, neither had they more in making a Defence; and that therefore things were so far upon an equal Foot. But to me it seems, that generally speaking, to find out new Ways and Methods of attacking, requires infinitely more Art and Ingenuity than to defend ones self. There is such an Instrument, or such a Stratagem, against which it is easy enough to be provided; and which a Person that is but moderately prudent, will with the least Difficulty render the Design useless and ineffectual, and tho' the Contrivance of it cost a great deal of Labour; and tho' abundance of Care and a particular Dexterity be requir'd to manage it. In the first Ages, a Ditch, a strong Wall, some large Mastiff-Dogs were a Rampart and a Guard sufficient for a Man's Security. If we do but consider how long they were formerly in taking a Place, even after Battering-Rams and other Warlike Engines, often pretty well contriv'd, that the Antients made use of, were found out, tho the Fortifications were but very indifferent: If we do but observe, that even now-a-days, since the Invention of Artillery, the Besieg'd have much the Advantage of the Besiegers; I am certain we shall be oblig'd to conclude, that in the Simplicity of the first Ages, an Attack must be, without Comparison, more difficult than a Defence; and that therefore a Government had no such pressing Occasions to unite the Forces of several for their common Security. What we have to offer in this Matter is, That in proportion as Mankind increas'd, civil Societies were form'd by degrees for different Reasons, more or less imperfect according to the Times, and according to the Abilities of the Founders. Mr. TITIVS (as above, Numb. 6.) conjectures, and 'tis probable enough, that it was the Craftiness of some ambitious Mind, supported by Force, that gave Mankind the first Plan of Governments; and what I have observ'd with respect to Nimrod, seems to favour this Thought. Such a Body Politick being once form'd, several afterwards join'd themselves to it upon different Motives, others form'd new ones upon the same Model: When there were several of 'em instituted, those who had hitherto liv'd in a natural Independency, fearing to be insulted and oppress'd by these rising States, resolv'd also to form the like, and to choose themselves a Chief. At first these petty Kings were little more than for the determining of Disputes, and for the commanding of Armies. This appears by the History of the Judges, and of the first Kings of the Israelites, and by what HERODOTUS relates of Dejoces King of the Medes, Lib. 1. p. 26, 27. Ed. H. Steph. see also HESIOD THEOGON. vers. 85, &c. & Oper. & Dier. vers. 38, 39. And therefore it is that there were sometimes several Kings among one and the same People, as Mr. LE CLERC has not fail'd to remark and to prove from the Testimony of HOMER, who mentions several Kings of the Pheacians, Odyss. Lib. 8. vers. 40, 41. He also quotes a fine Passage of DIONYSIUS HALICARNASSEUS, from whence it appears, that the Abuse which Kings made of their Power, oblig'd People to establish Aristocratical or Democratical Government. Κατ' ἀρχὰς μὲν γὰρ ἅπαντα πόλεις Ἑλλάδος Ἰσπανίας, &c. "At first all the Cities of Greece were govern'd by Kings, but not arbitrarily as barbarous Nations were, but according "to the Laws and Customs of the Country; so that he was esteem'd as the best King, who was the most just and the strictest "Observer of the Laws, and who never departed from the Customs of the Country. This is what HOMER means, when "he styles Kings, Men that do Justice. The little Monarchies thus limited, subsisted a long time upon that Foot, as among "the Lacedemonians; but some Kings beginning to abuse their Power, and to govern by their Folly, rather than according to "the Laws; the generality of the Greeks would not endure it, and therefore abolish'd this form of Government." Antiq. Rom. Lib. 5. Cap. 74. Ed. Oxon. I will here add a Passage out of Isocrates, where this Orator having a design to compliment the Athenians, says, that he will go back to the time, ὅτ' ἐκ τῶν ἑστὶ δημοκρατίας, ἔτ' ἀριστοκρατίας ἔτι καὶ πολιτείας. Ἀλλὰ μὲν πολιτεία καὶ τὰ γὰρ τῶν βαρβάρων καὶ τοῖς πόλιν Ἑλληνίδας ἀπ᾽ αὐτῶν διέκρινε. "When the Name of neither Democracy nor Aristocracy "was in Being; but Anarchy was the only Government both among barbarous Nations, and among all the States of Greece." Panathenaic, p. 443, 444. Ed. Paris. min. See also the Commentators on the beginning of JUSTIN'S Universal History; and what is farther said, in Chap. 5. Sect. 4. of this Book; Mr. LOCKE has likewise treated of the Origin of civil Societies in his second Treatise of civil Government, Chap. 7, &c.

^a The Remainder of this Section is taken from our Author's Abridg. de Offic. Hom. & Civ. l. 2. c. 5. f. 7.

^a The Persians took the true way of demonstrating this; who had a Custom, upon the Death of their King, to live the five ensuing Days without any Law; to the end, That finding, by Experience, the miserable Effects of Anarchy, the Slaughter, the Rapine, and if there be any thing worse, that accompanied such a Condition, they might be engaged in a firmer Allegiance to their Sovereign for the future. Sext. Empir. adv. Mathem. l. 2. p. 70. Ed. Genev. To the same purpose may be applied some of the Reasons, which according to the Account of Herodotus, B. 1. induc'd the Medes, living before in independent Villages, to invest Dejoces with the regal Authority over them.

^c L. 1.

^b In Acibus, p. 532. Ed. Lug. Bat.

met together without some Fears and Jealousies at home. Remarkable likewise is that Speech of Pyrrhus to the Athenians, recorded by Plutarch in his Life; when being permitted to enter the City, and offer Sacrifice to Minerva, upon his returning thence, he said, "That for his part, he retain'd a grateful Sense of their Kindness, and the Confidence they reposed in him; but advis'd them, not to open their Gates, if they were wise, to any King for the future. Civil Communities, even in the times of profoundest Peace, do yet fortify their Towns, guard their Frontiers with Troops, and fill their Granaries with warlike Stores; all which would be an unnecessary Expence, did not they apprehend some Danger from their Neighbours: of whom, after these Precautions, they are no longer afraid. So that 'tis the natural effect of Fear, to find out Remedies against it self. And, in like manner, because Men were afraid of each other, they supplied each other with Relief, by joining in a civil State. Of the Force and Efficacy of which those Authors seem to have a deep Sense, who affirm, that, In Case there were no Courts of Justice in the World, Men would destroy and devour each other^a. And indeed, that Men have abundant reason to apprehend and fence against mutual Danger, we have in another place^{b c} fully made out: Which is no less true for what Hornius objects, That the Fathers of Families for many Ages lived together on Terms of Equality, without the fear of any such pretended Invasion on their Rights: and that Ambition was but of late growth amongst Men; coming in after the Institution of Commonwealths, and then giving occasion to the Distinctions of Honour and Dignity. As if it were not Ambition, which occasioned the first Murther in the World; when Cain was enraged, that his Brother's Offering should find more Acceptance with God, than his own^d! Besides, Ambition is but one Root of those Evils, which spring in like manner from Perverseness of Temper, and Competition of Desires. Of which, even in those plain and primitive Ages, the former produced that savage and brutish Fierceness in the Race of the Giants; the latter occasioned Strife and Dissension betwixt the nearest Relations^e. In the Breasts of Kings, Ambition, 'tis true, reigns with greater Violence, and transports them to Actions more bloody and cruel; yet we may trace some Footsteps of the same Passion in Shepherds and Rusticks^f. Hornius proceeds to observe, That, in those early times, to provoke others with Words or Blows, would have proclaim'd a Man's Folly as well as his Malice: because this would have given a Right to the Party thus provoked, to take the first Opportunity of killing him. Again, there could be no hopes of Booty amongst People as yet unacquainted with Wealth, and possessing no other Stores but those of Fruits, plenty of which was to be had in other places, with little Pains, and no Danger. As if the Prospect but of moderate Gains were not, with bad Men, Temptation enough to do wickedly! Or as if Thefts and Robberies were not as common of Old, as they are at this Day, amongst People living wholly on Grasing and Tillage! Not to say, that the Occasion of founding Commonwealths was not only to protect Men from Robberies, but also from any Injuries, which they might be capable of offering or receiving. What he afterwards affirms is very true, that, Let the Suspicions of another's mischievous Design be never so well grounded, this will not justify an Attempt upon him, by way of Prevention. And that Right and Power of all over all, with which Mr. Hobbes invests Mankind in his State of Nature, ought to be extended no farther than right Reason allows of; amounting only to this Sense, that Man, in a State of natural Liberty, has a Right to imploy against all Persons, all such means for his Preservation, as Reason judges necessary for him to use, and dangerous to let alone. Wherefore to carry our Caution farther than right Reason shall prescribe, is doubtless a Breach of the Law of Nature. So that he, who on any uncertain Fears kills the Person he is afraid of, when he might as conveniently have escaped from him, must be adjudged guilty by the said Law. Whence they appear to be certainly in the wrong, who imagine that this Principle justifies Rapines and Robberies, upon such as are not open and profess'd Enemies. For Robbery and Rapine plainly denote such Means, as sound Reason can never judge necessary to a Man's Preservation, but such as are rather made use of to serve the Ends of Avarice and Cruelty: it being never alledg'd in Plea for Robbers, that they spoil Men of their Goods in their own Defence. That other Expression seems very ridiculous; Supposing Hatred and Diffidence to have reign'd never so much amongst Men, yet this could never be said to have happen'd purely for the sake of Commonwealths: for Men did not therefore hate or distrust one another, purposely that they might constitute a civil State; but they therefore constituted a civil State, because they distrusted or hated one another. And tho' we should allow, as fully as can be desired, that while the Hatred of one Person extended only to some few, who were disagreeable to him, he might at the same time love and favour all others, or at least not be enraged against them; yet if each Man had but his single Foe, this alone were enough to fill the World with Hatred and Dissension. 'Tis therefore a vain Attempt to ascribe the Original of Communities to the Accidents of Neighbourhood, and the natural Increase of Mankind by Generation. This last indeed affords a constant Supply, whence civil Bodies are stock'd and maintain'd: in like manner, the former might perhaps give Occasion for Neighbours to join themselves to the same Community, rather than to divide. But the Cause which first moved Men to esta-

^a Comp. Hobbes de Corp. l. 1. f. 2.

^b B. 2. c. 2. f. 6, 12.

^c V. Græc. l. 1. c. 4. f. 4. n. 2.

^d Gen. iv. 4, &c.

^e See Gen. xiii. 7. xxvi. 15, 20, 21.

^f Jud. viii. 12. 3. 25, &c.

^f Jos. 7. Theoric. Idell. 5. &c.

bliss Societies, is by no means deducible from these Grounds.

VIII. Nor has any One reason to imagine, that a bare Reverence of the Law of Nature, which prohibits indifferently all sorts of Injuries, could ever have been able to secure the whole Body of Mankind (as consider'd in a State of natural Independency) from mutual Prejudice. Some there are (it must be confess'd) with whom Honour, Justice, Faith, and Innocence are so much in esteem, that they would not violate these Rules, tho' sure of Impunity. Many also may be well represented by that Character which we find in Aristotle^a: *Who refrain from Injury upon a Principle of Fear (it being difficult to wrong others, without being likewise wrong'd by others) and who are therefore unwilling either to do wrong, or to receive it*¹. Now, were all Men of this Temper, the Establishment of civil Communities might not appear so very necessary a Work. But, on the contrary, what Numbers are there, who make light of breaking through the most sacred Ties of Duty, whenever invited to injure others by the Prospect of some Gain to themselves, and the Hopes of escaping, by Force or Fraud, from the Hands of the injured Parties? Not to distrust such Men as these, would be voluntarily to expose our selves to their Wickedness and Insolence. Parum tata per se ipsa prohibita est, says Sallust^b, Unguarded Honesty is but an undefensible Hold. But as it is the part of Prudence to keep a watchful Eye on bad Men, and to make an early Provision against their Attempts; so is that Assertion of Mr. Hobbes^c unreasonably harsh, wherein he affirms, That the Hope of any Man's Security and Preservation consists in his being able, by his own Strength and Cunning, either openly or secretly to be beforehand with his Neighbour in Mischief. Indeed the generality of Men are so far corrupted, that wheresoever there is appearance of greater Advantage from the Transgression of Laws, than from the Observation of them, they make no Scruple to transgress them: According to that of Plato^d; Whoever conceives it in his Power to do unjustly, readily does so: each Person concluding Injustice to make much more for his private Interest, than Justice could do. Yet to reproach all Mankind with this perverse Disposition, is carrying the Point and the Censure too far. Nay, by the Confession of Mr. Hobbes himself^e, some modest Natures there are in the World, that do not assume to themselves more than they leave to others; always having their Eye on that Rule, To do as they would be done by. How any one, upon Pretence of providing for his own Security, could rush upon the Oppression and Ruine of such innocent and excellent Persons, I must, for my part, own my self at a loss to understand. Nor can it ever be, that right Reason should warrant my going to kill or oppress another, of whose Designs to do me hurt I have not had very particular Indications: there being, till then, many better ways left open of composing Matters amicably. For, as to that Pravity of Nature and Disposition, which is common to the whole Race of Men, and which therefore admits of various Degrees, we cannot, on the account of it alone, conclude a Man an open and profess'd Enemy. 'Tis own'd therefore, that as to the Discharge of natural Duties from others to me, I cannot have it, in a State of Nature, so well secured, as under civil Government: yet neither is it left in so miserable an Uncertainty, as that hereby I must be obliged, or may be permitted, to treat all Men in a hostile Manner. For, while I find my own Strength to be equal or superior to another Man's, and while that Man, by Word or Deed, testifies a Desire of living peaceably with me, and by real Proofs confirms the Truth and Sincerity of that Desire; what reason have I to account him my Enemy? or how can the bare Suspicion, that all this Friendship is but Counterfeit; or that in time he may come to alter his Mind, give me Authority to assault him by way of Prevention? And the Truth of this will appear more evidently, if we look upon the Practice of entire and independent States and Governments, which are, with regard to each other, in a State of Nature. Here all Men agree in judging it a Crime for one Nation, by secret Stratagem or open Force, to attack another (as yet not known by any Exchange of good or bad Offices, nor engaged in Friendship and Alliance by Covenant or overt Act) only because there is no common Power presiding over both, by which the other State, if attempting any injurious Designs, might be restrain'd and punish'd. Which clearly proves against Mr. Hobbes^f, that the Law of Nature is not altogether dumb even in a State of Nature: tho' indeed there is much greater Security of having this Law obey'd, under civil Government; where the Power of the Magistrate is at hand, to compel those who are wanting in returns of Kindness and Peace. But, notwithstanding all this, thus much Prudence suggests to us, that we should not only provide, by a timely Defence, against the open and profess'd Malice of wicked Men; but that we should likewise esteem the Goodness of others, not infallible and immutable. And to answer all these Ends, no such universal Safeguard, as civil Society, could be invented or conceiv'd.

IX. Moreover, altho' the Law of Nature direct us, in case any Difference arise, to adjust it amicably amongst our selves, or refer it to the Arbitration of others; yet neither thus would the common Peace be sufficiently secured. For with the same Ease, that we dispensed with our selves in breaking the other natural Rules, we might also slight this of appealing to Arbitrators, and so have immediate recourse to Arms. Besides, supposing two Men had by Consent refer'd their Differences to a third

MR. BARB. NOTES on § VIII.

^a This Passage is not to the purpose, respecting only Covenantness: Our Author has express'd himself more to the point, in his Argument De Officio Hom. & Civ. l. 2. c. 5. f. 8.

^b At. Nicomach. l. 3. c. 3. p. 46. C. Et. Pass.

^c Alberhal in Bell. Jugurth. c. 14.

^d De Civ. c. 5. f. 1.

^e De R. p. l. 2. p. 593. Lib. II. c.

^f De Civ. c. 3. f. 27.

^g De Civ. c. 5. f. 2.

Person; yet were either of the Parties dissatisfied with the Decision, it were no hard Matter for him to renounce and reject it; in case he found his own Strength sufficient to shelter him from human Punishment: especially since the Arbitrator is not endued with any Authority and Command, by Virtue of which he might oblige the Parties to stand to his Sentence. Therefore, in a State of natural Liberty, Prudence will advise us, that we rely not too much on the bare Faith of others; but that we believe the Observation of all Compacts to be then best ascertain'd, when either they are grounded on the mutual Advantage of the Parties, or when 'tis in our Power to force those with whom we treat, to be just and honest. But where Perfidiousness is encouraged by Hopes of Profit, and not restrain'd by Fear or Punishment, there it were Madnes to think, that bare Covenants should be able to warrant our Safety. This appears from the Practice of all Nations; who when they break off their Alliance with one State, strengthen themselves with the Friendship of another: by which Act they do not presently condemn themselves of Treachery, in thus seeking for Protection to the Faith of others; but, in as much as Communities are chiefly guided by Interest, in fixing their Alliances, they do but substitute an advantageous League in the room of one which was either unprofitable, or dangerous. And 'tis under these Restrictions and Mitigations only, that we can any ways admit of Mr. Hobbes's Position, that Covenants are made upon mutual Faith, in a State of Nature, and are not binding. For tho' it be plausibly enough said by Locke, that all Men are ambitious of being credited; and that, to repose Faith in them, is with us to put a Tye upon their Fidelity; yet 'tis the first Course, in a State of Nature, to think upon that vulgar Saying;

Πῆρρα χρέματ' ἔλασσα, ἀπιστή δ' ἐσάωσα,
Theogn. ver. 830.

Undone by Trust; and by Distrust preserv'd.

X. Again, there is another reason why the Law of Nature cannot be able, of it self, to ensure the Peace of Mankind. For this is the Case of natural Liberty, that each Man, as he places his Defence and Safety in his own proper Strength; so as to the means of obtaining that End, and the whole Management of his Actions, he purely consults and follows his own private Judgment. And what a wide Difference there is between Men in this respect, no one can be so ignorant, as not to have made part of his Observation. Few there are of so happy and noble a Temper, as to have, at the same time, that piercing Sagacity, which may discern what is for the lasting Advantage of all Men in general, and of each in particular; and that Strength and Firmness of Soul, which may constantly pursue what has been prudently foreseen. The greater Number are, on account of their natural Dulness, imposed upon by gross Error, in the likeness of Reason. Others are hurried by the Violence of their Passions, wheresoever the Gratifications of Lust, or the false Appearance of Advantage shall draw them. Now in so endless a Diversity of Opinions and Desires, what Hopes can there be of Peace and Agreement: whilst every Fool is as strongly conceited of his own way, as the wisest Man is convinced of his; and the former will no more submit to the latter, than the latter will condescend to be instructed by the former? Since therefore Reason alone, according to the Tenor which we find it to hold in particular Persons, is insufficient to compose these Differences in Judgment; other Means are to be used, by which an agreeable Union and Harmony of Mind may, in some Degree, be obtain'd.

XI. In fine: altho' it be evident to all Men that by breaking the Law of Nature they exceedingly obstruct their own Happiness (the Promotion of which depends on the Assistance of others) and bring many grievous Evils and Dangers on themselves; tho' Nature has wisely imprinted it on the Minds and Consciences of Men, that such as act contrary to the Laws of Nature, by lightly invading and harming their Neighbours, shall not, in the last Event, be unpunish'd: lastly, tho' the Benefits that would redound to them from their observing natural Precepts, and the Evils which they incur by transgressing them, are a manifest Argument, that it is better for Men to live kindly and sociably, than otherwise: yet would not all this be enough to procure the settled Peace of Mankind. And that, because the Multitude act not by rational Motives, but by wild Impulse, mistaking Passion for Reason; chiefly thro' the Fault of Custom or Education, which stifles and suppresses the Force of inward Reflection. As also, because the greatest Part of Mankind are wholly intent upon the present, without any Care or Thought of the future; and are commonly moved by those Objects which thrust themselves upon their Senses, while those of a higher and nobler Nature are too refined for their Affections, and too remote for their Desires. Whence it comes to pass, that the dread of human Punishment is with too many more prevalent, than that of MR. BARR'S NOTES on § X.

¹ Mr. BRUYERE in his Character of Man, has this, "If a Man ask why the whole World does not make one single Nation, nor speak the same Language, nor live under the same Laws, nor agree in the same Usages and Worship? I answer, that, considering the variety of Mens Humours, the difference of their Talents, and the contrariety of their Judgments, 'tis strange that even seven or eight Persons can live amicably under the same Roof, within the same Compass, and compute one single Family."

² The latter part of this Period is taken out of our Author's Abridgment, De Officio Hom. & Civ. B. 2. c. 5. l. 8.

^a De Civ. c. 2. l. 11. ^b L. XXII. 22. ^c Claudian. D. IV. Consulat. Honor. 7. 104.

*Exstruite immanes jaspales, attollite turres,
Cingite vos fluviiis, castris opponite sylva:
Non debitis muram fieri.....*

Heap Rocks and Towers the vast Alient to win;
Let Floods surround, or Forests hem you in;
All Nature is too weak a Fence for Sin.

divine

divine Vengeance; which yet ought to hold the sovereign Place in our Fears. Because, the Justice of Providence is for the most part slow, and the Methods of it secret and retired ^a: Which, with bad Men, is an Argument, that the Calamities, which sometimes attend Impiety, arise from other Causes ^b; especially, when they find, that the worst amongst them often abound in those things, which the vulgar take for the Measure and Standard of Happiness, while the good are oppress'd with many Afflictions, sufficient to persuade the Wicked and Foolish, that Virtue has little Power, unless in making Men miserable. Thus Plutarch ^c observes: When Judgment is immediately executed on a Crime, it stops those Men in the Course of their Wickedness, whom Success would have encouraged to proceed. For nothing does so much enfeeble the Hopes, and deject the Mind of the oppressed, as the Respite and Delay of divine Vengeance; and nothing more increases the Cruelty and Insolence of their Oppressors. And with this very Prospect it is, that the Wicked encourage and hearten themselves in Villany; that the Fruit of their Crimes they shall receive in Hand, but the Punishment in Reversion, and at a great Distance from Enjoyment. It may farther be added, that the Stings of Conscience, preceding a villainous Act, are not so fierce and raging as those which follow after, when what is once done, we find past our Skill to undo ^d; and that the Voice of Reason, which could not be heard in the hurry and tumult of our Passions, when these once begin to cool and settle, will sound most forcibly in our Breast ^e. In like manner, says the wise Author but now cited ^f, as Malefactors, when led to Execution, carry each their Cross; so does Sin, out of every Offence, frame its own Torments: that most ingenious Artist of a miserable Life! such as is not only confounded with Shame, but distracted with Horrors, Convulsions, Remorse, and all the Tumults of a troubled Mind. But because these inward Torments make no Impression on Sense, they have so much the less Efficacy towards restraining the growth of Wickedness in others. Mr. Hobbes ^g is in the right, when he tells us, that Scarce any human Action can be assign'd, which is not the beginning of so long a Chain of Consequences, as our foresight seldom reaches to the end of. The pleasant and painful Accidents of Life are so firmly link'd together, that he who receives the Pleasure, is at the same time oblig'd (whether he apprehends it, or not) to accept of the attending Pain. Thus the abuse of Power is punish'd by the Power and Violence of others; Intemperance, by Diseases, &c. and these are what I call natural Punishments. Yet the generality of Men, either through defect of Judgment, or vehemence of Passion, are commonly hindred from giving these Considerations due weight. Wherefore there remain'd no way of laying so powerful a Restraint on human Corruption, as what is now afford'd, since the Institution of civil States. Plutarch ^h seems to have forgotten himself, when he censures Colotes for the following Assertion: They who first regulated Life, compos'd Laws, set up Governments, and Magistrates over Cities, and enforced Obedience to their Directions, were certainly the Persons who deliver'd us from Trouble and Tumult, and establish'd Peace and Safety in the World. Take away these Engagements; and we should live like wild Beasts, and hardly forbear to devour the next we meet. For that grave Writer, who reprehends this way of speaking, could have no very deep Insight into human Nature and Disposition, if he imagin'd, that, upon reversing the Laws of all civil Communities, the Honour and Safety of Mankind could be preserv'd by the wise Rules of Parmenides, Socrates, Plato, or Heraclitus. And, tho' we should never so freely subscribe to Aristippus's Boast ⁱ, who, when ask'd, What Advantage Philosophers had above other Men? replied, Were there a general Repeal of all Laws, we should continue to live as regularly and peaceably as we do at present; yet, what would become of the far greater Number; who, if left to themselves would satisfy Lust and Passion the best Reason and Philosophy? Rather therefore, let this be the final Decision of the Case; Qui ratione traduci ad meliora non possunt, metu contineamur ^k: 'Tis fit, that they whom Reason cannot persuade to do better, Fear should restrain from doing worse.

^a 'Tis an Observation of Cæsar, that Divine Providence, to strike Men with a deeper Sense of Affliction, by a sudden Change from prosperous Affairs, sometimes grants to those, whom it intends exemplarily to punish for their Wickedness, the more fortunate Success, and the longer Enjoyment of Impunity, De B. G. l. 1. c. 14. n. 5.

^c De Sera Numinis Vindicta, p. 548. D. E. ^d Curtius VIII. 2. Nature seems unkind in leaving Men under this great Weakness and Disadvantage, that generally they consider things less before they do them, than after they have done them.

^e Plutarch De Ser. Num. Vindict. p. 555. E. When a Man, out of Avarice, Envy, Ambition, or sensual Delight, has committed some heinous Wickedness, and after the violent Thirst of his Desire is cool'd and appeas'd, takes time to reflect, that what he propos'd of Profit, Convenience, or Satisfaction in any kind, has left him utterly disappointed, while the base Impressions and horrid Tyranny of Sin remain in full Force; must necessarily be brought to this Persuasion, that when for the sake of empty Glory, or unworthy Pleasure, he broke through the most sacred, most beautiful and excellent Rules of Mankind, he at the same time, fill'd his miserable Life with Shame and Disquiet.

^h Against Colotes, p. 1124. D.

ⁱ In Helych. De Vir. Illust.

^k Quintil. Inst. Orat. l. 12. c. 7.

C H A P. II.

Of the inward Structure and Constitution of civil States.

- | | |
|--|---|
| I. Men only are a sufficient Defence against the Wickedness of Men. II. To this End it is necessary that many should join together. III. Those who join in this manner ought to agree in their Resolutions. IV. The Difference between the Politics of Bees and Men. V. An Union of Wills and of Strength necessary to a civil State. VI. This Union produced by intervening Covenants. VII. The first Covenant, with the Decree following upon it. VIII. The second Covenant, giving the final Perfection to a civil Establishment. IX. The Reason for which Hobbes will acknowledge but one Covenant. X. This Reason insufficient. | XI. XII. Hobbes's Arguments answer'd. XIII. A civil State, how defined. XIV. In a Monarch, the Will of the Prince is the Will of the State. XV. Under other Forms of Government, according to the regular Course, the Community is concluded by the Votes of the major Part. XVI. This Rule admits of a Limitation. XVII. Of Equality of Votes. XVIII. Of joining or dividing Suffrages. XIX. How many Persons at least are requisite to a ruling Council. XX. Civis, or a Member of the civil State, who may properly be so term'd. XXI. Subordinate Bodies, of how many kinds, XXII. Invested with what Rights and Privileges. XXIII. Of unlawful Bodies, and Factions. XXIV. The peculiar Duties incumbent on the Members of civil States. |
|--|---|

IT follows now, that we enquire more exactly into the inward Structure and Constitution of civil States. That Men therefore might render themselves secure against the Wickedness of others, so far as the Condition of their Nature will admit, no other Expedient could have been invented but this, that each Person should provide a sufficient Guard about him; by means of which the Designs of others might appear so dangerous in the Execution, that they would think it their safest Course, rather to refrain than to engage, rather to keep the Peace, than to be the Challengers and Aggressors in a War. For the malicious Inclinations of Men, and their ready Disposition to their Neighbour's Hurt, cannot any way be more effectually kept under, than by setting before their Eyes some present Danger, which must certainly fall on him that shall dare to assault another; and by taking away all Hope and Prospect of Impunity. Now such a Defence or Assistance as this, can by no means be afforded by any fortified Place, whether it derives its Strength from Nature, or from Art: For to lie thus continually in Hold, is to be a perpetual Prisoner; nor would it be easy for a single Man to defend his Post. But if he let in others to help him, there will be a Danger from them likewise, and he will stand in need of a new Protection. Some kind of Aid might indeed be expected from Arms; but not to such a Degree, as that one Person alone should be able to promise himself any long Security from hence, against numerous Oppressors. So too, the Defence which might be made by brute Creatures, is very slender and uncertain, and by no means capable of shielding us from Dangers of this Nature. For tho' we meet with a Story of two Dogs, that perform'd military Service against the Americans^a; and tho' the Emperor of Ceylon, in his royal City of Candy, is reported to have a Life-Guard, as it were, of an hundred Elephants, which go their rounds upon the nightly Watch, and are the publick Executioners of Criminals: Yet many Men must join in teaching and training them, e'er they can be made fit for these Employments. It remains therefore, that against the Dangers which might be apprehended from Men, Men alone could afford an agreeable Remedy, by joining their Forces together, by interweaving their Interests and Safety, and by forming a general Confederacy for their mutual Succour^b.

II. But it is manifest, that the joining together of two or three, or a few Persons, must necessarily prove insufficient for this Defence; because, then, the least Addition, on the side of the Invaders would turn the Scales, and carry them on to certain Victory; and therefore would encourage and embolden them to begin the Assault, by promising not only Impunity, but Success. So that to obtain the Security of which we are now in search, it is requisite, that the Number of the Confederates be so great, as that the Advantage of a small odds, on the Enemy's side, shall not visibly determine the Issue of the War; and consequently, that this League and Union be made by a considerable Multitude. Hence Plato^c demands such a Number of Subjects in his Commonwealth, as shall be able to repel their Neighbours, when they prove Injurious, and to succour them, when they are oppress'd. From what has been offer'd this

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on Chap. II. § I.

^a See MONTAIGN'S Essays, B. 2. c. 12. p. 336. See also an account of the Island of Ceylon, by Robert Knox. Book II. Chap. I. to which may be added, that according to STRABO, the ancient Gauls, in their Wars, made use of Engl'ish Dogs, as well as those of their own Country. Geogr. Lib. 4. p. 305. Ed. Amst. see other Examples in Pliny, Hist. Nat. lib. 8. cap. 40. Poliæn. Stratag. Lib. 4. cap. 2. sect. 16. Lib. 7. cap. 2. sect. 1. Ælian. Hist. Animal. Lib. 7. cap. 38. Pollux Lib. 5. c. 47. Ed. Amst. Spartan. in vit. Caracall. cap. 6.

^a Gomara, Hist. Gener. Ind. Occid. 44, & 65.

^b Comp. Hobbes De Cive, c. 6.

^c De Leg. l. 5. p. 845.

this farther Remark may be drawn, that the just Measure of any State ought to be taken from the Proportion it bears to the Strength of those about it. And therefore those Communities, which were heretofore look'd on as sufficiently large, when Mankind was divided into a prodigious variety of distinct Governments, are too little since the forming of mighty Empires. For, as Pliny observes^a, Bodies, however high and towering, sensibly diminish, when set in Comparison with those that overtop them.

III. To proceed: 'Tis no less necessary, that the Multitude united on this account, do agree about applying the means for the Attainment of the desired End. For otherwise, how numerous soever they may be, yet if they consent not in using the best Methods for effecting the common Security, but resolve to manage each his own Strength according to his own Fancy, the Design will come to nothing: Because, being divided in Opinions, and moving contrary ways, they will not help, but hinder one another. Or, to suppose the best, if they should once happen to agree well enough about the Undertaking of a single Action, either upon sudden Impulse, or upon Counsel and Deliberation, led on by the Hope of Victory, of Booty, or of Revenge (as may sometimes be observed, in the mad Disorders of popular Tumults^b) yet afterwards, either by the Difference of their Tempers and Judgments, or by that Envy and Emulation, which is natural to most Men, or through Lightness and Inconstancy, they will be so torn asunder, as that, for the future, they will have no manner of Inclination, either to afford their mutual Succour, or so much as to keep the Peace amongst themselves^c. And consequently these united Bodies, which are form'd of a great Number of Persons, are of all the most unlikely to hold for any long time; unless they are kept together by some general Fear, restraining them from quitting a Resolution at their Pleasure, which they have once by Agreement taken up. Whence it follows, that the bare Consent of a Multitude, tho' confirm'd by Covenant, cannot give us that Security, which we now seek after; or, that 'tis not enough, for many Persons to enter into a Confederacy of mutual Assistance, and to promise on both sides, that they will direct their Strength, and all their Actions towards this End, and towards the common Good. But 'tis still necessary, that some farther Tye be laid upon them, that they who have once consented, for their general Benefit, to be peaceful and helpful to each other, may be hindred, by some Fear, from drawing back and disagreeing, when they find their private Advantage clashing with the publick.

IV. For the Illustration of this Point, Hobbes examines strictly the Nature of some inferior Animals, which after a sort do appear likewise to maintain Society among themselves; of which kind, the most remarkable are the Ants and the Bees². For these Creatures, tho' void of Reason, by which they might engage in Compact, and submit to Government; yet by joining Consent, that is, by desiring and declining all the very same things, do so direct their Actions towards the common Good, as that their petit Confederacies are liable to no Differences or Dissentions. Why it should happen otherwise with Mankind, and why a considerable Multitude should not be able to live amicably together for any time, without the Restraint of civil Authority, is a Question not unworthy our Debate. The Reason then, for which the wise Appointment of Nature hath join'd these little Creatures, rather than others, in publick Bodies, seems to be this; that they continue all the Winter, and are still nourish'd after their ordinary manner, whereas most other Insects, during that Season, either perish, or are preserv'd without any external supply of Food. Now these Winter-Stores may be much more conveniently brought together and laid up, if many join their Service, than if each labours apart from all the rest. Whence 'tis evident, that the Communities form'd by these Creatures have a quite different End from that of human and political Societies; tho' we may discover in them some resemblance of a Communion of Goods, whilst they labour all for the same general Stock, and afterwards do all receive their Maintenance from it. Hobbes offers this farther reason of the difference, that all the Government of these Animals is nothing but an universal Consent, or, many Wills directed to the same Object, not one arbitrary Will, as in civil States: he means, that each of them, in particular, conspires with the rest to work together, and to treasure up their Provision in the same Heap; and that all their Wills are not reduced into one sovereign Will, as in politick Bodies; so that what a single Ruler, or a governing Council determine, should pass for the Will of all in general. The main Causes why, in these Creatures, which live by the guidance of no superior Faculty than Appetite and Sense, the bare agreement of Inclinations should be so lasting, and so effectual, as to stand in need of no other Assistance, seems to be these that follow: 1. Men are continually in competition for Honour and Dignity, whereas these Creatures are not: And consequently, that Envy, Hatred, and Emulation, which flows from this Spring amongst the former, is not to be discover'd amongst the latter. 2. The natural Appetite of the Bees, and that Faculty, which we may call the Judgment of their Senses, are exactly uniform, and are carried on toward the publick Good, which in them differs not from the private. Whatever is not good for the Hive (as Antoninus^d observes) is not good for the Bee. To see their Hives full and flourishing, is their whole Wish and Desire. But amongst Men, So many Heads, so many Wits: and scarce any thing is look'd on as truly Good, which doth not afford the Possessor somewhat singular and extraordinary above his Neighbours. 3. Creatures, which have not the use of Reason, neither see nor fancy that they see any

^a Peregrin. c. 61. n. 2.

^b Vid. Tacit. Annal. I. c. 32.

Vices of the Athenian Commonwealth, l. 6. c. 45.

^c L. 6. f. 54.

^d Compare the Discourse of Polybius, on the

¹ De Cives, c. 5. f. 5.

² V. Virgil. Georg. 4.

any Defect in the Administration of their common Societies^a; in as much as they erected them not with the Guidance of Judgment, but by the bare Instinct of Nature, and have not the Art of comparing them with others. Again, not one of the Bees ever entertains a Design of forming her Comb in any other, than the common hexangular Figure; whereas, in human Politicks, there are very many, who, thinking themselves wiser than their Fellows, are disgusted with the present Condition, and are for introducing a Change in the Government. And according to the Difference of Judgments, several of those Projectors are for setting up several Models, or for reforming things each in his own way, the Consequence of which must be the Distraction of the State, and, in the Issue, a civil War. 4. These Creatures, tho' they have some Use of Voice, in making known to one another their Desires, at least, when their Affections are more warmly rais'd; yet they want that Art of disguising things in the false Colours of Speech, which is necessarily required to the disturbing the Minds and Passions of Society: This being the Instrument, by which what is Good is represented, either under a greater or a less Degree of Goodness, than it really hath; and what is Evil is in the same manner, either aggravated, or extenuated; or, perhaps both are painted with a quite different Face from what they truly bear. But now, the Tongue of Man is often us'd for a kind of Trumpet of War and Sedition; which is able, not only to propose false Rules of living and of acting, but also, with fair Glosses and much insinuating Language, to recommend them to Others, and thereby to render their Minds utterly averse to the Genius of a peaceful and social Life. On which account it was not without Justice said by the Comedian^b, of the eloquent Pericles, that he thunder'd and lighten'd, and confounded all Greece. 5. Irrational Creatures cannot distinguish between Contumely, or Contempt, and real Damage; or rather, they have no Sense at all of Contempt. Therefore, whilst they find the Necessities of their own Bodies supplied, they commence no Quarrel with their Fellows. But of Men, those are the greatest Disturbers of the Commonwealth, who enjoy the greatest Opportunity of being easy. Nor do they engage in Contentions about their Honour or their Reputation, till after they have gain'd an absolute Victory over the Force of Hunger, or the Injuries of Weather. Lastly, the Agreement of these Creatures is natural; but that of Men only federal; that is, artificial, or rather moral; held together by no other than moral Ties, which do not in the least extinguish the natural Difference of Mens Inclinations, the Roughness of their Tempers, and the Power which they have of taking quite contrary Measures. To all which we may add this further Consideration, that in the Kingdom of the Bees there is no sovereign Authority properly so call'd (tho' this be the very Life and Soul of a Community) for which reason their Monarch is not arm'd with a Sting. And therefore 'tis the greater Miracle of Nature, that —Rege incolumi, mens omnibus una;

Amisso, rupe're fidem.—

Their Prince secure, one common Mind they bear;
But, him once lost, with wild Distraction jar^c.

Yet here it ought to be well observ'd, that the Comparison, thus pursued, between the two Multitudes, one of Men, the other of Bees, hath been alledg'd to no other End, but to shew why, in a great Body of Men, destitute of the Advantages of civil Government, no long Agreement or good Understanding can reasonably be expected. But we would by no means be thought to insinuate, as if these Inclinations, in which the Seeds of Discord are contain'd, were found to be of equal Force and Efficacy in each particular Man; or, as if sound Reason did not, from the bare Consideration of human Nature, suggest such Arguments, as must engage and command Men, rather than any other Animals, to follow Concord and mutual Kindness. And therefore our Design in this Matter is not in the least thwarted by a learned Author^d, who hath undertaken to retort these six Reasons of Mr. Hobbes, by shewing, that as Man naturally loves Honour, so Honour is the natural Result of good Actions; that he more perfectly understands the Force of the publick Good, in securing his own private Interest; that he enjoys the Gift of Reason, which equally disposeth him, as his Lot shall fall, to govern or to obey; that he hath the Art of enlivening and adorning his rational Faculty, by setting an Edge and a Grace upon it, with the most proper Expressions; that he apprehends himself to be under the Guidance of a Law, by the Power of which he distinguisheth a down-right Injury, from a Damage offer'd without Injury; lastly, that Agreements made amongst Men are not only strengthen'd and confirm'd by Nature for a long Continuance, but do likewise receive from Art, as the Assistance of Nature, many Defences against less uncertain Dangers, and, by means of Writing, a Duration beyond the Age of Man. The Argument doth not at all affect us, unless it could make out, that a numerous Body of Men, united under no common Government, might not be disturb'd by a very few: As likewise, that all Men are judicious and wise, and do, after the clearest manner, apprehend the Dictates of sober Reason, and have utterly disabled all their evil Affections and Desires. He certainly erects a civil State upon no better than a ruinous Bottom, who makes too large Allowances to the Modesty and Ingenuity of Man-

^a The Government among such Creatures is but pretended and Chimerical. See Alzernoon Sidney's Discourse of Government, c. 2. f. 8.

^b Arjtoph. Achain. ver. 350. Plin. L. 1. Ep. 20. n. 17, &c. Ed. Cellar.

^c Tho'

by a kind of Miracle in Nature, the whole Hive disperse themselves, as soon as their King leaves them. V. S. nec. De Clementia, L. 1. c. 4, & 19.

^d V. Virgil. Georg. L. 4. v. 212, &c. Add. Xenophon. Cropad. l. V. c. 11.

^e Bp. Cumberland de L. N. c. 2. f. 22.

kind; and measures the Integrity of others, especially of the lowest Rabble, by his own.

V. But what that is which we may depend upon, as sufficient for the long keeping together the Consents and Inclinations of an united Multitude, will easily appear to one that throughly examines the common Bent and Genius of Mankind. Now in this there are two Vices to be discover'd, which especially hinder any Number of Persons from long continuing in the same general Design. One is, the great Variety of Inclinations and Judgments, about discerning what is most expedient for the common End: To which there is join'd, in many Men, a Dullness of apprehending which, of several Means propos'd, is more advantageous than the rest; as likewise, the obstinate Stubbornness in defending what they have once, right or wrong, happened to embrace. The other general Vice is a sluggish Coldness in Business, and an Aversion to doing willingly what we know to be for our Interest; when we are under no necessary Force, which might drive us on, if we hung back, and oblige us, whether we will or no, to the Performance of our Duty. The former of these Evils may be remedied, by uniting in a perpetual Bond the Wills of all the Parties, or by so ordering things, that in all Affairs relating to the common Good of the Society, there should be but one Will to govern their Proceedings. The latter, by constituting some Power, which shall be able to inflict a present and sensible Punishment, on those who oppose or hinder the publick Benefit. Tully hath a remarkable Saying to this Purpose: They observe (speaking of the Aristotelians; that even the Passion of Grief was not constituted by Nature, without our great Use and Advantage; that Men taken in Offences might be heartily troubled at the Correction, the Reproof, the Ignominy, which they undergo. For they, who can bear Infamy and Reproach without Concern, seem to have obtain'd the Privilege of sinning with Impunity.

Now the Union of Wills could not possibly be compass'd in any of the following ways: Either that by a natural Conjunction the Wills of all the Parties should be amass'd into one; or that one Person only should exert his Will, and all the rest suppress theirs; or that the natural Disagreement of Inclinations and Contrariety of Desires should by any means whatsoever be absolutely taken away, and combined in perpetual Harmony and Concord. The only Method then, by which many Wills may be conceiv'd as join'd together, is at least this; that each Member of the Society submit his Will to the Will of one Person, or of one Council; so that whatever this Person or this Council shall resolve, in Matters which necessarily concern the common Safety, shall be deem'd the Will of all in general, and of each in particular. For when I have made over my Power to another, his Act and Choice is interpreted as mine ^b.

So again, as to the other Remedy propos'd, 'tis impossible to constitute such a Power as shall be formidable to the whole Multitude, by natural Means; that is, by transfusing the real Strength of all and each of them into one Person, so as to leave all the rest utterly weak and impotent. But one Man can thus only be supposed to possess the Strength of all, when the whole Body, and every particular Member, have obliged themselves to use and apply their Strength, as he shall judge expedient. When this Union of Will and of Forces is once completed, thence at last ariseth what we call a Commonwealth, or civil State, the strongest of all moral Persons, or Societies.

What hath been offer'd may perhaps be more distinctly understood, if we consider, that by the Submission of their Wills, made on the part of the Subjects, their natural Liberty of Choice is not extinguish'd; by virtue of which they are still able, de facto, to resume what they once gave, and to deny and withdraw their Obedience which they promis'd: As likewise, that the Strength and Power of the Subjects are not by any natural Conveyance transferr'd really on the Sovereign, as if, for Instance, the Strength, which lay in the Shoulders of all the Subjects, should be removed to the Prince's Shoulders; and consequently that both the Wills and the Strength of those who are govern'd, are, as we may say, turn'd into the Scales, and render'd conformable to the Governour's Pleasure, only by these two moral Weights, which we come now to examine. The first is taken from their own Act and Covenant, by which they engage their Allegiance: And this receives all possible Force from the Command of GOD, and from the sacred Authority of an Oath; both which are so much the more effectual in over-ruling Mens Minds, the more carefully the Parties have from their Childhood been educated with good Discipline and Instruction, and the more Knowledge they have obtain'd of the Necessity and Usefulness of civil Government. But they, who, through the extreme Pravity of their Mind, resist the Force of this Weight, whilst they either foolishly imagine Government to be a Stratagem found out for the vexing and oppressing of all others, to satisfy the tyrannical Pleasure of a few; or else are overcome with a heavy Listlessness, rendering them averse to the voluntary Performance of what their Duty requires; these, we say, are drawn to obey their Superiors, by that other Weight which we have still in reserve; that is, by the Fear of Punishment, and by external Compulsion. Farther, since he who compels Another, ought to surpass him in Strength, and since that Strength, by which Governours exceed the Force of private Persons, ariseth from hence, that the Subjects are ever ready to apply their united Power, as they shall be commanded; hence 'tis evident, that the Ability, which Rulers have to compel and restrain evil and disobedient Subjects, is owing to the Obedience of the Good. Now, that the greater Part of a Nation's Strength shall always be in the Hands of the Sovereign, 'tis easy for him to effect¹; provided that he first obtain'd his Crown by lawful Means, and that he expresseth any tolerable Care and Endeavour towards the Discharge of his Trust. For as he may ever reasonably hope, that the Majority of the Subjects will be mindful of the divine Command, and of their Oath of Allegiance and Fealty; so 'tis indeed ever the Interest of the larger and better Part of the People, that the State should remain secure and undisturb'd, that the lawful Government should be maintain'd in its due Privileges and Authority. But besides all this, Governours have ready at Hand certain useful Engines, which afford a vast Addition to their Power; such as are good Fortresses and a standing Force, engaged to the Prince by more than ordinary Ties; by means of which Assistances, a Multitude, how numerous soever, may be reduced to Obedience, especially if they want Arms, and are scatter'd at a wide Distance, through the several Parts of the Country; and in case the Sovereign useth due Caution, to hinder his People from bandying into Factions.

^a Tusc. Quest. l. IV. c. 20.

^b A good Man submits his own Judgment and Choice to the Governour of the Universe, as good Subjects do to the Laws of the State. Arrian. Epietet. l. I. c. 12. p. 118.

VI. That the Union, which we have been thus explaining, may be more thoroughly apprehended, we are to know, that many natural Persons, before they close into one moral Person, whatever they do, and whatever Obligations they take upon themselves, they act and undertake in their single Capacities, so that the Number of the Actions and Obligations is equal to the Number of the natural Persons. And tho' often, when we would denote many independent Men, we use the Word Multitude, which seems to imply some kind of Unity; yet if we consider more exactly, this Term is not one of those which we call collective Words, or such as signify an united Body, composed of many Individuals, as those other Names of an Army, a Navy, an Assembly, a Senate, and the like; but really imports no more than a bare Number of things in general, without specifying whether they be of the same or different kinds, whether they be united or dispers'd. And therefore, properly speaking, a Multitude of Men is not one compound Body, but many separate Persons, each of which hath his own Judgment, and his own Will to determine him in all Matters that shall be propos'd. For which reason, if we thus consider a Multitude, and then abstract it from the particular Man, of whom it consists, we cannot ascribe to it, in this general Notion, any one Action distinct from those of the private Persons, or any peculiar Privilege or Right. Hence suppose a Man to be in a Multitude, or to have many other Men about him, not join'd in a common Society; should most, or should all the rest of these perform any Act, or engage in any Compact, while he alone enters his Dissent to the Business, or, negatively, doth not any way approve or partake of it, the said Act or Compact shall on no account affect his Person. So that, on the whole, to join a Multitude, or many Men, into one compound Person, to which one general Act may be ascribed, and to which certain Rights belong, as 'tis oppos'd to particular Members, and such Rights as no particular Member can claim separately from the rest; 'tis necessary, that they shall have first united their Wills and Powers by the Intervention of Covenants; without which, how a Number of Men, who are all naturally equal, should be link'd together, is impossible to be understood.

VII. The Nature and the Number of those Covenants, by the Mediation of which a civil State is compacted, may be discover'd by the following Method of Enquiry. Let us conceive in our Mind a Multitude of Men, all naturally free, and naturally equal, going about voluntarily to erect themselves into a new Commonwealth: Here it will be necessary, first of all, that they covenant each with each in particular, to join into one lasting Society, and to concert the Measures of their Welfare and Safety, by the publick Vote (tho', in a Compact of this Nature, 'tis the most usual way, for particular Persons, to reserve to themselves the Liberty of departing, if they shall see fit.) This Covenant may be made either absolutely or conditionally. The first is done, when a Man engageth himself to stick to this Society, whatever Form of Government shall afterwards be approved of by the major Part: The latter, when the Person engaging adds this Clause, provided such a Form shall be introduced, as is agreeable to his private Judgment. Farther, when this Covenant is to be transacted, 'tis requisite that all and each of them give their Consent. He that shall disagree, tho' he may happen, for some time, to continue in the same Place with the rest, yet stands without the Bounds of the rising State, nor is obliged by the Vote of his Fellows, tho' the greater Number, so as to be under any Necessity of joining himself to the new Establishment; but he remains under his natural Liberty, in which it shall be lawful for him to provide for his private Security, according to his own Measures. But after such a Society, representing the first Rudiments and Beginnings of a State, hath been united in the manner described, it is then farther necessary, that a Decree be made, specifying what Form of Government shall be settled amongst them. For before this Point is adjusted, 'tis impossible they should take any regular Step towards maintaining the Safety of the Publick. Now when Matters are come to this Issue, they who join'd themselves in the Society upon absolute Terms, shall, if they design to continue longer in the Place where the Society is fixed, be bound by the Agreement of the Majority, to acquiesce in the Form establish'd, tho' their own Opinion more incline to some other Model. For, by adding no Exceptions to the Covenant, they are presum'd to have, in this respect at least, submitted to the Will of the greater Number; from whom it can with no manner of reason be expected, that they should quit their own Judgment, to comply with a few that obstinately stand out. But on the other hand, they who entered themselves in the Society upon Conditions, unless they expressly consent to the Government resolv'd upon, shall not become Members of the new State, nor be concluded by the Vote of the Majority.

¹ Mr. Le Clerc (in his Additions to Morer's Dictionary, at the bottom of the Article of Calvin) says, That Princes who have but a moderate share of Integrity, may be almost ador'd by their Subjects.

² See hereafter in B. 8. c. 11. f. 2.

VIII. After the Decree hath pass'd, to settle the particular Form of Government, there will again be Occasion for a new Covenant, when the Person or Persons, on whom the Sovereignty is conferr'd, shall be actually constituted; by which the Rulers, on the one hand engage themselves to take care of the common Peace and Security, and the Subjects on the other hand to yield them faithful Obedience; in which likewise is included that Submission and Union of Wills, by which we conceive a State to be but one Person. And from this Covenant the State receives its final Completion and Perfection. But now, if the Form establish'd should happen to be a Democracy, this latter Covenant doth not so manifestly appear; because the same Persons are in different respects Sovereigns and Subjects: Whereas every Covenant requires two distinct Parties. Nor doth the different Respect seem a sufficient Distinction; as, for Instance, when the same Titius is said to be a Father, a Son, a Husband, a Son in Law, a Father in Law, a Merchant, &c. for here if this Titius, as a Merchant, shall promise any thing to the same Titius, as a Father, there is no Covenant in the Case. We are therefore to understand, that, in a popular Government, the particular Members and the Sovereign Assembly are not only distinguish'd by different respects, but are really different Persons (tho' not of the same kind) who have distinct Wills, distinct Acts, and distinct Rights from each other. For the Will of particular Men is not immediately the Will of the People; nor can what particular Men shall happen to do, be construed as the People's Acts, or vice versa. Again, particular Men neither enjoy the Sovereignty, nor any Part of it, but 'tis lodg'd in the Body of the People. For to have a Part of the Sovereignty, and to have a Vote in that Assembly in which the Sovereignty resides, are two different things. So that hitherto there seems to be no reason why we may not suppose a Covenant to pass between the general Assembly, and the private Members of the State. One thing indeed there is, which may be urged, with some Colour, to the contrary: 'Tis, that such a Covenant would be of no manner of Use; because each Man by giving his Consent to the setting up of a Democracy, is, at the same time, presum'd to have submitted his Will to the Will of the major Part; and besides, the Love that he hath for his own Person and Fortunes, seems to lay a sufficient Necessity on any Man to labour with his utmost Ability for the publick Good, with which his own private Welfare is inseparably united. However, altho' it may not perhaps be altogether so necessary in Democracies, as in other Governments, that this Covenant, or mutual Engagement for performing the respective Duties of Sovereign and Subject, should be openly and expressly made; yet 'tis absolutely requisite, that we suppose it to have pass'd by tacit Agreement. For whether we look on the first Decree, for the Establishment of the Democracy, as the bare Act of many Wills conspiring in one Desire, or as the Covenant of each Man with each, to this Purpose, I will submit my Will to a general Assembly for us all, upon Condition you will do the like: Yet from all this, thus strictly consider'd, there can no other Obligation arise, but what follows, that every Person shall be bound to acquiesce in this particular Form of Government, so long as 'tis not alter'd by universal Consent. But now the Subjects in a popular State are certainly under a farther Obligation. For first, each Member is bound to stand to such Decrees and Commands as shall proceed from the general Assembly; and then again, they are engaged, every one in particular, to contribute each his utmost Service to the State, and to prefer the publick Good to his own private advantage^a. Otherwise, on what Pretence should any Man be punish'd, for not giving Attendance at the publick Councils? Since then such an Obligation is evidently discover'd, there must of Necessity be some Principle whence its Origin is derived; and this can be nothing else but the Covenant of which we have been now discoursing.

But, if the Society agree to erect an Aristocracy, or a Monarchy, then this latter Covenant is far more visible. For upon creating the Senate, or the Prince, both Parties interchange their mutual Faith, and mutual Performances thence arise, as their necessary Duty. In as much, as after the Sovereignty hath been once conferr'd and receiv'd, the Prince or the Senate, no less than the Subjects, stand bound to discharge certain Offices, with which they were not before concern'd: The People, before the passing of this Covenant, being no more engaged to obey one Man, or one Council of Men, than that Man, or that Council of Men were engaged to undertake the Care of the Publick. But now, from what Principle could this mutual Faith and Obligation to Duties, which were not required before, take their Rise, but from Covenant?

What we have hitherto deliver'd, concerning the two Covenants, and the one Ordinance or Decree, may be illustrated by that Account, which *Dionysius Halicarnassæus*¹ gives us of the first Settlement of the Monarchy in Rome. For here, first of all, a Number of Men flock together, with Design to fix themselves in a new Seat; in order to which Resolution a tacit Covenant, at least, must be supposed to have pass'd amongst them. After this, they deliberate about the Form of Government, and that by Kings being preferr'd, they agree to invest Romulus with the sovereign Authority. And this holds too in the Case of an Interregnum, during which, the Society being held together only by the prime Compact, it is frequent to enter the Debate about the Frame and Model of the Common-wealth.

^a In Thucydides, a Member of a Democratical State, unacquainted with publick Affairs, is styl'd an useless Citizen, l. 2. c. 40. E. l. Oxon. Socrates's Dispute with Charmides in Xenophon, Memorab. l. 3. p. 485. ¹ B. II. in the Beginning.

We ought carefully to observe, that this Method of producing and constituting a civil State, by the means of two Covenants and one Decree, is the most natural, and what agrees in general to every kind of Government. Yet a Monarchy may sometimes happen to be constituted by one Covenant alone; as suppose many Persons, without any antecedent Agreement amongst themselves, should at the same or a different time, each Man for his own Person only, subject themselves to a single Master, almost in the same manner as an Army, which is form'd out of Strangers and Mercenaries, who come from all Parts to offer their Service. So again, they who join themselves to a Community already establish'd, have need of one Agreement only, by which they, on their own part, petition to be admitted into the State; and on the other part they who represent the State, upon Security given for their Obedience, admit and receive them.

It would be an unjust Suspicion, in any Person, to imagine that what we have offer'd about these Covenants, in making them the Cause and Foundation of a civil State, is purely our own arbitrary Fiction; because the first Rise of most Governments is unknown, or at least we do not certainly apprehend them to have been compos'd and cemented after the manner here described. For 'tis certain every State once had its Beginning. But now, before the fixing of any State, the Persons, of whom it was to consist, could not be united to each other, by the same Ties as they are after the State is actually set up; nor could they yet be subject to those, to whom afterwards they owe Subjection. And since we cannot understand, how either this Union, or this Succession could be made, without the Covenants or Agreements before mentioned, it is necessary that the said Agreements must tacitly at least have pass'd in the Institution of Common-wealths. Nor is there any thing to hinder, but that the Original of some things, not committed to the Monuments of Time and History, may be traced out by the Disquisitions of Reason.

IX. It may be worth our while, on this Occasion, to examine with particular Strictness the Opinion of Mr. Hobbes, who, in the Generation of States, acknowledgeth no more than one Covenant of each Man to each Man; frequently representing and declaring, that there passeth no Covenant between the Prince, or the Senate, and the Subjects. Indeed, we may easily gather from the Design of his Books of Policy, which is clearly discover'd in the Leviathan, the Reason that put him upon this Assertion.

^a See the Debate of the Persian Nobles in Herodotus. Thalia, p. 121, &c. and of Brutus and his Associates, in Dionysius Halicarn. l. 4.

¹ Mr. Buddeus (in his Practical Philosophy, Part 2. c. 4. §. 4.) says, that Philosophy teaches us the same concerning the Origin of States; but, if we consult History, we shall scarce find one Example of any State that has been form'd by such express Compacts. And indeed (as Mr. Titius remarks, Observ. DLV) the first Covenant and the general Decree relating to the Form of Government, had nothing to do with the Establishment of all Civil Societies, not even of those that appear'd the earliest in the World, which (as I have observ'd in the first Note on the seventh Section of the preceding Chapter) plainly owe their Rise to the Cunning and Management of some ambitious Mind, supported by Force. In that Case, Subjects did not make any Covenant amongst themselves, but only treated every one for himself, with him to whose Government they submitted: And much less, had the new Comes, who afterwards join'd themselves to such Society, when there was already an acknowledg'd Sovereign, any Business to treat with any other else but him, as our Author himself owns. As for those, who afterwards join'd themselves several of 'em together with an Intention to leave the Independency of a State of Nature, and to form a new Civil Society; we must acknowledge, that they were oblig'd to engage themselves, the one towards the other, for ever to unite their Forces together for their mutual Preservation and Security. But besides, that this Covenant was rather tacit than express; it was only made but for a Time, and in view of a second, with respect to which it was what Scissolis are with respect to the Structure they serve for the bulding of. So that we may say, that the reciprocal Covenant between Sovereign and Subjects is what properly constitutes a State: A Covenant which is the Foundation of all Government, tho' it is often only tacit.

² It is not at all to be wonder'd at, says Mr. Locke excellently well, in his second Treatise of Civil Government, Chap. vii. Sect. 101, &c. that History gives us but a very little account of Men that liv'd together in the state of Nature; the Inconveniency of that Condition, and the want of Society no sooner brought any number of them together, but they presently united and incorporated, if they design'd to continue together. And if we may not suppose Men ever to have been in the State of Nature, because we hear not much of them in such a State, we may as well suppose the Armies of Salmanasser and Xerxes were never Children, because we hear nothing of them till they were imbody'd in Armies. Government is ever antecedent to Records, and Letters seldom come in among People, till a long Continuation of Civil Society has, by other necessary Arts, provided for their Safety, Ease, and Plenty. And then they begin to look after the History of their Founders, and to search into their Original, when they have out-liv'd the Memory of it. For 'tis with Commonwealths as with particular Persons; they are commonly ignorant of their own Births and Infancies: And if they know any thing of their Original, they are beholden for it to the accidental Records that others have kept of it. And those that we have of the beginning of any Politics in the World, excepting that of the Jews, where God himself immediately interpos'd, are all either plain Instances of such a Beginning as I have mention'd, or at least are manifest Footsteps. He must shew an Inclination to deny matter of Fact, who will not allow that the Beginnings of Rome and Venice were by the uniting together of several Men free and independent of one another, among whom there was no Superiority or Subjection: And if Joseph Acosta's Word may be taken, he tells us (Lib. 1. Cap. 25.) that in many parts of America there is no Government at all: There are great and apparent conjectures, says he, that these Men, speaking of those of Peru, for a long time had neither Kings nor Commonwealths, but liv'd in Troops, as do this Day in Florida, the Cheriquians, those of Brazil, and many other Nations, which have no certain King, but as occasion requires either in Peace or War, they choose their Captains as they please. And I hope those who went away from Sparta with Palantus mention'd by Justin, Lib. III. Cap. IV. will be allow'd to have been free Men independent of one another, and to have set up a Government over themselves, by their own Consent. See Algernon Sidney upon Civil Government, Chap. III. Sect. XXV, XXXIII.

His principal Aim was to oppose those seditious and turbulent Spirits, who in his time labour'd to bring down the regal Power to their own Model, and either utterly to extinguish, or to render it inferior to the Subjects. To cut off from these Men their ordinary Plea for Rebellion, which was, that there is a reciprocal Faith between the Prince and the People, and that when the former departs from what he engaged by Promise, the latter are releas'd from their Obedience; as also to hinder restless and factious Persons from interpreting every Action of their Prince, which suited not with their own Humour, as a Breach of his Faith; he resolves to deny that there is any such thing as a Covenant between Subjects and their Sovereign. And having undertaken to maintain, that every Monarch, properly and truly such, hath an absolute and unlimited Power; it follow'd of course, that he should exclude all Covenants or Compacts from this Affair, because these seem to be the chief Instruments of reducing Authority to Bounds and Rules. But now, although it highly concerns the Interest of Mankind, that the regal Power should be kept sacred and inviolable, and be secured from the impertinent Cavils of those busy Designers, who are always plucking at it; yet this Consideration doth by no means make it necessary for us to deny what is as clear as the Light, and to acknowledge no Covenant, in a Case where there is certainly a mutual Promise for the Performance of Duties not before required. Whilst I voluntarily subject my self to a Prince, I promise Obedience, and engage his Protection: On the other hand, the Prince, when he receives me as his Subject, promiseth his Protection, and engageth my Obedience. Before this reciprocal Promise, neither was he bound to protect me, nor I to obey him, at least by any perfect Obligation. And who will pretend to say, that an Act of this kind doth not fall under the Head of Covenants? Nor is this Covenant useless, because they, who by their own free Choice appoint a King over themselves, seem before-hand to have entred into an Agreement for the advancing such a particular Person to the Throne. For as the bare Election, without the Acceptance of the Party elected, confers on him no Power over the rest; so 'tis plain enough, from the Nature of the Business, that they who freely put themselves under the Power of another, desire he should, in the Exercise of that Power, pursue the End for which it was given him: And that he receiv'd the Power on this Condition, that those who conferr'd it on him should not, by his means, miss of their Aim. They who create a Sovereign therefore, as they at the same time promise whatever the Nature of Subjection requires; so, on the other part, engage him to endeavour the procuring of all those Benefits, for the sake of which civil Governments are introduced. And what can we call this but the entering into Covenant?

X. Nor, upon admitting this Covenant between Prince and People, do those Inconveniences, to which Mr. Hobbes seems to have had an Eye, necessarily follow. This indeed is common to all Covenants, that they lay upon Men an Obligation to some certain Performance. But then, there is the greatest Difference imaginable between those Covenants, in which one of the Parties doth, at the same time, put himself under Subjection to the other, and those, in which neither Party requires, with respect to the other, any Superiority or Command. Thus the Right of a Master over his Servant, at least over such an one as freely enters into that Condition, depends upon Covenant; and in the same manner the Authority of a Father over him that offers himself to be adopted, and the Command of a General over his mercenary Troops. And yet this doth not hinder, in the least, but that in all these Cases there is a Right of governing on the one side, and an Obligation to Obedience on the other: Nor may the Party in Subjection throw off the Yoak, when his Superior's Command proves disagreeable to his own Humour. For, in all these Covenants, which do not include a Submission of Will and of Strength, some certain Duties are specified, to be mutually perform'd on the inward Principle of Conscience; and when either Party refuseth voluntarily to fulfil his Engagement, there remains no Redress, but either from War and Violence, or from the Compulsion of their common Lord. But in Covenants, where one of the Parties is made subject to the other, the latter may, as he thinks fit, prescribe what shall be done by the former; and hath likewise a Power of forcing his Compliance, in case of Refusal; whereas the former Party cannot, on any account, be said to hold the like reciprocal Power over him. Wherefore a Governour cannot be tax'd with Breach of Covenant, unless he either utterly abandon all Care of the Publick, or take up the Mind and Carriage of an Enemy towards his own People, or manifestly, and with evil Design, recede from those Rules of Government, the Observation of which was, by the Subjects, made the necessary Condition of their Obedience. And 'tis very easy for one in Authority to avoid and escape all those Imputations, provided he will but consider, that the highest of mortal Men are not exempt from the common Laws which attend their Fortune and Condition, and that as Pliny ^b observes, No Prince was ever himself deceiv'd, who had not before deceiv'd others. Lastly, that Prince must either be extremely vicious, or extremely weak and impolitick, who cannot so order Matters, as that it shall be always the Interest of the greater, or the stronger Part of the People to see him preserv'd in his Person and Government. And it may be a strong Motive to him, to apply his best Endeavours towards the compassing this good End, if he barely reflect on that Saying in Livy ^c;

^a Xiphilin. Epit. Dion in Neron. All Sovereign Force and Authority, when conferr'd by a private Person, passeth immediately from the Giver, and holds good against him in the Hands of the Receiver.

^b Paneg. c. 66. in fin.

^c L. 8. c. 21.

Is it to be imagin'd, that any People, or so much as any single Man, will continue longer than they needs must, in a Condition which is grievous and uneasy to their Mind? If then the Majority of the People find it their Interest to stand by their Prince, and to defend the publick Administration as lodg'd in his Hands; as they cannot but do, if he guide his Councils with Justice and Wisdom, then his Fortune rests upon a Bottom. He that cannot compass thus much is fitter for any other Employment, than for Sovereignty and Command.

XI. Let us proceed to weigh more particularly the Reasons urg'd by Mr. Hobbes in favour of his Opinion. And here, first of all, we think it very inconvenient, that he should go about to derive the Obligation of Subjects towards their Sovereign, from such a Covenant by which each Man obligeth himself to each of his Fellows, that he will not resist the Will of that Person, to whom he hath yielded himself to be govern'd^a. Indeed, they who have agreed amongst themselves, to confer the Sovereignty on a certain Man, are presumed to have agreed likewise, that they should all submit their own Will to his Will; or, that, in the Management of the Commonwealth, his Will should represent the Will of them all. Nor is it unusual to ratify such a Consent about conferring the Sovereignty, as also the Terms under which it is conferr'd, by the mutual Covenants and Oaths of the People. Yet to agree about investing such a Person with the Government, and to confirm their Investiture by interchanging their Faith one with another, are two different things. But to go farther, there's no Absurdity in supposing, that Subjects should mutually engage their Faith to yield Obedience to their common Prince; as we know, there are such Covenants in which all engage for each, and each for all. Yet there is no Necessity, but that this may entirely be omitted, and in Fact 'tis seldom practis'd. When a Stranger is incorporated into a State, he swears Allegiance to the Sovereign: But he is now here required, so far as we can discover, to contract with the other Subjects about paying this Allegiance. Lastly, it would be a thing of very dangerous Consequence, to build our Obligation to our Prince on a Covenant with each of our Fellow-subjects, which would import as follows, I transfer my Right upon the King for your sake, that you for my sake may transfer your Right upon him also. For at this rate every Subject will seem to make the Obedience of every other Fellow-subject the necessary Condition of his own: And consequently, if any one happens to violate his Engagement, all the rest stand releas'd from theirs. And this Reason alone shews what Necessity there is that each Subject should be bound to his Sovereign in his own Person, without any Dependence on the Obedience of others; to the end, that how uneasy soever one or two perhaps appear under their Confinement, the Sovereign may make use of the united Strength of all the rest, in reducing the Rebellious to their Duty.

No less incongruous is that Assertion of Mr. Hobbes to this Purpose; That the Obligation to obey the supreme civil Power doth not arise immediately from the Covenant, by which particular Persons give up all their Right to the State; but only mediately from hence, that without Obedience the Right of Sovereignty would have been vain and insignificant, and, by Consequence, no Commonwealth would have been form'd^b. What need of this winding and turning, when he might have gone on in the straight Road? The Reason, which moved him to this Position, is certainly idle and frivolous. He proceeds upon a tacit Supposal, that things agreed to by Covenant cannot lawfully be refused; whereas a Prince may lawfully command his Subject, what the Subject may as lawfully disobey; as if the King should order me to kill myself, or himself, or my Father, though judicially condemn'd: Wherefore, in his Opinion, the Obedience of Subjects is to be drawn from some other Principle, than from any Compact with the Sovereign. But now, we maintain, that the lawful Power of the Prince, and the Duty of the Subjects do exactly and compleatly answer one to the other: And therefore we deny, that, in any Case, the Subject can lawfully refuse what the Prince lawfully enjoins. For he can lawfully enjoin no more, than what really is, or, at least, is judg'd to be agreeable to the End for which civil Communities were first established. If either, through evil Design, or through unwise Counsels, he attempts any thing contrary to this End, the Act shall on no account be esteem'd lawful. But whether the Subjects may resist all such unreasonable Injunctions, is properly another Question, and shall be discuss'd in another place. Mr. Hobbes's Instances are of no weight in this Point. For, if the Prince might lawfully command any of those Actions, which he mentions; that is, if the Performance of such a thing, by a Subject, should seem conducive to the Good of the Commonwealth, the Subject could not lawfully refuse to comply^c. And, on the other side, if the Commands were void of all Justice and Reason, and the Subject slain for not performing them; no Man in his Wits will say, that such an one was lawfully put to Death.

As to what he affirms in the same Chapter d. That the Right of a Sovereign is conferr'd on him by the People, in the way of Donation;

^a De Cive c. 5. f. 7.

^b Ibid. c. 6. f. 13.

^c See Falges IX. 54. 1 Sam. XXXI. 4. Zenaras, Part III. reports, that when Theophilus the Emperor upon the Loss of a Battle, stood almost benum'd with Fear, and drawn, accosted him to this Purpose, Unless you follow me, I am resolv'd to kill you on the spot; for 'tis better you should lose your Life, than that you should fix a Mark of the highest Disgrace on the Roman State, by falling into the Hands of the Enemy. At which Threats the Emperor, with some Unwillingness, awaken'd from this Lethargy, and following his Guide, got off safe. The Poet Quint. Calp. l. 13. observes,

A Prince should rather fall amongst the Brave,
Than wear the Badges of a Royal Slave.

^d See ult. in fin.

this is not so much as consistent with his own Notions. Donation he himself allows ^a to be the transferring of Right from one Party to another, without the like Return. But now when a Prince is invested with the Sovereignty, there is a mutual transferring of Right, or a reciprocal Promise. The Subjects engage to be obedient, the Prince to take care of the Commonwealth, to which Duties neither of them stood bound, before this Act passed between them. For, as before the Government was conferr'd on such a Person, the rest of the Society might have oppos'd or resist'd his Command, though they afterwards appoint him for their Sovereign; so he on his part, if they had demanded his Care or Protection, might likewise have resist'd them; that is, might have denied those Performances, as things which they had no Right to require of him ^b.

XII. The other Set of Reasons, which he makes use of ^c to overthrow all Compacts between Prince and People, will appear to be no less weak than the former. In the first place, he undertakes to prove that democratical States are constituted, not by Covenants between each Man and the whole People, but between each Man and each Man. His Argument is: ^d Because, in every Covenant, the Parties covenanting must exist antecedently to the Covenant it self. Whereas before the Settlement of the State, the People cannot be said to exist, as being not one compound moral Person, but only a Multitude of Individuals. And then again, after the State is settled, to enter into such a Covenant would be to no Purpose; because the Will of the People includes in it the Will of any private Subject, to whom the People must be supposed, in this Case, to engage their Faith; so that they may release themselves when they please, and, by Consequence, are actually free. But now 'tis manifest, that there's a Medium between these Suppositions. Before the Settlement of the State, many Men are not indeed a People, that is, a democratical Community: Therefore no Covenant can be made with them as such. And so too, after the State is settled, a Covenant of this Nature would in one sense be in vain; that is, 'twould be in vain, for one or two particular Subjects, to make a private Compact with the People about the publick Administration: For he that hath once given his Consent to the introducing a Democracy, is presumed to have thereby oblig'd himself to obey such Decrees, as shall proceed from the Majority of the People; which Obligation must needs suffer Prejudice from any particular Covenant. But, still in the very Act of constituting a popular State, a mutual Covenant may, and really doth, pass between the People and the private Members; the Nature of which we have already explain'd. A Man might argue, with just as much Reason and Consequence, that a Husband cannot possibly have entered into any Covenant with his Wife: Because before Marriage she was not his Wife; and after Marriage, 'twould be in vain to come to a Covenant; the Woman's Will being then put under Subjection to the Man's. Whereas in the very Act of taking or choosing such a Woman for a Wife, a Covenant might pass between the Parties. Epicurus's Fallacy about Death was a piece of Sophistry much of the same Strain, as 'tis recited and confuted by Lactantius ^e When we are in Being, Death is not; and when Death is in Being, we are not: Therefore Death signifies nothing to us; or, Death and we have nothing to do with each other. What a nice Cheat was this upon our Understandings? As if we fear'd Death when 'twas once over, and had taken away our Senses with it; and not rather fear'd to die, by which Act our Senses are thus taken from us! For there is a certain Point of time, when we seem to be gone, and yet Death is not quite arriv'd. And here's the miserable Moment, when Death begins its Being, and we conclude ours.

But farther, should a Man contend with never so much Earnestness, that he cannot in democratical Governments, conceive such a Compact in his Mind, or that he judgeth it utterly useles; yet he cannot fairly take Occasion thence to exclude it from other Forms, where those who command, and those who obey, are really and naturally different Persons. For here certainly a mutual Covenant is required, by which the former engage to undertake the Care of the Publick, and to make the Safety and Welfare of the People the chief Law of their Actions; and the latter, again engage to yield Obedience. Hence 'tis evident, what Judgment we ought to make of that other Assertion laid down by Mr. Hobbes ^e that, because the particular Members of the Society, not by any Compact with the People, but by private Covenants between themselves, are bound to acquiesce in every Act of the People; they are, by the same Covenants, bound to acquiesce in that Act of the People, which transfers the Sovereign Right of the State upon a Senate, or upon a Monarch. For 'tis no good Consequence to say; if the general Assembly of the People agree to transfer the supreme Command on a Senate, or on a King, particular Persons are bound to stand to their Resolution; therefore there passeth no Covenant between the People, who transfer the Right, and the Nobles, or King, on whom it is transferr'd.

He has still an Argument behind, of as much Strength and Weight as the rest. He tells us, that a King, though elected by the People, cannot by the same People be oblig'd to any Performance; because immediately upon his Election the People are dissolv'd, and lose the Existence they had as one Person; for which Reason the Obligation directed towards them as one Person, doth likewise perish and is dissolv'd. Now, what he fixeth here for the Basis of his Opinion, that the Obligation towards any Person ceaseth, the Person himself being taken away; is to be understood of those Cases only, in which, either the Person is extinct by a natural Death, or that Quality expires in which alone the Obligation was found'd. But when a free People transfer the Government on a King, neither do themselves die in a natural Sense, nor is the King's Obligation founded in that Quality of the People, which denominated them a free State; but in that by which they resolve to be, for the future, a Society of Men under a single Governour. As a Suitor who is engaged by Covenant to a young Woman, cannot after the Marriage hath been consummated, except against the Contract, on pretence that his Obligation is expired, because she is not a Virgin now, as she was when the Covenant was made. For the Obligation of a Suitor was not founded in the Quality of Virginity; but he contracted with a Virgin in order to her changing her Condition to that of a Wife. Upon the constituting a Monarch, the People are dissolved in this respect only, that the supreme Authority doth no longer reside in a general Assembly; but they are by no means dissolved into a loose Multitude, not united by any mutual Bands: For they still continue one Society, held together by one Government, and by their original Covenant amongst themselves. The whole of the Matter therefore is this; Mr. Hobbes imposes upon less intelligent Readers, by the ambiguous Signification of the word People. In Democracies, the People denotes the whole Body of Men, who, in different respects, govern and are govern'd ^a. But who will venture to affirm, that an Obligation towards a People in this latter Sense, or as they are subject to a Monarch, or to a Senate, may not continue and subsist, tho' contracted whilst they were yet free, but in order to their future Subjection, and in certain prospect of it? To conclude, Mr. Hobbes himself elsewhere ^b expressly asserts, that God was made the King of the Jewish People by virtue of a Covenant between him and them ^c. And how then can he pretend, that there is no Covenant between a mortal King and his Subjects? A little before he delivers the direct contrary: When a Man, says he, submits himself to his Conqueror, he is bound by as necessary an Obligation as the truest Subject; for a Contract, lawfully entered into, can't fairly be broken or transgress'd ^d.

^a Señ. ult. in fin. ^b Comp. Luke XII. 13, 14. ^c C. 7. f. 7, &c. ^d Institut. Divin. l. 3, c. 17. ^e De Civ. c. 7. f. 9. that

XIII. By the means of these Covenants then a Multitude of Men are so united and incorporated, as to form a civil State; which is conceiv'd to exist like one Person ^e, endued with Understanding and Will, and performing other particular Acts, distinct from those of the private Members. Again, as 'tis distinguish'd and known from the same Members by one general Name ^d, so it hath peculiar Rights and separate Properties, which neither particular Men, nor many in Conjunction, nor all together, without him in whom the supreme Authority resides, can make any Claim or Pretences to: And lastly, it hath peculiar Actions proceeding from it, which private Persons can, on no account, assume or challenge to themselves. So that the most proper Definition of a civil State seems to be this, 'It is a compound moral Person, whose Will, united and tied together by those Covenants which before pass'd among the Multitude, is deem'd the Will of all; to the End, that it may use and apply the Strength and Riches of private Persons towards maintaining the common Peace and Security ^e. Mr. Hobbes hath given us a very ingenious Draught of a civil State, conceiv'd as an artificial Man: 'In which the Sovereign is the Soul, as giving Life and Motion to the whole Body; the Magistrates and the other Officers, artificial Joints; Rewards and Punishments, fastened to the Seat of Sovereignty, and by which every Member is moved to the Performance of its particular Duty, the Nerves which do the same in the Body natural; the Wealth and Riches of particular Members are the Strength; Salus Populi (the People's Safety) its Business; Counsellors, by whom all things needful for it to know are suggested to it, are the Memory; Equity and Laws an artificial Reason; Concord is Health, Sedition Sickness, and civil War, Death. Lastly, the Pacts or Covenants, by which the Parts of this Body politick are cemented together, resemble the divine Fiat, or the Let us make Man, pronounced by GOD in the Creation ^f. Whence we may gather, by the way, that Isocrates ^g was in the wrong, when he affirm'd the Form of Government to be the Soul of the State, having the same Force and Power as the Mind hath in the Body. Whereas the Form of Government is rather the same in the State, as in a human Body, the Structure and Disposition of the several Parts and Members.

^a Vid. Hobbes de Cive, c. 13. f. 3. ^b Leviath. de Interregnis, f. 7. Conclus. ^c Statius Achil. l. 1. v. 457, 458.

————— Sparsa ac diffusa moles
In Corpus unumque coit, & rege sub uno Diffusa est. —————

————— A wild and shapeless Mass
Assumes a Figure and a comely Grace,
Under a Monarch's Reign. —————

^d Vid. L. 1. t. 8. l. 6. f. 1. D. De Divis. Rerum, & L. 2. t. 4. l. 10. f. 4. D. De in Jus vocando, & L. 3. t. 4. l. 7. f. 16 D. Quot cujusunque Univers. Nom. & L. 48. t. 18. l. 1. f. 7. D. De Question. Act. Senec. de Beneficiis, l. 6. c. 19, 20.

^e For that Definition of Dion. Prusæus (in Borysthenic.) A State is a Multitude of Men living together, in the same Place, under the same Laws, we may perhaps hereafter find Occasion to examine; it being founded on the Maxims of Grecian Policy. Nor hath Apuleius much better Success when he defines the Platonic Commonwealth, as the most perfect Model of Government, in the following manner; from the Authority of Plato himself; A State is a Union or Conjunction of many Men, amongst whom some govern and some are govern'd, but all agree and mutually assist each other, guide themselves in their Duty by the same Laws (such as are good and just) and have accustom'd themselves to live within the same Walls, and to have the same Inclinations and Aversions in all things. ^f Leviath. Proæm.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on § XII, XIII.

¹ Vid. Hobbes de Cive, c. 35. 40.

² Vid. Hobbes ibid. c. 20.

¹ This Definition is a little intricate, and as Mr. Titius observes (Observ. DLVII.) confounds the Sovereign with the State. The State indeed is a Body of which the Sovereign is the Head, and the Subjects the Members. Our Author has here too blindly follow'd Hobbes's Definition of Cive, Cap. V. §. 9.

² Areopagit. p. 245, & Panathænic. p. 450. But it seems to me, that Isocrates is not speaking there of the form of Government, and that Πολιτεία signifies here only Civil Government in general, which as our Author himself allows in the following Chapter, Sect. 1. is the Soul of the State. Mr. Hertius has lately observ'd the same thing in his Remarks on Wolffius's Translation, which led our Author into this Mistake.

XIV. The State in exerting and exercising its Will, makes use either of a single Person, or of a Council, according as the supreme Command hath been conferr'd, either on the former, or on the latter. Where the Sovereignty is lodg'd in one Man, there the State is supposed to choose and desire whatever that one Man (who is presumed to be Master of perfect Reason) shall judge convenient; in every Business or Affair, which regards the End of civil Government, but not in others. For Instance, if a Prince declare War, if he make Peace, or enter into an Alliance, this is interpreted as the Will and Act of the State^a: But not if he eat, or drink, or sleep, if he marry a Wife, or if he be guilty of any Vice or Disorder. So that we may form a Distinction between the publick Will of the Monarch, representing the Will of the State, and the private Will of the same Monarch, which he useth like any other Man, in the Prosecution of his personal Affairs. Hence there naturally ariseth this Question, Whether if he, in whom the publick Will resides, wills otherwise than he ought to do, and consequently sins in the Exercise of this publick Will, the Action, which proceeds from a Will thus depraved, is to be look'd on as the Action of the State? For every Person, who submitted his own private Will to that of the Prince, is supposed to have done it with this Intention, that the Prince should will nothing, but what should be just in it self, and advantageous to the Publick. Here it seems reasonable to pronounce, that an Action, proceeding from the Abuse and Corruption of the publick Will, is in it self a publick Action, or the Action of the State; because perform'd by the Sovereign, as consider'd in that Capacity. Thus if a King or a Senate ordain evil Laws, execute wrong Judgment, appoint unfit Magistrates, or undertake unjust Wars, that Act in all these Instances is certainly publick. As when a Coachman overturns, the Action is his as a Coachman, tho' as one unskilful or negligent in his Art. But then in the Court of Conscience no Man is accountable for such an Act, unless he contributed positively and effectually towards its Production. Therefore Subjects are not charged with the Faults of the Government, nor they in a Senate or ruling Council, who dissent from any such Proposal, and are outvoted by the rest. But the Inconveniences, which innocent Subjects suffer on account of these publick Crimes, are to be rank'd amongst those general Evils to which human Nature, in this Condition of Mortality, lies necessarily expos'd; and which we must therefore endure with the same Patience as we do extreme Drought, or immoderate Rain, and those other Misfortunes which we style naturally Evil. Though there are several things, which Experience shews to have a very great Virtue and Efficacy towards the preventing of these Inconveniences; as fundamental Laws, good Education and Discipline, and above all, the Precepts of Religion.

It follows on the other hand, that whatever any particular Person, or many together, or all, without the King, shall will or do, beside or contrary to his Authority or Command, not only in Business of the latter, but also of the former kind, shall not in the least be look'd on as the Will or the Action of the State, but as a private Will, or a private Action: Nay, there shall be so many distinct Wills, and so many distinct Actions, as there are particular Men concern'd in the willing, or the doing thus or thus. And the same Judgment is to be pass'd on that which single Men, or a Number of Men shall attempt by their own private Motion, without Authority or Order from that governing Council, in which the sovereign Power resides. Therefore amongst the Opinions which encourage Sedition, and which tend to the dissolving the inward Frame and Structure of any State, especially of a Monarchy, Mr. Hobbes reckons this for one, that the Vulgar are not able rightly to distinguish between a State, or People, and a Multitude. A People or a State makes but one Person, having one Will, and performing only one and the same Action. Neither of which can be said of the Multitude of Subjects opposed to the Prince or sovereign Council. But what he affirms afterwards, that The People rule in every State, comes to nothing through his idle Affectation of overmuch Nicety. For the Word People must import one of these two things; either the whole State, or the Body of the Subjects. In the former Sense 'tis ridiculous Tautology, the People, that is the State, rules in every State: in the latter Sense 'tis absolutely false, the People, as distinct from the Prince, rules in every State. As for that which follows, In Monarchies the People govern; because the People, by the Will of one Man, exert their own; he ought rather to have said more plainly thus: In a monarchical Government the Will of the Prince is supposed to be the Will of the State. Nor can that Paradox, Rex est Populus, The King is the People, be explain'd in any other Sense than this. His other Remarks are true enough; as, that the Vulgar always speak of a great Number of Men, as of the People, or the State, and are wont upon Occasion to say, the State hath rebell'd against the King, which is impossible; and that the People or the State, desire and refuse what is desired or refused by some troublesome discontented Mutineers; under the Name and Colour of the People, animating the Members of the State against the State, the Subjects against the Sovereign.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTE on §. XIV.

^a Provided first, that he act with Knowledge, and not thro' Error, nor thro' any rash Motion, which for a time deprives him of the Use of his Reason; and, secondly, that he don't violate the Fundamental Laws of the State. Titius Observ. 559.

² Euripid. Supplic. v. 1188, &c.

—————'Tis fit Adrastus swear;
The King and Lord of Greece shall swear for all.

^b De Civ. c. xii. f. 8.

XV. But

XV. But where the supreme Authority is conferr'd on a Council made up of many Persons, each of whom retains his own Will; the Question first to be determin'd is, What Number of these Persons, agreeing in the same Resolution, shall represent the Will of the Council, and by Consequence of the State? For otherwise, as no Man is bound to follow another's Judgment rather than his own, unless he hath subjected his Will to the Will of the other Party; so tho' a Man enter into Society with others, in order to the directing their Business by the common Vote, yet if by express Condition he reserve to himself the Privilege, that he will not be oblig'd to any thing to which he doth not give his Consent, the Decrees of the Majority shall not in the least affect him, or force his Compliance. Thus there are Bodies incorporate, in which each Member hath a Negative, and by it can render the Consent of all the rest void and ineffectual¹. Yet, if a Person absolutely refuseth to hearken to Reason, and out of mere Stubbornness opposeth those who are in the right Opinion, he may be expell'd the Society, as a Nuisance; or, in some Cases, may be brought to farther Punishment. For tho' here he is not bound to follow the Act of the greater Part by his own precedent Covenant; yet he is under the Obligation of a general Law, which commands him to shew himself friendly and easy to others, and, as a Part, to conform himself to the good of the whole^a. It must be confess'd, that in Meetings of this kind, especially when consisting of a great Number of Persons, Business is never dispatch'd without much Difficulty, and many times falls and comes to nothing, by reason of the Difference of Mens Judgments, and the impregnable Obstinacy of some Tempers. And, according to the ordinary Course, if any Person hath once absolutely, and without Terms of Exceptions, united himself to any Society or Assembly, in as much as he cannot require, that all the rest should be govern'd by his Vote, or that they shall omit what seems necessary or profitable for them, in Deference to one dissenting Member; he is, at the same time, presum'd to have oblig'd himself to the acknowledging and ratifying all Resolutions, which the major Part shall have settled. For if he looks on this as any Hardship, he should have put in his Exception to it, when he first treated about his Admission into the Society. But it would now betray a Spirit unreasonably proud and troublesome, to think himself wiser than all his Fellows. If a Man so far persist in his Opinion, as to be uneasy, because he cannot force it upon the whole Company, he is at his liberty to quit the Union in which he was before engaged. But 'twould be high Injustice for a Person, when he had been out-voted, to follow the Example of those we find described in the Historian^b. Every one of them, says he, taking it beinously that his own Opinion was not followed, applied himself more negligently and heavily to the common Business; nay, rejoiced upon any ill Success or Miscarriage, that he might have Occasion thence to boast amongst those of his own Party, and demonstrate that there could be no other Cause of the Disappointment, but the slighting his particular Advice. Hence, according to the regular Course, the Votes of the Majority in Assemblies have the Force and Virtue of a general Decree; not because there is any Necessity of this, by the Appointment of Nature, but because there is hardly any other possible means of transacting Business amongst Numbers^c: Tho' it sometimes happens, that a Proposal more for the Benefit, or the Honour of the State, may be rejected, when the Authors cannot form a Party strong enough to carry it. For in these general Establishments, for the ordering of human Affairs, which often admit of so great Variety, since 'twas not possible for Men to invent such a Method, as should be free from all manner of

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on § XV.

¹ Every one knows, that in Poland the Opposition of a single Member breaks up the Diet. See Hartknock de Polon. Lib. II. Cap. I. Sect. 15. The States of Holland likewise observe this Maxim, when they have any Affair of great Importance to be debated. See Mr. Hortius's Note.

² See also Grotius Lib. ii. Cap. 5. Sect. 17. & La continuation des pensées diverses de Mr. Bayle, Pag. 14. Gronovius, in a Note upon the Place I have just quoted of Grotius, adds the following Restrictions to this Maxim of the Plurality of Voices. First, That the Point in Debate be determin'd by fair Voices, that is, that there be no Combination among the Members, and that the Majority of 'em, before they enter the Assembly, have not agreed to carry such a particular Opinion. Secondly, That the Majority of the Assembly be not suspected Persons, who, according to the establish'd Laws and Customs, ought not to be in the Business that is debating, that they may not be Judges in their own Cause. Thirdly, That the Matter in Debate be not contrary either to Divine Laws, or to Reason. Fourthly, That it does not destroy the Fundamental Laws of the State, and that it does not tend to the changing, without Necessity, the Form of the Government. Fifthly, and lastly, That it be not in the least prejudicial to the Rights of particular Persons, nor to the Privileges and Antient Customs establish'd for the good of the Publick.

^a On which Subject, we may add the Argument in Father Paul's History of the Council of Trent, (l. 4. p. 788.) that the French were not bound by the Decrees of the Council, having protested against it. Where the Judgment of the Parliament of Paris is also produced, and runs to this effect: 'That the Authority of the whole Body is then, indeed, transferr'd on the major Part, when the Cause affects all in common, but toucheth none in particular: But when the whole Cause so belongs to all, as that each are to be allow'd their respective Shares; in this Case, the Consent of every one in particular is necessary, and the Negative is the more favourable side: Nor are the Absent in the least oblig'd: Unless they confirm the Resolutions by their own Vote.' That Ecclesiastical Assemblies are of this kind; in which, how frequently soever Councils may be held, the absent Churches are not at all bound by their Decrees, except they please to receive them. ^b Agathias, l. iv. c. 5. ^c Vid. L. 50 t. 1. l. 19. D. Ad Municipalem. Plin. Lib. ii. Epist. 13. n. 5. The Votes pass by Number, not by Weight; nor is it possible, that in a publick Assembly it should be otherwise, where nothing is so unequal as the very Equality it self; whilst all have not the same Wisdom, and yet all have the same Right. Idem Lib. 6. Epist. 13. n. 4. Whilst the Point is unresolv'd, every Man hath the Privilege of dissenting; but when 'tis once determin'd, all are bound to maintain what the Majority have decreed. And of this regular Course of proceeding we are to understand that of Aristotle, Polit. IV. c. 8. That which most agree in, is receiv'd under all manner of Governments. For in Oligarchy, in Aristocracy, and in Popular States, the Resolution of the greater part of those concern'd in the Supreme Management, is confirm'd and ratified as a publick Decree.

Inconvenience, that must be follow'd which holds good for the most part ^a. And therefore, 'tis idle to pretend, that since it seems agreeable to Nature, that what proceeds from more Wisdom should take place, against what proceeds from less; it is therefore repugnant to Nature, that the weaker Opinion of many should outweigh the wiser Opinion of a few, and consequently that the former should compel the latter to an imprudent Undertaking. Indeed, in determining speculative Truths, Opinions are not pass'd by Number, but by Weight: And the Multitude of Patrons is it self look'd on as a Mark of Error ^b. But this Rule can by no means be applied to the Management of Business in an Assembly, the Members of which have all an equal Right to influence the Proceedings. For who shall be the Judge here which Opinion is the wiser? Certainly not the Parties themselves, which are thus divided. For neither side will allow the other thus to over-rule a Point, in which their Credit, as well as their Interest, is so nearly concern'd. And where's the Man, who doth not think his own Parts and Wisdom more considerable than his Neighbour's? Nay, How many are there who take a Delight in disparaging an Opinion or a Project, tho' the best that could have been advanced, only because they were not themselves the Authors and Contrivers of it? Nor would it be easy, for the two dissenting Parties to refer such a Controversy as this, to the Decision of a common Arbitrator; for again, the Arbitrator's Wisdom or Integrity might be call'd into Dispute, and might require a new Judge to determine the new Question: Not to say, that most of the Points, debated in these Assemblies, relate to such Matters as cannot conveniently be committed to the Judgment of those who do not belong to the Society. It hath been therefore thought most proper, to enter upon such a Method as should be the least expos'd, either to Difficulty or Uncertainty; and none can be invented which should answer this Character better, than the counting of Voices ^c. Besides, whoever is allow'd the Privilege to vote in a Council, is presumed of sufficient Ability to penetrate and comprehend all Affairs, that shall fall under their Deliberation. Which must be allow'd to be true of those Councils at least, into which Persons are not admitted, without some kind of Choice and Approbation of others. Neither would it be always expedient, to give any one Man in the Council, as suppose the President or chief Director, the Power of controlling the whole Matter by his Vote, and declaring which of the Opinions is the better. For, if the Privilege should be granted to him, he might prefer the Judgment of the smaller Party to that of the greater; nay, he might reject both Proposals, on Pretence that neither was good; and thus he would, to all Intents and Purposes, be the sole and arbitrary Governour of the State. As absolute Princes may follow that Advice which is offer'd by the fewest of their Counsellors; or may take such Measures as are contrary to the Opinion of them all.

XVI. But as to this Point of the Plurality of Votes, it is needful to observe, that in some Councils 'tis not enough for an Opinion propos'd to have the Advantage of one Vote, or of some few more than the contrary; but e'er it can be carried, it must have a Majority to such a certain Number ^d. Thus the Law about the Election of the Pope ^e requires two Thirds ¹ of the Cardinals to agree in their Nomination. And the same Rule appears to have been follow'd in ² the Election, and in the Orders

^a Bodin. De Republ. l. III. c. 4. p. 456.

^b Senec. De Beat. Vit. c. 2. Whilst I am treating of a Happy Life, You are not to answer me, as upon a Division in the Senate-House, The greater Number is on this side; for the greater part is, for that very reason, the worst; Mankind are not so happy, as that the best things shall have the most Patrons and Defenders. And therefore a Multitude is generally an Argument of the Wrong. Phocion, when a certain Proposal of his was receiv'd with general Applause, turn'd to his Friends, and ask'd them, Whether he had unadvisedly let drop somewhat that was amiss. Plutarch in Apophthegm. p. 188. A. Idem De Educat. p. 6. A. Ed. Wech. To please the Vulgar is to displease the Wise, Euripides will bear Testimony to this Observation, whom we find speaking to the same Purpose:

I've not the Art of tickling vulgar Ears,
But yet my Vote weighs somewhat with my Peers.
When Aff's judge, 'tis Musick to be loud;
And that which shocks the Thinking, charms the Crowd.

Hence, as Quintilian observes, (Institut. Orat. l. X. c. 7.) They who are ambitious of appearing Wise to the Fools, appear Fools to the Wise. Plato Conviv. p. 1188. C. Ed. Wech. A few Men of Understanding are more to be feared, than a whole Multitude compos'd of Ignorance and Weakness. Add. Valer. Max. l. 3. c. 7. §. 1. Ext. Dio. Chrysost. De Illo non capto, p. 190. D. Ed. Paris. Morel. For a thing to have been believed along time by Fools, is no Authority or Argument for its Truth.

^c Plin. Panegy. c. 62. in fin. 'Tis better to trust the whole Company, than any private Member: Particular Persons may deceive, and may be deceived; no Man ever cheated all, no Man was ever cheated by all.

^d V. Groc. L. 2. c. 5. §. 17. ibid. Becker.

^e Jus. Canon. C. 6. De Elect. & Electi Potestate.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. XVI.

¹ V. Gratian. Can. 36. Distinct 63.

² Our Author is very much mistaken in this Point, in reference to the Election of the Decuriones among the Ancient Romans; and to prove the Truth of this Assertion, we need only cast our Eyes upon the very Laws here cited by him: For they evidently prove, that there must be two thirds of the Members of the Council present in the Assembly; and not that two thirds of the Votes of those that are present are required, to determine absolutely in an Affair. See also Digest. Lib. L. Tit. IX. Leg. II. III. The Passage of Prudentius, which our Author quotes to prove it, is no better applied; for it signifies likewise, that to make a Decree of the Senate valid, it was antiently requisite, that there should be three hundred Senators present in the Assembly, and not that three hundred Senators should vote for the same Thing. For it was sufficient, that among those three hundred Senators, the Majority of Voice was for one particular Opinion. This appears among others, from this Passage of Livy, Plebs sic jussit; quod Senatus juratus: MAXIMA PARS CENSEAT, QUI ASSIDETIS, id volumus jubemusque. Lib. XXVI. Cap. XXXIII. towards the end. Upon which see Gronovius's Note. Our Author himself, Sect. 19. cites, in the same Sense I have done, the very Laws which he here applies wrong.

of the Decuriones under the Roman Emperours ^a. In the Venetian Historian ^b we find this Clause, added to the Decree of the Senate for Banishing the Jesuites, That nothing should be determin'd in Prejudice of the said Decree, unless eighteen Senators were present, and unless five Parts out of six consented to the Resolution. Yet, where there is no such particular Appointment, that side which exceeds the other, tho' by a single Vote, shall be accounted a true Majority, and equivalent to the Consent of the whole Body ^c. 'Tis to no Purpose, that some urge against this Judgment, the Maxim of the Civil Law ^d, Quod omnes tangit, id ab omnibus approbari æquum est, Equity requires, that what affects or concerns all, should have the approbation of all: For we cannot hence conclude, therefore 'tis Injustice, that for the more convenient Dispatch of Affairs, a few dissenting Members should yield to the stronger side. But farther, the Maxim produced doth not relate to those Assemblies or Councils, which are constituted for the Regulation of publick Affairs; but to private Partnerships and Confederacies, form'd by bare Compact, or by the Agreement of several Men, to be Joint-possessors of some one thing. Now such an Agreement, or Confederacy as this, doth not give the Persons concern'd, a Right to determine any thing about the common Affair, if so much as one of the Partners disagrees to the Proposal, thinking it prejudicial to his own Interest ^e. As for that Clause, which is added by the Law before mention'd, about the Papal Election, that 'What is there particularly order'd about the two Thirds, shall not abridge the Liberty of their Churches, in which the Opinion of the greater and sounder Part ought always to prevail; the reason of it seems to be this; because, according to their Hypothesis, the supreme Judge, the Pope, may declare which Opinion is the sounder, in case a Dispute should arise on that Point. Wherefore the sounder side, unless it be the stronger likewise, shall not be consider'd, except in Cases where there lies an Appeal to some Superior ^f.

XVII. If the Parties divided are equal, no Resolution shall pass; but Matters shall continue as they stood before: Because there is not ground enough for any Alteration either way; but, the Weight on both sides being the same, the Balance hangs even, and the Business naturally stops. Hence, even in criminal Cases, upon an Equality of Votes the Party is acquitted: Tho' the Penalties enacted against false Accusation, on litigious Suits, seem not to take place on these Occasions ^g. Amongst the Jews, the Criminal was not condemn'd; tho' there happen'd to be one more Vote against him than for him. Which Custom was, no doubt, founded on this Principle, that since there is no less Religion and Conscience to be observ'd in what is pronounced by a Judge, than in what is deposed by a Witness; as a single Witness is not sufficient to convict; so a single Judge is not sufficient to condemn. For the rest of the Judges, by declaring directly contrary to each other, seem'd mutually to evacuate the Force of their own Authority. We ought to add one more Remark on this Subject; and it is, that where Suffrages are given by Companies or Tribes, the particular dissenting Members in one Tribe, who were outvoted by the Majority of their Fellows, shall not be allow'd to increase the Number of dissenting Suffragans in any other Tribe.

XVIII. Lastly, when more than two Opinions are started, the Question is, Whether they are all to be reckon'd separately from each other, so as to give the Preference to that, which taken apart hath more Favourers than one besides; or whether two or more Sentences, tho' different between themselves, may be first join'd together to cast out a third, and then play'd against each other, so that the Motion, which upon the last Result hath most Voices, shall prevail? Here, if we consider things barely according to their natural Equity, without any special Compacts or Constitutions to the contrary, it seems proper to distinguish between those Opinions which really and totally differ one from the other, and those of which one is included in the other as a Part, or which differ only in Quantity; so that the latter may be allow'd to unite in that common Point where they agree, but the former may not be join'd, being absolutely inconsistent. Thus they who adjudge a Delinquent to pay twenty Pounds, and they who adjudge him to pay ten Pounds, may unite in the ten Pounds, against those who would entirely acquit him; and he shall stand guilty to the Value of the said Sum, as that in which the

^a L. 3. t. 4. l. 3. 4. D. Quod cujuscunque univ. Nom. & C. L. 10. t. 31. l. 45. De Decurion. Prudent. l. 1. Contra Symmach. v. 604. &c.

*Sic consultæ patrum subsistere conscriptorum,
Non aliter licitum prisco sub tempore, quam si
Tercerum sensissi senes legerentur in unum.
Servemus leges patrias; infirmæ minoris
Vox cedat numeri, parvique in parte sileat.*

Whilst ancient Honesty possess'd the Throne,
To Acts of Senate just Respect was shown,
Because three hundred Heads had join'd in one.
Still let the Laws prevail; the Weaker Few Yield up their False Belief, a Captive to the True.

^b Maurocen. l. 17. ^c Vid. L. 4. t. 8. l. 17. f. 6. D. De Receptis. Vid. Grot. d. l. ^d Cap. Quod omnes de Reg. Jur. in Decretal. Lib. VI. ^e By which we are to explain l. 11. of B. 8. t. 3. D. De Serv. Præd. ^f Ald. Gratian. c. 36. Distinct. 63. ^g Quintilian. Declam. 254. Equal Votes favour the Person in Danger. Antiphon. Grat. XIV. When things are equal, they make for the Prisoner, not for the Accuser; as an Equality of Votes assists the former, not the latter. Ad Aristot. Probl. f. 29. c. 13. Vid. L. 42. t. 1. l. 39. D. De Re Judicat. M. Senec. l. 1. Controv. V. One Judge condemns, the other acquits; of two different Sentences, the Milder ought to take place. The Greeks called this favourable Case, Minerva's Vote: On which Subject the Reader may consult a whole Dissertation of Bacler's. ¹ See Grot. B. 2. c. 5. f. 18. Note the last. ² See above in B. 5. c. 13. f. 19.

Majority of those that are to try him agree : The Fine of ten Pounds being contain'd under that of twenty ^a. Hence arose that Custom in the Roman Senate, of ordering a Member Sententiam dividere^b, to divide his Opinion, when he had not deliver'd himself distinctly, but had advanced two Motions at once, one of which was approved by the Company, the other not. But if some vote a Criminal to Death, others to Banishment, and a third Part are for clearing him ; neither can they who propos'd Banishment join with those who declared for his Death, against the acquitting Party, nor the Acquitters and the Banishers against those who condemn'd him to capital Punishment. For these Sentences are altogether incompatible ; Death being neither a Part of Banishment, nor Banishment of Death. And tho' the acquitting and the banishing Parties thus far agree, that both are for saving the Man's Life ; yet their Opinions do not directly produce this Agreement, but only by way of Consequence ; the Opinions being in themselves really different. For they who would absolve the Criminal, do thereby release him from all manner of Suffering ; whereas they who sentence him to Banishment insist positively upon having him punish'd, tho' in such a particular Manner and Degree ^c. Polybius ^d reports a remarkable Cause of this Nature. Certain Grecians were held Captives at Rome, and a Motion made in the Senate after what manner they should be dispos'd of. Upon the Debate three Opinions were propos'd, one that they should be releas'd, another that they should be condemn'd, and a third that they should be detain'd Prisoners some time longer ; the first in the Number of Votes exceeding both the other, if separately taken. Here Posthumius the Pretor, who then presid'd in the Senate, having a Grudge against the Captives, made use of the following Stratagem to the great Prejudice of their Cause. When the Members were to divide, he omitted one of the Opinions, and propos'd two only, ordering those who were for releasing the Men, to go to one part of the House, and those who were for disposing of them any other way, to go to the other part. By which means, they who would have confin'd them for a time, united themselves with those who whold have condemn'd them ; and so both together outvoted those who would have granted them their Liberty. In Gellius ^e we find the following Controversy propos'd : Seven Judges were to sit upon a Criminal, and that Opinion was to stand, in which the greatest Part of that Number should agree : Upon hearing the Case, two of the Judges declared for the Prisoner's Banishment, two more would have him fin'd, and the other three voted him to suffer Death ; being demand'd, in order to his Execution, he demurs to the Sentence. This Case was then offer'd for such an one as they term'd ἀρογος, or unexplicable. Cnemon in Heliodorus's History ^f is condemn'd by seventeen Hundred Voices to Death, and by a Thousand to Banishment : Yet, in as much as the former Party was divided, some requiring that he should be stoned, others that he should be thrown alive into a vast Cavern of the Earth : The Thousand who decreed to banish him, made the greater Number ^g.

It is farther observ'd by Grotius ^h, that when several Persons join'd together do not form a Society, or general Body, properly so call'd, but are only tied to each other with regard to some certain thing which they all partake of, yet by unequal Shares ; then not only the Order and Precedency shall be fix'd according to their different manners of partaking, but the Votes, in stead of being numbered, shall be measured by that Proportion which each Suffragan holds in the common Possession ⁱ. On which Rule we may add this Remark ; that since a Society or Combination of this Nature is founded only upon somewhat, which all have a common Title to enjoy, and not upon such a Covenant as is requisite to the Establishment of a just and regular Community, and by which each Member submits his private Will to the Will of the Majority ; therefore when 'tis affirm'd, that the Vote of him, who holds a larger Share in the Possession, shall have the Advantage of another's Vote, who holds a smaller Share, we are to understand it with this Limitation ; that the former shall not be allow'd, by Virtue of his superior Vote, to divest the latter of his Right, or any way to procure his Prejudice. And thus we may apprehend what is to be look'd on as the Will of the State, where the Sovereignty is lodg'd in many Hands.

XIX. As to the Number of Men who may compose a Council or Assembly, in which publick Affairs are to be debated and determin'd, 'tis manifest that three at least, are absolutely required ^k. For should there be but two, if they happen to be divided in Judgment, there is none else to turn the Scale on either side, and so no Business can be concluded ^l. Nor is it any Objection against this Rule, that sometimes ^a To this Purpose see l. 38. f. 1. d. l. D. de Re Judicat. & l. 27. D. de Receptis, d. l. & cap. 1. Jur. Can. de Arbitris in VI. 'Tis but lost Labour in Grotius (Flor. Sparf.) when, as to the Case propos'd in one of these Laws (l. 27.) he opposeth the Determination there made, and says, the Criminal ought to be condemn'd in ten, because the greater Part agreed to this Sum, and that what they disagreed in, ought to be rejected. For in five they all agreed, but the Majority only then prevails, when the whole Body do not unite in any single Resolution.

^b Vid. Cicer. Epist. Fam. l. 1. Ep. 2. Senec. XXI. What is customary in the Senate, ought likewise, I think, to be the Practice in Philosophy : When any Man delivers an Opinion, which I like in part, I bid him divide, and I follow accordingly.

^c Vid. Plin l. VIII. Epist. 14.

^d Excerpt. Legat. 129.

^e L. IX. c. 15. The same Case is the Subject of Quintilian's 365th Declamation, where among other things, there is this good Remark : Non idem sentientes non potes jungere, idem sentientes compara. You can't join those that disagree ; therefore compare those that agree. See likewise the Argument of the 30th Declamation in Liban.

^f L. 1.

^g Add. Cujac. Observ. XII. Cap. 16. & Ziegler ad Grot. l. 2. c. 5. f. 17.

^h Ibid. f. 22.

ⁱ On this Subject, Vid. L. 2. t. 14. l. 8. D. De Pactis, & L. 16. t. 3. l. 14. D. depositi, & L. 42. t. 5. l. 16. D. De Reb. author. judic. possid.

^k Vid. L. 50. t. 16. l. 85. D. De Verb. signif.

^l Ibid. Cap. 1. Jur. Can. de Arbitris.

two Persons only are term'd Colleagues, as for Instance, the Roman Consuls. For that Word often imports no more than the Equality of Office and Dignity ^a. In Latin we meet with Collegium Tribunorum, the College of the Tribunes; and yet any one of those Magistrates, by entering his particular Dissent, could evacuate any Resolution agreed on by the rest. So that they who are united to each other by such a Relation, and bear such a common Title of Honour, do not always form a regular Assembly, in which the Wills of all the Members are, by Virtue of some Covenant, compacted into one Will. But Men may happen to compose a Body or Society, and yet retain each his particular Will, distinct from the Will of his Fellows. Therefore to urge, that a Contract of Fellowship may be made between two Persons only ^b, is of no Consequence in the Point before us. As for what may be alledg'd to the contrary out of the Digests; the meaning of the Law in that place is, not that a College or Company may be originally constituted by a single Person; but that upon Failure of the other Members, by any extraordinary Accident, one Man shall be sufficient to preserve and represent the Body already establish'd, till such time as new Members may be substituted in the room of the former.

According to regular Course, the absent Members are not consider'd in these Assemblies, provided they have receiv'd lawful Notice ^c, but their Right devolves (as it were) upon those that are present. When two, says ^d Seneca, act by a common Commission, he that is present hath the Power of both. Yet in our Judgment, this Maxim ought to be restrain'd to Business of daily Occurrence, and such as will admit of no Delay. It is likewise an Exception to the same Rule, if the Laws require such a precise Number of the Members to concur in every Business ^e. In some places the absent Members are allow'd to exercise their Power by delegating some others, who appear in Person, and thus to give their Suffrage amongst the rest, either in Writing, or by the Mouth of their Proxy ^f.

XX. The Civil State being thus framed and settled, the Person or Persons on whom the supreme Authority is conferr'd, whether one Man or a Council, either particular or general, obtain the Name of a Monarch, or Senate, or a People; and private Men, as oppos'd to these, are styl'd Subjects. Here we must observe, that a Man may become Member of a State two ways, by express, or by tacit Covenant. For they who were the original Founders of Commonwealths, are not supposed to have acted with this Design, that the State should fall and be dissolv'd upon the Decease of all those particular Men, who at first compos'd it; but they rather proceeded upon the Hope and Prospect of lasting and perpetual Advantages, to be derived from the present Establishment, upon their Children and their whole Posterity. We must therefore presume them to have had this in their Aim, that their Children and their future Race should, as soon as they come into the World, enjoy the Benefits and Blessings of the publick Constitution. Which since it is impossible to obtain without Government, the very Life and Soul of a State, therefore all who are born within such Dominions, are hereby suppos'd to have submitted themselves to the standing Government. Hence there is no Necessity, that they who have been once invested with the supreme Command, should require the express Homage and Allegiance of their new Race of Subjects, tho' all the Persons, who first conferr'd their Authority upon them, may possibly be extinct. Farther, since every civil Community is fix'd in such a particular Scene, where the Members have placed themselves and their Fortunes in Security, which could not but be endanger'd, were all Men allow'd promiscuously the Privilege of coming thither without acknowledging the Government; therefore 'tis to be look'd on as a general Law in all States, that he who comes within the proper Limits of a State, and much more, if he desire to reap the Benefit of it, shall be presumed to have abandon'd his natural Liberty, and to have subjected himself to the Government there establish'd; at least for so long as he thinks fit to reside in those parts. If he deny to make this Acknowledgement, he is to be reputed as an Enemy; so far however, as that he may lawfully be expell'd the Borders. So it is manifest, that they are no less subjected to the civil Authority, who join themselves to a State already settled, than they, who by assembling and uniting themselves together, form'd it at the Beginning.

It may not be improper to remark on this Occasion, that there is some Disagreement amongst learned Men about the true Notion of Civis, a Member of a civil State. Mr. Hobbes ^g seems to make Civis an equivalent Term with Subditus, a Subject. According to which way of speaking, Women, Children, and Servants will be made proper Denizens. Our Judgment on the Point is, that since every State is constituted by Mens submitting their Wills to a single Person, or to an Assembly, they principally have a Title to the Name of Members, by whose Covenants the Society was first incorporated, and they who regularly succeed into the place of these primitive Founders. And since these Acts belong to the Masters of Families, they should seem to merit this Name by an especial Right; but Women, Children, and Servants, whose Wills were before included in the Wills of their domestical Governour and Director, can challenge it only by way of Consequence, and by Virtue of their Dependence upon him; in as much as they likewise enjoy the common Protection of the State, and hold several Rights and Privileges on the Score of that

^a Vid. l. 173. D. d. l. De Verb. signif. & l. 26. t. 7. l. 14. D. De Admin. tut. & l. 46. t. 3. l. 101. D. De Solutione, &c. ^b l. 3. t. 4. l. 7. f. 2. D. Quod cujusunque Universit. Nomine, &c. ^c Vid. C. 36. Jur. Can. de Electione & Electi Potestate.

^d Controv. vii. 4. De Decurion. ^e Vid. l. 3. D. d. l. Quod cujusunque Universit. Nomine, &c. & l. 45. D. d. l. ^f Vid. Cap. 46. De Electione & Electi Potestate, in Ultimo.

^g De Civ. c. v. f. 11.

Relation. But Inmates, Strangers, and other temporary Inhabitants, are not Members of the Commonwealth, because they propose only to tarry for a certain Space, but not to settle their Persons and Fortunes on the publick Bottom. Aristotle's Definition, fram'd to express a Member of State, and taken from his holding a Share in the Magistracy, and in the judicial Proceedings, agrees only to a democratical Government, as he himself observes ^a.

XXI. To proceed; in most Commonwealths the Members are found especially dispos'd to two subordinate Bonds or Engagements, by one of which they unite in certain Numbers, to form a particular Body, yet still under the Direction of the Publick; and by the other, the ruling Power calls them to some inferior Share in the Administration. These Bodies of Men, form'd in Subordination to the State, or general Body, whether they are term'd Companies, Corporations, Colleges, or pass under any other Title, may first be divided into those which were fram'd before the Settlement of civil States, and those which have been erected since. The Bodies or Systems, preceding civil States in point of Antiquity, are Families; in which the Authority and the Right, held by the Father and the Master, have been already explain'd. Of which Right, so much remains in their Possession, as hath not been cut off, either by the Nature and Frame of the publick Society, or by civil Ordinances, or lastly, by general Custom. Such Bodies as have been form'd since the Establishment of the civil Society to which they belong, may be distinguish'd by the Names of publick and private. The publick are those, which have been set up by Authority from the Sovereign Power in the Commonwealth. The private are, either those which have been compos'd by the sole Act of the Subjects amongst themselves, or such as depend upon some foreign Power, which, within the Dominions of another, is to be look'd upon only as a private Right and a private Act. Private Bodies may again be divided into lawful and unlawful; of which the former are, or ought to be, approv'd of and allow'd by the State, the latter not. We say, ought to be allow'd: For suppose under a State where the Divine Worship is corrupted, some endued with Sense and Knowledge of the true Religion, should hold private Assemblies, without either open Tumults, or secret Conspiracies against the Government establish'd; how much soever the Persons in Authority may dislike what differs from their own Persuasion, yet no one will presume to term these Assemblies unlawful, since the supreme Governours themselves lie under an Obligation to acknowledge, approve, and maintain the same Truths that are there profess'd.

So likewise, if in a barbarous State, where all Improvements of Learning are publicly discouraged, some Persons should meet together, to join in the Pursuit and Enquiry of Wisdom; such a Body of Men cannot be pronounced an unlawful Society. Both are again divided into regular and irregular. The former are those, in which, by Virtue of certain Covenants, there is an Union of Wills amongst all the Members: The latter those, in which we do not so much apprehend any Union of Wills, as a Consent and Conspiracy, without any mutual Bond or Engagement, such as may proceed from some common Affections, as suppose, from Hope, from Desire of Gain, or of Revenge; from Ambition, Anger, and the like.

XXII. With Regard to all lawful Bodies, 'tis to be observ'd, that whatever Right they possess, and whatever Power they hold over their Members, is all under the Determination of the supreme Authority, which it ought on no account to oppose or to overbalance. For otherwise, if there could be a Body of Men not subject to the Regulations of the civil Government, there would be a State within a State. Therefore, if any Commonwealth was at first fram'd by the Union of several absolute and independent Bodies, 'twas altogether requisite, that the respective Bodies should give up so much of their former Power and Right, as was necessary for the forming a civil Community: Because else they could not but fall short of the End which they propos'd. But, if we look on these Bodies or Systems in a State already settled, we are then to consider, what was the Intention of the supreme Governour, in founding or in confirming such a Company. For if he hath given, and ascertain'd to them, in express Words, an absolute and independent Right, with regard to some particular Affairs which concern the publick Administration; then he hath plainly abdicated part of his Authority, and, by admitting two Heads in the Constitution, hath rendred it irregular and monstrous; which no one in his Wits will do, unless upon extreme Necessity. But if the Sovereign is desirous to preserve the Power whole and unimpair'd, it is necessary that the subordinate Body should so restrain and moderate its Rights, as not to prejudice the supreme Authority, nor put any such Extent upon their Privileges, or to draw any such Consequence from them, as shall tend to the releasing the said Body from their inferior and subordinate Condition. Now after what manner the Power of these Bodies is limited, we are to learn from the particular Charters of their Foundation, or Confirmation; as likewise from the common Laws of the State, which are suppos'd to bind all and each of the Members, unless where they have been expressly abridg'd or repeal'd. From all which it follows, that, if the Administration of such a Body be committed to a single Man, whatever he acts according to the Rules of their Foundation, or according to the general Constitutions of the State, shall be look'd on as the Act of the whole Body. But what he doth contrary to, or beyond either of these, shall be his own proper personal Act, which shall not affect the rest, and for which he alone shall be accountable. If the Government of such a Body be lodg'd in a Council of several Persons; when any thing is done by them contrary to Law, or to their Foundation, those only shall be liable to Punishment on this account, who agreed to the Proceeding; but they who either dissented, or were absent from the Assembly, shall be judg'd innocent: Whom therefore it concerns, for the sake of their own Security, to protest against the Decree of the rest, and to register their Protestation in the publick Acts and Memorials, lest they should happen to be involv'd in the Punishment of their Fellows Crime. Whereas on the other side, in an independent Assembly no particular Member hath the Liberty of protesting against a Decree; because this would be to deny the supreme Power of the said Assembly.

^a Polit. l. 3. c. 1. See the rest of this Chapter where he thus goes on, According to different States, the Members are different. Wherefore the Description we have given belongs especially to the Members of a Democracy; to those of other Governments it may accidentally, but doth not necessarily agree. Idem Polit. l. 3. c. 8. There being many Forms of Civil Bodies, there must, by Consequence, be many kinds of Members, who compose them.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTE on § XXI.

¹ 'Tis not for this Reason: For the Sovereign doubtless believes his own Religion better than that which differs from it; and as long as he is of this Persuasion, nothing obliges him to alter it. But 'tis because Sovereigns, of what Religion soever, have no Right to hinder any one from peaceably serving GOD according to the Light and Dictates of his Conscience. See hereafter, Chap. iv. Sect. 11. Note 2.

As to the Debts of these Bodies or Companies, the first thing to be consider'd is, in whose Name they were contracted. For what any Member owes on his own private account, is not a Debt of the Company. Only in this respect, that when the Sentence of the Court obligeth him to Payment, Execution may be taken, not only upon the rest of his Goods, but upon those likewise which belong to him as a Partner in that Society. But such Debts as are contracted by the Governors of the Company (whether this Power be lodg'd in the Hands of one, or of more Persons) according to their Charter of Foundation, and those Rules which are to guide their Proceedings, oblige the whole Body, as such; and unless they have a common Stock, each Member is to answer for his Quota. Yet here again there is this Difference, that such Creditors as do not belong to the same Commonwealth, upon Denial of Payment, may treat the Members no otherwise than if each had engaged for the whole. As in all other Cases, any Person under a foreign Jurisdiction stands liable to suffer Reprisals for the Debts of his Countrymen. Debts contracted otherwise than the Rules of the Company allow, bind those only who gave their express Consent to the contracting them; and not those who dissented, except to the Value of what they have been Gainers by them. And such a Debt, when the common Stock, so far as 'tis affected by it, will not hold out, is to be discharg'd by Contribution of the dissenting Members, according to their respective Proportion. But if a particular Member lend Money to the Company, as such, he can only charge the Goods of the Company; and if they fall short, he must thank himself for the Loss a. If a Controversy arise between any Member and the Company, the Company shall not be Judge, but the State to which the Company is in Subordination. For 'twould be very inconvenient, that they should be allow'd to give Sentence in their own Cause, when the Matter may be referr'd to a common Power.

XXIII. Unlawful Bodies are not only those which unite on the account of some manifest Villany, or some Design contrary to express Law; as the Companies of Thieves, Beggars, Strowlers, Pirates, Highwaymen, &c. but likewise any Confederacies between Subjects built on a private Compact, without the Consent of the Government, and repugnant to the End of civil Communities: Which are usually term'd Conspiracies or Factions. The Design of these is various. Sometimes the Persons thus associating aim at the chief Command, and would seize the Government into their own Hands: sometimes they propose, by this means, to bring the Management of publick Business to their own Humour or Advantage. Some are for increasing their private Fortunes by plundering the Publick: Others bandy into Factions, only to secure themselves from Punishment. Nay, those Confederacies which carry a plausible Pretence, as suppose Protection from Danger, Redress of Grievances, Removal of evil Counsellors, and those likewise, the Cause of which is kept secret, are suspicious and dangerous. For in the first place, this is to invade the Office of the Sovereign, by entering upon those Affairs which belong solely to his Care and Direction; and then farther, when the Mutineers are grown confident of their own Strength, they may easily be encouraged to turn it upon the State b. Hence many Actions, not otherwise culpable in their own Nature, become unlawful, when perform'd in a tumultuous or factious manner. Thus to petition the Government, or to accuse any Person of a supposed Crime, are Proceedings which the Law allows; but to do either of these, with a numerous Body of Men gather'd for that purpose, bears the Appearance of Riot and Sedition. And so in martial Laws, it is usually made a capital Offence, for Soldiers to petition for Pay, in a large Company drawn together on that Design c.

XXIV. Besides that common Bond, which engageth all Subjects to their respective Sovereigns, there lies a particular Obligation on those who are entrusted by the higher Powers with the Exercise of some part of the Government, in their Name and by their Authority; and who pass under the general Style of Magistrates and publick Ministers. Distinct from these are the private Ministers or Servants of the a Comp. Hobbes, Leviath. c. 22.

b Thus Orbo speaks in Troitus. (Hist. L. 1. c. 84. in the Beginning.) At present indeed, and in the Po? You now hold, You are for me; but whilst You run up and down in the dark, and All are in Confusion round You, Chance or Opportunity may engage You against me.

c Act Acts xxix. 39, 40. Vid. Hobbes, De Civ. c. 13, f. 12, 13. & Leviath. c. 22. where he compares Lawful Bodies to the Meltes, and unlawful to Wens, Balls, and Posthumes, engendred by the unnatural Conflux of Evil Humours.

Prince, who perform common Offices for him, as they would for any other Master. Amongst the former kind, or those who serve the Prince in this politick Capacity, there is this Difference observable, that some of them exercise a part of the Government and princely Office, and do therefore in such a particular Measure represent the Person of the Sovereign; who are properly and strictly term'd publick Ministers: Others barely assist in the Dispatch and Execution of publick Business. To the first Class belong the Regents, or Protectors of the Kingdom, during either the Minority, or Captivity, or Delirium of the Prince; then the Governours of Provinces, Cities, and Districts; the Commanders of the Militia, by Land or Sea; the Directors of the Treasury; the Judges and others concern'd in pronouncing or executing Justice; the publick Censors of Doctrines, Ambassadors to foreign States, and the like. In the other Class, we are to reckon the Counsellors, who do not themselves exercise any part of the Sovereignty, but only declare to the Sovereign their Opinion about Affairs: Those likewise who are any other way serviceable to the publick Management; as the Secretaries, the Gatherers, Keepers or Dispensers of the Revenue, the Soldiery; those who lend an inferior Assistance in the Proceedings of Justice, and if there be any others of the like Characters; the Order and Distinction of which, in every particular State, may easily be understood.

a Comp. Hobbes Leviath. c. 23. & Bodin. De Republ. l. 3. c. 7.

C H A P. III.

Of the Generation of Civil Sovereignty or Majesty.

- | | |
|---|--|
| I. Sovereignty the Result of those Covenants by which the publick Body was first united. II. This is done by the Divine Will and Approbation. III. Whether the Majesty of Princes is immediately derived from GOD. IV. The Arguments which some make use of to prove the Affirmative. V. Civil Authority not the Effect of War. | VI. Whether a Father of a Family may, without any new Act, commence a Prince. VII. How a Vassal or Feudatory may become a sovereign Lord. VIII. Whether a Free State, or a Monarch, resigning their Power into other Hands, are the efficient Cause of the Sovereignty produced. IX. Who has properly the Power of conferring the regal Title. |
|---|--|

LET us proceed to examine, whence that Sovereignty or supreme Command, which appears in every State, and which, as a kind of Soul, informs, enlivens, and wields the publick Body, is immediately produced. In order to which Enquiry, we suppose, first of all, that Civil Authority, for the obtaining of its just Effect, requires as well natural Strength, by means of which the Subject, if he presumes to decline Obedience, may be terrified into his Duty, through the Fear of Punishment; as also a Title, by Virtue of which, as by just Right, the Performance, or the Omission of any Action, may be imposed on others: To which Title there answers in the Subject an Obligation to comply with what is thus enjoin'd. Now both these Requisites do immediately flow from those Pacts by which the State is united and subsists. For tho' no Person can transfer his Strength to another by any real and natural Conveyance, yet he is supposed to be Master of other Mens Strength, according to whose Pleasure they are bound to exert and apply it, not having any Power to resist or to refuse his Commands. In as much as there can be no other way of transferring Strength amongst Men. And since all the Members of the State, in submitting their Wills to the Will of a single Director, did, at the same time, thereby oblige themselves to Non-resistance, or to obey him in all his Desires, and Endeavours of applying their Strength and Wealth to the good of the Publick; it appears, that he who holds the sovereign Rule, is possess'd of sufficient Force to compel any Persons to a Discharge of the several Injunctions, which he lays upon them^a. So likewise, the same Covenant affords a full and easy Title, by which the aforesaid Sovereignty appears to be establish'd, not upon Violence, but in a lawful manner, upon the voluntary Consent and Subjection of the respective Members. This then is the nearest and immediate Cause, from which sovereign Authority, as a moral Quality, doth result. For if we suppose Submission in one Party, and in another the Acceptance of that Submission, there accrues presently to the latter a Right of imposing Commands on the former; which is what we term Sovereignty or Rule. And as by private Contract, the Right of any thing which we possess, so by Submission the Right to dispose of our Strength and our Liberty of acting, may be convey'd to another. Whence, if any Person should, for Instance, voluntarily and upon Covenant, deliver himself to me in Servitude, he thereby really confers on me the Power of a Master. Against which way of arguing, to object the vulgar Maxim of Quod quis non habet, non potest in alterum transferre, No one can transmit to another what he doth not possess himself; is but a Piece of trifling Ignorance. Yet still to procure to the supreme Command an especial Efficacy and a sacred Respect, there is need of another additional Principle, besides the Submission of the Subjects. And therefore, he who affirms Sovereignty to result immediately from Compact, doth not in the least detract from the sacred Character of civil Government, or maintain that Princes bear Rule by human Right only, not by divine.

^a Liv. l. 2. c. 59. The Force of the Supreme Command is built on the Consent of those who obey.

II. Yet this is beyond Dispute, that found Reason sufficiently intimated to Mankind, how that upon their Multiplication in the World, their Honour, Peace, and Safety could not subsist, without the Establishment of civil States, which cannot be understood without a supreme Authority. And thus both the States themselves, and the chief Government erected in them, are suppos'd to proceed from God, as the Author of the Law of Nature. For not those things alone are from God, which he institutes and ordains by his own immediate Act, without the Concurrence or Interposition of Men; but those likewise which Men themselves, by the Guidance of good Reason, according as the different Circumstances of Times and Places required, have taken up, in order to the fulfilling of some Obligation laid upon them by God's Command^a. And, in as much as the Law of Nature cannot, amongst a great Multitude, be conveniently exercis'd, without the Assistance of civil Government; 'tis manifest, that God, who impos'd the said Law on human Race, did command likewise the establishing of civil Societies, so far as they serve for Instruments and Means of improving and enforcing the Law of Nature. And hence likewise it is, that God, in the Holy Scriptures, expressly approves of such Government, acknowledging and confirming it, as his own Appointment, and guarding by the severest Penalties the sacred Awe and Veneration of it. But whether or no God expressly commanded the instituting of States, as to particular Times and Places, is a Point in which we have no certain Information. For the Precept of the Sons of Noah, concerning *Judicatures*¹, which may perhaps be urged to this Purpose, doth not specify the particular Time and Place of erecting them. So that we may understand it in this Sense, that the Methods of judicial Processes, when once settled, ought diligently to be exercis'd and administer'd. Bœcler^b explains the Origin of civil Government with very little difference from what hath been here deliver'd on the same Head. The Supreme Authority, says he, is not to be deriv'd from the bare Act of Man, but from the Command of God, and from the Law of Nature: Or from such an Act of Men, by which the Law of Nature is follow'd and obey'd. For he that enjoins Society, enjoins likewise the Order and Method to be observ'd in it: But now the very Soul of Society is Government; and of all the Societies the most perfect is a civil State. Which is right enough; provided we add, that the Divine Command, concerning the Erection of civil States, exerted and discover'd it self through the Suggestion of Reason, by which Men came to understand, that the Honour, Gracefulness, and Peace, which the Law of Nature proposeth as its Aim, could not possibly subsist without civil Society; especially after Mankind was considerably multiplied. And in this very Point consists the Difference between civil Communities and other human Institutions: The latter also being introduced through the Persuasion of sound Reason, yet not after such a manner, as if the Honour, Safety, and Welfare of human Race could not be preserv'd without it. As to the Fifth Commandment in the Decalogue², which enjoins Obedience to the civil Magistrates (urg'd by Bœcler) we are to observe, that this doth not exclude the next and immediate Cause of Government; as the Commandment against Theft doth not, in the least, exclude or supersede the Origin of Property. And then for the Title of God's Vicegerents upon Earth, ascrib'd to Governours, we think it may very fairly and conveniently be explain'd in this Sense; that whereas the Peace and good Order of Mankind was not sufficiently procur'd by a bare Reverence towards the Law of Nature, and towards the Author of it, that End is now happily produced by the Virtue and Efficacy of civil Dominion. In which Sense the following Positions of the same Writer are plain and intelligible: Therefore, That a State might properly be a State, and might obtain its End, God by the Law of Nature instituted a certain Order and Method of commanding and obeying, in which Order, by the Will of God, and by the Dictate of natural Reason, there must be somewhat supreme and independent, controulable by no human Pleasure, which as it is subject to God alone, so it is the Second or the Deputy of his Power; and this is nothing else but the supreme civil Authority. But it is purely the Act and Disposal of Men, whether they will intrust the supreme Authority with one, or with many Persons; and what particular Methods they will follow in establishing distinct Forms of Common-

^a Comp. 1 Tim. ii. 2.

^b Ad Grot. l. 1. c. 3. f. 6.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. II.

¹ Vid. Selden. de Jur. N. & G. sec. Hebr. 1. 7. c. 4. &c. & Le Clerc in Deut. i. 17.

² 'Tis in the Original the Fourth Commandment, instead of the Fifth, in which our Author follows the Lutheran division of the Decalogue. Besides, he too freely grants, that it relates in that place to Sovereigns. I know very well, that Divines and Preachers, by Strength of Consequences, or rather Artifices, include all Superiors under the Names of Fathers and Mothers. But no good Interpreter will draw any such Conclusions from thence; and without examining the general Foundation of those tedious Expositions that are commonly made on the Decalogue (on which we may see what Mr. Le Clerc says in his Note on the first Verse of the XX. Chap. of Exod. and what our Author says, after Gronovius, Lib. VIII. Chap. I. Sect 4. towards the End) we need only but consider a little the reason that the Legislator subjoins, to induce the Israelites to observe this Precept, That thy days may be long upon the Land which the Lord thy God giveth thee. This is a manifest Allusion to the efficacy that is attributed to the Prayers of Fathers and Mothers for their Children who are obedient. See Mr. Le Clerc upon this Commandment, and upon Gen. xxvii. 33. This will appear more evident, if the ingenious Exposition of Mr. des Maizeaux (in his Nouvelles de la Republique des Lettres, November 1700. p. 500. &c.) be well grounded.

wealths. Grotius's Opinion concerning the Original of Government is not so profane, but that it may be born with, if assisted by a dexterous Interpretation. He says^a that Men, not influenced by the express Command of God (and no such express Command doth indeed appear) but of their own accord (yet not without the Dictate of right Reason, and the Will and Pleasure of God) having experienc'd the weak Defence of separate Families against the Assaults of Violence (after Mankind had considerably spread and increased) united themselves in civil Society; the Effect of which was civil Power, styled on this Account by St. Peter^b, the Ordinance of Man, as establish'd immediately by human Appointment. But as for the other Assertion of Grotius, That the civil Authority is therefore term'd Divine, or said to be of God, because God approved of what Men wolsomly instituted; we can on no account admit it in this Sense, as if God approved of the Establishment of civil Government (as 'twere) ex post facto, or after it had been actually settled; as he hath been pleas'd, in many Places of Scripture^c, to confirm and ratify the Condition of Servants, which no doubt is an human Invention. But 'twas absolutely requisite to add, that Men were able antecedently to apprehend the Divine Will, by duely weighing the Condition of Mankind upon its Multiplication; which as it could not be preserv'd without civil Societies, or in a solitary Life; so Men, whilst in this Matter they followed the Guidance of Reason, agreeably to the Scope and Design of the Law of Nature, must be supposed to have fulfill'd the Divine Pleasure.

III. Tho' we think what hath been here deliver'd, sufficient as well to sanctify the Original of civil Government, as to engage the Veneration of Subjects towards their Rulers; yet it may be worth our while to consider, what Solidity there is in the Arguments of a late Author^d, who maintains that we ought to go much higher in this Point. He supposeth then, that what is the Cause of civil States is not likewise the Cause of the Publick Government and supreme Authority in them. And therefore he allows the States themselves to be establish'd by Covenants; but asserts on the other side, that the Sovereignty is conferr'd on Princes immediately by GOD himself, and that nothing which proceeds from Men, doth at all contribute to its Production. And, consequently, that a free People, when they voluntarily choose to themselves a King, do not confer Majesty upon him, but only mark out the particular Person on whom that Character is, by the Divine Gift, bestow'd: As in many Boroughs or Towns Incorporate, the Election of Magistrates belongs to such an Order of Men; and yet the Magistrates receive their Power of acting, not from that Order of Men, but from the supreme Ruler in the State. Which Position, tho' it may possibly take with some Persons, through a specious Appearance of more than ordinary Piety; yet 'tis manifest, that it tends to the breaking in funder all those Compacts and fundamental Laws which pass between Princes and Subjects, with regard to the publick Administration. And, in the first place, we cannot admit, that he should ascribe Majesty to Kings alone, and utterly deny it to free States and Democracies. It's true, the Custom of Speech, during these last Ages, seems to have appropriated the Term of Majesty to Kings, by placing it amongst their Royal Titles. Yet this doth not hinder but that the same Word may be used to denote the supreme Authority under any Form of Government. And thus too, that Definition of Majesty, poor and dry as it is, in which he calls it, The chief Power every where over the State, agrees as well to a Senate, or to a popular Assembly. Tho' in this respect Kings have the Pre-eminence, that each particular Member of the Senate, or of the general Assembly, is subject to the supreme Power of the People; whereas the Person of a King acknowledgeth no Superior upon Earth. Yet as to the Force and Efficacy of Command over Subjects, 'tis the very same under all sorts of Constitutions. To proceed, the sole Cause of this Majesty he makes God himself, Who, upon the People's Election, immediately transfuseth it on the Prince. Here I am mistaken, if he did not conceive Majesty under the Notion of a real and physical Quality; as they manifestly do, who affirm civil Government to be the Creature, or the Act and the Work of God, so that no other Creature, either in an equal or in a superior kind of Causation, or by any innate Principles, doth at all contribute to its Institution. By which Discourse their gross Ignorance of moral Things is sufficiently betray'd. The Argument which sets forth, how that Persons, exalted to the Throne from an inferior Station, have suddenly

^a L. I. c. 4. f. 7. n. 3.

^b Epist. 1. c. 2. v. 13.

^c Ephes. vi. 5, 6, 7, 8. Coloss. iii. 22. 1 Tim. vi. 1. Titus ii. 9.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. III.

^d Joh. Fred. Hornius de Civitate, l. 2. c. 1. Never were more pitiful and weaker Reasons given than in this Matter. If any one has a mind to see a Specimen of 'em, among abundance of Authors whom their Prejudices, Interest, or the Situation of Affairs where they liv'd, have most grossly perverted; let him only read, for Instance, Bæcler's Dissertation de Auspicio Regio, in the first Vol. of the Collection of his Dissertations Academiques; and Mr. Creech's English Notes upon his Translation of Lucretius in 1683. in King James II's Reign, p. 52, &c. The last is so much the more ridiculous, as he has brought it in by Head and Shoulders, and that of sixty Pages which he spends in giving us some few Notes upon his Translation, he wastes five or six in an impertinent Digression. But when he afterwards publish'd the Original with larger Notes in 1695. upon the Revolution, the Reader will find that he takes care not to mention any thing of this pretended immediate Emanation of Divine Authority. A Danish Divine has in our Time, in a more effectual manner, refuted the contrary Opinion, by causing to be burnt by the Hangman at Copenhagen, a Book of Mr. Thomasius, in which that Civilian maintain'd, that God is not the immediate Cause of Sovereignty. See what blind Zeal, or rather Flattery of Churchmen can do! As for Hæctor Godefroy Musius, who is the other I am speaking of, which is to be found in the Bibliothèque Univers. Tom. xi. Pag. 47. &c. Mr. Thomasius, from whom I have the Account of the Fact I have just now related, observes in the same place, Inst. Jurispr. Div. Lib. iii. Cap. vi. Sect. 68. that it was formerly propos'd in France, in the general Assembly of the States of the Kingdom, to canonize this Proposition, that Kings derive their Authority immediately from God; but it came to nothing, because several made it appear, that the Welfare of the State did by no means depend on any such Opinion; and if so, that the Question must be left to the Determination of the Schools. Grand. Hist. de France, Liv. I.

been furrounded with an unufal Glory or Splendor, which could not fhine from any other place than Heaven; may ferve for a Declamation before fuch an Audience, as are unable to diftinguifh empty Flourifhes from folid Truth. That Kings are the peculiar Care of GOD Almighty, ferves not in the leaft towards the Proof of his Opinion. And befides, the Divine Providence hath been pleas'd to fhew no lefs Evidences, as it were, of a particular Favour, to other Perfons preserv'd to be hereafter in an eminent manner ufeful to the World. At the fame time, we read of no inconfiderable Number of Kings, who have drunk Poyfon out of their precious Cups, or have fallen by the Treachery of their own People. As to that Temper and Constitution of Body in fome Princes², which is observ'd to produce Effects not unlike to Miracles, the Phyficians are to be confulted on the Point. Nor doth he prove what he aims at, by alledging the Punifhment, either of tyrannical Kings, or of ftubborn and rebellious Subjects; or by heaping up Testimonies in fo plentiful a Store (which too acknowledge God no lefs for the Author of aristocratical than of monarchical Government) or by reciting thofe Divine Predictions concerning fome Kings, the like to which have not been wanting in popular States. And as to what pafs'd in the Nation of the Jews, this can carry no Evidence as to the Original of Kingly Government in general; there having been many other Kingdoms establish'd long before: But it belongs rather to the manner of conferring the fupreme Command on a particular Perfon, according to particular People.

IV. Let us confider the Arguments by which he labours to make out, that all human Causes are of a far more inferior Power, than to be capable of producing Majefty or Sovereignty, the moft august thing upon Earth. Amongft which, that which carries the Prize from all the reft is this; That neither particular Men, nor a loofe and ungovern'd Multitude, are themfelves endued with Majefty, therefore neither can they confer it on the Prince. But now it may and often does happen, that a moral Quality (in which Clafs Government ought to be reckon'd) fhall be produc'd in another Perfon, by the Concurrence of thofe who had it not truly and properly in themfelves before; fo as that they may be rightly deem'd the productive Cause of the faid Quality^a. As many Voices joining in Confort produce a Harmony, which no fingle Perfon could pretend to by himfelf. And on this account it muft be censured as very falfe reasoning in Socrates, when he encouraged Alcibiades not to fear the venturing himfelf in an Affembly of the People, by telling him, If you defpife them Man by Man, you ought likewise to defpife them when gather'd into a Multitude ^v. Farther, fince Sovereignty refults from the Non-refiftance of the Subjects, and from their Conceffion that the Sovereign fhall difpofe of their Wealth and Strength; 'tis eafily feen that fome fcatter'd Seeds, as it were, of Government lie hid in particular Perfons, which, by Means of concurrent Compacts, being excited into Motion, do grow and fhoot forth. So that 'tis grofly abfurd to infer, that Sovereignty is not immediately of human Original, becaufe it is not difcoverable in the natural Powers or Faculties of Men: As if we were all this while fpeaking of a physical Quality; or as if there were no moral Qualities, diftinct from the physical. I know not what Relifh wife and Christian Princes can have for fuch flattering 'Titles as thefe; that God tranfcribes in the Perfon of the King that Right of governing Mankind, which he held alone by virtue of Creation: Yet fo as that GOD ftill retains his antient Right, and therefore reacheth out this Power to Kings by Accumulation, and not by an absolute Abdication: Together with the like Infnuations, by which bafe and wicked Parasites delight in raifing the Glory of their Prince to the Difhonour of their God. You would think 'twas a moot Point with them, whether after the constituting of Monarchs, God referv'd to himfelf any Power or Command over mortal Race; and whether thefe who govern below, ought to own his fuperior Authority. Certainly nothing can be more manifelt, than that civil Government is quite different in kind from that Command of God, which he holds by Right of Creation; and therefore 'tis not only abfurd, but blafphemous to affirm, that the Sovereignty which God alone is invested with, as the Maker of all Things, be out of his fingular Benevolence doth communicate to Men.

Endeavouring to give us another Proof that God is the immediate Cause of Sovereignty, he diftinguifheth between the immediate efficient Cause, and the immediate constituting, or appointing Cause. The Sovereignty only is, he fays, immediately produced by God; the Crown and Scepter being commonly receiv'd from other Hands. Hence he obferves, "that we ought to feparate thefe two ways of fpeaking, God is the immediate Cause of Sovereignty; and God immediately constitutes the Prince, or God immediately confers the Sovereignty. It being fomewhat tolerable to affirm, that God confers the Sovereignty by the Mediation or Interpofition, either of the popular Vote, or of Succeffion, or of Occupancy^c. But that in every Act of producing Sovereignty, God

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. 111.

^a The Souls of Kings and of Coblers are caft in the fame Mould. When we confider the Importance of the Actions of Princes, and their Weight, we imagine that they are produced from fome Causes as important and weighty. We are miftaken; they are mov'd to and fro in their Inclinations by the fame Springs as we are in ours. The fame Reafon that makes us quarrel with a Neighbour, happening in a Prince, makes him ruin a whole Province. Their Wills are as fickly as ours, but their Power is greater. The fame Defires move a Worm and an Elephant. Montaigne's Effays, B. 2. c. 12. p. 343. Edit. Paris. in fol.

^b See Algernon Sidney's Difcourfe upon Government, C. 2. f. 9.

^c Vid. L. 41. t. 1. l. 46. D. de Acquir. Rer. Dom.

^b In Ælian, V. H. l. 2. c. 1.

^c In this Senfe are we to underftand that Paflage of Themifius, Orat. 6. Ed. Harduin. p. 73. C. Do not imagine the Soldiers to have been the main Causes and Authors of this Election. The Concurrence of their Votes was the Act of Heaven: The Vacancy of the Throne was the Appointment of the Gods, and Human Affiftance was only the Inftrument of completing and executing the Divine Counfels.

cannot bear or permit any proximate or secondary Cause'. Now whoever looks more nicely into things, will perceive that these Men apprehend Sovereignty under the Idea of some physical Being, which, after the Production of it by God, wanders up and down in the World, without any certain Seat or Subject, till the Prince being at length design'd by the People, it falls upon him, and cloaths him with august Majesty and Splendor. Where they must certainly be at a Loss, if a Man should be so importunate as to demand, whether this Sovereignty, before it finds a place of Rest in the Person of some Prince, be a Substance or an Accident; and if the latter, how it can exist without a Subject? Farther, at what time it was created? at the Beginning of the World, or afterwards? As likewise, whether there be but one Sovereignty only, diffused through the whole World; or whether particular Princes have each a peculiar and entire Sovereignty of their own? Whether upon the Death of the Prince the Sovereignty dies with him; or whether it survives, like the Soul in Separation from the Body, or finds Reception, by a kind of Metempsychosis, in the new King^a? But in Truth, to enquire after the Cause of Majesty or Sovereignty, taken in a separate Sense, is no better than Impertinence; in as much as it never exists, but in the Subject. 'Tis just the same as if I should make a particular Search into the Cause of human Nature, separately consider'd; when as to the Cause of Men, as they exist, I have sufficient Information. And since this Author, before any hath obtain'd a Right to the Sovereignty, leaves it in the Power of the People, to elect what Person, and at what time they please, or to introduce any Form of Government^b; I would desire to know what would become of his Sovereignty, should all the People agree in preferring an aristocratical or democratical State to it? We acknowledge indeed, that Election, properly and strictly speaking, is no more than the Manner of acquiring Empire. But there seems to be no reason which should hinder, why by one and the same Act the Person may not be mark'd out, and likewise the Sovereignty conferr'd, as then first commencing its Existence. For 'tis very childish to imagine, that in moral Things, when any Right, or any moral Quality is conferr'd on another, it must of Necessity have somewhere existed separately before. On the contrary, it is evident, that Rights and all other moral Qualities do rather arise from the Concurrence of Mens Minds in mutual Compacts^c. Nor will there be any Difficulty in removing that other Scruple; If the People be the secondary Cause of Sovereignty, then the Power, by which they produce it, must have been receiv'd from God; which doth not appear to be true in Fact. For, since God hath implanted in Men a Care of their own Safety, hath commanded them to maintain a peaceable and well order'd Conversation, and hath likewise endued them with Reason, whence they are enabled to find out Means conducing to this End, amongst which the Establishment of civil Government justly challengeth the first place; who will make any farther Question, whether or no the Power of setting this Constitution on Foot was a Privilege vouchsafed to them by God himself? Those Maxims of Philosophy, which our Author so frequently lets fly against us, are partly but of slender Credit, and partly, through Ignorance and Mistake, are unskilfully transferr'd from natural to moral Things; which we are not now at leisure to discuss in particular. And then, as for the Account which Ovid gives of the Origin of Sovereignty, in the Fifth Book of his Fastii, 'tis meer poetical Fiction.

V. No less Pains hath he taken in confuting the Opinions of those, who derive the supreme Authority from any other Head. Upon which Argument, as he hath deliver'd a great deal of Truth, so are there some things which are justly liable to Censure. He is so far in the right, when he denies that Wars, occasion'd by the Ambition or the Lust of Tyrants, could give Rise to the sovereign Power. For Wars occasion'd by Tyrants do certainly pre-suppose civil Communities. Yet still, the notorious Violence of many Persons, and their Desire of oppressing others, might possibly give occasion to the Fathers of Families, living independent and scatter'd up and down, to unite in political Bodies¹. It is moreover evident, that most Empires, which have made a Noise and Figure in the World, if not all in general, have owed their Growth and Progress to War. And yet this is no reason why we should pitch upon War for the Original and Fountain of Government. For at least, that Band of Men, which first conspired to invade their Neighbours, voluntarily engaged in Subjection to a common Leader. And as for those who were invaded, no lawful Sovereignty could be establish'd over them, till by giving their Covenant and Faith, they had promis'd Obedience to the Conquerour.

VI. Yet it is not so utter an Impossibility, that civil Empire might arise from paternal Government²; such, we mean, as extended it self to some Breadth, taking many petty Villages under its Direction. 'Tis true, the Command of Fathers belongs properly to the Care of educating Children, as that of Masters doth to the Management and Improvement of Estates; nor can either be alter'd by the bare Number of Children, or of Servants. Yet there is not so wide a Distance between paternal and civil Government, but that Men might pass from one to the other, without the Production of any new Sovereignty by the immediate Power of God. For suppose a Father of a Family, bless'd with a

^a Add the Dispute in Father Paul's History of the Council of Trent, l. 2. p. 213. concerning the Nature of the Sacramental Symbols, where the Managers are put to great Shifts, by Reason of their Unskilfulness in Moral Things.

^b See Deuteron. xvii. 14.

^c Comp. Hobbes de Cive, l. 2. f. 4. see also above in B. 3. c. 5. f. 2, 3, 4.

¹ See Mr. Barbeyrac's First Note upon the Seventh Section of the First Chapter of this Book.

² See Mr. Barbeyrac's Second Note upon the Tenth Section of the Second Chapter of the Sixth Book, and Mr. Lock's second Treatise of Civil Government, C. 8. §. 105, &c.

plentiful Issue and with a numerous servile Train, to allow both the Children and the Servants, by Emancipation or Infranchisement, the Privilege of managing their own Concerns, and of constituting particular Families, upon this Condition, that in order to the common Security, they shall still be subject to his Government; I know not what such a Person wants to make him a compleat Prince, provided he be Master of so much Strength, as is sufficient to compass the End of a civil State. Upon his Decease, if he left any Appointment with regard to a Successor, especially if his Sons consented to the Disposal, that Settlement shall be followed. If he did not, then the People, as if they were to frame the whole Constitution anew, shall resolve what Government or what Governour they will hereafter receive. In which Case there will be no Breach of the Law of Nature, tho' the younger Son should, by the free Votes of the Assembly, be elected in his Father's room ^a.

VII. He farther endeavours to evince, that neither can such a Person be term'd the Cause of Sovereignty, who first possessing it himself, confers the regal Dignity on some one who is at present his Subject, releasing him from all future Dependence: As if a King remits to his Vassal his former Engagement, and allows him to hold as a sovereign Prince, what he before enjoy'd only as a feudatary Tenant; or if he makes a Grant to any of his Subjects of some Province in his Dominions, exempting it, for the future, from his own Jurisdiction. For a Cession of this kind is, he says, no more than the Manner of obtaining Sovereignty, and may be reduced to the Head of Elections. Now whoever thoroughly considers the Matter, will easily find out, how the supreme Authority is produced in this Case. And 'tis plainly thus; the King by quitting his Right, both over the Vassal and over the Feud, at the same time makes one Person capable of sovereign Power, and others capable of submitting to the Exercise of it. For that feudal Territory cannot hereafter belong to the Vassal, as an absolute and independent Prince, unless it be first utterly disengaged from the Authority of the Lord. And by this Means the Government, thus establish'd, really and truly proceeds from the Consent of the People. For if the Lord hath Power, by his own sole Act, to bestow such a Province on whom he pleaseth, he certainly, at the Beginning, receiv'd this Power from the Consent of the People, either voluntarily given, or obtain'd by the Issue of a just War. But if the Lord cannot do this by his own bare Authority, then 'tis evident, that the express Consent of the People must concur in the Disposal.

VIII. To conclude this Dispute; the same Author in the last place maintains, that even then the People are not the Cause of Sovereignty in the Prince, when having before liv'd under a democratical Form, they choose a single Governour. For, says he, the Sovereignty cannot here be conferr'd on the Monarch, till such time as the People have first renounced their Right; but the People in that very Moment, in which they renounce their Right, have no longer any thing to do with the Sovereignty: therefore all that they do, is to elect a Person, who having receiv'd his Power from GOD, shall, for the future, rule over them. But now upon the same Argument, it may be denied, that Property can pass from one Man to another. For, just in this manner, another cannot become Proprietor of my Possession, till I have first resign'd my Property. But after my Resignation, I have lost my Property, and consequently cannot transfer that on another, which I have not my self; and therefore all that I do, is to choose a certain Person, into whom the Property (sprouting up anew, I know not where) is afterwards to be infused.

As to the voluntary Abdication of Monarchs, his Opinion runs in the following Sense; That the Government being first abdicated, and the People loos'd from their Allegiance; the Sovereignty doth afterwards return to its original Author, in order to its being again brought back, and communicated to the appointed Heir. This is manifestly a Metempsychosis, or Transmigration of the sovereign Power; which a wise Man will not require us to be at the trouble of confuting. In reality, he who abdicates the Government, does not give it up, but leaves it in the hands of the People, who are the true Authors of all Government, and who are the Order of Succession, and before given him a Right.

IX. It may not be improper, before we leave our present Subject, to enquire in short, to whose Power it belongs, to confer the regal Titles and the Ensigns of Majesty, or any Denomination by which the supreme and independent Authority in State, inhering in a single Person, is wont to be express'd. And here it's manifest, that to bestow the Name and Title, belongs to the same Persons, who have a Right to bestow the same thing it self, that is, the supreme Command. And by Consequence, a People, that either now first unite themselves in a civil Body, or else, laying aside their former Frame of Government, resolve on a monarchical Constitution for the future, whilst they confer on one Man the Authority over themselves, they, by this very Act, give him a Right to bear the Title and Style of King, and to signify his high Station by decent Badges of Honour. Such a King, as he owes his Dignity and Empire to no foreign Power, so he need not wait for the Consent and Approbation of other Princes or States, in order to the assuming the Actions or the Character proper to his Office. But as a Foreigner could not dispute his Right to the Government, without a manifest Injury, so would it be injurious likewise to deny him the Appellation of King. Nor can any Preference to the contrary be drawn from the small Extent of his Dominions. For a Kingdom doth not denote any certain Measure of Territory, or of Power; but a particular Form of civil State, which may happen to be greater or less. But to make him a King, who before own'd the Command of some Superior, 'tis necessary, that he obtain the Consent of his Superior, to release himself and his Dominions from the Bond, by which they stood engaged to their former Lord. Thus he who is under a feudal Obligation, cannot, without his Lord's Consent, take up the Character of a sovereign Prince. And unless he be releas'd from this Obligation, tho' his Lord should grant him the Title, yet he will hold the Dignity itself after an imperfect and subordinate manner. So we find that the Successors of Alexander the Great durst not assume the regal Style, till Alexander's own Family was extinct, to which the Sovereignty did of Right belong. And even after this, 'twas necessary for them to have the Consent of the People under their Command, which the numerous Forces kept in Pay about them, secured beyond the Possibility of a Denial a. In the same manner, he who subdues a Territory by Arms, as he may, by the Right of War, acquire the Power and Authority, so may he likewise obtain the Title and Character of a King b. If a Prince would erect any particular Province of his Empire into a distinct Kingdom, the way of compassing this Design is to separate it from the rest of the Body, and to govern it by a peculiar Jurisdiction, independent of his other Dominions. That the Roman Senate frequently bestow'd the Title of Friend and King, as Marks of Esteem and Honour, is a piece of History vulgarly known. And this they might justly do with regard either to those Princes, on whom they themselves had conferr'd the respective Dominions, or to those, over whose Kingdoms they still held some superior and transcendent Right. But to have offer'd the same Title, as purely a Matter of Favour, to other Monarchs, over whom they could not pretend to the least Authority, had been a most insolent piece of Uturpation. And yet such a presuming Prerogative the Popes have not been ashamed to challenge over the most free and independent States of Europe c.

^a See Genes. XXVII. 29, 37.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTE on §. IX.

¹ Mr. Titus (Observ. DLXI.) asserts not: And that Foreigners are at their Liberty whether they will acknowledge or not acknowledge such a Sovereign for King; because, says he, this Title generally gives a Rank and Prerogatives that may occasion some Prejudice to other States.

a Vid. Cornel. Nep. Eumen. Plutarch Demet. Justin. l. 15. c. 2. Appian. Alexand. in Syriæ. Diodor. Sic. l. 20. c. 54, 55.
 b Vid. Justin. l. 41. c. 4, 5.
 c See Father Paul's History of the Council of Trent, l. 5. p. 354. where he reports, how Paul IV. advanced Ireland to the Honour of a Kingdom; and Thomas's Hist. l. 36. about the Title of Great Duke conferr'd on Cosimo of Flornce.

CHAP. IV.

Of the Parts of Sovereignty, and their natural Connexion.

- | | |
|---|---|
| I. In what Sense the supreme Power may be said to consist of Parts. II. The legislative Power. III. The vindicative Power. IV. The Judiciary Power. V. The Power of War and Peace, and of making Leagues. VI. The Right of appointing Magistrates. VII. The Right of levying Taxes. VIII. The Right of examining Doctrines. | IX. Government a more strict Obligation than bare Compact. X. Who may properly be said to hold a part in the Government. XI. The Connexion of Parts in the supreme Authority demonstrated; XII. And illustrated, XIII. Many are for dividing those Parts: XIV. Grotius amongst the rest; whose Opinion is particularly discuss'd. |
|---|---|

THE supreme civil Authority, tho' in its own Nature it be one indivisible thing, yet because it exerts its self in different Acts, according as it is employ'd about different Means, necessary to the Preservation of the State, is generally conceiv'd as consisting of many Parts; with Resemblance to those Parts which are term'd Potential; in natural Philosophy. For the sovereign Command is by no means such an entire compound Being, as is made up of heterogeneous Parts, which as they are join'd and knit together by some common Band, compose one Body, yet so as that each Part is capable of subsisting separately by its self. But as the

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES.

* These are Grotius's Terms, in B. 1. c. 3. f. 17. n. 1. 'Tis founded upon a false Hypothesis, which our Author has confuted in the preceding Chapter; by which the Supreme Civil Authority is conceiv'd to be as a physical Being, that has no Parts, and that only receives different Names according to the Diversity of Objects, with regard to which it acts. Indeed, the Supreme Civil Authority contains an Union of different Rights, or different distinct Powers, but conferred for the same End, that is, for the good of the Publick, so that to consider them in themselves, nothing hinders but that they may be either entirely separate one from another, or in the Hands of different Persons. See Mr. Titius's Observ. DLXIX. Numb. 2. and his Specimen Juris Publici, &c. Lib. VI. Cap. VIII. § 26. &c. as also what the learn'd Obrrecht says against our Author, in his Dissertation de Unitate Republicæ in S. Imperio Romano, §. 5. 'Tis the XIV of the Collection publish'd in 1704.

† By that is understood the Species of the same Genus: For the potential whole is what the Schoolmen call in other Terms, the Logical or universal whole; upon which we may consult the Metaphysicians. Thus Sovereignty is conceiv'd as a Genus, whose Species are the Sovereign Power of making War or Peace; the Sovereign Power of punishing; the Sovereign Power of raising Taxes, &c. To that is oppos'd the subordinate Parts of Sovereignty, that is, the different Subjects, Soul is one single Substance, dispensing Life and Vigour through the whole Body, and yet as it exerciseth different Operations, in Proportion to the Difference of the Objects presented to it, or of the Organs through which it works, is conceiv'd as having Potential Parts; so, in like manner, the Supreme Authority, as it is busied in prescribing general Rules of Action, is term'd the Legislative Power; as it determines the Controversies of the Subjects by the Standard of these Rules, 'tis the Judiciary Power; as it either arms the Subjects against Foreigners, or commands them to lay down their Hostility, 'tis the Power of War and Peace; as it takes in the Assistance of Ministers in the Discharge of publick Business, it is call'd the Right or Power of appointing Magistrates; and so with regard to its other Offices and Functions.

II. What therefore these Parts of Sovereignty are, may plainly be discover'd from the Nature and End of Civil States. A State then is a Moral Body conceiv'd to act by one Will. But in as much as it is made up of many Natural Persons, each of whom hath his particular Will and Inclination; and since these several Wills cannot, by any Natural Union, be join'd together, or temper'd and dispos'd into a lasting Harmony, therefore that one Will, which we attribute to the State, must be produced by the Agreement of all Persons, to submit their own private Wills to the Will of one Man, or one Assembly of Men, on whom the Government hath been conferr'd. Farther, since the respective Members ought in Duty to conform themselves to the Will of the State, 'tis necessary, that this Will be made known to them by clear and evident Signs. Hence we apprehend it to be one of the chief Offices of Sovereignty, to prescribe and declare to others what they ought to perform, or to omit. And because 'twould be impossible, in so great a Multitude, to give Injunctions to every particular Man, on occasion of every particular Action; therefore general Rules are establish'd, for the perpetual Information and Direction of all Persons in all Points, either of positive, or of negative Duty. Besides, since we easily discover amongst Men an immense Variety of Judgments and of Apperites, whence an infinite Field of Controversy might arise; it is on this Score highly conducive to the common Peace, that publick Determinations should settle what each Man ought to look on as his own, what as auther's; what is to be esteem'd lawful, or unlawful in the State, what honest, or dishonest; as likewise, what Degree every Man retains of his natural Liberty, or after what Manner each Person is to moderate the Use and Exercise of his own private Rights, in order to the publick Tranquillity.

III. To proceed; the chief End of Civil Communities is, that Men, by conspiring mutually to aid and assist each other, may be secured against those Damages and Injuries, which they might otherwise suffer from their own Kind; and by this means may either enjoy Peace, or have sufficient Defence against any Assaults or Molestations. Now in order to the procuring of Peace, 'tis in an especial manner necessary, that each Person be so far guarded against the Violence of his Fellows, as that he may be able to live securely; that is, without having just Cause to fear Injury from others, whilst he himself is not injurious to others. Indeed, that Men should be absolutely protected from mutual Hurt, or that all Injuries should be impossible, the Condition of human Things will not allow. Yet such Care may be taken, such Provision made, as that there shall be no probable Grounds for the Apprehension of Danger. And this Security is the Aim which Men propos', when they submit themselves to the Direction of others. Of which, if no greater Degree could be obtain'd by joining Strength, than each private Man could give himself by standing singly upon his own Guard, 'twould be folly to renounce our natural Liberty, in which every Person is his own Protector. But to compass this Security, 'tis not enough that each of those who are about to form a Civil Body, do covenant with the rest, by Word, or Writing, that he will not kill, steal, or offer any other Harm or Prejudice: For 'tis manifest how far Human Nature is in most Persons corrupted; and experience sadly informs us, how little Force the Reverence of verbal Engagements, or the Authority of Oaths, hath with the generality of Mankind, towards the keeping them in their Duty, should the Fear of Punishment be once remov'd. For which reason likewise 'tis not enough to have one who shall prescribe Rules of Acting, if he be invest'd with no farther Power. Therefore, to engage Men to an Observance, both of the common Precepts of Nature, and those particular Laws, which are enacted for the good of the State, there must be added the Fear of Punishment, or the different Persons among whom the Sovereignty is divided, as when the Roman Empire was in the Hands of the TRIUMVIRI, Augustus, Mark Anthony, and Lepidus, &c. But I must observe by the bye, that Mr. Courtin, according to his usual Exactness, says in his Index, that by potential parts of a State, Grotius means the parts that have the Sovereign Power; so that, adds he, it happen'd that the same Roman Empire has had two Sovereigns or two potential Parts, who reign'd at once, one in the East, and the other in the West, the Imperial Authority however remaining still one and indivisible. On the contrary, the Subordinate Parts are, according to him, those that are subject to the Sovereign Power, that is, the Subjects of the Provinces that compose the State, which are with respect to the State or Sovereign Power, what in the Schools several Species are with respect to the Genus. By this small Specimen one may easily see what Dependence there is upon this Translator's Explanation both of the Terms and of some Thoughts of Grotius; without saying any thing of the Translation it self. This heap of Nonsense is so much the more inexcusable in him, because he might easily have avoided it by following Gronovius, whose Notes 'tis plain he had read.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES ON §. II.

¹ Tho' here our Author uses the Terms of Hobbes (De Civ. c. 6. s. 9.) yet he means always, that the Laws of a Sovereign include nothing contrary to the Divine Laws, whether Natural or Reveald, as he will prove in the first Chapter of the next Book.

² The latter Part of this Section is taken from our Author's Abridgment, De Off. Hom. & Civ. B. 2. c. 7. s. 2.

and the Power of inflicting what is fear'd. And, that Punishment may produce the proper End of its Institution, it ought to rise to such a Measure and Proportion, as that there shall be manifestly a greater Evil in transgressing the Laws, than in obeying them; so that the Severity of what is to be suffer'd may over-balance any Pleasure, or Profit, which may now, or hereafter be obtain'd by the Offence: It being impossible for Men out of two Evils, not to choose that which to their Judgment appears the least. And thus the regard which Men have to their own Lives and Safeties secures mine. And altho' it may sometimes happen, that Persons shall be so transported, either through Rashness and Precipitancy, or some other extravagant Commotion of Mind, as to prefer the Satisfaction of the Crime to the Bitterness of the Penalty; yet this is to be reckon'd amongst those uncommon and extraordinary Accidents, which the Condition of our Nature, and the Circumstances of our Affairs will not suffer us to prevent. This Power of inflicting Punishment, on those who transgress the Commands of the Sovereign, is presumed to be then confer'd, when particular Men yield up the Use of their own Strength to the Service of the Community. By which Act they oblige themselves to execute Justice on Delinquents, when the Sovereign demands their Assistance in this particular; or at least, not to aid and defend those who are to suffer. But for a Man to oblige himself to undergo Punishment, without Reluctancy, or Resistance, is a void Engagement, and such as cannot hold good, on account of that natural Aversion, which we bear to all things destructive of our Safety and our Life. It is truly enough affirm'd by Mr. Hobbes, that this is the highest Degree of Power, which Man can hold over Man, to be able to prescribe to others, in whatever he thinks beneficial to the State; and by denouncing just Penalties, to terrify the Stubborn and Disobedient into a Compliance with what he thus enjoins. But then, as for what the same Author farther asserts, That he who hath a Right of inflicting Punishment as he shall see fit, hath a Right of compelling all Persons to all things at his Pleasure; it ought to have a Limitation affix'd to it, taken from the End of Civil Government: In as much as we are to presume, that he in whom the Supreme Authority resides, hath no other Will or Pleasure, but such as upon good Principles of Reason appears to have some Tendency towards the said End.

IV. Moreover, since under the exactest Systems of Laws there arise frequent Disputes, about the right Application of them to particular Cases, and many Circumstances are to be consider'd, before a Fact can be pronounced illegal, or the Author of it convicted: On this account the Judiciary Power is supposed to come in to the Assistance and Support of the two

^a De Civ., c. 6. f. 6. ^b Ibid. f. 8. ^c See Ecod. xviii. 15.

^d Add. Bœcler ad Grot. l. 1. c. 3. f. 6. p. 218.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTE on §. VII.

^a This is what St. Paul intimates to us, when he says: For this Cause pay you Tribute also (to the Magistrates) for they are God's Ministers, attending continually upon this very Thing. Rom. xiii. 6. They can't (says Mr. Le Clerc upon this place) leave the care of their own Affairs to apply themselves to those of the State, without having some Recompence for it; nor maintain the Dignity of Ministers of Powers already mention'd. The Office of the Judiciary Power is to hear and decide the Causes of the Subjects, to examine the Actions of particular Men, which are represented as Breaches of the Law; and to pronounce Sentence according to the Legal Penalties. Mr. Hobbes seems to have had an improper Notion of this Power: Since the Right of Judging, as to the Use and Exercise of any Part of the Sovereignty, is understood to be implied or included in the respective Part.

V. But tho' the Means hitherto prescribed may afford the Subjects full Security against those of their own Body; yet this is not enough to answer the End of civil Establishments. For 'tis to little Purpose for Men to be at Peace amongst themselves, if they are not able to defend themselves against Strangers; and this they cannot effect, unless they are united in their Strength. Because it's purely owing to Conjunction, that many are stronger than one; in as much as otherwise a thousand separate Men are not superior in Force to a single Person. In order therefore to the general Safety and Welfare, 'tis necessary, that there be such a Power in the State as may assemble, unite, and arm so many Subjects (or hire Mercenaries in their room) as shall be thought sufficient for the common Defence, with Proportion to the uncertain Number and Strength of the Enemy; and may likewise, when it shall be afterwards expedient, embrace Conditions of Peace. And since both the Seasons of Peace and of War receive a considerable Advantage from Leagues, for the better communicating the Benefits of different States, and for repelling and reducing to Reason some stronger Enemy, by a confederate Force; there must be inherent in the Sovereignty, a Power to enter into such Alliances as shall be serviceable in either Condition, and to engage all the Subjects to a just Observance of them; and at the same time, to derive upon the Publick such Fruits and Advantages, as shall accrue by their Means.

VI. Again, since the Affairs of the Community, occurring as well in Peace as in War, cannot be administr'd and executed without Officers and subordinate Magistrates, there is need of such a Power as may appoint Men to enquire into the Controversies arising between Subjects, to dive into the Policies of neighbouring States, to gather in and give out the publick Revenues, and lastly, in every respect to consult and promote the common Benefit. And then it must be another part of the same Power, to compel these Officers, when once constituted, to the Performance of their Duty, and to call them to account upon proper Occasions.

VII. Farther, in as much as publick Business in the time of War, or of Peace, cannot proceed without Expence, such a Power is likewife requisite, as may set aside for these Uses some part of Goods or Products of the Country; or may compel private Men to contribute so much out of what they separately possess, as is judg'd necessary to support the common Charges; as likewise to command and require the Hands of the Subjects, upon occasion of any needful Work. To the same Power belongs the Invention of other lawful Ways and Means of increasing the Riches of the State. The Principal of which is the Right of imposing Duties on Goods imported, or exported; and also of paring off some moderate Proportion from the Price of Commodities consumed by the Subject.

VIII. Lastly, Tho' to make away the intrinsic Liberty of the Will, and at the same time, to unite and compose Mens Judgments of things in a perpetual Harmony, by an inward Principle, be above human Ability to effect; yet to provide that these Sentiments and Persuasions, however different, may not disturb the publick Peace, is a Business absolutely necessary. For since all voluntary Actions take their Rise from the Will, and have a natural Dependence upon it; and since the Inclination of the Will, to the doing, or the not doing of any thing, is built on the Opinion of that Good, or Evil, of that Reward, or Punishment, which the Party conceives will follow from the Performance, or the Omission; and consequently, since Mens Actions are ever guided by their Opinions; some outward Means must needs be found out, by which these Opinions and Judgments shall be brought, as near as possible, to conspire and agree; at least shall be hindred from giving the State any Disturbance by their Opposition. To this End it is expedient, that the State do publickly own and profess such Doctrines, as are agreeable to the End and Design of Civil Government, and the Minds of the Subjects be from their Childhood grounded in them. In as much as the Generality of Mankind judge of things according as they have been accusom'd, and according to the common Notions, which they see obtain in the World; very few being able, by the Strength of their own Parts, to discern what is good and solid in the Conduct of human Life. There is indeed scarce any one Opinion, either relating to the Worship of God, or concerning those things, the Knowledge of which is strictly term'd human, but may be made the occasion of Dissention, Discord, Reviling; and in the final Issue, of Blood and War. And this doth not happen on account of the Falsity of the Opinion, or because to admit the contrary, would bring heavy Inconveniences on Mankind, or on Civil Communities; but by reason of Mens unhappy Dispositions, who always imagining themselves to be wise, would gladly appear so to all others, and are violently enraged against those who presume to be of the contrary Persuasion. This any one will readily confess, who hath but chanced to cast his Eye on those Quarrels of the learned about meer Trifles, carried on with no less Heat and Fury, than if their Lives and Religions lay at Stake. Now such Differences and Disputes, tho' they cannot be absolutely prevented, yet they may be hindred from interrupting the publick Peace and Tranquillity, by due Penalties enacted against those who shall maintain and foment them. Yet, what we would observe on this Subject, is not properly level'd against those Opinions concerning indifferent Points, but against such as being obtruded upon Mankind, either under the Colour of Religion, or with some other fair Pretence, shock and confound the Laws of Nature, and the Principles of sound Policy, and tend to the breeding of Moral Diseases in a State. Nor will any true and just Opinions be in Danger of suffering by this Censure. For no true Doctrine is opposite to the common Peace; and that which doth contradict Peace cannot be true; unless we may at the same time affirm, that Peace and Concord are repugnant to the Laws of Nature. Wherefore the Power of examining the afore said pernicious Doctrines, and of banishing them from civil Societies, is justly attributed to the supreme ruling Authority b.

a Society, and defend it against those that disturb and invade it without an Expencc. So that this is the Foundation of all the Taxes of lawful Powers, and which consequently a Subject ought to pay; because every one is oblig'd to contribute to the support of the Society, in which he lives quietly, and enjoys the Protection of the Laws. And to this part of Sovereignty we may also refer the Right of coining Money, the Right of Hunting or Fishing; and in general the Power of appropriating the use of things that have been left in common, and that cannot conveniently be divided among private Persons.

^a Plato de LL. l. 11. p. 977. D. Ed. Wech. Let no Man revile another; but in Cases of Doubt and Controversy, let the Parties behave themselves towards each other, and towards the Company, after the manner of Learners, as well as of Teachers; so as utterly to refrain from Reproach. For, to abuse each other in a Dispute with foul and scandalous Language, is to scold like Women: And very frequently Words, which in themselves are trifling Matters, give Occasion to the deepest Hatred and Enmity amongst Men.

^b Diogenes Laert. (in Theophrast. §. 38.) reports a Law of Sophocles Son of Amphiclidas, to this Purpose, That no Philosopher should keep a School, unless by the Decree of the Senate and Commons; and that to do the contrary should be a Capital Crime.

Plato de LL. l. 7. p. 888. C. Ed. Wech. Let no Poet presume to feign any thing, but what is consistent with the Laws of the State, and is just, honest and good. Nor shall he be allow'd to shew his Compositions to any private Persons, before the Guardians of the Laws, and the Judges appointed for this Service, have revised and approved of the Performance. To this Purpose see Casaubon Exercitat. in Baron. and his Epistle to Fronto Duceus, n. 624. Ed. Græv. Nor is it a despicable Remark of Mr. Hobbes, which he gives us in his Book de Homine, c. 13. §. 8. Many Books, says he, we have, compil'd by Romans, either under the Commonwealth, or soon after its Extinction, and by Grecians, during the flourishing Condition of the Athenian State, replenish'd as well with Precepts as Examples, by which the Minds of the Vulgar are render'd averse to Regal Power; and this for no other reason, but because they find these Authors making Panegyrics on the Villanies of base and perfidious Men, that is, on the Murthers of Kings, when they have before branded them with the Name of Tyrants. But still the Genius and Disposition of the Multitude is much more corrupted by the reading of those Books; and the hearing of those Preachers, who would have a Kingdom within a Kingdom, and Ecclesiastical within a Civil Supremacy. Hence instead of the Old Bruti and Cassii, we have our Modern Clements and Ravalliacs, who whilst in assassinating their Princes, they were only the wicked Instruments of other Mens Ambition, thought they did God Service.

IX. Our next Business is to shew, that these Parts of the Sovereign Power are naturally so united, and, as it were, interwoven with one another, that should we suppose some of them to inhere in one Person, some in others, the regular Frame of the State must absolutely be destroy'd ^a. Which Truth that we may thoroughly apprehend, it ought to be observ'd, that there are, above all others, two Bands especially, by which the Wills of many Men, or of whole Assemblies, are clos'd and made to conspire into one; Covenant and Command: Of which, nevertheless, the latter adds a much stronger Tie than the former. They who are held together by bare Covenant, stand oblig'd by the Law of Nature voluntarily to perform the Terms of Agreement; their natural Equality, in other respects, remaining as before. Now so long as the Articles are on both sides observ'd, a fair Union and Concord may continue amongst them. And when any one Party, with a wicked Design, flies from the Engagement, he is guilty of a Breach of the Law of Nature: But then the rest, whose Interest it was that the Covenant should remain inviolable, have no means left of reducing the false Brother to Reason, but meer Force of Arms, in which he who offer'd the Injury, is frequently not inferior to him that receiv'd it. After the same manner, they, who upon equal Terms stand bound to each other by virtue of some League or Confederacy, are at Peace and Agreement, so long as each Party makes good what he promis'd; but when either proves perfidious, the Band of Union is dissolv'd, and an Occasion of Hostility ensues. Whence it appears, that bare Covenants are not Bands sufficient, at least, for the long holding together many Persons in a moral Body; especially since it doth not always so happen, that the smaller and weaker Party recede from their Obligation, to the Prejudice of the more numerous and the more powerful, but very often the direct contrary. And tho' we should suppose, in the principal Compact, a Clause to this Purpose, that whoever presumed to break this Article, should be prosecuted with the united Strength of all the rest, yet (not to say, that this Clause would be of no effect, in case many Persons should join in such a Breach, unless a Democratical Government were establish'd amongst the Members, or unless they who before compos'd a Society, do unite more closely in a formal State) there will be need of another Covenant, to determine what Method shall be observ'd in proceeding against him who shall refuse to stand to this additional Engagement; and so on, in infinitum. But now Sovereignty or Command is a much stronger Tie, for the keeping an united Body of Men in firm Agreement. For they who are bound to each other under the same Government, do not continue equal to the Government itself; but whilst the Power of prescribing Rules to, and of inflicting certain Evils, by way of Punishment, upon such as transgress the Rules precrib'd, is conferr'd either on a single Person, or upon an Assembly; all Persons lie under a far greater Necessity to remain obedient, than if they were united by Compact only; which could not take away the Equality of the Members, or their Right of administering their private Affairs according to their own judgment.

X. It ought farther to be consider'd, that if any will maintain the Potential Parts of the Sovereignty (as they are term'd) to be within the same State, seated in distinct Persons or Councils, they must at the same time necessarily allow, that he to whom any Part belongs, must be furnish'd with sufficient Power, as well to compel the Subjects to the Obedience of what he ordains, by virtue of that Part, as to defend this his Right, when attack'd, or disturb'd; tho' that particular Limb of the Prerogative, which contains the Power of War and Peace, may possibly reside in another Person: And lastly, that he have a right of determining, by his own Judgment, at what time and in what manner, the Part of the Government which he holds shall be exercis'd and employ'd. For to possess a Right of declaring to others what you would have them do, and yet to be destitute of Power, for the obliging those to a just Compliance who refuse your Injunctions, deserves any other Name rather than that of Authority, or Command. And we hold that by a very precarious Title, which we cannot defend against others. Nor is he any better than another's Officer, or Minister, who exerciseth any kind of Right at the Pleasure and Disposal of that other Party.

XI. From what we have laid down, it will be evident, that there is so near and so necessary a Connexion between all the parts of the Sovereignty, as that not one of them can be separated from any other, but the regular Frame of the Commonwealth must be destroy'd; and instead of it an irregular Body must start up, held together only by an infirm and ineffectual Covenant. For if we appropriate the legislative Power to one, and to another the judiciary, each primarily and independently, it will of Necessity follow, that either the former is null and void, or that the latter ministers only to the former. Because, to make Laws which you can't put in Execution is vain and insignificant; and on the other side, to have Strength whereby you may compel and controul, and yet such as you must not use or apply, but at the Pleasure of another, is to be an Officer barely executive. Again, should we grant the latter the Privilege of applying his Strength according to his own Discretion, without being accountable to others, then we utterly overthrow the legislative Power, as before. It is necessary therefore, that both these Powers should depend upon one and the same Will. Nor can the Power of Peace and War, or that of exacting Tribute, be separated from this vindicative, or judiciary Right. In as much as no one can fairly compel the Subjects to bring in Contributions towards the Expences of the State, on either account, but he who hath also the Right to punish the disobedient. Farther, it would be absurd to give the Right of making Leagues for the Service either of Peace, or War, to any other Person, besides him who hath also the Right of decreeing Peace, or War, as he judgeth convenient. For otherwise, either the former will be only a bare Minister, or the latter will depend upon another's Pleasure, in acquiring Means for the Exercise of his own Right. So likewise, if you constitute any Person for the chief Management of Business, and do not, at the same time, empower him to appoint inferior Assistants, and to require their Service in their respective Posts (without which Assistants the Business cannot be perform'd) you really make him as meer a Servant as the rest. For which reason, neither can the Power of appointing Magistrates be divided from the other parts of the Supreme Authority. Lastly, to the same Authority it must belong, to take Cognizance of Doctrines and Opinions, of such especially, as bear any Relation to the End of civil Government, and which are of Force and

^a Add the Preface of Mr. Heber to his Book, as also Leviath. cap. 21. where he reckons up the Mischiefs, that have arisen from the Arbitrary and Unlimited Liberty. Comp. de Civ. c. 6. Leviath. c. 29, 46, 47.

^a Comp. Hobbes lib. 1. c. Horn. l. 3. c. 11. l. 3.

^b See especially Grotius De Imperio summorum Potestatum circa, sacra, c. 1.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. XI.

¹ See a Discourse of our Author's, intitled, De Concordia vere Politicæ, cum Religione Christiana, p. 11. and the Rights of the Christian Church, &c.

² It is, however, worth while to say something upon this important Matter. If we here make use of an unprejudiced Mind, it may be decided in few Words, at least as far as is necessary to establish general Principles, from whence we may easily draw Consequences in particular Cases; and in other Points depending upon that. The following Letter concerning Toleration contains what is sufficient to satisfy us. The Toleration of those that differ from others in Matters of Religion is so agreeable to the Gospel of Jesus Christ, and to the genuine Reason of Mankind, that it seems monstrous for Men to be so blind as not to perceive the Necessity and Advantage of it in so clear a Light. I will not here tax the Pride and Ambition of some, the Passion and uncharitable Zeal of others. These are Faults from which human Affairs can perhaps scarce ever be perfectly freed; but yet such as no body will bear the plain Imputation of, without covering them with some specious Colour; and so pretend to Commendation, whilst they are carried away by their own irregular Passions. But however, that some may not colour their Spirit of Persecution and Unchristian Cruelty with a pretence of Care of the Publick Weal, and Observation of the Laws; and that others, under pretence of Religion, may not seek Impunity for their Libertinism and Licentiousness: In a word, that none may impose either upon himself or others, by Pretences of Loyalty and Obedience to the Prince, or of Tenderness and Sincerity in the Worship of God; I esteem it above all things necessary to distinguish exactly the Business of Civil Government from that of Religion, and to settle the just Bounds that lie between the one and the other. If this be not done, there can be no end put to the Controversies that will be always arising between those that have, or at least pretend to have, on the one side, a care of the Commonwealth. The Commonwealth seems to be a Society of Men constituted only for the procuring, preserving, and advancing their own Civil Interests. Civil Interests I call Life, Liberty, Health and Indolency of Body; and the Possession of outward Things such as Money, Lands, Houses, Furniture, and the like. It is the Duty of the Civil Magistrate, by the impartial Execution of equal Laws, to secure unto all the People in general, and to every one of his Subjects in particular, the just Possession of the Things belonging to this Life. If any one presume to violate the Laws of Publick Justice and Equity, establish'd for the Preservation of those Things, his Presumption is to be check'd by the Fear of Punishment, consisting of the Deprivation or Diminution of those Civil Interests or Goods, which otherwise he might and ought to enjoy. But seeing no Man does willingly suffer himself to be punish'd by the Deprivation of any part of his Goods, and much less of his Liberty or Life, therefore is the Magistrate arm'd with the Force and Strength of all his Subjects, in order to the Punishment of those that violate any other Man's Right. Now that the whole Jurisdiction of the Magistrate reaches only to these Civil Concernments; and that all Civil Power, Right, and Dominion, is founded and confin'd to the only care of promoting these Things; and that it neither can, nor ought in any manner to be extended to the Salvation of Souls, these following Considerations seem unto me abundantly to demonstrate. First, Because the Care of Souls is not committed to the Civil Magistrate any more than other Men. It is not committed unto him, I say, by God, because it appears not that God has ever given any such Authority to one Man over another, as to compel any one to his Religion. Nor can any such Power be vested in the Magistrate by the Consent of the People; because no Man can so far abandon the Care of his own Salvation, as blindly to leave it to the choice of any other, whether Prince or Subject, to prescribe to him what Faith or Worship he shall embrace. For no Man can, if he would, conform his Faith to the Dictates of another. All the Life and Power of true Religion consist in the outward and full Persuasion of the Mind; and Faith is not Faith without Believing. What Profession soever we make, to whatever outward Worship we conform, if we are not fully satisfied in our own Mind that the one is true, and the other well pleasing unto GOD, such Profession, and such Practice, far from being any Furtherance, are great Obstacles to our Salvation. For in this manner, instead of expiating other Sins by the Exercise of Religion, I say, in offering thus unto God Almighty such a Worship as we esteem displeasing to him; we add unto the Number of our other Sins, those also of Hypocrisy and Contempt of his Divine Majesty. Secondly, The Care of Souls cannot belong to the Civil Magistrate, because his Power consists only in outward Force; but true and saving Religion consists in the inward Persuasion of the Mind, without which nothing can be acceptable to GOD. And such is the Nature of the Understanding, that it cannot be compell'd to the Belief of any thing by outward Force. Confiscation of Estate, Imprisonment, Torments, nothing of that Nature can have any such efficacy as to make Men change the inward Judgment that they have fram'd of things. It may indeed be alledg'd, that the Magistrate may make use of Arguments, and thereby draw the Heterodox into the way of Truth, and procure their Salvation. I grant it; but this is common to him with other Men. In teaching, instructing and redressing the Erroneous by Reason, he may certainly do what becomes any good Man to do. Magistracy does not oblige him to put off either Humanity or Christianity; but it to discuss the Opinion of Philo the Jew ^a, who having shewn that Moses was a King, a Law-giver, a Priest, and a Prophet, adds, Since all these Offices are reducible to one and the same Head, they ought by mutual Ties to be united and inclosed one with the other; and they are all requisite in the same Person, so that he who wants any one of the four, is to be look'd on as a lame Ruler of an imperfect Commonwealth.

XII. This will be more clearly discern'd, if we examine those several Divisions of the Sovereignty, which might be propos'd. Let therefore the Power of Peace and War be in the Prince; the Power of making Laws and executing Justice, in the Senate; the Right of levying Tribute, in an Assembly of the People. Here, if the King commands the Subjects to Arms, and they refuse to obey his Orders, either the King may compel them by Punishments, which he himself has a Right of inflicting, or he ought to deliver them up to take their Tryal before the Senate. Now should we admit the former of these, it doth not appear, how he, whom we suppose not to have the Power of putting the Laws in Execution, can punish the Subjects before they are actually list'd, and brought under martial Discipline. If you say, that, in this particular Case, the King hath a Right to punish the Disobedient, tho' not in other Cases; you, at the same time give him the Privilege of oppressing and grieving his People, as he thinks fit, and so you cancel the Rights of all beside. For when he orders them to take up Arms, he'll punish them, if they dare to refuse; and when he hath once led them out on an Expedition, then the Nature of military Discipline gives him the Power of Life and Death over them: And nothing is easier than for a General to cut off any Soldier, who hath the Misfortune to fall under his Hatred, or Displeasure ^b. On the other hand, if the King must be obliged to have recourse to the Senate for Justice, when any Persons refuse to list themselves under his Command; in this Case, either the Senators must pronounce the Sentence of their Condemnation, and give Orders for the Execution of it, barely by the King's Commission and Authority; which is contrary to the Supposition: Or they must judge whether the Act alledg'd be criminal, or not; and this Proceeding will certainly be vain and fruitless, unless the same Judges may likewise take upon them to examine, whether or no the War now engaged in by the Prince, be for the Advantage of the Commonwealth; and thus the King's Right will again be destroyed. We shall discover the same Inconveniences, if we compare the Right of the Prince with that of the People, under such a Constitution, as we did before with that of the Senate. For as the Measures of War are now settled in most Countries, Tacitus's Observation ^a holds true; that Armies cannot be without Pay, and Pay cannot be had without Taxes. If therefore the Prince have not a Power of compelling the Subjects, by virtue of his sovereign Command, to bring in their Shares of the publick Contributions, his Right over the Affair of War will be no more than a bare Power of persuading and advising the People, that, in such or such a particular Juncture, to engage in a War would be for the Advantage of the Commonwealth. On the other hand, if the People are not empower'd to judge whether the War, towards which these Subsidies are levied, be for their Interest, or not; then what have they to boast of, but the laborious, and servile Office of Assessors and Collectors? Nor will things be in a better Posture, should we separate the Branches of Sovereignty, according to any other Division that could be invented ¹. So just was that Remark of Afinius Gallus, in Tacitus c. that As a Government hath but one Body, so it must be directed but by one Mind (whether of a single Person, or of a Council, or Assembly.) This may be well illustrated by the Example of the human Soul, to which the sovereign Authority in a State seems to bear some Resemblance. Now should we suppose the potential Parts of the rational Soul, the Understanding and the Will, to exist separately, in two different Subjects or Suppositums, one of which should have only the Faculty of the Understanding, the other only the Faculty of the Will; neither of these Suppositums could be call'd a Man, nor could human Actions be expected from either; whilst one lay unactive and immoveable, the other blind and insensible. To which purpose the Epigram in the Anthologia ^d seems proper to be applied:

^c is one thing to persuade, another to command; one thing to press with Arguments, another with Penalties. ^d This Civil Power alone has a right to do; to the other, Good Will is Authority enough. Every Man has Commission to admonish, exhort, convince another of Error, and by Reasoning to draw him into Truth: But to give Laws, receive Obedience, and compel with the Sword, belongs to none but the Magistrate. And upon this ground I affirm, that the Magistrate's Power extends not to the establishing of Articles of Faith, or Forms of Worship, by the force of his Laws. For Laws are of no Force at all without Penalties; and Penalties in this case are absolutely impertinent, because they are not proper to convince the Mind. Neither the Profession of any Articles of Faith, nor the Conformity to any outward Form of Worship (as has been already said) can be available to the Salvation of Souls, unless the Truth of the one, and the Acceptableness of the other unto God be thoroughly believ'd by those that so profess and practise. But Penalties are no ways capable to produce such Belief. It is only Light and Evidence that can work a Change in Mens Opinions; which Light can in no manner proceed from Corporal Sufferings, or any other outward Penalties. Thirdly, The care of the Salvation of Mens Souls cannot belong to the Magistrate; because tho' the Rigour of Laws and the Force of Penalties, were capable to convince and change Mens Minds, yet would not that help at all to the Salvation of their Souls. For there being but one Truth, one way to Heaven; what hope is there that more Men would be led into it, if they had no Rule but the Religion of the Court, and were put under a Necessity to quit the Light of their own Reason, and oppose the Dictates of their own Conscience, and blindly to resign up themselves to the Will of their Governours, and to the Religion which either Ignorance, Ambition, or Superstition had chanced to establish in the Countries where they were born? In the variety and contradiction of Opinion in Religion wherein the Princes of the World are as much divided as in their Secular Interests, the narrow way would be much straiten'd; one Country alone would be in the right, and all the rest of the World put under an Obligation of following their Princes in the ways that lead to Destruction; and that which heightens the Absurdity, and very ill suits the Notion of a Deity, Men would owe their Eternal Happiness or Misery to the Place of their Nativity. These are the Author's own Words: From whence he asserts, that the Magistrate ought to leave every one the Liberty of professing such Opinions as he believes the most reasonable, and to take care that no Violence be offer'd to any Person upon that Account. He shews at large the Inconveniences that there would be in submitting ones self to the Humours of Princes; who act nothing but by the Suggestion of the Chorismen that are about them. If a Man were obliged to follow the Religion of the Prince, he must change his Religion as often as his Prince; so that if Princes of different Opinions should succeed one another, as it has happen'd in England, the Inhabitants of a Country must in a few Years be of different Religions to be sav'd. But as in every Church there are two Things especially to be consider'd, the outward Form and Rites of Worship, and the Doctrines and Articles of Faith; the Author takes notice there of the Duties of a Magistrate with respect both to the one and the other. As for Ceremonies, or the outward Form and Rites of Worship, it appears by the Definition of a Church, which is, according to him, a voluntary Society of Men joining themselves together of their own accord, in order to the publick worshipping of God in such manner as they judge acceptable to him, and effectual to the Salvation of their Souls. It appears, I say, by this Definition, that the Prince has no Power to enforce by Law, either in his own Church, or much less in another, the Use of any Rites or Ceremonies whatsoever, in the Worship of God. We cannot say, that being things indifferent, the Prince has a Right to regulate them as he finds convenient, because when such things are brought into the Church and Worship of God, they are remov'd out of the reach of the Magistrate's Jurisdiction, and in that use they have no Connexion at all with Civil Affairs. Besides, if they are indifferent, in themselves, they do not by the Prince's Approbation become acceptable to God, who has not promis'd to be pleas'd with the Worship that the Magistrates should establish. As to the Doctrines and Articles of Faith: First, Princes ought not to tolerate any Opinions contrary to Civil Society. Secondly, They ought not in particular to tolerate those who under the pretence of Religion would divest private Persons, or even Magistrates of their Civil Rights and Possessions. Thirdly, They ought not to suffer Churches which are constituted upon such a Bottom, as that all those who enter into them, ipso facto, deliver themselves up to some Foreign Authority which they are ready to pay a blind Obedience to, notwithstanding they have Princes of their own. Fourthly, and lastly, Atheists who deny the Being of a God are not to be tolerated, because having no Religion, they make a Conscience of nothing but what is punishable by the Civil Laws. Two Reasons induced me to set down here the Principles of this little Treatise. One is, Their being a necessary Consequence of a Truth which our Author himself has solidly proved in his Discourse de habitu Religionis Christiane ad Vitam Civilem, I mean, that Religion is antecedent to Civil Societies, and that it has nothing at all to do with their Establishments. See Sect. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. The other Reason is the Authority of the Person who wrote the Letter concerning Toleration, which is of very great weight: Since the Learned Mr. Locke has, in his last Will and Testament own'd it for his. See also Mr. Noord's excellent Dissertation de Religione ab Imperio jure Gentium libera; publish'd by me in French in the beginning of the Year 1707. and since translated into English. The Reader will find, in my Notes, the principal Treatises that have been written upon this Subject, specified and referred to.

^a De Præm. & Pæn. p. 919. A. Edit. Paris. Our Author might plainly have said, that this Opinion, having no other Foundation than Philo's Authority, was not worth refuting.

^b Vid. Liv. l. II. c. 23, 32, 58 l. III. c. 10, 20, 24. l. IV. c. 1, 5. 58. l. V. c. 2. 10. and in many other places. Divdor. Sic. l. XIV. c. 73. Quintus Curtius, l. VII. c. 2. Polyb. l. 1. c. 9.

Πηδός ὁ μὲν γυνοῖς, &c.

*The blind Man bears the lame: What Fate denies
The wretched Pair, their mutual Help supplies;
One lends his Feet, the other lends his Eyes.*

Here the two unfortunate Persons were able in some sort to make up the Defects of Nature, so long as they agreed to afford their mutual Assistance. But should this Agreement have been once broken, and a Quarrel have happen'd between them, each Party would have been alike at a loss about their Way. In the same manner should any persist in dividing the Parts of the Sovereignty, he will by no means compose a regular State, but a disorderly Body, the Members of which holding these separate Limbs of the Government, shall be kept together, not by any common Authority, but bare Compact or Agreement. Now in such a Society some kind of Peace and Concord might be maintain'd, so long as particular Persons kindly conspir'd in their Opinions with regard to the publick Good, and were each of them ready voluntarily to perform what was requisite towards this End. But should any Dissention arise, no means of Redress would be left, but either to seek abroad for an Arbitrator, or to decide the Controversy by the Sword.

XIII. Tho' the Case be manifestly thus, as we have represented it, yet there is no inconsiderable Number of Men, who stand up resolutely for the Division of the sovereign Power, that hereby they may frame I know not what Mixture of Commonwealths, which being rightly temper'd and qualified must needs, forsooth, produce the most happy System of Government. They would gladly engage Aristotle to be of their Party, but without Effect; he in the place of his Works, which they alledge e, speaking of a Mixture far different from any that can be applied to the parts of the Sovereignty. Which makes it seem the more strange, that some Interpreters (and Nich. Piccart amongst the rest) when they come to treat of this Mixture, put such things together, as probably never entred into the Philosopher's Head. The Temperature which he so much adviseth and recommends, runs in the following manner: That the King shall have the Power of making War, of coining Money, of engaging in Leagues, of conferring publick Rewards: that the Senate shall possess such Rights as demand Experience and Deliberation; the framing and the executing of Laws, and the administering of publick Justice: Lastly, that the Populacy shall manage such Affairs, as their Knowledge chiefly directs them to; the Examination of the Revenue, the Division of Lands, the Creation of Magistrates, the Inspection of Buildings, Highways, Aqueducts, Corn, and other Helps and Assistances of the State. In like manner, it would not argue any Division in the Sovereignty, should we, for Instance, suppose that the Senate had the Power of condemning, but the Prince or the People of pardoning and acquitting. For here the Prince might by his Prerogative absolve any Person, against whom the Judges had pronounced Sentence; and consequently the latter would be only an inferior Court, whose Decisions must borrow their Force and Ratification

^a Hist. l. IV. c. 74.

^b Alti. Bodin. De Republ. l. 2. c. 1. p. 287. with the Observation made on that Author, by Aristotels, De Republ. l. 2. c. 6. Sect. 1. §. 56.

^c Annal. l. 7. c. 12.

^d L. 1.

^e Poët. l. IV. c. 8, 7.

from the Authority of the former. Whence it sufficiently appears, that if in any State, the Judgment of capital Causes belongs to the Senate, the King still retaining the Right of Grace, or Pardon; the Senate doth really hold, by Deputation from the King, this Power of presiding in criminal Processes, and of pronouncing Sentence as the Law directs; and this as well for the Banishing all Partiality from the Methods of Justice, as to divert the Odium from the King: Yet so as that the Power of Life and Death are radically, or originally, inherent in the King's Person. Some would frame a Division in the judiciary Power it self; so that the Prince should have the Power of Life and Death over strangers only, but the People over the Natives. But now, if the People exercise this Power over the Natives, only as an inferior Court, then they do not in the least intrench upon the Prerogative of the Prince. On the contrary, if they hold it originally and independently, then the King will have nothing left him but an empty Title, and will only perform the Office of Prætor peregrinus, a Judge of foreign Causes. As for what they add, about dividing the Right of Coinage, it is too impertinent to deserve a Repetition.

Arniseus^a is very large on this Point, and amongst many accurate Remarks, justly rejects some spurious kind of Mixtures in Government. And at last, the fairest Model he could invent, was, that the King should have the Power of War and Peace, of levying Tribute, of Coining Money, of distributing publick Rewards; that the Senate should be employ'd in judging Causes, and in receiving Appeals, as likewise in the Reformation of Manners by good Laws, and in exercising the Power of Life and Death; and lastly, that the People should be allow'd the Care of the Revenue, and the Creation of Magistrates. Of which Model a Judgment may be formed, by what we have before observ'd.

XIV. Grotius himself^b hath attempted somewhat towards dividing the Parts of the Sovereignty. Where he is so far in the right, when he denies that any such Partition of Power, between the Prince and the People, can be made, as that the prime Compact shall be thus loosely express'd, If the King govern well, then the People shall obey him; if he govern ill, then the People shall compel him to his Duty: Observing, that certain Bounds and Limits ought rather to be assign'd to the Power of either Party; such as may easily be apprehended from the Difference of Places, Persons, and Affairs; but that the bare Good or Evil of an Action, consisting in the Application of fit Means to the publick Safety, which often admits of very great and obscure Debates, cannot be a proper Bottom to ground a Partition upon; in regard to that extreme Confusion which must follow, whilst the King, on the one hand, would insist upon the Management of an Affair, alledging that he order'd it well; and the People, on the other hand, would challenge the Direction of it, pretending that it had been ill managed before. His other Remark is no less true, that for a Prince to promise the People by an Oath, that he will perform, in such a peculiar manner, things which belong to the Administration of the Government, doth not argue a Partition of Power. But though all the rest of his Discourse he falls into the common Error. One way then, by which he thinks the Sovereignty may be divided, is, when a Partition shall be made by express Agreement. A Precedent of this kind he alledgeth from the Roman State in the time of Probus, when the Senate confirm'd the Prince's Laws, heard Appeals, created Pro-consuls, and supplied the Consuls with Lieutenants. As if any Person could be ignorant, how that, amongst the Emperors, those who affected to seem more modest than others, exercised the Sovereignty under the Mask and Disguise of the antient Commonwealth; leaving to the Senate some inferior and petit Affairs, such as had little Influence on the main Government; but reserving strictly to themselves the chief Force and Command, which consisted for the most part in the Soldiery. Another Project of dividing the Sovereignty he expresseth in this manner: If the People, being as yet free, shall require thus much of him whom they choose to be their King, and shall lay it upon him after the manner of a standing Rule or Command. Now here 'tis not easy to apprehend what kind of thing a standing Command is, when supposed to continue after that the Party hath lost the Power of Commanding. For every Command presupposeth a compulsive Force, to be exerted so often as the Command shall be transgress'd. Wherefore the People, who appoint themselves a King on such Terms, shall either keep this compulsive Power over him, or they shall not keep it. If the former, the King is only so in Name; the Force and Efficacy of the Government residing in the People: If the latter, the Command will be insignificant. He ought therefore to have said, that a People, as yet continuing in a State of Liberty, may oblige the future King to follow certain Rules in the Discharge of the Government. But that such a Compact doth not imply or infer a Division of the sovereign Power, we shall hereafter make appear. His last Instance of dividing Sovereignty is, When in conferring the Government, some Clause was added, importing that the King might be compell'd or punish'd upon Default. But indeed the Sovereignty can by no means be said here to be divided, but the People really possess it entire, only allowing the King, under a great and specious Title, the Office of an extraordinary Magistrate; in case the People have a Right, on any account, to compel or to punish their Prince. For Punishment ever proceeds from a Superior, consider'd in that Capacity. And as for Compulsion, this may be used two ways, either morally, or physically; that is, either by way of Authority and Command; or by way of Force and Violence. Authority over an Equal, as such, is impossible. Therefore when Grotius argues that the People at least are equal to the Prince, because in some particular Cases they may compel him; he must at the same time allow, that neither Prince nor People have Authority or Sovereignty over the other; which is repugnant to the Nature of a civil State. The other kind of Compulsion, by Arms and hostile Violence, takes place only between Equals, or such as are not properly subject one to the other. And of this Compulsion must we understand the Case urged by Grotius; That a Creditor hath naturally a Right of compelling his Debtor. For certainly he hath no such natural Right, by way of Command or Sovereignty, inherent in his Person; for then it must necessarily follow, that every one who commenceth a Debtor, must fall under Subjection to his Creditor. But still the Creditor hath the full Privilege of compelling his Debtor to Payment, either by the Assistance of the Judge (such as cannot be had between Prince and People) or else, if he live in a Condition of natural Liberty, by hostile Force. If then we would assign this way of compelling to the People, we must withal allow, that both Prince and People live in a State of natural Freedom; that is, that the civil Government is utterly dissolv'd. To conclude, we readily acknowledge the Truth of Grotius's Observations, That in civil Institutions there is nothing absolutely free from all Inconvenience; and that therefore we ought not, on account of the Inconveniences attending a divided Power, to conclude it impossible: In as much as every Right is to be measur'd, not by the Opinion of one or two particular Persons, but by the Will of him from whom the Right proceeds. But then it must be granted us in requital, that if any please themselves with framing such a Partition, they will hereby constitute, not a regular State, but an ill-jointed and distemper'd Body.

^a Rel. Polit. l. 1. c. 6. f. 1.

^b L. 1. c. 3. f. 9, 17.

CHAP. V.

Of the different Forms of Government.

- I. The Accidents of civil States cannot constitute a new Species.
- II. Irregular Forms and Systems of Government.
- III. The three Forms of regular Government.
- IV. Democracy seems to be the most antient Form.
- V. Democracy no less invested with supreme Power, than Monarchy.
- VI. Democracy, how constituted.
- VII. The ordinary Requisites of Democracy.
- VIII. How Aristocracy is establish'd:
- IX. And how Monarchy.
- X. In Bodies politick there may be Vices of Men, and Vices of State.
- XI. Yet th se compose not a peculiar Species of Government.
- XII. As neither do the various Accidents of Democracies and Aristocracies.

- XIII. Of the mixt Government propos'd by modern Authors.
- XIV. The Nature of irregular States.
- XV. This Irregularity best illustrated by Examples.
- XVI. States which admit of Provinces do not, hence become necessarily systematical
- XVII. Of Systems occasion'd by a Common Prince.
- XVIII. Of Systems compos'd by League and Confederacy.
- XIX. Of the Communication of Councils and Business in these united Bodies.
- XX. Whether the greater part ought here to conclude the less.
- XXI. How these Systems are dissolv'd.
- XXII. The several Forms of Government compar'd.

I. THE Sovereign Authority, besides that it inheres in each State, as in a common or general Subject; so, farther, according as it resides either in one Person, or in a Council (consisting of some, or of all the Members) as in a proper or particular Subject, it produceth different Forms of Commonwealths. And here, e're we proceed to enquire into this Variety, we take it for granted, that we may have free leave to retain the Word Form, when we would express that Constitution or Model of State, which ariseth from the Difference of the Subject, in which the supreme Power is primarily and originally seated. That the actual Administration of the Government recedes, in many Cases, from the particular Form, is a thing vulgarly known: As in Democracy, for instance, some Affairs are managed in the way of Monarchy, others in the way of Polyarchy; according as Business is committed to the Care of one Person, or to such a Number of Commissioners. And because it is a Matter of great Consequence, whether the Power any Person exerciseth be his own, or whether it be another's, of which he may at any time be deprived, holding it only by a precarious Title; therefore 'tis great want of Accuracy in a certain Author to affirm, that 'When a King suffers himself to be led by the Nose by some few Counsellors, who abuse the easiness of his Temper, or a People by some powerful Demagogue, or when in a ruling Senate one Member leads the rest, by his Wisdom or Eloquence, or overawes them by his Interest and Strength; a Polyarchy is really introduced in the first of these Cases, and a Monarchy in the two latter; and that in the first Case there is nothing but an empty Name, and outward Semblance of Monarchy, in the second of Democracy, in the third of Polyarchy or Aristocracy. Thus also, no intelligent Person will imagine the Form of a Commonwealth to be alter'd, upon a Change either in the Persons, or in the Number of Ministers; no more than he will think, that when a new Successor banisheth from his Councils and Presence, one who was chief Minister under the former Prince, and had the Management of all Affairs, an Interregnum must hereupon ensue. The Cap-city and Inclinations of him or them, who either by their own Right, or by Delegacy from others, exercise the sovereign Power, do indeed affect and vary their Administration, but do by no means touch the Form of Government. In the same manner, supposing the chief Authority to be exercis'd well in one Place, and ill in another; yet a new Model of State doth by no means result from the different Exercise of the same Power. Wherefore as a Person in sound Health doth not differ in Specie from one that is sick, and as the unnatural Distortion of the Body doth not produce Men of a new kind; so neither do the Vices of those who command, or of those who obey, nor the Corruption of Laws, make the least Step towards constituting another Species of a Commonwealth.

II. It may be useful farther to observe, that most Authors who have treated of civil Knowledge, have employ'd themselves in explaining the regular Forms of Government; as for the irregular Forms, many have not so much as thought of them, some few have very slightly touch'd upon them. Hence it came to pass, that if they happen'd to meet with a civil body, which did not exactly come up to one of those usually term'd simple Forms, they had scarce any Word left to express it by, besides the Name of a mixt Government. But now, not to urge how very ill this Mixture is applied to some Commonwealths; it is weak to imagine, that besides these three regular Forms, there are none other, which may be term'd irregular. For all Men don't build their House just according to that Model which the Rules of Architecture prescribe. The Regularity of a State we conceive to consist in this, that all, and each of the Members seem to be govern'd as it were by one Soul; or, that the supreme Authority is exercis'd through all the parts of the State by one Will, without Division or Convulsion. And hence the Nature of an irregular State may without much Difficulty be collected. Farther, there are some political Systems composed of several perfect States in Conjunction, which with unskilful Judges pass for single States, and these too may have their use in our Enquiries, concerning the several Forms of Commonwealths.

III. The Forms of a regular State are three, only arising from the proper or particular Subject, in which the supreme Power resides; which is either a single Person, or a Council select or general. For the Sovereignty is committed either to one Man, or to a Council of several Men. And this Council is made up, either of all the Members, or of the smaller indeed, but the better and more select Part. One Species or Form therefore is, when the Sovereignty is lodg'd in a Council consisting of all the Members, and where every Member hath the Privi-

^a Pyth. Od. 2. v. 157, &c. Ed. Oxon.

^b In Menexeno, p. 519. B.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTE on §. IV.

¹ Philo. Jud. De Mundi Opificio, gives this Centre of the Favourers of Polytheism; They who are not afraid to transfer, from Earth to Heaven, the worst Frame of Government, the Dominion of the Multitude. Our Author cites this Passage, as if Democracy were there acknowledg'd to be the worst Form of Government in the World. But what is said in that place is only meant of the Abuse that crept into it whenever the vile Populace is at the Head of Affairs (ἡ γὰρ οὐκ ἐστὶν ἡ ἀρετή) and besides the same Author in another Treatise (de creatone principis towards the End) says in express Words that Democracy is the best and most lawful Form of Government. Ἐν δὲ ἀρετῆν ἢ ἐπιματῶν τῆν lege of a Vote; and this is call'd a Democracy. Another is, when the Sovereignty resides in a Council composed of select Members, term'd an Aristocracy. A third when the Sovereignty is in the Hands of one Man; call'd a Monarchy or a Kingdom. In the first, the Sovereign is sty'd a People; in the second Optimates or Senators; and a Monarchy in the third. Pindar hath express'd all the three together:

— — — When Choice of Fate
Puts to the Reins a single Master's Hand;
Or when th' impetuous Multitude command,
Or when wise Patriots guard the thriving State.

IV. In the first place, we will examine the Nature of a democratical Government; not that we think it to excel the other Forms, either in Dignity or Splendor, or in real Usefulness and Advantage¹; but because in the greatest part of the World it appears to have been the most antient; and because Reason shews it to be more probable, that many Men, being in a Condition of natural Freedom and Equality, when they resolv'd to join in one Body, should at first be inclined to administer their common Affairs by their common Judgment, and so to constitute a Democracy. Nor is it to be supposed that a Father of a Family, as yet free and independent, who upon weighing the Inconveniences of a separate Life, voluntarily join'd himself to those of his own Condition, in order to the forming a civil Community, should in a Moment have so far forgot his former State, under which he dispos'd of all things relating to his own Safety meerly as he pleas'd, as to be willing to submit himself immediately to a single Director, with regard to the common Interest, with which his own private Security had a necessary Connexion. But at the Beginning it seems rather to have been thought more equitable, that what belong'd to all, ought to be managed by all; till in Progress of Time, most receded from this Model, either voluntarily or by Necessity; whether this Necessity was brought upon them by some of their own Members, or by Strangers. What Plato^b discourseth concerning the Athenian Commonwealth, seems to be of weight on this Subject: The Original (says he) of our Government (under which the chief Authority was in the People, and the Magistracies were conferr'd on Persons of the greatest Ability and Merit) was taken from the Equality of our Race. Other States there are, composed of different Blood, and of unequal Lines; the Consequences of which are disproportionable Sovereignty, tyrannical or oligarchical Sway. Under which Men live in such a manner, as to esteem themselves partly Lords, and partly Slaves to each other. But we and our Countrymen, being all born Brethren of the same Mother, do not look upon our selves to stand under so hard a Relation, as that of Lords and Slaves. But the Parity of our Descent inclines us to keep up the like Parity by our Laws; and to yield the Precedency to nothing but to superior Virtue and Wisdom. Now it is manifest, that most civil Communities arose, at first, from the Union of such Families as were allied in Race and Blood. Nor is this Judgment opposed by the Authority of antient Story, which, tho' it makes frequently mention of Kings, yet at the same time informs us, that most of them were such, as had rather an Influence in persuading, than any Power of commanding. So Justin^a, in the entrance of his Work, describes that kind of Government as the most primitive, which Aristotle^b styles an Heroical Kingdom; such, as is by no means inconsistent with a democratical State. To the same purpose Thucydides^c observes, that the most antient Kingdoms pass'd by Inheritance, and were confined within settled Honours, and tied to certain Terms and Conditions. Thus in most Nations, Liberty and popular Sway were at first establish'd; till, by Degrees, that vast Multitude of petit Commonwealths was reduced, chiefly by War and Violence, into some few great Empires. What Aristotle^c urgeth for the Antiquity of regal Government is as follows: Wherefore Cities were at first under Kings, as the barbarous Nations are at this day; for the Persons who join'd in forming those States, were themselves before under the same Government, the Sovereign Rule in Families being that which is kept up in Kingdoms. Which last Words receive a fair Illustration from the smart Saying of Lycurgus, who, when a Person advised him to introduce a Democracy in the State, answered, Do you first establish a Democracy in your own House^d. But really, Aristotle's Argument doth not conclude. The contrary might rather be infer'd; that these antient Fathers of Families, having been accustomed before to bear Rule, should be more inclined to a democratical Form, under which they might still enjoy the Privilege of giving their own Judgment upon Affairs, and might bear a part in the publick Administration. Nor do they settle the Point, who tell us, that ' paternal Government was the most antient amongst Men; being at first mild and gentle, till, upon the Increase of Families and of Vices together, it was strengthen'd with the Power of Life and Death. That this Government was continued down through succeeding Families, in the Persons of the First-born, who, by a kind of natural Right, held both the sacred Office, and the civil Authority; that, by this means, the Heads of Families grew into so many petit Kings; the great Multitude of whom, discover'd in the Land of Canaan^e, seems a plain Argument in the ' present Case. But indeed, as the Right of Primogeniture was not of so great Force and Efficacy, as to establish regal Dominion amongst Brethren without their Consent, and to oblige them to unite their Families to that of their Elder Brothers; so besides, these primitive Governours, whom we find dignified with the Title of Kings, were commonly no more than superior Magistrates in popular Societies; tho' this Honour was most frequently bestow'd on the chief of the Race, when the respective Society was composed of Families, which had the same Original; yet so as that this Right of Birth and Seniority was not always observ'd.

V. It seems needful, on the present Argument, to bring the Opinions advanced by Hornius under a particular Examination. He then, in relation to Aristocracies and Democracies, which he comprizeth under the General Name of Free States, passeth his Judgment to this purpose: There may be such an Establishment found out, as shall avoid the Confusion of the promiscuous Multitude, and shall attain to a decent and agreeable Order, making Provision for the common Safety by Pacts and Covenants, without Subjection, and without the Loss of that Liberty which is extinguish'd under a Monarch's Reign. Here we have almost as many Mistakes as Words. That the Order, which may be observ'd in free States, is the only thing which shields off the Confusion of the promiscuous Multitude; that free States are held together barely by Compact and Covenant, without any Sovereign Command; that particular Persons are not so strictly subject to a popular Assembly, or to a Council of Senators, as to a Prince under a Monarchy; that all the parts of Sovereignty are not so fully exercis'd under the former Governments, as under the latter; that the Power of Life and Death is less employ'd, with regard to private Men, by a People, than by a Prince. What he asserts farther, that certain Fathers of Families, living at yet in a separate Condition, learnt from the neighbouring Kingdoms, what form of Government to introduce; is so far from appearing true, that in the first Union of Families and Nations, most Communities seem rather to have been of the popular Form; till upon Discovery of the Inconveniences attending such a Government, they fell, sooner or latter, under the Command of a single Sovereign; some, by their own voluntary Act, some, by Force and Compulsion. No less vain is that Remark; As Art endeavours to imitate Nature, but can never reach to equal or to excel her; so in these artificial Forms of Government, the Nature of Kingdoms is, in some sort, represented, as to the Influence which they have on the common Use and Benefit; but the inward Force, and Virtue, and Dominion, with which Monarchies are endued, being the Work of Almighty GOD, was beyond the Power of Men to produce. Of ^a Isocrates is of the same Judgment, I seem'd unjust to us (Athenians) says he, that many should be ruled by the Authority of a few; that those who were inferior in their Fortune alone, and in no other Respect, should be debar'd from a Share in the Magistracies and Honours: And last, whilst we have All the same Common Country, the same Privileges of Birth, some should be Masters and Proprietors of the State, others no better than strangers and Dependents; and that, under the Presence of Law, Persons by nature Members of the Commonwealth, should be denied the Offices and Employments in it. Ad Libanum Prologum. loc. comm. contra Tyrannum.

^b L. 1. c. 13. p. 8. Ed. Oxon.
^c Polit. l. 1. c. 2.
^d Plutarch in Lycurg. p. 57. A.
^e 177. Josh. xii. & Judg. i. 7.
^f De Civitate, l. 3. c. 11.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. IV.

* Principio rerum, Gentium Nationumque Imperium penes erat Reges, L. 1. c. 1. † In his Politicks, B. I. c. 14. the the Origin of Majesty or Sovereignty we have already treated; and why may not this as well agree to a moral compound Person, as to a single Man? For surely 'tis no Contradiction to affirm, that the Senators, under an Aristocracy, are all equal, as to their private and separate Capacities, and yet are each of them subject to the Authority of the whole Council. And it requires no Depths of Parts to apprehend the Difference between all in general, and each in particular; between the Assembly of the People in Democracies, and private Men dispers'd according to their respective Habitations. Therefore 'tis but a trifling Argument which we find urged by this Author; Where the Sovereignty is ascribed to all, there either all do really possess it, or some few only. If all, then they will have none to be their Subjects; because to command and to obey cannot belong to the same Person: If it be said that the particular Men are Subjects, then all cannot be Governours; because when each separate Person is in a Condition of obeying, the Multitude, which they compose, must likewise stand under the same Engagement; for Obedience is the only thing, which in this Case the private Members confer on the common Body. Certainly in moral compound Bodies somewhat may be attributed to all in Conjunction, which we cannot assign either to each Member taken apart from the rest, or to any one of those particulars; and consequently the whole Society is in reality a moral Person distinct from the separate Members, to which such a peculiar Will, such Actions, and such Rights, may be appropriated, as private Men are not capable of possessing. Those Scruples likewise must soon vanish, which are rais'd from this Consideration, that in popular Assemblies the Majority always prevails. For this is one of the moral Affections which attends the very Essence of a compound Body, that the Consent of the greater part of those, who make up the Council, shall be deem'd the Consent of all; in as much as no other means can be assign'd, by which the Wills of many natural Persons, when they happen not exactly to conspire, should be brought to a moral Union. Wherefore it cannot be pretended, that in aristocratical or democratical States, the Subject, in which the chief Authority resides, is obscure and uncertain, tho' it should happen that those individual Persons, whose Voices upon one Occasion compos'd a Majority, upon another should prove to be of the weaker side. For none of these Circumstances take away that Unity of Will, which is to be attributed to the whole Body. In a Senate, if so many Members happen not to agree, as are required towards making a Majority, the Senate is presumed to design or to declare nothing, and therefore no Step is to be made in the new Affair. Which tho' it often turn to the Disadvantage of the State, yet doth not prove that the Senate is not invested with sovereign Command. Besides, that other Allegation is false: True and proper Sovereignty cannot be ascribed to a Multitude, by reason that the Obedience, which is necessary upon such a Supposition, must be here wanting; since the Multitude cannot be bound always to keep the Resolution which they once embrac'd; and since the Obligation, rising from their Authority, doth not affect them as taken all together in a general Body. For as it doth not destroy the Sovereignty of a King, that he may, when his Pleasure alters, revoke a former Decree, upon which Act the Obligation of the Subject to the said Decree expires; so whatever Power the common Assembly may have, as to the altering of their own Decrees, yet in the mean time, particular Persons are no less engaged by them, than they would by regal Injunctions. If not, let those who maintain the contrary Opinion shew us, that Offenders against the Laws are not so liable to Punishment under free States, as they are under Monarchies^a. 'Tis no better than trifling to argue; that if the Sovereignty be lodg'd indivisibly in the Hands of many together, then each of these many must necessarily hold some part of it, out of the Collection of which Parts the whole Sovereignty must at length be constituted. But at the same time 'twill be likewise necessary, that each of these parts be supreme; and thus in one State, there will be more than one supreme, which is absurd. For in moral Consideration there is no manner of Absurdity in supposing, that those particular Wills, which unite and conspire to make up the Will of the Community, should want some Power or Quality which the general Will is possess'd of. So that 'tis no good Consequence to say, the Sovereignty is the supreme Right; therefore each Man holds a part of it, which part is likewise supreme. We might with as much reason infer, that because the Votes of particular Persons, separately and solitarily consider'd, are ineffectual towards the enacting of a Law, therefore many of them in Conjunction are still unable to perform this Work. Lastly, he adds, that since in a governing Senate, there is no one Member, who may not, if he offend against the State, be brought to due Punishment by his Brethren; it follows, that in case all the Senators should prove guilty, the punishing of them would belong to the People. But each Member being thus punish'd and remov'd, the Sovereignty of the whole Council could no where subsist. This Difficulty will admit of an easy Solution, if we first rightly explain what it is to offend against the State. He then is properly said to be thus guilty, who commits any thing tending to the Prejudice of the Publick, contrary to the Laws and Injunctions of the Sovereign. Wherefore the whole Body of Senators cannot offend against the State, unless they either violate those Laws, the Observation of which was made the Condition of their holding the Sovereignty; or turn profess'd Enemies to the People under their Charge: Upon which Suppositions their Fate will be the same, as that of Kings in the like Cases. What he farther vents in prejudice of free States is notoriously false. As that, The Sovereignty exercis'd by a Monarch is quite a different thing from that which appears in free Governments, tho' their Effects may be alike. Because a Monarch, besides that personal Dignity and Splendor, of which no Man is capable in a Commonwealth, is endued with Majesty, which free States may not assume. But now we look on it as a certain Truth, that GOD may with equal Justice, be styl'd the Author of Monarchies and of free Commonwealths; and the former are no less produced by Covenants, than the latter; from which Covenants the Sovereignty results in both Cases; the immediate Cause of Obedience being in the People: That a Subject consider'd under that Capacity is obliged to the same Duties in a Commonwealth, and in a Kingdom; that his Obedience is no less strictly required, and his Subjection is in no less Degree, under the one Form, than under the other; and that both Governments have the same Right of punishing Criminals. For who will believe, upon the bare Word of this Author, that in a Kingdom the Punishment of Offenders is grounded on a Right over the Lives of the Subjects, which is wanting in free States; and that therefore under the latter, the Transgressors of the Laws are punish'd as Enemies; or only by the Right of War?

^a Add. Liv. l. 2. c. 30.

VI. We may now enquire how a Democracy is erected, and what this Form of Government hath in it peculiar from others. When therefore a Number of free Persons assemble together, in order to enter upon a Covenant about uniting themselves in a civil Body, this preparative Assembly hath already some Appearance of a Democracy; properly in this respect, that every Man hath the Privilege freely to deliver his Opinion concerning the common Affairs. Yet he who dissents from the Vote of the Majority, shall not in the least be obliged by what they determine, till such time as, by means of a second Covenant, a popular Form shall be actually confirm'd and establish'd. Mr. Hobbes ^a, for want of distinguishing these two Covenants, hath handled this Subject with great Confusion. For we have formerly proved ^b, that no Man can be obliged by the plurality of Votes, before he hath given his Consent to such a Form of publick Administration. Therefore what he asserts is false, that by their voluntary assembling of themselves together, we are to suppose that they stand obliged to whatever the major part shall resolve. What he farther delivers, may in the following manner be more clearly explain'd. When many Men upon a general Meeting, oblige themselves by Compact to unite their Strength and Wealth; either in this very Meeting a Decree is pass'd, for the introducing some particular Form of Government, or not. In Case no such Decree about the Government be made, nor the Time and Place assign'd for the holding another Assembly, then the present Meeting is presum'd to be void, and each Person continues in his natural Condition of Liberty as before. For a Number of Men cannot become one Body, unless they have agreed upon a constant Method of transacting publick Business. If they break up without settling this Point, yet prefix a Time and Place for considering and debating the Matter farther, in order to a final Resolution; we have then no more than the Rudiments and first Principles of a State, which cannot be properly styl'd a Democracy. For we must not presently make use of this Name, when every Man hath a Right to give his Opinion, or when the Time and Place are pitch'd upon for another Congress; in as much as this way of proceeding is common to all kinds of Societies and Conventions at their first Rise, and before they are fully establish'd: But we are then to call it a democratical Government, when the Right of settling Matters, relating to the publick Safety, is confer'd for ever on a general Assembly.

VII. Towards compleating the Nature of a democratical State, these Conditions seem especially necessary. First, that a certain Time and Place be assign'd for holding those Assemblies, in which the common Affairs are to be debated and determin'd. For as on the one side, the private Business of particular Men will not suffer them always to attend the Publick, so on the other side, if nothing be agreed upon as to the Time and Place; those who belong to the Society may either meet at different Times and Places, by which means Factions are necessarily introduced; or else not assemble at all, in which Case they will not be a People, but a scatter'd Multitude, to whom no Action, and no Right can be attributed as to one compound Person. Secondly, that the Vote of the Majority shall pass for the Vote of the whole Body: Since, as the World goes, it so very rarely happens, that a great Multitude of Men agree in their Judgments as to the same Matter. In the last place; since some Affairs of the Commonwealth occur every Day, and are of inferior Moment; others are less frequent, and affect the main Interest; and since it cannot be convenient, for the whole People to meet about settling the former Concerns, either in daily Councils, or at Intervals of so little Distance, as to let nothing of this Nature escape their Examination; it is therefore necessary to appoint certain Magistrates, as Substitutes or Delegates, who, by the Authority of the whole People, may dispatch Business of every Day's Occurrence; may with mature Diligence search into more important Affairs, and in case any thing happens of greater Consequence, may report it to the popular Assembly; and may likewise see the Decrees of the People put in Execution: For a large Body of Men is almost utterly useless in respect of this last Service, as of many others.

VIII. An Aristocracy is then constituted, when the Assembly, who by means of their first Covenant united themselves, as it were, into the Rudiments of a State, do by common Decree entrust the supreme Administration in the Hands of a Council, consisting of some select Members. These Members, when they have been declared and design'd by the said Assembly, either by their Names, or by some other Mark of Distinction, and have also accepted of their De-

^a De Cive, c. 7. f. 5.

^b C. 2. f. 7.

^c Thucydides (l. 2. c. 22. Ed. Oxon. in the beginning) reports, 'That Pericles, once finding the Athenians to be of a wrong Opinion about the Method to be used in a War, would neither call an Assembly of the People, nor hold a select Council; lest some very false Step should be taken, whilst their Debates would be guided rather by signation, are then supposed to enter upon the sovereign Command. And here we may observe, that Mr. Hobbes ^a is mistaken, when he draws the Origin of Aristocracy from Democracy, if his meaning be, that all Governments of the former kind were Changes from the latter, which are supposed to have been before completely establish'd. For Experience proves, and Reason does not deny, that Men might pass on from the first preparatory Covenant, either to Aristocracy or to Monarchy, without taking Democracy in their way. Besides, we have before made it appear ^b, that Mr. Hobbes doth but play with an Argument, when he tells us, 'That no Covenant can be transacted between the Senators and People, because the Government, being once conferr'd on the former, the latter do no longer exist after the manner of one Person'. For to make Men capable of sustaining Obligations towards others, 'tis sufficient that they still continue natural Persons, tho' the moral Personality, which they once bore, may be expired. We may add, tho' the People, upon transferring the Sovereignty from themselves, do not henceforth exist as one compleat Person, oppos'd to their newly received Head; yet this doth not dissolve them into a loose Multitude; in as much as being join'd to their Head, the Senate, they still constitute one Person. Farther, what he infers in another place ^c is false; that As the People under a Democracy, so the Court of Senators under an Aristocracy, are free from all manner of Obligation. For should we be never so willing to grant the Antecedent ^d, upon Supposition that the respect, which all in general bear to each in particular, may perhaps seem insufficient to found a mutual Obligation between them; yet it cannot hence be concluded, that neither is there any mutual Obligation betwixt Senators and People, as 'twould be no Consequence to say, I do not any way stand oblig'd to my self, whilst I manage my own Affairs in Person; therefore if I transfer the Care of them on another, he likewise shall be exempt from all Obligation. One thing this Author rightly observes ^e, that under an aristocratical, as well as under a democratical Form, unless certain Times and Places are appointed for the Senators to meet, there will be no longer any such thing as a Court or a compound Person, but a disorderly independent Multitude, without Authority or Rule. In as much as the Wills of the particular Members, from the Combination of which we apprehend the Will of the Court to spring, cannot be known otherwise than by their assembling together for this Purpose. For to take the Senators Votes, by a distant Scrutiny sent about in Writing, is a Method full of Inconvenience. Farther, it is no less necessary in an Aristocracy than in a Democracy, that the Times of meeting in a Council be not fixt too far asunder, unless the Exercise of the sovereign Power, at least with regard to Business of daily Occurrence, be in the mean Time entrusted with some one Magistrate, or with Commissioners not many in Number.

^d Passion than by Reason.

IX. Lastly, A Monarchy is settled, when the sovereign Authority is conferr'd upon one Man. And that this is done by means of a Covenant intervening, we have already sufficiently demonstrated against the Opinion of Mr. Hobbs ^f: Before we proceed farther, we cannot but take under Examination the pestilent Notion of a certain Anonymous Dutch Author, in his Political Balance, which runs in the following manner: 'Since the Act of conferring the sovereign Power is always design'd for the more convenient Prevention and Removal of Evils, whether proceeding from inward or from outward Causes; it cannot be presumed that a democratical Society should ever have devolv'd this Authority on one Man and his Heirs, by a perpetual Succession. For, in as much as their Hopes of a more commodious Protection under a single Government, were grounded purely on the Virtues which appear'd at first in the Person elected; and since no one can be ignorant, that all Men are changeable and mortal, and that, in a short time, either Age will render them unfit for Government, or, if they die sooner, they will leave either no Issue, or such as must be young and unexperienced; or that, should they happen to leave Children grown to mature Years, yet these may either not be more able to rule than others, by any natural Capacity; or may want Will and Inclination to defend their Charge; we must therefore by no means suppose that a popular Society ever intended to debar themselves of the Privilege of choosing a better Governour, in the room of one, who is either weak, or wicked. But that when Persons had thus got the Sovereignty into their Hands, it was easy for them, by drawing to their Assistance the greatest part of the People, especially the Soldiery, so to confirm their Power to themselves and their Posterity, as to be able ever to hold the Command even against the Will of the Subject. To which we reply, if it ever entred into the Thoughts of a Society, to confer the chief Rule on a Person under this Condition, that whensoever the People should vote his Government not so effectual towards procuring the common Safety, as their democratical State was before, he should be depriv'd of his Office, they did not, by such an Act as this, constitute a Monarch, but only an extraordinary Magistrate, who was to depend upon the Breath of the Multitude, and therefore was not invested with the supreme Authority. Besides, since 'tis evident, how little a State is a Gainer by frequent Changes in the Throne, other Mens rather than other Manners still succeeding; and how great a Blow it must be to the Publick to force a Prince from his Command, who hath had Opportunity, in his publick Administration, to strengthen his private Interest; it is but a fair and easy Presumption, that a People should be willing to trust their Fortune once for all, by fixing the Government irrevocably in a King: the Evils which naturally flow'd from their former uncertain, unsettled Condition, being much more to be dreaded, than any which a degenerate Monarch might create. Especially, if we consider how far the exorbitant Inclinations of such a Prince may be limited and retrench'd by fundamental Laws. And lastly, 'tis by no means allowable to revoke all such Acts, the Issue of which doth not exactly answer our Expectation: Since human Affairs must be always liable to Accidents, and since we can establish nothing, but what will be attended at least with some Inconveniencies a.

^a Ubi Supra, f. 8.^b C. 2. f. 12.^c The Fifth Section of this Chapter.^d C. 2. f. 9. &c.^e S. 9.^f S. 10.

A Monarchy differs from the Two former Species of Government in this respect, that under them, before any Matter can be debated or determin'd, that is, before Authority can be actually exercis'd, 'tis necessary that certain Times and Places be assign'd for this purpose: Whereas in a Monarchy (at least if it be such as we term absolute) Deliberations may be held, and Resolutions taken, at all Places and Times c. For a People, or a Senate, in as much as they do not compose one natural Body, must wait an Opportunity of meeting together. But a Monarch, who is but one Person in natural, as well as in moral Account, is always furnish'd with an immediate Power of exercising his sovereign Command, thr' all Instances of Government. It is likewise true what Mr. Hobbes d observes on this Head, that in a People, or in a Court of Senators, in case any Decree pass which is contrary to the Law of Nature, the State it self, or the moral Person, is not affected with the Guilt, but those Members only whose Votes concurr'd in the Resolution. For Sin regards only the natural or express Will, not the moral or political Will, which is purely artificial. Otherwise they also, who disliked the Proceeding, would be included in the Crime e. But in a Monarchy, if the Prince decree any thing which the Law of Nature forbids, the Prince himself is the Sinner; because, in his Person the civil or political Will is the very same with the natural.

X. To these regular Forms of Government, it hath been the Custom, with most Authors, to add certain others, which they term vicious, distemper'd, or corrupt. Now here it is certain, that in many Commonwealths, no less than in particular Men, we may observe a very plentiful Field of Corruption and Diseases; so that it may be look'd on as some kind of Perfection to have the fewest Failings. Of those Diseases, which infect civil Societies, some we see, take their Rise from the Wickedness of particular Persons, others from some Defect in the publick Constitution. The former we may style the Vices of Men, the latter the Vices of the State. It may be proper to touch on some Instances of each Kind, for Illustration and Distinction. In a Monarchy then, the Vices of Men, or personal Faults, are as follow; if he, whom either the Chance of Blood, or the unhappy Suffrage of the People, hath advanced to the Throne, be destitute of the Arts of Government, and very little or not at all affected with any Care or Concern for the common Interest, which he prostitutes to the Ambition, or to the Avarice, of bad Ministers; if he render himself terrible by Passion or Cruelty, forgetting that he is a Man himself, or that he governs Men; if he take a delight in exposing the Commonwealth to unnecessary Hazard or Danger; if he squander away what hath been gather'd to defray the Expence of the Publick, either in Luxury, or in unadvised Grants and Bounties f; if he heap up Money beyond the Bounds of Reason, first squeeze'd out of the Subject; if he be notoriously abusive or unjust g; or guilty of any other Practice, which enters into the Character of a bad Prince h. The Vices of Men in an Aristocracy are: if, by Corruption and base Acts, Persons of no Honesty or of no Ability, find an easy Admission into the Senate, whilst true Merit is excluded; if the Senators break into Parties and Factions amongst themselves; if they make it their Endeavour to enslave the Commonalty to the Service of their private Interest, and to increase their own Estates at the Expence of the Publick. In a Democracy, personal Faults are such as these; if Men, who really want Judgment, turbulently and importunately maintain their own Opinions; if extraordinary Virtue, yet such as is not likely to prove too hard a Match for the Commonwealth, be oppress'd and born down by Envy; if through a Lightness and Inconstancy of Humour, Laws, are rashly made, and as rashly repeal'd; and what was embraced but now with Applause, is soon after disliked and rejected without Reason; and if sordid and worthless Persons are entrusted with the Management of Affairs i. Lastly, a Ad. Groc. l. 1. c. 3. s. 8. n. 1.

 b Ibid. Hobbes, De Civ. C. 7. s. 13.
 c Ibid. s. 14.
 d Herod. l. 1. c. 14. p. 13. Ed. Oxon. Ἐξεί τε ἢ Πάρι, ὅτε πρὸ ἀὐτοκρατορίας ἢ. Where the Emperour is, there Rome is.
 e See Luke xxiii. 51.
 f Drepan. Paneg. upon Theodosius, c. 27. n. 1. E. Cellar. 'Tis the last Defence of wicked Princes, to plunder some, that they may be bountiful to others.
 g 'Tis remarkable what Philostratus reports (De Vit. Apollon. l. 3. c. 3.) in the Beginning of the old Indians, that they allow no manner of Honour or Privilege to the Heirs of the Crown; That neglectful Treatment may be a Lesson to them against unreasonabl: Pride.
 h Such as Claudian sets down, De Bello Gildon. v. 157, &c.

Quocumque profundi
 Traxit vomitibus, luxu p. jove risulit:
 Instat terribilis visus, morientibus heres,
 Virginitibus raptor, thalamis obscuro adulter.
 Nulla quies: oritur preda cessante libido;
 Divitiibusque dies, & nox metuena in maritis.

Those Heaps which boundless Avarice supply,
 Vainly he spends in vilest Luxury;
 Tyrant to all that live, and Heir to all that dye.
 Alike the Nymphs and injur'd Matrons move,
 Or Brural Rape, or foul adult'rous Love.
 Sin never sleeps; new Spoils, new Lusts invite:
 The Wealthy fear the Day, the Married dread the Night.

Thomasi. Orat. 10. De Pace rd Valent. Imper. He is but a lame Prince or Legislator, who is fit for the Service of War, but unskilful in preserving Peace. i In Plutarch, Dion. p. 978. E. Popular Ambition is term'd a wild Distemper, not inferior to Tyranny it self.

such Vices of Men as may affect any Species of Government, are: If the Persons on whom the chief Administration lies, perform their Office negligently or dishonestly; and on the other hand, if the Subjects, who ought to rest contented with the Glory of obeying, grow refractory and aspire to Command.

The Vices or Faults of a State, in general, are; when the Laws and Institutions are not accommodated to the Nature of the People, or of the Place; or when they are so framed, as to breed inward Divisions, or to provoke the just Hatred of Foreigners; or when they render the Subjects incapable of performing such Service as is necessary for the Preservation of the Commonwealth: As suppose the Constitution be such, that Men, whilst they comply with it, cannot avoid sinking into effeminate Weakness, or, on the other hand, cannot bear the easy unactive Condition of Peace; or lastly, when they contradict some of the principal Maxims of civil Doctrine; and the Mischief will still be the greater, if these Irregularities happen to wear the Disguise of Religion.

XI. Though a sound and a distemper'd Commonwealth are vastly different from each other, yet we are not, on this account, to multiply the Forms of Government, and to oppose one or two vicious Forms to each of those which we term good and regular. For these Vices or Defects do neither change the Nature of the Authority it self, nor the proper Subject in which it resides. And thus far Mr. Hobbes ^c is in the right, when he denies, that Anarchy opposed to Democracy, Oligarchy to Aristocracy, Tyranny to Monarchy, are three other kinds of Commonwealths. I think (says he) no Man believes that Want of Government is any new kind of Government. But what he farther observes, is not universally true; That Anarchy, Oligarchy, and Tyranny are three Names impos'd by those who either misliked the Government, or the Governours. It being usual with Men to signify by Names, not the things only, but at the same time their own Affections, as their Love, Hatred, or Anger, their Contempt, or Esteem. For, as it happens in other Matters, that one Man loves what another violently abhors, so the same Form of Government meets with the Applaudation of some, and with the Aversion of others. And this not only because some perhaps reap a particular Advantage from such, or such a Species of Commonwealth; but likewise on account of peculiar Tempers and Inclinations. Men of haughty Spirits, and who dislike the Equality of a popular State, when they see all Men without Distinction, giving their Votes in publick Bu-fincks, of whom the inferior Commonalty always make up the greater Number, call this an Ochlocracy, or a State where the base Rabble sit at the Helm, and where no Prerogative is allow'd to such extraordinary Merits, as they look on themselves to be possess'd of. And yet this Name, as full of Contempt as it is, might with Justice be applied to such a Government as we read of amongst the Epheians of old: Who when they expell'd Hemodorus out of the City, gave this reason for their Proceeding; Let no Man amongst us excel his Neighbour; if he doth, let him find out another Seat, amongst another People: And whom Heracitus for this Judgment, declared to be all worthy of Death. Again, if any Person is discontented that he hath not a place in the Senate, and at the same time thinks himself not in the least inferior to many of that Order; Envy and Contempt together prompt him to give them the Name of oligoi, the Few; that is some inconsiderable Morrals, who having in no respect the Advantage of those about them, do yet exercise Authority over their equals or their betters. And a Man under this Chagrine hath commonly in his Mouth the Complaint which Ajax makes in the Poet.

----- ἰ γὰρ ἔτ' ἐπιδόξ' ἔχει γέρας, &c.

Merit no longer finds a just Reward: Folly's a Favourite, and Vice perfer'd.

People of a more lofty Genius, and those on the contrary who are more mild and tractable, both join in giving the Title of Lords and Masters to foreign Princes, who govern with a stricter Hand: Whereas 'tis well known, that when a Father treats a stubborn Child with Severity, and one that is more submissive with Gentleness and Kindness, in both Instances he exerciseth the very same paternal Power. The like may be affirm'd of the Name of Tyrant, which is now attended with an indelible Mark of Hatred and Detestation, from the Custom of the Grecians, who thought the chief Happiness of the States to consist in a popular Liberty. Lucian himself passeth this Censure upon them: In general, says he, People, not considering whether the Person who bears Rule be just or unjust, have an Abhorrence to the bare Name of Tyranny. Many of their Authors apply the same Word to any kind of Government in the Hands of a single Person. Thus Aeschines particularly says, There are three political Forms in use in the World, Tyranny, Oligarchy, and Democracy. Hence 'tis worthy our Remark what Mnemou, in Photius, reports of Dionysius, the Fourth Tyrant of Heraclea; Having, discourieih ingeniously on some Disfeates of the State.

^a Ad. Hobbes Leviath. c. 29. about the Lind, where he ^b Such was the Authority of the Priests amongst the People of Meroe, mention'd by Diod. Sic. l. 3. c. 6. and Strabo l. 17. p. 566. Ed. Gouss. Casab. to whom the Kings themselves were accountable.
^c De Civ. c. 7.
^d So that we cannot universally allow that of Lysias, De Populari Statu, Grat 24. No Man is more inclined by Nature either to a Popular or to an Aristocratical State; but every one endeavours to establish that Form of Government, which tends most to his particular Advantage. With whom Socrates, De Pace, p. 320. joins his Opinion: No Man hath a Natural Affection for any of these States; but all love that best, in which they themselves meet with the greatest Honour and Esteem.
^e In Cicero, Tull. Quaest. l. 1. c. 36. Diog. Laert. l. 9. in Heracit. l. 2. Strabo, l. 14. p. 441.
^f Opus. Calaber. l. 5.
^g In Paulan. l. 1. p. 735. con. Ed. Amst.
^h Contra Crephont.
ⁱ Ad. Cornel. Nep. Miltiad. c. 8. n. 3.
^k Of the Tyrants of Heraclea, c. 5.

MR BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. X, XI.

¹ These Instances are taken out of our Author's Abundantia, D. Offic. Hom. & Civ. l. 2. c. 8. f. 10.
² See Hobbes's Leviath. B. 2. c. 19.

³ De Civ. ubi supra.

says he, arrived to a high pitch of Glory, he disdain'd the Name of Tyrant, and assumed that of King; the latter being less odious and more honourable. Yet there is no one who doth not apprehend, that these invidious Titles are sometimes affix'd with sufficient Justice, to distinguish the Government of bad Princes or Senators from that of good, the Fury of a turbulent and inconstant Multitude, from the wise Administration of a modest People. Aristotle's Decision of this Point differs little from what hath been here establish'd; who terms Tyranny, Oligarchy, and Anarchy (for as to this latter word, he useth the general Name of Polity for a sound popular Government) παρὰ τὸν εὖτος Deviations or Degeneracies from a Kingdom, an Aristocracy and a Democracy ^a. And who will pretend that a bare Deviation is sufficient to constitute a new Species? As for that Latitude of which the Word Εἶδος or Species is capable, we think it not considerable enough to afford any just Matter of Dispute ².

XII. But when we meet with such a Government, as we can neither bring under any of those Forms which are found and regular, nor yet explain how it differs from them, by the bare Notion of a Disease or Deviation, then the learned are put upon a more laborious Enquiry. Most Authors judge it the shortest way of getting over this Difficulty, to call such Governments mixt States; as if they were the Result of the more regular Forms, allay'd and blended together. Aristotle is called in by many to countenance this Project; and therefore it may be worth our while to examine his Opinion in the Case. First then, as for what he delivers, in the Fourth Book of his Politicks ^b, concerning the several Kinds of Democracy and Aristocracy, it bears no Resemblance to the Mixture proposed by our modern Designers. The chief thing he there insists on, is the reckoning up of certain Conditions and Qualities, to be found in those who are to be admitted into the popular Assembly, or into the ruling Senate. By which means, neither is the Sovereignty it self any way varied, nor are the Parts of it torn and wrested from each other, nor the State rent into two or more distinct Bodies; but the Forms of Government which he there mentions, are only hereby slightly diversified, according to their several Accidents, or circumstantial Differences. Thus, although in the Definition of a Democracy, the chief Authority should be laid to reside in a general Council, or a Council made up of all the Members, and at the same time tho' it be true, that Women and Children have as much Interest as others in the common Welfare; yet who will maintain that a new Form of Government is establish'd, when the Women, the Children, and Servants, are excluded from the public Debates? Tho', in our Judgment, 'tis sufficient for the constituting a Democracy, if those Persons are allow'd the Privilege of Votes, who by uniting together, first compos'd the State, and after them their Successors, to whom their Places and Rights properly descended. But now it's manifest, that civil States were originally compos'd by Fathers of Families, who held the inferior Train before-mention'd, under their domestical Sway, and certainly did not intend to relinquish all Authority over them, or to set them on the level with themselves. It was necessary therefore, that Persons who were thus in Subjection, should be debarr'd from giving their Suffrage with their Lords. After the Democracy was once settled, 'twas in the Power of the Members to receive others into the State, or not; to give them a full, or imperfect Right; to let them have the same Share with themselves in the Administration, or utterly to exclude them from it. Whence it may happen, that in free Governments many shall want the Privilege of a Voice, whilst yet the popular Establishment continues as perfect as ever. On the other hand, 'tis possible indeed, that a State, at first democratical, may, by receiving large Additions, and by shutting out all these new Comers from their Honours and their Councils, at length commence an Aristocracy. In the same manner, the Species of aristocratical Government will not be multiplied, though; in one place, Virtue and Merit should be a sufficient Qualification for a Senator, in another, the Estate and Family should be likewise consider'd. No more could it be said, that there were so many several distinct Forms of Democracy; if, under one State, every free Denison had a Vote in the Assembly; under another, none but Men of such and such Fortunes were admitted; under a third some particular Profession rendred Persons incapable of this Honour. Much less do any new Forms or Species (properly so call'd) arise from the different Laws of Democracies, relating to the Election of Magistrates; whilst in some places, for Instance, all Persons promiscuously have a Right to bear these Employments; in others, again an Estate, to such a Value, is made a necessary Condition: As suppose, under one Government, the rich were allow'd to absent themselves from the public Councils without Censure, the Poor not; or vice versa. And indeed, this whole Matter is plain beyond Dispute. What Judgment we ought to pass on the Mixtures, supposed to be in the Commonwealths of Sparta and Crete, as described by Aristotle, we shall elsewhere discuss. The Athenian State, which Aristotle ^c and Isocrates ^d describe and commend, was in all respects truly popular. Polybius's Opinion ^e, concerning the mixt Government in the Roman Commonwealth, comes under our Examination in another place.

XIII. As for the Moderns, some of them have invented many kinds of mixt States;

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTE on §. XI.

^a At. Sallust. Philosoph. de Div. & Mundo, c. 11. and to the same purpose, Themistius, Orat. 16. p. 336. Edis. Petav. Who then will be so bold as to maintain, that the Corruption of a State is sufficient to constitute a new Form of Government? See likewise what Mr. Parizonius says concerning some of Aristotle's Terms, in his fourth Note on Ælian. Var. Hist. Lib. II. Cap. XX.

² Vid. Polit. l. 3. c. 7. §.

^b C. 3. c. 2.

^c Polit. l. 2. c. 9, 10.

^d In Areopagit.

^e L. 6. f. 20.

yet so as that, upon the whole, rejecting the greatest part of them as inconvenient, they applaud two ways, as especially proper and useful. The first is, when the parts of the Sovereignty reside separately and independently in different Persons, or Bodies of the same Commonwealth, so that each Person or Body hold their respective Parts by their own proper Right, and administer it according to their own Judgment, whilst in respect of the other parts they are altogether in the Nature of Subjects. Much after this manner was the Disposál of the Kingdom of Numidia by Scipio, after Masinissa's Death; his three legitimate Sons being all allow'd to bear the regal Title and Dignity; but with this Difference, that the Elder Brother Micipsa should keep his Court at Cirtba, the ordinary Seat of the Kings; that Gulussa, the next to him, should have the chief Command of War and Peace; and that the youngest, Manastabales, should preside in judicial Affairs. The other way which they propose is, when the sovereign Authority inheres indivisibly in many together, yet so as that neither the most considerable Majority, without some few dissenting Members, nor indeed all the rest, when any one of the Number stands out, can act to any purpose, or exercise any part of the supreme Power. And this again is subdivided into two Models, either that all the Members shall have equal Power; or that some one or two of the Number shall be invested with certain extraordinary Rights and Prerogatives, which they may use without the Assistance of their Brethren. They proceed to alledge many Authorities from the Antients, where Mention is made of mixt Commonwealths; with regard to which Authorities we have already observ'd, that what is deliver'd in them concerning the mixture of Governments, doth not in the least belong to the Division of the sovereign Power amongst several Persons or Councils; but either to the settling the due Qualifications of those Persons, of whom the governing Council is to be composed, or to the joining together of several good Institutions drawn from different States. Besides, we are of Opinion, that some Examples of these Mixtures might receive a convenient Explication, by distinguishing between the Sovereignty it self, and the manner of administering it. So that we may affirm those States to have mingled as it were somewhat of others in their Composition, in which the Method of Administration seems to have been borrow'd from another Form: As suppose for Instance, in a popular State, the main Business should be dispatch'd by some one principal Officer, or by a Senate; or if under an Aristocracy, one Magistrate should be invested with extraordinary Authority, or the People consulted in many important Affairs; or if in a Kingdom, the Difficulties of publick Business should be referr'd to the Debates of a Senate, or of a popular Assembly. And if this come not up to a full Solution of the Passages cited from Antiquity, the Point

^a Appian in Libyc, bell. p. 64. Ed. H. Steph.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTE on §. XIII.

¹ See Mr. Bayle's Reflections on La difficulté de trouver un juste Milieu dans un Gouvernement mixte, Tom. I. of the Reponse aux Questions d'une Provinciale, pag. 611. &c.

will be throughly clear'd from what follows. We have above demonstrated, that in order to completing the Essence of a just and regular State, such an Union is requir'd, as shall make all things, which belong to the Government of it, seem to proceed from one Soul. Now hence it is manifest, that the former way of Mixture constitutes such a Body as is held together, not by the Bond of one supreme Authority, but barely by Compact; and which therefore is to be rank'd, not amongst the regular, but amongst the irregular States; being but weakly guarded against foreign Assaults, and very obnoxious to inward Disorders and Convulsions. As to the other kind of Mixture propos'd, we think it ought to be consider'd, whether those Persons, in whom the sovereign Power is said thus indivisibly to reside, do make up a standing Senate, which is to guide and direct the whole State as one lasting Body. If so, the Form will be aristocratical; yet such as must be very unfit for the Dispatch of Business, whilst some few, or but one of a contrary Judgment, may vacate the Resolutions of all the rest. Again, if those particular Members, in other respects equal, do each of them hold some part of the Government, yet so as that the sovereign Acts cannot be exercis'd without the unanimous Consent of the whole Number, then the State is systematical, according to the proper Notion of that Word; yet such as will likewise have great Disadvantages, as to the Management of Affairs, by reason of this very great and unnecessary Streightness. If some one Person be endued with high Degrees of Authority, and several parts of the supreme Power above others in the Council, then the State will be plainly irregular, lying between such a Monarchy as is overawed by an assuming Senate, and a systematical Form. And this Irregularity will in Proportion be the greater, in Case more than one are invested with these signal Prerogatives above the rest.

XIV. For our part, as we envy no Man the Praise of his Constancy and Resolution, who will on no account lay aside the Term of a mixt State; so we think it the more commodious and easy Method, and the more expeditious for the Explication of certain Phænomena in particular Commonwealths, to call those Governments irregular, in which we can neither discover any one of the three regular Forms, nor yet any proper Disease or Deviation; and which at the same time cannot, with due Exactness, be rank'd amongst the systematical Models. Concerning which we may in general observe, that they differ from regular States in this respect, that all things do not seem to proceed in them from one Soul and one Will, nor all and each of the Members to be ruled by one common Power. Again, they vary from systematical Forms, because they are not compos'd of several compleat and distinct States. Lastly, they do not fall in with Diseases or evolutions, because a distemper'd State always appears under Circumstances of Ignominy, and hath as it were somewhat of the Bastard in its Countenance ; in as much as it proceeds either from the ill Management of a good and regular Frame, or from incoherent Laws and improper Institutions. Whereas the Irregularity of a Government doth not only affect its Frame after an intrinsic and secret manner, but being openly confirm'd, and as it were declar'd legitimate, shews it self in publick without Shame or Guilt. Therefore the former, or the Disease, cannot be suppos'd to have entered into the Intention of those who first founded the Commonwealth, ever appearing as a subsequent Vice or Defect : But the latter, the Irregularity owes, if not its Original, yet at least its Confirmation to the Will and Approbation of the first Authors. It is just the same Difference as may be observ'd between two Buildings, one of which is design'd according to the Rules of Architecture, but either the Materials are naught, or through the Negligence of the Inhabitant, the Roof gapes, the Walls shake, the Beams crack, the Foundation sinks and gives way : In the other, either the Builder at first propos'd a Model not agreeable to the common Rules ; or some great Fault, which afterwards happen'd, hath been cur'd and made up after a strange and unseemly manner. Farther, some Irregularities appear'd upon the first Settlement of a State, others crept in by silent Steps, and in long Progress of Time. For it might so happen, that the Authors or the Reformers and new Modell rs of a Commonwealth might not be able to introduce a regular Frame, either on account of Ignorance, or because the present Posture and Exigence of Affairs would not suffer them to consider of a more accurate Constitution ^a. Sometimes too, Persons, who have been the chief Leaders and Assistants in winning a Kingdom, have beforehand contracted for such Lordships, or such Privileges in it, as that they cannot be rank'd in the Number of true and proper Subjects. Again, many times, either through Neglect of the Governours, or upon some other Occasion, a Distemper seizeth a State, and having taken so deep root, that it cannot be removed without the Destruction of the publick Frame, there remains no Cure for it, but this ; to divest it, as it were, of its Faultiness, and to vindicate it from Censure, by turning it into a solemn and legal Appointment ; by which means what was before term'd Usurpation, Faction, or Contumacy, shall, for the future, bear the Style of a just Right and Privilege.

^a Id. Hobbes Leviath. c. 29. post. princip. among those just now cited.

XV. These irregular Forms of Government can neither be brought within any certain Number, nor divided into proper Kinds, by reason of that great Variety, which either really occurs in Fact, or at least may be framed in our Imagination. So that we have scarce any other means of discovering their Nature, but by gathering it from particular Instances, and the illustrious Examples in Story. Such an Example we endeavour'd to exhibit in the ^b Roman Commonwealth : As the like hath been attempted in the German Empire by Severinus de Monzambano ^c. At present, 'twill be sufficient to offer a Remark or two concerning the Irregularity, which some observe, in the Government of Rome, under the antient Emperours : Whilst sometimes the State appear'd a Monster with a double or triple Body, one Prince ruling the East, another the West, or three dividing the World amongst them ; sometimes again, with a double or triple Head, whilst two or three of the royal Family held the sovereign Power, as Copartners, and govern'd in common. Now as to the former of these Cases, we may note, that whilst two Emperours presid'd, one over the Eastern, the other over the Western World, separately and independently from each other, then there were really Two distinct Kingdoms, which, taken both together, still retain'd the Name of the Roman Empire, out of which they had been compos'd. Besides which Agreement as to their Original, the Resemblance of Laws and Manners, the natural Relation between the respective Sovereigns and between their Subjects, their strict League and Alliance, which insur'd their mutual Help and Support, all concurr'd to make up some Appearance of Unity. But what Name we are to impose on that Form of Government, when two or three royal Partners administr'd Affairs in Conjunction, it is not easy to determine. Certainly two Persons cannot make an Aristocracy. For since each is invest'd with equal Power (upon which Supposition the Case before us proceeds) they cannot be united, otherwise than by Covenant ; and there could be no Expedient found out for the Dispatch of Business, should they happen to disagree about any Proposal, there being no third Person to turn the Scales. And tho' the

^b In a Dissertation entituled, De forma Reipublicæ Romanæ,

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. XV.

¹ See our Author's Dissertation De Republica Irregulari among his Dissertationes Academicæ selectiores, where he treats more fully of this matter.

² This Work is generally attributed to our Author : However, he has never, as I know of, publicly own'd it ; he has indeed strenuously defended it against several Authors who attack'd it, in his Dissertation De Republica Irregulari ; and those who are acquainted with his Style and Character, do not much doubt of its being written by him ; neither after all, is it a Work that does him any manner of Discredit, but rather the contrary, for not to mention the principal Design of the Work which the World has highly approv'd of, the Preface has abundance of Wit and Life in it. Since the first Edition of this Translation, the Monzambano has been printed in 1706, at Berlin, with the Author's Name to it ; who at his Death order'd his Heir to publish it from a Copy full of several Alterations, Corrections and Additions. There are likewise some things left out, which together with the Suppression of the Preface, will doubtless make the learned very well pleas'd to have the Edition, which was surreptitiously publish'd, as well as that which is now extant with the Author's Name and Approbation. Mr. Titius has taken care to satisfy their Curiosity in that point at an easy rate, in bethinking himself of a thing odd and singular enough ; which was his printing in 1708. at Leipsick the Book we are here speaking of in such a manner as to give 'em the two Editions all together ; for the Passages which Mr. Pufendorf had either retrench'd or alter'd are here interred again, in their proper Places between two Crotchets, and distinguish'd by a different Character. Besides, the Editor has made a sort of variorum of it, by putting at the bottom of every Page the Notes of several Commentators upon the old Monzambano.

same Inconvenience may seem to attend any ruling Council or College, where the Members are of an even Number; yet it cannot so frequently happen, that upon a Division in Judgment the Votes shall be equal. Besides, in this Case it is not difficult to bring over some one out of such a Number to the opposite Sentence: Or, if this can't be done, the next Expedient is to let that Opinion prevail, which declares against Innovation, and would have things continue in their present State. Farther, neither can we, properly speaking, affirm the united Government of three Cæsars, reigning together, to have been aristocratical. For this royal Triumvirate did not compose such a collegiate Body, as was to determine State-Affairs by the Plurality of Voices, or where two Members, agreeing in Opinion, might by their proper Right and Authority compel the third, who dissented, to follow their Resolution. And in all Cases, a Council or Body of Men, in which the Major part cannot influence and draw over the rest, seems to be held together, rather by bare Compact, than by any Government or Command. We may therefore say, as to the Question before us, that the sovereign Authority did truly and radically inhere in that Person alone, who assumed the other into a Partnership with him; tho' both might seem equal as to the exterior Ensigns of Majesty. Thus the Historian ^a tells us of Lucius Verus, That he lived not as a free and sovereign Prince, but, under Marcus, invested with the imperial Authority. Nor was it easy to suspect, that any Man would be guilty of so notorious Ingratitude, as to oppose the Will of his Patron, to whom he owed his Promotion and Honour. To which we may add this Consideration, that for the most part the Persons thus sharing the Government, were either Father and Son, Father-in-Law and Son-in-Law, or two Brothers; so that the Party admitted as a second in the Dignity, might be farther restrain'd by the Ties of Blood or the Alliance of Marriage, from abusing the Power which had been given him, to the Prejudice of the Donor. Whence it appears, that this Practice of assuming a Colleague was not any Portion of the Sovereignty, but as it were the Designation of a Vicar-general and Heir apparent who was immediately receiv'd into the Business of State, and join'd with the other in the Administration; being likewise invested with the most shining Ornaments and the richest Trappings of Greatness. Now that which put the Emperours upon this Method, was the inconstant Humour of the Soldiery; who, on frequent Occasions, took a Pride in complementing their Leaders with the imperial Title ^b. If this Explication will not satisfy some Men, or if it seems not applicable to every particular Instance which we find upon Record; we have no way left but to affirm, that the Government then commenced irregular, when more Persons than one held the Monarchy (if it might still deserve that Name) in Conjunction; and yet were engaged to each other only by Compact or Faction. Amongst whom if any Dissension or Hatred should chance to arise, the Consequence could be nothing less than mutual Suspicions, Plots, and Designs, and in the final Issue, a civil War ^c. Such an Irregularity the Roman State was evidently sensible of, whilst Romulus and Tatius sat as Partners in the Throne ^d. In general, we may apply to all these polyarchical Governments, what Solyman the Turk observed in the German Empire; that it might be well compar'd to a Lute, which costs a great deal of Labour and Skill to put it in Tune, and is very easily put as far out of Tune as ever ^e.

^a Julius Capitolinus, c. 1.

^b Themist. Orat. 16, Fratres Amantes, p. 76. B. Ed. Paris. speaking of Valentinian who had admitted his Brother Valens into a Partnership with him in the Empire, useth the following Expression: He receiving the Whole and giving the Whole, at the same time a Brother and a Father, the one by Nature, the other by his own Act and Choice, tho' he hath conferr'd an equal Share of his Power, yet, in effect, he still keeps it entire; by reason of the Obedience and Compliance of him on whom it was conferr'd.

Thus Solinus, c. 8. reports of Æneas, that he reign'd with Latinus three Years, sociâ potestate, as his Fellow or Equal in the Supreme Authority.

^c Lucan, l. 1. v. 92, &c.

*Nulla fides regni sociis; omnisque potestas
Impatiens consortis erit.*

To trust a Partner's Rule impairs our own,
And Empire hates a Consort in the Throne.

Statius, Theb. 1. ver. 130.

————— Sociisque comes discordia regnis.

————— Howe'er the Crown is shar'd, Discord's a Partner.

^d Vid. Plutarch. Romul. Add. Eryc. Putean. Hist. Infubric. l. 2. the Story of Pertharite and Gundobert, joint Kings of Lombardy. Procopius relates a like Case; Hist. Goth. l. 1. The Goths, says he, and Odoacer's Army came to this Agreement; That Theuderick and Odoacer should reign in the City Ravenna with equal Power. And for some time the Compact was faithfully observ'd; but the Issue was, That Theuderick, according to the vulgar Report, inviting Odoacer to a Banquet treacherously slew him. 'Tis a true Remark of Euripides, Andromach. v. 471, &c.

Two Tyrants can no more be born than one,
But press the Subjects with a double Load;
Till Discord and Sedition work their Fate.

Plin. Paneg. c. 8. n. 4. What a small Difference is there between laying down the Imperial Honour, and sharing it with another; unless the latter be difficult and dangerous? Add. Herodian. l. 4. c. 1, &c. See likewise Racine's Freres Ennemis, Act, I. Scen. V. and the Fables de la Fontaine, Lib. I. Fab. XII. intituled le Dragon a plusieurs Têtes, & le Dragon a plusieurs queues.

^e We do not think that we ought to admit, under the Head of Irregular Forms, what Francis Carron reports of Dayre in Japan; who he says was the true Heir of the Crown, yet was put off by the Prince in possession, with the outward Majesty, and empty Badges of Honour. Much to the same purpose, Alexander de Rhodes relates, That in the Kingdom of Touquin there are two Kings, one called Bua, the other Choua; yet so as that the former barely enjoys the Title, the latter really holding the Command; only Bua hath the Power of conferring the Degree of Doctor, and receives the Oaths of the Subjects when they renew their yearly Allegiance; as to other matters, he passeth his time shut up in an old Palace without Action or Business, Irim, par. 2. c. 6.

XVI. When several States are, by some special Band, so closely united, as that they seem to compose one Body, and yet retain each of them the sovereign Command in their respective Dominions; these we term Systems of States. Whence it is in the first place evident, that when a State is composed of several subordinate Bodies, we must not on this account presently give it the Name of System: 'Tho' Mr. Hobbes^a is pleas'd thus to style it, and to compare the said Parts with the Muscles in the Body natural. No more are we to apply this Term, in general, to all those larger States which have vastly increased their Dominions by swallowing up their little Neighbours, and by reducing them into the same Body with themselves. Which we may observe to be done chiefly in the following Methods. First, when the Victor either removes the vanquish'd into his own Territories, or however gives them the same Privileges with his former Subjects. Secondly, when the conquer'd Nation is left to possess its antient Seat, but utterly losing the Sovereignty which it held before, is rendred purely the Subject of the conquering People. In both Cases the State thus subdued loseth its Name; but in the former the conquer'd are made equal to the Conqueror; in the latter they are put under an inferior Condition, being reduced into the Form of a Province. Tho' it often happens, that the vanquish'd are partly left in Possession of their antient Laws or Privileges, how different soever from the Manners and Institutions of the conquering State^b. For in order to preserve the Unity of a Commonwealth, 'tis not required, that all its particular Parts shall use the same positive Ordinances, or shall stand exactly upon the same Bottom; but 'tis enough, if they depend upon one Government. And it is frequently the Art and Policy of a Conqueror, to make no Alterations in the Customs of those who are fallen under his Dominion: Or, at least to accommodate himself to them for such a time as he thinks convenient.

In relation to the Government of Provinces, we are to examine what Mr. Hobbes delivers on that Subject^c. Whereas, says he, heretofore the Roman People govern'd the Land of Judea, for Example, by a President; yet was not Judea therefore a Democracy, because they were not govern'd by an Assembly into which any of them had Right to enter; nor by an Aristocracy, because they were not govern'd by an Assembly, into which any Man could enter by their Election; but they were govern'd by one Person: Which, tho' as to the People of Rome it was an Assembly of the People, or a Democracy; yet as to the People of Judea, which had no Right at all of participating in the Government, was a Monarch. For tho', where the People, are govern'd by an Assembly, chosen by themselves out of their own Number, the Government is call'd a Democracy or Aristocracy; yet when they are govern'd by an Assembly, not of their own choosing, 'tis a Monarchy; not of one Man over another Man, but of one People over another People. So that Mr. Hobbes seems to look on these Provinces which are dependent on some aristocratical or democratical State, as so many distinct Monarchies. Now tho' we easily allow, that 'tis the more usual Practice to govern Provinces by one Man, than by an Assembly consisting of many, as the same Author shews at large^d; yet we think it needful to enquire what Form of Government it establish'd over a dependent People. For Provinces have lost the Nature of States, and are made the Appendages of other States, having no kind of sovereign Authority in themselves. Whether therefore such a Province is govern'd by a President, or by an Assembly, is an indifferent Point, which doth not in the least affect the proper Sovereignty, in as much as both he and they bear only a subordinate or delegated Power. So that the Sovereignty, exercis'd over these additional Dominions, is exactly of a piece with that of the main State, and cannot, without Impropriety, obtain the distinct Name of a Monarchy or an Aristocracy; which are Terms belonging to true and independent States, such as really possess a supreme Government of their own.

XVII. Of Systems properly so call'd, these two kinds do especially fall under Notice: One, when two or more States are subject to one and the same King^e; the other, when two or more States are link'd together in one Body by virtue of some League or Alliance. In regard to Systems of the former kind, 'tis observable, that it implies no Contradiction in Moral Bodies, to have but one Head over several of them together, and consequently to have one Person the Head of many distinct Bodies; which in Nature would bear so monstrous an Appearance. But because the Union of these Systems is founded either in the sole Person of the Prince, or in his Family, hence it comes to pass, that when the Person is deceas'd, or the Family extinct, the respective People recover their particular Right of settling their own Government, and are no longer obliged to make Use of a common Head. Nay, during the Continuance of the said Head, the States are really distinct from each other. The Causes whence such Combinations arise are various; but the most frequent seem to be the Marriages of Princes, and the Right of Inheritance. For there are many States, in which the Crown descends to the female Issue of the royal House, not only when the male Line is utterly extinct, but when there is no male Heir in a nearer, or in an equal Degree. Now here if the Lady Sovereign happen to take another Sovereign for her Husband, the two Kingdoms will come to a Conjunction, if not in their Persons, at least in their common Issue. For it is not necessary, that, in a Match of this Nature, the Princess should put her self and her Dominions in Subjection to the Prince. So likewise in one undivided Kingdom, where the Hereditary Succession is establish'd, either according to the plain and direct, or the lineal Course, if one

^a Leviath. c. 22. ^b Hobbes Leviath. c. 26.

^c Leviath. c. 19.

^d Ibid. c. 22.

^e For Example,

Great-Britain and Ireland, See our Author's Dissertation, De Systematib. Civit. S. 9, 10.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTE ON §. XVII.

² See the Seventh Chapter of this Book, §. 12, 13 of the remote Heirs any way become Master of another Crown, and the Rule of Succession (all the rest failing who stood nearer) call him to receive that of his own Country, the two Kingdoms will by this means be united under his Reign. The Consequence is the same, if a People choose for their King one who bears the same Character elsewhere, in Possession, or in Reversion. Again, two or more Nations may engage by League to elect one Prince over both by joint Suffrages, and yet as to other Matters, continue separate Kingdoms, without transacting their Affairs in a common Assembly. Lastly, such a System doth then arise, when a Prince, constituted by the free Consent of the People, subdues by Arms another People, in his own Name, and at his own Hazard and Expence; not in the Name or at the Charges of the State over which he presides. For that this is no impossible Case, Grotius^a hath sufficiently made out, against the Opinion of Hottoman the Civilian^b.

As for the Dissolution of these Systems, 'tis manifest it must happen, either upon the Death of the Prince, if the Union was founded in his Person only; or upon the Extinction of the royal Family, in case the respective Kingdoms were all entail'd in the way of Inheritance. For then each separate People recover their Right of constituting a new King, or of introducing what Form of Government they think fit, without consulting the rest; they being supposed to have no other Bond of Union. If a Prince holds one Kingdom by Right of Inheritance, and another by free Election; upon his Decease the Union between them will be broken, and the latter Kingdom shall have no Obligation to advance his Son to the Crown.

But if this Union depend upon a League between the Kingdoms, 'tis no less manifest, that if the Agreement happen to be violated, especially in the principal Articles, then the injured State may disengage it self from the other. Yet here we ought carefully to distinguish between the Obligation by which particular Kingdoms are tied to their respective Kings, and the Obligation by which the same Kingdoms are united amongst themselves. A King once elected, and who hath receiv'd the Fealty and Allegiance of his People, may not afterwards be deserted on account of any Misbehaviour, or any Action contrary to his Engagement, so long as he doth not profess open Hostility towards the State. Unless perchance the Compact, between the Elected King and the People, had this conditional Clause expressly annex'd to it, that the Obedience of the latter should be due on no other account, but upon the former's performing all and each of the Articles settled betwixt them. On the contrary, the Engagements by which united Kingdoms are held together, may be renounced on that side, to the Prejudice of which the Laws of the Union have been violated, tho' the Injury be not very considerable; in case the other Kingdoms concurr'd in the Action, or if it was undertaken for their Sake, or converted to their Use and Service. Wherefore upon the Decease of the common Prince, the Injured State may disclaim the Union, reserving a Right to prosecute the Authors or Abettors of the Fact, and to recover what is lost by their means. If, by the Marriage of hereditary Princes several States are conjoin'd, which observe a different Course and Order of Succession, the Union will be dissolv'd, if such a Case happen, as that the same Person proves incapable of succeeding to both Crowns according to the publick Laws. Let us suppose two Kingdoms in Conjunction, one of which receives the Method of lineal Descent by Agnation, the other by Cognition. Here, if it so fall out, that the common Prince decease without male Issue, the latter of the two Kingdoms shall pass to his Daughter, the former to the Heir male in the next Degree. But if an Union, at first contracted on the Occasion of Marriage, shall be afterwards confirm'd, and turn'd into a perpetual Establishment, by means, either of a solemn League passing between all and each of the Kingdoms to this purpose, or a Decree made by the common Sovereign, with the Approbation of the respective States; then any difference, which was before observ'd in their way of Succession, shall be understood to be actually taken off. And, for the future, such a Method shall be followed, as is expressly specified in the League, or in the Decree; or such as the Authors of the Union appear to have been most inclin'd to; or such as is most agreeable to Reason, and most conducive to the Safety of the united States. But when one Kingdom happens to be join'd to another, in the manner of a Province, the Union founded on a precedent League expires, and a much closer Bond succeeds in its room, by means of which they unite into the same civil Body.

XVIII. The other kind of System is, when several States are join'd to each other by a perpetual League or Alliance; the chief Occasion of which seems to have been, that each particular People loved to be their own Masters, and yet each was not strong enough to make Head against a common Enemy. The Purport of such an Agreement usually is, that they shall not exercise some part of the Sovereignty there specified, without the general Consent of each other. For the Leagues to which these Systems owe their rise, seem distinguish'd from others (so frequent amongst different State-) chiefly by this Consideration; that in the latter each confederate People determine themselves by their own Judgment

^a L. I. c. 3. s. 12.

^b Quæst. Illustr. 1.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES ON §. XVII, XVIII.

^a Lex Commissoria: See Grotius Lib. I. Cap. III. Sect. 16. Numb. V. by that is generally understood a conditional Clause added to a Contract, the not performing of which renders void or makes the thing in dispute to be forfeited. We have seen some Instances of it relating to the Contract of Sale, Book V. Chap. V. Sect. IV and of Pawns and Mortgages, Chap. X. Sect. XIV. So in that Place the lex Commissoria or conditional Clause is an Article imposed upon the King; by virtue of which, if he breaks the Engagement which that obliges him to perform, he forfeits ipso facto the Crown: Just so in Manors, when the Vassal does not do Homage, or does not pay the Rent due to his Lord, or becomes guilty of Felony, the Fee falls into Lapse, as the Law terms it; that is, is forfeited to the use of the Lord, and is re-united to the Manor.

! As for Example, the United Provinces of the Netherlands, the Swiss Cantons, &c.

to certain mutual Performances, yet so as that, in all other respects, they design not in the least to make the exercise of that part of the Sovereignty, whence those Performances proceed, dependent on the Consent of their Allies, or to retrench any thing from their full and unlimited Power of governing their own States. Thus we see that ordinary Treaties propose, for the most part, as their Aim, only some particular Advantage of the States thus transacting; their Interests happening at present to fall in with each other: But do not produce any lasting Union, as to the chief Management of Affairs. Whereas in those Leagues we are now speaking of, the contrary is observable; they being carried on with this Design, that the several States shall for ever link their Safety one within the other, and in order to this mutual Defence, shall engage themselves not to exercise certain parts of their sovereign Power, otherwise than by a common Agreement and Approbation. For the Promises made in the two Cases here compared, run in very different Terms; in the former thus: 'I will join you as a Confederate in this particular War, and the manner of our attacking the Enemy shall be concerted by our common Advice: In the latter thus; None of us, who have entered into this Alliance, will make use of our Right, as to the Affair of Peace and War, except by the general Consent of the whole Confederacy. We observ'd before, that these Unions submit only some certain parts of the Sovereignty to mutual Direction. For it seems hardly possible, that the Affairs of different States shall have so close a Connection, as that all and each of them must look on it as their Interest, to have no part of the chief Government exercis'd without the general Concurrence. Or, if there be any Communities thus mutually depending, it had been the wiser Course for them, rather to have incorporated themselves under the same Government, than to rely on the bare Engagement of a League. The most convenient Method therefore seems to be, that the particular States reserve to themselves all those Branches of the supreme Authority, the Management of which can have little or no Influence (at least directly) on the Affairs of the rest. The same must be said of such publick Business, as either occurs every Day, or else requires so speedy Measures as to prevent a general Debate. But then as to all Affairs, on which the Safety of the Allies hath a joint Dependence, these ought in reason to be adjusted by common Constitution. And in this Number War, whether offensive or defensive, seems to claim the first Place; after that, Peace as the Result and Issue of War. To which we may add Taxes and Subsidies, as they contribute to the mutual Support; and Alliances with foreign States, as they promote the common Safety. It falls under the same Head of Duties, that in Case any Dispute arise amongst the Confederates themselves, the other Members who are unconcern'd, shall immediately interpose their Mediation, and not suffer the Controversy to come to Blows. Thus the wise Prince Philip of Macedon, declares in the Historian ^a, that The mutual Wrongs of his Allies so particularly concern'd himself, as that he could not but use his best Endeavours for a Composition, by Words to the present, and by Letters to the absent Parties: Whereas those other Dangers or Injuries, which affected the whole Confederacy, belonged to the Care of the common Assembly, and were thence only to receive their proper Redress. As for other Matters, which seem not so necessary to be transacted in common, as Negotiations of Traffick, Subsidies for the particular Occasions of any single State, the constituting of Magistrates, the enacting of Laws, the Power of Life and Death over the respective Subjects, the ecclesiastical Authority, and the like; there is no reason but that they may be left to the Pleasure of each distinct Government: Tho' at the same time, particular States ought so to manage these Privileges, as that they shall cause no Disturbance in the general Union. Whence 'tis evident, that one or more of the Allies cannot be hindred by the rest from exercising, according to their own Judgment, such parts of the civil Administration, as were not, in the Treaty of Alliance, referr'd to the common Direction. Yet as to the Power of Life and Death, some Scruple may be made on account of that Passage in the Civil Law ^b: At sunt apud nos rei ex Civitatibus fœderatis, & in eos damnatos animadvertimus. But some Persons, Members of our Confederate States, are here arraign'd in Judgment, and receive from us both their Condemnation and Punishment. Grotius ^c hath taken a great deal of Pains to solve this difficulty; but whoever thoroughly considers his Discourse, will find that he hath labour'd to little purpose. For he certainly leaves the following Question unanswered; How that State can entirely preserve its Liberty, the Subjects of which are liable to be arraign'd under another Government, and to be punish'd upon Conviction? We find that the Freedom of the Achaians was look'd on as considerably impair'd, when, by the Treachery of Callicrates, the most worthy Persons in that Commonwealth were accused of favouring Perseus's side, against the Romans, and were cited to Rome, there to answer the Charge, upon Occasion of Xenon's Protestation, who under a just Assurance of his own Innocency, happen'd to declare, that if any Man had Thoughts of impeaching him amongst the rest, he was ready to take his Tryal, not only in the Common Assembly of his Countrymen, but amongst the Romans themselves ^d. On another Occasion, the Achaians seem to have made a Breach on the Laws of regular Government, when they demanded those Spartans to be deliver'd up into their Hands, who had been the chief Instruments in promoting the Siege of Las, a Laconian Town ^e.

^a Polyb. l. 4. c. 24. ^b L. 49. t. 15. l. 7. §. 1. D. De Captiv. & Possess. ^c L. 1. c. 3. §. 21. ^d See the Case at large in Pausanias, Achaias. It is likewise touch'd upon by Polybius, Excerpt. Legat. 105. ^e Liv. l. 38. c. 31.

^a This Law is more naturally brought in hereafter, in the Eighth Book, c. 9. §. 4.

Whereas the Cause ought first to have been heard in a common Council of both States, and upon Conviction, the Spartan Government should have been moved either to punish the Criminals, or to surrender them to their Accusers. As for the Place alledg'd from the Civil Law, we think this the clearest way of replying to it; that whereas the precedent Discourse had explain'd what the Nature of Leagues would bear, and what ought to be done, the Words here cited declare what was actually done in later Times; when the Romans, growing insolent on Success, used their Allies, who by free and voluntary Leagues had engaged their Friendship, with the same Treatment as those whom they had conquer'd by their Sword. Of which Injustice Cicero himself complains.

XIX. Since in these Systems, 'tis necessary there should be a Communication of certain Affairs express'd in the League, and since this cannot be done so conveniently by Letters, a determinate Time and Place ought to be settled for the holding Assemblies, and one or more Persons appointed, who shall have Power to call the States together, in Case of any extraordinary Business, which will not admit of Delay. Tho' it seems a much more compendious Method, to fix a standing Council, made up of Persons deputed by the several Confederates, who shall dispatch Business of daily Occurrence, or of less Importance, according to the Tenor of their Commission; who in Matters of greater Consequence shall make report to the States, and shall publish and execute such Decrees as are return'd to them on these Occasions; to whom the Ministers of the Confederacy in foreign Parts shall give an immediate account of their Proceedings, and who shall treat with the Ambassadors of other Nations, and conclude Business in the general Name of the Confederates: But who shall determine nothing that exceeds the Bounds of their Commission, unless all the Subjects have been first consulted on the Point. How far the Power of this Council of Delegates extends, is to be gather'd either from the Words of the League it self, or from the Warrant by which they act. This is certain, that the Power, whatever it be, is not their own, but deriv'd to them from those whom they represent; and altho' the Decrees which they publish pass solely under their own Name, yet the whole Force and Authority of them flows from the States themselves, by whose Consent such a Council hath been erected. So that the Deputies are no more than Ministers of the confederate States, and are altogether as unable to enjoin any thing by their own proper Authority, as an Ambassador is to command and govern his Master.

XX. Yet it may still appear doubtful, whether or no the whole Body of the Associates, or the Majority of them, have not a Power over particular States, or over those whom they exceed in Number, with regard to such Matters as were the first occasion of the Alliance, and which by the express Terms of the League were appointed to be managed in a common Assembly; so far as that the few dissenting States shall be bound, tho' against their Will, to do as the major part have determin'd. Here in our Opinion, the negative side of the Question ought to be preferr'd; if we speak of regular Systems, and where the particular States reserve to themselves the entire Possession of their former Liberty. In as much as the Liberty of a State, which is nothing else but the Power of finally resolving and determining, according to its own Judgment, all Matters in which its Safety is concern'd, cannot be understood, in case the State may, by virtue of the Authority held over it by some other, be compell'd to certain Performances against its Will. Nor can any reason to the contrary be drawn from hence, that in the League 'twas agreed not to exercise some particular parts of the Sovereignty there express'd, unless by common Consent. For 'tis one thing to say, I engage not to use my Right unless you are willing; and another to say, I gave you a Power of compelling me to use my Right, tho' against my Inclination. Now the first of these Forms is only implied in the League, not the latter. For the clearer Apprehension of which Point, it ought well to be observ'd, that when the Wills of many Persons are bound to conspire in one, this must arise either from a Compact between them to this Effect, or because one of them hath submitted his Will to the Will of the other. An Union or Concurrence of Wills, grounded on bare Compact, doth not in the least destroy the Liberty of which we have been now speaking. For they agree beforehand in settling those Affairs, which are referr'd to their joint Management; or if any new Business offers it self to their Debates, they desire to be influenced not by Authority, but Argument and Reason. But when I have submitted my Will to the Will of another, and by this means have given him a full Authority over me, I may then be obliged to things which are very inconsistent with my good liking. Nor doth The Right of the Majority - (which some may urge) oppose our Judgment in this Case. For first, The greater part draws the less only in Bodies already constituted, not in those which are still to be established. And then farther, the Prerogative of the Majority in a settled Council to oblige the rest is owing to human Compact and Institution, not to Nature; tho' natural Reason adviseth the Reception of this Method (as the most convenient in numerous Assemblies, and where Business of various kinds, and of every Day's Occurrence, is to be dispatch'd. Now in order to this, 'tis necessary that each Member do in such manner submit his Will to the Will of the whole, or of the major Part, as that he, tho' himself of a contrary Opinion, shall be bound absolutely to follow what they determine; which we cannot conceive, unless at the same time we suppose the latter to hold a Command or Authority over the former. Bea Offe. Add the Story of Decius Magius, who was laid in Irons by Hannibal, Livy, l. 23. c. 7, 10. and Scipio's Advice to the Romans, that they should not hear the Informers against the same great Enemy; Livy, l. 33. c. 47.

b See B. 7. c. 2. f. 15.

sides, in an Assembly of Confederates, there seems to be no Occasion for this Right of the Majority; inasmuch as they are seldom composed of any considerable Number of States, and are chiefly united by the Prospect of general Advantage, which 'tis presumed none in their Wits will obstinately oppose. Yet if any, through a malicious and unreasonablc Fervecitncfs, shall refuse to join in the wholesome Counsels of the rest, and by this means shall endeavour to betray the common Safety, or Interest; it will be then lawful to apply the same Methods of Redress, as they who live in a Condition of natural Liberty are allow'd to use against the Violaters of Faith and Contract. Unless it be judg'd the more eligible Course, utterly to purge the Society of so intractable a Partner. To all which we may add, that it must frequently occasion great Injustice, if in a confederate System the Plurality of Vote, were to bind the whole Body: As when the Allies are disproportion'd in their Wealth and Strength, and consequently some contribute more than others to the common Defence. For tho' we may be apt to imagine, that they who contribute according to the Proportion of their Ability, do really bring equal Shares; yet it may happen very frequently, that one who hath but slender Fortunes may be more willing to expose them to Danger, than another who hath larger Possessions. Thus let us suppose, that in a Confederacy, some one State contributes more to the common Security, than all taken together; here it would be a manifest a Breach of Equity, if this State should, by the Agreement of the rest, be compell'd to engage in any Action, the chief Burthen of which must lie upon its own Shoulders. On the other hand, if the Votes were to take place according to the Proportion of Force, or Treasure supplied to the common Cause; then the more powerful State would actually obtain a Sovereignty over all besides ^b. So that we may conclude from the whole, that where-ever Business is decided by Plurality of Voices, in such a manner as that the dissenting Parties are likewise bound to stand to the Resolution; there the regular Form of Systems or Confederacies is deserted, and the Members either break into an irregular Body, or close together in one undivided State.

XXI. The Dissolution of these Systems happens, when some of the Confederates voluntarily quit the League, and govern their own States apart; which they are induced to chiefly by this Motive, that they hope to receive more Advantage by a Separation, than they could expect under a Conjunction, and apprehend their Allies to be rather a Burthen to them, than an Assistance ^c. Intestine Wars are another Cause which must necessarily break these Unions, unless, upon the Establishment of the Peace, the League be also revived. If a confederate Power happen to be overcome in a foreign War, it is sometimes a Policy of the Conquerour to cut the Knot, and to make each Government independent of the rest: As the Romans did in the Case of the vanquish'd Achaïans ^d. We are farther to observe concerning these Dissolutions, which arise from external Force, that the Enemy, by possessing himself of one or two more of the united States, acquires no manner of Right over those that remain, nor can demand to be admitted into the Confederacy, by virtue of that League which engaged the conquer'd States to the others. But a new Agreement must necessarily pass, before any such new Member can be receiv'd into the Alliance, in the room of those whom he hath subdued. Thus we find King Philip, by a Decree of the Amphyctionians obtaining a Seat in their common Assembly, in the room of the Phocæans ^e. For altho' the League, by which the several States are thus combin'd, may seem to be a real lasting Engagement ^f, and tho' a State doth not cease to be the same, upon the Alteration of its Government; yet the Alliance must always be presumed to expire, when any one People are brought under a foreign Yoke, or made the Accession of another Kingdom. Because, the League being made between free States, consider'd in that Capacity, whenever this Condition fails, the League must fall with it. Nay, tho' we should go so far, as to suppose, that in the Terms of the League there was an express Clause, that the Change of Government in any State should not exempt it from the Engagement, yet the Change here spoken of must be presumed to be made in a lawful manner, and with the Content of the People. And consequently neither an unlawful Usurper, nor any foreign Enemy, shall have a place in the Congress of Allies.

On the other hand, these Systems do more closely unite, and are incorporated into the same civil State, by the following means: Either if all the Confederates, by a voluntary Submission, put themselves under the Government of some one Person or Council; or if some one People, which hath the Advantage in Strength and Power, shall reduce the rest to the Condition of dependent Provinces: Which usually happens, when weaker States allow any lasting Preference of Prerogative to those that are stronger, and engage themselves in unequal Alliances ^g. Lastly, if some particular Man invade the sovereign Command, through the Favour of the Soldiers, the Esteem of the Commonalty, or the Strength of a prevailing Faction.

XXII. To conclude; the last Dispute upon this Head commonly is, concerning the Excellency of particular Forms of Government, and which ought to be perfer'd to another: whether that under which the publick Welfare may with more Expedition, and more Certainty, be procured, or that where the Sovereign Authority is less expos'd to Corruption and Abuse. Now as to the Point of Comparison, thus much in the first place is evident, that no Frame of civil Constitution can be so exactly

^a Vid. Groc. Apolog. Cap. 7. sub fin.

^b Add. D'olor. Sic. l. 15. c. 28.

^c Add. Liv. l. 38. c. 31, 32.

^d Comp. Xenoph. l. 4. c. 6. Per. Grec. where he speaks of the Peace with Amalchidus.

^e Dial. Sic. l. 16. c. 61.

^f See hereafter in B. 8. c. 9. B. C.

^g Vid. Groc. l. 1. c. 3. l. 21. n. 10. circa fin.

model'd, and so well guarded by Laws, but that either through the Negligence or the Wickedness of those who bear Rule, the same Government which was instituted for the Security of the Subjects, may turn to their Prejudice and Mischief. The Reason of which is, because Government was first establish'd as a Defence against those Evils, which Men were capable of bringing on each other. But at the same time, they who were to be invest'd with this Government were likewise Men, and consequently not free from those Vices which are the Spurs to mutual Injury. Vitia erunt, donec homines a, Whilst there are Men in the World, there must be Faults: And therefore we cannot but sometimes suffer from their Hands the very Evils from which they ought to protect us. Hence the old Remark is so often true, Quicquid delirant reges, plerumque Achivi b.

The Kings grow frantick, and the People smart.

As therefore the Condition of human Affairs will bear an absolute Perfection; so 'tis controverted between many Persons, what Form of Government seems to have the fewest Imperfections: And the Generality of Judges pronounce in Favour of Monarchy c. It is not our Design to examine the particular Allegations of each Party. Only thus much we would observe, that Arguments of this kind are by no means so very strong and conclusive, as that the Inferences, drawn from them, must necessarily fall out in all places and at all times: And that the Actions of one or two Governours are no manner of Proof, that all others of the same Order or Title must needs follow their Example. And in our Judgment, the wise Speech of Marcellus in Tacitus d is what every good and useful Subject ought to meditate upon: He said, He could not but remember that happy Age, under which he himself came into the World, and that Form of Government which had been instituted by their Forefathers; yet 'twas his Principle, Ultiora mirari, presentia sequi; bonos Imperatores voto expetere, qualescunque tolerare: To admire what was past, but to follow what was present; to wish for good Emperours, but to bear with any e.

It may not seem improper on this Occasion, to shew briefly the Reason why, amongst the ancient Grecians, such Perions as under a democratical or aristocratical State, assumed a monarchical Power, met with so universal Hatred and Censure: And what Motives induc'd them to maintain their Authority by such evil Arts, as we find described in Aristotle and other Authors; on account of which the Name of Tyrant hath been branded with an indelible Mark of Detestation. Now the Grecian States seldom stretch'd their Dominion beyond the Compass of a single Town. And to such the most agreeable Government was, either a Democracy, or an Aristocracy moderately exercis'd; or lastly, what Aristotle terms a heroical Kingdom, a princely Sway, founded rather upon the Authority of Persuasion, and upon the general Character of extraordinary Virtue, than upon any proper Sovereignty, or Force of Command. Besides, the Grecian Nation, being of a haughty Spirit, and of a stirring and restless Temper, was most in love with such a Constitution, under which every Man might bear a part in the Government. Wherefore in a State of this kind, he who had taken on himself a regal Authority, a thing so odious to the People, against their Consent, was obliged, for his own Security, to awe the Town with a Castle or Citadel, and to place a strong Guard round his Person; and then this Guard was to consist of Foreigners, because it had not been safe to trust his own Subjects, and because he had not the means of bridling one Province by another, by interchanging the Native Forces. Farther, the Truth and Loyalty of the Guard was not otherwise to be purchas'd than by the largeness of their Pay; and hence for the raising of sufficient Funds, the Subjects were to be drain'd by constant Impositions. Again, it was no less necessary that the Natives should be disarm'd, and render'd as weak and little as possible; that the Heads of the Poppies should be cut off; that all Meetings of the wealthier Subjects should be suppress'd; and that Informers and Court Spies should be maintain'd and encouraged. So that 'twas not Injustice only, but downright Madnes, in these Tyrants, to affect such a Government as was to be preserv'd by evil Arts, which could not be lasting, and under which 'twas impossible for them to gain the Love of their Subjects. And it is equally absurd to institute a Monarchy in a State, confin'd to a single Town; and a Democracy in larger Territories, and vastly extended Dominions. But since Princes who stand possess'd of wide and spacious Realms, have no need to make use of these Arts for their

a Tacit. Hist. l. 2. c. 74.

b Herc. l. 1. Ep. 2. v. 14. c Vide Isocrat. in Nicoel. Herodot. (Thaliss) where the Persian Nobles debate about establishing a Form of Government, after the Magi had been kill'd. Euripid. Supplicibus, vers. 475, &c. Bodin. de Rep. l. 6. c. 4. Aristaus. Reliq. Polit. l. 2. c. 7. l. 2. and many others. On the other hand, the Dutch Writer of the Political Balance seems to have omitted nothing that Malice or Envy could suggest against Monarchy. A great part of whose Arguments may be turn'd upon him by what Mr. Hobbes observes, De civi. c. 10. & Leviath. c. 19. d Hist. l. 4. c. 8.

Mr BARBEYRAC'S NOTE on §. XXII.

See Maximus of Tyre, Dissert. VI. p. 6. Elit. Diss. where he maintains, that as Aristocracy is better than Democracy, so Monarchy is preferable to both. See likewise Montaigne, Liv. III. Chap. IX. p. 711. Ed. Par. in Polio, where there is in the Margin, Policee, la meill ure a chaque Nation? And les Caracteres of Mr. la Bruyere, Chap. du Souverain, ou de la Republique at the Beginning. Montaigne however, says in another place, that Democracy is most natural and most equitable. Liv. I. Chap. III. p. 1. But after, all no body has better handled this Question relating to the Excellency of particular Forms of Government than Mr. S. Bay in his Dissourse on Government. 'Tis worth while to see what he says from the sixteenth Section of the second Chapter, quite to the End of it; or, if any one has a mind to have a general Idea of it at one view, he need only read the Nouveaux de la Republique des Lettres, Avril 1700, p. 444. &c. See also the Parthians, Tom. II. p. 161. &c. and the Essay upon Popular Discontents, which is the first Piece of Sir William Temple's Posthumous Works, Publish'd in 1704.

Support, inasmuch as they may be able to poize and balance one Province with another; those Persons are guilty of no less Baseness and Wickedness, who suggest any such Practices of Tyranny to the Imitation of great and potent Monarchs, than those who make it their Endeavour to turn the Odiu of the old Grecian Tyrants upon Monarchy in general. And hence likewise it is evident, that Princes live much more securely in ample Dominions; because there the diobedient and rebellious cannot so easily communicate their Designs, unite their Strength, or touch and taint the Loyalty of others. Whereas when a whole State is confin'd within the same Walls; the way lies ready for a handful of Mutineers to spread the infectious Madness, and to corrupt the whole Body of the Subjects, before the Government can either prevent, or apprehend the surprizing Danger ^a.

^a Compare the Reflections which Mr. Gardner makes in his Origines juris Civilis, &c. Publish'd at Lipsik in 1703. with these of our Author in this Section.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Affections, or Properties belonging to Sovereignty.

- | | |
|--|---|
| I. How the ruling Power in a State comes to be styl'd Supreme. II. He that is invested with this Power is unaccountable. III. And above human Laws. IV. Of the Distinction between real and personal Majesty. V. That a King may be superior to a whole People, demonstrated. VI. The Arguments to the contrary refuted. VII. Absolute Government, what. VIII. Not occurring alike in all Forms of civil Establishments. | IX. Limited Governments, how occasion'd: X. Founded on what Covenants. XI. In what respect the different parts of the Government may be limited. XII. Of the Power of Estates, and Councils. XIII. Hobbes answer'd. XIV. The various ways of holding the sovereign Power. XV. A temporary Sovereignty, whether possible. XVI. Of patrimonial Kingdoms. XVII. Of Kings, assumed by the free Act and Grant of the People. |
|--|---|

WHEN we would enquire into the Affections and Properties of the supreme Power, the first Point, which falls under Examination, is how it comes to obtain that Name and Title. And the chief reason seems to be this; because 'tis impossible, that one Man should bear a greater Sway over another, than that the latter shall be oblig'd to imploy his Strength and his Fortunes for the Advancement of the publick Good, as the ruling Party directs, and shall farther be obnoxious to capital Punishment upon Default. To which may be added this Consideration, that as, setting aside the Divine Sovereignty, particular Men cannot enjoy a higher Degree of Liberty, than the Power of guiding and applying by their own Judgment their Actions, Persons, and Goods; so the Freedom of a Community or Body of Men consists in their being able, by their own joint Discretion, independent of the Will of any Superior, to resolve and decree such Matters, as appear conducive to the general Benefit and Safety. And hence likewise it follows, by necessary Consequence, that such a Power being supreme, or not acknowledging any Superior upon Earth, the Acts, which proceed from it, cannot be disannull'd at the Pleasure of any other Mortal ^a. But that a Person or a State should be able to alter the Decrees and Resolutions of their own Will, is so far from abridging, that it really inhanceth their Liberty.

II. For the same Reason must the Sovereign be acknowledg'd unaccountable: That is, not obnoxious to human Judgment, or human Punishment ¹. For both these suppose a Superior; but a Superior to the Supreme, in the same Order of Men, and the same Notion of Govern-

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES ON §. I. and II.

¹ Proprio, & alio non dependente iudicio; these are the Author's own Words; but if this be true, then Princes whose Power is limited, are not Sovereigns: Since they cannot do any thing good in Law, in some certain Cases without consulting an Assembly of the People, or of those who represent them: But our Author in the tenth Section of this Chapter plainly asserts the contrary. He ought therefore to have express'd himself here in such a manner as to have compriz'd more clearly what is agreeable both to an absolute Sovereignty, and to a limited one. See Sir George Mackenzie's Jus Regium, Archbp. Usher of the Obedience of Subjects to their Princes, and the Homily of the Church of England against Rebellion.

^a Vid. Grat. l. 1. c. 3. §. 7. n. 1.

¹ Nam impune quaelibet facere il est Regem esse. C. Memmius apud Salust. Bell. Jugurth. Cap. 36. 'To do with Impunity whatever one will, is to be a King. Pliny the Younger says, that what is most agreeable in Sovereignty, is the not being accountable for any Thing whatsoever: Exoptumque principi [Nero] illud in principatu beatissimum, quod nihil cogitur Panegy. Cap. 6. Num. 1. Our Author cites these Passages. See Gratius Lib. I. Cap. VI. Num. 6. Sect. 6. However all that our Author here says, is to be understood with this Restriction, as long as he does not forfeit his Right. See hereafter, Chap. VIII.

ment is a Contradiction. But it will be proper here to observe, that I may give an Account two ways, either to a Superior, who upon his Dislike may reverse all my Acts, and farther inflict a Punishment upon me : Or else to an Equal, whose bare Approbation of my Proceedings I am willing to obtain ; only to keep up my fair Character with him, and to justify my Integrity and Honour. In the former manner, supreme Rulers are not accountable to any earthly Power. But in the latter way, Princes who are tender of their Reputation, commonly endeavour to lay open their Actions and Counsels to the View of the whole World : Which being done only to secure the Credit of their Reign, cannot imply the least shadow of Subjection. In the same manner, I may expend my Money and Fortunes at my own Pleasure, and as I see Occasion ; and yet I am willing to keep Books of my Accounts, to satisfy my Friends, that I am no ill Husband.

And then as for the other Point, the being obnoxious to Punishment, this cannot affect him, who owns no Court that can give him his Tryal, no Judge that can pronounce or execute Sentence upon him. For the Courts of Justice in a Commonwealth reach no farther than the Subjects, and are beholden to the Sovereign for all their Authority and Power. But if, as it frequently happens, Princes condescend to answer an Action in their own Courts in Matters of Debt and the like Cases ; this is not done, as if they acknowledged any superior Force, that could oblige and compel them, but only expresseth their Desire of seeing the Plaintiff's Pretensions clearly made out ; which, if they once appear just, they are ready to satisfy and discharge in a voluntary manner. Yet we speak here of human Punishment only, inflicted by a superior earthly Judge. For the Divine Justice finds many ways of shewing it self on those high and potent Sinners, who violate the Laws of Nature, in Contempt of all earthly Tribunals. Reges in ipsos imperium est Jovis ^a. Princes are but the Subjects of Heaven. As to what History ^b tells us of the Egyptians, that when their Kings had been ill Governours, they denied them the usual Honours of Burial ; this piece of Disrespect can scarce fall under the proper Notion of Punishment.

III. Farther, when a civil Power is constituted Supreme, it must, on this very Score, be supposed exempt from human Laws, or, to speak more properly, above them. As for the Laws of GOD and Nature, to bring them into the Question, would be no less absurd than impious ^c. Now human Laws are nothing else, but the Decrees of the supreme Power, concerning Matters to be observed by the Subjects, for the publick Good of the State ^d. That no such Edicts can directly oblige the Sovereign is manifest ; because his very Name and Title supposeth that no Bond or Engagement can be laid on him by any other mortal Hand : And for a Person to oblige himself under the Notion of a Lawgiver, or of a Superior ; is an impossibility ^d. Yet in an indirect manner and by way of Reflection, the Force of his own Ordinance frequently reacheth the Legislator, on account of natural Equity, and publick Decorum ; to excite and encourage Obedience in the Subject, by acting that himself which he prescribes to others, as expedient for the common Interest ; and lest by forbidding such Practices, as he is himself observ'd passionately to pursue, he should seem to envy others the Sweetness of Vice, and

^a Hor. Ode 1. v. 5, 6. L. 3.

^b Vide Diodor. Sic. l. 1. c. 72.

^c The Generality of Mankind imagine, that the principal Advantage of Sovereignty consists in not acknowledging any superior Power--- who then shall govern the Prince ? That Law which Pindar calls the living and supreme Directress of Men and Gods : not written in Books, or engraven in Tables ; but imprinted in a lively sense upon the Reason, ever residing and keeping a constant watch, nor suffering the Mind to be one moment without a Guide and Ruler. Plutarch ad principem indoctum, p. 78. c. See also upon the same Subject Mr. Buddens's Dissertation, intituled, Principum Legibus Humanis, sed non Divinis solutum. Printed at Hall in 1695.

Omne sub regno graviore regnum.

Monarchs must answer to a higher Throne.

^d Vide Hobbes de Cive, c. 6. s. 14.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. 111.

¹ Our Author is here guilty of the very same Error which I have taken notice of in the first Note upon this Section. For neither does this agree with Sovereigns whose Power is limited ; because, tho' they ratify and confirm the Acts which the Assembly of the People, or their Representatives, have pass'd relating to publick Affairs, the whole Management of which they are not willing to leave entirely to them ; and tho' these Acts derive their Power and their Authority immediately from them, yet however they cannot revoke 'em, or make any Alterations in them without the Consent of the People. It must still be observ'd, that what our Author here says, only regards the Actions of the Sovereign, and not the Effects which the Laws that he has abrogated may have already produced with respect to the Subjects. See Book I. Chap. VI. Sect. 6.

² V. Grot. L. 2. c. 4. s. 12. n. 10. Gronovius in his Notes on this place of Grotius cavils like a true Grammarian at the same time that he reproaches that great Man with a wretched piece of Sophistry (Sophistica cavillatio.) When the People, says he, make a Law, does not the Law it self oblige them to observe it ? Do they not make the Law above themselves ? Whence then proceedeth that Remark of Titus Livy (Lib. II. Cap. 1.) that from the Time of the Expulsion of the Kings out of Rome, the Empire of Laws, more powerful than that of Men, immediately began ? If each particular Man can bind himself by a Promise, or by an Oath, why should not a whole People be bound by the Laws of their own making ? The Law is, according to the Civilians, a general Convention of the Citizens (Communis Reipublice Sponsio, Digest. Lib. I. Tit. III. Leg. 1, 2.) and a sort of Oath, by which they engage themselves to certain Things : And this is the Reason why Justin calls the Laws of an antient Society of Pythagoreans, Sodalitii Sacramenta (Lib. XX. Cap. IV. Num. 14.) But I. Grotius had a mind, and certainly he ought to speak with a Philosophical Exactness, and not as Gronovius does, to dispute about a figurative Expression very common both in Antient and Modern Authors, as well as in common Discourse. Properly speaking, one cannot say that the Law is either above the Legislator who made it, or even those to whom it is prescrib'd ; with less reason than that the Law it self imposes on them any Obligation. The Obligation proceeds from the Authority of a Superior ; and every Superior is a Person, and not a Thing. If we are bound to obey the Laws as Law, it is not directly because it seems to be or is even really just, or advantageous to the Publick (otherwise we might dispense with observing those which only related to indifferent Things) but because it is prescrib'd by a Superior, who has a Right to demand our Obedience in every thing that is not contrary to the Laws of God or of Nature. Therefore when a free People establish Laws of their own accord to govern themselves by, every engross engross it all for his own Possession and Prerogative. The Life of a Prince, says Pliny ^a, is a perpetual Censorship; by this we are turn'd and directed in all our Proceedings; and to secure our Obedience, we have ever more need of his Pattern, than of his Prescriptions. For Fear is a most unfaithful Guide to Virtue. Men are much better influenced into Goodness by the Power of Examples which at first sight, discover this Advantage in themselves, above all other Methods of Instruction, that they shew the Possibility of obtaining what they advise us to pursue. There is a Remark, not unworthy the Majesty of Kings, which Athenæus ^b hath made from the Reports of more antient Histories, that of the two great Monarchs in India and in Persia; the former was absolutely forbid to exceed the moderate Bounds of Drinking; and the latter allow'd his Liberty in this Respect, but one Day in a Year, at a solemn Sacrifice and Festival. Claudian's Admonition to the young Emperor was wise and proper;

*In commune jubes si quid, censeturque tenendum,
Primus jussa sibi: tunc observantior æqui
Fit Populus, nec ferre negat, cum viderit ipsum
Authorem parere sibi: componitur orbis
Regis ad exemplum; nec sic inflectere sensus
Humanos edicta valent, ut vita regentis* ^c.

Would you your publick Laws should sacred stand?
Lead first the way, and act what you command.
The Crowd grow mild and tractable to see
The Author govern'd by his own Decree.
The World turns round, as its great Master draws;
And Princes Lives bind stronger than their Laws ^d:

IV. For the better asserting and vindicating the just Pre-eminence of the supreme Power, especially in monarchical Governments, it will be proper to take under our Censure that vulgar Distinction of Sovereignty into real and personal; which seems, in our Judgment, to be not only very absurd, but of very pernicious Consequence, Member indeed promises to observe 'em as long as they are in being, because with respect to him they are so many Ordinances of a Superior, or of the whole Body of the Community, to whose Will he has submitted himself. But the whole People are not bound by any Compact, because they cannot be superior to themselves. I own that if these Laws are consistent with the Good of the Society, they ought not lightly to be abolish'd, as long as things remain in the same situation. But it is not because they are Laws that have been imposed and establish'd as superior to themselves; 'tis only by virtue of the Law of Nature which the Creator and sovereign Legislator imposes one very particular Society, as well as on every individual Person, to take care of their own Preservation. II. The Consequence that Gronovius draws from the Obligations, into which we enter by Promises or Compacts, and by an Oath, is evidently false. When I make a Promise to any one, he whom I promise acquires from that Moment a Right with respect to me; and I am actually bound by my Word till I have accomplish'd it, or he acquits me of it. But who does acquire, by the Laws that a People establish to govern themselves, a Right by virtue of which he can demand of them not to abolish 'em? The same is to be said of an Oath: For, in every valid Oath the Divinity which we call to witness, acquires, if I may say so, a Right to demand the Performance of what we have sworn; whether the Oath be reduced to a sort of Vow, or whether 'tis only instead of an Accessory, as in the Engagements which we enter into with other People. See what I have said in one of my new Notes, Book IV. Chap. II. Sect. 17. Note 2. III. The Laws properly speaking can never be look'd upon as Conventions. See what our Author has said Book I. Chap. VI. Sect. 2. IV. In short, Grotius, as well as our Author, is here only speaking of the Civil Laws purely positive, and not of the Laws of Nature: For with respect to the last, nothing is more true than what Pliny the Younger says, Non est princeps super Leges, sed Leges super Principem, Panegy. Trajan Cap. LXV. Num. 1.

^a In Panegy. c. 45. n. 6.

^b L. 10, ex Otet.

^c De IV. Consul. Honorii, v. 296, &c.

^d Liv. l. 26. c. 36. Would You lay an Injunction on an Inferior? The most likely means to engage his Obedience, will be to apply Your self, and those about You, to the same Practice. Plin. l. IV. Epist. 22. towards the End. As in a Body, so in a Government, the most dangerous Disease is that which flows from the Heart. Vide Justin. l. III. c. 2. n. 8. The Old Persian Proverbs to this purpose carry much good Sense in a very odd Dress: If a King pluck but an Apple in a Subject's Garden, his Servants will root up the Tree. If a King allows his Soldiers the stealing of half a Dozen Eggs; their next Exploit will be to visit the Camp with Hens. Rosar. Pertic. c. 1.

^e Those are call'd Rights purely Personal, which are only lodg'd in the Person who is invested with 'em; and those Real Rights, which indeed suit with a certain Person (for that is common to all sort of Rights) but which are also in some manner fix'd to a certain Thing, which they always follow, so that whosoever acquires the Thing, has from that moment the Right, by that very Circumstance, that he lawfully possesses it. See Grotius, Lib. I. Cap. 1. Sect. 4.

^f L. 1. c. 3. f. 7.

if applied to this Sense, that there shall be suppos'd at the same time, in the same Monarchy, a real and personal Sovereignty; the latter to be lodg'd in the King, the former in the People, as oppos'd to the King; and that in this, as in most other Cases, the real Authority and Right shall have the Ascendant of the personal. Nothing can be more evident, than that such a Notion contradicts it self, turning every Kingdom into a Monster with two Heads, and exposing it to utter Convulsion and Ruine. The Necessity of this Distinction doth by no means appear from the Reason commonly alledg'd, that the King or the royal Family being extinct, the People so far return to their first Right and Freedom, as that they may at their Pleasure either choose a new King, or set up another Form of Government. It may as well be affirm'd, that we ought to suppose a real Power in a Servant, contradicting to the personal Power of his Master, merely because if the Master dies without Heirs, the Servant is at his own Disposal. Nor can any better Argument be drawn from the Position of Grotius ^f and others, that there is a twofold Subject in which the supreme Power resides, one common, the other proper; the former the whole State or Kingdom, the latter a single Person, or a Council, whether consisting of many, or of few. For the Sense of that Observation can be only this, if we ask in a general and confused manner, Where the supreme Power is lodg'd? The Answer will be, In the whole Commonwealth: But if we propose the same Question distinctly, and enquire what Person bears the Sovereignty in the State? It will be answer'd, The King, or the Senate, or the People. But who will hence infer, two distinct sovereign Powers, one real in the People, another personal in the Prince? This would be no less ridiculous, than to conceive two distinct Sights in a Man; one residing a common Subject, the Person; the other in a proper Subject, the Eye.

V. Many have taken the Liberty to assert, that the Power of the Prince neither can, nor ought to be superior to that of all the People. Aristotle seems very much to countenance this Opinion, in the sixteenth Chapter of his third Book of Politicks¹. And in the fifteenth Chapter of the same Book, he discourseth to this purpose², A King ought indeed to be invested with Strength and Power; but in such a Degree, as that he shall be greater indeed than single Persons: And than many in Conjunction; yet still inferior to the whole Body of the People. Grotius hath undertaken the Controversy with these Men; and the first Argument he urgeth against them is, that as each particular Man may give up himself in personal Servitude to another; so a whole People or Nation may transfer on a single Governour all their Right and Power over themselves, without Limitation or Restriction³. Tho' indeed, in other respects, it seems by no means fair to compare the Condition of Subjects, under an absolute Monarch, with that of Slaves. For as Claudian well observes.

*Fallitur egregio quisquis sub Principe credit
Servitium: Nunquam libertas gratior extat, Quam sub Rege pio. — — —*

They grossly err, that think a slavish Chain Binds 'em beneath a virtuous Monarch's Reign.
When Justice, Piety, and Goodness sway
The regal Power, 'tis Freedom to obey^d.

Grotius proceeds to reckon up several Causes and Occasions which may induce a People to renounce all their Right in this manner, and yield it up into the Hands of an absolute Lord. Many of these we find put together by Tully: Men, says he, subject them selves to the Power and Command of another, for several Reasons. They are led by Kindness and good Will, by extraordinary Benefits, by superior Worth and Excellency, by the Hopes of Advantage, and by the Fears of Compulsion: large Promises of Bounty and Favour; and lastly, as we have seen it often happen in our Commonwealth, by downright Wages and Hire. But those Cases which Grotius chooseth to insist upon are, if a People should chance to lie under manifest Danger of Ruine from an Enemy, and have no other means of being deliver'd, than to put themselves, without any reserve, under the Command of their Protector^e: Or, if being in Distress with violent Want, they cannot otherwise procure Sustenance and Support^g: If a Father of a Family, having large Territories, should refuse to admit any Person into his Lands, but upon Covenants of absolute Subjection: Or if a Master, who possesseth a vast Number of Slaves, should give them their Freedom on the same Condition. Besides, it's possible, that such a Form of Government may suit with the Genius of some particular People. Nor ought the Desire of living under an absolute Monarchy to be always judg'd a Token of a low and abject Spirit, tho' it hath usually lain under this Censure in the Opinions of Persons born in Democracies; who, on that Score, will never pardon the Cappadocians for refusing Liberty, when offer'd them by their Roman Conquerours^h. But on the contrary, to any People, amongst whom there are a Number

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. V.

¹ In the Beginning: Where he cites the Reasons of those who are of Opinion, that Absolute Monarchy is contrary to Reason. For that Philosopher calls an Unlimited and Absolute Monarchy, a Government where the King manages as he thinks proper all the publick Affairs with the same Authority, as a Father commands in his Family, and a Commonwealth governs it self. In the seventeenth Chapter Aristotle decides this Question according to his Ideas; and says, that as the Temper and Genius of every People require one certain Form of Government more than another, if in a Nation proper for Monarchy, there be any Person or Family that surpasses all the rest of the Subjects in Virtue that then it is equally just and advantageous to the State, that that Person, or that Family, should reign with an absolute Power. Therefore that Philosopher does not assert that no King can ever be above the People, tho' our Author seems here to charge him with it. The Qualifications that Aristotle requires in an Absolute Monarch are very rare; and that gives room to Mr. Sibney in his Discourse upon Government (Chap. III. Sect. XXII.) to maintain, that that Philosopher supposes a Man that is not to be found in the World, to insinuate by that, that we ought not to trust any one whatsoever with absolute Power. But perhaps Aristotle, never conceiv'd any Idea of a perfect Virtue, and that only supposing Men to be as they generally are, he design'd only to exclude those enormous Vices which denominate a Tyrant. Besides, our Author here cites another Passage out of Aristotle, which does not at all relate to the Superiority of the People above the King, but only to the Strength and Power with which the King is invested to put his Laws in Execution, and to restrain his rebellious Subjects. He ought, indeed to be greater than every Subject in particular, or than many in Conjunction, but still inferior to the whole Body of the People.

² Ibid. l. 1. Gronovius here also finds fault with that great Man; but his Censure is no better grounded than that mention'd in our fourth Note, Sect. 3. He takes abundance of pains to prove that when a King degenerates into a Tyrant, and governs in a manner manifestly tending to the ruin of the State; or if he violates the fundamental Laws, to which he has sworn to conform himself, the People may resist him, and free themselves from that unjust Subjection. But this is what Grotius himself owns in express Terms, Cap. IV. Sect. 7. Num. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5. And Sect. 11, 13, 14. All that he pretends to establish in the place here mention'd is, that the sovereignty does not belong to the People always, and without Exception, so that they may resist and punish their Kings as often as they abuse their Power. So that Gronovius might have sav'd himself the Trouble of refusing what his Author does not maintain.

^a Towards the End.

^b Vid. Exod. xxi. c. Levitic. xxv. 39. Add. Selden, *De J. N. & G. sec. Heb. l. c. 7. V. L. 40. t. 12. l. 37. D. De liberali causa, & C. L. 7. t. 16. l. 10. D. d. t. l. 7. & l. 33. & D. Quib. ad Libert. proclam. non licet. L. 45. t. 13. l. 4. & L. 28. t. 3. l. 6. f. 5. D. De injust. Testam. &c. Novel. Leonis. LIX. Caesar reports of the ancient Gauls, that amongst them, most of the inferior Populacy, when oppress'd, either by Debts or Taxes, or the Injuries of too powerful Neighbours, fix'd themselves as Vassals on some of the Nobility, who enjoy'd all those Rights over them, which Masters ordinarily bear over their Slaves. *D. B. G. l. VI. c. 13. n. 2. c. De laudibus Strabon. L. 3. v. 113, &c.

^d There is an excellent Saying to the same purpose in Philostrat. De Vit. Apollon. l. 5. c. 12. p. 245. B. Ed. Morel. As some one Man in a Commonwealth, highly surpassing others in Wisdom and Virtue, seems by his good Management to turn the Popular Government into the Command of a single Person; so a single Person reigning Sovereign in a State, if he direct all his Counsels to the Publick Good, seems to express, in his Authority, the Freedom of a Popular Government. Add. Hobbes De Civ. c. 10. f. 8.

^e Offic. II. c. 6.

^f Vide Liv. l. 7. c. 31.

^g L. de Genes. xvii. 19.

^h Vide Strabo, l. 12. p. 273. & Justin. l. 38. c. 2. 'Tis a Saying of Euripides, in (Helen. v. 283) and 'tis no more

Τὰ Βασιλέων δόξα πάντα πλὴν ἑνός.

In Barbarous Kingdoms all are Slaves but One.

of proud, insolent, aspiring Men, impatient of Equality, a popular Liberty must be the most pernicious thing in the World; and yet the same Men very contentedly submit to a monarchical Government. For they had rather serve One, and lord it over all others in the State, than live on the common Level; and, as Aufonius says ^a, For the Sake of commanding, they are willing to obey. The Eastern Nations have been of old, and are still so accusom'd to Monarchy, that we are told the Chinese could not form any Notion of the States of Holland, having heard of no Government, but that by Kings ^b. And a Venezian Traveller ^c reports, that the King of Pegu, when he was inform'd, that the sovereign Power at Venice was lodg'd in the Senate, burst out into a Fit of Laughter, taking it for a meer Jest in Politicks. On the other side such Men are fit only to live in a popular State, as have moderate Spirits and easy Passions, and know how to rest satisfied with the same humble Condition as their Neighbours. Lastly, it often falls out, that free States are by intestine Divisions brought into such Circumstances, as that they cannot be safe otherwise than under the absolute Command of a single Person; and, as Lucan observes,

Cum Domino Pax ista venit &c. —

They gain a Master when they gain a Peace.

VI. It may, perhaps, seem more to the purpose, to examine the Reasons of those Men, who are so fond of exalting, above Kings, that real Sovereignty of the People, which they have fram'd in their own Fancy. They tell us, then, that all Kings are constituted by the People, and that 'tis natural the Parties, who confer the Dignity, should be superior to the Parties who receive it. Now, as to this Point it must be observ'd, that altho', in the constituting of all Kings, the People interpose their Consent, yet there is a great Difference in the manner how such Consent is obtain'd and applied. Some Nations take a King upon their own free and voluntary Motion: Others under the Distress of War, or some other great Necessity, receive the same kind of Government; which they would have been very far from desiring, had they not been driven to it by these Misfortunes. It is agreeable to the common Usage of Speech, to say, that those Princes only are constituted by the People, whom the People appoint by their own free Act. On the other hand, those who extort the Peoples Consent by Arms, or the like means, are not said to have been made by the People's Appointment, but to have subjected the People to their Command. But farther, then only the Parties who constitute another are properly superior to him, when it is always in their Power to determine how long he shall possess the Dignity with which they have once invest'd him. Whereas, in many Cases, it is at first a Matter of free Pleasure and Choice to appoint the Person, and yet the Appointment, being once made, becomes necessary and irreverfible. Others answer the same Argument with this Distinction; a Man may constitute another, either over a third Person, or over himself. In the former Case, the constituting Party is superior to him whom he thus constitutes. For 'tis suppos'd before-hand, that the third Man, both was, and still is, under the Power of him, who thus sets a new Ruler over him. Whence it follows, that this new Ruler must depend on the Will and Pleasure of the old. For since no one can serve two Masters, unless in Subordination; I cannot appoint another Lord over my proper Subject, without making him accountable to my self: And consequently, he is no more than a subordinate Governour. Thus a free State, when it gives a General the full Command of its Soldiers, was and still is superior to him and them. But he, who constitutes another with Authority over himself, can no more be suppos'd to continue superior to him, than he can, at the same time, and in respect of the same Person, command and obey.

But 'tis farther urged on the other side ^f; that since all Government is instituted for the sake of those who obey, not of those who rule; or, since the King is made for the People, not the People for the King; on that score, the People must be superior to the Prince: In as much as that, for which another thing is ordain'd, seems more noble and excellent, than what is thus fram'd on its account. Here the Assertion, if held in general, is false; for all Government or Command is not instituted for the sake of those who obey; as is clear in the Authority of Masters over their Servants: Altho' the Master cannot indeed well enjoy the Fruits of his Sovereignty, unless he take some Care of those, who are thus placed in Subjection under him. Besides, the Question is not, whether the Person of the Prince be of more value than the whole People; as it is in case either he or they were necessarily to perish: But, whether, since civil Government is set up for the Benefit of the Community, the means of procuring this End should be determin'd by the Judgment of those, who have submitted their Wills to the Will of the Prince, or by him, to whose Prudence and Conscience the Administration of Affairs hath been given in Charge.

Some, because we read of the Peoples being punish'd for their Princes Sins, thence infer, ^g that the People had a Power to restrain them from sinning, which cannot be suppos'd, without a right superior to the regal Authority ^h. For I am not chargeable with the Guilt of another Man's Action ⁱ, when I contributed nothing to it. But 'tis impossible to conceive how the People can partake in the Sin of their Prince, at which

^a ——— Et dominum Ut possint, servare volunt. — Idyll. 15 v. 37, 38.

^c Caspar Baibi, in Elmorum.

^d L. b. 1. Pharsal. v. 670.

^b Neuhof. in L. g. t.

^e Our Author hints at, especially, the famous Book, intitul'd, Vindicie contra Tyrannos. See Question III. of that Book, p. 67, &c. Ed. Francos.

^f V. Grot. L. 1. c. 3. § 8 n. 13.

^g P. Grot. ubi supra, §. 14.

^h See the Vindicie contra

Tyrannos Junii Boniti, p. 29, &c.

ⁱ V. Grot. ubi supra, c. 16.

they are heartily displeas'd, unless by neglecting to use some proper Method of Correction. In answer to what is thus urged, we take it for a certain Truth, that the Sins of the Princes do not directly, and on their own account, derive any Guilt on the Subject, unless the Subjects themselves have contributed some positive Assistance to them ^a. But they cannot contract a Guilt from the Omission of any Restraint or Punishment; because being inferior to the Prince, they had neither Power nor Obligation to apply such means of reclaiming him. For as our Ability, so our Duty of hindring another Man's Sins, ariseth from our Power over him, or from such an Authority, as implies our Right of directing and controlling his Proceedings. Therefore, what the Prince acts, before he receives that Dignity, certainly cannot affect the rest of the People; since Equals have no Command one over the other. No more can the Subjects be charged with what he commits after his accession to the Crown: Since 'tis ridiculous to say, that those who, during his private Station, had no Command over him to restrain him from offending, whilst he was in all Points their Equal, should then at last obtain such a Command, when they gave up themselves to his Direction and Sway. Nor doth that Act or Covenant, by which Subjects invest a Prince with absolute Power, by any means make them partakers of his Sins. For by such a Covenant the People do not indulge an Impunity to the King, but only leave him in Possession of that which he before enjoy'd by virtue of his natural Liberty: Since he could not exercise the supreme Authority, were he not exempt from human Punishment.

What some urge, that, as he who hath given himself up for a Slave, still keeps a Right of recovering himself from that State; so a People, who have submitted to the Yoak of Monarchy, retain an equal Right of reassuming their Freedom: This no Man in his Wits will allow for Truth, unless it be added, as a necessary Condition, that such a return to Liberty be made with the Consent of the Master, or the Prince, by their voluntary receding from that just Right and Authority, which they had before obtain'd over the Servant, or over the Subject ^c. Besides, 'tis a groundless Assertion, to say, that a People, to whose Temper and Disposition an absolute Monarchy was once agreeable, when they have, in Course of Time, worn off their servile Genius, may re-establish themselves in a free Commonwealth. For if such a Case should happen, it will be incumbent on the Prince, so far as Prudence permits, to humour this Change of Inclination in the Subject, by softening the Rigour, and varying the Measures of his Reign. No less ridiculous is it to infer, that because a Master or Proprietor, who abuseth his own Possessions, may be punish'd, or deprived of his Goods, therefore a Prince too, who makes ill use of his Power, may be corrected and reduced to Reason. For that which makes such a Proceeding lawful in the former Case, is the Prince's superior Right over the Goods of the Subjects, which 'tis the Interest of the whole Community to preserve from being thrown away to no purpose. But who will pretend, that the People have a kind of Prerogative, or a more eminent Right over the Rights of their King; or, that they are Masters to their own Master?

As for the Sayings of some Princes, produced in favour of the opposite Opinion, it cannot be denied, but that many such fine Speeches have been used out of a principle of Ostentation. But they will all fall under this general Answer, that a Prince ought indeed to direct every thing to the Good and Safety of his People: But the People are not thereupon invest'd with a Power of punishing him, as often as they shall judge that he applies wrong Means towards the obtaining of that End. Alike senseless and trifling it is to argue, that, in as much as the People have not a Right of destroying themselves, or of practising any grievous Cruelty on their own Bouy, therefore they can transfer no such Right on the King. For who ever maintain'd, that Princes had a Right of destroying their People? We shall hereafter make it appear, that absolute Government is by no means so formid'le a thing, as these Men are willing to fancy: And how far a People may proceed, in case the Prince manifestly seeks their Ruin, will be likewise consider'd in its proper place ^d. When we are told of the antient Consuls, and other Magistrates, said to be plac'd over the People, and yet frequently reform'd by the Peoples Censure and Punishment; these Allegations are vain and idle, the Instances not coming up to the Question ^e.

Lastly, as to what is objected from Scripture History, that the Jews threw off the Yoak of the strange Nations, when they seem'd to have been sufficiently chastis'd for their Rebellion against GOD; we thus reply, that either they still continued in a state of War with those Nations, never engaging their Faith, or submitting as true Subjects; and so they had a Right of treating their Oppressors as Enemies: Or else, they acted in these extraordinary proceedings by express Command from Heaven; which if it seem to intrench on the common Measures of Right, is no Precedent for the Imitation of others ^e.

^a Lucipid. de Jure. l. 1. c. 879, 881.

----- The State which suffers in its Fame
For a bad Prince, it self is innocent.

^b The Argument urged from Gen. xxiv. is sufficiently answer'd by Grotius, in the place above quoted. See also marked Passage in Martinius Hieronimus de Jure (l. 2. c. 1.) applicable to the same Chapter, v. 17.

^c Plut. Nearchon Cyrop. l. 3. princip. ^d Gen. p. 6. ^e Aut. sanction De Obligat. Consulat. Prælat. IX. § 16, &c. & Prælat. II. §. 13, 16, 22, 23.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTE on §. VII.

¹ For these Consuls and Magistrates were not Sovereigns, but the meer Ministers of the People.

VII. To proceed, nothing is more apparent, than that in some States the ruling Power (especially, if monarchical) is free in its Proceedings; in others, it is restrain'd to a particular manner of acting: Which Difference gave Occasion to the Distinction of Sovereignty into absolute and limited. And here we think our selves oblig'd, in the first place, to explain, with what Accuracy we can, the proper Signification of this Term absolute; which bears a hateful Sound in the Ears of Persons born under free Governments. Indeed the Word, if fallly applied and understood, may encourage ill Princes to grieve and oppress the State, and to commit the worst of Disorders. Especially, since there will be seldom wanting a Tribe of Flatterers to second the Motion, and under this fair Pretence to feed and inflame the Ambition, and other Vices of their Master. ' You are absolute, will they say, ' therefore your Pleasure is your Law: ' Therefore waste your Subjects and your Neighbours ' with unnecessary Wars, to procure your self ' the Name of a great Commander: ' Therefore, ' take the Liberty of treating with Insolence and ' Abuse, whomsoever you think fit: ' Therefore, ' drain your People with Rapines and Exactions, ' to supply your Luxury, or your Pride. A high Strain of this parasitical Rhetorick was that which Anaxarchus used to Alexander, when under Discontent for his Murther of Clytus; he told him, ' That Justice was therefore feign'd by the ' Poets to sit on the same Throne as the Gods, ' or to stand behind Jupiter's Chair, that Men ' might apprehend and acknowledge whatever a ' King acts to be good and right ^a.

Nay, there are Authors, who upon profess'd Principles maintain the absolute Right of Kings, by such Arguments and Reasons, as if they measured it only by a general Impunity, and a Licence to oppress and spoil the People. The true State of the Point then is this: As we cannot conceive, in single Persons, a higher and more absolute Liberty, than that they shall determine and dispose of their Goods and Actions, not by the Will of another, but by their own Judgment and Pleasure, yet still with a full Obedience to the Law of Nature; and as this Liberty naturally belongs to all Persons, who are not subject to the Command of others: So, where many Men cleave together in an establish'd State, there too, as in a common subject, must necessarily reside the same Liberty, or the Power of choosing, by their own Judgment, all Means and Methods tending to the Preservation of the whole Society. And this Liberty is attended with an absolute Command, or a Right of prescribing those Means to the particular Members, and of compelling them to a due Obedience and Conformity. Therefore in every State, properly so call'd, there must always be such an absolute Authority, at least in Habit and Power, if not always in Exercise and Act. For 'tis a Contradiction to say, that such a Community is obnoxious or subject to none, but purely free and independent, and yet that it hath not a Right of administering its proper Affairs by its own Inclination and Judgment. And that this absolute Sovereignty implies nothing that can be term'd unjust or intolerable, we may easily apprehend from the End of civil Establishments and Communities. For these publick Bodies were never instituted with a Design, that Men should throw off the Restraints and Commands of Nature, and run into all the Extravagancies of evil Lusts; but that, by the united Strength of a Multitude, a better Provision might be made for the Interest and Security of each Member; and consequently, that we might be put into an easier and safer Course of observing the Edicts of natural Law.

VIII. But when we consider the supreme Power, as it inheres in one Man, or in a Council, whether of all, or of a few, as in its proper and peculiar Subject; it is not every where thus free and absolute, but in some places we find it under the Restraint of certain Rules and Laws. Indeed, as for Democracies, the Distinction between absolute and limited Sovereignty is not in them so easily discoverable. For although, in every such free State, there must be some settled Rules, founded either upon Custom, or upon written Law, determining at what Time, and by what Persons, the People shall be call'd together, publick Affairs propos'd, and the Resolutions executed (for we can form no Notion of a civil Community without these constant Methods of proceeding) yet since the Council, in which the Sovereignty resides, consists of all the People, and consequently every Man is there who obtains any Right by such Rules or Orders; therefore nothing hinders, but that the People thus assembled may, at any time, alter or repeal them: b. Anacharsis in Plutarch ^c laugh'd at Solon for hoping that he should be able to curb the Injustice, and the other Vices of his Countrymen, by written Ordinances, things of no more Strength than Cobwebs: Solon wisely answer'd, that Men commonly stand to Bargains and Agreements, when it is the Interest of neither Party to break them: And that he would so frame and temper his Prescriptions, as to make it evident to all Persons in the State, that it would be much more for their Benefit and Advantage to obey the Laws, than to transgress them. But the Event of Things confirm'd the Judgment of Anacharsis rather than the Hopes of Solon. The most likely Means that can be thought of, for the ensuring and perpetuating these Decrees, is for the People to bind themselves by a solemn Act of Religion, that they will ever observe them: As was practis'd in Rome, with regard to the Law prohibiting regal Government. Yet whether such an Oath is any longer obligatory;

^a Plutarch. ad Princip. Indo. p. 780. And so in Sophocles, Antigone. p. 234. Ed. H. Steph.

Kings have large Privileges; and, in chief,
The Power to act or speak whatever they please.

^b Add Mauroceni Hist. Venet. l. 13. p. 517, &c.

^c In Solon, p. 81. A. B.

when none of the Persons survive who first engaged in it, hath been the Subject of a former Enquiry a. Cæsar found an easy piece of Sophistry to elude such a publick Constitution. The Roman People had laid up a certain Sum in the Treasury, with a solemn Execration of any one that should dare to touch it, unless in case of an Invasion from the Gauls: Cæsar laid Hands on the Money, and solv'd all Scruples with this Bravado, that by subduing the Gallick Nation, he had at once freed the Commonwealth from their Oath, and from their Enemy b. Herodotus c informs us, that the Athenian Lawgiver but now mention'd made his People swear, that they would not reverse one of his Ordinances within the Space of Ten Years. Others have endeavour'd to preserve such publick Rules, by decreeing a Penalty against any Person, who should move to have them repeal'd; tho' the Penalty, in this Case, may as well be abrogated as the Law. Thus the Thasians made it Death for any Man to propose a League with the Athenians d. And the Athenians themselves denounced a Fine against him who should prefer a Bill for the Recovery of the Island Salamis e. Charondas decreed amongst the Thurians, that whoever attempted to correct or alter the settled Laws, should come into the publick Assembly with a Halter about his Neck f. In the same manner Xenophon g reports, that by an Order of War in Cyrus's Expedition, it was declared capital for any Person to speak of dividing the Army.

But in Aristocracies and Monarchies, where the Persons governing are different from those who are governed, and consequently where the latter may obtain a Right by the Pacts and Promises of the former, the Distinction between absolute and limited Sovereignty is clearly discernible. He then, under such States or Kingdoms, is properly absolute, who exerciseth the publick Administration by his Judgment, not according to any settled Rules or perpetual Decrees, but as the various Conditions of Affairs seem to require: Or, in short, who procures the Safety of the Commonwealth by such means as his own Prudence suggests, in every Exigency of Things and Times. And in this Sense the Term absolute is so far from implying any thing that looks odious and tyrannical, that it lays on Princes a Necessity of applying a stricter Care and Caution, than those who proceed in all Business by constant Forms; if they would fully satisfy their Conscience and their Duty. Dio the Orator h speaks admirably to this purpose: A good Prince, says he, covets nothing, because he thinks himself to possess all things: He abstains from Pleasures, because he knows they are all within his reach, if he should be inclined to make use of 'em: He is juster than all others, because he knows himself to be the Fountain of Justice to the whole State: he takes a Delight in Business and Labour, because he engageth in it by his own free Motion: and he loves the Laws, because he doth not fear them. And in this way of arguing he proceeds truly and rationally. For who hath need of greater Prudence, than one who is to steer and direct such important Affairs? Who of a stricter and more accurate Justice, than one who is above the Laws? Who of a more tender Modesty, than one who hath a Licence to do all things? And who of a more resolute Courage, than one, who is by his Office the common Guardian and Protector?

IX. But since, in consulting the publick Safety, the Judgment of a single Person may easily be deceiv'd; and since all Men are not arriv'd at such a Strength of Soul, as to be able to rule their Passions under so vast and so tempting a Liberty; many Nations have thought it the more secure and prudent Course, not to put so una B. 4. c. 2. f. 17.

b Appian. Alexand. de Bell. Civ. l. 2.

c Clio.

d Polyæn. Strateg.

l. 2. c. 33.

e Plutarch. Solon. p. 82. B.

f Diodor. Sic. l. 12. c. 17.

g Περὶ ἀρχαῶν. l. 6.

h Orat. 63. de Regno. & Tyranno. p. 588. A. B. Ed. Morell.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTE on §. IX.

This is what M. Antoninus acknowledges in Herodian, B. 1. c. 8. Ed. Oxon. καλεπὸν δὲ μετρηταί τῶν ὀντων ἐπιβῆναι ἐπιθυμίας, ὑπερβύσους ἐξουσίας. This is a Quotation of the Author's. Plato said long before that time, that tho' a Prince should be perfectly instructed in the Maxims of true Politicks, yet if he were to be accountable to none, he will not be able during the whole Course of his Life, to have only in view the publick Good and to prefer it always to his own private Advantage: The Propensity of human Nature, which inclines to seek Pleasure, and rashly to avoid Pain, will constantly put him upon trampling under foot the Laws and Interest of the State, to satisfy his immoderate Desires, and to bring at last, by that means, both upon himself and the Publick an infinite number of Evils. Εάν ποτε ἢ τὸ γινώσκαι τίς ὅτι ταῦτα ἔγωγε πύρουκα, &c. de Legibus, Lib. IX. p. 87 c. B. C. Edit. Serran. As for the rest, I refer the Reader to Mr. Sidney's Discourse upon Government, Chap. II. Sect. XXX. where that skillful Politician shews for several Reasons, and by a great number of Instances, how very difficult it is for a Monarchical Government to be regulated as it ought to be, when it is not limited by some Laws; and I shall content my self with only relating the following Words taken from another place of the same Author. 'If the Rulers of Nations be restrain'd, not only the People are by that means secur'd from the Mischiefs of their Vices and Follies, but they themselves are preserv'd from the greatest Temptations to Ill, and the terrible Effects of the Vengeance that frequently ensues upon it. An unlimited Prince might justly be compar'd to a weak Ship, expos'd to a violent Storm, with a vast Sail, and no Rudder. We have an eminent Example of this in the Book of Esther. A wicked Villain having fill'd the Ears of a foolish King, with false Stories of the Jews, he issues out a Proclamation for their utter Extirpation; and not long after being inform'd of the Truth, he gave them leave by another Proclamation to kill whom they pleas'd, which they executed upon seventy thousand Men. The Books of Ezra, Nehemiah, and Daniel, manifestly discover the like Fluctuation in all the Councils of Nabuchodonosor, Cyrus, Darius, and Artaxerxes.—If a frantick Fit come into the Head of a drunken Whore, Persopolis must be burnt, and the Hand of Alexander is ready to execute her Will. If a dancing Wench please Herod, the most venerable of all human Heads must be offer'd in a Dish for a Sacrifice to the Rage of her impure Mother. The nature of Men is so frail, that wheresoever the Word of a single Person has had the force of a Law, the innumerable Extravagancies and Mischiefs it has produc'd have been so notorious, that all Nations, who are not stupid, slavish, and brutish, have always abominated it, and made it their principal Care to find out Remedies against it, by so deciding and balancing the Powers of their Government, that one or a few might not be able to oppress and destroy those they ought to preserve and protect. This has always been as grateful to the best and wisest of Princes, as necessary to the weakest and worst (Chap. III. Sect. XLIII.)—Moses was a Man of as great Parts as any in the World, and yet could not bear the weight of Government alone; and therefore GOD chose out several Persons to ease him of it.—Power, as Theopompus King of the Lacedæmonians says very well, was secur'est when 'twas less courted and less hated. Book II. likewise Mr. Titius Obf. in Pufen. DCI. bounded bounded a Power entirely into the Hands of one Man, who can neither be infallible in his Understanding, nor inflexible in his Will; but rather to prescribe to him a certain Method of governing: It having been first discover'd, that these fixt Rules and Forms of publick Business, are agreeable to the Genius of the People, and the Constitution of the State. Nor is this Limitation of Power an Injury to those Princes, who owe their Crown to the free Gift of the People. For if they thought it hard to receive an Authority, which they could not exercise at their own Pleasure, they were at Liberty to have refused it. But when they have once accepted of the Sovereignty under these Conditions, the solemn Oath by which they engage to observe the Conditions, utterly forbids them to use any Means, whether of secret Contrivance, or of open Violence, in order to subvert the Laws of the Kingdom, and render themselves absolute. Because, as Pliny^a observes, No one ought more religiously to observe his Oath, than he who hath the greatest Interest in not being forsworn.

'Tis a very poor Argument which some make use of, when they tell us, that since Princes are ordain'd by God, and since he hath commanded them fully to discharge their Duty, which cannot be done without the Exercise of the sovereign Power; therefore we ought to suppose, that God, by the same Act, gives them such a certain Measure of Authority; of which as they ought not to suffer themselves to be in the least abridg'd; so the People cannot, with any Justice, desire to make an Encroachment upon it; nor, if they did, could they be able to blind the Prince, by a Contract so prejudicial to his Right, and to the Trust which he receiv'd from God. At the same rate, they say, a Wife might engage her Husband, by Covenant, to wink at her stolen Amours: So as to answer the Poet's Character.

— — Doctus spectare lacunar,
Doctus et ad calicem vigilantium stertere naso.

Who his taught Eyes up to the Ceiling throws,
And sleeps all over but his wakeful Note.

Mr. Dryden.

Or the Bargain might be mutual;

Ut faceres tu quod velles; necnon ego possem
Indulgere tibi:

The Parties should be pleas'd on either side;
And both may for their private Needs provide.

Mr. Dryden.

But, as we have already evidenced the Origin of Sovereignty to be from God, so we take it for a certain Truth, that it was left to the Pleasure and Judgment of Men to choose what particular Form of Government they thought most convenient; except where civil Laws have been divinely instituted, by the extraordinary Interposition and Appointment of Heaven. 'Twas a wise Saying of Melancthon^b, States and Kingdoms differ in their Frame, some admitting Liberty in one Degree, some in another. But God approves of all Forms of Government, which are agreeable to Nature, and to Reason. None will pretend that when a free People are about to elect a King, one Candidate can plead the divine Designation more than another: Or that there is any peculiar Form of Words establish'd by GOD himself, under which the Investiture of Sovereignty must necessarily be made.

Nor will the famous Description of a King by Samuel^c, do these Authors any Service, which they expound as a general Right belonging to every Monarch; whilst others will have it to be a bare account of Matter of Fact, what some Kings will do, tho' none may justly do it. Grotius^d takes the middle way between these contrary Interpretations, and tells us, that the Prophet's Words do neither express a Matter of Right, nor yet a bare Fact, supposed to be wrong and injurious; but such a Fact as carries in it the Force or Consequence of a Right, tho' it hath not the Foundation; and this Force or Consequence is, that it obligeth the Subject to Non-resistance: In other words, that however the Prince may in Actions violate his Duty, yet the People have no more Licence to oppose his Proceedings, than if he did nothing but what was highly just and equal. And on this Account he observes it to be, that Samuel foretels the People, they should cry to GOD under these Oppressions; intimating, that the Things were above human Relief or Remedy. In fine, he says, such Acts as these in Kings may be term'd right, by the same way of Speech, as when the Civil Law^e affirms the Prætor jus reddere, to do Right, even when his Sentence is unjust. But the true Import of that place of Scripture may perhaps better appear, if we take this plain and easy Method of explaining it. The Jewish Nation had hitherto liv'd under a Democracy, but such a one as often bore the Semblance of that kind of Government on which Aristotle bestows the Title of Heroical. Their Judges, rais'd up for the most part by divine Impulse, either deliver'd them from their Oppressors by War, or administer'd Justice in Peace: Yet, in ordinary Cases, they had more Authority to persuade, than Power to command: And no Taxes were allow'd them beyond the standing Revenues to increase their Strength, or to adorn their Dignity^f. At length the People, grown weary of this Constitution, desir'd a King, after the manner of other Nations; that is, one who should shine with external Pomp and Grandeur, and should either keep a constant Body of regular Forces, or at least should train up the Subjects to Arms, that they might be ready to make Head against any sudden Invasion g. When Matters stood thus in the Peoples Opini-

^a Paneg. c. 65.

^b In Epitom. Morul. Philos.

^c 1 Sam. viii. 11, &c.

^d L. i. c. 4. l. 3.

^e L. i. r. i. l. 11. D. De Just. & Jure. This is what Pedo Albinovanus calls, Jus injustum, Eleg. I. Verf. 54. Edit. Gorall.

^f Add. Grot. ad Judic.

^g See 1 Sam. xiii. 2. xix. 48. 52.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. IX.

¹ See Sisney upon Government, C. 3. S. 14.

² Juvenal. Satyr. i. v. 56, 57.

³ Juvenal. Satyr. 6. v.

281, 182.

⁴ In the Third Chapter of this Book.

nion, Samuel, to put them upon a serious Deliberation, before the thing was past recovery, sets out to them, in lively Colours, the Rights of such a Sovereign, and the Inconveniences which would attend the Government. You would have a King, says he, who should appear with State and Magnificence: why, to compass this End, he must be attended with a numerous Train of Guards; therefore, He will take your sons and appoint them for himself, for his chariots, and to be his horsemen, and some shall run before his chariots. You would have a King, who should be furnish'd with a standing military Force: It will be necessary therefore for him, to appoint captains over thousands, and captains over fifties, out of your Sons, who might otherwise have been employ'd in the Improvement of your private Estates. Again, the Care of publick Affairs will not allow such a King to undertake the Culture of his own Lands; therefore he will take your Sons to ear his Ground, and to reap his Harvests; as likewise, to make his instruments of war, and instruments of his chariots. Besides, since his Court will be large and full, and since it will be beneath the Dignity of his Wives, or Daughters to govern the Kitchen, and to provide Sustenance for so vast a Household; he will take your daughters to be co-factionaries, and to be cooks, and to be bakers. He will have Occasion for a Multitude of Officers, to inspect and regulate the Affairs of War and Peace; and all these must have their fix'd Salaries to reward their Service; for which purpose, he will take your fields and your vineyards, even the best of them, and give them to his Servants: And for the same use he will require the tenth of your Cattle. And, after all, if need be, he will not stick to take your servants, and your beasts, and put them to his work. In a word, if you resolve to have a King, you must maintain him like a King, and settle a large Revenue for his support; and should you afterwards grow weary of the Burthen, you cannot lay him aside at your pleasure; your Election having given him such a Right to the Crown, as may not be taken from him without his Consent. It is plain then, on the whole, that this Passage in the Scripture-History doth by no means patronize ill Princes, nor doth contain any certain Measure and Standard of regal Power, there prescribed by God in the manner of a Law, so as to be incapable of receiving Addition or Diminution from any human Agreement; but that the Prophet barely enumerates the Burthen and Charges of a monarchical State, whether absolute or limited. 'Tis certainly therefore left to the Judgment of a free People to determine, whether they shall confer the Sovereignty on a Prince in an absolute manner, or whether they shall bind him to certain Conditions; provided these Conditions imply nothing, which is either impious towards GOD, or destructive of the proper End of Government. For although it be true, that Men first entred into regular Bodies and States, upon their own free Choice, yet in as much as they were always under the Command of the Law of Nature, they ought, on all accounts, to institute such Rules of Sovereignty and of civil Obedience, as should be conformable to that Law, and to the just Design of political Societies.

X. But that we may rightly apprehend what Promise or Engagement (for all have not the same Force) is required to the rendering a Monarchy not absolute (and the same will hold of an Aristocracy) we must observe that a King, at his undertaking the chief Government, binds himself to the due Discharge of it, either by a general, or by a particular Promise, to which is usually added the Confirmation of an Oath. A general Promise may be made either tacitly, or expressly. A King, by the Act of accepting the Administration, is supposed tacitly to engage, that he will conscientiously perform his Trust; altho' no express Promise be given. But the most common way is to make this Promise in express Words, with the addition of an Oath, and the Solemnity of certain Rights and Forms. And nothing is more frequent, than to have the Prince's Duty described in these set Speeches, by way of Periphrasis, or an Enumeration of its principal Parts: As suppose, that he will be diligent and watchful in promoting the publick Security, that he will protect the good, and punish the bad, that he will faithfully administer Justice, will not oppress the Subject, and the like. Now Promises of this kind do not in the least prejudice the Aboluteness of a Sovereignty. The King is indeed obliged by them to govern well; but they leave it to his Judgment and Pleasure,

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES ON §. IX, A.

* How ingenious soever our Author's Paraphrase on this Place may be, it is highly probable that Samuel does not represent what Kings have a Right to do, but only to set before the Jews the Misfortunes that they would be exposed to under a Royal State, to endeavour to put them out of Conceit with it. See Mr. Sidney's Discourse upon Government, Chap. 3. Sect. 3, 4, 5, 7. The Assertors of absolute Power depend chiefly upon the first Words of Samuel's Discourse, which they thus translate: This will be the Right of the King, &c. but the Word מִשְׁפָּחַת in the original, Mischpach, often signifies, as Mr. Le Clerc observes, the manner of acting, the common Method whether good or bad, just or unjust. 'Twill be sufficient to give one single Instance of it, taken from the same Book of Samuel: Now the Sons of Eli were Sons of Belial, they knew not the Lord. And the Priests (Mischpach) Custom with the People was, that when any Man offered Sacrifice, the Priests Servant came while the Flesh was in seething, with a Flesh-Hook of three Teeth in his Hand: And he struck it into the Pan, or Kettle, or Cauldron, or Pot; all that the Flesh-hook brought up, the Priest took for himself. 1 Sam. Chap. ii. 12, 13, 14. Now the Priests had no right to do that; for only the Breast and the right Shoulder of the Sacrifices here mention'd belong'd to them, Lev. vii. 32, &c. Mr. Le Clerc has likewise shewn by the sequel of Samuel's Discourse, that the Interpretation which they put upon it, is entirely contrary to the Rules of Criticism, as well as to the Maxims of Reason.

† These Princes who have been the most jealous of their absolute Authority, have sometimes acknowledged that they could do nothing contrary to the Laws. There is a remarkable Instance of it, which Mr. Sidney has taken Care to relate; it is, that in the Treaty of the Rights of the Queen of France, printed in 1667. by the Command of Lewis xiv. to justify that Monarch's Pretensions to possess the Spanish Netherlands; there are these very Words, That King Lewis was that happy man of France, that they can do nothing contrary to the Laws of their Country.

‡ See also on 2 Kings xi. 17. The People prohibited the King's Safety under their Care. So says Josephus; For, though the King should promise any thing to the People, was not the Custom amongst the Jews: That is, by an express Promise and such as should be made at the Coronation.

to choose and apply the Means in order to the obtaining this End. A particular Promise, which specifies the manner and means of governing, may be divided according to its different Force and Effect. For sometimes it only binds the Conscience of the Prince; sometimes it makes his due Performance the Condition of his Subjects Obedience. The former is done, when the Prince engageth, for Instance, that he will confine the Offices and Places of Trust to Men of such Rank, or of such Qualifications; that he will invest no Person with Privileges and Immunities, burthensome or prejudicial to others; that he will enact no new Laws, impose no new Taxes or Tributes, employ no foreign Soldiers, and the like. But then we suppose the People to demand all this of the Prince, without constituting any certain Council, to which he shall be bound to apply himself, in case the Necessities of the Commonwealth require a Digression from such Promises and Engagements; which are always to be understood with this tacit Expression, unless the publick Safety (the Supreme Law) command the contrary. Such a Council, we mean, as might proceed, not precariously, but by its own proper Right, in determining these Affairs, and without the Consent of which the Subjects should not be obliged to obey the Prince's Orders, in Points of this nature. Now in such a State as we have been here describing, the Administration of the Government is bound and confin'd by certain Laws; and the Prince, who shall act otherwise, except in Cases of Necessity, hath no doubt violated his Word and Faith. And yet the Subjects are not empower'd to reject his Commands, or to reverse his Proceeding upon this Pretence. For whilst he declares, that the Safety of the People, or some extraordinary Benefit to the Publick, is the Cause and Motive of what he does, as indeed this Presumption always attends the Acts of sovereign Princes, the Subjects are cut off from all farther Answer or Plea: Inasmuch as they have no Authority to take Cognizance of those Matters, and to judge whether the Necessities of the Commonwealth require them, or not. Whence 'tis easy to draw this Observation, That a People do not sufficiently guard and secure their Liberties, when they create a King only with a limited Sovereignty, and yet do not appoint a Council, without the Approbation of which those Acts, excepted in the limited Grant, shall not be perform'd: Or unless they oblige the King to hold an Assembly, in which these extraordinary Affairs may be debated. For this is a much better Expedient, than if the King should be only bound in these Cases, to follow the Opinion of a smaller Council: Since it might so happen, that the private Interest of those few Members, who compos'd such a Meeting, should interfere with the publick Good; whence they might be prevail'd on by the Motive of particular Advantage, to with-hold their Consent from the salutary Proposals and Intentions of the Prince.

But Monarchy is brought into much narrower Bounds, and under much stricter Ties, if at the first conferring of Sovereignty, it be expressly covenanted between the People and the Prince, that the latter shall govern according to certain fundamental Laws, and in all such Affairs, as are not left to his absolute Disposal, shall have recourse to a Council of the Commons, or of the Nobles, and determine nothing without their Consent: That in case he do otherwise, the Subjects shall not be obliged by any of those illegal Commands. A People, who constitute a King over them in this manner, are supposed to have promised him Obedience, not absolutely and in all Points, but so far as his Government is agreeable to the original Contract and the fundamental Laws: From which whatever Acts of his recede are thereby void, and lose all Force of engaging the Subjects to a Compliance. Nor yet can it be truly said, that these fundamental Laws render the supreme Power lame and imperfect. For all the Acts of Government may be exercis'd here, as well as in an absolute Kingdom: Only, that whereas in the latter, the Prince proceeds by his own sole Judgment, at least as to the final Determination of things; in the former there is a Council establish'd, which doth, as it were, bear him Company in the adjusting of Affairs; and on the Authority of its Decisions the Sovereignty depends; not as on the proper Source of Power, but as on a necessary Condition. Neither are there in such a State two Governing Wills; since whatever the common Body acts by the Will of the Prince: The Limitation of the original Grant only producing this Effect, That, unless under such a Condition, the Prince shall not incline his Will to some particular Designs, or that such Acts of his Will shall have no Force or Virtue. No more can it be pretended, that the King in a Realm thus constituted, loseth his sovereign Power, or that the Council is superior to him. For these are very faulty Consequences, 'The Prince cannot act in every thing according to his own Pleasure; therefore he hath not the supreme Authority: I am not obliged to obey him in all things; therefore I am his superior, or at least his equal: I can't command a Subject in an arbitrary manner; and therefore he must have his Turn of peremptorily commanding me who am his Prince. There is a great deal of Difference between these two Propositions, 'I am bound to act with this Person's Approbation, because I have engaged my self to it by Covenant: And I am bound to follow this Person's Will and Pleasure, because, by virtue of his Sovereignty, he hath a Right of laying these Injunctions on me'. Supreme and absolute are by no means one and the same Term. For the former only denies a superior or an equal in the same Order: The latter farther imports a Power of exercising any kind of Right, according to one's own Judgment and Inclination.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. X.

¹ Wile Grot. L. 1. c. 3. s. 16. Numb. 1. where he explains this matter by the Example of a Father of a Family, who if he has promis'd his Family any thing even relating to its Management, he is indispensibly obliged to keep his Word, without ceasing, upon that account, to be less the Head, or Sovereign if I may say so, of that little Society. A Husband likewise does not lose any thing of his Authority over his Wife, for having promis'd her something, which he cannot lawfully dispense with the performing of it.

But what shall we say, if in the original Agreement it was expressly ^a made a Condition, that if the Prince acted otherwise, he should forfeit his Sovereignty? We have many Instances of this Practice in History. Diodorus Siculus ^b reports, that amongst the Sabæans, the King, though in all other respects unaccountable, yet if he set a Foot beyond his own Palace, was to be stoned by the People. And this, he says, was ordain'd by the Advice of an antient Oracle. The People of Arragon heretofore, when the King had taken an Oath to preserve their Privileges, engaged their Allegiance to him in this Form, He who have as much Power as you, make you our sovereign Lord, upon Condition you keep inviolably our Laws and Rights, and not otherwise ^c. Severus, when he entred upon his Reign, not only swore that no Senator should be ever put to Death by his Order; but likewise publish'd a Decree to this Effect, That whatever Emperor should take off one of the Senatorian Rank, he himself, his Children, and the Agents be made use of, with their Children, should be declared Enemies of the Commonwealth ^d. Though Julius Solon, who by the Emperor's Command wrote this Decree, in a little time after lost his Life. To come then to a Resolution of the Question before us, 'tis plain that no absolute Prince can receive his Authority under such a Clause or Condition as we have now describ'd. Yet nothing seems to hinder why a limited Government, and yet a true and proper Monarchy, may not be conferr'd on a Person under the Terms of Restraint. For though we should allow, That a temporary Authority cannot rightly be term'd supreme, yet we must not call that Authority temporary, which depends on a Condition in the Power of the Prince to perform. Nor do we by this means subject the Prince to the Judgment of the People, as if they were in a solemn manner to determine whether he hath broken his Engagement, or not. For, besides that the Condition we speak of usually consists of such Matters as are clear and obvious to Sense, and therefore not easily liable to Doubt or Dispute; such an Act of the People, whereby they take Notice of the Prince's Miscarriage and Forfeiture, doth not carry in it the Semblance of a judicial Proceeding, for the taking Cognizance of a Subject's Offence: But is no more than a bare Declaration, by which the one Party observes and protests, that its manifest Rights have been violated by the other Party; and such a Declaration may be made by an Inferior ^e.

Grotius ² speaks somewhat obscurely when he observes that the Obligation, arising from the Promises of Kings, may restrain either the Exercise of the Act, or directly the very Power. That an Act contrary to Promises of the former kind is Unjust and yet Valid; but an Act repugnant to Engagements of the latter sort, is not only unjust, but void and ineffectual. As if he had said, sometimes a King promiseth that he will use such a part of his Sovereignty only in a certain manner; sometimes he plainly abridgeth himself of such a part of his Power. Concerning which Distinction we may offer these two Remarks: First, that an Act committed against Promises of the former kind, may likewise be void: For Instance, suppose a Prince hath engaged, that he will not levy new Taxes without consulting the States of the Realm, we conceive that the Levies which he shall make in this arbitrary manner are null and unbinding. And, Secondly, that as to the latter part of the Distinction, what Grotius there supposeth, cannot but maim and dismember the sovereign Power.

XI. But to give us a deeper Insight into the Nature of limited Monarchies, it will be useful to remark, that the Affairs which offer themselves in the publick Administration, are chiefly of two kinds. Some may be settled and regulated before-hand; because, whenever they happen, they have the same constant Nature. Others there are on which Judgment cannot be given, whether or no they are expedient to the publick Welfare, but at the very time when they appear: Because the Circumstances which attend them are not to be foreseen. Now a People, who have settled themselves in a limited Monarchy, may provide that, in neither of these kinds of Affairs, any Prejudice shall arise to the Good and Safety of the Commonwealth. As to the former, by ordaining perpetual Laws, which the King shall be bound to observe: And as to the latter, by appointing a Council of Peers, or of Commoners, who shall always be consulted on such Emergencies. Thus a People who are fully satisfied of the Truth of the Religion they profess, and likewise of the Decency of their external Rites, and their ecclesiastical Polity, may oblige a Prince, when they invest him with the Government, to make no Alteration in the Establish'd Worship, by his own sole Judgment and Authority. Again, no Man is ignorant how much the Justice of a Nation suffers, when Causes are determin'd, not according to written Laws, but by the bare Sentence of the Prince, and by what they term Equity: Since in this way of proceeding, Passion, or Ignorance, must frequently get the Advantage over Reason ^f. To avoid which Inconvenience, a People may engage the Prince whom they create, that he shall either observe the Laws already extant, or enact new and reasonable Statutes; and that according to these Constitutions, Justice shall be given by certain Colleges, or standing Courts; no Causes,

^a We say expressly, for if the Clause run only thus, In case the King act otherwise, the Subject shall not be obliged; it will not amount to such a peremptory Condition, as the Civilians call Lex Commissoria. ^b L. 3. c. 47. Add.

Agatharoid. de Mari Rulro. c. 50. Strabo, l. 15. pag. 488. Edit. Genev. Casaub. tells us of a Custom much like this; that in Sulcis, if the Prince happens to drink to excess, the very Women have Liberty to kill him; and she that doth the Feat, for her Reward, may claim his Successor in Marriage. ^c See Hottomann. Franco Gall. c. 1:.

^d Xiphilin. Epit. Dion. in Sever.

^e Comp. Bœcler ad Grot. l. 1. c. 3. s. 16.

^f Vide Tacit. Annal. 13. C. 4 & 42.

except of very weighty Concern, or by way of Appeal, being allow'd to come before the King. Yet, as to this Point, Kings themselves are often fond of referring invidious Causes to the Decision of others ^a. And this Excuse is often serviceable, in putting off the importunate Intercessions of great Persons on the Behalf of Criminals. 'Twas a brave Saying of the Emperor Andronicus Comnenus ^b, That the Severity and Authority of the Laws ought to be of more Force than his private Will and Inclination; and, that 'twas fit the Sentence of the Judges should over-rule the Opinion of the Prince. No less obvious is it to remark, how easily Luxury or Ambition may squander away what hath been got by the Industry and Sweat of other Men. On this Score therefore, lest the Riches of the Subject should serve only for Fuel to the Vices of the Sovereign, many Nations have wisely assign'd their Kings such fixt Revenues, as they thought sufficient for his ordinary Expences on the Commonwealth; and lest the raising of larger Sums, when there should be Occasion for them, to the Consideration of a Council or Assembly. In like manner, since some Princes, out of too great a Fondness for martial Glory, hazard themselves and their Realms by engaging in unnecessary Wars; it was a prudent Caution in those People, who, when they conferr'd the Sovereignty on their Kings, oblig'd them not to enter upon a War, at least not on the offensive side, without the Advice and Concurrence of a proper Council. We are told of the Inhabitants of the Island Borneo ^c, that they have such a Natural Aversion to War, and to martial Princes, that when they find their Monarch to be of a fiercer Disposition, they oblige him to fight at the Head of his Army, where he may meet with the greatest Danger. In these therefore, and in all Instances of Business, which a People find to be of publick Use and Benefit, they may provide for their own Security, by settled Constitutions and Decrees: Lest if they should leave the absolute Disposall of such Affairs in the Hands of the Prince, the common Interest might possibly sometimes suffer.

From what hath been observ'd on this Head, it appears in what Sense we ought to explain that common Assertion of the Grecian Politicians, and others who follow them, when they tell us, That the Government of a State ought rather to be committed to Laws, than to Men. For the only rational Interpretation of such a Maxim must be this, that it is more expedient the Rulers of Commonwealths should govern according to the standing Prescriptions of the Law, than according to their own private and unconfined Pleasure. For otherwise bare Laws are no fitter to govern a State, than the bare Needle to govern a Ship, without the Assistance and Direction of a Pilot.

Many Examples and many Methods we find in History, how the regal Power hath been limited and restrain'd ^d. But perhaps no Relation is so extraordinary as that which Solinus ^e gives us of the People of the Islands Hebrides in Scotland: Their King, says he, hath nothing of his own; all Possessions lie in common: He is tied to Equity by establish'd Laws. And lest Covetousness should tempt him from Truth and Right, he is taught Justice by the Discipline of Poverty; having no fixt Revenue, nor private Estate, but owing his Maintenance to the publick Stock. He is allowed no Wife, but makes free with any of his Subjects Beds, as he thinks convenient. And thus he hath no Hopes of a Family and Children, to engage and to ensnare him. Apollonius Rhodius ^f tells us a lamentable Story of the Kings of the Mosynæci, that if at any time they pronounced an unjust Sentence, they were immediately shut up in a Tower, and there starv'd to Death.

XII. But whereas, as hath been already shewn, Princes in a limited Monarchy are for the most part oblig'd, in such Affairs as the People thought fit not to leave to their absolute Disposall, to apply themselves to a Council, either of all the Subjects in general, or of Deputies, representing the particular Classes and Orders; it is farther to be observ'd, that the Power of such Councils is not in all places alike. For there are Realms, where the King, being in other respects absolute, appoints a Council or Senate, the Approbation of which he makes essential to the Validity of his Decrees ^g. Now a Senate of this kind is, as to its Authority, no more than a Board of Counsellors; and when it proceeds to take the royal Edicts under Examination and Censure, and to reject such as seem less expedient to the Commonwealth, it does this, not by its own proper Right, but by a power delegated from the Prince; who makes this prudent Provision, that nothing may be enacted prejudicial to the Publick, either through his own Inadvertency, or through the Instigation of Flatterers. Plutarch ^h reports it as 'A Law of the Egyptian Kings, which they constantly observ'd, to bind the Judges by Oath, that they should not obey the Prince himself, if he desired them to pass an unjust Sentence. And on the same Occasion he tells us, that Antigonus the Third gave Notice to the States, 'That in case he

^a Ovid. Metam. (l. 12. v. 626, &c.) makes Agamemnon use this wise Conduct in disposing of Achilles's Arms:

*A se Tantales odium involuntumque removit;
Arceolæque duces in illis considere castris
Iussit, & arborum litis traiecit in omnes.*

The King throws off the Odium, and denies
To sit sole Judge upon so vast a Prize:
But cites a Council of the Martial Peers,
And to the general Vote the mighty Cause refers.

^b Nicetas Acominat. l. 1. De Imper. Andronic.

^d How the Power of the Egyptian Kings was confin'd, see Diodor. Sic. l. 1. c. 71. Add. Plin. Nat. Hist. l. 7. c. 22. in fin. & Solin. C. 66. Philostratus (Vit. Apollon. Tyrann. l. 3. c. 33.) reports, that the ancient Constitutions of the wise Indians permitted the King to stay amongst them but a single Day at once.

^e See what Neuhof relates of the Empire of China, Descrip. Sin. c. 1.

^c Franc. Lopez de Gomara Hist. Ind. Occidental. c. 95.

^f Argonaut. l. 3.

^g Apophtheg. p. 174 B. 183. F.

Mr. BARBEYRA C'S NOTES on §. XI, XII.

¹ Grotius, B. 1. c. 3. f. 16. Numb. 3. is more worthy to be consulted upon this, than the Places just mention'd.

² See Grot. B. 1. c. 3. f. 18.

³ should,

should, by any Letter to them, command any thing contrary to the Laws, they should not perform such an Injunction, but should take it for granted that he had forgot himself a. By this means too Princes often get rid of bold Petitioners, whilst in appearance they grant the Request, but at the same time know, that the Senate will cancel and reverse it b.

Yet, under this Constitution, if at any time the Prince positively insists in having his Will take place, and doth not own the Reasons, urged by the Senate, to be of strength enough to persuade the contrary; the Senate cannot proceed farther in opposing the Prince's Power. For it is not supposed, that he, in appointing such a Council, intended to give up irrevocably his absolute Right of governing, and of his own accord to make his Subjects Obedience only conditional, when he might have claim'd it without any such Terms of Restraint. The Senate therefore, in this Case, hath its Authority only by Commission from the Prince, who may consequently put a Stop to it, when he thinks fit: Tho' indeed he ought not to think fit, unless on very extraordinary Occasions. But thus much may be done on the Peoples side; when one King hath, by his own free Act, constituted such a Senate, they may oblige his Successors (by an Oath, at their Admission to the Government) not to dissolve it.

A Senate thus form'd, and especially if it be left in the King's Power to suppress it, doth not hinder the King from being absolute. For when we apply this Denomination to a Prince, we do not presume that he acts whatever he pleaseth, according as he is led by the Blindness of Lust, or the Rashness and Inadvertency of Passion; but only that he determines, by his own final Judgment, all Matters belonging to the Commonwealth: Which is very far from being inconsistent with a Necessity of hearing good Reason and sound Advice. Hence, altho' the Counsel, which such a Senate offers the Prince, doth not oblige him by its own Force, or by any Authority inherent in it self, yet, it affords the Ground and Occasion of an Obligation, by representing to the Prince after what manner he may truly discharge his Duty, in the Business at present under Debate c. For so a Physician cannot be said to oblige a Patient by his own Power and Authority; yet when he shews him what will conduce to his Health, the Patient is bound to follow his Prescriptions by the Law of Nature, which enjoins every one to take care of his own Health and Safety. The same must be said of the Assemblies of the Estates in a Realm; which serve only for a larger Council of the Prince, by means of which the Complaints of the People, which are often neglected or suppress'd in private Councils, may be brought to the Prince's Ear; who hath the Liberty of taking what Method he pleaseth for their Redress d. It is well observ'd by Mr. Hobbes e, that unless we would rob the King of his Sovereignty, and make a State with two Heads, such an Assembly cannot undertake more Business than the King hath propounded to them: Since the People cannot choose their Deputies to other Intent, than is, in the Writing directed to them from the Sovereign, express'd. For the same Reason, when the Sovereign shall declare, that nothing more at present remains to be propounded to their Debate, the Body is dissolv'd. Yet they are allow'd, of their own accord, to inform the King of some Matters in the way of Address and Petition.

But the Sovereignty may then properly be term'd Limited, when the People at first conferr'd it on the Prince, under this Condition, that before he proceeded to the Exercise of certain Acts, he should consult the Assembly of the Estates, and that without their Consent his Decrees should be of no Force. Yet still we ought to leave it in the King's Power, to call this Assembly, and to dissolve it: As likewise to a Vide C. L. l. 1. c. 19. l. 1. De Precib. Imperat. offerend.

Bodin. de Republ. l. 3. c. 4. p. 455. Gramond. Hist. Gall. l. 5. p. 277. &c. Joh. Labardæ, Hist. Gall. l. 3. p. 132, 133. Ed. Paris. 1671.

b Vide L. 10. c. 12. l. 1. C. De Petit. Honor. sublat.
c Add 1 Kings xii. 7, 8. Martinus in his History of China (l. 5. c. 37. p. 122) relates, that the better sort of Princes amongst that People, made it a Custom, when they were admonish'd by Persons celebrated for Wisdom and Goodness, of shunning Vice, or of pursuing Virtue, or of any Affair relating to the Publick Welfare, to receive the Advice with bended Knee. Add. l. 6. c. 1. p. 204.

d See Grot. l. 1. c. 3. f. 10. e Leviathan, c. 22.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTE ON §. XII.

'Tis worth the while to explain that Point a little. Let us hear Mr. Sidney upon it: 'The Power of calling and dissolving Parliaments, is not simply in Kings. They may call Parliaments, if there be occasion, at times when the Law does not exact it. They are placed as Sentinels, and ought diligently to observe the Motions of the Enemy; and give notice of his Approach: But if the Sentinel falls asleep, neglects his Duty, or maliciously endeavours to betray the City; those who are concern'd may make use of all other means to know their Danger, and to preserve themselves.—The Consuls, or other chief Magistrates in Rome had certainly a right of assembling and dismissing the Senate: But when Hannibal was at the Gates, or any other eminent danger threaten'd them with Destruction; if that Magistrate had been drunk, mad, or gain'd by the Enemy, no wise Man can think that Formalities were to have been observ'd. In such Cases every Man is a Magistrate; and he who best knows the danger, and the means of preventing it, has a right of calling the Senate or People to an Assembly. The People would, and certainly ought to follow him, as they did Brutus and Valerius against Tarquin, or Horatius and Valerius against the Decemviri; and whoever should do otherwise, might for Sottishness be compar'd to the Courtiers of the two last Kings of Spain. The first of these, by name Philip the Third, being indispos'd in cold Weather, a Brazier of Coals was brought into his Chamber, and plac'd so near to him, that he was cruelly scorch'd. A Nobleman then present said to one who stood by him, The King burns; the other answer'd it was true, but the Page whose Office it was to bring and remove the Brazier was not there; and before he could be found, His Majesty's Legs and Face were so burnt, that it caus'd an Erysipelas of which he died. Philip the Fourth escap'd no better, who being surpriz'd as he was a Hunting by a violent Storm of Hail and Rain, and no Man presuming to lend the King a Cloak, he was so wet before the Officer could be found who carried his own, that he took a Cold, which cast him into a dangerous Fever. If Kings like the Consequences of such a Regularity, they may cause it to be observ'd in their own Families; but Nations looking in the first place to their own Safety, would be guilty of the most extreme Stupidity, if they should suffer themselves to be ruin'd for adhering to such Ceremonies.—The Law for annual Parliaments expressly declares it not to be in the King's Power as to the point of their meeting, nor consequently their continuance: For they meet to no purpose, if propose

propose the Matters which are to be debated in it; unless we would give him the Name only and Shadow of a King, or would throw the Commonwealth into an irregular Shape. And altho' it be granted, that the Estates assembled may, of their own accord, lay before the King Considerations relating to the publick Safety, yet the Decrees which they form on such heads, shall derive their Force from the royal Assent and Ratification. The Difference between such a Body of Representatives, and Counsellors properly so call'd, is this, that although, in their Applications to the Sovereign, they both act in the same manner by Reasons and Advice; yet the Sovereign may reject the Reasons of the latter, but not of the former. Nor ought the Prince to think it hard, if the Estates do sometimes deny their Concurrence to what he offers. For he hath engaged himself by his Promise, to have always an Eye and Regard to the common Welfare, which in all Probability must be better understood, and more surely consulted by a Number of select Judges, than by a single Man. The Prince therefore, in case his Estates should thus happen to dissent from his Opinion, must attribute the Misfortune to his own Inadvertency or Passions, or to the ill Fate of the Kingdom. 'Tis an idle Fear which possesseth some Men, that by this means we shall put it in the Power of the Estates to preserve, or to destroy the Commonwealth, as they think fit. For 'tis ridiculous to suppose so much Imprudence, either in the King, as that he shall be unable to represent to the Assembly the real Necessities of the Kingdom; or in the Assembly, as that, when they see the Business thus clearly laid before them, they shall obstinately betray their own Security. But this is certain, since the Persons who first invested the Prince with a limited Sovereignty, cannot be presumed to have been desirous, either of overturning and destroying the Government, or of hindring, by their Acts and Covenants, the true End of civil Communities from being obtain'd; it may hence be gather'd, that these original Covenants and Agreements are always so to be interpreted, as that they may consist with the publick Safety, and on no account contradict and oppose it: And consequently, that the Persons thus covenanting must be supposed to have done all with this Reserve in their Mind, that the Terms and Conditions, which they now settled, should not in the least prejudice the general Interest or Security, or cause a Convulsion or a Dissolution in the Commonwealth. If then such a Case should happen, that the Covenants first entred upon by the People should afterwards, in any Instance, appear prejudicial or destructive to the publick Welfare, it will be convenient, if the Matters shall admit of Delay, to propose them in an Assembly of Estates. When this cannot well be done, the King hath it in his own Power to correct, by Wisdom and Art, those dangerous Establishments. And the same Rule will hold, with regard to the standing Laws; which are now and then enjoind Silence by the supreme Law, the Safety of the People. Thus Agésilans commanded the Laws to sleep one Day; that those who had fled in the Battle of Leutra, might have Leave to return, without the usual Penalty and Disgrace. In the same manner, the ordinary Course of judicial Proceedings is often hindred either by the Necessity of the Times, or by the Condition of the Parties offending; who perhaps, were they to be formally arraign'd, must first be vanquish'd as Enemies, before they can be try'd as Criminals. Therefore Mr. Hobbes's Position will not stand, without some Grains of Allowance, when he asserts ^a, That the Evil inflicted by publick Condemnation is not to be styl'd by the Name of Punishment, but of an hostile Act. He speaks Truth, in case there was no precedent Crime: But when the Offence is evidently proved, the Evil inflicted will be truly and properly a Punishment, tho' the present posture of Affairs hinder the Offender from being condemn'd in the common Method of Justice.

XIII. But Mr. Hobbes seems inclin'd to allow no Distinction between supreme and absolute Power; or rather to make all Power absolute, that is, supreme. To whose Notions this general Remark may be applied, that what he so crudely delivers, should be limited with this Condition, So far as the End of civil Government will admit: As, for Instance when he says, that he, to whom the Right of Punishing belongs in a Commonwealth, may justly compel all Men to all things that he pleaseth ^b. And indeed he himself inserts this Restriction; for he tell us, that by all things, he means, all things that are necessary to the common Peace and Security ^c. And so again, he observes, that there is connect'd with the Right of the Sovereign, so much Obedience in the Subjects, as the Government of a State necessarily requires. By the same Rule therefore, when he affirms ^d, that he, who hath in such a manner subjeckt'd his Will to the Will of a Prince, as that the Prince may, without Restraint, do what he lists; make Laws, judge Causes, inflict Punishment, use the Strength and Riches of the People at his Pleasure, and all this by Right; hath certainly granted the highest Power of Sovereignty that can be given: We are to consider, with what Purpose and Intention Men first applied their Minds to the constituting of civil States: And then we shall suppose no Person to have voluntarily transferr'd on the Prince any farther Degree of Power, than appears conducive to that End, in the Judgment of any wise Man: Tho' to determine what is thus conducive according to particular Circumstances and Occasions, doth not belong to those who transfer their Right, but to him, on whom it is transferr'd. The Sovereign

^a they may not continue to do the Work for which they meet; and absurd to give them a Power of meeting, if they must not continue till it be done: For as Grotius says, Qui dat finem, dat media ad finem necessariis, the only reason why Parliaments do meet, is to promote the publick Good; and they by Law ought to meet for that end. ^b They ought not therefore to be dismiss'd, till it be accomplish'd. Mr. Stancy's Discourse upon Government, Chap. 3 Sect. 38. See the rest of the Chapter.

^a Leviath. c. 28.

^b De Cive, c. 6. f. 6.

^c C. 5. f. 6. & f. 9. in fin.

^d Ibid. c. 6. f. 13.

therefore hath a Right of compelling the Subj^{cts} to all such things as he judgeth to be of any Consequence to the publick Good. But to constrain them to that which is inconsistent with the Safety of the Commonwealth, or with the Laws of Nature, is what he ought not to entertain, even in Thought and Inclination. And if he should engage in any such Attempt, no doubt he transgresseth the proper Bounds of his Authority.

It may not be amiss, if we here examine the Arguments alleg'd by the same Author^a, by which he endeavours to make out, that it would be a vain Design to introduce a limited Sovereignty. For, in this Case, says he, 'The Assembly, which prescribed Laws to the future Prince, had certainly an absolute Power, at least actually, or virtually. If then, the Assembly continues; or, proroguing it self from time to time, meets again at a fixt Day, and at a certain Place; this absolute Power remains ever as it was first seated; and so the Prince will not have the supreme Authority, but will be a bare Magistrate. (And thus much we grant, if the Assembly thus meets by its own Right, and hath the Power of determining all kinds of publick Business, and of calling the King himself to an account.) 'But if the Assembly dissolves it self, unless the State be dissolv'd with it, there must be left somewhere a Power of punishing those who transgress the Law; which cannot be done without absolute Authority: This Clause we deny, as utterly false; and we have no better Opinion of the Reason, on which he builds it: 'A Prince (says he) who hath so much Strength granted him in rightful manner, as to enable him to punish any Subject whatsoever; enjoys the greatest Power that a People can give. For the Weakness of this Argument will easily be discover'd by any one, who reflects on the Design of civil Establishments, and considers, that by submitting their Will, and their Strength, Men do not turn themselves into meer Engines, to move no otherwise than as they are drawn; but that they only grant to another the Use of their Powers under a Condition; so as that they themselves are to judge whether this Condition be made good, and if it be not, are at Liberty to retract what they gave. Alike absurd is it to pretend, that there is not more Security against the Abuse of Power in a limited, than in an absolute, Government. He who hath Strength enough to defend his People (as all wise Subjects must allow their Prince) hath not always Strength enough to oppress or to destroy them. The Commands of a General may work with good Force upon his Soldiers, when he orders them vigorously to attack the Enemy: And yet they would be found very insignificant, should he bid them turn their Swords against each other. On the whole he is a prudent Prince, who tho' intrusted with an absolute Sovereignty, yet in some Instances waves his own particular Advantage, when he finds the Subjects are not to be brought to a Compliance, without endangering the publick Welfare. But they are no less a prudent People, who well knowing what things would be inexpedient to their Constitution, have, by means of fundamental Laws, put it out of the Power of Princes to constrain them in those Instances.

XIV. Lastly, it is incident to the supreme Power, that it may be enjoy'd, either fully, or under more or less Degrees of Diminution: And this chiefly belongs to monarchic^l Government. For some Kings possess their Realm in the way of Patrimony, others in the way of Use only, not of Property; and this either for the Term of their own Life, or with the Power of transmitting it to their Posterity under certain Conditions: And others are commission'd to hold their Sovereignty only for such a fix'd period of Time, which being once elapsed, their Power passeth away with it, and they return to the Condition of private Men. Indeed Mr. Hbbes will have those Monarchs likewise to be call'd temporary, who receive their Power for life, and affirms them to be properly no Monarchs, but only the Ministers^u of the People. But it is contrary to the common Custom of Speech, to call him a temporary Prince, who doth not lay down his Dignity, but with his Life: This Term being properly applied to those, whose Authority expires at such a certain and definite point of Time, not by Chance, but by Right.

XV. But learned Men are not agreed to acknowledge any such Thing, as a temporary Monarch. Grotius will have the Dictator, amongst the Romans, whose Power lasted but six Months, to have been truly a Monarch: Because, says he, whilst this Period lasted, he exercis'd all the Acts of supreme Authority, with the same Right, as those who are most justly and properly sovereign Princes; neither could his Acts be revers'd by any other Power. But we understand the Nature of moral Things by their Operation, and consequently those Powers, which produce the same Effects, ought to go under the same Name. Tho' the continuance of a Thing doth not change the nature of it; yet there is no doubt to be made, but that a temporary Command is in Dignity much inferior to one perpetual; since Men are wont to respect those with a much more solid Veneration, whom they apprehend to be incapable of returning to a private Condition, than those whom in a little time they are again like to see on the same Level with themselves. But

^a De Cive, c. 6. f. 17.

^b De Cive, ubi supra, c. 7. f. 16.

^c C. 9. f. 11.

^d L. 1, c. 3. f. 11.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES ON §. XIV, XV.

¹ P. Hobbes, c. 6. f. 13. ibid. Answer. not excepting the Clause by which it is stipulated, that the Prince shall be of such a Religion. See Mr. Hortius's Dissertation de Superioritate Territoriali; which makes part of the second Tome of his Commentationes & Opuscula, &c. Sect. 13. p. 217, &c. as also La Reponse aux Questions d'un provincial, by Mr. Bayle, Tom. 1, p. 535, &c.

² That is true (says Mr. Buddeus, in his excellent Dissertation, entituled Jurisprudentia Historice Specimen, among his Selects, §. Natur.) provided that the Nature of a thing has so close a Connexion with the Continuance, that the change of the one necessarily takes away the other. Sect. 47. See his 43d Section to the 48th.

indeed, indeed, Bodinus a before Grotius, and many good Authors since him, have shewn, that the Dictator was by no means a Monarch, but only an extraordinary Magistrate. Nor doth that Axiom stand on very sure Ground, Those are the same Powers, which produce the same Effects: For it must be farther consider'd, whether the Person exerciseth this Power as properly his own, or as delegated to him by others, to use in their stead. On which account, it is a Mistake likewise in Grotius b, to rank those Persons in the Class of temporary Monarchs, Who during the Minority of Kings, or in the time of their Captivity, or Lunacy, are appointed Protectors: In as much as they are neither subject to the People, nor is their Power revocable, before the time fix'd by Law: For these Governors exercise the supreme Authority, not in their own Name, but in another's; and therefore can no more be term'd Monarchs, than we call a Guardian the Proprietor of the Goods of his Ward. And then no Man, who is vers'd in the Roman History, will allow that the Dictator had all, and each precise part of the Sovereignty so committed to him together, as that during the six Months Space he might exercise it as he pleas'd. And as for what is urged, that his Acts could not be revers'd by any other Power; it is not absurd to suppose a Magistrate so commission'd and empower'd, that, at least in some certain Affairs, there shall lie no Appeal from his Sentence; and yet he shall be no more than a Magistrate c.

It is worth observing on this Head, that the Power of the Dictators, and of all other Magistrates appointed for a certain time, doth at that very Instant expire, and the Persons do by Right return to a private Station; and that therefore, whatever they do, after this precise point of Time, is look'd on as a private Act, to which any Man may refuse Obedience d; tho', perhaps they still bear the external Ensigns of Power. Hence to abrogate the Command of such Representatives, there is no need of a new Decree of the People; but, if they refuse to resign, the old Decree is sufficient to be immediately put in Execution against them. For those Rights, the Validity of which depends on a certain space of time as on a necessary Condition, do cease with the elapsed Time, without farther Process: But in Controversies about Rights, when the Quality of certain Actions is to be proved, there is need of long Debate, and of a formal Sentence. The reason of which Difference is this; there can be no Dispute whether such a point of Time is pass'd, but whether an Action was good or bad, may be argued with Probability on both sides e.

But it is by many thought impossible to give an Instance of temporary Sovereignty, if we speak of such Power as is properly supreme, and not conferr'd by Deputation. For what we read of Augustus f, that he would suffer his Empire to be granted him only for ten Years, and upon the expiring of that Term, renewed it again for ten Years more; was a meer Jest and a popular Cheat. Narbarzanes, in Q. Curtius g, hid the vilest Treachery under the same specious Proposal: Put your Government, says he to Darius, into the Hands of another, who shall bear the Name of a King, till such a time as he shall have driven the Enemy out of Asia; and when his Victory hath secured the Kingdom, let him restore it to its proper Master. Let Bessus enjoy the sovereign Command, during this Juncture; and when things are settled, let him deliver to you, the lawful Prince, that Power which he receiv'd only in Trust h. In Nicephorus i we find Michael Paleologus obliged by Oath to administer the Government, 'till the lawful Heir and Successor should be grown up, and then to resign freely to him the Throne and all the Ensigns of Majesty. Tho' indeed his Oath was never kept. And for the Compact between Eteocles and Polynices, that they should reign each a Year by Turns, this Instance may easily be answered, by saying, that it was contrived only as an Expedient to keep the Kingdom undivided; each Brother thus possessing the entire Command, tho' in an alternate Course j.

XVI. As for that way of possessing Kingdoms, by which they are said to be in the Patrimony of the Prince, we are first of all to observe, that a Man's Patrimony is not, strictly speaking, so much what he derives by Inheritance from his Parents, as what he enjoys with full Property or Dominion, by whatever Means it came into his Hands. Hence, as Property is chiefly applied to Things; so they too are especially term'd patrimonial, in as much as they have no inherent Right, which might hinder the Possessor, either from employing, or from abusing them at his Pleasure. Afterwards Slaves came to be added to the Things or Goods, which compos'd the Patrimony of their Lords; who challeng'd so absolute a Right and Title over them, as to make the Servant not at all concern'd in his own Safety or Destruction, affirming the one and the other to be entirely the Master's Advantage and the Master's Loss. And within these Bounds did the Fathers of Families confine Patrimonies in the early Times. For as to the Right of governing their Wives and Children, tho' this indeed belong'd to them, and to them alone; yet in as much as these near Relations were Persons con-

a De Republ. l. 1. c. 8. b Chap. 3. §. 11. c Such were heretofore among the Romans, the Præfetti prætorio; upon which see a Rescript of Constantine: A præfettis autem prætorio provocare non sinimus. Cod. Lib. vii. Tit. xlii. de Appellat. & Consule. Leg. xix. see also Tit. xlii. de Sententiis præfett. prætor. & Digest. Lib. iv. Tit. iv. de Minoribus, Leg. xvii, xviii. The Bishops, who never fail'd to take the Advantage of the Indulgence of Princes to satisfy their own Ambition, obtain'd that Privilege of the Emperors Arcadius, Honorius, and Theodosius, with respect to the Causes that were determin'd by them. Episcopale judicium ratum sit in omnibus, qui se audiri a sacerdotibus elegerint; eamque illorum judicationem adhibendum esse reverentiam jubemus, quam vestris deferre necesse est potestatibus, a quibus non licet provocare. Cod. Lib. I. Tit. iv. de Episcopali Auctoritate, &c. Leg. viii. see Genf. xli. 46, 44.
d Vide Livy, l. III. c. 38, &c. e Dio. l. 53. f L. V. c. 9. g What we meet with in Diod. Sic. (l. IV. c. 23, & 31.) may be produced with a better Colour, for an Instance of a Kingdom in Trust.
h L. VI. i Vide Euripid. in Phœniss. Statius Theb. l. 1.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. XIII.

1 See Rosin Antiq. Rom. L. 7. c. 17.

2 See Sidney upon Government, c. 2. f. 24.

Y y y 2

siderable

siderable on their own account, they did not pretend to put them amongst their Possessions, or to reckon them part of their Wealth and Estate ^a. Nor are Men wont to set down their Learning and their Skill in the List of their Fortunes, however advantageous to them ^b: tho' many a Person by these Accomplishments supplies, the want of real Possessions, and comes under that Character in Ovid ^c; Ars illi sua census erat. —

—His Art was his Estate.

But when the Ambition of Princes began to rank, amongst the chief Goods, a Power and Command over Men; and many of them brought it into a Custom to maintain their own Pleasures and Vices at the Subjects Cost; those Kingdoms came to be look'd on as Patrimonies, which the Sovereign had receiv'd a Power of alienating, as he should think fit: This being esteem'd the utmost Force of Property, and the very Essence, in which a real Possession did consist ¹. Whereas other Monarchs, who had not obtain'd so vast a Privilege, and so unbounded a Power over their Realms, were said to hold them in the manner of Personal Possessions, and rather to have the Use of them, than the Property. Which Distinction seems to have taken its Rise from the different ways of acquiring Government, especially monarchical. For altho' no Prince can be lawfully constituted, without the Consent of the Subjects, yet there are different manners of exerting and applying this Consent. So that, in some Cases, the King confers a Benefit on the People, in taking them under his Sovereignty; in others, the King is highly obliged and indebted to the People, for advancing him to the Throne. Those, who have given a Prince just Cause of proceeding to Hostility against them, in case they lose the Day, may, by the Right of War, be deprived of all their Possessions, and of their personal Liberty itself. Therefore, if Men under these Circumstances are admitted to any Terms or Conditions, they are to acknowledge it as the pure Favour and Mercy of the Conquerour: Who, tho' he leaves them to enjoy their Life and personal Liberty, and their private Estates; yet is supposed to challenge the Sovereignty over them in the fullest and most irrevocable manner, for himself and his Posterity ². The same Claim is presumed to be made by a Prince, who receives a People into his Protection, when they had otherwise been inevitably ruin'd ^d. Now the Effect resulting from a Sovereignty thus obtain'd, is chiefly seen in this, that not only the Condition of the Subjects depends entirely on the Pleasure of the Prince; but that Prince may transfer his ^e Right of governing such a Realm on any Person, whom he shall choose; and consequently may appoint any Method of Succession that shall be agreeable to his Judgment or Inclination.

XVII. But where the King receives his Crown from the Grant of the People, there each Person thus concurring is supposed to have reserv'd and secured to himself so much of his former Rights and Privileges, as is consistent with the Nature of a civil State. And therefore, the Condition of the Subjects, under such a Constitution, rather depends on their own Choice, than on the Prince's Pleasure. Yet they could not but find it necessary, to abridge themselves of their natural Liberty in such a Degree, as the Form of Government required, which they are now about to introduce. Farther, since in conferring Sovereignty by a voluntary Act, Men are usually prevail'd upon by the Consideration of some peculiar Merit or Advantage in the Person, and therefore would not perhaps submit to the Authority of another, as they are willing to yield to his; it follows, that according to the regular Course, the People are to determine on whom the Crown shall devolve, after the Decease of the King now elected. And here, if the People should not think it proper to constitute every new King by a particular Election, it shall be in their Power to settle the Method of Succession; and the Prince's Nomination shall, in this point, by no means hold good against their Act. Upon this account chiefly it is, that many Authors have affirm'd these Monarchs to hold their Realms jure usufructuario, by the Right of Use and Profit; as we have already hinted: In as much as by their own Pleasure, and without the Consent of the People, they can settle nothing, either in regard to the inward Frame and Constitution of the State, or to the alienating and transferring it on any Person ^e. We are by no means for extending the Comparison farther between Princes, constituted by the free Grant of the People, and those Persons whom the civil Law terms Usufructuarii, Possessors of things with a Title only to the Use. And therefore we utterly dislike the Assertion of Mr. Hobbes, which we meet with in his Book De Cive ^f; If, says he, the People, e'er they departed from the Election of a temporary Monarch (that is, in his Notion, a Prince who receives the Government for Life) made a Decree to meet again at a certain Time and Place after his Death; then, so soon as he shall happen to decease, the Sovereignty returns in full to the People; not by any new Act of theirs, but by the Right which they before enjoy'd. For during that whole Interval, the supreme Dominion was in the People, as to the Property, and only as to the Use and Exercise in that temporary Monarch. This Notion, if taken in the gross Sense in which it is deliver'd, we cannot but look upon

^a Vide L. 50. t. 17. l. 126. f. 1. D. De divers. Reg. Jur. & ibi Jac. Godofred. & L. 9. t. 2. l. 33. D. ad. L. Aquil.

^b Philo. Jud. De Plantatione Noe, p. 224. C. Ed. Paris. The Painter reckons his Art, and every Mechanick the Mystery of his Calling a kind of Inheritance or Fortune to him; not as an Earthly Possession, but as a free Reward. For these Advantages, tho' they do not fall under Property, yet are highly beneficial to the Persons who enjoy them. ^c Metam. l. 3. v. 588.

Mr BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. XVI.

¹ See the next Chapter, f. 11. and B. 8. c. 5. f. 9. &c.

² 'Twas thus among the Jews, that the King chose which of his Sons he pleas'd, to be his Successor. See 1 Kin. i. 35. 2 Chron. xi. 20, 22. with Mr. Le Clerc's Notes thereupon. The reasons urged against Patrimonial Kingdoms by Franc. Hortomann. Quest. Illustr. 1. are answered by Grotius, l. 1. c. 3. f. 12.

^d Comp. L. 7. t. 1. l. 13 f. ult. f. 15. f. 1. D. De Usufuct. & L. 3. t. 33. l. 9. c.

^e 1. Grot. ubi supra, f. 13.

^f C. VII. f. 16.

as highly dangerous and prejudicial to all those limited Princes, who are ordain'd by the voluntary Donation of the People, and bound up to certain fundamental Laws. And the rather, because, since he hath taken the Liberty to call a King for Life a temporary Monarch, others may with as much reason extend the Name to those who receive the Sovereignty, with the Privilege of transmitting it by Inheritance, yet so as to keep it within their own Line and Family. Besides, since Mr. Hobbes hath not determin'd how far he would stretch the Parallel which he useth, he may easily be intangled in a Train of very pernicious Consequences. For since Property, consider'd in it self, is a much more noble Right, than that of temporary Use; some Men may, on these Principles, conclude that the People are superior to the Prince, and have a Power of bringing him to Correction, in case he doth not govern according to their Pleasure and Humour. On the like Score we ought to reject what the same Author lays down in his Leviathan, that Fleeting Kings have not the supreme Power; that They, who have the Privilege of appointing a Successor after the Death of the present King, do really hold the Sovereignty even in his Life time: since none have Right to give that which they have no Right to possess. For as to the Power of a Sovereign over his Subjects, it matters little what Provision is settled, or what Method agreed on, in Case of an Inter-regnum. And even when this Point is stated and determin'd by Law, the Subjects may nevertheless yield a most strict Obedience to the Prince, and be far from invading any part of the Sovereignty, or from thinking of a Successor, or of a new Form of Government, during the Life of their present Master. And then, besides, 'tis a very weak Consequence to say, that because an elective Prince cannot appoint a Successor at his pleasure, therefore he hath the Use only, and not the Property of the supreme Command, and is no more than the Minister of a Power which resides in others. For all the Power which, in this Case, continues in others, is, that upon the Decease of the Prince, the Liberty of consulting their own Security, and of governing their Actions by their own Judgment, shall return to them. But for the maintaining of this Power, 'tis by no means necessary so to break and divide the Sovereignty, as to say that the Property or real Possession resides in the People, and the Use only, or the Use, in the Prince. Since even in Case of an absolute Lord or Governor, when he is extinct, the Person who was under his Dominion falls again into the Liberty which Nature gave him, and the Force of which seems now to revive in him. Thus who for instance will pretend, that a Father hath only the Use of paternal Authority, because upon his Death the Children are at their own Disposal? Or that a Master hath only the Use of the despotal Power, because in case he die without Heirs, the Slave recovers his Liberty?

^a C. 19.

C H A P. VII.

Of the Ways of acquiring Sovereignty, especially monarchical.

- | | |
|--|--|
| I. The way of acquiring Sovereignty in democratical States is uniform. II. In Aristocracies and Monarchies various. III. How far Government may be serv'd on by just Force. IV. How far by unjust Force. V. How a Person may be releas'd from the Government of another. VI. Election, of how many kinds. VII. Inter-regnum, what. VIII. And Inter-reges. IX. Hobbes examin'd. | X. The Case of posthumous Issue in the hereditary Line. XI. Of Succession in a patrimonial Kingdom. XII. Of the same in the Kingdoms establish'd by the free Act of the People: And this either simply hereditary, XIII. Or lineal, XIV. Or transverse. XV. Of the Judge of Controversies arising in the Case of Succession. |
|--|--|

SINCE in examining how Sovereignty is acquired, it must regularly be supposed before hand, that the Person who acquires it, is different from those over whom he acquires it; 'tis manifest that the Question before us is but little concern'd with Democracies; under which those who command, and those who obey, are distinguish'd by a moral respect only, and not a physical. And though this Form of popular Government is sometimes set up, upon the Expulsion of a King, or of the ruling Members in an Aristocracy; yet since still the governing and the governed Parties are the same, 'tis absurd to say, that the People have obtain'd the chief Command by a violent Course; or that the People have, by such Force as properly belongs to Subjects, erected a Sovereignty over themselves. In Democracies therefore (contrary to what we see in Monarchies) the way of holding Sovereignty is ever one and the same. Yet these, as well as other States, sometimes owe their Increase and Improvement to the Force of Arms, tho' never properly their Original.

II. In Aristocracies there appears some Difference, with regard to the manner of obtaining the sovereign Power. Not only because, in some places, this Form of Government was introduced by the voluntary Act of the People, and in others by Violence; but likewise because, upon the Decease of any Member in these ruling Councils, the vacant Seat is fill'd up in some Places by Election; and in some again, Birth and Inheritance give a Title to the Honour. But in Monarchies, this Difference of Acquisition most visibly discloseth it self. For tho' all Princes in order to legal Establishment of their Authority have need of the People's Consent, yet this Consent is obtain'd several ways; and even when the Sovereignty is conferr'd by the free Motion and Grant of the People, there is still this Distinction, that some Princes are advanced to the Crown by Election, others by Succession.

III. The way of acquiring Sovereignty by Violence is usually term'd Occupatio, or Seisure: Which yet we must observe to be different from that by which we lay hold on things that want a Proprietor, and thus make them our own. For since, in things of this kind, there is no inherent Right, which might cause them to belong rather to one Man than to another (excepting the Determination of civil Laws) hence to obtain the Property of them, there is no need of a particular Title, but it is sufficient barely to lay our Hands upon them, with a Desire of possessing them. But since every Man is by Nature equal to every Man, and consequently not subject to the Dominion of others, therefore this bare seising by Force is not enough to found a lawful Sovereignty over Men, but must be attended with some other Title. When Grotius therefore tells us, That of Things which properly belong to no Body, two are capable of Seisure, Sovereignty and Property; we must not understand the word Sovereignty in the strict Sense, for such as is exercis'd over Men; but for a Sovereignty over Lands, the Effects and Virtue of which amounts to this, That no Person ought to fix in such a Lordship, or District of ours, against our Consent, or unless he will yield himself a Subject to us. For Men cannot be said to belong to no Body; he is his own Man, who is not another's. And on this account the same Author truly remarks, That in case a Person dies without Heirs, his Servants regain their Freedom, and his Subjects are left to their own Judgment and Disposal; inasmuch as neither of these fall under the Right of Seisure. But as for the Limitation which he adds, unless they voluntarily relinquish their Liberty; it might perhaps have been better omitted. For where can we find a Man, who will thus utterly wave and abdicate his Freedom? He may perhaps think it convenient always to be under some Master; but he will likewise claim it as his Privilege to choose one Service rather than another. Such Occupancy then is a proper Means for the obtaining of Sovereignty, as presupposeth a just Cause of the Invasion, and is confirm'd by the Consent of the Subject, and by subsequent Articles and Covenants. For without these mutual Ties the State of War continues; and there can be no Fidelity or Obligation, and therefore no true Authority or Command. On which Score Hornius ought to fall under Censure, when he asserts, That he who subdues another upon precedent Injuries and just Provocation, immediately obtains a lawful Dominion over the conquer'd Party, and needs not to wait for his Consent. For how is it possible to descend from the Condition of War to that of Peace, without some intervening Compact? Or how can Allegiance be due to him, who hath not purchas'd and receiv'd it by some certain Terms of Agreement? All the Advantage which the Conqueror in a just War gains in this respect is, that he lies under no Necessity of caressing those whom he hath subdu'd, and of winning their Consent by Flatteries or Intreaties, but may extort it by denouncing the severest Evils. And therefore Hornius's Argument comes to nothing, when he says, That if the Consent of the conquer'd were, in this Case, necessary, a lawful Conqueror could never gain Dominion by Occupancy: In as much as the Occupancy would be of no force, should this Consent of the conquer'd be withheld. For since such Occupancy supposeth the Victor to be superior in Strength to the vanquish'd, and therefore able to set before them any Pains or Punishments; it can't but have so much Effect, as to hinder them from withholding their Compliance. Because, as there is no Man who would not rather conquer than be conquer'd, so every wise Man, when he finds himself worsted, will be glad to come off as cheap as he can, and will by no means think himself prejudic'd, in yielding a Consent to the Victor's Sway, when without this he must have inevitably perish'd.

IV. But what shall we say in case the Dominion be seized by unjust Force? As to this Question, it is first acknowledg'd, on all Hands, that a popular State, or the Majority in such a State, may, for the avoiding any grievous Evil (whatever be the occasion which threatneth it) relinquish their present Liberty, and put themselves under the Command of a single Person, or of a select Coun-

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. II. and III.

¹ This manner of acquiring Sovereignty by the Right of Succession, takes place in Kingdoms originally establish'd by a forc'd Consent of the People, as will be shewn hereafter in the 11th Section.

² See above in B. 4. c. 6. the last Section.

³ 'Tis not only by this Act of Clemency which the Victor shews to the vanquish'd, that he obtains a lawful Dominion over them. The Title of his Sovereignty is farther grounded upon the Reason, that the vanquish'd (having undertaken a War against him) upon precedent Injuries, and a refusal to give him that just Satisfaction which was due to him, have expos'd themselves by so doing to the Fortune of Arms, and have tacitly consented beforehand to whatever Conditions the Victor should think fit to impose upon them. Our Author's Abrigment, De Offic. Hom. & Civis, l. 2. c. 10. f. 2.

a L. 2. c. 3. f. 4.

b Xenophon. Cyrop. l. 4. l. c. 9. Ed. H. Steph. Nothing is so much as our selves.

c L. 2. c. 9. f. 1.

d It was a wise Rule with the Incas of Peru, to advance the Empire by the slowest and most insensible Degrees, and rather to invite new Subjects by Clemency and Kindness, than to compel them by Arms and Violence. Vid. Garcil. de la Vega, Com. Reg. l. 2. c. 19.

e De Civitate, l. 2. c. 9. f. 2.

f Ibid.

cil

cil. And for the same reason, that a People subject to Kingly Government, may, to escape Destruction, and when their Prince can no longer assist or protect them, submit themselves to another. But all the stress of the Difficulty lies in this, that since Fear unjustly caus'd invalidates a Covenant, and since he, who by his injurious Proceedings hath endamaged another, is obliged to make Restitution, how such a Consent of the Subject, as is extorted by unjust Force, can confer the Sovereignty in so lawful a manner upon the Invader, as to give him Quiet of Conscience in the Possession. For what Hornius says¹ is meer trifling, That since the Sovereignty, which the Invader receiv'd by the Consent of the People, he did not take from the People, but was invested with it by GOD, therefore were it to be restor'd, it must be restor'd to GOD, not to the People. But we should rather conclude, that since the People, as Hornius himself allows, have the Power of appointing the Person in whom the Majesty should be infused by God; therefore it is sufficient, if the Oppressor restores this Power only to the People. For if the People do but recover the Privilege of marking out the Person who is to govern them by their own free Choice, they will not think themselves much concern'd, whether the Invader retains the pretended Majesty he hath seiz'd, or restores it to Heaven. Our Judgment on this Point is, that we ought first to consider, whether the forcible Invader hath turn'd a Democracy into a Monarchy, or whether he hath driven out a Monarch, and settled himself in his room. In the latter Case, the Obligation to Restitution doth not expire, till the expell'd Prince and his Heirs, who had a Right of succeeding, are all deceas'd; or till such an unfortunate Prince hath quite abdicated, or relinquish'd his Claim to the Kingdom: And this he is presumed to have done, as by other Inclinations, so if in a long course of time he hath made no Effort towards the recovering of his Crown. And in the mean time, even whilst the Invader's Title and Conscience are both unsettled, the Allegiance, promis'd by the Subjects to him, holds strong and binding; provided they did not give it, till they had done all that could be requir'd of them towards serving their old Master. As for the former Case, this seems the most probable way of determining it, to say, that since a Nation may live in all respects as happy under a Monarchy, as under a Democracy, 'twill be easy for them to digest the Loss of their popular Liberty, if their new Sovereign proves a good Governor. And we may presume, they are thus satisfied, when their quiet Deportment and long Use seems to have reconciled them to the Alteration. As for the few Murmurers and Malecontents which remain, they are not worthy to fall under regard: Since there will not want some of this uneasy Temper in every Form of Government, however freely and fairly constituted by the Community. But in case the Invader, after having made this Charge and Revolution in the State, should treat his Subjects in a wicked and injurious manner, we can scarce conceive, that they are by any intrinsecal Obligation engaged to obey him. We must therefore grant Hornius^b what he asserts without Proof, That it doth not belong to the Nature of Sovereignty, to consider what way it was obtain'd; inasmuch as at all times, and in all places it demands the same correspondent Obedience. For indeed, when a Person hath not only intruded into the Throne, by Force or Fraud, but likewise still grievously oppresseth the People, and seems to make open and arbitrary Violence the Standard of his Reign; this is a Guilt which seems incapable of being purg'd by any Course of years, tho' Time in other Cases be thought sufficient to found a Right of Prescription. For long Possession is here nothing else but a long continued Injury^c.

V. To these Enquiries another may be added, by what means and at what times a Community which hath thrown off monarchical Government, is confirm'd in its new Democratical Frame? In resolving which Doubt different Judgments must be given, according to the difference of the Cases that may arise. First, then, if a City or Country hath on any occasion whatsoever discarded the Sovereignty it once stood under, and set it self up for a free independent State, upon Supposition that it hath transacted the Affair in a friendly manner with its former Lord, and hath by him been acknowledg'd for a free Commonwealth, it immediately commeth such, with the fullest Right of Liberty, and need not wait for the tedious Confirmation of Prescription and Use. Secondly, if a Sovereign hath upon just Reasons been divested of his Power, the Liberty is presently valid so soon as it is actually asserted; nor is there any Necessity of its being either confirm'd by long Possession, or acknowledg'd for lawful by the former Lord; except so far as this last Circumstance may be a means of preventing all unjust Claims and quarrelsome Pretensions for the future^d. Thirdly, if the Constitution be alter'd by an unjust Rebellion, the Liberty thus usurp'd so long continues unlawful, as the rightful Prince shall labour to reduce the Rebels to Obedience, or at least by solemn Declaration shall protest and preserve his Right over them; till by long Acquiescence and Silence he may be presum'd to have given up his Claim. Fourthly, if it so happen that a City or Country, being in great Distress and Danger from an Enemy, shall in vain beg the Assistance of its Sovereign, who is unable to afford any Shelter or Support, so as to be put on its own Defence, and oblig'd to seek for Safety from its own Strength and Counsel; we are of Opinion that the Right of the said Sovereign doth expire, when for a considerable time the People have manag'd their own Affairs in a separate manner, and have no Intercourse, or Communication with their former Governour: Inasmuch as this manifestly argues a Dereliction or Desertion on the part of the Sovereign. For

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. IV.

¹ Ubi supra.

² Comp. Grot. l. 2. c. 4. s. 14. & l. 1. c. 4. f. 19.

³ Comp. Grot. l. 2. c. 4. f. 14. & l. 1.

^c 4. f. 19.

^a Vide Justin. l. 4. c. 2. n. 3. Ed. Grav.

^b De Civitate, l. 2. c. 9. f. 4.

^c Ibid. Justin. l. 3. c. 5

^d Vide Baudium de Inducis Belli Belgici, l. 3. p. 178.

tho'

tho' a King, or a Commonwealth should be forc'd by the most pressing Necessity, thus to abandon a City or a Country under their Dominion, to its own Care and Defence a; yet so soon as they recover out of that Necessity, they ought immediately to return to the Exercise of their former Sovereignty. Otherwise how can he pretend to be my Prince, who for a long time hath neglected every part of his Princely Office towards me, when 'twas in his power to have perform'd it b?

VI. The manner of acquiring Sovereignty by Election is, when a People already incorporated, or now about to incorporate, do, by their own free Choice and Judgment, design or nominate a certain Person for the supreme Command; who, upon receiving such a Decree of the People, or of their Representatives, together with the Promise of their Obedience, and having accepted the Offer, is thereby invested with the governing Power. Election is usually divided into free and limited. By the former any Person, without Exception, may be designed, who either is at present, or probably will be hereafter, in all natural respects fit for Empire. By the latter no Person can rightly be pitch'd upon who is not of such a Nation, or of such a Family, or endued with such a particular Qualification. But indeed, if we consider the Right of Electing, as it radically and fundamentally inheres in the People, every Election will appear to be in it self free. For tho' an Order may have been once made, excluding such a certain kind of Men from the Crown; yet nothing hinders but that this Order may be repeal'd and disannull'd. But if the People devolve their Right of electing on a few Deputies, they commonly tie them up to certain Laws, defining the Conditions and Requisites to be consider'd in those who are Candidates for the Sovereignty. In some Places the Government is conferr'd by a kind of Mixture of Election and Succession: When the Crown descends, in course, to the Sons of the deceas'd Prince, yet so as that the Consent of the People, or of the Nobles, shall first intervene. Which Consent is not a bare Ceremony, like that of Inauguration, or of doing Homage, but hath the Force and Virtue of a negative Vote. As supposing a People to have first conferr'd the Government on the Author and Founder of the present royal Family under this Condition, that he should transmit it to his Descendants, provided they appear'd fit to receive it: In such Kingdoms the People or the Nobles assemble on the Vacancy of the Throne, not properly to choose a new Prince, but only to declare that they find no Objection in the Son to hinder him from inheriting his Father's Crown.

VII. An Election may be made, either in a rising State, now about to be set up, or in one formerly erected and establish'd. In the former, after the original Compact between the Members thus uniting, after a Decree pass'd for the introducing of such a Form of Government; the Community or the deputed Representatives proceed to Election. Which being finish'd, and the Grant accepted, and a Covenant thereupon ratified between the Prince elect, and the People, there immediately commenceth a State perfectly monarchical. But, in a Kingdom already establish'd, it may happen that a Monarch deceaseth before his Successor is appointed; and then the Nation is said to suffer an Interregnum. Now what Frame a State falls into during such an Interval, may easily be apprehended, if we consider what those Bonds were which held it together, in its former more regular and perfect Condition. Since then the Intrinsic Perfection of the State, and the actual Existence of the sovereign Power, were both owing to the latter Compact between the Prince and People; it follows, that the Person in whom the Sovereignty properly resid'd being extinct, the Kingdom sinks into an imperfect Form, and is united only by the first antecedent Pact, by which we conceive the particular Members of the Community to have agreed to incorporate in one Society. Not but that this primitive Pact uniting the general Body, is during the time of an Interregnum considerably strengthen'd and assisted, by the Endearment of a common Country, and that kind of Relation or Affinity which results from thence: Together with this Consideration, that the Fortunes of most Men are fix'd and rooted in that particular Soil, and the Effects of others not easily to be transported or removed d. And this too is the reason why a Commonwealth, under an Interregnum, holds more firmly together than an Army (especially if compos'd of Mercenaries) when it hath lost its General: Inasmuch as the Persons, who compose the latter Body, are such as either have no proper Country, or else a Country at a Distance. But now the wealthy part of a Nation, to preserve and secure what they possess, will be ever most forward in maintaining a good Agreement, and most industrious in re-establishing and settling a Government.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTE on §. VII.

a See a Discourse of our Author's, De Inter-regnis, which is amongst his Academical Dissertations.

b Vide Liv. l. 3. c. 6. l. 23. c. 21.

c Vide Liv. l. 35. c. 16.

d See a Discourse of our Author's, de

Obligations erga patriam, which is in the same Work of his just now mention'd.

e Lysias contra Philon. Orat. 30. c. 2. p. 471. Those who are natural Subjects, but yet of such an Opinion, as to esteem any Country their own where they can promote their own Interest and Gain, must certainly neglect the common Good of the State, to serve their own private Advantage: Since 'tis not the Place where they were born, but the Fortunes and Riches they possess, which they look upon as their Country, and their dearest Concern. Livy, l. 2. c. 1. well observes, That Brurus would have done the Roman Commonwealth a bad Office, if through a too eager desire of Liberty, he had driven out one of the first Kings, before the Minds of that vast Multitude of People, which were gather'd together from all Parts, had been engaged and united by the dear Pledges of Wives and Children, and by a kind of natural Affection to the Soil where they had so long taken Root.

Antiphon, Orat. 16. Nor was it an easy thing for him to desert the City; his Children and his Wealth being sufficient Pledges for his Stay. Hence, as Plutarch remarks (in Mario, p. 401. A.) the Romans chose Men in their Army according to their Estates; these being Pledges and Securities for Fidelity, whilst they seem'd now to have pawn'd or staked all they were worth.

Tho'

Tho' we may, with Livy ^a, call a Nation, during an Interregnum, A State without Government, and as it were, an Army without a General; yet because Communities at their first uniting, before the Sovereignty hath been conferr'd, either on a single Man, or on a Council, seem to bear the Semblance of Democracies ¹; and farther, since it is natural that all Persons upon the Decease of him to whom they committed their Guidance and Safety, should take Care of themselves; therefore an Interregnum, regularly speaking, hath the Appearance of a kind of temporary Democracy: At least so far, as that the Consent of the whole People is to determine all Points, both in regard to the Administration of publick Affairs, and to the Creation of a new Prince; unless they are more inclin'd to introduce some other Frame and Constitution. And yet it is not properly a perfect Democracy; in as much as no Decree hath yet pass'd to fix the Sovereignty in a Council of the whole People, by perpetual Right; and because the Laws and publick Institutions are still adapted to monarchical Government. Tho' it may likewise happen, that when a Kingdom consists of very large integral Parts, as suppose of diverse Nations, Provinces, or great Cities, it shall, in case of an Interregnum, appear like some collective or systematical Form ².

Hence 'tis evident in what sense we are to expound that Assertion laid down by Grotius ^b and others, That when a King dies without a Successor, the Sovereignty returns to the People. That is, altho' during an Interregnum, the sovereign Authority may so far be said not to be properly in the People, as that they have not receiv'd it in a formal manner, or by a perpetual Decree; yet they may in the mean time, either by themselves, or their Delegates, exercise all those Acts of Sovereignty, which appear conducive to their Safety and Preservation. For those Authors are manifestly in an Error, who assert, that upon the Extinction of the royal Family, the Sovereignty doth not return to the People, but only the Power of designing and choosing a new King. As if, in the Case of an Interregnum, the People were necessarily obliged to constitute another Monarch! And as if they could not confer the ruling Power on a select Council, and so make an Aristocracy; or, establish the present Democracy, for a regular and standing Government!

VIII. But those States have consulted their own Peace in the safest manner, which to avoid the Inconveniences usually arising from an Interregnum, have ordain'd beforehand on what Persons the chief Administration shall fall, when there happens to be a Vacancy in the Throne. And these, by whatever Names or Titles they pass, whether of Interreges, Protectors, Regents, or the like, are temporary (or, as we may say, provisional) Magistrates, who, by the Authority of the whole People, are to perform during the present Exigency, the Acts of the supreme Power, at least such as are necessary to hold the Community together; yet so as to be accountable for their Management to the People; which account the new King doth, as in the Name of the People, demand. The Power of these Officers, upon the Election of another Prince, or the setting up another Form of Government, presently expires.

In those Kingdoms where there are constant and perpetual Senates, yet such as in the Lifetime of the Prince do not hold the sovereign Authority; upon the Prince's Death, the Senate cannot, by any proper Right, claim that Authority which before they wanted. Yet 'tis most convenient, that in case of an Interregnum, the chief Administration of Affairs shall for that time be delegated to them; as they were before employ'd by the King to assist him in his Counsels and his Cares. But then the Power which they exercise on this Occasion, shall be supposed to be conferr'd on them by the Grant of the whole People. For whatever Authority they receiv'd from the King, as a Body of Magistrates, expires upon his dying without a Successor ^c; and if they are allow'd to proceed in the Exercise of their former Function, the Privilege is not owing to the Commission of the Prince, but to the Favour of the People ^d. And therefore they can hold their Power no longer than the Community pleaseth; much less can they challenge a perpetual Sovereignty, or, by their own Authority, erect themselves into an Aristocratical Body, or a select governing Council. For 'tis the Prerogative of the Community, to establish what Frame of Government they think fit; unless they have, by Oath, obliged themselves to avoid some particular Constitution. Dionysius Halicarnassens ^e reports, that when the frequent Changes of the Interreges displeas'd the Romans, who seem'd thus to have brought a hundred Kings upon themselves by getting rid of one, the Senate referr'd it to the Judgment of the People to put the Commonwealth into the hands, either of Kings, or of annual Magistrates; as should suit best with their Inclinations. Tho' indeed we find the People returning the Complement, and leaving this Option to the Senate ^f.

IX. To give farther Light to this Enquiry, it may be worth our while to examine the Case which Mr. Hobbes ^g puts, and the Issue of his Opinion upon it. If, says he, the People assembled deliver the Sovereignty to one particular Man to hold, only during Life; and when they have so done, depart, without ordering any thing about the Place where they shall meet to make a new Election after his Death; they will be no longer one compound Person, but a loose independent Multitude: In which it shall be

^a L. 1. c. 17.

^b L. 1. c. 3. f. 7. Numb. 2.

^c Vite Connoctag. de Unione Lusitan. l. 3. p. 116.

^d Ad. Bodin. de Republ. l. 3. c. 2. p. 217

^e Vide l. 2. & Liv. l. 1. c. 17.

^f See the History of the Interregnum in Poland, upon the Death of King Stefismund in Paul. Piafec. ad Ann. Christi, 1632.

^g De Civ. c. 7. f. 17, 16.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. VIII.

¹ See above in Ch. c. S. 6.

² Upon this see above in Chap. c. S. 16. See also a Discourse of our Author's De Systematibus Civitatum, which is amongst his Academical Dissertations.

lawful for any Man to meet and consult with any others, at any Time, and at any Place. Whence he concludes, that such a Monarch is, by the Law of Gratitude, obliged to take Care that the State be not dissolv'd upon his Decease; either by fixing a certain Time and Place, when and where as many of the People, as think fit, may meet and form an Assembly; or else by nominating a Successor; according as the Interest of the Commonwealth, shall seem to require. Now here Mr. Hobbes is in a Mistake, whilst he thinks, 'That the People, by departing from one Assembly, without appointing the Time and Place for another, do disband and separate into a disorderly Multitude; applying it, as he doth, to those who, in choosing a King, have establish'd themselves into a regular and perfect State; and not to those who have it still under Doubt and Consultation, what State or political System they shall introduce. For when a Multitude come together on the last account, and depart without agreeing to meet again, 'tis plain they are dissolv'd re infecta, and consequently remain in the same divided independent Condition, in which they were before. But they, who have once incorporated themselves into a regular Commonwealth, and have subjected themselves to a King, have fix'd all their Fortunes in this Seat, and cannot be presum'd guilty of such a Folly as to desire, that, upon the King's Decease, the State shall likewise be extinct, and themselves thrown into the natural Condition of Anarchy, not without manifest Danger of losing the Security, which they enjoy under the present Establishment. Therefore, if they have not conferr'd the Sovereignty on the Prince, with the Right of Inheritance, or with a Power to dispose of the Succession as he shall think fit, they must be supposed, at least, to have tacitly agreed, that immediately upon the Prince's Death they will hold an Assembly, either at the usual Place, or where the Prince kept his Court. Nor will there be wanting, in a whole People, some Persons of great Authority and Worth, whose Influence will be able to keep the Multitude in good order, and to bring them as soon as possible to a general Consultation, for settling the Commonwealth. Hence too it is evident, how far we are to admit of another Assertion of Mr. Hobbes ^a, that When a Monarch renounces and abdicates the Government for himself and Heirs, the Subjects return to their absolute and natural Liberty. For it can never be true in this Sense, that the People, on such an Occasion, relapse into a confused Multitude, without any Tye or Relation to each other; but only that they receive an absolute Right of lifting and disposing themselves anew, under any Frame and Constitution.

X. In hereditary Realms there ariseth some Semblance of an Interregnum, when the King dies leaving his Queen with Child, or, at least under probable Hopes of Breeding. Now by the Consent of most Nations, a Right may be transferr'd even on un-born Heirs, so as to give them the just Title and Property, tho' as yet incapable of the Use or Exercise. But now, whereas there is a proper Subject, in which the supreme Authority resides, there cannot be really an Interregnum. On which account neither the Minority, nor the Captivity of Princes create an Interregnum in the strict Sense of the Word. Yet as to the latter Case it hath been a frequent Practice in the World, for the Relations of a captive Prince to hold him for dead, and to proceed accordingly; whereas they ought rather to administer the Government in his Name, 'till he shall return from his Imprisonment, or die under it. Now altho', before the royal Issue be brought into the World, it cannot certainly be known whether the Child will prove alive or dead, a Son or a Daughter (in Nations where the fair Sex is excluded from the Crown) yet till this Point is clearly determin'd by time, the People can by no means challenge such a Right, as they obtain in a proper Interregnum; but the Kingdom must, in the mean while, be govern'd in the same Method as is wont to be observ'd, during the Minority of a Prince ^d.

XI. By the way of Succession or Inheritance, the sovereign Right which one Person hath obtain'd or receiv'd, is continued to his Posterity. This Succession ¹ is appointed, either at the Pleasure of the Prince, or at the Pleasure of the People ². Those Princes who possess their Realms after the manner of Patrimonies, have a Right to dispose of the Succession, according to their own Inclinations; and when they have once declared their Pleasure in this Point, it ought no less strictly to be observ'd, than the last Will of any Testator. And in this Case a King may divide his Dominions amongst his Children by equal Portions, and without regarding the Difference of the Sex. Or if his legitimate Issue fail, he may transmit the Crown to his na-

^a Leviath. c. 21.

^b Hence the Perkins, when their Prince Hirnisias died, leaving his Queen with Child, proclaim'd the unborn King, and crown'd him too, by fixing the Diadem on the Royal Burthen: Nay, they voted the Infant a particular Name, firmly believing it would be a Son. And this proved the great Sapores, so renown'd in Story Archib. l. 4. c. 10. ^c Vide Justin l. 36. c. 1. Trebell. Pol. in Gallien. c. 1. We have a Story to this purpose in Dion Cassius, l. 36. Tyrannes, the Armenian Prince, had vast Treasures, laid up in the fortified Places of Sophene. When Pompey demanded all his Wealth to be deliver'd up to him, by those who had it in Charge. their Answer was, That they would do nothing without express Orders from their Master. And when Tyrannes, though against his Will, commanded them to open the Castles, they still refused to comply, urging that the King laid this Injunction on them, not voluntarily, but through Compulsion. Yet they afterwards were oblig'd to deliver all up, when they found their Prince was severely used, and thrown into Chains upon their Refusal. Demetrius, being made a Prisoner by Seleucus, commanded his Son, with his Captains and Friends that were at Athens and Corinth, not to believe his own Writing or Seal, when they should be shewn to them; but to keep for Antigonus his Towns, and the Remains of his Kingdom, as if he were actually dead. Plutarch. in Demet. p. 914. D.

^d Vide Serran, Hist. Gall. in Philipp. Valef. ab init.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. XI.

¹ Vide Grot. l. 2. c. 7. s. 12, 13. ² See Mr. Bede's Dissertation de Successione Primogenitorum, Sect. 22. &c. and also that D. Testamentis summorum Imperantium, & speciatim Caroli. II. de Hispan. Reg. c. 1. f. 21, &c. see likewise Sidney upon Government, C. 3. s. 18. and Tom. V. of the Reponse aux Questions d'un Provincial by Mr. Bayle, p. 138, &c.

tural ^a, or to his adopted Son; nay, if he thinks fit, to one no way related to his Family ^b. But when such a Monarch hath made no Provision about the Succession, it must then be consider'd, what Person the common Course and Order of Nature calls to inherit the Throne. For though the Prince, in his Life-time, did neither by Testament, nor any other way, signify his Resolution in this Affair; yet we must presume, that he did by no means desire the State should upon his Decease fall into Anarchy; common Humanity not suffering him to leave his Subjects in a Condition of Misery and Ruin. Especially since, if he purposely declin'd to make a future Settlement, it had been easy for him to have given the People Notice; so that, upon this Intimation they might have agreed on some Expedient for their own Security. Besides, we ought in Reason to suppose, that Princes, as well as other Persons, are unwilling that the Rights or the Possessions, which they have acquired, should at their Decease, either be imbezeld, or left as it were to the first Taker; but that they would have them devolve entire to their dearest Friends. Therefore when such an Omission happens in patrimonial Kingdoms, the same Order is to be observ'd as in private Inheritances; except so far as the Disposition and Safety of the Nation made it advisable to recede from that Method. For although 'tis very likely, that a Father bears an equal Affection towards all his Children; yet if he be wise, he will so far moderate and restrain it, as not to weaken the hereditary Estate, on which the Security and Honour of a Family in a great measure depend: and he shall be presumed to have taken this Resolution, if he hath not expressly declar'd any thing to the contrary. From these Considerations it follows, that such a Prince as we are now speaking of, is desirous to have the monarchical Frame of Government preserv'd after his Death; in as much as he shew'd his Approbation of it by his own Example, and did not afterwards reverse, or alter it, by his Word or Deed. And farther, since Men are naturally inclin'd to wish best to those, from whose Success some Honour and Glory is reflected on themselves, rather than on others; and since the Power of Children casts the brightest Glory on Parents after their Decease; it must be concluded, that a Father is more heartily concern'd for the Happiness and Greatness of his own Issue, than of Strangers. If he had any other Design, he ought in express manner to have declared it: since, commonly speaking, we do not suppose a Man to have been so little Master of his Wits, as to deprive his Children of so fair an Advantage, and to leave it, as it were, on purpose to create Quarrels and Disputes. But Mr. Hobbes is in the wrong, when, amongst the Tokens which a reigning Prince may give of his Resolution not to transmit the Crown to his Family, he reckons

^c for one, long Custom, ^d In as much as he who says nothing about his Succession, is supposed to consent to the ordinary Custom of the Kingdom; which Custom, whether it derives its Original from the primitive Founder of the Race, or from any of his Posterity, hath in time pass'd into the Force and Authority of a fundamental Law. But the Enquiry which we are now upon is, What Order is to be observ'd in the Succession, when it is neither determin'd by the Appointment of the last Prince, nor by the Law or Custom of the Nation? To proceed then, our silent Monarch must be presumed to desire, not only that the Kingdom shall preserve its regular Frame, that is, that the Sovereignty shall not be divided into Shares amongst his Sons, or near Relations, nor yet held in Common by them all, with equal Power; but likewise that the State shall not be parted into distinct Governments, and many Kingdoms introduced instead of one: In as much as either of these Alterations would draw after it, not only the exceeding great Hazard and Detriment of the Realm, but also the utter Convulsion of the royal Family. The next thing which, in this Case, must be presumed to have been the Will of the Monarch, is, that notwithstanding the Prerogative of Age, his Sons should be preferr'd before his Daughters; because Men are, for the most part much fitter to command, and the Government of Women is generally attended with a long Train of Inconveniences, which must needs be increas'd, if the Brothers are to be set aside to make room for a female Sovereign. Another thing to be taken for granted on these Occasions must be, that amongst Children of the same Sex, the eldest is to be advanced rather than any of the rest: and this not only, because he is judg'd to excel the younger in Wisdom, as well as in Years, but because, if we consider them with Relation to the Father, all Brothers are equal: And were the Crown to be bestow'd on the most worthy of them, they could not avoid falling into irreconcilable Differences and Contentions. A famous Instance of which Truth we have in the Revolutions, that not long since happen'd in the Empire of the Mogul, described at large by Monsieur Bernier. To prevent therefore all such Confusions, it is the best and safest Method to follow the Order of Birth, which is embraced by the universal Agreement of all Nations, as a Rule which Nature her self seems to have prescribed. Yet here it will be necessary, that the eldest Son, who is thus preferr'd to the Crown, take effectual Care for the honourable Subsistence and Support of his younger Brothers. But that he should be obliged to make their Fortunes as large, as if the Kingdom were to have been divided into equal Shares, is both needless and indeed impossible. For let us suppose four Brothers; whence can the elder, who is to fill the Throne, procure so much

^a Thus Alphonfus, King of Aragon, gave the Kingdom of Naples, which he had conquer'd, to his base Son Ferdinand: whereas others pretended, that it ought to have been united to Aragon, by the Arms and Wealth of which Nation it had been subdued. Galactophil.

^b Act. Justin. l. 41. c. 5. n. 10. where Phraates leaves the Parthian Empire to his Brother Mithridates, all his own Children being excluded.

^c De Civ. c. 9. f. 15.

^d Add. Xenophon Crop. l. 8. p. 139. Ed. H. Steph. in Cyrus's last Speech.

Treasure to pay the Portions of the rest, as shall be equal in Value to three Parts of the Realm: ¶ In Monarchies of this kind, the Prince dies without Issue, his Brothers or Sisters are to succeed; and upon Failure of these, the next in Blood to the deceas'd King; with due regard still to the Prerogative of Sex, and of Age. Nay the Government may, at length, devolve to those who were actually related to the last Possessor, tho' of a different Blood from the Author of the regal Line. And this, not only, if the deceas'd Prince thus declared his Will, but if, by the Custom of the Country, the same Method of Succession obtains in private Inheritances: for then, we must suppose, that the Prince would have the Custom hold in regard to his own Patrimony; as well as to those of others, when he hath made no express Disposal to the contrary.

Mr. Hilles seems to have carried this Point a little too far, when he tells us c, By the same way as the Sovereignty descends, the Right of Succession likewise descends: For in case the eldest Son dies before his Father, he shall be supposed, unless the Father hath made any other Settlement, to transmit the Right of Succession to his own Children; and therefore the Nephews and Nieces shall sooner come into the Succession, than their Uncles by the Mothers (he means by the Fathers) side. It cannot indeed but be acknowledg'd, that this Right of the Children to represent their Father and come into his place, looks very fair and equitable d; and that his untimely Death should not be the Cause of a new Loss and Prejudice to them, seems to be but a reasonable Favour. And yet, since the Son, during the Father's Life, hath not a full Right to the Inheritance, but only a just Hope and Expectation; and since it doth not appear, that this bare Hope can be so well transmitted to Children, as the Right it self might be; we may with more probability conclude, that by the meer Right of Nature the Nephews have not the Precedency of their Uncles; unless their Title is strengthen'd and supported by the Laws or Customs of the Kingdom e.

XII. But in Kingdoms which were first constituted by the voluntary Act of the People, the Order of the Succession doth likewise originally depend on the Peoples Will. And if they expressly confer on the Prince, not only the Sovereignty, but likewise the Right of nominating his Successor (which is seldom done, unless upon a very extraordinary account) then he shall leave his Crown to whom he pleaseth. But, if the People themselves settled the Succession, they either were willing to have it pass in the usual way of other Inheritances, so far as that Method can conveniently be applied to Kingdoms; or else they appointed a particular Course, by which it should be regulated and determin'd. Now the Safety of the State requires, that the Succession of a Kingdom, simply Hereditary (or where it is barely appointed that the Crown shall pass from each Prince to the next of his Kin) should vary from the Order and Method of private Inheritances; chiefly in the following respects. First, That the Kingdom shall not be divided amongst several Brothers, or other Joint-heirs g, equally distant in Blood from the deceas'd Prince. In as much as this Prohibition is highly conducive to the Agreement of the Subjects, and to the Support of the Nation and Government. Secondly, That the Succession shall stop at those Persons who are descended directly from the Monarch; and not pass to the collateral Line, much less to the Degrees of Affinity h. For the People, by their primitive Grant, design'd only to confer the Kingdom on such a Person and his Posterity; upon Failure of which they again recover the Right of settling the Commonwealth, as they judge convenient. Thirdly, That no Person shall be capable of succeeding, but such as are born according to the Laws of the Country. By which Caution are excluded natural or base Sons, however they stand in the Father's Affection, who may perhaps equal them to his legitimate Issue. For in those Nations at least, which have any Honour or Spirit, such Men must lie open to Contempt, whose Mothers were not thought worthy of legal Matrimony, and were used rather for occasional Instruments of Pleasure, than for agreeable Companions of Life. Besides, since the Ladies of that Profession are seldom famous for Constancy and Fidelity, and since they want the Advantage of a fix'd Cohabitation, it cannot so very certainly be known, whether the Prince be really the Father of this unworthy Progeny, which they charge upon him. But now 'tis highly expedient, that the Person of a King should be awful and venerable, and as little as possible exposed to Controversy and Doubt i. For which reason, 'tis the Custom in some Nations for the Queen to be delivered in an open Chamber, to take off all Suspicion of a supposititious Birth. And we read that Queen Constance, Mother of Ferdinand the Second, was brought to Bed of him, when she was past Fifty Years old, in a Pavilion erected in a most publick Part of the City, before a large Assembly of the Nobility of both Sexes k. Adopted Sons come like-a Ald. Bacler ad Grot. l. 2. c. 7. s. 13.

b V. Grot. l. 2. c. 7. f. 11. n. 2.

c D. Civ. c. 9. f. 19.

d See above in B. 4. c. 11. f. 12.

e Ald. Bodin. de Repub. l. 6. c. 5. p. 143. &c.

f V. Grot. d. l. f. 14. &c.

g This is a Remark which the Historian Justin attributes to the Soldiers of Dionysius, Tyrant of Sicily, who after the Death of that Prince, advanced to the Throne Dionysius his Eldest Son. Extincto in Sicilia Dionysio Tyranno, in locum ejus Milites maximum numerum ex filiis ejus, nomine Dionysium succedere; & natura jus scuti, & quod firmius futurum esset, regnum, si penes unum remansisset, quam si partionibus inter plures filios divideretur, arbitrabantur. Justin. Lib. XXI. Cap. 1.

h Ald. Bacler ad Grot. l. 2. c. 7. f. 15.

i See a famous Instance of this in Martinus's History of China, l. 6. c. 1. p. 202.

When Perseus and Demetrius disputed which should succeed Phillip, it was urged on behalf of the latter, that although he was the younger of the two, yet he was born in honest Wedlock, whereas Perseus's Mother was only a Mistress of the King's: and that, for Evidence of this Distinction, Perseus had no Mark of Phillip in his Body, whilst Demetrius exactly resembled his Royal Father, Livy, l. 59. c. 53. Add the Story of Ferdinand King of Neapl. in Paul. Jov. Hist. Neapol. l. 2.

k Pandulf Collet. Rer. Neapol. l. 4.

wife under this Rule or Exclusion; as well because to be descended from the true regal Line makes a Prince more respected, and fills the Subjects with better Hopes, that he will resemble his great Ancestors, no less in Virtue than in Blood; as because the People originally conferred the Crown on the immediate Race of the first Possessor; designing, when that should prove extinct, to resume the Power of settling the Government for the future. But allowing Adoption to give a Right to the Kingdom, this Power of theirs might be for ever forestall'd and eluded. Fourthly, That in the same Degree of Kindred, whether amongst the Children or the Grandchildren of the last Monarch, the Males shall be preferr'd to the Females, tho' the latter happen to be their Superiors in Age ^a. Fifthly, That in the same Degree, and the same Sex, the Advantage shall be given to the Elder ^b. Lastly, The Succession of such Realms differs from the Course of vulgar Inheritances in this, that altho' they are deliver'd, as it were, from hand to hand, and do not devolve to a new Possessor, 'till the Death of the former; yet of these Persons, the one is the Occasion only, and not the proper Cause of transmitting them to the other; whereas common Inheritances pass to a new Proprietor by the Right, and Will, and the Favour of the last. For 'tis not the Pleasure of the Prince, under these Governments, which bestows the Crown on the next Wearer; but it descends in the royal Line, by virtue of the original Act and Constitution of the People. And for the same reason it is not necessary, that the Prince who succeeds, though the nearest in Blood, should take upon himself the private Affairs, Incumbrances, and Debts of the deceas'd. But, if he thinks fit, he may take Possession of the Kingdom, and refuse the Inheritance of the private Patrimony ^c, to which that nobler Right of the Crown is by no means inseparably united; but is of it self an entire, distinct, and transcendental Inheritance. For the People must be supposed willing to have the Crown descend by a clear and unquestion'd Title; but as for the peculiar Estate and Fortune of the Prince, they are not in the least concern'd or affected with it. Besides, it might prove a Burthen to the Nation, were the royal Heir, at his Entrance on the Government, obliged to discharge such Debts as his Predecessor personally contracted; since in Case the private Patrimony would not hold out, the Deficiency must be supplied by the publick Stock. To conclude, the chief Reasons which move any

People to establish such an Order of Succession; as we have been all along describing, seem to be these: That the Throne may be fill'd without any Controversy or Doubt; and the Inconveniences of new Elections avoided: that the Splendor of the Prince's Birth may increase his Respect, and his Race and Education give the Promise of more illustrious Virtue; and that the reigning Monarch may still govern the Kingdom with more Vigilance, and defend it with more Courage, whilst he is to deliver it down to those Persons, who on the Score of natural Affection, are the dearest to him in the World ^c.

XIII. But since, in this way of Succession, which we call simply hereditary, it may easily happen amongst Persons, far remov'd from the Author of the Race, that it shall not be clearly known which of the many ought to be preferr'd, if the Crown fell thus absolutely to him who was next in Blood to the deceas'd Prince; especially since the Favour of Representation (or of letting the Children represent their Parents in Right) quite vanisheth in these distant Degrees: to prevent any such Controversy, many Nations have introduced a more accurate Succession, which they term lineal ^d. Now according to this, all the Descendants of the royal Founder are conceiv'd to form a Number of perpendicular Lines, each of which approacheth nearer to the Throne, according as the Persons, in the same Degree, stand possess'd of those natural Advantages, the Prerogatives of Sex and of Years. And the Kingdom shall not pass into another Line, till the former is quite exhausted and extinct. It is needless therefore for persons in this List of Succession, to shew in what Degree they are related to the last Possessor, or to appeal to the Right of Representation; but according as they are born, the Law gives them a perfect Right of inheriting, in their proper Order: which Right, tho' they should happen themselves not to wear the Crown, they transmit in the same Order to their Children. Here then the first regard is to be paid to the Children of the deceas'd Prince, and not to the living only, but to the dead, in case they have left Issue in any Degree whatsoever; for such Issue shall exclude all others, if their Parents were the nearest lineal Heirs: yet so as still to allow, in the same Degree of the same Line, a due Preference first to the Advantage of Sex, and then to that of Age. (For that the bare Prerogative of Age should out-weigh and overrule the Prerogative of Sex, can perhaps be instanc'd in no Example of History.) If ^a Alf. Bæcler ad. J. I. Grot. s. 17.

^b Thus Perseus urgeth against his Younger Brother Demetrius, Competitor with him for the Crown. ^c That he endeavour'd to invert the Order of Age, of Nature, of the Customs of Macedon, and of the Laws of Nations. Livy. l. 42. c. 11.

^c The Perseus had a very extraordinary Custom.

by which One ey'd Persons, and those who labour'd under any other Corporal Blemish were excluded from the Crown. Procop. de B. Pers. l. 1. c. 11.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES ON §. XII, and XIII.

^d This is Grotius's Opinion, Lib. II. Cap. VII. Sect. 19. Grotius in his Note upon this place finds fault with his incomparable Author, but without the least appearance of Reason. Grotius is speaking only of what a Prince has borrowed, or owes upon any other Account whatsoever, not as Head of the State, but as a private Person; so that his own private Patrimony which he possesseth independent of the Crown-Lands, are as it were mortgaged for the Payments of such Debts and Incumbrances. Whereas all Grotius's Reasons only prove, that a Successor is obliged to discharge all Debts and Incumbrances that were contracted by his Predecessor as Head and Governour of the People, and for the Occasions of the State, as could easily be proved, if the Thing were not evident to any one who with never so little care will examine that Note. Now this is what Grotius does not deny: On the contrary he confirms it himself sufficiently at large in Chapter XIV. of the same Book, Sect. 11, 12. See what our Author says after him, Book VIII. Chap. X. Sect. 8.

^e See Grot. B. 2. c. 7. l. 22, 23.

the last Possessor dyed childless, the account passeth back to the next Line above him, and so on; still ascending from the deceas'd; and not descending from the first Progeni: or: with the same Allowance as before to the two Prerogatives of Nature.

The two Species of lineal Succession, commonly assign'd, are what they term cognatical, and agnatical: The former kind which, on account of its being receiv'd in the Kingdom of Castile, goes likewise by the Name of Castilian, hath its Peculiarity in it, that in the same Degree of the same Line, the younger Males are preferr'd to the elder Females; yet so as that no Transition is made from one Line to another on the bare Obstacle of Sex. Thus it doth not exclude the Women, but postpones them to the Men; and runs back to the Female again, in case the Males, who were superior or equal to them in other respects, shall happen to fail together with their Issue. By Consequence therefore, a Granddaughter by a Son comes before a Grandson by a Daughter, a Niece by a Brother before a Nephew by a Sister. The other kind of lineal Succession, or the agnatical, differs from this, in that it excludes from the Crown, the Females and their Descendants for ever. A Custom which seems chiefly to have been taken up, to hinder the Kingdom from passing by Marriage to Strangers; and to maintain the antient Stock in its due Veneration, which might be in danger of growing weak and despicable, by suffering so many foreign Grasse. This is commonly known by the Name of French Succession, having long obtained in that Nation. In some places the agnatical Method is temper'd with this Reserve, that in case all the Male Line fails, the Right returns to the Females ^a.

We may remark in general of lineal Succession, that since 'tis so very plain and easy, it might be a principal means of deciding Controversies in Kingdoms, to enquire first of all, what kind of Succession hath been there by Custom establish'd. A remarkable Instance of this the History of the last Age presents us with in the Dispute about the Succession to the Crown of Portugal; when Raimundus of Parma stood on the Right of lineal, the other Competitors on the Right of simple Inheritance ^b.

XIV. Another Method of Succession ² may be introduc'd, by Virtue of which he shall always stand nearest to the Crown, who is nearest to the Founder of the royal Family. Thus then the

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. XIV, and XV.

¹ These Names come from the Words Cognati and Agnati, the former whereof signifies the Kindred by the Mother's side; the latter, the Kindred by the Father's side. The latter only inherit the Crown by an Agnatical Succession, but one or other may obtain it by a Cognatical Succession.

² The best way is to refer it to an Arbitrator that is of the same Royal Family. De Offic. Hom. & Civ. l. 2. c. 10. §. 12.
³ If then the King or People, find that either of the Competitors refuses to make use of such amicable Methods of deciding Controversies, as are practis'd by Persons living in a State of natural Liberty, and that he endeavours to involve the Commonwealth in Civil Wars, only to gratify his own Ambition; they may certainly bring him to reasonable Terms by forcible means, tho' the Determination be not in the way of Judicial Sentence. If Gronovius had minded that, he would not have thrown away so many Words in censuring his incomparable Author, on whom he puts a wrong Construction in his Note upon Lib. II. Cap. VII. Sect. 27. for I doubt not but that Gravius suppos'd what I have just now said. I likewise find that Mr. Hertius takes Notice pretty near of the same Thing in his Notes, which were publish'd almost at the same time of the first Edition of mine.

^a Vide Guicciardin. l. 12. p. 367.

^b Vide Connettag. de Unione Lusitan. l. 3.

^c L. 29. c. 29.

^d Jodoc. Schouten in Descript. Regn. Siam

^e Thuanus l. 65. ad Ann. 1578. & Connettag. de Unione Lusitan. l. 1.

the last of which Authors seems to hint, that this proceeded from a particular Compact between the Brothers.

^f Garcilass. de la Vega, l. 4. c. 10.

^g Petrus de Valle, Itin. Par. III. Epist. 6. & Hieron.

^h Oforius, in several Places of his Work.

ⁱ Franc. Lopez de Gomora, Hist. Ind. Occidental. c. 28.

^j Id. m. c. 12.

^k Franc. Creuxius Hist. Canad. l. 1.

^l L. 15. p. 528. Ed. Genev. Casub. ^m L. 2: c. 7. §. 2.

Founder's Sons are the first in the List, according to their Age; next to them his Nephews, with regard still to their Father's Age, and to their own: upon Failure of all these, the Founder's Grandsons come in, then his Grand Nephews, and so on. This was the Course observ'd of old in Namidia, as we may gather from Livy c. The like is practis'd in the Kingdom of Siam ^d; and hath been in Fes and Morocco ^e: as it was heretofore amongst the Chittas, or petty Kings in Peru, under the Empire of the Incas ^f. Thus in many Parts of the East Indies, especially on the Coasts of Malabar, 'tis the Custom for the Father to be succeeded not by his own Son, but his Sister's Son: the People fancying themselves to have more evident Proof, that the latter is of the royal Blood ^g. In Hypaniola, the Nephews by the Sister are admitted for the same Reason; tho' not till the direct Line fails ^h. And amongst other Indian Nations, in that Neighbourhood, even in private Inheritances, the present Possessor prefers his Sister's Children to his own; excepting the Family of the Incas, where the Son constantly succeeds the Father ⁱ. The same Rule is follow'd in Camida, with regard to Honours as well as to Estates ^k. Strabo ^l reports a very strange way of Succession amongst the Chabramotite, a People of Arabia. The Crown passeth, says he, from the present Possessor, not to his Son, but to the first Nobleman that was born in his Reign. For as soon as every new Monarch is settled in the Government, a List is taken of all the Wives of the Nobility, who appear to be with Child; and Keepers are set over them to observe which Lady is first brought to Bed of a Son: and the Child which thus gets the start is declared lawful Heir, and educated in a royal Manner against the next Vacancy in the Throne.

XV. 'Tis a Question usually canvass'd, who shall be judge of the Controversy between two or more Competitors for a Crown; especially if the Kingdom be not patrimonial ³? For to try out an uncertain Title by the Sword, is a manifest Breach of the Law of Nature. Here then it is evident, in the first place, that Disputes of this kind cannot possibly be determin'd in the way of Jurisdiction, or proper Sovereignty; and that therefore they must be left to that Method of Decision, which holds amongst Persons living in a State of natural Liberty, in subjection to no judicial Authority ⁴. In which Sense we ought to understand what Grotius ^m hath deliver'd on this Point. Now those are said to live in a State of Nature, who are neither subject one to the other, nor both to a common Lord. And tho' the Parties themselves may perhaps, whilst they are contending, acknowledge a Sovereign; yet the Cause is of such a Nature, as not to bear the Sentence of any Person under the Notion of a superior. First, a Foreigner cannot pretend to interpose as a Judge. Nor, Secondly, is the King himself, if the Controversy happen'd to be started in his Life-time, a sufficient Arbitrator; in as much as the People, in these Monarchies which we now speak of, are not supposed to have left the Method of Succession to the Pleasure of the Prince. Not but that we have many Examples in History of Kings, who relying on their own Authority and Worth, have assumed greater Power in this respect, than the Constitution of free Kingdoms would otherwise allow. Thus Darius in Herodotus, decides the Quarrel between his own Sons: And in Polymnia, Artaxerxes and Cyrus submit to their Father's Determination. And lastly, it may be maintain'd, that neither the People themselves can have such a Competition in an authoritative manner. Yet not for the Reason assign'd by Grotius, because the People have transferr'd all their Jurisdiction to the King and royal Family, and therefore can claim no Reliques of it for themselves, whilst any of that Line survive. For Succession in such a Case doth not belong to that Jurisdiction, which the People conferr'd on the King: And if a Quarrel of this kind should arise during an Interregnum, the People cannot be debarr'd, at least, from a temporary Jurisdiction. But the true Reason must be drawn from the Nature of these Disputes. For the Effect of judicial Power, as exercis'd over Subjects, is, that they shall be obliged to acquiesce in the Sentence given, and upon Refusal, shall by virtue of the sovereign Authority be compell'd to submit. And this, because 'tis one part of civil Subjection, to expect from their Superior the Decision of any Controversy that may happen between them and their Fellows. But now, if we run over all the various Doubts which may be rais'd on the Point of Succession, we shall find that not one of them is capable of being solv'd by the People, in the same commanding manner, as the Causes of private Persons are ended by the Ordinary Judge. For suppose a Prince already settled in the Throne, with the Approbation of the People, should have a Claim put in against him by another of the royal Family who pretends to be the nearer Heir: In this Case, the People having acknowledged the Prince in Possession, it cannot be imagin'd, that the new Claimant will appear, or stand to their Verdict. Nor, on the other side, will the Possessor of the Throne submit to be judg'd by those who have already own'd him for their Sovereign. Much less have the People a sufficient Power to give Judgment, when they refuse to own the Person who puts in his Pretensions. But if, upon a Vacancy in the Throne, two Competitors offer themselves, and engage in a Dispute about their Title, and the People only stand ready to receive him for their Prince, who shall have the better Right; there is here no need of Judgment properly so call'd, or such as is given by the Sentence of the Court, to compose Matters between private Men. For in this Case the controverted Point must be one of these two; either barely, which of the Rivals stands in the nearest Degree, or else which Degree ought to have the Preference? When the former happens to be the Question, the contending Parties are to clear their Descent as well as they are able; and he who shall appear to the People to make out his Claim most evidently, ought to carry the Day. Now tho', in this Method of proceeding, the People's Vote weighs considerably towards turning the Scale, yet it is not pronounced like a Sentence from the Tribunal, but only in the way of a bare Approbation; as a Debtor who is ready to pay, desires only to see the Bill, and to satisfy himself in the Truth of what he is charged with.

But if the Dispute be, which Degree or which Line ought to have the Preference, this shall be adjusted by the common Declaration of the People, since every one is presumed to understand what way he likes best; and since the People is still reckon'd the same as it was heretofore, when the Order of Succession was originally establish'd. Thus the Controversy between Edward King of England, and Philip Valois, as likewise that which happen'd before between Jane, Daughter to Lewis Hutin and Philip the Long, was discuss'd before an Assembly of the Estates of France. Thus we find in Mariana nine select Judges settling the Succession in the Kingdom of Arragon. And in Dionysius Halicarnassus, the People end the Differences between Sylvius and Iulus, in favour of the latter; chiefly on this Argument, That he was born of a Mother who had been the true Heiress of the whole Kingdom. And yet, this Declaration hath no more of the Nature of a judicial Sentence in it, than when a Person, who hath first conferr'd a Grant, afterwards explains some Terms that were thought ambiguous or obscure in the Instrument of Donation.

In Case either of the Competitors shall represent it as a Grievance, that the Affections of the People seem prejudiced in favour of his Rival, it may be the most ready Expedient to refer the Contest to proper Arbitrators; such as are neither inclin'd to one Party more than to the other, and in regard to whose Interest, 'tis an indifferent Matter which of the Two gets the Victory.

a Polymnia, init. Yet Justin (l. 2. c. 10. n. 9, 10.) reports that the Cause was referr'd by the Consent of the Brothers to their Uncle Artaphernes as to a Domestic Judge.

b Artaxerx. init.

c Add 1 Kings i. 5, &c.

d See the French Historians, and Polybor Virg. Hist. of Engl. l. 19. init.

e Hist. Hispan. l. 20. c. 2, 3.

f L. 1. g Vide Conneftag. de Unione Lusitan. l. 3. & 5. The most usual Controversies that occur on this Head, see in Grotius, l. 2. c. 7. f. 28, &c. Arniseus Relect. Polit. l. 2. c. 2 f. 10, &c. and in other Authors;

CHAP. VIII.

The Supreme Power is to be held Sacred in Civil States.

- | | |
|---|--|
| I. The Supreme Power not to be resisted in lawful Commands. II. Whether a Private Member can suffer Injury from the State. III. Subjects very prone to unjust Complaints against their Governours. IV. How many ways a Sovereign may injure his Subjects. V. Whether in the Case of grievous Injury and Oppression a lawful Prince may be resisted. | VI. The Name of a Tyrant does not justify the use of Violence in the Subject. VII. Grotius's Opinion. VIII. No Princes are to be held sacred, but such as are truly invested with royal Authority. IX. In what Case an Usurper may be acknowledged for a lawful Prince. X. How far the Commands of an Usurper oblige the Subjects, while their lawful Sovereign is alive, tho' in an exil'd condition. |
|---|--|

I. AS civil Empire, or Sovereignty, was first introduced to guard the Safety of Mankind, and to take off the almost infinite Miseries of a State of Nature, so that it be held sacred and inviolable by all Men, is highly the Interest of the whole World^a. And thus much indeed every Man in his Wits will confess, that 'tis a Sin to oppose a lawful Ruler, whilst acting within the Limits of his Authority. In as much as it appears evidently from the Nature and Design of Government, that there must of Necessity be join'd with it an Obligation to Non-resistance; or to a ready Obedience in performing or omitting any thing, which it shall command or forbid. The main Question therefore must be, whether in case the Sovereign should enjoin the Subjects what is unlawful, or treat them in an injurious manner, he is then also to be esteem'd Sacred; and so, that the Subjects ought not in a violent way to resist and repel the Injury?

II. Mr. Hobbes^b indeed maintains, that A State cannot do Injury to a Subject, as neither can a Master to his Slave. And he builds his Notion on this Argument, 'That no Covenant hath pass'd between the State and the Subject (all Injury, according to him, consisting in the Violation of a Covenant) and that the Will of the Subject is entirely submitted to the Will of the State; so that whatsoever the State acts is supposed to be done with the Subject's Consent. But now that what a Man willingly consents to receive, can be no Injury to him, is a Maxim that every Body is acquainted with. But we have already evinc'd, both that Injury doth not barely consist in the Violation of a Covenant, and that there doth really a Covenant pass between the Monarch and his Subjects. And as for Subjects submitting their Will to the Will of the State, this must be interpreted and restrain'd according to the true End and Design of civil Communities; and then the whole Matter will come to this Issue: Every Subject submits his Will to the Will of the State in all those Affairs which respect the common Interest and Safety; and in any Business of this kind a private Member cannot complain of Injury, tho' he should happen to dislike the publick Proceedings. But since it is very possible, that the sovereign Power may enjoin the Subject such Performances, or inflict on him such Evils, as bear no regard to the publick Welfare, but intrench on the particular Person's Right, whether acquired by Covenant, or by the universal Law of Humanity; there appears no reason why we should not affirm that a private Member is capable of being injur'd by the State, to which he belongs.

III. But here it ought well to be consider'd, that turbulent and querulous Subjects are wont to censure many Actions of their Prince as Injuries, which are by no means such. Every thing is by them condemn'd for Oppression and Mismanagement, that doth not exactly suit with their private Judgment. Now as the great Variety of Mens Inclinations and the Irregularity of their Aims and Wishes, make it impossible that the publick Administration should be equally grateful to all Persons; so he who exclaims against all Proceedings as injurious, which do not hit his particular Humour, is either contriving to overthrow the Constitution, or hath a Mind to be tampering in the Government himself. The last is the Case with many Murmurers; who are discontented only because the Commonwealth is not in their own Hands. Of this Number was Avidius Cassius^c, who boasted that he took up Arms against Marcus Antoninus, because he was displeas'd at the Prince's Greatness, and could not bear the Name of an Emperor. The same Pretence was made use of by Peisacimus Niger^d, and by Clodius Albinus^e, in their Rebellions against Severus. Many complain of their Prince for employing bad Ministers; when if we search into the Bottom of their Discontent, we shall find it to be only that they are not themselves prefer'd to a Share in the Ministry. The common People often grumble at the Hardship of Taxes, when no more is demanded than what the present Occasions of the Publick, or such Neces-

^a Add. Diodor. Sic. l. 1. c. 90.

^b De Civ. c. 7. l. 14. & c. & l. 7.

^c In Valtat. Gallican c. 1.

^d In Elian Spartian.

^e In Jul. Capitolin.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. I. and II.

¹ V. Grot. l. 1. c. 4. f. 2. And two Latin Discourses of Mr. Nolet's Publish'd in French by Mr. Barbeyrac in the beginning of the Year 1707, Entitul'd, Du Pouvoir de Souverain, & de la Liberté de Conscience, at Amsterdam.

² In the seventh Chapter of the first Book, Sect. 13. See above in the second Chapter of this Book, Sect. 8. & Citations sities as are likely to arise hereafter, seem to require. And what Answer they ought to receive, Mr. Hobbes ^a will inform us. As for the strict and severe Execution of the Laws, no Person can make this the Ground of his Dissatisfaction, but such an one as desires a Liberty of committing Wickedness. After all, in case any Man looks on those Burthens as intolerable, which the Affairs of the Commonwealth make necessary, he hath the Privilege of quitting the State. And if he is not inclined to make use of that Privilege, he hath nothing to blame but the common Condition of Mankind, who are not to expect in this World any Degree of pure and untainted Felicity. But should he think it allowable for him, on this account, to rid himself of the lawful Government by violent means; 'twere the same thing, as if he should resolve to improve his Fortune by Rapine and Theft, because he thinks it a Hardship to maintain himself by his own Industry and Labour.

IV. Tho' all this must be acknowledg'd to be true; yet there is no doubt, but that a State, or the sovereign Ruler of it, may do an Injury to a private Subject: Since here the Parties are both under the same common Law of Nature at least, which is sufficient to make them capable of being injured one by the other. Now a Sovereign may be conceiv'd to injure his Subjects two ways, if in his Dealings with them he violates either the Duty of a Prince, or the Duty of a Man; that is, if he either treats them not as Subjects, or not as Men. The Duty of a Prince respects either the whole People, or particular Persons. Thus much a Prince owes to the whole People, that he procure the Good and Safety of the Community, either by his own Judgment, in case he be absolute, or if his Power be limited by Laws, according as those Laws shall direct and prescribe. Therefore he injures the whole People, if he quite throws off all Care of the Government, in his own Person, and doth not so much as see that the publick Business be dispatch'd by his Ministers. As for Instance, if he should neither undertake the Defence of the Kingdom against foreign Enemies, nor by a due Execution of the Laws secure its inward Peace; and yet, in the midst of all this Neglect, should continue to enjoy the Title and Revenues, and should judge the Greatness of a Prince to consist in the unbounded Extent of his vicious Pleasures. For if, together with the Administration, he lays aside the Honours and Profits of the regal Office, he shall be supposed to have plainly abdicated the Government. Which Privilege of resigning the Crown ought to be allow'd him, unless he hath first, by evil Counsels, put the State under great Difficulties, and then would desert it in the midst of its Danger. And this must be own'd for a manifest Injury, thus to discharge no part of a Duty, and yet to desire the Reward and

Advantage of it. But it will be a much greater Injury, should he with hostile Intentions directly endeavour to overthrow the common Safety, and put on the Person of an Enemy, which cannot possibly consist with the Person of a Sovereign ^d. But such a Case as this can never happen, where a Prince is Master of his own Reason. For who, in his Wits, would ruin what belongs to himself? Or where will he meet with Subjects, who useth them as Enemies? Yet indeed, if he happens to enjoy two Kingdoms at once, 'tis possible that he may seek the Destruction of the one, to advance the Interest and Greatness of the other ^e. But we have an Instance even of the former Madness, in the Story of a certain King of Peru, in the last Age, who by the Practice, as 'twas reported, of some Magicians, was possess'd with so utter an Aversion to his Subjects, that he took up a Resolution to make them all away; and in order to this, commanded that no Person, under Pain of Death, should till the Ground for the space of Three Years. Which occasion'd so grievous a Famine, that the People murther'd each other for Food ^f. Again a Prince injures the Community, if he subverts the fundamental Laws without the Consent of the People, and upon no urgent Necessity; or if he go about to change the manner of holding the Government. As likewise, if he should ruin the publick Patrimony; or if, by imposing greater Tributes than the Occasions of the State require, he should first imploy the Subjects Purfes, and then squander away the Money in Extravagance, or send it out of the Realm; with many Acts of the same Nature. To all which may well be applied the smart Conclusion of the Old Greek Epigram ^g.

Ἄλλὰ λύκος ἔργει τι δὲ τὸ πολέου, εἰ τὸ φύλαξθαι
Ὀλλύει, ἢτε λύκοις, εἴθ' ὑπὸ τοῦ φύλακος;

But he keeps off the Wolf; we own the Deed;
But where's the Difference, if the Sheep must bleed,
Whether the Keeper, or the Wolf they feed?

The Duty which a Prince owes to his particular Subjects is, that he permit them to enjoy the same Rights with others of their Rank and Order; that he protect and defend them, and administer Justice to every one, so far as his regard to the publick Safety will allow him. If he fails in any of these Performances towards particular Persons, when the Condition of the Commonwealth would give him leave to discharge them, he certainly does the respective Person an Injury ^d. An Old Woman who came with a Petition to the Emperor Adrian, and was by him told that he had no leisure at present to hear her, in a very angry mood made him this smart Reply, Ergo noli imperare, Therefore don't pretend to Govern ^e.

^a D. Civ. c. 12. f. 2.
^{1.} 9. c. 6. near the end. Tho' indeed Pausanias's Action is by no means to be commended.
Dion. & Zonar. T. 2.

^b Joan. Moquet. Itiner. l. 4.

^c Antipater in Antolog.

^d V. Justin.

^e Xiphilin. Epit.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. IV.

¹ As the Emperor Caligula, who wish'd that the Roman People were but one Head, that he might dash its Brains out, as we have it related in Sueton. c. 35.
² V. Groz. l. 1. c. 4. f. 11.
³ This is what Phillip King of Macedon formerly did, as is related in Livy, B. 40. c. 3, &c.

A a a a a

That

That Duty which the Prince stands under as a Man, he may violate several ways, in his Transactions with particular Subjects. As suppose he should undeservedly brand an honest Person with Disgrace and Ignominy; if he should withhold the Reward promis'd to his Service; if he should refuse to discharge his Debts, or to fulfil his other Contracts or Engagements, or to repair a Damage which he hath occasion'd by some extravagant Humour; if he should assault the Honour of chaste Virgins should defile his Subjects Beds by Adultery, should hurt their Bodies, seize or destroy their Goods; lastly, if he should take away the Life of an innocent Person, either by direct and downright Violence, or by suborning false Witnesses against him, or compelling the Judges through Threats and Promises, to pass an unjust Sentence of Death: Ammianus Marcellinus a hath made a very sensible Reflexion on the Grievances last mentioned. Amongst Arms and Trumpets, says he, the Equality of Condition makes the Danger seem lighter; and the Power of martial Valour either possesseth it self of what it attempted; or, if taken off by the Surprise of unexpected Fate, carries no Mark of Infamy alone with it, but concludes Life and Pain together. But when the Pretence of Rights and Laws serves to cover and disguise wicked Counsels, when the Judges sit masqu'd in the severe Gravity of Cato or Cassius, but act every thing according to the arbitrary Pleasure of their insolent Master, and the whole Affair of Life and Death is weigh'd and determin'd by his Humour, nothing else can ensue but capital Destruction and precipitate Ruin.

V. But 'tis a Point of greater Difficulty to explain, whether Subjects are obliged to endure all those Injuries without resisting, or whether in some Cases they may not repel them by Force? Our Judgment on the Matter is this: Since such is the Condition of human Life, that it cannot be exempt from all Inconveniences, and since 'tis not easy to find a Man in the whole World, who is so nicely exact in his Behaviour, as to give a compleat and universal Satisfaction; 'twould be equal Folly and Impudence to oppose a Prince for every Fault; especially since we our selves on the other hand are not so very punctual in the Discharge of our Duty towards him; and since even in private Persons the Laws are went to pass over slight Miscarriages. Therefore how much more just and reasonable must it be to overlook the pardonable Failings of a Prince, on whose Care the Tranquillity of the whole Nation, and the Security of every Man's Life and Fortune depends? And so much the rather, since Experience informs us; with how fatal a Destruction of the People, and how miserable a Convulsion of the State, the very worst of Princes have been dethron'd. We are to forgive then the slighter Injuries of Rulers; as well in regard to their high and noble Office, and to the many Benefits we constantly derive from them in other respects, as out of a due Concern for our Fellow Subjects, and for the whole Commonwealth b. We ought to bear, says Tacitus c, with the Tempers of Princes; since frequent Alterations can never turn to the Advantage of a State. 'Tis a sensible Argument, that which Cerialis (in the same Author d, useth to the Rebellious Treviri. As you would endure, says he, the Barrenness of a Soil, the immoderate Force of Rain, and the other Inconveniences of Nature, so endure the Luxury or the Avarice of your Rulers. There will be Vices in the World so long as there are Men; but then these are not perpetual, and are amply recompens'd by the Intermixture of better Qualities. Plato e speaks admirably to the same purpose, We ought never to use Violence to our Parents, unless they are depriv'd of their Reason: But if we dislike their manner of Living we must not provoke them by unprofitable Remonstrances, or cherish in them by servile Flattery and a criminal Compliance, the Vices to which we would not be subject our selves. A wise Man will take up this Resolution in regard to his Country; then only to reprehend the Miscarriages in the State, when his Reproof is likely to meet with good Effect, and not to draw down Ruin on himself: But when a Reformation cannot be wrought without the Expulsion and Slaughter of many Persons, he will never attempt to introduce a Change in the Government by violent means; but will give himself up to Quiet and Retirement, and pray for his own and the publick Happiness f. Besides, a Man consults his own safety, when he chooseth rather to dissemble the Affronts of too powerful an Oppressor, than to draw on himself some greater Mischief, by unreasonable Resentments and Complaints g. Add to this, that as we are commanded by the Holy Scriptures h, so are

Mr. BARBEYRA C's NOTES on §. V.

^a V. Groet. l. 1. c. 4. f. 4. That must be duly consider'd. For the Sovereign has never any Right to do the least Injustice. If then we ought not to resist him but in the last Extremity, 'tis not for his Sake, or by Virtue of his Power, but on account of the Interest of the State; which would by that means be expos'd to Troubles and Commotions. Besides that (as Gronovius observes, in his Notes upon Grotius, Lib. I. Chap. III. Sect. 8. Num. 15.) it often happens that a People upon the Expulsion of one bad Prince, fall under the Dominion of another worse than the former; the specious Name of Liberty serving those for a Pretence who are ambitious of bringing them under their Subjection. 'Tis a Reflection which Tacitus puts into a General's Mouth, Ceterum Libertas & speciosa nomina preetextantur, nec quisquam alienum servitium & dominationem sibi concupivit, ut non eadem ista vocabula usurparet, Hist. Lib. IV. Cap. LXXIII. Another Latin Historian gives us an Instance of it in the Person of Sandrocroctus, who made himself Master of the Indies, after the Death of Alexander the Great. Auctor Libertatis Sandrocroctus fuerat; sed titulum Libertatis post victoriam in servitutem converterat. Justin. Lib. XV. Cap. IV. Num. 13. ² 1 Ep. Pet. ii. 17, 18.

^a L. 26. c. 13.
1281. D. Ed. Weck.
Familiares.

^b V. Justin. l. 15. c. 4.

^c Ann. 12. c. 11,

^d H. 4. c. 74.

^e Epist. 7. p.

^f Cicero produceth this Passage out of Plato in the Ninth Epistle of his First Book ad

^g See the Sentences cited to this purpose by Grotius, ubi supra. Æschylus Prometh. Vinct.

— ἡ δὲ ἐν πρῶτῳ κέλυτος, &c.

— When a self-will'd Lord
Too big to be controul'd and fiercely bent
On Cruelty and Rage, ascends the Throne;
Strive not in vain, nor kick against the Goad.

we advised by sound Reason, patiently to suffer the Moroseness and Severity of our Parents and Masters ^a .

Nay farther, this too is most certain, That when a Prince with plain hostile Intentions, threatens the worst and most cruel of Injuries, it is better if we can to withdraw our selves from the Stroke, and either to secure our selves by Flight and Concealment, or to remove into another Country and Government for Protection. But what if a Prince should with this hostile Fury attempt to destroy an innocent Subject, without leaving any Possibility of Escape? Many as to this Case are not able to conceive how the same Man can thus bear the Person of a Prince, and of an Enemy together, in respect of the poor Sufferer, or with what Face he can claim the Privilege of being held inviolable, who thus is bent on sacrificing a guiltless Member of the State, as a miserable Victim to his Lusts. But they are of Opinion, that if he who owes another his Protection and Patronage, shall upon no Cause at all, or upon an unjust one, assume the Mind of an Enemy towards him, he releaseth the other Party from his Duty of a Client or Dependent ; so far at least, as that it shall be lawful for the latter to make use of Force in defending himself from the unreasonable Cruelties of the former. Which Defence may the better plead for Favour, the greater the Number is of those whom the Prince endeavours thus injuriously to destroy. But since 'tis hardly possible to find any Examples of Princes, who entertain a Design against the Lives of innocent Men, and openly profess that they do it out of meer arbitrary Pleasure ; a greater Doubt ariseth, what Course can be lawfully taken, when a Prince goes about to exercise Cruelty under the Pretence and Colour of Right ; as suppose, in way of Punishment, for the Neglect of an unjust Command. Now here we first of all take it for granted, that since in conferring any Power there is a Salvo made to the Right of all Superiors, therefore the Subjects, upon the establishing a sovereign Civil Authority, neither could, nor would by that Act renounce the Subjection which they before stood under to Almighty G O D, and consequently that they are not bound by any Injunctions of the civil Power, plainly repugnant to the Divine Commands. What a Subject ought to do in this Case, if threatned with Violence on the account of his Christian : Profession, it is not our Business to determine : In as much as the same Scriptures, in which that holy Doctrine is deliver'd, may fully inform any Person how infinitely it concerns him, not really, nor so much as seemingly to act any thing contrary to his Religion ^b, and at how great a Price, if Occasion be, he ought to purchase his Innocence. But that, upon the Apprehension of certain Death, a Man may undertake the Performance of an Action in it self repugnant to the Law of Nature, without any Sin on his part, we shall by and by make out ^c. Yet if the Action enjoin'd be such, as I cannot perform without deriving Guilt on my self, or such as I esteem to be, in its own Nature more bitter than Death, and at the same time no reason is shewn, nor so much as Probability pretended, either from some Fault of mine, or from the publick Good, why I should be put under this Necessity of doing what might either have been done by another, or ought not to be done at all ; it is manifest, that the whole Design of such a Command is, that I may be destroy'd, who have committed no Offence, purely to gratify the Will of the Enjoiner, and his cruel Disposition towards me. By which Act, since he lays aside the Prince to put on the Enemy, he is suppos'd at the same time to have remitted the Obligation, which lay on the part of the Subject. But still as far as 'tis possible, we are to avoid this Danger by Flight, and to seek the Patronage of some third Person, who is not by any Ties engaged to the same Prince. Nay, if all means of escaping are cut off, we ought rather to be kill'd than to kill ^d : yet not so much out of Veneration to the Person of such a Ruler, as out of regard to

MR. BARBEYRA C's NOTES on §. V.

¹ Ut Parentum severitiam, sic Patria, patiendo ac ferendo, leniendam esse, Livy, l. 27. c. 34. See Epiſt. Enchirid. Cap. XXXVII. and Justin. Lib. XV. Cap. III. Num. 10. Plato in the Dialogue, Intituled, the Criton, compares likewise the Patience wherewith we ought to suffer any Injustice we receive from our Country or the Commonwealth, to the manner in which a Child ought to bear with the Moroseness and Severity of his Parents, or a Slave the ill Usage of his Master. Nay, he even says, that the Subject ought to suffer with so much the more Reason, as the Obligation which we are under with respect to the State, is greater than that which a Man owes to a Master, and to those from whom he receiv'd his Being. Ἡ τῆς ἀρετῆς τῶν Πατέρων ἐκ ἡμῶν τὸ δίκαιον, &c. Tom. 1. p. 50, 51. E. I. Steph.

² As it cannot be prov'd, neither by the Principles of the Law of Nature, nor by the Holy Scripture, that Sovereigns are vested with a Power to hinder any one from serving God in a peaceable manner, according to the Dictates of his Conscience (see above, Chap. IV. S. 11. Note 2.) it follows from thence, that the People have as natural and as unquestionable a Right to defend their Religion by Force of Arms against a Sovereign, who endeavours to compel them to renounce it, or to forbid them the free Exercise of it, as to defend their Lives, their Estates, and Liberties against the Attempts of a Tyrant. This Right is even more allowable than any other, in as much as it regards the greatest of all Interests, and the strongest of all Obligations, or rather that which is the Foundation and Source of all others, I mean, the indispensable Necessity that obliges every Man to follow the Light of his own Conscience. 'Tis to no purpose for Grotius, after having approv'd of the Conduct of the Maccabees, to maintain however that the Christian Religion leaves its Followers no other Remedy but Flight, or Patience. The Passages which he produces regard only private Persons who are not in a Capacity to resist. But (as Mr. Bernard, Nouv. de la Rep. des Lettres, Mai 1700. p. 557, observes) Jesus Christ moreover gives People the Liberty of defending their Rights by the common ways of Justice. See also Gronovius's long Note upon Grotius, Lib. I. Cap. IV. Sect. 7. Num. 8. and Mr. Vaucler Muelen's Dissertation de Sanctitate summi Imperii civilis, &c. p. 70, &c. Mr. Rechenberg the present Professor of Divinity at Leipsick, likewise publish'd a Dissertation de Religione armis defensa in the Year 1689. at the same time that he had a Professorship in another place. He applies the general Proposition to the Protestants in particular.

³ See Sir George Mackenzie's Jus Regium, p. 113, &c.

⁴ B. 8. c. 1. f. 6.

⁵ V. Grot. l. 2. c. 1. f. 9. cum not. Gronov.

^a Pliny, L. 7. Ep. 14. speaking of Masters being murder'd by their Slaves, says, Non judicio, sed scelere perimuntur, They are kill'd, not in the Method of Judgment, but of Villainy.

^b See Matth. x. 31, &c.

the Commonwealth, which on such an occasion, cannot but be imbroil'd in the most unhappy Troubles. But when a Ruler proceeds against a Subject in way of punishment for a real Crime, altho' here the Subject is not bound to meet the Mischief by voluntarily appearing and offering up himself; yet the Reason why he cannot, in this Case, defend himself by Force is, that the Prince acts nothing here but what is consistent with his Right; and therefore it would be highly injurious, whatever the Pretence might be, to offer him any Hurt on such an account. It ought farther to be observ'd, that altho' we should grant never so fully, that a particular Subject may, in some Cases, guard his Safety by Violence against the injurious Assaults of his Superior, and this without Sin; yet it doth not hereby become lawful for the other Subjects to throw off their Allegiance, or protect the innocent Party by forcible means. For besides, that they ought not to make Inquisition into these Acts of the Prince, which he exerciseth as it were by Virtue of his judiciary Power, and that many guilty Persons, to draw Odium on the Government, make high Pretensions to Innocence; tho' the Person should happen to be really injured, the rest of the People are not at all releas'd from their Obligation to Obedience. And that for this Reason, Because, in the first Contract, every particular Subject engageth the Prince's Care and Protection only for himself, and doth not suppose it a Condition of his own Obedience, that all and each of his Fellows shall be justly treated. Nor is the Fear of being hereafter used in the same manner, sufficient to break off this Obligation in the other Subjects; First, because it is uncertain; and, Secondly, because 'tis possible the Prince's Hatred to this Person might be founded on some particular Reasons, which do not appear in others. But whilst the Subject's Obligation towards the Prince remains in Force, it shall not be lawful for him on what Pretence soever, to make any violent Resistance.

VI. Now, as what hath been hitherto deliver'd is, in the Opinion of many Men, not at all derogatory from the Sacredness of Princes; so, on the other hand, those Persons are not to be endured, who assert in gross, that a King, when he degenerates into a Tyrant, may be deprived of his Crown, and brought to Punishment by the People. For since the Acts of civil Government are for the most part so obscure, that

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTE on § VI.

When we speak of a Tyrant that may lawfully be dethron'd by the People, we do not mean by the Word People the vile Populace or Rabble of the Country, nor the Cabal of a small Number of factious Persons; but the greater and more judicious part of the Subjects of all Ranks in the Kingdom. Besides, the Tyranny must be so notorious, and evidently clear, as to leave no body any room to doubt of it. See what Mr. Buddeus says to this Matter, upon Tarquin the Proud, in his Discourse Intituled, Jurisp. Historica Specimen, Sect. 3. &c. Among the Selecta Jur. Nat. & Gent. See likewise Mr. Le Clerc upon Judges iii. 20. v. 24. Now a Prince may easily avoid making himself so universally suspected and odious to his Subjects: For, as Mr. Locke says, in his second Treatise of Civil Government, Chap. XVIII. Sect. 209. It is as impossible for a Governor, if he really means the Good of the People, and the Preservation of them and the Law together, not to make them see and feel it; as it is for the Father of a Family, not to let his Children see he loves and takes care of them. And therefore the general Insurrection of a whole Nation does not deserve the Name of Rebellion. We may see what Mr. Sidney says upon this Subject in his Discourse concerning Government, Chap. III. Sect. XXXVI. Neither are Subjects bound to stay till the Prince has entirely finish'd the Chains which he is preparing for 'em, and has put it out of their power to oppose. 'Tis sufficient that all the Advances which he makes are manifestly tending to their Oppression, that he is marching boldly on to the Ruin of the State. In such a case, says Mr. Locke admirably well, ubi supra, Sect. 210. How can a Man any more hinder himself from believing in his own Mind which way things are going, or from casting about how to save himself, than he could from believing the Captain of the Ship he was in, was carrying him and the rest of his Company to Algiers, when he found him always steering that Course, tho' cross Winds, Leaks in his Ship, and want of Men and Provisions did often force him to turn his Course another way for some time, which he steadily returned to again, as soon as the Winds, Weather and other Circumstances would let him? This chiefly takes place with respect to Kings, whose power is limited by fundamental Laws. If it is objected that, the People being ignorant and always discontented, to lay the Foundation of Government in the unsteady Opinion and the uncertain Humour of the People is to expose it to certain Ruin; the same Author will answer you, that on the contrary, People are not so easily got out of their old Forms as some are apt to suggest. England, for Instance, notwithstanding the many Revolutions that have been seen in that Kingdom, has always kept to its old Legislative of King, Lords, and Commons: And whatever provocations have made the Crown to be taken from some of their Princes Heads, they never carried the People so far as to place it in another Line. But 'twill be said, this Hypothesis lays a Ferment for frequent Rebellion. No more, says Mr. Locke, than any other Hypothesis. For when the People are made miserable, and find themselves exposed to the ill Usage of arbitrary Power; cry up their Governors as much as you will for Sons of Jupiter, let them be sacred and divine, defended or authoriz'd from Heaven; give them out for whom or what you please, the same will happen. The People generally ill treated, and contrary to Right, will be ready upon any occasion to ease themselves of a burden that sits heavy upon them. 2. Such Revolutions happen not upon every little Mismanagement in publick Affairs. Great Mistakes in the ruling part, many wrong and inconvenient Laws, and all the slips of human Frailty will be born by the People without Mutiny and Murmur. 3. This Power in the People of providing for their Safety a-new by a new Legislative, when their Legislators have acted contrary to their Trust by invading their Property, is the best Fence against Rebellion, and the probablest means to hinder it, For Rebellion being an Opposition, not to Persons but Authority, which is founded only in the Constitutions and Laws of the Government; those whoever they be, who by Force break through, and by Force justify the Violation of them, are truly and properly Rebels. For when Men by entering into Society and civil Government have excluded Force, and introduced Laws for the preservation of Property, Peace, and Unity among themselves; those who set up Force again in Opposition to the Laws do rebellare, that is, do bring back again the State of War, and are properly Rebels as the Author shews. In the last place he demonstrates, that there are also greater Inconveniences in allowing all to those that govern, than in granting something to the People. But it will be said, that ill-affected and factious Men may spread amongst the People, and make them believe that the Prince or Legislative act contrary to their Trust, when they only make use of their due Prerogative. To this Mr. Locke answers, that the People however, is to be Judge of all that; because no body can better judge whether his Trustee or Deputy acts well, and according to the Trust, reposed in him, than he who deputed him. He might make the like Query (says Mr. Le Clerc from whom this Extract is taken) and ask whether, the People being oppress'd by an Authority which they set up but for their own Good, it is just that those who are vested with this Authority, and of which they are complaining, should themselves be Judges of the Complaints made against them? The greatest Flatterers of Kings dare not say, that the People are obliged to suffer absolutely all their Humours, how irregular soever they be; and therefore must confess, that when no regard is had to their Complaints, the very Foundations of Society are destroy'd; the Prince and People are in a State of War with each other, like the Multitude cannot apprehend the Equity or the Necessity of them, and often, through Prejudice or Passion, will not apply their Minds to a Discovery of the Truth; and since, generally speaking, it makes for the Interest of the Commonwealth to let the Reasons of the State and the Grounds of publick Counsels and Proceedings be known by a very Few: it will be a most difficult Task to point out exactly those several Actions, on the Performance of which a Prince may justly be call'd a Tyrant, and as justly be oppos'd by the People, with any Violence whatsoever. Whence it may easily come to pass, that an Odium of this Nature shall be brought even on a good Prince, by such as either dislike his Person, or the present Constitution; since Men have been now long accusom'd in the Use and Signification of Words, to make them stand not only for the real Nature of Things, but for their own Humour or Affections. Thus much is acknowledg'd by general Opinion, that neither private and personal Vices, nor smaller Neglects in the publick Administration, are sufficient to denominate a Tyrant. Are heavy Taxes impos'd? The Subjects who are not admitted to Council, cannot possibly judge whether the Necessity of the State requires this Provision, or not. Are severe Penalties executed? Why, if this be done upon some precedent Offence, and according to the Laws, no Man can with Justice complain; tho' perhaps the Case would better have allow'd of Mercy and Pardon. Are some great Men innocently taken off, on the account of private Hatred or Suspicion; which, in vulgar Estimation, passeth for the highest and most provoking Grievance? yet if Plots against the Prince's Government, or other Crimes are, in pretence at least, laid to their Charge, or the ordinary Court of Judgment observ'd in condemning them; although perhaps the Persons themselves, and some few others may be throughly satisfisd of their Innocency; yet how is it possible that the rest of the People should have the same Certainty and Assurance? Especially since the Presumption of Justice always lies on the Prince's side. Well, but perhaps, Promises are broken, or Privileges formerly granted retrench'd. Still, if the Prince be absolute, 'tis but to alledge some Offence in the Parties, or some signal Advantage to the Commonwealth, and then he shall be supposed to have acted according to his sovereign Right; and whether these Pretences be real, or no. the Subjects are not able clearly to judge. And all Privileges must be construed with this Limitation and Exception, Unless the Safety or Necessity of the Publick forbid them to hold any longer. No small part of the Arguments, usually brought for the opposite Opinion, fall of their own accord, if it be well consider'd, that these are two very different things; A People have power of applying Force to their Rulers, and of reducing them to Amendment, when they do not govern according to their Will; and, There is in the People, or in particular Persons, a Right of defending their Life and Safety against their Prince, upon the Approach of extream Danger, and when the Prince is manifestly turn'd an Enemy towards them. For the Reasons which prove the latter of these Positions do not in like man-two Independent States that are doing themselves Justice, and acknowledge no person upon Earth who in a sovereign manner can determine the Disputes between them. Bibliothèque Universel. Tom. XIX. pag 591. Mr. Sidney in his Discourse upon Government, Chap. III. Sect. 41. says, 'They who create Magistracies, and give to them such Name, Form, and Power, as they think fit, do only know whether the End for which they were created, be perform'd, or not. They who give a Being to the Power which had none, can only judge whether it be employ'd to their Welfare, or turn'd to their Ruin. They do not set up one or a few Men that they and their posterity may live in Splendor and Greatness; but that Justice may be administer'd, Virtue establish'd, and provision made for the publick Safety. No wise Man will think this can be done. if those who set themselves to overthrow the Law are to be their own Judges. If Caligula, Nero, Vitellius, Domitian or Heliogabalus had been subject to no other Judgment, they would have compleated the Destruction of the Empire. If the Disputes between Darius, Eveus the Third, Dardanius. and other Kings of Scotland, with the Nobility and People might have been determin'd by themselves, they had escap'd the punishments they suffer'd, and ruin'd the Nation as they design'd. Other Methods were taken; they perish'd by their Madnels; better Princes were brought into their places, and their Successors were by their Example admonish'd to avoid the ways that had prov'd fatal to them. If Edward the Second of England with Gauvesson and the spencers, Richard the Second with Trevelin and Vere, had been permitted to be Judges of their own Cases, they who had murder'd the best of the Nobility, would have pursu'd their Designs to the Destruction, of such as remain'd, the enslaving of the Nation, the Subversion of the Constitution, and the Establishment of a meer Tyranny in the place of a mix'd Monarchy. But our Ancestors took better Measures. They who had felt the smart of the Vices and Follies of their Princes, knew what Remedies were most fit to be applied, as well as the best Time of applying them. They found the Effects of extreme Corruption in Government to be so desperately pernicious, that Nations must necessarily perish, unless it be corrected, and the State reduced to its first Principle, or alter'd. Which being the case, it was as easy for them to judge whether the Governor who had introduced that Corruption should be brought to Order, or remov'd if he would not be reclaim'd; or whether he should be suffer'd to ruin them and their posterity; as it is for me to judge whether I should put away my Servant, if I knew he intended to poison or murder me, and had a certain Facility of accomplishing his Design, or whether I should continue him in my Service 'till he had perform'd it. Nay, the Matter is so much the more plain on the side of the Nation, as the disproportion of Merit between a whole People, and one or few Men entrusted with the power of governing them, is greater than between a private Man and his Servant.' To this let us add the following Verses of an ancient Greek Poet.

A. Σέβειν δὲ τὰς κρατῦνας νόμῳ.
B. Οὐ ταύριλῶς δὲ τοῖς πονηροῖς ἐπιτρέτειν,
"Ἄλλ' ἀντιτάττεσθαι, εἰ δὲ μὴ, τ' ἀνο κατῶ
Ἡμῶν ὁ βίῃ λήπει μετασφύρεται ὄλιῳ.

An Atient Law commands us to obey
Those who in Government do bear the Sway:
But wicked Magistrates we may resist,
Nor suffer them to do what e'er they list;
For then the World would in Confusion lie,
And Civil States be Scenes of Anarchy.

Philomon in Adelph. Fragm. IX. Edit. Cleric.

² Comp. Bœcler. ad Grœc. l. 1. c. 4. s. 12

ner evince the former: And yet many Men confound the one with the other. And thus too when it is said, that a People who have given themselves up to Slavery, have not thereby lost all Right of rescuing themselves into Liberty and Security²; the Assertion will hold true only in this Sense, that a People may defend themselves against the extreme and unjust Violence of their Prince: Which Defence, if it succeeds prosperously, brings Liberty along with it as a necessary Attendant. In as much as the Lord, by thus changing himself into an Enemy, seems to absolve the Subjects from their Obligation towards him: So that they are not bound to return under his Yoak, tho' he should alter his cruel Resolutions. Excepting in this Case, a People who have given themselves up for Slaves, or rather who have put themselves under the Command of an absolute Sovereign, have no more a Right of regaining their Liberty by Force, than I have of recovering a thing by Force, which I have already upon Bargain deliver'd to another Man. For this civil Servitude is not so abhorrent from Nature, as some imagine; as that a Person, who at one time, to avoid a greater Evil, finds it necessary for him to consent to it, may afterwards, when Occasion favours him, throw it off again, by the Right and Privilege which Nature allows him. And although the State of Slavery should be contrary to the Inclinations of a particular People, either from the beginning, or upon the changing of their Minds; yet 'tis by no means lawful, barely on this account, to deprive the Prince of that Right which he hath already obtain'd: No more than it is lawful for the Seller to take away from his Chapman what he before deliver'd to him upon Contract; tho' he should happen to find that the Sale did not prove to his Advantage.

VII. Grotius^a, in adjusting these Matters, hath taken a Course not very different from that which we have here follow'd. Amongst other things he well observes, that whether or no the extreme Injuries of Sovereigns may be forcibly

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTE on §. VI.

² No Man can so far part with his Liberty as to give himself up wholly to an arbitrary Power, to be treated absolutely as that Power thinks proper; for this would be to dispose of his own Life, of which he is not Master. Much less has a whole People such a Right, as every one of those who compose it, is entirely destitute of. 'The natural Liberty of Man is to be free from any superior Power on Earth, and not to be under the Will or Legislative Authority of Man, but to have only the Law of Nature for his Rule. The Liberty of Man, in Society is to be under no other Legislative Power, but that establish'd by Consent in the Commonwealth; nor under the Dominion of any Will, or Restraint of any Law but what the Legislative shall enact, according to the Trust put in it. Freedom then is not what Sir Robert Filmer tells us, A Liberty for every one to do what he lists, to live as he pleases, and not to be tied by any Laws: But Freedom of Men under Government, is to have a standing Rule to live by, common to every one of that Society, and made by the legislative Power erected in it. A Liberty to follow my own Will in all things, where the Rule prescribes not; not to be subject to the inconstant, uncertain, unknown, arbitrary Will of another Man: As Freedom of Nature is to be under no other Restraint but the Law of Nature. This Freedom from absolute arbitrary Power is so necessary to, and closely join'd with a Man's Preservation, that he cannot part with it but by what forfeits his Preservation and Life together. For a Man, not having the power of his own Life, cannot by Compact, or his own Consent, enslave himself to any one, nor put himself under the absolute arbitrary Power of another, to take away his own Life, when he pleases. No body can give more Power over it. Indeed, having by his Fault forfeited his own Life by some Act that deserves Death; he, to whom he has forfeited it, may (when he has him in his power) delay, to take it, and make use of him to his own service, and he does him no Injury by it. For, whenever he finds the hardship of his Slavery outweigh the value of his Life, 'tis in his Power, by resisting the Will of his Master, to draw on himself the Death he desires. This is the perfect Condition of slavery, which is nothing else but the State of War continu'd between a lawful Conqueror and a Captive. For, if once Compact enter between them, and make an Agreement for a limited Power on the one side, and Obedience on the other; the State of War and Slavery ceases, as long as the like Compact endures. For, as has been said, no Man can by Agreement pass over to another Nation, that which he hath not in himself, a Power over his own Life. I confess, we find among the Jews, as well as other Nations, that Men did sell themselves; but, 'tis plain, this was only to Drudgery, not to Slavery. For, it is evident, the Person sold was not under an absolute, arbitrary, despotical Power. For the Master could not have power to kill him at any time, whom at a certain time he was obliged to let go free out of his Service; and the Master of such a Servant was so far from having an arbitrary Power over his Life, that he could not at pleasure so much as maim him, but the Loss of an Eye or Tooth set him free. Mr. Locke of Civil Government, Book II. Chap. IV. Let us add the following Reflections of Mr. Abbadie. The natural Right of our Preservation is altogether unalienable, that is to say, such as we can never renounce entirely and absolutely. It is true, that when I confederate my self with other Men to form a Society, 'tis upon this Condition, that I shall expose my own particular Person for the preservation of the whole; there would be no way for a Society to subsist, if every one consulted his own Safety only; and I should lose the support that I meet with for my own preservation, in my Union with others. But we cannot say that Soldiers, who maintain themselves in their Ranks, and fight valiantly in War, do renounce the natural Care of their preservation, so we cannot say that private Persons renounce the Right of their preservation, when for the Love of their Country, they expose themselves to the Danger of perishing. 'Tis a Contradiction that we should for ever alienate this Right. How have Men, who enjoy the Privileges of civil Society, renounced this Right of Self-preservation, when those who are cut off from Society, as Criminals condemn'd to Death, do not renounce it? So that if they make their Escape, and are taken again, they shall suffer the punishment that their former Crime deserv'd, in Execution of the Sentence that was pronounced against them before; but there will be no Indictment brought against 'em for their being willing to save themselves, which is founded upon this Principle, that as Nature always returns, so the Rights of Nature are never lost—A Man, that finds himself ill, may, and ought to make choice of a skilful Physician, to whom he will give a power apparently arbitrary over his Body: I put my self into your Hands, he will say, do with me what you please, I will not contradict your Prescriptions, and when I would do so I desire that my Servants may execute your Orders and not mine, and that you may have the sole power in this Matter. I am certain that you would believe that such a Man has notwithstanding all that renounced neither the Right nor the Care of his preservation; if the power which he gives over himself, unlimited in appearance, were so in reality; and if it were evident that the Physician would poison the sick Man, might he not oppose him without breaking his Word and his Engagements? Is it not apparent that there are in that Case two Extremities to be avoided? That a sick Man ought not to be suffer'd to be Master of his Physician; but that 'tis also just for him to oppose the Physician, when it is notorious that he would poison the sick Man? If it were not justifiable to dethrone a King who is evidently endeavouring to ruin and undo us, it would follow that the Right of destroying us, without being capable of losing the Crown on that score, passing from Father to Son, we should have lost, or alienated for ever the Right of our own Preservation. Defence de la Nation Britannique, p. 260, 261. See the Homily of the Church of England against Rebellion, the second Part.

resisted, is best to be understood by considering, as well the Nature of Sovereignty, as the presumed Design of those who first incorporated themselves in a civil State. As for the former, 'tis not in the least repugnant to the Nature of Sovereignty, that all the Actions of the Subjects should by it be directed towards the publick Good, and that those who oppose its Decrees, should undergo the severest Punishment; without allowing it the Power to murder Men out of meer Humour, so as on no account to be resisted. Nor is there any natural Connexion between an absolute Power of procuring a Man's Safety, and an absolute Power of destroying a Man at pleasure. And 'tis impossible to make out what such a Power in the Sovereign, or such an Obligation in the Subject, can contribute to the Peace and Security of the Commonwealth. On which Score it is evident, how false that Inference is which some Men make; the supreme Authority is accountable only to God, therefore we have sufficient Reason to conclude, that the Persons who first united in a Community, designed to reserve to themselves no Degree of Right which should hold good against the ruling Power. As if to defend one's Life against an injurious Assailant, were to proceed against him in a judicial manner a! Nor is their Scruple of any Moment, who disallow the Liberty of resisting Governors, in Cases of barbarous Cruelty, on this Argument, Because we cannot frame to our selves any lawful Call, that the Subjects have to take up Arms against the chief Magistrate; since no Mortal can pretend to have a Jurisdiction over a Person of that Character. As if Defence were the Effect of Jurisdiction! Or, as if he who sets himself to keep off an unjust Violence, which threatens his Life, had any more need of a particular Call, than he who is about to fence against Hunger and Thirst with Meat and Drink b!

As to the latter Consideration proposed by Grotius about the Design of Societies, he rightly judgeth, that if those Persons, who by incorporating themselves in States, gave the first Rise to sovereign Power, had been ask'd whether they intended to lay this Burthen on all their Consciences, that they should rather choose to die, than in any Case to oppose by Arms the unjust Violence of their Superiors; they would certainly have answer'd, that it was never in their Thoughts to enjoin such a Hardship. For this would have been a greater Inconvenience, than that which they endeavour'd to avoid by entering into a civil Community. For before they lay open to the Injuries of many, but still with the Right and Power of resisting them: Whereas by this means they must have bound themselves quietly to suffer any Injuries from him, whom they had arm'd with their own Strength. And no doubt Fighting and Contention is a less Evil than certain Death.

VIII. But this Sacredness which we have been hitherto touching upon, doth not belong to any Kings, but those who are really and strictly such. It cannot therefore be claim'd by those, who though they bear the Title of Kings, are yet subject to the Power of the People; as were the ancient Kings of Sparta, and many elsewhere; invested rather with the Authority to persuade, than with Power to command. Such a King was Mezentius in Virgil, against whom —*furiis surrexit Etruria justis,

Regem ad supplicium præsentis morti reposcens.*

By just Revenge the Tuscans set on fire,
With Arms their King to Punishment require.

Those Princes do likewise forfeit this Sacredness, who have either laid down their Dignity, or have utterly deserted and abandon'd the Kingdom; against whom, in case of grievous Injuries offer'd by 'em to others, it is lawful to proceed altogether in the same manner, as we might against private Persons. As for the Example of Semiramis, who having prevail'd with her Husband to resign the Sovereignty to her for Five Days, made use of the Grant to take away the Life of the Giver; this Story proves nothing else but the great Wickedness of the Wife, and the no less Folly of the Husband d. Yet it sometimes happens, that those who have either voluntarily laid down their Authority, or have been deprived of it by some Misfortune, are still permitted to enjoy that formal Veneration of the People, which used to be paid to Princes, and all other external Badges of Majesty. Which Privilege, as it is to be look'd on as meer Imagery, made up of nothing but the regal Trappings and Ornaments; so unless it hath been confirm'd by some Pact and Agreement, it must be conceiv'd to depend entirely on the Favour and Complaisance of others e. Thus Labardée, in his History of France f, rightly observes, that whilst Sedan, and the Territories depending on it, was neither feudatary to the Emperor; nor to the King of France, nor to any other Monarch, or State, the Lords and Proprietors were truly sovereign Princes. But after that Frederic Maurice, Duke of Bouillon, had resign'd this City, with its Dependencies, to Lewis the Thirteenth of France, receiving in lieu of it certain Lands belonging to the French Crown; he required Security to be given him, that he and his Posterity should retain the Title and Character of the former Dignity: Which could not be afterwards reckoned a true independent Honour, such as accompanies sovereign Power; but only a nicer Shadow of princely Greatness, having no farther Effect, than the obtaining such a certain place among the noble Families of France, and some other ornamental Privileges. And the

a Comp. Bæcl. ad Grot. d. l.
d Diodor. Sic. l. 2. c. 18.

b Comp. Ziegler ad Grot. d. l.

c Æn. 8. v. 494, 495.

e An Instance of which we have in Dairo of Japan.

f L. 10. p. 684.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. VIII.

1 V. Grot. l. c. 4. f. 8.

2 This is what Tacitus relates of the ancient Kings of Germany; Mex Rex vel Princeps, prout Decus bellorum, prout facundia est, audiuntur, auctoritate magis suscipiendi, quam jubendi potestate. De Morib. Germanor. c. 11. Vide etiam, c. 7.

Truth of this appears evidently from that Act of the Duke, in desiring Security for his Titles, when he gave up his Dominions. Since those who truly and properly possess the sovereign Dignity, have no need thus to bargain for the Enjoyment of it.

Another way by which a King falls back into the Condition of a private Man, is in case his Kingdom be seiz'd upon as forfeited either by Felony, committed against him whose Fief it is; or by virtue of some Clause inserted in the Donation of the Crown, importing that if the King should act thus or thus, the Subjects should be immediately releas'd from all Obligation to Obedience. So likewise if in conferring the Sovereignty it were expressly agreed, that the Prince in some particular Designs or Practices might be resisted; such a Covenant may no doubt be put in Execution. Lastly, if a Prince constituted by the People shall go about to alienate his Kingdom, or to change the manner of holding the Government, 'tis manifest not only that any such Act of his is null and void; but likewise that in case he endeavour to compass his Design by Force, the People may oppose him in the same manner ^a.

IX. It is another difficult Question what may lawfully be done, and what not, against Invaders and Usurpers of Sovereignty; and this, not after that long Possession, or some subsequent Pact, hath given them a proper Right to govern, but so long as the unjust Cause of their possessing the Throne continues, and whilst they seem to be supported only by Strength. On this Head we are first of all to enquire, whether the Commands of such Usurpers, whilst in Possession, have the Power of obliging? And here we must recollect from what hath been formerly observ'd, that no Obligation to Obedience can be produced in me, unless the other Party had a lawful Authority over me. Meer Violence may indeed lay on a Man some extrinsecal Necessity of doing this or that; but it cannot impose an Obligation, which is an intrinsecal Engagement so binding to the Mind, as to make the Neglect or Omission of it sinful. When therefore a Man is threaten'd with Violence from a stronger Hand, he is perhaps compell'd to perform those things to which he hath no Obligation, and which he really hates and abhors. But if he afterwards find Opportunity, no Man will censure him for breaking his way through these unjust Impositions. But what is to be done, if a Person, who at first indeed seiz'd upon the Government by Violence and evil Arts, would yet be thought to obtain it by Right, and tho' he repositeth his Confidence in Arms, yet professeth to be no Enemy, but a true and proper Prince? As to such Cases this seems in general to be the most probable Solution, that he who actually possesseth the Sovereignty, by whatsoever means he acquires it, is so long to be acknowledg'd by the Subjects for their lawful Prince, as there appears no one who can claim the Crown by a better Right. For then it is consonant to Reason, that the Possessor's Power shall hold good, provided he act like a legal Governor: It being the common Interest of the People, that the Care and Direction of the State should rather lie in any one Person, than that, on the account of having no certain Head, it should be involv'd in endless Disputes and Disturbances. Since therefore the Subjects must be, in this Case, supposed to have, at least tacitly, consented to the Authority of their new Master, they shall be truly oblig'd to yield Obedience to him. Thus 'tis well known by what means the Family of the Cæsars rais'd themselves to the imperial Dignity; and yet St. Paul ascribes the εξουσία, the proper Power to them, as those who were to be obey'd for Conscience sake. And 'twas our Blessed Saviour's Command, Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's. For at that time there was no particular Person who had a better Title to challenge the supreme Authority; and as for the Senate and People of Rome, they had receded from their ancient Right, though more out of Fear, and for want of Strength to make Opposition, than because they approved of this Alteration in the Government. It was a remarkable Law of Henry VII. of England, which enacted, that no Person who had follow'd the Party of the Prince then reigning, should be ever impleaded or condemn'd for that Act as a Criminal, either by legal Process, or by Act of Parliament. The Reasons of which are discuss'd by my Lord Bar-

^a Add. Boeker ad Grot. l. 1. c. 4. f. 10.

^b Aristophanes (in Ranis, Act. 5. Sc. 4. v. 21, 22, 23.) hath a notable Remark to this Purpose: 'Men should not breed up a Lion's Whelp in their City; but if he be once bred up, his Temper must be complied with.'

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. IX.

¹ Ide Grot. ubi Supra, Sect. 12. See our Author in the sixth Chapter of this Book, Self. 10, 11.

² Rom. xiii. 1, 5.

³ Matt. xxii. 21.

⁴ 'They who have more regard to the prevailing Power than to Right, and lay great weight upon the Statute of Henry the Seventh, which authorizes the Acts of a King de Facto, seem not to consider that thereby they destroy all the pretended Right of Inheritance; that he only is King de Facto who is receiv'd by the People; and that this Reception could neither be of any value in its self, nor be made valid by a Statute, unless the People and their Representatives who made the Statute, had in themselves the Power of receiving, authorizing, and creating whom they please. For he is not King de Facto who calls himself so, as Perkin or Simmel, but he who by the Consent of the Nation is possess'd of the Regal Power. If there were such a thing in nature as a natural Lord over every Country, and that the Right must go by Descent, it would be impossible for any Man to acquire it, or for the People to confer it upon him, and to give the Authority to the Acts of one who neither is nor can be a King, which belong only to him who has the Right inherent in himself, and inseparable from him. Neither can it be denied, that the same Power which gives the validity to such Acts as are perform'd by one who is not a King, that belongs to those of a true King, may also make him King; for the Essence of a King consists in the validity of his Acts. And 'tis equally absurd for one to pretend to be a King, whose Acts as King are not valid, as that his own can be valid if those of another are; for then the same indivisible Right which our Author, and those of his Principles assert to be inseparable from the Person, would be at the same time exercis'd and enjoy'd by two distinct and contrary Powers. Moreover it may be observ'd, that this Statute was made after frequent and bloody Wars concerning Titles to the Crown; and whether the Cause were good or bad, those who were overcome were not only subject to be killed in the Field, but also to be prosecuted as Traitors under the Colour of Law. He who gain'd the Victory was always set up to be King by those of his Party, and he never fail'd to proceed against con in his History of that Reign ^a. After the same manner in an hereditary Kingdom, when the Right seems to lie doubtfully between two or more Competitors; whilst the Controversy is yet in Agitation, and 'till such time as it may be determin'd, either by an amicable Accommodation, or by Arms, 'tis the safest Course to obey him who hath the actual Possession ^b. And much more will this Conduct be justifiable in Strangers, whom it doth not concern to examine the Titles by which the Sovereignty hath been obtain'd, but who barely go along with the Possession; especially when the Possessor is supported by great Strength and Power.

X. But when a Person, driving out the lawful Prince, seizeth the Government, and sets himself up for King, tho' he be really the Usurper of another Man's Right; what Course shall an honest Subject take under this Difficulty; in as much as he seems still to owe Allegiance to his rightful Sovereign during his Life? On which Point it appears reasonable to affirm, that things may often come to such an Issue as shall make it not only allowable, but good and necessary to obey the Ruler in Possession by what means soever the Possession was gain'd. As if the lawful Sovereign be reduced to such Streights, that he can no longer exercise any part of the regal Office towards his People. For then, tho' the Commands of the Usurper, being destitute of legal Power, are not in themselves obligatory; yet it becomes a wise Man to consult the Welfare of himself and his Affairs, to make Provision against the Future, and with Wariness and Caution to reflect on his present Condition; that he may not rashly thrust his Life and Fortunes into Danger: As he would do, should he by vain Obstinacy and Opposition, draw the Usurper's Rage upon his own Head, without procuring the least Advantage, either to his Country, or to the ejected Prince. Some are willing to deduce this Doctrine from the 13th Chapter of the Epistle to the Romans, where the Apostle says we ought to obey, ὁ μὲν εἶδ' ἰν' ἐξουσίᾳ, not only for veritas; as if he should have told us, it was not the part of a prudent Person to provoke the Anger of him, who bears the Sword, by an unnecessary Stubbornness; and that therefore, out of regard to our own Safety, we should be subject τοῖς βουσι ἐξουσίας, to the Powers that are in being, that is, which have the present Possession. Since then a State, cannot subsist without some Government, and since he who actually wears the Crown, doth at least in some tolerable Measure, maintain the publick Security; an honest Man and a Lover of his Country ought not, when the Posture of Affairs requires this Proceeding, by an useless Resistance, to give Occasion to farther Troubles. But what seems hardest of all to be resolv'd is, how the Subjects can at the same time keep up two contrary Obligations, one to the lawful Prince now expell'd, and the other to the Possessor, who hath constrain'd them to swear Allegiance to him, and for the present executes the regal Office. For how can a Man pay Fidelity to two together, who are bent upon mutual his Enemies as Rebels. This introduced a horrid Series of destructive Mischiefs. The Fortune of War varied often; and I think it may be said, that there were few if any great Families in England, that were not either destroy'd, or at least so far shaken, as to lose their Chiefs, and many considerable Branches of them: And Experience taught that instead of gaining any Advantage to the publick in point of Government, he for whom they fought seldom prov'd better than his Enemy. They saw that the like might again happen, tho' the Title of the reigning King should be as clear as Descent of Blood could make it. This brought things into an uneasy posture; and 'tis not strange that both the Nobility and Commonalty should be weary of it. No Law could prevent the dangers of Battle; for he that had Followers, and would venture himself, might bring them to such a Decision as was only in the Hand of God. But thinking no more could justly be required to the full performance of their Duty to the King than to expose themselves to the Hazard of Battle for him; and not being answerable for the Success, they would not have that Law which they endeavoured to support, turned to their Destruction by their Enemies, who might come to be Interpreters of it. But as they could be exempted from this Danger only by their own Laws, which could authorize the Acts of a King without a Title, and justify them for acting under him, 'tis evident that the Power of the Law was in their Hands, and that the Acts of the Person who enjoy'd the Crown, were of no value in themselves; the Law had been impertinent, if it could have been done without Law, and the Intervention of the Parliament useless, if the Kings de Facto could have given Authority to their own Acts. But if the Parliament could make that to have the Effect of Law which was not Law, and exempt those that acted according to it from the Penalties of the Law, and give the same force to the Acts of one who is not King as of one who is, they cannot but have a power of making him to be King who is not so; that is to say, all depends entirely upon their Authority. Besides, he is not King who assumes the Title to himself, or is set up by a corrupt Party; but he who according to Usages requir'd in the Case is made King. If these are wanting he is neither de Facto nor de Jure, but Tyrannus de Titulo. Nevertheless, this very Man, if he comes to be receiv'd by the People, and placed in the Throne, he is thereby made King de Facto. His Acts are valid in the Law, the same Service is due to him as to any other: They who render it are in the same manner protected by the Law: that is to say, he is truly King. If our Author therefore do allow such to be Kings, he must confess that Power to be good which makes them so, when they have no Right in themselves. If he deny it, he must not only deny that there is any such thing as a King de Facto, which the Statute acknowledges, but that we never had any King in England; for we never had any other than such, as I have proved before. By the same means he will so unravel all the Law, that no Man shall know what he has, or what he ought to do or avoid; and will find no Remedy for this, unless he allow that Laws made without Kings are as good as those made with them, which returns to my purpose: For they who have the power of making Laws, may by Law make a King as well as any other Magistrate. And indeed the Intention of this Statute could be no other than to secure Mens Persons and Possessions, and so far to declare the power of giving and taking away the Crown to be in the Parliament, as to remove all Disputes concerning Titles, and to make him to be a legal King whom they acknowledge to be King. Sidney's Discourse upon Government, Chap. III. §. 35.

^a 'Tis Irene's Advice in the Historian (Nicet. Choniat.) Nec imperatorem qui absit querendum, nec qui adsit possidendum esse; Neither to seek after a Prince who hath deserted the Crown, nor to disturb a Prince who possesseth it.

^b Cassius Clemens, who had stuck to the party of Niger against Severus, thus makes his Defence to the latter: 'I own'd neither You nor Niger for my proper Master; and tho' I appear'd on the other side, yet my Aim and Endeavour was not to oppose You, but to vanquish Julian. Since then my design was the same with Yours, I am in this respect certainly Guilty of no Fault. Nor am I more worthy of Blame for not revolting afterwards to Your Party. For You would not Your self have been willing that any Friend of Yours should have relinquish'd Your Cause, and gone over as a Deserter to Niger. Xiphilin. Epit. Dion. ad Ann. 193. & Zonar. Tom. 2.

Destruction? And yet, on the other Hand, the Covenant made with the Usurper by the Subjects, and the Faith which they have engaged to him, seem utterly unable to take away the Rights and Pretensions of the lawful Sovereign: as the Composition which a Countryman makes with Robbers, to hinder them from wasting his Estate, is incapable of extinguishing his Landlord's Right and Property. Grotius's Opinion on the Case is this, that if whilst the Usurper is in Possession, the Acts of Sovereignty, which he exerciseth, have a Power of obliging; not by Virtue of his Right (for Right he hath none) but because 'tis in the highest Degree probable, that he abolishes the just Right to the Throne, had rather, as things now stand, that the Commands of him who is thus in Possession should hold good, than that by the ceasing of all Laws and Justice, the Commonwealth should be thrown into utter Confusion ^a.

And indeed, we ought by all means to presume, that every Prince hath so much Humanity, as to desire that his Subjects should be preserv'd by any Method whatsoever, rather than by striving in vain with their ill Fortune and unreasonably expressing an Affection without Strength to support it, they should give themselves up for a fruitless Sacrifice. When the Romans, being themselves in Distress, were petition'd by their Allies the Petili for Relief, their Answer was, 'They confess'd themselves to be no longer in a Condition of supporting their distant Dependents, and therefore desired the Petitioners to return Home, and since they had already given the utmost Specimen of their ' Fidelity, to consult amongst themselves for the future how to make the best of their Affairs' ^c. There appears nothing therefore that can with more probability be affirm'd in the Point before us, than this, that if the lawful Prince be brought into such Streights, as that neither he himself is able to afford his Subjects due Protection, nor they on the other hand able to resist the Usurper, without their imminent Ruin; it must be taken for granted, that he hath for a while releas'd his Subjects from their Obligation towards him, till such Time as Providence shall open a way to his Restoration; so far as is necessary to secure them from Destruction and Danger. And thus too the Fealty promis'd to the Usurper, seems so far only to be binding, as that it shall be a kind of temporary Engagement, to expire so soon as the expell'd Prince shall recover his Dominions; and consisting not so much in any internal Necessity laid upon the Conscience, as in the Force of that Terror under which they now stand. Grotius ^d, in another Case, allows of external Right and Property; and we see no Reason why there may not be admitted some kind of external Obligation, not affecting the Conscience ^e. If we put all these Considerations together, we shall find, that there is scarce any Case, in which a private Person may, by his own Authority disturb an unjust Possessor of the sovereign Dignity: especially since Experience witnesseth, that such Conspiracies do commonly exasperate the usurping Powers to greater Violence and Oppression ^f.

^a L. 1. c. 4. l. 15. Add. l. 2. c. 4. f. 14.

^c Add the Speech of King Ferdinand I. when he fled from Naples, in Guicciardine, Book I. near the latter End.

^d L. 3. c. 7. f. 6.

^e See Kings ii. 2 Chron. xxiii. on which place Mr. Hobbes rightly observes that Abasab was dethron'd, not by any Right which the High Priest had in that Capacity, but by the Right of the young King. Leviticus. c. 44. What Opinion we ought to entertain of those Laws which permit or reward the killing of Tyrants, see in Læ. l. r. on Gen. l. 1. c. 4. f. 17.

^b Comp. 2 Sam. xv. 25, 26. 1 Kings iii. 26.

^f Vid. Justin. l. XVI. c. 5. sub. fin.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. V.

^a Vid. Liv. L. 3. c. 27. ^b As this whole Chapter regards one of the general Duties of Subjects, I think I cannot do better before I proceed to the following one, which treats of the Duties of a Sovereign, than to let down here in a few Words the principal Duties of Subjects of what Rank and Condition soever. Our Author has said nothing of 'em in this Work: But he has given us a concise and clear Idea of them in the last Chapter of his Abridgement of the History of the World, which I shall here translate, and add something to it here and there, which will clearly be distinguish'd by Clotchers. The Duties of Subjects, says he, are either general or particular. The first arise from the common Obligation which they are all under as submitting to the same Government, and as Members of the same Civil State. The others result from the different Employments and particular Offices, with which each Subject is entrusted by his Sovereign. I The General Duties of Subjects respect their Behaviour either towards the Governour of the State, the whole Body of the People, or their Fellow Subjects. 1. As to the Governour, every Subject owes them the Respect, Fidelity and Obedience which their Character demands: So that consequently they ought to live easy under, and be satisfied with the present Government, and not to form any Cabals or seditious Practices against it; to be attached to the Interest of their Prince, to respect and honour him more than any other, to speak and think favourably and with Deference of him and all his Actions. [We ought even to have a Veneration for the Memory of good Princes: But for those who have not been such, behold the judicious Reflections of Montaigne: Among those Laws, says he, which relate to the Dead, I take that to be the best, by which the Actions of Princes are to be examin'd and search'd into after their Decease. They are equal to at least, while alive, if not above the Laws: So that what Justice could not inflict upon their Persons, is but reasonable should be executed upon their Reputation, and the Estates of their Successors, things that we often value even above Life itself. This is a Custom of singular Advantage to those Nations where it is observ'd, and by all good Princes as much to be desired, who have Reason to complain that the Memories of the Tyrannical and Wicked should be treated with the same Honours and Respects as theirs. We owe indeed Subjection and Obedience to all our Kings alike, for that respects their Office; but as to Esteem as well as Affection, those are only owing to their Virtue. Let it be allow'd then, that according to the Rule of Politicks we are patiently to endure unworthy Princes; to conceal their Vices, and to assist them in their indifferent Actions as long as their Authority stands in need of our Support. But the relation of a Prince and Subject being once ended, there is no Reason why we should deny to our own Liberty and common Justice, the publishing of our real Wrongs and Sufferings; and to forbid good Subjects the Glory of having with Respect and Faithfulness serv'd a Prince, whose Imperfections were to them so well known, were to rob Posterity of so useful an Example. And those, who out of regard to some secret Obligation, do contrary to their own Knowledge and Conscience, espouse the Quarrel and vindicate the Memory of a faulty Prince, do a particular Act of Justice at the Expence of, and to the Disadvantage of the publick one. Livy with abundance of Truth says, that the Language of Men educated in Court, was always full of Vanity and Ostentation, and that the Characters they give of their Princes are seldom true; every one indifferently magnifying his own Master, and stretching his Commendations to the utmost extent of Valour and sovereign Grandeur. And perhaps some may condemn the Boldness of those two Soldiers, who, the one being ask'd by Nero, why he did not love him, answer'd him plainly to his Face,

‘ I lov’d thee whilst thou wert worthy of it, but since thou art become a Parricide, an Incendiary, a Waterman, a Player, and a Coachman, I hate thee as thou dost deserve: The other, Why he should attempt to kill him, as warmly reply’d, Because I could think of no other Remedy against thy perpetual Mischief. But the publick and universal Testimonies that were given of him after his Death, and will be to all Posterity, both of him and all other wicked Princes like him, his Tyrannies and abominable Deportment consider’d, who in his right Senses can blame? I am scandaliz’d, I own, that in so sacred a Government as that of the Lacedaemonians, there should be mixt so hypocritical a Ceremony at the Interment of their Kings; where all the Confederates and Neighbours, and all sorts of degrees of Men and Women, as well as their Slaves, cut and slash’d their Foreheads in Token of Sorrow, and repeated in their Cries and Lamentations, that that King (let him be as wicked as the Devil) was the best that ever they had, by this means attributing to his Quality the Praises which only belong to Merit; and that which is properly due to the supreme Merit, tho’ lodg’d in the lowest and most inferior Subject. Essays, Lib. I. Chap. III.] 2. With Respect to the whole Body of the People, ’tis the Duty of every good Subject to make it an inviolable Law to himself, to prefer the Good of the Publick to any other Motive or Advantage whatsoever; cheerfully to sacrifice his Fortune, Life, and even all that he values in the World for the Preservation of the State; and to employ all his Wit, Industry and Address to advance the Honour, and to promote the Advantage of his own Country. [But we must here observe, that a private Interest is not always oppos’d to that of the Publick. Moreover, the common Duties of Subjects answer in this respect to one another, so that the Engagement of every particular Person does in some manner depend upon the performing of what the rest are oblig’d to do, as well as himself, for the publick Good. For, indeed, the publick Good is only the Consequence of the united Forces and Services of many conducting to the same End. If then, in a State, it is as it were become customary for the Generality openly to prefer their own private Interest to that of the Publick; a good Subject will not in that case be to blame in the least, in not caring to expose his Person or his Fortune by a Zeal impotent and useless to his Country. Titius Orosio, DCCXXVII.] 3. And lastly, the Duty of a Subject towards his Fellow-Subjects is to live with them in a peaceable and friendly manner; to be good-humour’d and complaisant to ’em in the Affairs of Human Life, to give Mankind no Uneasiness by peevish and obstinate Tempers; and in short, not to envy or oppose the Happiness or Advantages of any one.

II. The Particular Duties of Subjects are annex’d to certain Posts and Employments, the Discharge of which influences in some measure either the whole Government of the State, or only one part of it. There is one general Maxim which serves for all of ’em, and that is, that no one aspire to any publick Employment, or even presume to accept of it, when he knows himself not duly qualified for it. [Those few wise and good Men who are Members of the Commonwealth, would doubtless be better pleas’d to retire into themselves and live at Ease; full of that sweet Content, which excellent and intelligent Persons know how to give themselves, in the Contemplation of the Beauties of Nature, and the Works of Providence, than to sacrifice all this Satisfaction to Business and a publick Post; were it not that they hope to do some good in being serviceable to their Country by their own Endeavours, and in preventing the Administration of Affairs from falling into ill or unskilful Hands. This may and ought to prevail with Persons of this Character, to consent to the trouble of being Magistrates: But to cabal and make Parties, and court Employments of Trust with Eagerness and Passion, especially such as are judicial, is a very base and scandalous Practice, condemn’d as such by all good Laws, even those of pagan Republicks (as the Julians Law among the Romans abundantly testifies) unbecoming a Man of Honour; and the shrewdest sign that can be, that the Person is unfit for the Trust he seeks so vehemently. To buy publick Offices is still more infamous and abominable, the most fordid, and the most villanous way of Trading in the World: For it is plain, he that buys in the piece, must make himself whole by selling out again in Parcels. Which was a good Reason for the Emperor Severus, when he was declaiming against a Fault of this Nature, to say, That it was very hard to condemn a Man for making Money of that which he had given Money for before.—Just for all the World as a Man dresses and sets his Person in Order and Form, putting on his best Face before he goes abroad, that he may make a Figure, and appear well in Company; so is it fit that a Man should learn to govern his own Passions, and bring his Mind to good Habits, before he presume to meddle with publick Business, or take upon him the Charge of governing other People. No Man is so weak, as to enter the Lists with an unmanag’d Horse, or to hazard his Person with such an one in any Service of Consequence and Danger; but trains and teaches him first, breeds him to his hand, and uses him to the Exercise he is design’d for: And is there not the same Reason that this wild and restless part of our Soul should be tamed and accustomed to bear the Bit? Should he perfectly instructed in those Laws and Measures which are to be the Rules of our Actions and upon which the good or ill Conduct of our Lives will depend? Is it not reasonable, I say, that a Man should be Master of his own private Behaviour, and expert in making the best of every Accident and Occasion, before he venture out upon the publick Stage; and either give Laws to others, or correct them for the Neglect of those they have already? And yet (as Socrates observ’d very truly) the manner of the World is quite otherwise: For, tho’ no body undertakes to exercise a Trade, to which he has not been educated, and served a long Apprenticeship; and how mean and mechanical soever the Calling be, several Years are bestowed upon the Learning of it; yet in the case of publick Administrations, which is of all other Professions the most intricate and difficult (so absurd, so wretchedly careless are we) that every body is admitted, every body thinks himself abundantly qualified to undertake them. These Commissions are made Compliments and things of Court, without any Consideration of Mens Abilities, or regarding at all, whether they know any thing of the Matter; as if a Man’s Quality, or the having an Estate in the Country, could inform his Understanding, or secure his Integrity, or render him capable of discerning between Right and Wrong, and a competent Judge of his poorer (but perhaps much honest and wiser) Neighbours. Charron de la Sagesse, Liv. III. Chap. 17. Sect. 1, 2.] But we must still say something more. 1. Ministers of State, or Privy Counsellors, ought with the greatest Application to study and perfectly know the Affairs and Interests of the State in all the parts of Government: and to propose faithfully, and in the most proper manner, whatever appears to them to be advantageous to the Publick, without being influenced by either Affection, Passion, or any sinister Views: The publick Good ought to be the only design of all their Advice and Endeavours, and not the Advancement of their own private Fortunes, and the promoting their own Greatness and Power. Nor must they ever by vile and nauseous Flattery, countenance or encourage the criminal Inclinations of the Prince. They should never be engag’d in any Faction or Party whatsoever; keep nothing secret that ought to be discover’d, nor discover any thing that ought to be kept secret, should still show themselves above the Power of all Temptations; and never neglect the Affairs of the State for their Pleasures, or their own private Concerns. [Now in Persons thus to be chosen and employ’d, several Qualifications are necessary: As, first of all, it is necessary to choose such as are faithful, and fit to be trusted; that is, in one Word, Men of Virtue and good Principles. I take it for granted (says Pliny) that the better Man any one is, the more such and true he is, and more safe to be depended upon. 2. They must be Persons of Ability, and proper for this Office, not only in regard of their Knowledge and Learning in general, but upon the Account of their Skill in Politicks, and that express Form of Government in particular; such as have been used and try’d before, and have come off with Honour and Success, versed in Business, and accustomed to Difficulties: For Hardships and Adversities are the most useful and improving Lessons. Fortune, says Mithridates in Salust, in the room of many Advantages which she has torn from me, has given me the Faculty of Advice and Persuasion. And in one word, they must be wise and discreet, moderately quick, and not too sprightly and sharp, for such Men will be always projecting. And Men of Fire are more for Change than for steady Management. Now in order to these Qualifications, it is necessary they should be Men of ripe Years, to give them Staidness, Experience and Consideration: Nay, I may add, to inspire them with Caution too, for it is one of the many Unhappineses attending Youth, that Persons then are easily impos’d upon; of which the Tenderness and Softness of their Brain may perhaps be one Reason, that may dispose them the more easily to receive any Impression, and consequently to Credulity and easiness of Temper. It is for the convenience of a Prince to have notable Men of all sorts about him; both those that excel in Subtilty and Cunning. The former indeed ought to be more numerous, and are more especially requisite, because they are more for the Honour of their Master, and of more constant use; for these are the managers of all regular and ordinary Proceedings. The Men of Art are for cases of Necessity and extraordinary Emergencies, to help at a pinch, and to countermine a Danger. A third Qualification necessary for privy Counsellors, is Openness and Freedom and Courage in all their Behaviour, when consulted with. They must use their utmost Care that all their Proposals be for the Honour and Advantage of their Prince; and when once they have secured this point, that the Advice be wise and good, all Flattery and Disguise should be laid aside; all Equivocations and Reservations, and Craftiness of Expression detested and despised, by which they may seem to aim at ingratiating themselves, or to contrive that what they say may be acceptable to their Master. These are the Men Tacitus describes, who accommodate their Language as they see occasion, and do not so properly discourse with their Prince, as with his present Inclinations and Circumstances. They consider him as a great Man, as one able to make their Fortunes; they observe what he would do, not what is best for him to do. Whereas, indeed, all these Regards ought to be utterly banished their Thoughts, they should have a constant Eye upon the Sacredness of their Office, and the Importance of the Trust reposed in them; and looking no further than the Reason, and Justice, and Convenience of the Thing, speak the Truth, and spare not: I or however harsh and distasteful this Liberty, and Openness, and honest blunt dealing may be at the present to those Persons, whose Opinion and Inclinations it happens to cross; yet there will soon come a time when 't will obtain Respect and Esteem. Opposition is offensive just at the instant; but upon cooler thoughts the very Persons you opposed will commend and admire your plain dealing. A Man should likewise take care to be consistent with himself, firm to his Principles, without veering and wheeling about perpetually, as oft as other Peoples Humours shift into a fresh Quarter. But as he must not be changeable and obsequious in a base compliance with the Passions and Pleasures of others, so neither must he be stiff and peremptory in his own Opinions. There is always a decency to be observed, and great difference to be made between Constancy and Contradiction. For Opiniatry and Fierceness confounds all manner of Deliberation; and therefore I am far from desiring my good Counsellor to be inflexible; as knowing very well, that hearkening to other Mens Reasons, and changing our own Opinions upon them, is so far from deserving the Reproach of Rashness and Inconstancy, that it ought rather to be looked upon as a Testimony of Modesty, and Ingenuity, and great Prudence. For although the wise Man always walks in the same way, and by the same rule, yet he does not always go the same pace, nor tread in the same steps; change he does not then so properly as accommodate and mend himself; like the skilful Sailor, who plies to every Wind, and whose excellency lies in trimming the sails that way that the Gale blows freshest. Thus the Man must often go about to make the Port he designs, when there is no coming at it by a straight Course. And it shews the Dexterity and Address of a Statesman to be able to change his Methods, when those which were first chosen are either disapproved, or by some Accident rendered useles and ineffectual. Another necessary Accomplishment for this Post, is the making of a Conscience of revealing any Debates he shall be privy to. For Silence and Secrecy are exceeding necessary in the management of all publick Affairs: Inſomuch, that a great Author has pronounced it impossible for that Man to manage any matter of Consequence, who is not so much Master of himself as to keep his own Council. For how should he support the weight of Publick Business, to whom even Silence is a Burden? But upon this occasion the concealing what one knows is not sufficient, I must likewise caution him against knowing too much. A curious and inquisitive Temper, which loves to be busy and inform it self of other peoples Actions and Concerns, is no commendable Quality in any case; but to pry into the Affairs of Princes, and to value one's self upon knowing their Secrets, is as dangerous as it is unmannerly: And as Tacitus has well observ'd, nothing is more hazardous, nothing more unfit for us, than officiously to dive into, and be bold with their retired Thoughts and Intentions. And therefore whatever a Man knows of this kind should come freely and without his seeking; nay, I make no difficulty to affirm, that it is commendable in a Man to decline the Opportunities of having such things imparted to him, and to know as little of them as possible he can. This argues Reverence and Modesty, prevents all Jealousies, and suits the distance between a Prince and his Subjects. Thus have I given my Reader a short Account of those good Conditions which seem necessary for the qualifying Men to be Politicians or privy Counsellors. And by these he will be able to tell himself, what are those ill Qualities which incapacitate a Man for such a Trust. That a Prince in making his choice should be sure to reject all such as are of confident, assuming, and presumptuous Tempers; because these Vices make Men hot and arrogant in Debates, positive and bold in their own sense: And a wise Man, quite contrary, will be content to allow second and third Thoughts, to examine every thing over and over. It is the Character of such a one to suspect himself, to be jealous of the consequence, fearful in advising and resolving, that so he may afterwards be more vigorous and assured, when he comes to execution. For the mind that knoweth how to be afraid, and undertakes warily, will act more securely, and go upon surer grounds. Fools, quite contrary, are eager and assured, blind and bold in Debate; but when they come to Action, cowardly and tame. Advice given with Heat and Confidence, looks fair and gay at first sight; but the Execution of it is hard and desperate, and the Event of it full of grief and disappointment. Next to this presumptuous Vanity and Heat, Passion is improper for such Ministers of State; all Anger and Envy, Hatred and Spight, Avarice and Ambition, all selfish Narrowness of Spirit and private Interest; for these are all of them Corrupters of the best Sense, the very Bane of all sound Judgment; Integrity and faithful Discharge of a publick Character cannot dwell in the same Breast with these personal Piques, and private Affections. Private Advantage ever did, and ever will obstruct and confound Publick Counsels, and each single Man's Profit is that which poisons all good Sense, and kind Inclination to the Common Good. Nothing more remains absolutely necessary to be avoided, and that is Precipitation; an irreconcilable Enemy to Prudence and good Counsel; and fit for nothing but to put Men upon doing amiss, and then being alham'd and unfortunate upon that Account. Charron de la Sageſſe, Liv. III. Ch. II. Sect. 17. 2. The Clergy as being the publick Ministers of Religion, ought to discharge their Function with the utmost Gravity and Application; should teach no Doctrine, nor advance any Opinion in Religion, which does not appear to them to be sincerely true; should be themselves a shining Example by their own Deportment, of those Instructions which they deliver to the people; nor should ever dishonour their Character, or lose all the Advantage and Efficacy of their Calling, by the Disgrace of a scandalous and irregular Life. [Since then the Clergy are, or should be at least, the publick Masters of Virtue for the People, who gladly hear them, and put a mighty confidence in them; it is of great moment to make a good choice of them, especially in places that are very full of People. They are in some measure, like the Demagogues among the Greeks, and the Tribunes among the Romans; with this Exception, that they do not meddle, or ought not to meddle with, State-Affairs. Those who gain the Hearts of the Populace, can often set 'em in a Flame, and retain 'em just as they please, can raise them in what passion they have a mind to, or on the contrary persuade them to Moderation and Peace. If the People, from some Accident or Opinion, take the Opportunity of making Disturbances, 'tis not so much the People whom we ought to condemn, as those who spirit them up and excite them to it. One shall rarely hear of any Commotions in a Town, unless backed by them whose Business it is to teach in publick or privately. Those who take upon themselves to discharge with Reputation to difficult an Employment, ought chiefly to be endow'd with two Qualifications. The first, is their having a Knowledge, and being acquainted with Religion, that is to say, that they have with Care and Diligence applied themselves to the Study of the Holy Scriptures, and meditated so upon them, as to be able perfectly to understand all the Duties of Christianity, and all their Consequences, together with the Grounds on which they are built. This ought to be the Foundation of their Studies, and the End to which all their Reading and all their Meditations ons should be directed. To this purpose all their Knowledge in H. story, in Morality, in Philosophy, in polite Learning, and all in general that they make their study, ought to be employ'd by them, nor ought they to esteem any thing but according as it may be of service in putting them in a Condition to persuade Men to the Obedience of the Gospel. The second Qualification necessary for them to have, is that their Behaviour be consistent with what they teach, so that they be a Pattern of those Christian Virtues which they instruct others in. For tho' an Angelical Perfection, as being above the Power and Abilities of Human Nature, is not to be required of them, and one ought to excuse their Frailties as well as those in other Men; yet it is certain that Mankind expect from them and with good Reason too, not only more Knowledge and Learning, but more Virtue also. An Honest Man, when we speak of such as follow another way of Living, is a Man who acts nothing that is scandalous, or punishable by the Laws, and who performs the external Duties of Societies, so as not to deserve to be reproach'd by the World with any thing that's base and infamous, according to the manner of Living and the Custom of the Country for Persons of his Rank and Circumstances. This Notion of an Honest Man is conformable to all the vicious Customs, and all the Corruptions of the Times and Places where those who made it, happen to be educated in; and tho' the Depravation of Manners is not every where equal, nor it may be the same, yet it is too true, that there is no place whatsoever, where Men do not forgive in each other a great many Vices, and even to a degree far beyond what the Evangelical Rule allows of. For example, a Man may be immoderately ambitious, or aim at Employments that he is not qualified for, and endeavour to get into them by all the Methods that are not liable to Punishment; and this purely to gratify his own Vanity, and not with a design to be serviceable to the Publick; yet not be reputed a dishonest Man, nor be looked upon by any with scorn and indignation. A Man may, and still maintain this very Character, be infinitely more covetous, and more addicted to his Pleasures than the Gospel suffers, or do any thing that does not give any occasion of scandal in places where he lives, either to improve his Fortune, or to waste his Time in greater Variety of Voluptuousness. But a great deal more is required to make such a kind of Honest Man pass for a Good Man, according to the Precepts of the Gospel, or indeed according to those of Moral Philosophy: They, whose Profession it is to instruct others in the Principles of Religion, must not be satisfied with being Honest Men, in the sense which those Words are generally taken; but must be Good Men in the Gospel Sense; that is, they must be subject to no habitual Sin, but especially to such as are upon all Accounts inconsistent with true Piety and Devotion. Now if the Persons who are chosen in this Affair, are not of the clearest Characters, two Evils must necessarily arise from thence. The first is, that their bad Example will do abundantly more Mischiefs, than their good Sermons can do good. Mankind are by Nature much more inclin'd to follow the World; and therefore a Clergyman, who lives a regular Life, does by his Manners much better convince the People, that 'tis their Duty to live well, than the greatest Orator could do by the most studied and Rhetorical Discourse; as on the contrary, if he leads a disorderly one, his vicious manners will make a deeper Impression upon their Minds, than all he can be able to say to 'em. There is no need of producing Instances to prove this; 'tis what daily Experience tells the whole World. And therefore advise People as much as you will, to do as such Men say, and not as they do; they will always be sure to follow the Ill they do, and forget all the Good they say. Never did a Person of an ambitious and wrangling Temper, inspire by his Discourses, a Contempt for the Grandeur of the World, or the Love of Peace. Never did a covetous Preacher make his Hearers liberal. Never did a voluptuous Clergyman persuade any one to abstain from Pleasures, or to use them with Moderation; at least when those Persons were discovered to be what they really were. Parrochiana, Tom. II Pag. 235, &c.] 3. The Publick Professors and Masters of Arts and Sciences, must not teach any thing that is false or pernicious to the Minds of the People whom they are employ'd to instruct; nor advance any Principle tho' never so true, that they do not prove by solid and convincing Reasons, sufficient to enlighten the Understanding of their Scholars; must carefully avoid broaching any Opinion that may be likely to disturb the Government; and ought to look upon all Human Learning that is not useful to Mankind either in private or publick Affairs, to be vain and empty Speculations. 4. Magistrates, and all other Officers of Justice, should be easy of Access to every Body; protect the common People against the Oppressions of the more powerful ones; be as forward in doing Justice, and that with the same Impartiality to the Mean and the Poor, as to the Great and Rich; not spin out a Cause to an unnecessary length; never suffer themselves to be corrupted by Bribes and Solicitations; examine thoroughly into the Matter before 'em, and then determine it without Passion or Prejudice; regardless of every thing while they are doing their Duty. [Magistrates have a mixt Quality, and are placed in a middle Station between sovereign Princes, and private Subjects. These Subalterns therefore have a double Task incumbent on them, and must learn both how to command and how to obey. To obey the Princes, who trust and employ them, to submit to, and truckle under the paramount Authority of their superior Officers; to pay Respect to their Equals; to command those under his Jurisdiction, to protect and defend the poor, and those who are unable to contend for their own; to stand in the Gap and oppose the powerful Oppressor; and to distribute Right and Justice to all sorts and conditions of Men whatsoever. And, if this be the Business of a Magistrate, well might it grow into a Proverb, that the Office discovers the Man, since no mean Abilities, no common Address, can suffice for the sustaining so many Characters at once, and to act each part so well as to merit a general Applause and Approbation. As to the Sovereign, by whose Commission the Magistrates act, his Commands must be the rule of their Behaviour. Some of his Orders they ought to execute speedily; some again they must by no means comply with; or be in any Degree instrumental in the Execution of them; and in others the most adviseable Course of the Matter to the Magistrate, such as those of Oyer and Terminer; and in all others where there is this Clause (so far as to you shall appear) or any other Clause equivalent to this, inferred; on which, tho' they do not refer the Cognizance to him, yet order such things, as are either manifestly just, or at least lawful or indifferent in their own Natures, he ought readily to obey, and without demur; for here is no difficulty, nor any ground at all for a just and reasonable Scruple. In such Commissions and Orders, as do not leave the Cognizance of the Matter to him, but only decree some point of executive Obedience; as in those particularly, which we commonly call Mandates and Warrants; if they be contrary to any positive Law, which the Sovereign has power to dispense with, and there be clauses of Non-Obstante for that purpose, to save the party harmless; he is obliged to obey his Orders without more to do. Because, according to the Civil Constitution, and the Laws of the Land, the Sovereign has a Liberty reserv'd to him of relaxing, or setting aside the Laws in such particular Cases. And the having such a Power over all Laws whatsoever, is the very thing in which absolute and unlimited Sovereignty consists. In cases contrary to Law, or such as manifestly make against the publick Good (tho' there should be an indemnifying Clause) or where the Magistrate knows his Orders to be obtain'd by surpris or upon false suggestions, or by corrupt Methods, he ought not, in any of these cases, to be hasty in the executing his Orders; but let them lie by a while, and with all Humility remonstrate against them; and, if occasion be, repeat those Remonstrances a second or a third time; but if the Command be peremptory, and unalterable, and repeated as often; then he is to comply so far as in Honour and good Conscience he may, and for the rest to excuse himself as well as he can. In matters contrary to the Law of God and Nature, he must lay down his Office, and be content to quit all; nay resolve to suffer the worst that can come, rather than be instrumental in, or consenting to them. I cannot so much as allow him to deliberate, or once to doubt in such Circumstances what to do; for natural Justice cannot be hid, it shines clearer and brighter than the Sun; and all Men must see it, except those who wilfully shut their Eyes, and wink hard against it. All this Advice relates to things in agitation, and intended or ordered to be done; but, as for those which the Sovereign has done already, let them be never so wicked and unreasonable, a Man had better dissemble the Matter as well as he can, and try to wipe out all Remembrance of it, than lose all by provoking and expostulating with a Prince to no purpose; as Papinian did did. For it is the very extremity of Madness to strive against a Stream; where no Ground is got, nor any thing but Hatred and Disfavour for our Pains. As for their Duty, when considered in their other Capacity, and with regard to the private Subjects under their Government, Magistrates must always remember whose their Authority is, and from whence they derive it. That this is none of their own proper Right, but merely a Trust; that they hold it from and under the Prince; that he has the Fee, and is the Lord and constant Proprietor; but they are Tenants and Stewards at Will, put in to exercise this part of his Jurisdiction for so long a Term only, as their Commission purports; or during his pleasure, and no longer. Now hence it is very natural and obvious to infer, That a Magistrate ought to be easy of access; always ready and at leisure to hear and receive the Petitions and Complaints preferred to him: That his Doors should be open to all Comers, and he as seldom out of the way as possible; but especially not so wilfully, and by contrivance; for he should consider himself, as no longer at his own disposal, but a Servant of the Publick, and devoted to the use and benefit of the People: And this was the Reason why Moses's Law commanded that the Judges should keep their Sessions, and decide Controversies in the Gates or their Cities; that so Justice might offer it self to all that went out and in, and none might find any Difficulty in addressing for, or obtaining it. He ought to receive the Applications of all Persons and Conditions alike; and be open and kind to all, the mean as well as the great; and the poor no less than the rich. Upon which Account it is, that one of the Philosophers compares a Magistrate to an Altar; to which all People have recourse in their Affliction and extreme Necessity, pour out their Souls there, and depend upon Relief and Consolation for their Troubles from so doing. But, though in point of Justice, he should be free and open, yet in Friendship and Acquaintance he ought to be exceedingly reserv'd, not to make himself cheap and common, not to admit any one into his Familiarities, and intimate Conversation, except some very choice Persons, such as are known to be Men of sound Sense, and staunch Virtue; and these too but privately. For, a large and general Acquaintance debases the Authority of his Character; and abates of that Firmness and Vigour which is necessary for the discharge of it. When Cleon was chosen and admitted to the Government, he called all his Friends together, and solemnly renounced from that time whatever Friendship had been formerly between them, as thinking the continuing under such Engagements by no means reconcilable with the Trust he had now taken upon him; and Cicero observes accordingly, that a Man must put off the Character of a Friend and lay that quite aside, before he can do Right to the part of a Judge. There are two things, wherein the Office of a Magistrate consists; the one is, to preserve and keep up the Honour and Dignity, and just Right of the Prince who has employ'd him, and of the Publick, whose Representative he is, with a becoming State, with Gravity, authoritative Behaviour, and a well-tempered Severity. Next, he is to act like a true and faithful Transcript, from the Original; an Interpreter and Executor of his Master's Will; and to see that this be duly declared, and diligently observ'd. By his Will, I mean the Law; for this is the authentick Will of the Prince, and the only Declaration of it, which Subjects are bound to take notice of. Of this the Magistrate is to exact a faithful Account and punctual Obedience; for which Reason we often find him termed by Authors, The Living and the Speaking Law. Now, tho' it be the Duty of a Magistrate, and an excellent Qualification in him, to temper Justice with Prudence; and Severity with Gentleness and Forbearance; yet, it must be confess'd much more for the common Advantage, to have such Magistrates as incline to the Excess of Sharpness and Rigour, than those who are disposed to Mildness, and Easiness, and Compassion. For even God himself, who highly recommends, and so strictly enjoins all those human and soft Dispositions upon other Occasions, yet positively forbids a Judge to be mov'd with Pity. The strict and harsh Magistrate is the better Restraint, the stronger Curb; he contains people in bounds, and preserves a due Awe and Obedience of the Laws. The mild and merciful one exposes the Law to contempt; makes Magistracy cheap, and lessens the Prince, who made both the Law and the Magistrate, in the Eyes and Esteem of his People. In one word, there must go two Qualifications to the capacitating a Man for the discharging this Office compleatly, Integrity and Courage; the first cannot subsist alone, but stands in need of the second to support and back it; the former will be sure to keep the Magistrates Hands clean from Avarice and Partiality, and Respect of Persons, from Bribery and Gifts, which are the Bane, and utter Exterminators of Truth; and from any other Violation of Justice; which Plato calls (which indeed it ought to be) a pure unblemish'd Virgin: This will also be a Guard to him against his Passions; the Aversions or Affection he may bear to the Parties concerned; then he will find great occasion for Courage too, to stand his Ground against the Menaces and imperious Solicitations of great Men, and Requests and Importunities of Friends, who fancy they have a sort of Right to dispose of him, and will not take a reasonable refusal: To harden him against the Prayers and Tears, the loud Cries and bitter Complaints of the miserable and afflicted; for all these are very moving and forcible Inducements, a great Violence, upon Reason and Duty; and yet so committed, that there is plausible Appearance of both, in the very diversion they labour to give us from both. And the Truth is, this Firmness and inflexible Constancy of Mind is the most masterly Virtue, and particular Excellence of a Magistrate; that he neither be terrified and subdued by Greatness and Power, nor melted by Miseries and deplorable Circumstances. These are what very brave Men are often transported by; and therefore it is the greater Praise to continue proof against them. For, though being soften'd by the latter, it have an Air of good Nature, and is more likely to prevail upon the better sort of Men; yet either of the extremes are sinful, and both foreign to the Merits of the Cause, which is the only thing that lies upon a Judge. The Motives of Pity then are very dangerous Temptations; and what a Man in Authority ought as much to stop his Ears against, as Promises or Threatnings; for even that God himself, who is Love and Mercy in perfection, has discountenanced this unseasonable Compassion. And the same Legislator, who said Thou shalt not receive a Gift to blind thine Eyes therewith, neither shalt thou accept the Person of the Meek, found it no less necessary for the good of Mankind, and the equal Distribution of Justice, no less agreeable to his Goodness, to add that other Command, Thou shalt not favour a poor Man in his Cause. Charron de la Sagesse. Liv. 3. Chap. 17. Sect. 3, &c. 5. The Generals, Captains, and other Officers in the Army ought to exercise their Soldiers carefully and at convenient Times, to inure them to bear the Hardships and Fatigue of War; should strictly observe all the Rules of Military Discipline; never expose, nor hazard their Troops, but when there is an absolute necessity for it; should take care as far as in them lies, that their Soldiers have a constant regular supply of Provisions, and not defraud them of their Pay and Allowance; never strive to win their Affection to the prejudice of the Government, but always inspire them with Sentiments conformable to the Good of the Country and the publick Welfare. 6. Soldiers, on the other hand ought to be content with their Pay, and not plunder, nor abuse in any manner whatsoever, either Citizens, or the Country-people; should cheerfully and with resolution expose themselves to the Fatigues and Hazards to which they are called for the Defence and Honour of their Country; should as much avoid the imprudent Ardour of running into unnecessary Dangers, as the base Cowardise of flying when there is occasion for their standing; should shew their Valour and Intrepidity upon the Enemy, and not upon their Comrades; should valiantly maintain their Posts, and prefer a glorious and honourable Death to an ignominious Flight and Life. 7. Ambassadors, Plenipotentiaries, Envoys, and others that bear any Publick Character abroad, ought to behave themselves with great Prudence and Circumspection; to be Persons of deep Penetration, carefully to distinguish Solidities from Trifles, and Truth from Falshood; inviolable in keeping a Secret, and proof against any Corruption or Temptation that might make them neglect or abandon the Interest of their Prince. [A publick Minister, or a Plenipotentiary, is a Camelion, a Proteus; sometimes, like a cunning Gamester, he dissembles his very Humour and Temper, as well to avoid the Conjectures and Penetration of others, as to prevent any Secret escaping thro' Passion or Weakness; is always ready to put on that Shape his Designs and Occasions require, and artificially appears what it is his Interest to be thought. Thus when he designs to dissemble that his Master is very Formidable or very Low Low, he is resolute and inflexible, to prevent any large Demands; or easy and complaisant, to give others occasion to make them, and to secure the same Liberty. At other times he is profound and subtil, to conceal a Truth in the very publishing of it; because it concerns him to divulge it, and that it should not be believed: Or else free and open, that whenever he shall have occasion to conceal what must be kept secret, People may not so much as suspect him; but on the contrary, believe he has discover'd whatever he knew. In like manner he is warm and verbose, to excite others to talk, or to hinder their speaking what he desires not to hear, or their acquainting him with what he would be ignorant of; talks of indifferent Things which soften and destroy one another, and leaves the Mind confounded betwixt Confidence and Distrust; that he may make amends for one lost Opportunity by dextrously gaining another: Or he is cool and silent to engage others to talk; hears patiently a tedious while to obtain the same Favour himself; talks with superiority and weight when he designs to make such Promises or Threats as may carry a great stroke with them, and make a strong Impression upon such to whom they are directed. Sometimes he speaks first, the better to discover the Oppositions and Contradictions, Intrigues and Cabals of foreign Ministers upon the Propositions he has to advance, and take his Measures from their Answers. At another Meeting he stays till the last, that he may be sure not to lose his Labour; to be more exact; to observe every thing that may be serviceable to his Master, or his Allies: To know what to ask, and what he can obtain: He knows how to be clear and expellive, or obscure and ambiguous; can use equal Words and Turns, which he can render more or less forcible, as his Interest and Occasions require. He asks little, because he won't grant much; or his Requests are large, that he may be sure of a little: Desires small things which he pretends to be of no value, that they may not hinder him of greater; avoids the gaining an important Point at first, as it is like to hinder him of several, which, tho' in themselves of less value, yet united exceed the other. His Demands are extravagant, with design to be denied, that he may be furnish'd with a just Excuse for refusing those he knows will be made: As industrious to aggravate the enormity of these, and as warmly to urge the Reasons why he cannot hearken to them, as earnestly to endeavour to enervate those which they pretend for their Denial: Equally concerned to aggrandize the little he offers, as to slight openly the little they are willing to grant. Feigns extraordinary Proffers which beget a Distrust, and oblige them to reject what indeed accepted would be useles; this serves to colour his exorbitant Demands, and to throw the blame of the refusal upon them: He grants more than they can ask, to get more of them; shews himself very hard and unwilling to grant trivial things, that he may quash all Hopes and Expectations of better from him; or if he is persuaded to part with any thing, 'tis on such Conditions that he may share the Advantages of it. He directly or indirectly espouses the Interest of an Ally, as he finds it profitable, or as it tends to advance his Pretensions; talks of nothing but Peace and Alliances, the publick Good and Tranquillity; in all which he means nothing but his Master's Interest; sometimes he reconciles disagreeable Parties, at other times he divides those he found united; terrifies the strong and potent, and encourages the weak: Unites several feeble Interests against a powerful one, to render the Balance equal; joins with the former, that they may desire his Alliance and Protection which he sells at a dear rate: knows how to interest those with whom he treats, and by a dextrous Management, by fine and subtil Turns, makes 'em sensible of their private Advantage, the Riches and Honour they may hope for by a little Easiness which will not in the least clash with their Commissions, nor the Intentions of their Masters. And that he may not be thought impregnable on this side, betrays some small Concern for his own Fortune; discovers by this their most secret Intentions, the most profound Designs, and last Efforts; which he turns to his own Advantage. If he is injur'd in any considerable Article, he is very loud, but if he finds he is not so, is yet louder, and throws the injur'd on their Justification and Defence. All his Measures were order'd, his Steps pointed out, and his least Advance preferib'd by the Court, yet he appears as complaisant and free in the most difficult Contexts, as if all his Compliances were extempore, and purely owing to his condescending Temper. He dares even engage to an Assembly that the Proposals shall be approv'd of, and that his Master will not ditown him. He spreads false Rumours concerning those things which he alone is entrusted with; he closely reserv'd some particular Instructions, these he never discloses, but at such Extremities as to neglect the use of them would be pernicious. All his Intrigues tend to solid and substantial Ends, for which he willingly sacrifices Punctilio's, and imaginary Points of Honour. He has a great deal of Phlegm, and is arm'd with Resolution and Patience; fatigues and discourages others, but is himself unwearied. He's forewarn'd and fortified against all tedious Delays and Affronts, Jealousies and Suspicions, Difficulties and Obstacles; fully persuaded that Patience and an happy Conjunction will influence their Minds and accomplish his desired Ends. He feigns a secret Interest to break off the Negotiation, when he passionately desires its Continuance; but on the contrary, when he has strict Orders to use his last Endeavours to break it off, thinks the best way to effect it is to press its Continuation. After a very great Event, he is either stiff or easy, according as it is advantageous or prejudicial; and if by a vast Prudence he can foresee any thing advantageous to the State, he follows it close, temporizes and manages himself according to the Hopes, Fears, and Necessities of his Master; takes his Measures from Time, Place, and Occasion, his own Strength and Weakness, the Genius of the Nation he treats with, and the particular Temper and Character of their Ministers. All his Maxims, Designs, and most refin'd Politicks tend only to prevent being deceiv'd, and to deceive others. Mr. de la Bruyere's Caracteres at Chap. du Souverain & de la Republique. This indeed is a very fine Description of a publick Minister, or a Plenipotentiary; but, however such a Description in which every particular is not to be imitated. We may also consult Mr. Wicamefort's Book intitled, L'Amassadeur & ses Fonctions.'] 8. The Commissioners, or Receivers of the Revenues belonging to the State, and in general all those who have the Management of the publick Money, ought to take care not to use any unnecessary Severity, nor to exact more of the Subjects than what they are tax'd at, to enrich themselves, and burden others; should apply none of the publick Treasure that passes through their Hands to their own use, and satisfy those whom they have Orders to pay out of it, without making them stay a long time for their Money. But all these particular Duties of Subjects cease with the publick Posts and Employments from whence they flow. Whereas the General Duties remain still in force, as long as Men are Subjects and live under any Form of Government.

C H A P. IX.

Of the Duty of Sovereigns:

- | | |
|---|---|
| I. The Office and Duty of Sovereigns, whence to be discover'd. II. The Obligation that Princes have to be well instructed in it. III. The People's Safety is the supreme Law. IV. The Subjects are to be train'd up in good Manners. V. Fit Laws are to be enaſted, VI. And put in Execution. VII. Penalties are to be inflicted with Juſtice and Moderation. | VIII. The Subjects are to be refrain'd from mutual Injuries. IX. An able and honeſt Miniſtry is to be employ'd in State Affairs. X. Taxes are to be equally laid, and rightly gather'd. XI. The Wealth of the State is to be advanced. XII. Factions to be prohibited. XIII. A ſufficient Force to be kept up for the oppoſing of foreign Invaders. |
|---|---|

IT remains that we take a View of the Duty of Sovereigns; which ought to be explain'd with eſpecial Care and Diligence; as well in regard, that the Ignorance or Neglect of this Duty is the Occaſion of ſo many Miſchiefs in the World, as becauſe to deliver the Rules and Meaſures of it, is the proper Buſineſs of this general Part of civil Knowledge, it being placed beyond the Bounds of municipal Laws. Yet in as much as others have frequently inculcated theſe Points, we ſhall reckon our Task diſcharg'd, in barely repeating the chief Heads ^a. The Precepts then which unite in the making up of this Duty, may eaſily be gather'd, by examining the Nature and End of civil Communities, and the proper Offices belonging to the ſovereign Power.

II. Here then it is before all things neceſſary that Princes induſtriouſly apply themſelves to the underſtanding of every thing, that falls under the compleat Diſcharge of their Truſt; ſince no Man can manage with Commendation what he hath not firſt rightly learn'd and conſider'd ^b. And as the ^c Art of Government is ſo very difficult as to require the whole Man, tho' of the greateſt Parts and Abilities, they

^a See Lord Bacon's Sermon ſid. c. 19.

^b See 1 Kings iii. 9. Virg. Æn. 6. v. 857, 853. Iſocrates has a wife Remark on the ſame Subject; It is, ſays he, 'that according as Princes cultivate their own Minds, ſo they muſt expect to find their Kingdom. And therefore no Champion at the Games has ſo much need to exerciſe his Body, as a Governour has to exerciſe and improve his Wit, Ad Nicoclem. And the Admonition of the Satyrift, as it belongs to Mankind, ſo it eſpecially affects Princes.

*Diſce —————
————— quom te Deus eſſe juſſit, & humanâ qua parte locatus eſt in re.*

Perſ. Satyr. III. v. 71, 72.

Study thy ſelf, what Rank or what Degree
The wiſe Creator hath ordain'd for Thee,
And all the Offices of that Eſtate
Perform, and with thy Prudence guide thy Fate.

MR. DRYDEN.

See alſo Philip de Comines, Lib. I. p. 342. & Lib. III. p. 388.

^c That thoſe things which appear neceſſary to be known, in order to the well-governing of a State, are not ſo very trite and vulgar, ſo obvious to all Capacities, may be gather'd from what Mr. Hobbes has particularly deliver'd on this Point. De Cive c. x. ſ. 10.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. I, and II.

¹ 'How happy is that Poſt which every Minute furniſhes Opportunities of doing good to thouſands! How dangerous is that which every moment expoſes to the injuring of Millions' (Caractères de la Bruyere, Chap. du Souverain & de la République, p. 337. Ed. de Bruxelles 1697) the Good which Princes do, reaches even to the moſt diſtant Ages as the Evils that they occaſion are multiplied from Generation to Generation to laſt Poſterity. Theſe are the Archbiſhop of Cambray's own Words in his Avantures de Telemoque (Page laſt but one of the laſt Tome) a Work from whence I ſhall take ſeveral fine Paſſages, with which the Reader, I preſume, will not be diſpleaſed to have his Memory reſreſhed, to renew the Pleaſure which he took in the firſt reading of ſo many excellent Precepts, where the Solidity of the Thoughts, and the Beauties of the Expreſſion, ſtrive in emulation of each other, which ſhall moſt charm thoſe who have a taſte of fine Things.

² 'The moſt painful and difficult Employment in the World, in my Opinion (ſays Montagne) is worthily to diſcharge the Office of a King. I excuſe more of their Failings than Men generally do, in conſideration of the inſupportable weight of their Office, which amazes me. 'Tis hard to keep meaſure in ſo unmeaſurable a Power. Whether it is, that it is to thoſe who are of a leſs excellent Nature, a mighty Incitement to Virtue to be fix'd in a place where you cannot do the leaſt good that is not put upon Record; and where the leaſt Benefit accrues to ſo many Perſons; and where your Capacity, like that of Preachers, is principally addreſſ'd to the People, no very exact Judge, eaſily impoſed on, and eaſily contented. Eſſais, Liv. 3. Chap. 7. de l'Incommodité de la Grandeur, p. 681. in Fol. See alſo Lib. I. Chap. XLII. where there is in the Margin, Sceptre de Grand poids. Here are Mr. de la Bruyere's Thoughts, which are as beautiful as ſolid. 'There are, ſays he, no general or certain Rules of governing well; they depend on Times and Conjunctures, the Prudence and Deſigns of the Governours: So that perfect Government is the Maſter-piece of the Underſtanding, and perhaps it would be impoſſible to arrive at it at all, did not Subjects contribute one Moiety to the Work by an Habit of Dependence and Submission. — If the care of a ſingle Family be ſo burdeſom, if a Man has enough to do to anſwer for himſelf; what a weight what a load is the charge of a whole Kingdom? Is the Sovereign recompens'd for all his anxious Cares by the Proſtrations of his Courtiers, or the Pleaſures an abſolute Power ſeems to afford? When I think on the troubleſom, hazardous and dangerous Paths he is forc'd to tread to arrive at publick Tranquillity; and when I reſlect on the extremely difficult, tho' neceſſary, Methods he is frequently oblig'd to uſe to compaſs a good End; that he is accountable to God even for the Felicity of his People, that Good and Evil are in his hands, and that Ignorance is no Excuse; I can't forbear asking my ſelf, Wouldſt thou reign? Would a Man meanly ought therefore as it were to forget their own Persons, and live only for the Sake of the People. From these Considerations it follows, that Princes ought to renounce all those Studies and Pursuits which contribute nothing to this good End, much more are they obliged to retrench their Pleasures and useles Diversions, so far as they intercept their main Employment: For the same Reason they ought to admit into their Familiarity none but Men of Wisdom and Experience; and on the contrary, to discountenance and chase away all flattering meanly happy in a private Condition, quit it for a Throne? Is it not even to one, who comes to it by Hereditary Right, almost insupportable to be born a Monarch? — There is a sort of Commerce or Reciprocal Return of the Duties of the Sovereign to his Subjects, and of theirs to him. Which are most strongly binding, or most difficult in the Performance, I won't determine: 'Tis not indeed very easy to judge between the strict Engagements of Reverence, Assistance, Service, Obedience and Dependence on the one side; and the indispenfible Obligations to Goodness, Justice and Protection on the other. To say the Prince is the supreme Disposer of the Lives of the People, is to tell us only that the Vices of Mankind have entailed on them a natural Subjection to Justice and the Laws, with the Execution of which the Prince is enrull'd: To add that he is absolute Master of his Subjects Goods, without any Reason or legal Process, is the Language of Flattery, the Opinion of a Favourite, who will recant it when he feels Death upon him. When on a fine Evening you see a numerous Flock of Sheep spread over a little Hill, quietly grazing on the fragrant Thyme; or in a Meadow, nibbling the short and tender Grass that has escap'd the Mower's Scythe, the diligent and careful Shepherd, you observe, is always amongst them, suffers 'em not to go out of his Sight, leads 'em, follows 'em, changes their Pasture; if they wander, he fetches 'em in; if the greedy Wolf appears, he sets his Dog on, to beat him off; he nourishes and preserves them; the Morning finds him in the open Field in which the Sun left him: What Care! What Vigilance and Slavery is this! Which Condition looks to you the most delightful and free, that of the Sheep or the Shepherd? Was the flock made for the Shepherd, or the Shepherd for the Flock? The genuine Image of this is of a good Prince and his People. There is no Occasion (on the contrary) for Arts and Sciences in the Exercise of Tyranny; the Policy which consists only in Bloodshed, is very shallow, and has nothing of Fineness in it. It prompts us to murder all whose Lives are Obstacles to our Ambition; and this a Man, naturally cruel, does with Ease. 'Tis the most barbarous and detestable way of supporting and aggrandizing our selves. Caracteres ou Moeurs de ce Siecle. Chap. du Souverain & de la Republique. See likewise les Aventures de Telemaque, Tom. V. p. 18. Ed. de Bruxelles. Xenophon, as our Author has remark'd, said a long time since, That Man is able more easily to govern all other Creatures, than those of his own kind; Ὅς ἀνθρώπων περὶκότι, πάντων ἢ ἄλλων ζώων ἐπιρᾶον ἢ ἀνθρώπων ἀρχεν, Cyrop. lib. 1. init. See also in les Choses memorables, Socrates's Dispute with a Youth, named Glaucou. Socrates (ad Nicoclem) in the Beginning, calls a Kingdom the greatest of humane Affairs, and such as requires more than ordinary Degrees of Prudence and Foresight; and says, that the Cause of all the Misfortunes which Kings are expos'd to, and of the Diversity of Opinions about their Condition is, That People think that all the World is as capable of reigning, as of discharging the Offices about the Temple. Ταυτὸς δὲ τῆς ἀνομιλίας, &c. Yet nevertheless, adds our Author, there are many that think the Italian Proverb not altogether groundless, that there needs but a very little Brains to rule the whole World; nor this other Latin one, The World does not know what little Wisdom it is that governs it: Upon which I have read a Dissertation of a Professor at Leipsick, named Mr. Adam Rechenberg, printed in 1676. He might add, that if they mean by that, that generally the Government of States is the Thing of the World in which the least Ability, Care, and Application is employed, one might admit of these Proverbs. But it must likewise be acknowledged, that if the Rulers of States would discharge their Duty as they ought to do, they would be more sensible of the Weight of Government than they are; and that if they would inform themselves of the Rules of so nice and difficult an Art, and practise them exactly, the World would be much better governed than it is, and the People infinitely more happy.

'Tis a sort of an Affront and Mockery to extol a Man for Qualities misbecoming his Rank and Condition, tho' otherwise commendable, and for Qualities also that ought not to be his principal Endowments: As if a Man should commend a King for being a good Painter, a good Architect, a good Marksman, or a Runner; Commendations that do him no Honour but when mentioned together, and in the Train of those that are more properly belonging to him, to wit, his Justice, and his Knowledge in governing his People, both in Peace and War. 'Twas after this Manner that Agriculture was an Honour to Cyrus, and the Knowledge of Letters to Charlemagne — Demosthenes's Companions in the Embassy to Philip, extolling that Prince as being handsome, eloquent, and a stout Drinker, were answered by Demosthenes, that these were Commendations more proper for a Woman, an Advocate, or a Sponge, than a King.

Imperet bellante prior, jacentem
Lenis in hostem.

Horace Carm. Saecul. V. 51, 52.

First, let his Empire from his Valour flow,
And then by Mercy on the prostrate Foe.

'Tis not his Profession to know either how to hunt, or how to dance well.

Excudent alii spirantia mollius aera,
Credo equidem, vivos ducent de marmore vultus:
Orabunt causas melius, caligine mætas
Describent radio, & surgentia sidera dicent:
Tu regere imperio populos, Romæ, memento
(Virg. Æneid. VI. 846, &c.)

Let others better mold the running Brass,
And soften into Fleh a marble Face;
Plead better at the Bar; describe the Skies;
And when the Stars descend, and when they rise.
Roman, 'tis thine alone with awful sway,
To rule Mankind, and make the World obey.

DRYDEN,

Plutarch says moreover, that to appear so excellent in these less necessary Qualifications, is, to produce a Witness against a Man's self, of his having mispent his Time, and applying his Studies ill, which ought to have been employed in the Acquisition of more necessary and useful things. So that Philip, King of Macedon, having heard Alexander the Great his Son singing at a Feast, in Emulation of the most skilful Musicians there, Art thou not a Jhmed, says he to him, to sing so well? And to the same Philip, a Musician with whom he was disputing about his Art; Heaven forbid, Sir, that so great a Misfortune should ever befall you, as to understand those things better than I. A King should be able to answer, as Iphicrates did the Orator, who press'd hard upon him in his Invective, after this Manner; And pray what art thou, that thou dost swagger at this Rate? Art thou a Soldier, dost carry a Musket, art thou a Pikeman? I can none of all this, but I am one who knows how to command all these. Essais de Montague, Liv. I. Chap. XXXIX

The wife Mentor says to Homenus, in les Aventures de la Telemaque, Do you not see that Princes who are corrupted by Flattery, take every thing to be harsh and austere that is free and ingenuous? They are become so nice, that every thing that is not Flattery, offends and provokes them. But let us proceed a little further: Suppose that Philocles is really harsh and austere, is not his Austerity much better than the pernicious Flattery of your Counsellors? Where will you find a Man without Faults? And should not you fear, least of all, the Fault of one who tells you the Truth a little too boldly? But is not this a Fault necessary to the Correction of your own Faults, and to the Parasites; all trifling Genius's, and such as are skilled in nothing but what is empty and insignificant. But now to render themselves capable of applying as they ought the general Maxims of State Policy, Princes must be perfectly acquainted with the Constitution of the State, and conquering that Aversion to Truth which Flattery has raised in you? You ought to have a Man about you, that loves nothing but Truth, and who loves you better than you know how to love your self; who will tell you the Truth in spite of you, who will force through all your Intrenchments; and this necessary Man is Philotes. Remember, that a Prince is extremely happy, when but only one Man of such an Elevation of Mind is born in his Reign, and who is certainly the most valuable Treasure of his Kingdom; and that the greatest Punishment he ought to fear from the Gods, is to lose such a Man, if he renders himself unworthy of him, for want of knowing how to make use of him. As for the Faults and Errors of good Men, you ought not to be ignorant of them; but however you should make use of their service. Set them right; but be not implicitly managed by their rash and indiscreet Zeal; give them a favourable hearing, honour their Virtue, and shew the publick that you know how to distinguish it; but more especially take care that you be not like those Princes, who, contenting themselves with despising corrupt Men, do notwithstanding employ them, trust in them, and heap Favours upon them; and who, pretending to have Judgment to know virtuous Men, yet give them nothing but empty Commendations; not daring to trust them in any Employments, nor to admit them into their familiar Conversation, nor to bestow any Kindnesses upon them, Tom. III. p. 3, &c. Iocantes, as our Author observes, gave likewise this Advice to Nicoles: φίλος πῶ μὴ πάντας τὸς βυλομένους, ἀλλὰ, &c. p. 34. Ed. Par. min. Receive into your Friendship not every Body, but such only as are worthy of your high Birth and Station; not those with whom you might pass your Life most pleasantly, but those by whose Assistance you may best govern the Commonwealth. Use your self to take Delight in such Company, as may both increase the Stock of your Wisdom, and raise the Character of your Virtue among others.—Rely upon the Fidelity, not of those who praise every thing you say or do, but of those who admonish you when you commit any Fault. Suffer wise and prudent persons to speak with Freedom to you, that when you are in any Difficulty you may find people that will endeavour with you to clear Matters up. Distinguish artful Flatterers from such as serve you with Affection; that Rogues may not have a larger share in your Favour than Men of Honour and Honesty.

5. A King is not to be believ'd when he boasts of his Constancy in standing the Shock of an Enemy for his Glory, if for his Good and Amendment he cannot stand the Liberty of a Friend's Advice, which has no other power than to wound his Ear a little, the rest of its Effects being still in his own Hands. Now there is no Condition of Man whatever that has so great Occasion for true and free Informations as theirs. They support the publick Life, and are to please the Opinion of so many Spectators, that, as it has been customary for Men to conceal from them whatever might have power to divert them from the Course they are taking, they find themselves insensibly involv'd in the Hatred and Detestation of their People, often upon such trivial Occasions as they might easily have avoided, and without the least prejudice event to their Pleasures themselves, had they been advised and set right in Time. Their Favourites have commonly more regard to themselves, than to their Masters; and certainly 'tis their Interest to do so, forasmuch as the greatest part of the Offices of true Friendship, when used to a Sovereign, are esteemed to be a rude and hazardous Undertaking: And therefore there is Occasion not only of very great Affection and Freedom, but for Courage too.—There is none of us all that would not be worse than Kings, if so continually corrupted as they are by such kind of Vermin. L'Essai de Montagne, Liv. III. Chap. XIII. p. 803. 804. There follows in that Place some solid Thoughts upon the Way that ought to be taken to inform Princes of their Faults, and to make them give Ear to Truth. See also Two finis Chapters of Charron, in his Treatise de la Sageffe, Liv. III. c. 9, 10.

It were indeed to be wish'd, that Carnades's Observations were not too often found true, that the Sons of Princes, and other wealthy and great Men, learn no Art well but that of Horsemanship, because their Horse cannot flatter them. Add Diodor. Sic. Lib. I. cap. 71. & Lib. XII. cap. 12. Where the same Author reports, that Charondas among his other Institutions, order'd an Action of ill Company, and set a very severe Penalty on those, who, being prosecuted upon this Action, should be convicted. See Plutarch de Descrip. Anic. & Adulator.

6. The rest of this Paragraph is not in the Original, but is taken from our Author's Abridgment de Offic. Hom. & Civ. Lib. II. c. 11. §, 2.

7. In the first place he must apply himself to Study, and understand the Humour and Complexion of his people. For this Knowledge will be a very great Direction, and model the Person to whose Government they are committed. Now the reigning Qualities of the People in general—are Fickleness and Inconstancy; a Spirit of Faction and Discontent; of Impertinence and Folly; Love of Vanity and Change; Insolence and insupportable Pride in Prosperity; Cowardise and Dejection of Mind in Adversity. But besides these Characters, which are common to Persons of that Condition every where, a Man must be still more particularly instructed in the Temper and Complexion of that Country, and those Subjects, where himself is concerned. For the Dispositions of Men differ extremely, and are almost as various as the Towns wherein they dwell, or the Persons that inhabit them. Some Nations are in a peculiar and distinguishing Manner, passionate or choleric, bold and warlike, cowardly or luxurious, addicted to Extravagance, to Wine, to Women; laborious or slothful, frugal or expensive. And of those who agree in these Qualities, there is a Difference in the Measure; in some they are more, in others less predominant. So necessary is that Rule, nosceda natura vulgi est, & quibus modis temperanter habeatur. That the common people must be studied, first to know what they are, and then what is the best Method of dealing with them. And in this sense it is, that we are to understand the old Philosophers, when they pronounce Subjection and Obedience a necessary preparation to the Art of Ruling: Nemo bene imperat, nisi qui ante paruerit imperio. No Man (says Seneca) ever governs well, who has not first liv'd under Government, and known what it is to be commanded himself. Not that we are to infer from hence any Necessity, or indeed so much as a possibility, that all Princes ought to be rais'd to that Dignity from an inferior Condition; for several of them are born Princes; and a great many Governments pass on in a Line, and come by Succession and Proximity of Blood: But the true Importance of that Maxim is, that whoever is desirous to be a good Governour, must inform himself of the Humours and Inclinations of his Subjects, and understand which are the reigning Qualities in them, as perfectly well as if he had been one of the same Rank himself, and had felt and had been acted by them in his own person. But then it is no less necessary, that the Condition of the Government should be likewise thoroughly understood, and that not only what Sovereignty and Power is in general; but the Frame and Temper of that Government and that State in particular, where this person himself presides, what the Form and Constitution of it is, how it was fix'd and adjust'd, and what Extent of Power is vested in him; whether it be an old or later Establishment; whether it descends by Inheritance, or whether it be conferr'd by Election; whether it were obtained by regular and legal Methods, or whether acquired by Force of Arms; how far this Jurisdiction reaches; what Neighbours are about him; what Strength and what Conveniences he is provided with. For according to all these, and a great many other Circumstances, too tedious to be specified here, a different sort of Conduct will be found necessary. The Sceptre must be sway'd, as such Considerations shall declare; one and the same Method will not serve all alike; but the Rules and Administration must be suited to the Temper of the Beast, and as this proves to be harder or softer mouth'd, so the Rider must take Care to keep a stiffer or a slacker Rein. Charron de la Sageffe, Liv. III. Chap. 2. Sect. 1. We shall see the Usefulness of these Instructions, when we come a little farther to treat of the Manner in which Laws ought to be made. (see sect. 5.) Plutarch likewise gives it as the first Maxim to those whose Business it is to govern the State, to study the

Disposition

the Temper of their Subjects⁸; they should excel in such Virtues⁹ as will be of Service to also in a more particular manner endeavour to them in supporting the weight of so difficult and Disposition of the People, and to accustom themselves to it as much as possible, or else, says he, if they should endeavour to introduce Changes and Alterations in it all at once, they would be engag'd in an Affair that is neither easy nor safe, and that requires a great deal of Time, and a Power firmly establish'd. Τέταρτον γὰρ τῶν ἀγαθῶν &c. Præcept. Reip. gerendæ, p. 749. B. Ed. Wich. There are in the rest of this Treatise many excellent Maxims for the Art of Government.

⁸ After the Knowledge of the State and Government, which is in the Nature of a Preface or Introduction, the next both in Order and Dignity, is Virtue. And no Man can wonder that so honourable a Place is assign'd to this, among the necessary Qualifications of a Governour, who at all considers how absolutely and indispensably needful it is to a Prince, and that both upon his own account, and for the Benefit of the Publick. First of all it is highly reasonable, as Cyrus well observes, that he who is above all the rest in Honour and Authority, should be so in Goodness too; this is no more than what such a great and elevated Station may justly seem to require of him. Then his own Reputation is nearly concern'd in it; for common Fame makes it one great part of its Business to pick up and disperse every thing our Governours do or say: The Prince stands expos'd to the publick View, every Eye is upon him, and he is curiously watch'd. There is no such thing in Nature as Privacy in Princes; they can no more be hid than the Sun in the Firmament. They are the constant Subject of Discourte in every Company and so are sure to have a great deal of good, or a great deal of ill said of them. And it is of exceeding great Consequence to any Governour both with respect to his personal, and the common Interest and Safety, what Opinion the World have of him. Nor is it enough, that the supreme Governour be virtuous in his own Temper and Conversation, but he is likewise oblig'd to take good Care that the Subjects be like him in Goodness. And how deeply this concerns him I appeal to the universal Consent of all good and learned Men, who, with one Voice, declare it impossible for that Kingdom or Nation, that City or less Society of Men, to prosper; nay, so much as to subsist long, who have banish'd Virtue from amongst them. And those nauseous Flatterers prevaricate much too grossly, who pretend that it is for the Advantage and Security of Princes, that their Subjects should be abandon'd to Wickedness and Vice. Because they say, this emasculates their Minds, and renders them more tame and servile in their Dispositions. So Pliny in his Panegyrick (Chap. XLV) says, Patientioris servitutis, quod non deceat esse nisi servos. They are more patient under Slavery, who are fit to be nothing but Slaves. For, quite contrary, we find by unquestionable Experience, that the more vicious Men are, the more do they blinch and grow unruly under the Yoke: The good and the gentle, the meek and sweet temper'd Men, these are much better qualified to live in Fear and Awe of Authority themselves, than to be an Awe or give Occasion of Jealousy to their Governours. Pessimis quisque asperime relictorem patitur (Salust. ad Cæsar. de Rep. Ordinand. Orat. 1. init.) Every Man is more ungovernable, in proportion as he is a worse Man. Mutiny and Discontent, and perpetual Uneasiness are the sure Attendants of a profligate Mind. Contra, facile imperium in bonos, qui metuentes magis quam metuenti. On the other Hand, good Men are very easily kept in order; they give their superiors little Trouble, but had rather submit with Reverence and Fear than be a Terror and Disturbance to them. Now there cannot be a more powerful Motive, a more efficacious Means of bringing over the People, and forming them unto Virtue, than the Example of the Prince. For (as daily Experience shews) every one affects to be like him; and the Court is the standard of Manners, as well as of Fashions. The Reason is, because Example is what Men are sooner mov'd with, and sooner wrought upon by, than Laws; for this is a Law in dumb-shew, but has more Credit and Authority than the Voices of the Law speaking in Commands. Nec tam imperii nobis opus, quam exemplo (Plin. Paneg. Cap. XLV. num. 6.) & mitius jubetur exemplo. We do not want Precepts so much as Patterns, and Example is the softest and least invidious way of commanding. Now if all Example be a mighty Inducement, that of great Persons must be so in a degree proportionable to their Quality and Station. For all the little ones fix their Eyes and Hearts here, and take their Observations from those above them. They swallow all without chewing; admire and imitate at a venture; and conclude, that their Superiors would not be guilty of any Behaviour unbecoming their Character; and if they do any thing, it must be excellent and good. And on the other hand, Governours are so sensible of the Force of this Motive too, that they think their Subjects are indispensably oblig'd to those Rules which they are content to be governed by themselves; and that their own doing what they would have done by others, is singly a sufficient Inducement to bring it into practice and common Vogue, without the Formality of a Command to enforce it. From all which it is abundantly manifest, that Virtue is exceeding necessary and advantageous to a Prince, both in point of Interest and in point of Honour and Reputation. Charron de la sagesse, Liv. III. Chap. 2. §. 2. Let us add to this the following Reflection of Montaigne: I know not how 'tis, but the World requires of Princes more than other Men, to hide and conceal their Faults: For what is only reputed in us Indiscretion, the People esteem in them to be Tyranny, and a Contempt of the Laws. And besides their propensity to Vice, are apt to censure, that, as a heightning pleasure to their Crimes, they insult over and trample under Foot the publick Ordinances. Plato indeed, in his Gorgias, defines a Tyrant to be one who is at his Liberty in a State to do whatever his own Will leads him to. And 'tis by reason of this Impunity that the publication of their Vices does often more Mischief than the Vice it self. Every one fears to have his Actions discover'd, and to be censur'd in his Pleasures: But Princes are even to their very Gestures, Looks, and Thoughts, the Observation of the People, who think they have a Right and Title to be Judges of them. Besides that, the Blemishes of the Great naturally appear greater by reason of the Eminence and Lustre of the Place they are seated in; as a little Scar, or a Wart in the Forehead, is a much greater Deformity than a considerable Gash any where else. And this is the Reason why the Poets feign the Amours of Jove to be perform'd in the Disguise of so many borrow'd shapes, that among those many amorous Intrigues, there is but only one, as I remember, where he appears in his own Majesty and Grandeur. Essais Liv. I. Chap. 42. p. 190.

⁹ The Virtues proper for this Purpose are, 1. Piety, which is the Foundation of all Virtues; but it must be a solid and reasonable Piety, free from Hypocrisy, Superstition, and Bigottry. 2. The Love of Justice and Equity. For the chief Design a Prince was made for, is to take Care that every Man has his Right. This obliges him to study, not only that Part of humane Learning which qualifies those famous Civilians that are fit to be Legislators themselves; who go up to that Justice which at first regulateth humane Society, who exactly know what Liberty Nature has left us in Civil Governments, and what Freedom the Necessity of States take from private People, for the Good of the Publick: But that part of the Law too, which respects the Rights, and descends to the Affairs of particular Persons. 'This is a part of Education which is left the Gentlemen of the long Robe, and is not admitted into that of Princes, as being beneath them, tho' they are every Moment of their Reign to pass Judgment upon the Fortunes, Liberties, and Lives of their Subjects. Princes are perpetually talk'd to of Valour, which is of no Use but to destroy; and of Liberality, which is good for nothing but Extravagance, unless regulated by Justice. 'Tis true, every Temper must be instructed, if I may so say, in a Virtue proper for its respective Occasion; the Covetous must be aspir'd with Generosity, the soft and the slothful must be inflam'd with the Desire of Glory, and the Ambitious must, as much as possible, be restrain'd within the Rules of Justice. But whatsoever Variety there may be in the Disposition of Princes, Justice is always the most necessary; for that Virtue keeps up Order in him who does it, as well as in those to whom it is done. 'Tis not any Constraint that limits the Powers of the Prince, seeing that at the same Time that he renders it to others, he teaches them to return it to himself, and that willingly too, tho' his Power necessarily obliges us to receive it from him. (St. Evremond, Tom. III. p. 74, 75.) From whence it follows, that he ought especially to be a religious Observer of his Word. Let us hear what the Oracle of Gascoigne says farther upon this Subject. 'Those of our Time, who have considered in the Establishment of the Duty of a Prince, the Good of his Affairs only, and have preferred that to the Care of his Faith and Conscience, might say something to a Prince, whose Affairs or Fortune had put into such a posture, that he might forever establish 'em by only once breaking his Word; but 'twill not go so. They often buy in the same Market; they make more than one Peace, and enter into more than one Treaty in their Lives. Gain tempts them to the first Breach of Faith, and almost always presents its self, as in all other ill Acts, Sacrileges, Murders, Rebellions, Treason, as undertaken for some kind of Advantage: But this first Gain is attended with infinite mischievous Consequences; throws the Prince out of all Correspondence and Negotiation, by such an Instance of Infidelity. Solyman of the Ottoman Race, a Race not very solicitous of keeping their Words and standing to their Articles, when in my Infancy, he made his Army to land at Oronto, being inform'd that M. reurino de Gratinare and the Inhabitants of Castro were detain'd Prisoners, after they had surrendered the Place, contrary to their Articles of Capitulation, order'd them to be set at Liberty, saying, That having other great Enterprizes in hand in those Parts, this Perfidiousness, tho' it carried with it a show of present Advantage, would for the future bring on him a Discredit and Distrust of infinite Prejudice. (Essais Liv. III. Ch. 7. p. 478.) 'To whom ought not Treachery to be hateful, when Tiberius refused it in a thing of so great Importance? He had word sent him from Germany, that if he thought fit, they would rid him of Ariminius by Poison. This Ariminius was the most potent Enemy the Romans had, who had so basely beaten them under Varus, and who alone put a stop to the Growth of their Power in those Countries. Tiberius retained Answer, that the People of Rome were always usel to revenge themselves of their Enemies by fair and open Ways, with their Swords in their Hands, and not clandestinely and by raud. He quitted the advantageous for the honest Part. You will tell me he was a Deceiver, and did not speak as he thought. I believe so too, and 'tis no great Miracle in Men of his Profession. But the Acknowledgment of Virtue is of no less Importance for being in the Mouth of one that hates it; since it is Truth that forces it from him; and if he will not inwardly receive it, he at least puts it on to make himself outwardly fine. Liv. II. Ch. 1. at the Beginning. See what Telemachus says to dissuade his Allies from making use of the Treason of a certain Citizen of Phuustium who offer'd to deliver up to them one of the Gates of the Town by Night, Tom. 8. p. 41, &c. 3. Valour is likewise a very necessary Qualification in a Prince; but then it must be managed by Prudence. Mentor gives Telemachus very excellent Advice upon this Matter. Go, says he, into the greatest Dangers, as often as it is necessary you should go. A Prince dishonours himself more by avoiding the Dangers of a War, than by never going to it at all. The Courage of him who commands others should never be doubtful: It is necessary for a People to preserve their General and King, it is still more necessary for them not to see him in an uncertain Reputation of Valour.—But then on the other Hand do not run headlong into Danger, when there's no Necessity for it; for Valour can no longer be a Virtue, than as it is managed by Prudence; otherwise 'tis a senseless Contempt of Life, and a brutal Ardour. Inconsiderate Valour is always unsecure; he that is not Master of himself in Dangers, is rather fierce than brave. He is forc'd to be beside himself, that he may be rais'd above Fear; because he cannot overcome it by the natural Disposition of his Heart; now in this Case, if he does not run away, he is at least confounded; he loses the liberty of the Mind, which would be necessary to him in making use of Opportunities to defeat the Enemy, or serve his Country. If he has all the Courage of a Soldier, he has none of the Prudence of a Captain; nay, he has not even that of a private Soldier; for a Soldier ought, during the time of Action, to keep such a Presence of Mind, and such a Moderation as is necessary to obey Orders. He that rashly exposes himself, discomposes the Order and Discipline of the Troops, sets an Example of Temerity, and often exposes the whole Army to very great Dangers. Those who prefer their vain Ambition to the Safety of the common Cause, deserve Punishments instead of Rewards. Take care then not to search after Glory with too much eagerness: The most certain way of finding it, is patiently to wait a favourable Opportunity: Virtue gains so much the more Respect and Esteem, as she shows herself plain, modest, averse to Pride and Ostentation; and the greater the necessity of exposing your self to Danger grows, the greater still your Courage and Foresight ought to be. Tom. 8. p. 43, &c. See likewise Montagne's Essais Liv. I. Chap. 14. and Liv. II. Chap. XVI. that treats of Glory. 4. A Prince ought to be very reserved in discovering his Thoughts and Designs. This Virtue is apparently necessary to all those who are concern'd in Government. It includes a wise Mistrust and innocent Dissimulation. See Charron de la sagesse, Liv. III. Chap. 2. f. 6, 7. And what our Author has said above, Book IV. Chap. 2. Sect. 17. 5. A Prince must above all things accustom himself to moderate his Desires: For having it in his power to satisfy them, if once he should give a loose to them, he would be tempted to proceed to the last Excess, and by ruining his Subjects, would, in the End, ruin himself. To prevent these terrible Inconveniencies, and to form himself to this Moderation, nothing can be more proper for him than to accustom himself to Patience. 'Tis the most useful of all Virtues for those who are to command. A Man must be patient, if he will become Master of himself and others. Impatience, which appears to be the strength and vigour of the Soul, is only its weakness. He that can't wait and suffer, is like one who can't keep a Secret: Both of 'em want Resolution of Mind to contain themselves, as a Man that runs a Race in a Chariot, and has not a Hand strong enough to stop where he ought, his unruly Courfers.—An impatient Man, by his mad ungovernable Desires, is thrown into an Abyss of his Misfortunes: The more powerful his Authority is, the more fatal to himself is his Impatience. He will not stay, he will not allow himself time to measure any thing; he forces all things to satisfy his Pleasures; he tears off the Boughs, to gather the Fruit before it is ripe; he breaks down the Gates, rather than stay till they are open'd to him; he will be a reaping while the prudent Husbandman is but sowing; every thing that he does in a hurry, is ill done, and has no longer Duration than his own fickle Inclination. Such are the foolish projects of a Man who believes that he is at liberty to do every thing, and who is entirely governed by his Passions, to the Abuse of his power. (Avant. de Telemaque, Tom. V. p. 179, 180.) The Philosopher Arrian (de expedit. Alex. Lib. IV. cap. 7.) says, That it is easy to see by the Example of Alexander, that whatever fine Actions a Man performs to outward appearance, it signifies nothing to true Happiness, if one does not know at the same time how to rule and moderate ones self. Τὸ τὸν ἄλλεν τι ὄρελος ἐς εὐδαιμονίαν ἀνθρώπου, ἐι μὴ σωφρονῆεν ἐν ταύτῳ ὑπάρχει τὴν τῷ ἀνθρώπῳ τῶν τὰ μεγάλα, ὡς δοκεῖ, πειγματι πειζάντι. 6. Goodness and Clemency are also Virtues, very proper in and very useful to a Prince. Let him shine bright (says Montagne) in Humanity, Truth, Fidelity, Temperance, and especially in Justice; Marks that are rare, unknown, and exiled. 'Tis by no other Means but by the sole good Will of the People that he can do his Business; and no other Qualities can attract their good Will like those, as being of the greatest Advantage to them. Nihil est tam populare quam bonitas. Nothing is so popular as Goodness (Cicer. Orat. pro Ligur. cap. XII.) Essais Liv. III. Chap. 17. p. 477. See Charron de la sagesse (Liv. III. Chap. 2. Sect. 12.) 7. Liberality, well understood and well applied, is so much the more necessary for Princes, as Avarice and Niggardlines are a Disgrace to a Person whom it almost costs nothing to be liberal. But then also there are no People that ought to take more care in regulating the Use of this noble Virtue. As this requires abundance of Circumpection, and supposes moreover very commendable Dispositions in Princes, who know how to place their Favours as they ought to do, and to confer them on deserving Persons; one can't, in my Opinion, absolutely say with Montagne, that Liberality is not in its true Lustre in the Sovereign's Hand, and that private Men have the most Right to it; that it is a very improper Subject to be preached up to young Princes; and that it is but of little value in comparison of other royal Virtues. However, there is nothing more solid than the Reflections which this Author makes in the same place. 'To take it exactly, says he, a King (as King) has nothing properly his own; he owes his very self to others. Authority is not given in the Favour of a Magistrate, but of the People. A Superior is never made so for his own profit, bus for the profit of the Inferior: And the Physician for the sick Man, and not for himself. All Magistracy, as well as Art, has its End without its self. Nulla ars in se versatur.—A Prince being to give, or, to say better, to pay and render, to so many People according to what they have deserved, ought to be a trusty and prudent Disposer of what he has to lay out. If the Liberality of the Prince be without Bounds or Discretion, I had much rather he were covetous; Royal Virtue seems to consist most in Justice, and of all the parts of Justice, that best denotes a King, that accompanies his Liberality; for that they have particularly reserv'd to themselves, whereas all other sorts of Justice they remit to the administration of others.

important a charge¹⁰; and also learn how to regulate their outward Behaviour in a manner suitable to the Grandeur and Dignity of so exalted a Station.

III. The general Rule which Sovereigns are to proceed by, is, Salus Populi suprema lex esto; Let the Safety of the People be the supreme Law. 'Tis Plato's Description of a Prince, that He neither thinks, nor commands, what may advance his own private Interest, but what may promote the Benefit of his Subjects: and whatever he says or does, is said or done for their Advantage, and for their Ornament and Grace. For the Authority which Governours bear, was first conferr'd on them with this Intention, that it might prove a Means of procuring that End for which civil Societies were establish'd. And therefore they ought to esteem nothing as contributing to their own private or others. An immoderate Bounty is a very weak means to gain them good Will; because it balks more people than it encourages. Qua largitione quod in plures usus, eo minus in multos uti possis--Qui autem est stultus, quam quod libenter facias, curare ut ille diutius facere non possit? (Cicero. de Offic. Lib. II. cap. 15.) By how much you use it to many, by so much less will you be in a Capacity to use it to many more. — And what greater Folly can it be than to order it so, that what you do willingly, you cannot do long? And where it is conferr'd without due respect of Merit, it puts them out of Countenance, on whom it is bestow'd, and is receiv'd without a just acknowledgment, and that grateful Sense which the Bounty of a Prince ought to meet with. Some Tyrants have been sacrific'd to the Hatred of the People, by the Hands of those very Men whom they have unjustly advanced. — The Subjects of a Prince, profuse in Gifts, grow exorbitant in their Demands; and accustom themselves not to Reason, but Example. — The more a Prince exhausts himself in giving, the poorer he grows in Friends. How should he satisfy Desires, which still increase the more they are fill'd? He who has his Thoughts fix'd upon getting, never thinks of what he has already received. Covetousness has nothing so properly its own as Ingratitude. Essais, Liv. III. Chap. 6. p. 609, &c. The best may be seen in the Original; for it would be too much to transcribe it all. See also Mr. le Clerc's Reflections upon Happiness and Misfortune, &c. Chap. XII. p. 282, &c. and Charron de la Sagesse, Liv. III. Chap. 2. Sect. 13. Here is a general Idea of Virtues which are most necessary for a Sovereign, besides those that are common to him with private Persons, and of which some are included even in those we have been mentioning. Cicero is not very wide of these Ideas in the following Enumeration. Fortem, iustum, severum, gravem, magnanimum, largum, beneficum, liberalem [dicit]; he sunt regie ludes. Orat. pro Rege Deiotar. Cap. IX.

'Tis thus that I thought the Latin, moreque ad tanti fastigii dignitatem ought to be rendred. For besides that the Author plainly distinguishes Manners from Virtues, I am mightily tempted to believe, that he form'd all this little Addition upon Charron's Notions in the Chapter I have so often quoted, and to which he himself refers in the second Edition of my Original. Here is what Charron says. The next thing that comes under our Consideration, after the Prince's Virtue, is what they call his Manners, that is, his Behaviour and Way of Living; the Mien, the Posture, the Address that suit with the Majesty of a Prince; and all those profound Respects so necessary to be kept up. — Now tho' Nature contributes a great deal to this in the Form, and Temper, and Person, yet all that Nature does is capable of Amendment and Improvement, both by the additional Helps of Industry and Art. Under the Head we are now upon, we may reckon the Air of his Face, the Composure of his Countenance, his Fashion and Behaviour, his Gate, his Tone and manner of Speech, his Clothes and Dressing: The general Rule to be observ'd in all these particulars, is such a Mixture of Sweetness and Moderation, of Staidness and Gravity, as may win upon Mens Minds, and move their Affections pleasantly; such as may keep the middle way between Familiarity and Fear; engage their Love, and yet command their Honour and Respect. His Court and Conversation are likewise worth taking Notice of. For the former, it is convenient that it should be very publick, that the Palace he dwells in should be noble and magnificent, fit for Resort and Correspondence; and that if it can be well contriv'd, not far from the Middle of his Country, or at least the most significant part of it; that so his Eye may command all his Quarters; and like the Sun in the midst of the Firmament, pierce, enlighten, and warm all round about him with the influence of his Beams. For when a Prince resides in some very remote Corner of his Dominions, his Distance emboldens those in the contrary Extremity to behave themselves insolently and grow tumultuous and unruly. As for his Conversation, that should be very reserved, his Confidants and familiar Friends but few, his Progresses and other Appearances in publick but seldom; that the People may be glad to see him: For the shewing himself often, and giving too easy access to his Person, will mightily lessen the Majesty of his Character. Continuus aspectus nimis reverendus magnos homines ipsa satietate facit [Majestati major ex longinquo veneratio. Tacit. Annal. l. 47. quia omne ignotum pro magifico est. Idem. Agricol. Cap. XXX.] The being always admitted to the sight and presence of great Persons, does mightily impair and diminish our Respect, by glutting our Curiosity. Majesty is always most revered at a distance; for Nature forms all our Ideas bigger than the Life; and what we are not acquainted with, is always vastly'd to be very great and stately. Charron de la Sagesse. Liv. III. Chap. 2. Sect. 15.

The Words our Author uses, after several others, to express this common Maxim, are taken from Cicero; Omnia salus populi suprema lex esto. De Legib. Lib. III. Cap. 3. Here is what a great Emperor says to this Matter. Δὸ τὸ ἄλλο εἰς τὸ εὐεργετῆσαι τὸν λαόν, &c. that is, according to Mr. Dacier's Translation, you ought always to have these two Maxims in view; to do for the Good of Mankind all that the Condition of a Legislator and a King requires of you: And the other, to change your Resolution, whenever Men skilled in such Matters give you better Advice. But still the change must be made from the Motives of Justice, and the publick Interest, and never for your own Pleasure, your own Advantage, or your own particular Glory, Marc. Antonin. Lib. IV. Cap. 12. You will find several excellent things upon the same Subject, in the Cyrop. and in the 3d Book of Socrates's Chæses memorables by Xenophon; as likewise in the Works of Plato and Aristotle. According to these wise Heathens, whose Ideas are very different from those of many Christian Princes, who rather follow Machiavel's Politicks, a good Prince is one who endeavours to make his Subjects happy; ὁ εὐδαιμόνος πρὸς τὸν ἀνὴρ ἡγήταια [Socrat. ad Xenophon. ubi supra] a Tyrant, on the contrary, is one who has nothing but his own private Interest in view, ὁ μὲν γὰρ τυραννίς ἐστὶ μοναρχία πρὸς τὸ συμφέρον τὸ τῷ μοναρχῶντι. Aristot. Polit. Lib. III. Cap. 7. See Cicero de Offic. Lib. I. Cap. 25. Plin. Panegy. Cap. 67. and the Parrhasians, Tom. 1. p. 212, &c. of the first Edition, But after all, the Maxims of good Politicks have nothing in them contrary to natural Right; and our Author has also written a fine Dissertation in 40 pages in Ozruo, in which he proves in a few Words that they are very agreeable to the Precepts of the Gospel. This Dissertation is entituled, De concordia vere Politice cum Religione Christi, and is among his Academical Dissertations. One may also see that of Mr. Buddeus, which is entituled, Concordia Religionis Christianæ Statuque Civili, where he has treated more exactly of this Matter, for it consists of a hundred and forty Pages in Quarto. It was printed at Hill, in 1701. and is very well worth reading. But as the Actions of Sovereigns, and the Body of a State, seem often to depart from the Rules of those Duties, which private persons are obliged to observe to wards each other, our Author had a Design to compile a Treatise, to shew expressly how far what is call'd a Piece of Policy, or something done for a Reason of State may be justifiable; as he informs us himself in his little Preface to the second Edition. It was indeed to be wish'd for the sake of the publick, that Death had not prevented his executing that project, and several others. I find in Charron some Thoughts upon the same Subject, which, I presume, no one will be displeas'd to see here. The Justice, and Virtue, and Probity of a Prince is not in all points tied up to the same Methods and Manner of proceeding with that of Persons in a private Capacity. It has a larger range, and freer scope allow'd; and all this Latitude is Indulgence little enough; no more than is absolutely necessary for the weighty and hazardous Office our Governours are engag'd in, and the infinite inconceivable Difficulties that arise in the Administration. This makes it reasonable for 'em to be in a Way personal personal Good, which is not at the same time profitable to the Commonwealth: Would it not seem a Wonder to You (says Socrates to Xenophon^b, if he should be owned for a good Herdsman, who lessens the Number, or multiplies the ill Qualities of his Drove? 'Tis a much greater Wonder, if he who hath the Command of a State, and both wastes the Strength, and corrupts the Manners of his Subjects, doth not blush at his Mismanagement, and confess himself an ill Governour.

by themselves; the common and direct Tract is too narrow; they are obliged to shift and dodge, and wheel about, and whatever Censures People, who understand not the Nature of the Case, may pass, as if every thing that is unusual and indiscreet, were presently wicked and unjust; yet those, who are capable of considering, and competent Judges of the Matter, must admit it to be lawful and allowable, as well as prudent and needful for them so to do. For Prudence must be mix'd with Justice; some Leints and Stratagems, and little Slights made use of, and (as they commonly express it) when the Lion's Skin is not big enough of its self, it must be eked out, by tacking a Fox's Skin to it! Nor would I be so mistaken here neither, as to be thought a Justifier of these crafty Dealings at all times, and in all Cases indifferently. By no Means; this is not a standing Rule of Action, but must be reserved for special Occasions, and particularly there must be three Conditions to warrant it. The first is absolute Necessity, or at least, some evident and considerable Advantage to the publick — And this must by all means be contulded and the chief Aim. This is a natural and indispenible Obligation: For the publick Good is a Condition paramount to all others; and the Man who is procuring it, cannot but be doing his Duty. Salus populi suprema lex esto. The safety of the People must be the supreme Law. The second Qualification which these Methods must have to recommend them, nay, indeed to acquit them of Blame, is, that they be used defensively only, and not offensively; with a Design to preserve a Prince or a State, but not aggrandize them, and oppose others. For this Reason they should seldom or never be begun with, but only return'd back again; and are then in proper Time and Place, when employ'd to save the Publick from Snares and subtil Designs, and not to conceal, but to discover and defeat mischievous and wicked Practices. For one Trick may be answer'd with another, and it is reasonable to play the Fox with the Fox. The World is exceeding full of Malice and Cunning: And Aristotle's Observation is most true, that the Subversion of Kingdoms and States is usually owing to Treachery and Deceit. What then should hinder? What forbid? Nay, in such Exigencies, what can excuse the Conservators of the publick Safety, from preventing and disappointing such Calamities and villanous Inrentions by countermining? Why may not the State save it self by the same Methods that were practis'd to ruin it, and retort the Artifice of Factions and wicked Male-Contents back upon their own Heads? For a Man to be too squeamish in these Cases; to play constantly above board, and upon the square; and to deal with those Men according to the Rules of that rigorous Equity and plain dealing, which Reason and Conscience require from us in private Affairs, is inconsistent with the Nature and the Measures, nay, with the very End of all Government; and the Event would often be the betraying and losing all, and sacrificing the Publick to an unreasonable Scruple. The Third Qualification is, that these Methods be used moderately and discreetly; as they are not fit for all Times, nor all Occasions; so neither are all Persons fit to be trusted with them. For they are capable of great Abuses: And if abused will prove of ill Example and ill Consequence, by ministring occasion to ill Men, to practise and justify their Frauds and indirect dealings, and to give Countenance to Wickedness and Injustice, even in private Commerce and Transactions: For a Man is never at Liberty to forsake Virtue and Honesty, to follow Vice and Injustice; these things are so far from indifferent, that there is no possibility of reconciling those distant Extremes, no satisfaction capable of being made for so ill a Choice. And therefore away with all Injustice and Infidelity, all treacherous and illegal Proceedings, and cursed be the Principles and Politicks of those Men who would possess sovereign Commanders with a Belief that all things are lawful, if they be but expedient for them. There is a vast Difference between such an arbitrary Notion of Right and Wrong, and the Rules of Limitations I have here laid down. Reasons of State may sometime make it necessary to temper Honesty with Profit, and try if these two can be so mingled together as to make a good Composition. But, tho' we may try to compound and soften the Matter a little, yet we must never act in Opposition to Justice: We may, nay, we must sometimes wheel off a little, and fetch a Compass about it; but we must never lose sight of it, much less turn our backs upon it, and cast all Regards for it sacred a thing behind us. For there is a Cunning very consistent with Virtue and strict Honour, such as St. Basil the great calls a great and commendable Cunning (magna & laudabilis astutia) such as tends to good; and may be used as Mothers and Physicians deal by their Children and their Patients, when they tell them fine Stories to amuse and entertain them, and by Degrees cheat them into Health. In short, many things may be acted secretly and in the Dark, which are not fit for publick View, and will not bear an open process. Prudence and Stratagem may be added to Courage and Strength; Art and Wit may supply the Defects of Nature and Force, in Cases which these are not sufficient to manage: A Governour may, nay he ought to be, as Pindar calls it, a Lion in the Field, and a Fox at the Council-Table; or as that divine Saviour, who was Truth it self, has express'd himself upon another Occasion, he may be a subtil Serpent, but still a harmless Dove, Liv. III. Chap. 2. §. 2. The Author afterwards proceeds to particulars in this Affair; but how nice and delicate so ever the Speculation of them may be, the Practice is infinitely more difficult; and there are but few Princes who keep themselves, on many Accounts, within the just Bounds there mentioned. See Mr. Bayle's Diction. Histor. & Crit. Tom. II. p. 114. Col. A. 2 Edit.

² The Truth of it is, that the very Interest of the Sovereign requires that he should direct all his Actions to this End.

*Qui scriptis duro servus imperio regit,
Tinet timentes; metus in auctorem redit.
Senec. in Oedip. vers. 705, 706.*

The following Words of Mr. de Cambray will serve to explain and illustrate this Sentence. 'Where the sovereign Command is most absolute, there Princes are least powerful. They take, they ruin every thing, and are the sole Possessors of the whole State; but then the State languishes, the Country is unmanur'd and almost desert, the Towns every Day decay and grow thin, and Trade is quite lost. The King who can neither be such by himself, but must be such with regard to his People, undoes himself by degrees, by insensibly undoing his Subjects, to whom he owes both his Riches and his Power; his Kingdom is drain'd of Money and Men, and the Loss of the latter is the greatest and most irreparable of all Losses. His arbitrary Power makes as many Slaves as he has Subjects; they all seem to adore him, and all tremble at the least Motion of his Eye: But see what will be the Consequence upon the least Revolution; this monstrous Power rais'd to too excessive an Height, cannot long endure; it wants supplies from the Hearts of the People; it has wearied out and exasperated the several Ranks of Men in the State; and forces all the Members of that Body to sigh with equal Ardour for a Change. At the first Blow the Idol is pull'd down, and trampled under Foot. Contempt, Hatred, Fear, Resentment, Jealousy; in a Word, all the Passions combine together against so injurious and detestable a Power. The King, who in the Days of his vain Prosperity could find no person that durst tell him the Truth, shall not find one in his Adversity that will vouchsafe to excuse him, or defend him against his Enemies. Tom. III. p. 74, 75.

β Απομν. L. 3.

IV. In order to the internal Tranquillity of States, it is necessary that the Wills and Inclinations of the Members be so moderated and directed, as shall appear conducive to the Safety of the whole Body. Hence it is the Duty of supreme Rulers, not only to prescribe Laws fit for the obtaining of this End, but likewise so to keep up the Strictness of publick Discipline, especially as to what relates to the Education of Children, as that the Subjects may conform to the Laws, not so much out of fear of Punishment, as out of Habit and Custom: In as much as bare Penalties are not so apt to produce a Care of doing well (this being the proper Effect of Reason and Institution) as a Solicitude to avoid Discovery in doing ill.

Towards the accomplishing of so good an End in States, where Christianity is profess'd, this Religion it self doth in a high manner contribute; provided it be such as is preserv'd in its primitive Sincerity, purg'd from human Corruptions, and inculcated both by the Doctrine and Example of a learned and pious Clergy: In as much as that holy Institution doth not only comprize all the Points conducing to Eternal Salvation, but likewise the most perfect Scheme of moral Precepts, which are admirably useful in disposing the Minds of Men to a Compliance with civil Life, and yet which cannot so conveniently be establish'd by the bare Force of civil Laws. For this Reason, in all Christian Governments, which we ¹ Οὐκ ἔστι γὰρ ἕτι ἢ ἢ ὧν ἐλεμωτ' αὐτῶν νόμων, &c. 'The best and most useful Laws, and which are approved of by all such as are subject to them, are of no use, unless Subjects be trained up and educated in a Manner of living conformable to Government, Aristot. Polit. V. Cap. IX. Plato says, that to lay the Foundation of a good Government, we must first begin by the Education of Children, and must make them as virtuous as possible: As an experienced Gardiner employs his Care about the young and tender Plants, and then goes on to others. Καὶ εἰνεταί μοι ἢ πολιτικῶν μὲν ἢ ἀρχεῖσθαι ὀρθῶς. ὀρθῶς (Harry Stephens corrects it ὀρθῶν, but without any Necessity, as might be demonstrated, if this were a proper Place to do it) γὰρ ἐστὶ τῶν νέων πρῶτον ἐπιμεληθῆναι, ὅπως ἐσονταὶ ὅτι ἀεῖοι, ὡς περ γαργυρῶν ἀγαθῶν ἢ νέων φυθῶν εἰκὸς πρῶτον ἐπιμεληθῆναι, μετὰ δὲ τοτο ἢ ἢ ἄλλων. Euthyphron. p. 2. Et Serrini. Children belong less to their Parents than to the Publick, says Mentor; they are the Children of the People, they are the Hope and Strength of the State: 'Tis too late to mend them, when they are spoiled; it signifies nothing to debar them from Employments, when they have render'd themselves unworthy of them; it is much better to prevent the Evil, than to be obliged to punish it. A King — who is the Father of all his People, is still more particularly the Father of all the Youth, who are the Flower of the whole Nation; and it is in the Flower that Fruits are prepared. Let not the King then disdain to watch over them, and make others do the same also in their Education; let him take Care that the Laws of Minos be duly observ'd, which ordain that Children be taught to contemn Pain and Death; to place an Honour in the Neglect of Pleasures and Riches; to look upon Injustice, Lying, and Slothfulness to be infamous Vices; that from their tenderest Infancy they be instructed in singing the Praises of Heroes who were belov'd by the Gods, who have done glorious things for their Country, and who signaliz'd their Valour in Battle; let the Charms of Music seize their Souls, to make their Manners gentle and fine; let them learn to be tender of their Friends, faithful to their Allies, and just to all Men, even to their most inveterate Enemies; let them learn less to fear Death it self, and all manner of Torments, rather than the Stings of Conscience. If Children are instructed betimes in these noble Maxims, and if they are instilled into them gently, there will certainly be few but what will be inflamed with the Love of Glory and Virtue. — It is of the highest Importance also to establish publick Schools, to accustom Youth to robust Exercises of the Body, to hinder them from growing lazy and effeminate, which will spoil the best Tempers in the World. There ought to be a great Variety of Games and publick Shews to animate the People, but especially to exercise their Bodies, to make them sprightly, supple, and vigorous, with Rewards and Prizes to inspire them with a noble Emulation. But what is chiefly to be wish'd for, to encourage good Manners, is, that young People should marry early, and that their Parents, without any base or fardid Prospect of Interest, should leave to them the Choice of their Wives, such as are most agreeable to them both in Body and Mind, with whom they might live for ever happy. Avant de Telemaque, Tom. III. at the End.

² Quid Leges sine moribus

Laws without Manners are but Words and Wind.

Vana proficiunt?

Horat. Lib. III. Ode XXIV. 35, 35.

Upon which see Mr. Dacier's Note. The Method of the ancient Athenians, which an Orator of that Country makes an Encomium on, in a Place which our Author has quoted after that of Horace, is indeed admirable, and deserves to be proposed as a Pattern to all Princes. Ἀλλὰ γὰρ οὐκ ἐκ τοῦτ' αὐτοῦ, &c. 'They censur'd those as guilty of extreme Ignorance, who imagin'd, that where there were the most accurate Laws, there must be the most excellent Men; when 'tis evidently so very easy a Matter to borrow and transcribe the good Regulations of other States. Therefore they did not believe, that Virtue deriv'd so much Advantage and Assistance in its Growth from good Statutes, as from Custom and Practice. That the greatest part of Men must, of Necessity, frame their Minds according to those Patterns by which they were first taught and instructed; but that a numerous and accurate Establishment of Laws was really a Sign of the ill Condition of the Commonwealth: Edicts and Ordinances being then heap'd upon one another, when Governments find themselves obliged to endeavour the restraining of Vice, as it were by Banks and Mounds. That it became wise Magistrates, not to fill the publick places with Proclamations and Decrees, but to take care that the Subjects should have the Love of Justice and Honesty firmly rooted in their Minds. That not the Orders of the Senate or People, but good and generous Education, was the Thing which made a Government happy: In as much as Men would venture to break through the nicest Exactness of political Constitutions, if they had not been bred up under a strict Obedience to them: Whereas those who had been form'd to Virtue, by a regular and constant Discipline, were the only persons, who, by their just Conformity, could make good Laws obtain a good Effect. The principal Design of the Athenians, when they made these Reflections, was not how they might punish Disorders, but how they might find a Way of making the people to be willing not to do any thing that might deserve punishment. This last View seem'd to them worthy of themselves and their Employment: But as for the other, or an exact Application to punish people, they thought it a Business proper only for an Enemy; and therefore they took care of all the Subjects in general but particularly of the Youth. Isocrat. in Areopagit. p. 254, 255. Ed. Paris. min. What follows in the same place very well deserves to be read. See also Maxim. de Tyr. Diss. III. p. 64. Ed. Davis, and Jamblique de Vita Pythagor. §. 171, &c.

³ We must not here forget the following Reflection of Montaigne: 'The Christian Religion has all the Marks of the exactest Justice and the greatest Usefulness: But none more manifest than the severe Injunction it lays indifferently upon all to yield Obedience to the Civil Magistrate, and to maintain and defend the Laws. Of which what a wonderful Example has the divine Wisdom left us, who, to work and establish the Salvation of Mankind, and to carry on his glorious Victory over Sin and Death, would do it no other Way than at the Mercy of our ordinary Forms of Justice, submitting the Progress and Issue of so high and salutiferous an Effect, to the Blindness and Injustice of our Observations and Customs, suffering the innocent Blood of so many of his Elect, and so long as are acquainted with the exhortatory Part of the Law of Nature is given in Charge to the Ministers of the Church, to be by them press'd and enforced upon the Conscience; tho' the dogmatical Part belongs rather to those who have made this Science their peculiar Profession ^b. Of great Advantage to the same Design are publick Schools, if employ'd for the teaching not of useles Trifles, and the Inventions of idle Brains, the Reliques of the Kingdom of Darknes ^a, but solid Learning and Knowledge, the Use of which, diffuseth it self through all the Business of Life. Amongst these Studies, the chief is that which, upon sound and rational Principles, explains the Right of Sovereigns, and the Obligations correspondent to it in the Subjects ^b. Another thing which adds Strength and Vigour to publick Discipline, is the Example of those who hold the supreme Authority. The Manners of the whole State (as Isocrates ^c well observes) are drawn and express'd from the Pattern of the Prince. And therefore Spartian ^d had Reason to say of Caracalla, when he married his Mother in Law, He engaged in such Nuptials, as had he understood himself to be a true Lawgiver, he, of all Men, ought to have prohibited. To see then, that all these Particulars are duly regulated in a Commonwealth, should be the Care of the Supreme Directors.

V. Of great Service and Benefit it is, in order to the same End, to have a System of just, plain, and perspicuous Laws, for the settling of such Affairs, as the Subjects are most frequently concern'd in with one another, and suitable to the Condition and Genius of the People they are prescribed to. 'Tis the Advice of Isocrates ^d to a young Prince, As for Laws, seek those in general which are equitable and useful, and such as may render the Differences amongst the Subjects, as few as possible, and the Accommodation of them no less easy and expeditious. The Marks which the same Orator hath set ^e to distinguish good Laws, are, that they be Few in Number, yet satisfactory and intelligible to those who are to use them; just and profitable, and consonant to each other; and rather directed towards keeping up the publick Institutions, than towards preventing the petty Frauds of private Dealings ^f. It ought to be a settled Rule in this Point, not to enact more Laws than conduce to the Good of the Subject and of the State. For since Men, in their Deliberations about what they ought, or ought not,

^a Loss of many Years to the maturing of this inestimable Fruit? Effigis Liv. I. Chap. 22. towards the End. ^b Add Grocius, de Imperio Summ. Potest. circa Sacra. Chap. I. Num. 13.

^a Vide Hobbes Leviath. c. 46. &c. Lucret. I. VI. v. 981. ^b Vide Hobbes Leviath. c. 30. There is a famous Passage, relating to the Instruction of Youth, in Dio Cassius (l. 52) in Mecenas's Speech to Augustus. Add the Dispute about suppressing the University of Comimbra in Comestrag. De Unione Lucitan. l. 8. Nor is that to be disregarded which Græmond in his History of France (l. 3.) offers concerning the Number of Schools. ^c Ad Nicoclem, p. 36.

^d Ibid. c. 32. ^e in Panathen. p. 453. ^f Lycurgus (Orat. contra. Leocrat.) says, that Laws, by Reason of their Brevity, do not teach (as is done in the Science and Study of the Law) but command Men how to act. Quintil. Declam. 264. Where's the Difference, whether there be no Laws, or such as are ambiguous and uncertain? To this let us add what Cicero says, 'That the Use of Law having been established for the Good and Advantage of States, and to make Mankind better and happier; no Law that is unjust or prejudicial to a State, can have the Force of a Law, nor deserve to be call'd by that just and equitable Name. Constat profecto ad salutem civium, &c. de Legib. Lib. II. cap. 5.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. IV, V.

1. C. 10. ² 'Tis upon this Account, that those who make Laws, and govern States, ought thoroughly to know the Disposition of the people they have to command, as we have observ'd above §. 2. Note 5. Legislators and Magistrates, who are not sufficiently instructed in this Matter, fall unavoidably into a very grievous Inconvenience, which is this; supposing the people to be of a Temper and Complexion quite different from what they really are, they give them Laws which they cannot observe; upon which either a vast Number of people must be punished, without the State reaping any Benefit from it; or else they must behold the Authority of the Law contemn'd, that is, the Constitution upon the Brink of Ruin. On the contrary, when they give a people no Laws but such as are fitted to their Capacities, and such as suppose them to be what they are, they have the satisfaction of seeing them observ'd by every Body, without proceeding but rarely to the punishments which those that violate them are made to suffer: And they peaceably enjoy all the Advantages that result from the Observation of those Laws. The Fault I have been now mentioning, was notorious in the Roman Commonwealth, which could not subsist but upon supposition that those who possess'd the chief Employments in the State were exempt from Ambition, Luxury, and Avarice: This was a ridiculous supposition, and what ruin'd that Government in a very short time, after it was arriv'd at the last period of its Greatness. The Consuls and Pretors, who generally govern'd large Provinces, and who often commanded powerful Armies, were absolute in their Governments and in their Armies, during the Time of their power; so that there was no Appeal, either from their Judgment, at least in Favour of the people of the Provinces, or any way of making them alter their Conduct, by any Authority whatsoever---without even being assur'd of having Justice at Rome, when the Time of their Magistracy was expired---But besides, their punishment was very inconsiderable, and to be fear'd only by such as had been guilty of the most horrible Excesses; as we may be inform'd by Cicero's Harangues against Verres---If, on the contrary, we compare the Laws of Moses to the Genius of the people to whom he gave them, we may remark, that God suited himself, if I may so speak, to the Temper of the Jews, and that he tolerated some things, which he would never have suffer'd in a more enlightened Nation, and which are at this Day likewise forbidden under Christianity. For Example, our Lord tells us that he had not allow'd of Divorce (Mat. xx. 8.) but for the Hardness of their Hearts: And he has forbidden it Christians, except in one Case only. The same Commendation is also given to Solon, who, before he undertook to prescribe Laws to the Athenians, had studied their Tempers, and managed himself thereupon accordingly, as far as the Good of the State would permit him:---Being afterwards ask'd, whether he believ'd he had given the Athenians the best Laws that it was possible to give them; he reply'd, he had given them the best Laws that it was possible to make them receive (Plutarch. p. 86. C. (in Solon.) I have taken all this from Mr. le Clerc's Reflections sur ce que l'on appelle Bonheur & Malheur en matiere des Loteries, Chap. X. Pag. 127, &c. But it would be well to read all the rest of that Chapter. ³ A Multiplicity of Laws is a Sign of an ill govern'd State. Corruptissima Republica plurime Leges, says Tacitus, Annal. Lib. III. Cap. 27. The more the Roman Government was corrupted, the more Laws there were. See Strabo, Geogr. Lib. VI. p. 260. Ed. Paris. 399. A. Ed. ult. Augt. and the Paraphrasia, Tom. II. p. 300. &c. As for whatever relates to Laws and the Administration of Justice, we may consult Mr. Baillet's Philosoph. Practic. Part III. Cap. 5. §. 4. There are also a great many excellent things in a Dissertation of Mr. Thomassin's entitled, Morum cum Jure scripto contentio, and printed at Hall in 1701.

to do, are more frequently guided by their natural Reason, than by reflecting on the publick Constitutions ^a; wherever there are more Laws than can easily come within the Compts of their Memory, and those prohibiting such things as Reason, of it self, doth not prohibit, here the Subjects must through meer Ignorance, without any ill Intention, fall into the Laws as into so many Snares. And by this means, the Government brings the People under an unnecessary Inconvenience; which is contrary to the original Design of civil States. Moreover, the ordinary Form and Course of Justice ought to be fix'd in such a Manner, as that every Subject may recover his Right, by as short and as cheap a Process as can be contrived. The Persians have a Proverb, that Short Injustice is better than tardy and tedious Justice.

VI. And because 'tis in vain to enact Laws, if Governours suffer them to be transgress'd with Security; it is therefore their Part carefully to put their own Decrees in Execution, and to inflict due Punishments ^b, according to the Nature and Circumstances of the Fact, and the Intention and Malice of the Offender. In which Affair they ought so to proceed, as that the true Force of the Laws may be exercis'd, not only upon the Subjects of moderate Fortune and Condition, but upon the Wealthy and Powerful; whose Riches and Honours ought on no account to give them the Privilege of insulting over their Inferiors with Impunity; especially since Commonwealths are never in more Danger, than from the Fury of the Populacy, exasperated by unreasonable Oppressions ^c. Nor ought Indulgence or Pardons to be allow'd without any true Cause: since not to treat alike those who, ex crisis punitus, have deserv'd alike, is not only unjust, but hath also a peculiar Efficacy towards inflaming the Minds of the Subjects ^c.

VII. But as nothing is to be guarded with penal Sanctions, which doth not contribute to the Advantage of the State, so in the annexing of those Punishments, such Moderation is to be us'd, as that they may bear a just Proportion to the same End; and consequently that they may be no more to the Grievance of the Subject, than to the Benefit of the Publick. In general, if it be desired, that Punishments should obtain their due Effect, they ought to be rais'd to such a Degree of Severity, as that the Pain and Sharpness of them may outweigh the Profit, or Pleasure, which might arise from the Transgression ^c.

VIII. Farther, since Men first incorporated themselves in Communities, to obtain Security against the Injuries of others ^a; it concerns every Government to forbid the mutual Injuries of Subjects, so much the more strictly and severely, as their perpetual living together affords more easy Opportunities of Hurt and Mischief. Neither ought the Distinction of Orders, or Dignities, to be allow'd such a Force, as to encourage the great and powerful in tyrannizing over those of meaner Condition. The way to purchase an honest Popularity, is (in Isocrates's Words) neither to let the Commonalty grow extravagant and abusive, nor to let them suffer from the Insolence of the superior Order; but to bestow Honour

^a Hobbes De Cive, c. 13. f. 15. Leviath. c. 30.
^d Pindar. Olymp. Od. 13. v. 6, &c.

^b Leviath. id.

^c See the Phrynasiens, Tom. II. p. 578, &c.

Εὐνομία βᾶθρον πολιῶν, &c.

Good Law, the Basis of a State,
Here with her Sitters takes her Seat;
Strict Justice, with unshaken Mind,
And Peace, engaging to be kind,
Through their fair Hands the Treasure flows,
Which Heaven on craving Men bestows;
Daughter of Themis, who presides
In Councils, and wise Motions guides.

^e Add Hobbes Leviath. c. 30.

^f Ad Nicodem. p. 31.

Mr. BARBEYRA'S NOTES on §. VI, and VIII.

¹ 'The Crimes and Disorders that are not to be prevented, must be immediately punish'd with severity: 'Tis an Act of Clemency to put a stop to the Course of Iniquity, by making early Examples of those who presume to offend. A little Blood shed in due time prevents the shedding of a great deal, and makes a Prince to be dreaded without making use of severity too often. Avant. de Tolon. Tom. III. p. 73. We shall treat of Punishments more at large in the Third Chapter of the following Book. See Mr. Buddeus's Philosoph. Pract. Part III. cap. 5. §. 1. concerning the Manner of the Distribution of Punishments.

² 'What signifies it to me or to any of my Fellow-Subjects, that my Sovereign is successful, that the prudent Management of his Ministers, nay, that of his own personal Merits, exalt him to the highest Pitch of Glory: that my Country is powerful, the Terror of all the neighbouring Nations? What should I be the better for all these things, if I were forced to labour under the dismal and melancholy Burthen of Poverty and Oppression? If, whilst I was secur'd against the Sallies from without of a cruel Enemy, I was expos'd within the Walls of Cities to the Barbarity of a treacherous Assassin? If Rapine and Violence were less to be feared in the darkest Nights, and in the widest Deserts, than at a mid Day in the Streets? If Safety, Cleanliness, and good Order had not rendred living in Towns so delightful, and had not added to the Plenty the Means of our conversing with so much Ease one with another? Or if being weak and defenceless, I were encroached upon in the Country by every neighbouring great Man? If there was not a Provision made to protect me against his Injustice? If I had not at hand so many Masters, and those eminent Masters too, to breed up my Children in those Arts and Sciences which will one Day raise their Fortunes? If the promoting of Trade had not made good substantial Stuffs for my Clothing, and wholesome Food for my Nourishment, both plentiful and cheap? If, to conclude, the Care of my Sovereign had not given me reason to be as well contented with my Fortune, as his extraordinary Virtues must needs make him with his? Caracteres ou Mœurs de ce Siècle, par Mr. de la Bruyere, p. 334.

always on Persons of the greatest Merit, and to see that the rest are not wronged or trampled upon." 'Tis a good Saying of the Historian ^a, Tho' it be enough for private Men to do no Injury themselves; yet 'tis the Duty of Princes to take care farther, that others do none. It is likewise repugnant to the End of Government, to allow Subjects in revenging, by their own private Force, the Injuries which they think themselves to have suffered.

IX. Besides, altho' a single Ruler cannot, in Person, discharge all the Affairs of an extended Realm, so that he must of Necessity assume Ministers into the Partnership of his Cares; yet these, as they derive all their Authority from their Master's Commission, so whatever they act, whether well, or ill, must finally be set to his Account. And therefore Isocrates ¹ prudently adviseth, So appoint others over the Business which you can't excuse your self, as considering, that whatever they perform, will be ascribed to you. And again, If you happen to obtain a Magistracy, never use the Service of a wicked Person in exercising your Office; for in whatsoever Point he offends, the Guilt will be laid to your Charge ^b. For which Reason, and because as the Ministers are, so the Business will be well or ill managed; Governours are obliged to employ, in publick Trusts, Men of Integrity and Ability; often to inspect their Proceedings, and to reward, or punish them, according as they find them deserve; to the End that the rest may understand how strictly they stand engaged, to apply no less Fidelity and Diligence to the Affairs of the State, than they would to their own personal Concerns. The Chinese, to avoid all Inconveniences that might arise from Favour on the one hand, and from Repentment on the other, allow no Man to bear an Office in the Place where he was born; it being most likely that he should there meet with Persons whom he particularly loves, or hates. Thus too, since wicked Men are tempted to the Commission of the greatest Sins, through Hopes of Impunity, which they easily entertain, where the Judges lie open to Bribery and Corruption; it's the Duty of Sovereigns severely to punish such Judges, as the Patrons of all those Villanies which disturb the publick Security ^d, and to revoke their unjust Sentences and Proceedings. For the Practice said to be observed in Arragon, seems reasonable; to punish the Judges for a false Sentence, and yet to put the same Sentence in Execution. Besides, tho' the ordinary Management of Affairs is entrusted in the Hands of Ministers, yet the supreme Rulers themselves ought never to disdain the lending a patient Ear to the Complaints, or Requeits, of their Subjects.

What Qualifications Sovereigns ought to regard in those, whose Advice they would use in the Dispatch of publick Business, and what seems the most convenient way of getting out their Opinion, Mr Hbbes ^e hath shewn at large. As to the latter Point, there's a remarkable Instance in Dowla's History of the Civil Wars of France ^f, where the Pope consults the Cardinals, not in a Consistory, but each apart, about the Absolution to be granted King Henry. Isocrates ^g calls a Counsellor, The most useful of all Treasures, or Possessions, and the most worthy of a King. Neubof ^h, in his Description of China, reports many things very worthy of Observation, concerning the Magistrates of that wise People. Nor ought we to undervalue the Directions of King James the First of England, in his ΒΑΣΙΛΙΚΩΝ ΔΕΥΣΕΩΝ ⁱ; that a Prince should choose his Counsellors chiefly by his own Judgment, not at the Pleasure of others; and that he should take them indifferently out of all Orders of the People, in as much as he is the common Father of all. In the same Piece, the King hath assign'd the Reasons, why Men of moderate Condition should be pitch'd on, for the Offices relating to the publick Money ^k.

X. Since the Subjects are obliged to the bearing of Taxes, and the like Burthens, on no other account, but as they are necessary to defray the publick Expences in War, or Peace; it is the Duty of Sovereigns, in this respect, to draw no farther Supplies ^l, than either the

^a Xiphilin. Epit. Dion. in Galba. See also the Parrhasiana, Tom. II. p. 283, &c. where it is shewn, that every Man ought to have Justice done him.

^b Themist. Orat. 8. p. 117. Mentor gives Telmachus very excellent Advice and very judicious Rules relating to this Point (Tom. 5. p. 124, &c.) but as this Chapter is already clogged with Notes, it would be too much to copy it out here. See also Charron de la sagesse, Lib. III. Chap. 2. f. 16, &c. And Mr. Buddeus's Philosoph. Pract. Part III. Cap. 5. f. 6. Our Author has here cited that Verse of Martial, Principis est virtus maxima, nisse suos. Lib. VIII. Epigr. 15. But it relates to quite another thing: For the Poet means that the great Virtue of a Prince consists in the Knowledge how to gain the Affections of his People, as it plainly appears from the Design and Fancy of the Epigram: The following Example is more to the purpose. — When Satibarzanes petitioned his Master Artaxerxes for the Government of a certain Province, of which he was very incapable, together with the Sum of three Thousand pieces of Gold; the King granted the latter part of his Request, but denied the former: for, says he, to give you so much Money will not make me more indigent, but to give you such a Government, would make me more unjust. Euripides (in Rhes. v. 626) Every Man ought to be assigned that part in which he is capable of doing most service. Libanius (Legat. ad Julian.) According as the Man is, whom you place in the Box, accordingly the Chariot will be guided.

^d vid. Diodor. Sic. l. 2. c. 75, 76.

^e Leviath. c. 15, 30.

^f L. 14. p. 966.

^g Ad Nicoclem.

^h Descript. gen. Sinic. C. 1.

ⁱ L. 2.

^k Ad Liban. Orat. 5. De Assessoribus.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. IX, X.

¹ Ad Nicoclem, p. 35. ² Charron, d. 1. ³ Too great Exactions do considerably lessen the publick Revenues, tho' at first sight they seem to increase them. The Reason of it is, that Trade is thereby quickly ruined, and so that Source of the publick Revenues is entirely, or in part, dry'd up. For when there is very little to be got by Trading, People grow tired of it, and traffick as little as possible. Being by degrees destitute of Money, or having no considerable Sum by them, they can undertake no great Enterprize; so that Trade is at last, by degrees, reduced to what is only necessary for the support of Life, and brings but a small Matter to the Prince's Treasury. This is what one of the most antient Greek Poets above a thousand Years ago says, speaking of his Brother, who had bribed the Judges, who, in those Days, were called Kings, that he might have a larger share in the paternal Estate than He- meer Necessity, or the signal Benefit and Interest of the State shall require a. And then they are to see that these Impositions be levied according to the justest Proportion; and that no Immunities or Exemptions be granted to certain Persons, to the defrauding or oppressing of the rest b. Farther, that the way of gathering them be with as little Charge as possible, and that much do not stick to the Collectors Fingers: Lest it should happen to the Treasury, as it fares with Buckets in a Fire; they are fill'd to throw upon the Flames, but by passing through so many Hands, and being frequently shook from side to side, they are scarce half full, when they reach the Place, which requires their Service. 'Twas a notable Answer, that which Hybreas the Orator gave Mark Antony the Triumvir, when order'd by him to double the 'Tribute in Asia; You should, at the same time, command us (says he) to have a double Summer; and a double Autumn this Year 2. Care ought likewise to be taken, that what is collected, be laid out on the Occasions of the Commonwealth, and not wasted in Luxury, Donatives c, superfluous Magnificence, or idle Vanities. Lastly, Matters are to be so ordered, as that the Expences, as near as possible, keep a Proportion to the Revenues; or where they fail, the Defect must be made up by frugal Management, and by retrenching unnecessary Charges. 'Tis of pernicious Consequence to affect more Pomp and State than the ordinary Income will support; and he doth, in Reality, live great enough, who gives every one their due. Nor ought we to be moved with that Sentence of Tully d 'Tis no great Commendation in a Prince to be reputed a frugal Man: Which Mr. Hobbes e thus explains; Frugality, tho' in poor Men a Virtue, maketh a Man unapt to atchieve such Actions, as require the Strength of many Men at once; for it weakens their Endeavours, which are to be nourish'd and kept in Vigour by Reward.

hance to their Subjects (only, so far as Charity commands them to have a particular regard to those, who, by some undeserved Calamity, are rendred insufficient for their own Support f) yet, in as much as the Sums, necessary to the common Safety, are collected from the Ability of private Persons; farther, since the Strength of a State consists in the Valour, and the Wealth of the Subjects; and because,

— gravis est domino, quæ servit egestas 3;

Poor Vassals are a Burthen to their Lord;

therefore, so far as in them lies, they are to take care, that the Estates and Possessions of their People be well cultivated and improved. Isocrates g is admirable in his Advice to this purpose; Keep a strict Eye (says he) over the Fortunes of private Men; believe the Prodigal to spend out of your Stock, and the good Husband to increase your Wealth. For all the Substance of the People is (as it were) the domestick Treasure of a good Prince. It will contribute much towards this End, if the Subjects be encouraged to take as plentiful Supplies as possible, from the Land and from the Water; to improve industriously the Materials of their own native Growth, and never to hire other Hands for those Works which they can conveniently perform themselves; and this is done by furthering, and promoting Manual Arts. And, in pursuance of the same Design, it will be of mighty Use, to advance the Exercise of Merchandize and Navigation in Maritime Countries h. Nor is it enough to banish Idleness, but Men are to be brought to a frugal Method of living by Sumptuary Laws i, which may forbid all unnecessary Expences; especially those by which the Wealth of the Natives is translated to Foreigners. 'Twas a Saying of Mæcenas, that great Riches are gathered, rather by spending little, than by receiving much j;

XI. Tho' Rulers are not bound to afford Suste-nod: We have formerly, says he, divided our Inheritance; but you took from me what did not belong to you, by presenting many Gifts to the Kings, who are greedy of 'em, and pretend that they determin'd the Cause. Blind Wretches, who know not that one half is much better than the whole!

Νῆπιος ἐστὶ ἵσταται ὄσω πλέον ἡμῖν πατρὸς.
(Oper. & Dier. verif. 40. upon which see Le Clerc.)

a He means, that it were better for Kings to be satisfied with one half of what they exact from the People, than to extort from them all that they have, and by that Means render them incapable of contributing any more to the supplying of their Wants. Parrhasiana, Tom. I. p. 281, 282. See what follows; and in Tom. II. p. 291, &c. As also Charron de la sagesse, Liv. III. Chap. 2. f. 20.

b Vide Phil. De Comines, l. 5. c. 18. circa fin. Grotius on Luke III. 13. 'Tis the Duty of Princes to adjust the publick Burthens, according to the publick Necessities; so as that they may lawfully provide for their own Support, in a way agreeable to their Quality; but not to make the Luxury and the Lust of themselves, and their Court-Slaves, the Measure of what they demand, which are indeed without measure.

c Add. Tho. Mori Utopl. 1. Drepan Panegy. c. 27. It is the last Defence and Refuge of wicked Princes, to take away from some, what they may bestow on others. Add. Montagne's Ess. l. 3. c. 6. p. 175. Add. Machiavel Prim. c. 16. Plin. Panegr. c. 4.

d Orat. pro Rege Deiotaro, c. 9. e Leviath. c. 11. f The Yucas of old in Peru, amongst all their Titles, delighted chiefly to be styl'd Lovers of the Poor, as de la Vega informs us (Commento Reg. l. 2. c. 14.) who likewise reports (l. 4. c. 7.) that the Lands of Widows, in that Kingdom, had more Privileges than those of their Tuca himself. g Ad Nicoclem, p. 33.

h See an Instance of this, in the Diligence of Sesostris, by which he rendred Egypt capable of Trade, and convenient for the Communication of Goods and Products. Diodor. Sic. l. 1. c. 57. See also upon this whole Matter, the Parrhasiana, Tom. 1. 264. &c. Tom. II. p. 291, &c. And les Avant. de Telsmaque, Tom. I. p. 85, &c. Tom. III. p. 50, &c. And Mr. Buddeus's Philosoph. Pract. Part III. cap. 5. sect. 8. Where he also treats of what relates to Money. Add the Rules laid down by Mr. Hobbes (Leviath. c. 30.) to be observed in relation to the Companies of Merchants. i In Dion. Cass. l. 52.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTE on §. XI.

1 V. Hobbes De Cive, c. 15. f. 0. 2 Plutarch. in Marc. Antonin. p. 926. B. See also upon this whole Matter, the Philosoph. Pract. of Mr. Buddeus, Part III. cap. 5. sect. 7. 3 Lucean. Pharfal. L. 3. v. 152. 4 See the next Book, c. 5. f. 3:

Yet, in this Respect, the Example of Sovereigns hath more Efficacy, than the Force and Authority of any Laws ^a. But if a Country abound with Men and Money, it is there convenient to tolerate some unnecessary Consumptions, and such as may seem to border upon Luxury; that the common People may hence be furnish'd with Opportunities of maintaining themselves, and that the vast Stock of Money may not lie dead and useless. Provided, that no Encouragement be given to Extravagance and Excess, and that those Commodities be not idly wasted at Home, which might be exported with Advantage to foreign Parts.

XII. Farther, since the internal Health, and the firm and robust Habit of a Commonwealth depends on the Unity of the Subjects; the more exactly this Unity is observed, the more effectually the Force and Authority of Government diffuseth it self through the whole Body of the State; it is, for this Reason, incumbent on Sovereigns, to prevent all Factions amongst the People; from which 'tis but an easy Slip into Sedition, and Civil War; a Condition so much worse than a War carried on, with universal Consent, against Foreigners; as War is in general less amicable than Peace ^b. As likewise to take care, that the Subjects do not bandy and associate themselves by particular Covenants and Engagements ^c; and that neither the whole People, nor any Part of them, place a greater Dependence, or rely more for Defence and Succour on any other Person, within or without the Realm, under any pretence whatsoever, whether sacred or civil, than on their lawful Prince. And that, on the contrary, there be no Person to whom Seneca's Description may be applied,

^a Tacitus Ann. L. 3. c. Uspisium was the principal Author of these strict and grave Fashions; himself using the antique Habit, and the antique Diet: Hence there arose in Men a Desire of expressing, by such Observances, their Duty to their Prince, accompanied with a Love of Emulation, stronger than any Fear of Law or Punishment. Add Bernier's Description of the Empire of the Mozul, near the End, where he speaks of the Causes contributing to the great Consumption of Gold in that Kingdom. ^b Herodot. Uran. init. Add Evagrius (H. E. l. 4, c. 13.) concerning Justinian's Favour to the Fallica Veneta, with the Mischiefs that arose from it; as likewise Procop. Hist. Arcan. & De Bell. Pers. l. 1. c. 24. & Bacon's Serm. sci. c. 15. & 49. ^c Vide Diodor. Sic. l. 1. c. 21.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. and XII.

' No Body doubts that Union will make a Nation flourish, and that Dissension is very dangerous to it; but there must be Care taken to have a just Notion of the Meaning of those Words. An Union serviceable to a Monarchical or Aristocratical Government, is what designs the universal Good of those who live under it. If in a Monarchical State, where the Power of the Sovereign is limited by the Laws, the principal Subjects of the State should willingly, or by Force, consent to submit all the Laws to the Prince's Pleasure, such an Union would not be advantageous to him in any Respect. It would change a Society of free People into a Company of miserable Slaves. The ready Compliance of the Chinese to obey their King blindly, does but strengthen his Tyranny, and add to their Misery. For those who depend on the Will of one Man, addic'd to a thousand Passions, whose Fancies are above the Restraint of Law, can be certain of nothing; such a Man has some Favourites, who have other Favourites of their own, and suffer themselves to be bribed; and such a Form of Government is only a Subordination of Tyrants, every one of them endeavouring to get something by the Subjection of the People. But it is asserted, that the general Obedience of the Chinese is of service to preserve the Peace of their Country, and that they enjoy by it all the Advantages that the strictest Union can procure. They mean, all Advantages that can be possess'd in Slavery. But sure there is not a Freeman but had rather see more frequent Commotions, than suffer an eternal Slavery. Moreover, 'tis false to affirm that there are no intestine Wars under such a Form of Government. The most enslaved People will, in Time, grow weary of an exorbitant Tyranny, and upon the first Opportunity shew, that the Desire of Liberty is not quite stifled in their Souls. This has happen'd often among the Chinese and Turks. As there are few People concern'd in supporting arbitrary Power in a particular Family, or a particular Person, and the generality having Reason to complain of it, so few will be against a Change in the Government, and others believe that if they get nothing, they will lose no great matter by it. The same ought to be said of an Aristocratical Government. The Union of those who govern such a State, would be useless, if it did not procure the Observation of the Laws, and the universal Good of the Commonwealth. This we may understand from the History of the Thirty Tyrants of Athens, and the Decemviri of Rome. The Union of those Men serv'd only to crush the People, and make them miserable; because their principal Design was to gratify their Passions, without having the least Respect to the publick Good. Union may also be consider'd with Regard to the People, who, when the State is so fixed as that they may peaceably enjoy the Fruits of their Labours by obeying the Laws of their Country (which are not to be chang'd or transgress'd by any Member of the Society at his Pleasure) ought to esteem themselves happy, and to obey unanimously the Commands of the supreme Power. Now to keep the Populace in so firm an Union, it is requisite that not only they may be the better for it, but also that they should be sensible of their own Happiness. Without that, there will be always some turbulent Men, who, having wasted all their Substance in Debaucheries and Idleness, would endeavour to recover it by some new Commotion. Such Men will easily induce People, who fancy they live unhappily, to take up Arms against their Prince at the first Opportunity. On the other hand, when the People are of Opinion that they cannot mend their Condition by a Turn of Affairs, and that they should venture losing a great deal by it, 'tis a very difficult Matter to seduce them.—The Agreement and Union both of Governours and People ought to tend to the publick Good; from whence it follows that whatsoever has not such a Design, is injurious to it, and ought rather to be term'd a Conspiracy than an Union; since the Name of a Virtue cannot with Reason be attributed to a thing which injures and ruins a Society. What has been said of the Civil, may also be said of the Ecclesiastical Society, which can only flourish by the great Number of its Members, and by Learning (which is in that Society what Riches are in the other) and by Union. Not to mention here the Number and Learning of such a Society; I shall only take notice, that the Union of those who govern'd it, ought not to be a tyrannical Combination, which destroys it. Such is, for instance, the Union of the Inquisitors in Spain and Italy, who perfectly agree among themselves: But to do what? To hinder both Lay-Men, as they term 'em, and Ecclesiasticks (who might discover the Errors that were introduced into Religion, through Ignorance, or the Abuses crept into the Discipline out of Ambition or any other Passion) from proposing a Reformation, be there never so much Occasion for one; and of course, to keep every Body in extreme Ignorance, or a sinful Dissimulation and Hypocrisy. It would be more for the Advantage of the Church, that there were many Contests, rather than a perpetual Tyranny, that quite overthrowes the very End of its Establishment, which was, to be taught the Principles of the Christian Religion, and convinced of the Certainty of it, by very substantial Reasons. Farrington, Tom. I. p. 289, &c. See Hobbes de Cive, c. 13, l. 12.

—Stat ingens arbor, atque umbrâ grati; Sylvas minores urget a.

————— He stands a mighty Tree,
The Underwood oppressing with his Shade ¹.

XIII. Lastly, since the Condition, under which different Nations and Kingdoms stand, in regard to each other, is but a deceitful kind of Peace, and such as cannot be relied on with any Security; it is a part of the Office of supreme Governours to take care, that as well the Courage of the Subjects, as their Skill in Arms, be kept up and improved; and that all things necessary to be employ'd against an invading Enemy, as fortified Places, Arms, and Men, be provided betimes: For, to use the old Proverb in Plautus, 'Tis a lamentable Work to begin digging a Well, when we are almost dead with Thirst. But to be the Aggressor in a War, how just soever the Occasion of it may be, is what ought not to be practis'd; unless a very fair Opportunity offer it self, and when the State of the Commonwealth may with Convenience bear such an Undertaking. To the same End, the Councils and Motions of the Neighbouring Governments are nicely to be divid'd into and observ'd (in which Respect the perpetual Residence, now fix'd in most Courts, are of very great Use) and Friendships and Alliance prudently to be contracted c.

^a In Oedip. v. 542, 543.
Ad. Hobbes De Civitate, c. 13. f. 7, 8.

^b In Mostellar. Act. II. Sc. 1. v. 32, 33.

^c Vide Marfelaer Legat. l. 2. c. 11.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. XII.

¹ Vide Bacon's Serm. fid. c. 35.
Jazoffe, Liv. III. Chap. 3. sect. 18, &c.

² See the Avantures de Telemachus, Tom. IV. p. 5, &c. and Charron à la

' Ah! with what Deliberation ought Princes to consider every thing before they begin a War. The Motives of it ought to be just; nor is that sufficient, they ought to be necessary: The Blood of a People must not be shed, unless for their own Preservation in Cases of Extremity. (Avantures de Telemachus, Tom. IV. p. 91.) The Evils of a War exhaust a Nation, and always put it in danger of being destroyed even while it is most victorious: With what Advantage soever they may undertake a War, they are never certain of concluding it without being expos'd to the most tragical Reverses of Fortune; whatever Superiority you have in the Fight, the least Mistake, a sudden Terror, a meer Nothing snatches the Victory out of your Hands, and carries it to the Enemy: Nay, tho' you should hold Victory chain'd as it were in your Camp, you ruin your self in ruining your Enemy; you depopulate your Country, let the Ground be almost uncultivated, put a Stop to Trade; and which is worse, you weaken your Laws, and suffer Corruption of Manners. The Youth no longer apply themselves to Learning; the pressing Necessity of your Affairs makes you tolerate pernicious Liberties in your Army; Justice, Order, every thing suffers by this Disorder. A King who sheds the Blood of so many Men, and occasions so many Mischiefs, only to gain a little Glory, or to extend the Bounds of his Kingdom, does not deserve the Glory he is in Pursuit of, but rather deserves to be depriv'd of what he possesses, for desiring to usurp what does not belong to him, p. 4, 5. of the same Tome.

OF THE LAW of NATURE
AND NATIONS.

BOOK VIII.

CHAP. I.

Of the Power to direct the Actions of the Subject.

- | | |
|---|---|
| I. Of the Nature of Civil Laws in general. II. Whether a Civil Law may contradict the Natural? III. Whether the Definitions of Crimes is left arbitrarily to the Determination of the Civil Laws? IV. The Precepts of the Decalogue whether Civil Laws. | V. Whether any thing was just antecedently to the Civil Laws? VI. Whether a sinful Command of a Superior may at any time be obey'd without Sin? VII. No Sin lawfully committed at the Command of a Superior. VIII. Whether a Subject may lawfully bear Arms in an unjust War, at the Command of his Prince? |
|---|---|

HAVING explain'd what related to the Nature of Sovereign Power in general; I come now to consider the most material Difficulties that arise upon the particular Parts of it. And since I at first supposed, that the Power to direct the Actions of the Subject, was that from which all civil Laws were deriv'd; to what I have already said of Laws in general ^a, I now shall add what more particularly relates to Laws civil, and the Commands of the sovereign Power. A Law therefore is call'd civil either with respect to its Authority, or to its Original. In the former Sense, all Laws may be call'd civil, which are the Rules for the Administration of Justice in civil Courts, from whatever Original they arise ^b. The Laws of God and Nature, it must be own'd, are of universal Obligation, and they that break them must expect to be punish'd by divine Justice. But it is the civil Power that gives them the force of Laws in civil Courts. And the same Power must determine, what Crimes are to be punished by the civil Justice, and what shall be left to the divine; as also, upon what natural Obligations an Action may commence in the civil Court; and what will not bear an Action, but must be left to the common Ingenuity and Probity of Mankind. Hence under civil Government no Man is call'd to account, or can, properly speaking, be punished for the Violation of those Laws of Nature, which have not the Authority of civil Laws stamp'd upon them. For the Evils that attend such Crimes are only such as are usually called Natural Punishments ^c. Those Laws of Nature indeed, upon the Observation of which the common Quiet of Mankind entirely depends, have in all Commonwealths the force of civil Laws. But there are others that have no such force allow'd them, either in express Terms, or in any Practice of civil Courts; as well because the Controversies about the Violation of them would be very perplex'd and intricate, as to prevent the Multiplication of litigious Suits; and also that the Good and Virtuous might not be deprived of the most valuable part of their Character, the doing well out of Reverence to their Creator, without regard to the Fears of human Penalties; for this they must necessarily lose, when there is no Distinction made whether a Man doth well out of Love to Virtue, or out of Fear of Punishment. ^d And indeed, as Seneca saith, how cheap a thing is it to be good only as far as the Law obligeth us, when the Rule of our Duty is of so much wider Extent? For how many things do Piety, Humanity, Justice, and Fidelity require of us, which yet are without the Reach of the Law ^d? Civil Laws with respect to their Original, are such as flow entirely from the Will of the supreme civil Power, and respect only such things as are left indifferent by the Laws of God and Nature, and which particularly conduce to the Benefit and Advantage of the Commonwealth. And these demand the same Obedience

^a B. 1. chap. 6. ^b Vid. Grot. de Imper. Summar. Potest. circa sacrz, c. 3. n. 4, 11. &c. c. 4. n. 1.
^c See above in B. 2. chap. 3. §. 21. ^d Sen. de ira, l. 2. c. 27.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. 1.

¹ Quod non vetat Lex, hoc vetat fieri Pudor & nec. Tread. v. 332. Grot. L. 3. c. 10. §. 1. See likewise what has been said above in B. 3. c. 4. §. 6. from from the Subject as other Laws do; since it must evidently be more for the good of Society, that in indifferent things the Determination of the Government should take place, and the Subjects should look upon that to be good, which is thought so by their Governors, than that there should be endless Disputes between them about it, which do not usually end but in War and Bloodshed, certain and undeniable Evils. 'The publick Good, saith Cicero, ought to be the End of all Laws, and is the best Comment upon, and Interpretation of them; and we do not desire the Preservation of our Laws merely for the sake of the Laws themselves, but for the common Interest and Advantage. And hence the Constitutions of particular Commonwealths, made for the Publick Good, are call'd by some, Appendages to the Law of Nature. But it must be observ'd, that tho' all these Laws put together, are commonly call'd the Civil Law, yet, that there are several Particulars contain'd in the Bodies and Codes of the Civil Law, which are not properly and strictly Laws. For besides those Commands which the sovereign Power lays upon the Subject for the particular Utility of the Commonwealth, there are many other things insert'd, which should be reduc'd properly to the Law of Nature. What belongs more particularly to the Civil Law, may be reduc'd to these two Heads: First, to certain Forms prescribed, and certain Methods to be observ'd in civil Affairs, either in transferring Rights, or else in laying Obligations upon Persons, which shall be look'd upon to be valid in the Civil Court: And Secondly, To the several Ways how a Man is to prosecute his Rights in the same Courts. So that, if we give the Law of Nature all that belongs to it, and take away from the Civilians what they have hitherto engross'd and promiscuously treated of; we shall bring the Civil Law to a much narrower Compass; not to say at present, that whenever the Civil Law is deficient, we must have recourse to the Law of Nature; and that therefore in all Commonwealths the natural Laws supply the Defects of the Civil. For which reason Hobbes calls the Law of Nature, the unwritten Civil Law.

a Cic. de Invent. l. 2. c. 38.

b Philo Judæus de Josepho p. 351. B. Ed. Paris.

c De Civ. c. 14. §. 14. Vid. Quintil. Decl. 252. Actio inscripti Mithridæi; upon which Law Quintilian says, That the old Romans seem'd to have made it with the greatest Wisdom possible: For since, saith the Declaimer, they knew that no Prudence or Foresight could be cautious enough to prevent all the several Ways of Mischief that bad Men devise, they made this Law for an universal Security, that what Crimes escap'd the others might fall under the reach of this.

d Ibid. Sect. 9.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTE on §. 1.

1 Besides, as there are a great many things which the Law of Nature prescribes only in a general and indefinite Manner; so the Time, Manner, Place, Application to such or such Persons, and the like Circumstances, are left to the Discretion and Prudence of every private Man. The Civil Laws generally regulate all that matter, for the Order and Tranquillity of the State; sometimes they propose Rewards to those who by the Natural Bent of their own Inclinations would willingly perform such Actions, to which they are not determinately bound, in such and such a particular Case. They also explain whatever may happen to be obscure or doubtful, either in the Maxims of the Law of Nature, or their Application; and private Men are bound to submit to the Decisions that are made by publick Authority, even tho' they should not find 'em upon Examination to be very just. In short, they limit in several Respects, the Use of those Rights which naturally belong to every one; which they ought not to do any farther than the Good of the State requires it. Moreover, every private Man is oblig'd to comply with all these Regulations, as far as they contain nothing that is manifestly contrary to the Divine Laws, whether Natural, or Reveal'd; and that not only through Fear of the Punishments which are annex'd to the Violation of 'em, but even upon a Principle of Conscience; and also by the Virtue of a Maxim of the Law of Nature, which commands to obey our lawful Sovereign in every thing we can do without committing a Crime. The Author's Abridgment, De Offic. Hom. & Civ. B. l. c. 12. Sect. 6, 7, 8.

II. But notwithstanding, Hobbes de Civ. c. 14. §. 10. will maintain this strange sort of Opinion, 'That it is impossible any civil Law should be made repugnant to that of Nature, except it be to the Dishonour of God. The Argument he uses to prove it, is this: Men, saith he, d when they enter into civil Societies, oblige themselves by Compact to obey his Commands, who hath the sovereign Power, that is, to obey the civil Laws; and this Compact they are oblig'd by the Law of Nature to observe. But since the Compact it self, and consequently the Obligation to obey the Civil Laws, was antecedent to the Promulgation of the Laws themselves; by the force of the same Law of Nature, which commands not to violate the Compacts, we are oblig'd also to obey every civil Law. For where we are oblig'd to Obedience before we know what will be commanded, there we are oblig'd to obey universally and in every Respect".

But the Truth is, it must be presum'd, that when Men enter into civil Societies, they have already a competent Knowledge of the Law of Nature; and that one of the chief Ends of erecting civil Governments was, that the Laws of Nature, upon which the common Peace of Mankind is established, might be obey'd without Danger. And in short, that there is nothing in the Laws of Nature, which is any way repugnant to the Nature and End of civil Society; but on the contrary, that they are entirely necessary to assist and promote it. And therefore when Men form'd themselves into civil Societies, and oblig'd one another by Compact to obey the civil Laws, we must suppose that they took it for granted, that nothing would be establish'd by the civil Law, which was contrary to the natural; and that the particular Advantages of the Commonwealth could not be contrary to the common End of all Government. It is possible indeed that a civil Law might be made in Opposition to the natural; but no Man in his Wits would ever attempt to make such a Law, unless he resolv'd to ruin and overturn the whole Commonwealth. And therefore Stratocles was very justly taken for a Madman, when he publish'd his Law at Athens, that whatever King Demetrius commanded, should be Law to Gods and Men. And Parysitis was guilty of detestable Flattery, when she persuaded Artaxerxes to marry his own Daughter, and despise the Greek Law; adding, that Heaven had made him the Persian Law, and the proper Judge of Good and Evil.

III. The same Author argues further in defence of his Opinions, de Crue, c. 6. §. 16. c. 14. §. 9. 10. ' That tho' Theft, Murder, Adultery, and all kinds of Injuries, are forbidden by the Law of Nature; yet that what is to be call'd Theft in a Subject, what Murder, what Adultery, and what an Injury, is not to be determin'd by the Law of Nature, but by the Civil Law. For barely the taking away what another Man is in Possession of, is not Theft, but only to take away that which of right belongs to another. But what of Right belongs to me, and what to another, is a Question of the Civil Law. And in the same manner, barely to kill a Man is not Murder, but to kill him the Civil Law forbids. And so also, no Act of Generation is Adultery, but that which the Civil Law declares such; and lastly, Breach of Promise is indeed an Injury, where the Promise itself is lawful; but where there is no Right to make an Agreement, there no Right is transferred, and consequently no Injury follows; but what we may make Agreements about, and what we may not, depends upon the Civil Laws. To which I answer, that all that believe the Scriptures, as to several sorts of Crimes, are sufficiently assured, both from the Laws of the Jews, which were of divine Institution, and from other Parts of the holy Book, how God, the Author of the Law of Nature, would have them desir'd; so that tho' the civil Government should desir'd to make some particular Acts not criminal, yet they would nevertheless be contrary to the Law of God. Especially since there can be no sufficient Reason given, why God in his Laws should give such Definitions of such Actions, unless they ought equally to be observ'd in all Nations. The Spartans allow'd the frigid and impotent to supply their Deficiency in the Conjugal Duties, by the Assistance of the young and vigorous: And this was done at Sparta, without any bad Imputation of the Husband, the Wife, or the Gallant, when they had no Hopes of Children otherwise: Because the Civil Laws of that State did not comprehend that Method of answering the Husband's Part at his own Request, under the Name of Adultery. And yet, since it is evident from the Laws of God, that by the Law relating to Adultery, any Familiarity of the Bed with a Woman actually married to another is forbidden; it is evident, that those Assurances also were contrary to the Law of Nature. But if it be reply'd, that the Definitions of particular Acts in the Scriptures were intended for, and only belong'd to the Jewish Commonwealth, and so are of positive Institution; yet thus much however must be allowed, that the Civil Law ought to have so cautious a Regard to the Definitions of Acts forbidden by the Law of Nature, as not to defeat the Intention and End of it, the Preservation of a peaceable Society and honourable Correspondence among Men. And therefore if any Definitions of the Civil Law be opposite to this End, it must be granted, that it is also contrary to the Law of Nature. For Example; if the Civil Law should define Adultery to me, by telling me that it is when a Man invades another's Bed against his Wife's Consent; or of Theft, that it is, when a Man takes away something from another by Night; or of Murder, that it is when a Man openly assaults another, and kills him: It is manifest, that the publick Quiet and Security of the Commonwealth could not long subsist under such Methods of Government. For we are not to imagine, that the Universality of such Definitions would sufficiently secure the publick Peace; that is, that though particular Persons might perhaps sometimes be sensible of Inconveniences from them, yet that at other times they might find Advantages proportionable to the Inconveniences; and that the Equality of Right, which such Laws would settle among the Subjects, would take off all occasion of Complaint: For tho' perhaps a Man might desire that some particular things might be lawful only for himself; yet if others should have as large Immunities granted them in Opposition to him, he would soon be willing to throw up his Privilege. And should the Civil Laws make any such Establishments, it must be impossible that the Peace and Order, which Nature intended, should be preserv'd. And if the Equality of such Laws alone were Reason enough to introduce them, why must we any longer be confin'd by any Laws at all, since by taking them wholly away, we should make the greatest Equality? Which it is impossible any Man in his Wits should think of doing. In some Accounts of the Tartars we are told, that they are utter Strangers to all Justice; and that when any of them wants any thing, he may take it without fear of Punishment wherever he finds it: And when the Party robb'd complains to the Magistrate of the Injury done him, the other doth not deny the Fact; but pleads only that he wanted what he took; and then 'tis usual for the Magistrate to give Sentence, That the Party who complains, may, if he pleases, right him in ^a Plut. Demetrius, p. 90, 901.

^b Plut. Artaxerxes, p. 1022. B.

^c Sigismund. Baro Herberstein de Rebus Moscov.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES ON §. 111.

¹ See above in B. 6. c. 1. §. 15. It was sometimes common among the Romans to lend their Wives to Persons comely and well-born. See Plutarch. in Numa, p. 76. D. & in Catone, p. 771. A.

² 'Tis necessary to observe here, that tho' some Nations, that were not much enlightened, have permitted and authoriz'd in some Measure, Things manifestly contrary to the Law of Nature, it was not through Ignorance of this Opposition; much less still out of a Conceit that the Sovereign had a Power to determine the Nature of Crimes according to his own Fancy; but most commonly on account of some Circumstances which made 'em judge it proper to let some Crimes go unpunish'd, to prevent greater Inconveniences.

³ This Permission takes place likewise in Cholchis; See Busbequius's 3d. Ep. p. 155.

the same manner upon others. There are others indeed a who give a more favourable Account ; telling us only that the Tartars are very free in communicating what they have to Strangers ; but that they will expect a Return of the same kind, or else will take it by force. A Tartar's Definition therefore of Theft would be, When something is taken away without the Consent of the Proprietor, which the other had need of ; a Definition evidently imperfect, and which manifestly subverts the Law of Nature relating to Theft. 'Tis certain, none but the worst of Men could wish for such a Law, since it might often happen, that a Man might have the ill Fortune to be robbed of that, which of all things he was most unwilling to lose, and which he either might never find another Man possess'd of, or else so secured, that he must despair of being ever able to take it from him. But besides, the Supposition Mr. Hobbes goes upon is false ; that what belongs of Right to me, and what to another Man, is a Question of the Civil Law ; and that out of civil Government there is no Propriety : For tho' Men that live under it have a more secure Enjoyment of their Proprieties, than they that live out of it ; since the first are defended in their Rights and Fortunes by the united Strength of a Number of Men, besides the Assistance of the Magistrate ; and the latter can support themselves only by their own single Power ; yet notwithstanding, there can be no Grounds of Proof to assert, that there was no Propriety before the Institution of Civil Government. For all sovereign Princes and Commonwealths are now actually in a State of Nature, and their Proprieties are not determin'd by any common Law or Judge, but solely by Compact, and the natural means of Acquisition ; and yet I believe no Body ever imagin'd, that Princes might ravage, or steal from one another, without incurring the Guilt of Rapine or Theft. So that admitting, that a Man cannot make any Compact that will be valid about what is forbidden by the Civil Law, yet certainly it cannot be denied, but that they who live in a Liberty of Nature, may make certain Compacts, which it will be an Injury to violate. And therefore it is false to say, we must be oblig'd entirely to the Civil Law, to know what an Injury is. Besides, neither will it, I think, be denied, that a Man is guilty of Homicide, tho' he be only under the Government of the Law of Nature, when he takes a way another's Life without making War upon him, or in his own defence. Nor is it difficult to understand barely by the Law of Nature, without any Assistance from the Civil, that Adultery is the Violation of conjugal Faith : But that the Civil Laws may superadd certain Obligations to the matrimonial Contract, for want of which the Marriage may be look'd upon to be deprived of certain Effects, was never deny'd. But further, it may be necessary to distinguish between what is commanded by the Civil Law, and what is only permitted and not forbidden by the Sanction of any Penalty to be inflicted by civil Justice. For a Prohibition of the Law of Nature, and a Permission of the civil about the same thing, are not oppos'd to one another ; for a Permission of the Civil Law doth not make any Act not to be contrary to the Law of Nature, that really is so, or excuse the Man that is guilty of it from Sin against God : But it only declares, that the Civil Power hath laid no restraint upon the Person that will commit such Acts ; that if a Man doth commit them, he is not to be punished on that account ; and that human Justice alloweth such Acts to have the same Effects with other Acts, that are agreeable to the Law of Nature. And therefore the Laws of Tartary do not, 'tis presumed, command Men to steal, nor, I suppose, forbid the Proprietors to defend their own : Only the Person that robs is not liable to be punish'd, nor oblig'd to make Restitution ; so that according to the common Justice of that Nation, Robbery and Stealing are look'd upon to be lawful ways of Acquisition. And the same may be said for the Children at Lacedæmon ; for we need not translate that Sentence of Plutarch β δὲ πλείων νεβόησο τὸς παῖδας, the Children were commanded by the Law to steal ; since the Sense of it may as well be, that they were permitted by the Law. Xenophon indeed says, That it was so far from being thought scandalous for the Children to steal at Sparta, that they were under necessity of doing it : But this was spoken only in a way of Raillery, and to mortify Chirofophus the Lacedæmonian. Neither was that Practice so inexcusably bad as some believ'd it, or deserved so severe an Invective as Isocrates gave it d. For the Truth of the matter was, that the Liberty the Boys were allowed in was only that of robbing Orchards, and stealing Victuals ; and then too if they were taken, they pay'd severely enough for it e. We are told too a Haytho de Tattaris, c. 48.

b Plut. Apophth. Lacon. p. 175. F.

c Xenoph. περὶ ἀναξαρ. l. 4.

d Hocr. Panathen.

e Vid. Plut. Lycurgus. Xenophon de Repub. Lacedæmon. Busbequius gives a much worse Account of the Liberties allow'd among the Mengrelians, Ep. 3. p. m. 155. Vid. Lib. 11. c. 5. l. 1. D. de Aleator.

Mr. BARBEYRA C'S NOTE on §. III.

i " There are certain Evils in a Commonwealth, that are suffer'd to remain in it, because they hinder, or prevent greater Evils. There are other Evils, which are only so by their Establishment ; and which being in their Original, an Abuse, or ill Custom, prove less pernicious in their Consequences, than a Law or Custom which is more just and reasonable. There is a sort of Evils that might be corrected by a Change or Innovation, which is a very dangerous Evil. There are others, which are hidden and sunk like Ordure in a Common-Sewer, I mean buried between Shame, Secresy, and Obscurity, so that one cannot stir or rake into 'em, without their casting forth Poison and Infamy. The wisest sometimes doubt whether 'tis better to understand these Evils, than to be ignorant of 'em. Sometimes a great Evil is tolerated in a State, but it is such as prevents a Million of little Evils, or Inconveniences, which were all inevitable and irrecoverable. There are Evils under which every private Man groans, and which however become a publick Good : Tho' the publick is nothing but a Combination of private Men. There are also personal Evils, which concur toward the Good and Advantage of each Family. There are some which afflict, ruin, and dishonour Families ; but they tend to the Good and Conservation of the Machine of State and Government. La Bruyere, Caracteres ou Mœurs de se siècle, Chap. du Soverain & de la Republique, pag. 316, 317. See also a Fragment of Philemon's, related by Athenæus, Lib. xiii. pag. 569. and a passage of St. Augustin, cited by Mr. Le Clerc, p. 298. which shews the Reason why a State is sometimes oblig'd to tolerate Curtesans. See also the Dissertation of Velshuyfen, entituled, Disquisitio de tolerando malo in Republica.

of Dionysius the Tyrant, 'That tho' he punish'd other Crimes very severely, yet he would often pardon them that stole Cloaths, in hopes that by this Method he might restrain the Syracusians from the Riot and Drunkenness they were given to. Neither do I think, that the Law of Sparta before-mention'd laid any Command either on the Husband, or Gallant; that matter seems to have been no more, than that if they two agreed, the Law did not interpose; but look'd upon the Children so begotten to be legitimate, and admitted them Heirs to the Estate of the Family. So also, where Duelling is permitted, the Blood which is shed in them may be excused from the Punishment of Murder at the Bar of civil Justice, but will not be so acquitted hereafter at the divine Tribunal. That the civil Power may with Justice permit things of such a nature, and that not by bare Silence and Connivance only, but by express mention made in the publick Laws, is what I dare not affirm; by such a Method the civil Power would seem almost to invite the Subjects to transgress the Laws of Nature: Possibly it may be excusable to dissemble things, where the Times or the Humour and Dispositions of the People will not endure a Reformation by direct Remedies. And so there was good Reason why the Roman Law call'd that, Actio rerum amotarum, when there was indeed a real Theft committed.

IV. Our Author also, de Cive c. 14. §. 9. affirms, 'that the Precepts of the Decalogue are merely civil, and not natural Laws, and that they are to be explain'd after this manner: You shall not deny your Parents the Honour the civil Law alloweth them. You shall not kill any Man, the Law forbids you to kill. You shall avoid every unclean Act which the Law forbids. You shall not take away what belongs to another Man against his Consent. You shall not frustrate the end of Law and Judgment, by bearing false Witnesses. But it will here be easily observ'd, that he depends upon an utterly false Hypothesis, and supposeth what will never be allowed, that there was no Propriety, no Marriage, and that everything was lawful for every Man before the Institution of civil Governments. It is certain, the Precepts he speaks of, are obligatory, and bind even those Persons to one another, who do not live under any common Government, but only in a State of natural Law. For certainly Men could, and actually did divide things between one another by Compact even in such a State; and therefore would have sinn'd as much against the Eighth Commandment, if they had neither openly or secretly robb'd one another, as they do that rob their Fellow Subjects in civil Governments. It may also be perhaps denied, that a Man in a State of Nature is guilty of Adultery, when he violates his Neighbour's Bed: But the answer may be seen, Gen. xx, 3. xxvi, 10. And further, since Arbitrators must be often made in a State of Nature, to decide Disputes about matters of Fact, by intervention of Witnesses, as Mr. Hobbes admits himself, de Cive c. 3. §. 23. we may hence find the use and necessity of the ninth Commandment. In general, the Precepts of the Decalogue, it is evident, may be reduced to the Law of Nature; but when they are consider'd as written in two Tables, and promulg'd to the Israelites by Moses, they may properly enough be call'd Civil Laws, or rather the general Heads of the Jewish Civil Law, which are afterwards divided into particular Laws, with penal Sanctions added to them^a. Upon which Account, Gratius saith^b, the Decalogue does not in express Words comprehend every Crime, not even all those which are punishable by the Civil Law, but only such in every kind as are most heinous and malignant. For there is no mention made of Wounding, but only of Murder; nor of any other sort of Gain made by another's loss, but that of Theft; nor of any other Falsity, but False Witnesses.

V. It may be proper in the next place to consider, that the same Author in his Book de Cive, c. 12. §. 2. among those seditious Doctrines he supposes to be the internal Diseases, and Causes of the Dissolution of the Commonwealth, sets down this for the First: 'That every private Man is Judge of good and evil. For, saith he, the Measure of good and evil, of just and unjust, is the Civil Law, and whatever the Legislator commands must be look'd upon as just and good, whatever he forbids, as unjust and evil; and therefore it is a very ill Maxim, that we are to obey our Sovereign only, when his Commands are just. There was nothing just or unjust before Civil Government; their Nature relates to the Commands of the Sovereign: and every Action is in its own Nature indifferent; that it becometh just or unjust, is owing to the Will of the Sovereign. And therefore lawful Princes make those things just, which they command, by commanding them; and those things which they forbid, unjust, by forbidding them. But while private Men assume to themselves the Cognizance of good and evil, they affect to be like the Sovereign, which it is impossible should be consistent with the Quiet and Peace of any Commonwealth. In Answer to him, it may be readily allow'd, that sovereign Princes have indeed Power, by annexing or taking away the Penal Sanction, to give or take from the Laws of Nature the Force of civil Laws in human Courts of Justice; as also to make many things, which do not belong to the Law of Nature, just, by commanding, and unjust, by forbidding them. But to say that before civil Governments were erected, there was nothing just or unjust, either defin'd by Nature, or obliging Mens Consciences, is as false, as to assert, that Truth itself hath only a precarious arbitrary Dependence upon the

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTE ON § III.

^a 'Twas when a Husband or a Wife, upon their separation, had kept back something that ought to be restor'd to the Party it belong'd to, after the Divorce; but because of the strict Union that was between 'em, by their Marriage, they soften'd the Notion of Theft, which he is guilty of in reality, that does not restore whatever he is not the lawful possessor of, and only barely call'd it, the detaining another's Goods. Vid Digest, Lib. 25. Tit. 2. De Actione rerum amotarum. And Mr. Noodt, in his Julius Paulus.

^b Vide Philon Judæum, de Decalogo.

^c Grot. ad Math. v. 27.

Pleasure of Men, and is not founded in the Nature of things; or that Sovereign Princes may fashion and dispose the nature of things as they please, or that the same Truth may be different from it self. And indeed the thing it self sufficiently confutes Hobbes. For is it at all probable, that those Masters of Families, who at first united, and form'd themselves into Commonwealths, should, all the time they liv'd separately, behave themselves only like so many wild Beasts; break all manner of Compacts they ever made; rob one another of Life and Fortune at pleasure, upon every pretence of a Right, and that all their Actions were to be thought purely indifferent? Upon the same grounds, sovereign Princes now, who are still with respect to one another in a State of Nature, should not be thought guilty of Injustice, when they break their Compacts, and invade one another's Rights: And yet it is certain, they are not subject to civil Laws. But on the contrary, it is not to be conceiv'd, that civil Governments could ever have been establish'd, or after their Establishment, preserv'd; if there had not been something just or unjust antecedent to their Existence. For 'tis certain, Compacts must have been made use of at the first forming of Commonwealths. But how could Men persuade themselves, that such Compacts could be of any Force, except they knew before, that it was just to observe them, and unjust to do otherwise? And if it be no Justice to stand to Compacts antecedently to the Definition of the Civil Laws, there can be no reason why Subjects may not, when they please, renounce their Obedience, dissolve civil Government, and so utterly abolish all the Distinction between just and unjust. For it is extravagant to imagine, that such Numbers of Men, as a Commonwealth consists of, will always be kept in Subjection by no other Restraints, but Fear and Power. Nor therefore can I believe there was ever any Prince heard of, so far depriv'd of Reason, as to have commanded what the general Laws of Nature forbid, or forbid what they commanded; for Instance, that it should be unlawful to perform Trust or Promise, or to give any Man his due; that it should be a Crime to live with any Respect to Reason or Justice, that every Man might have full Liberty to do all the Mischiefs he could, and the like. But now, why might not such Laws have been made, if there had been nothing just or unjust, antecedent to the Determinations of the civil Laws? 'Tis certain the Command of the civil Power may as well make Poison it self wholesome and necessary Food, as make such Things as these just and good. And therefore Polybus was equally in the wrong, when he seems to derive the Original of Justice and Injustice from civil Government a. In another Sense indeed, what Mr. Hobbes saith, may be safely enough admitted; that is, supposing that by good and evil we understand no more than the advantage, or disadvantage of the Commonwealth. For then it will really appear to be a seditious Doctrine, that every private Person is Judge of good and evil, meaning by it, what is for the Advantage or Disadvantage of the Commonwealth; that is, that every private Man is a competent Judge, whether those are proper Means, which the Prince commands shall be made use of in promoting the publick good; and that, in Consequence, every Man's Obligation to Obedience may depend upon that Judgment. For it is necessary that Subjects (as Cicero in Tacitus told his Soldiers) should be ignorant of some things as well as know others. For if everyone should have the Liberty to dispute what he was commanded, Obedience and Authority would soon sink together b. It was Cato's Saying, that the Tenant ought not to think himself wiser than his Landlord; and of Plato, that no Man should pretend to be wiser than the Laws c.

VI. Our next Consideration shall be, whether a Subject may be guilty of Sin, in executing the Commands of his Prince; supposing he pretends, that he barely undertook the Performance of the Action, and left the Design, Contrivance, and the Necessity of Account, entirely upon him who gave the Command? For there is a Difference between the Laws and the Commands of Princes: The Laws are general Precepts, which affect every Subject; the Commands are only occasionally imposed upon particular Persons; but have the same effect the Laws have in obliging those they are directed to. In this Case it is the known Opinion, that a Man may sometimes sin by obeying the Commands of the civil Sovereign, and therefore that the Subject may and ought to examine such Commands by his own Conscience rightly inform'd d. For certainly it ought to be supposed, that good Men promise Obedience upon certain Conditions only; that, since they are sure to give an Account of their Actions at the Divine Tribunal, and since all the Governments of this World are under an infinitely great overruling Power; they are always ready to obey the Commands of their Sovereign, except when they contradict or interfere with the Law of Nature, or the manifest Laws of God. For with-a Polyb. l. 6. where he is transcrib'd with very little Judgment, by Machiavel, Disc. in Liv. l. 1. c. 2. Vid. R. Cumberland, de Leg. Nat. l. 5. c. 5.

b Tam nescire quedam milites, quam scire oportet, Tacit. Hist. l. 1. c. 83. H. L. 2. c. 39. It is one part of the Character of a good Soldier, that he had rather put his General's Commands in Execution, than make any Debates upon them. Cato de Repub. c. 5. And so far Terentius was in the right, Tacit. Ann. 6. c. 8. We are not to examine whom you prefer, or upon what account Heaven hath given you the supream Disposal of things, and it is our Glory to obey.

c Plat. Polit. p. 555. D. Ed. Wech. Arist. Rhetor. l. 1. c. 15. To endeavour to be wiser than the Laws, is what the best Laws take care to forbid. That is to be understood in Reference to the written and perpetual Laws establish'd by the consent of the People; whereas in this place the matter in Question is chiefly concerning particular Orders given by a Prince, according to the present Circumstances, and posture of Affairs.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTE on §. VI.

d An ancient Greek Poet in one of his Tragedies, makes Antigone, who had buried her Brother Polynix, contrary to the Prohibition of Creon King of Thebes, answer that Prince, when he demanded of her, how she durst act contrary to his Laws, "I could not think, that the Edicts of a Mortal Man, as you are, could be of such Force as to oblige me once to violate the fix'd unwritten Laws of Heaven; for they are not of yesterday or to day, but subsist perpetually, and for ever; and no one knows from whence they came. I ought not then, for fear of any Man, by violating them to expose my self to the Punishment of the Gods." Sophocles Antigone, v. 453, &c. Ed. H. Steph. OUT out Dispute, should a Prince give out any Command contrary to the Civil Laws, he may be obey'd without Sin. But on the other Hand, Mr. Hobbes de Cive c. 12. S. 2. declares this for a seditious Doctrine, 'That Subjects are guilty of Sin, when they obey those Commands of their Sovereign, which they think unjust. And it may indeed be allowed to be dangerous not only to the Commonwealth, but also to the Consciences of private Subjects, to believe, that upon any Scruple or Doubt, concerning the Equity of what is commanded, Obedience may lawfully be refused. For should this Doctrine be admitted, it must often necessarily happen, that a Man must be reduced to a Necessity of Sinning; if he obeyeth, he must act contrary to his Conscience; and contrary to his Allegiance, if he doth not. For I think it is on all Hands allowed, that in Cases where the Conscience is doubtful, the best resolution a Man can come to, is, to take that Side where there will be least danger of Sin. But now the danger of Sin is in a much nearer View, when upon an uncertain Doubt, a Man quits his Allegiance which he hath expressly sworn to keep; since ² Procop. Hist. Goth. l. 1. p. 175. Ed. August Vindel. Senec. Tro. v. 868, 869. The Guilt of a Crime forc'd upon a Man, recoils back upon the Authors of it. Vid. Lib. 3. t. 1. D. de his qui infam. not. Quique suo nomine non jussu ejus, &c. M. Senec. l. 4. Contro. 27. That Woman is not immodest that hath been corrupted in her Chastity by a Tyrant, neither is he guilty of Sacrilege, that takes the Offerings of the Gods, and brings them to the Tyrant; or that sets up his Statue among the Images of the Deities.

MR. BARBEYRAC'S NOTE ON §. VI.

¹ This Distinction does not remove the Difficulty. For in what manner soever the Subject acts, whether in his own Name, or in that of his Prince, his Will always consents in some sort, to the unjust and criminal Action, which he executes by the Order of his Sovereign. So that we must either always impure these sorts of Actions partly to him, or else never any of 'em. And it would signify nothing to say, That in the Case our Author is speaking of, the Action is of the Number of those that are call'd Mixt; or to alledge in their defence, the Laws and Privileges of Necessity. Vid. Remark, Book 1. Chap. 5. Sect 9. Note 3. and Book 2. Chap. 6. Sect. 12. Note 5. The surest way then is to maintain in general, and without any Restriction, that the severest Menaces in the World should never induce us to act, even by the Order, and in the Name of a Superior, the least thing that manifestly appears to us to be unjust or criminal; and that tho' we may be very excusable before the Human Tribunal, for having been conquer'd by so severe a Tryal, we shall not be entirely so, before that of the Divine. There is but one single Case, where we may conscientiously obey the Orders of a Prince, which plainly appear to be unjust; and that is, when the Person concern'd in the unlawful Action which the Prince commands to do, dispenses himself with our exposing our selves in his Favour, to the grievous Consequences of a Refusal: provided the Business in hand is a Thing, as to which 'tis in his Power to consent to the Mischief that the Sovereign commands to be done him, or the Violation of any Right, which it is lawful for him to renounce. For if any one should give me leave, for example, to kill him, I could not however innocently make my self the Minister of my Prince's Anger; because no Man is Master of his own Life. Yet, nevertheless, our Author pretends (in his own Apology, Sect. 20.) that if we do not admit of the Opinion which he here maintains, we shall necessarily be forc'd to acknowledge, that all Soldiers, Executioners, and other inferior Officers of Court, ought to understand Politicks, and the Civil Law; and that they may excuse themselves from their Duty of Obedience, upon pretence that they are not sufficiently convinced of the Justice of what they are commanded: which would reduce the Authority of a Prince to nothing, and render him incapable of exercising the Functions of Government. But that only proves, that Subjects may not, nor ought not, always to examine all the Orders of the Sovereign, to know if they are just, or not. If that were to be done, I must own, there would be scarce one Soldier in the World, that innocently follow'd his Trade. How few are there that know the true Reasons of a Prince, for whom they fight? And suppose they did know, how few are capable of judging of 'em? Thus generally speaking, the greatest Part of those whom the Sovereign lifts in his Dominions, may not excuse themselves on account of their Doubts of the Justice of the War, whither they are order'd to march; because that demands an Examination much above their Capacity; whereas they have no need of any great Knowledge or Penetration, to be clearly convinc'd of the Obligation they lie under, of obeying their Prince. But if a Commander that is skill'd in Politicks, and thro'ly acquainted with the Affairs and Interest of the State, plainly perceives that his Prince is engag'd in an unjust, or an unnecessary War; ought he not to sacrifice every thing, nay even his own Life, rather than serve in such a War as that? There is not always an occasion of any great Penetration, or the admittance into the Cabinet-Council, to discover the Injustice of the Wars that ambitious Princes undertake. The Manifestos they publish themselves, compar'd a little attentively with those of their Enemies, are often sufficient to shew to any one that has but a moderate ll are of good Sense and Honesty, the Weakness of their Reasons, and the Iniquity of their Cause. In such a Case as that, we are not only exempted from our Duty of Obedience, but we ought also to forbear, and refuse doing it upon any Terms whatsoever. The same thing must be said of a Parliament whom a Prince commands to register an Edict which is manifestly unjust; of a Minister of State whom a Prince will oblige to dispatch or put in execution an Order full of Iniquity or Tyranny; of an Ambassador to whom his Master gives Instructions, attended with an apparent Injustice; of an Officer whom his King commands to kill a Man in secret, whose Innocence is as clear as the Day, &c. And they are not only Persons of a distinguish'd Condition, or of Parts and Understanding above the common Level of Mankind, that may and ought to excuse themselves from obeying the above-mention'd Reason; but sometimes, tho' very rarely, the most simple and ignorant find themselves also under an indispensable Obligation to deny their Sovereign the Ministry of their Arms, at the hazard even of their own Lives. Such was the Case of the Soldiers that were sent by King Absziah to apprehend Elijah, and who were punished for it by the Fire which came down from Heaven upon them, at the Prayer of that Prophet, and consum'd them all, ii Kings. c. 1. v. 9. A Tip-staff, or a Sergeant at Arms indeed is not, generally speaking, bound to enquire, whether the Magistrate that orders him to take the Body of such an one into Custody, has any just reason or no, for commanding him to execute that Order; that is not his Business, and he ought to have a favourable Opinion of those that administer Justice, as long as there are no evident to take with him these Cautions : First, That he be commanded barely to execute the Action, that is, only to apply the Strength of his Body to the Performance of the Action, and neither give Occasion to it, or furnish Pretext, or make use of any Excuse for it ; but undertake it as an Action that belong'd wholly to another Person, and which he will not take upon himself. Secondly, That he should shew his unwillingness to be employ'd in such a Service, and desire earnestly to be excused from it ^a. And Lastly, That upon declining the Action, he be threaten'd with present Danger of Life, or some other great Evil, which he is not obliged either in Justice or Charity, to suffer for another Man, and which the Person that commands him hath Power to inflict ; and especially if he sees that tho' he refuseth his Assistance in the Action, it will be executed by other Hands. It is undoubtedly true indeed, that no Commands of Men, contrary to the Law of God, can have any binding Force, that is, lay an intrinsic Necessity of Obedience on the Conscience, and that therefore it can be no Crime to refuse to obey them. But there is a wide Difference between being bound in Conscience to do a thing, and being able to do a thing without Sin. to avoid some very great Evil. For there are several things which we are under no manner of intrinsic Obligation to do ; which yet upon pressing Necessity we may lawfully undertake. And in this Case the Question is, not whether we are bound to do such a thing, but whether we can do such a thing without any Guilt of our own, when we see we must otherwise lose our Lives to no purpose. Neither is any thing I have here said, in the least weakn'd by what Pliny saith, Ep. 9. l. 3. ' Where he tells his Friend of a very ill Cause he had been engag'd against, that he had prov'd before the Senate, that it was criminal even to have assisted in it. (Ministerium etiam crimen esse). For the Persons he pleaded against, had not been barely the Instruments of another Man's Crimes, but had charg'd innocent Persons with false Crimes, that the Proconsul might take occasion to seize on their Fortunes and Estates ; and their informing against, and wrongfully accusing them, was entirely their own Act ; the Impeachments they made, were all in their own Names, and not in the Proconsul's, nor were they pretended to have been made at his Command ; neither were they forced to be Delators, by any immediate fear of Death, if they had refused to be so. They pleaded indeed, that they were provincial Subjects, and therefore were obliged by Fear to be absolutely at the Command of the Proconsul. But what look'd most probable was, that the Expectation of the Gain they hoped to make, was their greatest Encouragement ; tho' perhaps it might be true too, that the Proconsul had given them reason to be afraid, if they refused to obey him ; yet it is not likely he should threaten them with Death, and there was no other possible Method left for them to escape it ^b. And in this Case, the Desires, or Intreaties of Superiors must not be supposed to have the same Force in them, as Necessity or their Commands ^c, though in others it may sometimes be true, that the Intreaties of Tyrants are mixt with a sort of Necessity. Neither is the Example of Doeg, 1 Sam. xxii. 18. any Objection against what has been said. For it was expressly added, that a Man ought to desire earnestly to be excused, as Paul's Guards very honourably did (And thus the Midwives were commended for defeating the barbarous Command of Pharoah, tho' it were with an Untruth, Exod. i) But Doeg, on the contrary, shew'd himself ready and willing to put the King's Command in Execution upon the Priests, tho' we do not find that any Threats were added to it, when he had himself

Proofs of the contrary. But supposing they had in reality such Proofs, I maintain they ought not in that Case to obey. And this Supposition contains nothing that is impossible. It may happen, for example (and every one will easily conceive it) that an Officer of Justice may fully know the Innocence of a Person falsely accus'd, of either Murder, or Robbery, who is infallibly ruin'd, if ever he should once be taken. In the late Persecutions in France, could not they plainly see, that were sent against those poor Creatures whose only visible Crime was serving God according to the Dictates of their Conscience, the tyrannical Injustice, and barbarous Cruelty of the Orders they receiv'd, and ought they not to have seen it? If in those Cases, they can reconcile their Interest with their Conscience, by pretending to search after those unfortunate Creatures, whom they will not find, and at the same time, contriving under hand, the Means for 'em to make their Escape ; Well and Good. But I cannot persuade myself, that Men can punctually execute such Orders, without making themselves Accomplices of the Iniquity of him that gives 'em. The same must be said of Executioners. Upon which consult Grotius Lib. ii. cap. xxvi. Sect. 4. Num. 9. as also Mr. Sidney's Discourse upon Government, Ch. III. Sect. xx. and the Apology of Socrates by Xenophon. In which there are several fine Passages which shew that we ought never to obey our Superiors to the prejudice of our Duty ; but very far from it, and unless we are in an entire Incapacity to resist 'em, we ought to exert our selves to the utmost of our power, and endeavour to hinder those that would oppress the Innocent, from doing them any Mischief. Saul's Guards refused to put to the Sword a great Number of Priests, whom that Prince sacrificed to his Anger against David, 1 Sam. xxii. 19, &c. but as Mr. Le Clerc has observed, they would have been still more commendable, if they had interceded with the King in behalf of those innocent Persons, by representing to him in the best manner they could, that he had commanded a Thing that was forbidden by the Laws, both Divine and Human ; and if, after all their Prayers and Representations had prov'd ineffectual, they had seiz'd upon the King as a mad Man, and secur'd him till the Priests had made their escape. Since the first Edition of this Note, one Mr. Adam Rechenberg, a Professor at Leipsick, has publish'd a Dissertation, Entituled, de Ministerio, quod crimen est, Dignissimo politico. In which the same Opinion that is here advanc'd, is maintain'd, and confirm'd by several Examples and Authorities. There is also a Dissertation de injusto Pontii Pilati judicio, written by Mr. Thomassius, against a Civilian nam'd Stellerus, who was willing to justify Pilate, in a Treatise call'd Pilatus defensio, upon this Principle, among the rest, that the Governour of Judea, in condemning JESUS CHRIST to Death, had only acted as a bare Executor of the Sentence of the Jews. This Dissertation of Stellerus was Printed in 1674, but it was suppress'd by publick Authority.

^a We have a particular Instance of this Nature in Olearius's Travels into Pers. l. 5. c. 32.

^b Vid. Tacit. Ann. l. 13. c. 43. Where Silius pleads that he had done nothing out of any Design of his own, but that all was entirely out of Obedience to his Prince. Afterwards he pretended the Commands of Messalina, and wav'd his Defence. For why was there no body else made choice of that would sell his Voice to oblige that cruel and impudent Woman? But it is necessary that the Instruments of Oppression and Tyranny should be punish'd : For when they have receiv'd the Rewards of their Wickedness, they shift the Crime over upon some body else : and therefore Jul. Gracianus very well deseriv'd Commendations, who was commanded to accuse M. Silanus, and was kill'd for refusing. Tacit. Agricola ; and Seneca gives him a very great Encomium. De Benef. l. 2. c. 21.

^c Plato Epist. 7.

before falsly accus'd them, insinuating that they had entred into a secret Conspiracy with David, against the King: For it is evident from Psal. lii. that he had brought some false Accusations against them. But notwithstanding, it must be confess'd, that there are some Actions, the bare execution of which a Man would rather die, than undertake: Such as to murder Parents, or Children; to commit Incest with a Mother, or a Daughter, or to lie with a Beast. A small Stock of Courage would make a Man prefer Death to the guilt of being an Instrument in such Actions. And I cannot but think it was a noble Spirit of Constancy and Bravery in those Romans, 'Who when singled out by Hannibal, to fight with one another, Brothers with Brothers, Fathers with their Children, and Kinsmen with their near Relations, chose rather to die under Torture, than be stain'd with Blood which Nature had so naturally ally'd.'^a Neither can I think it at all lawful, that to save my own Life, I may assist to take away another Man's; for that would be to make another's Life the Price of my own: And there are many things which we cannot do for Price, which upon other Considerations we may b.

VII. But in general, that a Man may not at the Command of a Superior undertake an Action, as his own, which is repugnant to the Dictates of a good Conscience, is what no Man that hath any Sense of Religion can deny. The Judges therefore Josephus speaks of^c (to consider some Examples under this Head) refus'd to condemn the innocent Zacharias, tho' they were sensible what danger threaten'd them from the Fury of the Zealots. And on the other hand, the Judges mention'd, 1 Kings, ch. xxi. were certainly guilty of a very great Sin; because they pass'd Sentence not by Order from the King, but as the pure Result of judiciary Process upon the Evidence of the Crime; nor can the Witnesses be excus'd from an equal share of guilt. Nor were the Detectors Persons less guilty, whose Business it was to charge false Accusations upon the great and rich, that ill Princes might have a Pretence to ruin them in Circumstances less criminal. Marcellus Epirus was once a Person very well known by that Character, but more particularly infamous, for the Impeachment of Thraseas: Tho' Tacitus tells us he pleaded in his Excuse for that, that his Accusation charg'd no more upon Thraseas, than what the Judgment of the whole Senate confirm'd; which was only to spread the Crime wider, not clear himself. 'Tis true indeed, as the Historian says, That Nero endeavour'd only to disguise his own natural Cruelty, under the Formality of secret Accusations^d. But still it was the Avarice and Ambition of such auxiliary Villains, which provoked and encouraged him. Others engaged in the same Practices excus'd themselves by saying, that in those Times they were under a necessity to do what they did, to secure their own Honour and themselves: A kind of Defence which means no more than that they chose rather to expose others to Danger, than hazard themselves. Neither did Curtius Montanus^e, as the same Historian says, allow it to be a tolerable Excuse, because he thought the Persons that us'd it not to be criminal in the Occasion of it; but in a Rhetorical way he chose to pass by some things, that he might press others with more Vehemence. And the Senate acted with great Justice, when after Nero's Death, they decreed his Instruments the Informers should be punish'd as a Race of Miscreants, who lived upon the Ruin of private Men^f. The Emperor Titus with the same Justice commanded all such Persons to be publickly whipt and beat in the Forum, then dragg'd through the Amphitheatre, made Slaves, and sold; and some of them to be transported to uninhabited Islands; and after him Trajan sent away Numbers of them in a few shatter'd Vessels, that they might be left to the Mercy of the Sea, and be shipwrack'd wherc-ever the Waves threw them^g. Neither could the secret Command of Tiberius excuse Piso from the Guilt of Germanicus's Death, if he was really the Cause of it: And if he had confess'd such a Command in the Senate, tho' that must have been enough to have put even Tiberius to the blush, and depriv'd him of all his Shifts, to excuse himself from commanding so barbarous an Action; yet the Senate had still Power very justly to condemn him as the Criminal, because he did not pretend any publick Authority for it, but voluntarily undertook an Action which Tiberius had not the least Pretence of Justice to command, only that he might engage the Emperor to him, by such an Act of Villany^h. Neither do I think that Joab was absolutely free from the Guilt of Uriah's Murther, 2 Sam. xi. 14, 15, 16. tho' Chap. xii. 9. David only is mention'd as the Principal in it. And it was very brave in Papinian to refuse to defend the Murther of Geta, with that noble Saying, That it was easier to commit Parricide, than to excuse it. Others tell the Story, that he refused to speak an Oration for the Emperor, in which he would have had him inveigh against his Brother; and that he excus'd himself by saying, that to accuse a murther'd innocent Person would be a

^a Vid. Diod. Siculum l. 25. in excerpt. Peirescanis. Vid. Laonic Chalcondyl. l. 1. where Amurath Emperor of the Turks, commanded that the Parents of all those who had been in the Insurrection with Sauzes, should kill their Sons with their own Hands. There were two Fathers that would not obey so cruel a Command, and were therefore cut to pieces at the same time with their Sons. For Amurath us'd to say, That the Sons would not have join'd with Sauzes, without the Advice of the Parents.

^b Abr. Rogerius, in his Account of the Bramins, saith, That the Bramins believe that the Wife may do any thing, tho' never so bad, which the Husband commands her, without Sin; for the Sin, they say, cannot be imputed to her, but is to be charg'd upon the Husband, whom she is oblig'd to obey.

^c Josephus de Bello Judaic. l. 4. c. 19. The Author here takes an occasion of praising the Intrepidity of the seventy Judges mentioned by Josephus, who chose rather to expose their own Lives, than unjustly give Sentence of Death against Zacharias the Son of Baruc, one of the most considerable Jews at that Time, whom the Zealots would fain have destroy'd upon any Terms. But this Example does not well suit with this place; for those Zealots were nothing but a set of factious and wicked Persons, that had no Authority over the seventy Judges, whom they had chosen out from among the People, to try and destroy Zacharias with some colour of Justice, supposing that they would have seconded their furious intentions against him.

^d Tacit. Hist. 4. c. 8.

^e Tacit. Hist. 4. c. 42.

^f Tacit. Hist. l. 4. c. 30.

^g Suetonius, Titus c. 8. Plin. Pan. 34. 35.

^h Tacit. An. l. 3. c. 16.

Second Parricide. But Spartianus in his *Life of Caracalla*¹, denies this Account, because he says, Papinian could not, as being Prefect, make any such Oration (tho' it doth not appear why it might not have been extraordinarily commanded by him) and only adds, that it was certain he was put to Death, for being a Favourer of Geta. However this be, that Man is certainly in the right, who refuses to prostitute Wit and Parts to defend Wickedness, tho' the Defence be publish'd afterwards in another's Name. For the Invention of specious Arguments, set off with the Art and Dexterity of an Eloquent Speaker, can never be supposed to be barely the Execution of another Man's Action. In this particular Case the Thing would have appear'd otherwise indeed, if Caracalla had only commanded some Person to have recited such an Oration in the Senate, as a Piece of his own, or some other Man's Composition, under a capital Penalty, if he refus'd it.^b But still it must be remember'd, that where the Actions of Princes do not plainly appear to be unjust, Subjects ought to be very cautious, and especially publick Ministers, how they give them an ill Character; because it is their Duty, always to presume for the Justice of their Master.^c

VIII. Upon the same grounds we may determine, whether a Subject may lawfully bear Arms in an unjust War, at the Command of his Prince. Grotius, L. 2. Cap. 26. §. 3, 4. is of Opinion, that when it manifestly appears that the War is unjust, it is not lawful for a Subject to maintain so bad a Cause: And that when the Case is doubtful, he ought to take the safest side, which is to sit still, and not engage himself at all in the War. But I think, a Man ought to be very cautious, how he resolves in such a manner, about Things of such Consequence as these. When according to this Opinion, the Power of the civil Sovereign, and the Obedience of the Subject, in a Case of so great Importance, are made to depend upon every particular Man's Judgment; and when, especially, it would be easy for a Man to pretend scruple of Conscience, only to disguise his Fears and Cowardise.² 'Tis true, where a Man is admitted to the Counsels and Debates, and hath a Right to give his Voice in them, if he is not obliged by the Determination of the Majority, without his own Consent, he cannot, with Justice, so much as undertake any thing manifestly unjust. Which will hold true too, if it be left to his Choice, whether he will take Arms, or not: But if he should be commanded simply to obey, in this Case it must be consider'd, that all Nations, acted by any Sense of Justice or Honour, before they engage in a War, always suppose, that the Cause of it is just; and where they do not, it is to no purpose to talk of Conscience. But the Point in dispute turns chiefly upon this, Whether in regard of certain particular Circumstances, it be convenient for the Government to begin a War, notwithstanding the truth of such a Pretence? In this Case, the Person particularly intrusted with the Government of the Commonwealth, and entirely acquainted with its Strength, must be presumed to see better what will be for the Advantage of the Publick, than any private Man can. And if a Man, admitting the Justice of the Cause, should yet doubt whether it might not be better to neglect, or forgive, the Injury done the Commonwealth, than revenge it with a War; it must be told him, that this is by no means a sufficient Reason, for a Subject to refuse to obey his Sovereign, and provoke him to use Severity upon him; that he supposeth his Sovereign hath not observed a certain Virtue, which hath only the Force of an imperfect Obligation. And therefore the safest Method a Subject can take, is simply to obey³, and leave his Sovereign to answer for the Justice of the War before God.^c But yet it must be observ'd, that what hath been said affects only Subjects, who take Arms at the Command of their Sovereign. For they that voluntarily put themselves into the Service of a foreign Prince, ought by all means to be sure of the Justice of the Cause they engage in. And therefore the sensible part of the World will always justly condemn those that set their Lives out to hire, without any manner of Consideration of the Cause they fight for.^d

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on: §. VII, VIII.

¹ Chap. 8.

² See our Author's Dissertation De Obligatione erga Patriam, f. 19. ³ Vid. What has been said concerning Soldiers in Note ... Sect. 6. Yet Mr. Buldcus however pretends, that upon a bare Doubting of the Justness of the Cause, the Subject is not bound to obey their Prince when he commands 'em to serve in the Wars; yet after all, he does not deny the Reasons that our Author makes use of to establish the contrary Opinion.

^a There are several Passages in Plato's Dialogues of Socrates, which might be applied this way: And to this we may refer the Account Dio Cassius gives of Sallust. l. 43. who he says was made Prefect of Numidia by Caesar, upon pretence of his taking the Administration of that Province, but in reality only that he might squeeze all that he could from it. But after he was come home, he was accus'd of Extortion and Corruption, and of several Oppressions in the Province; and so was look'd upon to be more particularly infamous, because having wrote an History, where he frequently, and very severely reflects upon such as made their Fortunes by publick Rapine in their Governments, he himself had not made his Actions agreeable to his Writings, and therefore tho' he was acquitted by Caesar, yet he sufficiently publish'd his Crimes, by the lively Character he had drawn of them, in his own Writings.

^b See the Solacium in Politics, Abbas Chancellor of France was guilty of. Gramond. Hist. of France, l. 16.

^c Hector in Homer saith very well, Iliad 12. v. 243.

Εἰς κλονὸς αὐτῶν ὄντων, ἀνὴρ ἐδούρει πρὸς πᾶσι.

In Tacitus Hist. l. 3. 25. it is call'd a publick Crime, when a Son had kill'd his Father in the Field. Vid. l. 9. c. 4. l. 2. 1. D. de noxal. act. l. 9. t. 2. l. 37. D. Ad L. Aquilianum.

^d Gunther. Ligurinum, l. 7.

*Ære dato conducta cohors, & bellica Miles,
Dona sequens, pretioq; suum mutare favorem
Suetus, & accepto pariter cum munere bello,
Hunc habuisse, dator pretii quem jussit, hostem.*

Lur'd to the Field by Pay, and hopes of Spoil,
In servile Arms the Mercenaries toil;
Inconstant, False, and Faithless to their Trust;
The Cause that is most Gainful seems most Just:
He that first hires, commands them to the Wars,
And those he calls his Enemies, are theirs.

CHAP II.

Of the Power of the Sovereign over the Lives of the Subject, in Defence of the Commonwealth.

- 1. The Sovereign may hazard the Lives of his Subjects in War.
- 11. Whether lawful to refuse bearing Arms upon a Compact with an Enemy.

- 111. No Man to make himself unfit to bear Arms.
- 1v. The Obligation of a Soldier what?
- v. Whether the Commonwealth may give up an innocent Subject?

I. THO' the End Men propos'd to themselves, by entering into civil Societies, was to provide, not only for the Security of their Estates, but more especially of their Lives; yet it was found necessary to the Preservation of civil Government, that the Sovereign should have some Power over the Lives of his Subjects; and that for these two Ends: First, To Guard the Commonwealth from Evils and Dangers; and Secondly, To suppress Disobedience to the Laws. By the First, The Sovereign hath Power to hazard the Lives of his Subjects in Defence of the Commonwealth, and to assert the Rights that belong to it; since in War Men always propose to take away one another's Lives. And since the Art of War it self is not to be learn'd without Experience, it was Plato's Opinion ^a, that the Lives of the Subjects might be expos'd to some Danger for the Attainment only of the military Accomplishments (tho', I confess, I am not of his mind) and accordingly he propos'd, that the Weapons us'd in all military Exercises should differ little from the real and dangerous ones, such as might strike some Apprehensions of Fear into the Persons that us'd them; and he afterwards adds a Law, That if any Man happen'd to be kill'd in those Exercises, that the Person who kill'd him should be acquitted by the Law, and be look'd upon as innocent. For, saith he, the Legislator ought to consider, that tho' perhaps he may lose some few of his Subjects by this Method, yet that the rest will suffer nothing by it; but that if there were no Apprehensions of Danger in these Exercises, there would be no way to distinguish between the Brave, and the Coward; and the want of such a distinction would certainly be of worse Consequence to the Commonwealth, than the other Evil. And such Military Exercises we are told are now in use in Japan ^b. Demosthenes mentions an Athenian Law ^c, by which if a Man kill'd another accidentally in any Exercise, he was not to be banished: The reason of which was, saith he, because Law doth not consider the Event, but the Intention of the Person, which was only to overcome his Adversary, not to kill him: But if his Adversary was too weak to bear the Fatigue a Victor must expect, the Law thinks him the Cause of the Misfortune which befalls him. And indeed there is very good Reason that even the Exercise in military Duties should be under a severe Discipline, since in War the Fate of things may frequently turn upon a very small Neglect. And therefore tho' civil Courts are sometimes easily induced to make Allowance for those Passions, that have generally a violent Influence upon us, yet a Court martial hardly will ever afford them any Favour. And hence military Judicature makes it capital to desert the Post a Man is commanded to, tho' perhaps to avoid present Death ^d. (Though some have thought the Shame of some ignominious Punishments might be a better Expedient to prevent Cowardice) And therefore to refuse to List into the Military Service hath in some Nations been severely punished ^e. There was a Law at Sparta, which made it Death for any Man to refuse to hazard himself for his Country; so that as the Orator speaks upon it, 'The Occasion of their Fear was made their Punishment; and there being two such Extremities in View, there would be hardly any Man who would not sooner venture the loss of Life among Enemies, than suffer it to be taken away by the Laws in his own Country ..' 'Tis true there are few Nations in which there are not Numbers of Subjects by their Years and Strength of Body fit to bear Arms, who have nevertheless Immunities from that Service granted them, either out of Respect to their way of Life; or upon some particular Indulgence of the State; but it must be understood that all such Privileges are to continue no longer in force, than while there are other Subjects enough, or else Allies, or hired Forces in readiness to defend the Commonwealth: In Cases of the last Extremity, they must be superseded; and they that enjoy them must arm, as well as others, in the common Defence. For certainly it is more reasonable that such Privileges should be laid aside for a time, than that, by an unreasonable Superstition for them, the whole Commonwealth should be ruin'd. And therefore at Rome all Exceptions from military Service, allowed to the Old, and the Priests, always ceased upon Expectation of a Sabellick Invasion ^g. That should too be observ'd, as a wise and good Institution made by Solon or Pisistratus (which is mentioned by Plutarch in the Life of Solon ^h) That such as were disabled in the Wars should be allowed Pensions out of the publick Treasure. And indeed if the State of the Commonwealth will permit, there is all the Reason in the World that they should have some Consideration made them, who are upon hard Duty, while others sit at ease, and are not only forced to neglect the Concerns of their Families, but to undertake a larger share of Service for the Publick, than other Subjects ⁱ.

^a De Leg. l. 8. p. 927. A. B. Ed. Wech. ^b Vid. Bern. Varen. Deser. Japon. c. 19. ^c Orat. adv. Aristocrat. ^d Vid. Liv. l. 5. c. 6. Festivarium meretur qui signum relinquit, aut praesidio decedit. He deserves the Bastinado that flies away from his Colours, or deserts the Post he was commanded to. Nich. Montagne's Essays, l. 3. c. 12. p. 775. Justin. l. 3. c. 3. in fin. Ferdinandus Pinto. c. 10. ^e Lycurgus Orat. contra Leocrat. ^f Vid. Leg. Longobardorum, l. 3. Tit. 13. s. 1. ^g Appianus de Bello Civili. l. 2. p. 523. Ed. H. Steph. ^h Vid. L. 10. t. 38. l. ult. C. de quibus muneribus Num. Lic. se excusare. Andreas Mauropeneus Hist. Venet. l. 7. p. 147. ⁱ Vid. Diodorum Siculum, l. 1. c. 73. where he gives an Account of the Egyptian Laws relating to the Soldiery. H. And

II. And here it may be inquired, whether, if a Man detain'd Prisoner by an Enemy, to obtain his Freedom, promiseth that he will never for the future bear Arms against him, his own Country can afterwards oblige him, contrary to his Promise, to draw his Sword against the same Enemy? Some, I know, suppose, that such a Compact in it self is void, because it is contrary to the Duty every Subject owes the Commonwealth: But, I should not think it so sufficient an Answer, to say that every thing contrary to Duty is therefore immediately void and null; as to deny that it is contrary to the Duty a Subject owes the Commonwealth, to procure himself Liberty, by promising that which is already in the Enemy's Power. For except the Enemy give the Captive his Liberty, he can never bear Arms against him. And therefore the Commonwealth loseth nothing by such a Compact; for unless the Captive recover his Freedom, he must be consider'd as lost already. And therefore when the Commonwealth receives him again from his Captivity, it is supposed to receive him upon such Terms, as leave him power to keep his Promise with his Enemy, especially if he gain'd his Liberty by his own Interest only, without any publick Assistance from the Commonwealth. But cannot the transcendent Power of the Sovereign rescind such an Obligation, when the common Safety requires it; as suppose the Commonwealth be in eminent Danger, except he in particular take Arms? In this Case, I think, that since it is next to a Contradiction for me to be a Subject, and yet to be under an Obligation which must make me unserviceable to the Commonwealth in the greatest publick Extremities; no less absurd is it for me to imagine it possible, that I should be obliged by a simple Compact, not to resist the unjust Violence of a Person, that attempts the Ruin of my self and all that belongs to me: therefore the Force of such a Compact extends to the offensive only, and not to the defensive Wars; especially if the hazard of the common Safety of the whole State be like to endanger mine too. For to what purpose did my Enemy grant me my Liberty, if he intended to tie me up so that I could have no power left me to make any opposition against him, if he should ever after, design any thing against my Life and Fortunes? And therefore such a Compact is no Objection against my taking Arms at my Sovereign's Command in Defence of the Commonwealth. It is a Question something like this, Whether a Captive that hath his Freedom given him by his Enemy upon a certain Condition, upon Non-performance of it, a be obliged to return to his Captivity? And it is affirmed of private Persons: But Buffiere's Hist. Franc. l. 16. speaking of King Francis, doubts whether it may be so of sovereign Princes. I shall not determine the Controversy: But I think it would be the safest and wisest way, not to let a captive Prince have his Liberty, before the Conditions of it are actually performed.

III. From what hath been said it follows, That tho' the Necessities of the Commonwealth do not at present require military Service from the Subject, yet that it is a Crime which ought to be severely punished, for a Man to make himself or others unfit for that Service: For tho' other parts of my Body, as Seneca saith, are my own, yet my hands belong to the Publick. Instances of this sort of Cowardice are frequent to be found even among that martial People, the Romans themselves. Suetonius tells us the reason why Tiberius reform'd the Houses of Correction in Italy, was, because the Keepers of them were suspected, not only to have often taken up Travellers, but to have conceal'd Persons that fled to such Holes for fear of being impress'd Soldiers. And this might perhaps be the reason why the Emperor Hadrian afterwards suppress'd all those Houses. C. Vettienus was known to have cut off the Fingers of his left Hand, that he might be excused from serving in the Italic War; and his Goods were confiscated for it by the Senate, and himself condemned to perpetual Imprisonment. And Augustus expos'd a Roman Knight, with all his Estate to Sale, for cutting off his two young Sons Thumbs, that they might not be forced into the Wars. And therefore Ammianus Marcellinus, speaking of the Dispositions and Manners of the Gauls, saith, That none of them ever cut off their Thumbs, to make themselves incapable of military Duties as the Italians had done. And accordingly there were several Laws made among the Romans, to restrain such practices. Trajan made a Law, That the Person who disabled his Son, when any Levy was made for War, so that he could not be fit for military Service, should be banished. And there is another of Constantine's extant to this purpose. That the Sons of veteran Soldiers fit for the Service of the War (some of which have refused to list themselves out of Sloth and Laziness, and others have been so cowardly as to maim themselves, only to avoid the necessity of that Duty) if they are thought incapable to serve in the Army, shall be forced to at endth most servile Offices about the Court. He that thinks to excuse himself from bearing Arms, by cutting off his own Fingers, shall not escape what he designed to avoid, but shall with that Mark of Infamy be forced to undergo the Drudgery of the Service, since he refused the Honour. And further, These provincial Subjects, that by such Practices are forced to make their Levies weaker, shall be allow'd so much favour as to bring two maim'd Persons for one whole. But the severest Law is that in D. ubi supra, l. 5. de Re Mil. If there be any Person that, to avoid being impress'd for the War, hath, as he thinks, secured his Body from danger by cutting off his Fingers, a Vid. Grotius Lib. III. cap. xxi. Sect. 6. and Mr. Buddeus in his Specimen Jurispr. Hist. Sect. 6. among his Selectis Juris Nature. But when the Effect of the Condition fails, without any Fault of the Person; as if, for Example, a Prisoner of War that is to be exchange'd for one that has been releas'd, should happen to die before the exchange was made. In that Case (says Grotius) he that is at Liberty ought not to return to Prison, but only pay the Price of what he cannot effect, that is, give for his Ransom as much as would have been given for the Person that is dead.

b Seneca, l. 1. Controv. 7. c Suetonius, Tiber. c 8. d Spartianus, c. 18. Vide Not. Salmaf. in loc. Philos. l. 6. c. 7. e Suetonius, August. c. 24. Am. Marcellinus, l. 15. sub fin. f L. 49. t. 16. l. 4. l. 12. D. de Re Militari. g V. Theod. de fil. militar. apparitor. & veteran. l. 1. Et de Tironibus, l. 4. 10.

he shall be condemn'd to be burnt, and the Master that doth not hinder him, shall incur a severe Penalty. But it is probable that this Punishment was to be inflicted only on Slaves, but the Laws before mention'd comprehended the Freemen. For it is very well known, that the Romans would not at first permit their Slaves to bear Arms, but in Cases of the greatest Extremity. Tho' it is manifest, that this was not observ'd in the latter End of the Empire, as appears from l. 16. C. Theodos. Tit. cod. where there is this Law of the Emperors, Arcadius and Honorius: Against the Irruptions of the Enemy we command, that not only the Persons, but their Abilities shall be regarded; and tho' we believe, that Freemen may be moved with a more generous Concern for their Country, yet by the Authority of this Edict, we command the Slaves also to list themselves with all speed for the War, and if they are found fit for the Service, they shall be rewarded with their Liberty, &c. For that Law in the Eleventh Book under the same Title, which is also extant in the Twelfth Book of the Codes of Justinian, Tit. 44. l. 2. speaks of Slaves that were alieni juris, belong'd to other Men, that the Person that offer'd to send them to the Wars, should be forced to pay a Libra of Gold into the Treasury. But the Eighth Law in the Theodosian Code, under the same Title, doth not simply forbid the levying of Slaves for Soldiers, but only commands that no Slaves should be taken into the choice Companies. And † Vegetius complains, that, either by the Favour or Connivance of the Officers, the new listed Men all pass'd the Muster, and that such as were not fit for their Masters Service, were taken to serve the Publick. But some will have it, that the Italians and French derive their word Poltrones from this cutting off the Thumbs: But I am inclin'd to think Menage is more in the right ^a, in deriving it from the Italian word Poltro, which signifies one that always lyes at home upon his Couch.

IV. A Man therefore that is obliged to attend the War, is bound to defend the Post his Commander appoints him to, tho' perhaps he foresees he must in all probability lose his Life in it. And tho' in the general, all Burdens ought to be laid proportionably on the Subjects, so that they may assist one another in the bearing them; or where that cannot be, or there is no necessity of it, that they may relieve one another by Turns, or else excuse themselves by an Equivalent another way, or else appoint every one his share by Lot; yet the Nature of War will not permit, that those dangerous Posts should always be appointed by Lot. And therefore it must be left to the Commander to choose the Persons he thinks fittest, or if there be any Number fit, which of them he pleaseth. Unless there be any that will voluntarily undertake the danger, as Calpurnius Flaccus did ^b, and before him Decius Mus ^c. And no Man of Bravery or Spirit will ever complain that he is commanded upon such Duty, but will rather commend his General's Judgment and Conduct in it ^d. And besides, since 'tis by the Protection of the Commonwealth that we enjoy our Lives for a long space of time, which, if we had been expos'd to a State of Nature, we should soon have been deprived of; we must not think it a severe piece of Duty to part with them in defence of the Commonwealth, especially since we are so many other ways indebted to it. And therefore it is not at all unjust, that upon an extraordinary Command of the Commonwealth, and in its greatest Extremities, we should hazard that Life in its Defence, which it doth in effect bestow upon us every day; and especially, since in a State of Nature every Man must be forced to defend himself with his own single Strength, unless he will choose to die, or be enslaved. But now in Commonwealths it is much better to hazard ourselves with a Number, not only because the hopes of Victory are greater, but because, tho' a Man be kill'd in the fight, yet by the protection of the Commonwealth his Goods and Fortunes will be preserv'd for his Relations; which in a State of Nature there could be no hopes of. But however, it ought to be observ'd, that the Design of such Commands is not, or at least ought not to be; to take away the Lives of the Soldiers directly: I say, ought not to be; for we have an Instance in David, that Generals are sometimes guilty of such Crimes, 2 Sam. xi. 15. and he is therefore call'd a Murtherer, Ch. xii. v. 9. And it is not uncommon to expose such as are less beloved where they must inevitably be cut off by the Enemy ^e, as Micopsa sent Jugurtha to Numantia, that either his own Valour or the Enemy's might be fatal to him. But the Design of such severe Commands ought to be, either to avert some great Evil; or to procure some great Good to the Commonwealth, and then the Soldiers may justly be engaged in such hard Parts of Duty; tho' it may happen; that they may fall in the Enterprize. For the Conditions of a decisive Combat are either, kill your Enemy, or die with him: For this is better than to fall alone. And therefore I think those Commanders at Sea may justly be acquitted from the Guilt of Self-Murder, that upon the express Order of their Superiors, or at least upon a Presumption of it, from the State of the Engagement; blow themselves up with their Ship, rather than be made a Prize to the Enemies. For let us suppose the Number of Ships equal on both sides; when one of ours is taken, the Enemy hath an Advantage of two Ships more than We: If ours only be lost, then they have but one more; but if both sink together, the Strength on both sides will still be equal. And 'tis scarce possible if our Ship be blown up, but it must ruine one or more of the Enemy's with it. For the greatest Danger of being taken, is when the Ships are Grappling; side by side; and generally the Enemy must suffer more than we by such an Act: For 'tis evident † Vegetius de Re Militari, l. 1. c. 7. ^a In Origin, Ling. Franc.

^b Flor. 1. 2. c. 2.

^c Liv. 1. 7. c. 34.

^d Sensar de Provid. c. 4. Why are the Bravest Men in the Army commanded upon the most difficult Enterprize? It is the Choice of the Troops that the General sends out to surprize the Enemy by Night, to observe their Motions, or to force a Party to dislodge them; and yet none of them that are sent, complain that their Commander deals hardly with them, &c.

^e Vide Q. Curtium, l. 7. c. 2. Polyb. 1. 1. c. 9. Diod. Siculus, l. 14. c. 85. Et. l. 19. c. 48. Justinus, l. 12. c. 5. n. 8. Zonar. T. 2. in Maurit. Sallust. B. Jugurth. c. 7.

they must have much the Advantage of us, when they force us to fly to so desperate an Expedient. But to blow up only to avoid being funk, is I think, a very ill Choice; because a Man may have some Hopes of escaping by swimming ^a. It was an old Law among the Chinese, That the General should forfeit his head, that had the Misfortune to succeed ill in the Fight, tho' not through his own Fault, by which they design'd to oblige their Commanders, whenever they engaged an Enemy, to think of nothing but Victory, or Death ¹.

V. But what if the Life of a Subject be demanded without the Hazard of a Fight; for Instance, to appease a powerful Neighbour, and in consequence to divert some imminent Evil, or perhaps prevent the Ruine of the Commonwealth? In such a Case it must be consider'd, what Reasons such a Neighbour may have to demand the Subject to be yielded up to him. If it be for any Crime he hath been guilty of, tho' perhaps there may be some easy way, or other, for him to escape, yet he ought to be particularly cautious how he exposes the Commonwealth to Danger upon this Account. And therefore though we may suppose, that a Man under such Circumstances is not obliged to deliver himself up to his Enemy; yet he is bound to dispose of himself so as to bring no Inconveniences upon them that give him Reception. And I make no doubt but his own Country and Commonwealth may for that reason eject him against his Consent: For perhaps it may be thought less Cruelty to do so, than to surrender him up. But it may be supposed that the Lives of certain Subjects may be demanded for some publick Crime, of which those particular Persons are wholly innocent. Such a kind of Calamity is related to have befallen the State of Athens for the Death of Androgeos; in Revenge of which Minos, after he had subdued the Athenians, demanded of them, by way of Tribute, Seven young Men, and as many young Women, to be devour'd by the Minotaur ¹. And in a Case like this I do not see how any Subject can refuse to take the Chance which falls to his Lot (which is the fairest way of Decision between Equals) unless there be a Thesaurus found, who will voluntarily undertake to conquer the Monster. But the Difficulty will be greater, if we suppose the Life of an innocent Person to be demanded, or suppose some other Evil threaten'd him as great as Death, without any pretence of publick Guilt, or private Crime. We have an Instance of a Case in Libanius, Tit. 1. Decl. 27. where a Tyrant demands a certain beautiful young Man of a neighbouring City, threatening War if he was denied. The City chooseth to hazard a War, rather than deliver him up. But when it was closely besieged by the Tyrant, the Father of the young Man kills his Son, and throws him over the Wall; and afterwards when the Siege was rais'd, he is accused of Murther ^c. I shall not hear either accuse, or defend the Father: He might possibly make a better Defence for himself than Virginus did in Livy, L. iii. c. 50. however, I think it is past dispute, that the Commonwealth is not obliged to protect such a Person to its own Ruine: For so the Commonwealth must be destroy'd, and the innocent Person be far from being secured by it. Neither can any Man desire that the whole Commonwealth should perish with him, and upon his Account. The only Refuge such an unhappy Person can take, must be either to provide for himself, if he can, by fight; or else by attempting some bold and dangerous Enterprize. When all fails, he must submit to unavoidable Misfortune, in which it may be possible at least for him to preserve his Mind innocent ^d; since it is utterly unlawful for a Man to destroy himself to avoid the most injurious Usage. And the Commonwealth (after it hath defended such an unfortunate Person to the utmost of its Power, and endeavour'd as far as possible to assist his Escape some way or other; and all proves to no purpose, and imminent Ruine cannot be well otherwise avoided) may at the last forsake him; that is, not hinder his Enemy from taking him: For it is a cheap Peace that can be bought with the loss but of one Subject. But that the Commonwealth should deliver him up to his Enemy, or force him to surrender himself, is, I think, neither lawful nor necessary. We have an Example of this Nature in Megacles of Messana, Marselaer Legat. l. 1. c. 33. and of something greater in the Story of Sperthias and Bulis, who voluntarily surrender'd themselves up to Xerxes to satisfy him for the Injury the Lacedemonians did him in killing his Ambassadors ^e. But however the Commonwealth ought to set a greater Value upon the Lives of the Subjects, than to squander them away profusely upon the Fear of uncertain Danger, or upon prospect of unnecessary Good; neither is any Subject obliged to sacrifice himself upon such Occasions. And therefore the two Brothers, the Phileni, did more for their Country than could have been desired of them ^f. And Caiaphas made a very ill Application of what was otherwise a good Saying, John xi. 50. implying that it was lawful to take away an innocent Person's Life, that the Romans might not be jealous of any Revolt among the Jews, and so take an Occasion to bring a War upon them; especially since it would have been easy to have prevented such Suspicions by Measures much gentler than that of the Death of an innocent Man. And I do not see how the Action of Darius was excusable, when he threw away so many thousand Lives only to gain Zopyrus Credit among the Babylonians ^g.

VI. It is also often necessary, that for the Ratification of publick Compacts, some of the Subjects be given for Hostages ². And the civil Power —Whose greatest Care Was not to be depriv'd of Death.

^a Lucan, l. 3. v. 701, 702.

— Non perdere letum.
Maxima cura fuit.

^b Vid. Virg. Æn. VI. 20 Hvgin. Fab. 41. Ovid. Met. VIII. 170. Plut. Thesius. ^c Vide Bœcler in Grot. L. 1. c. 1. s. 6. p. m. 95.

^d Vid. L. 3. c. 1. l. 1. §. 6. D. de Postulando

^e Herodot. Polym. 1. Grot. l. 2. c. 25. f. 3.

^f Vide Sallust. de Bell. Jugurth. Pomp. Mela. l. 1. c. 7.

^g Herodot. Thalia, in fin.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. IV, VI.

² See our Author's Abridgm. De Offic. Hom. & Civ. l. 2. c. 13. §. 2. ² See hereafter in C. 8 f. 6. and Grot. l. 3. c. 20. f. 52, & may may force them to undertake this Duty, when there are none that offer themselves voluntarily. And if any over powerful Enemy demand certain particular Subjects for Hostages, they cannot, I think, upon any pretence refuse. But where there is any Number of Persons proper to be given for Hostages, and it is indifferent to the Party we make the Agreement with, or our selves, which of them be given; to take away all Occasion of Complaint, or Suspicion of Partiality, the proper Method will be to determine the Matter by Lot. And if the Hostages are to be detain'd for any long time, it will be reasonable to relieve the first, by sending new ones in their places: As also to take Care, that the extraordinary Service the Hostages undertake, more than other Subjects, shall be compensated to them some other way. And here it may be enquired, Whether the Lives, or only the Liberties of Hostages are engaged? And, I think it sufficiently appears, by giving up the Hostages, that thus much is actually done and intended: 'We deliver these Persons into your hands as a part of the Commonwealth we particularly value, and if we break the Articles of Compact, we leave it entirely to your Mercy to do with them what you think fit. Thus the City of Liege gave Hostages to Charles Duke of Burgundy, upon Condition, That if they did any thing contrary to the Agreement, he might freely give himself Satisfaction upon the Hostages; tho' the Duke afterwards dismiss'd them.' And therefore since the Breach of Compacts of this Nature is a just Reason for levying War against the Party which is guilty of it; it is manifest, that after such Breach of Compact, and after the War is begun, that the Hostages themselves may be look'd upon to be Enemies, in the same manner, as all the Subjects of that Commonwealth, comprehending such as were no way necessary to the Occasion of the War. And 'tis certain that Hostages have often suffer'd in the same manner as profess'd Enemies. Tho' on the other hand there have been many others, who have thought it barbarous and inhuman, to revenge the Injuries others have done, with the Deaths of innocent and unhappy Persons ^b. And it is certainly false to say, that the Hostages are given with Intention that they should suffer Punishment for the Compacts violated by the Commonwealth. For I cannot see how the End Men ought to propose to themselves from punishing, can possibly be obtain'd by the Punishment of an innocent Hostage, who did not properly consent to the Violation of the Compacts, but only did not refuse to suffer Evil in another's stead, which in it self is no Crime. And the Hostages will notwithstanding be a sufficient Caution, tho' by the Law of Nature they cannot properly be punished for another's Default: For it is enough that they are in such a State, as leaves them at any time expos'd to the Liberties of War, and that their Security depends solely upon the pleasure of an injured and angry Enemy. But however, the Truth is, the Commonwealth directly engageth only the corporal Liberty, and not the Lives of its Hostages; because it firmly resolves (or at least ought to do so) to observe its Faith; and therefore morally supposeth no such Case by which it shall give the other Power over the Life of the Hostage. And without dispute, the Commonwealth offers great Injury to the Hostages, either by unjustly breaking Compacts, and exposing them to the Mercy of the Enemy; or by giving them up, only with a Design to betray him into Security, and so make the greater Advantages upon him. But on the other hand, let us suppose the Party that receives the Hostages may take Advantage from thence, either to imploy them in some secret Treachery against us, or to provoke us with open Injuries, threatening Death to them, if we resist him: In such a Case it must be thought reasonable, that if the Injuries are so great, as to make it more supportable, to hazard the Lives of innocent Hostages, rather than the Commonwealth should suffer them, we may very justly neglect the Consideration of their Danger, and make all the Strength we can to resist the Enemy. And the Commonwealth in such a Case doth no greater Injury to the Hostage, than it doth when in War; it appoints particular Subjects to certain Posts, in a brave Defence of which they must either die, or be made Prisoners. And the Hostages ought patiently to submit to such fatal, unavoidable Misfortunes, and not be dissatisfied with their Country, since it could not be supposed to foresee so unexpected a Case ^c. Neither ought we upon this Account to set the less Value upon a civil State, since such extraordinary Cases seldom happen in it; when in a State of Nature, it is impossible but such Inconveniences must be very frequent. And this Reasoning must determine the Case that happen'd to the People of Utica; some of the Subjects of which City Agathocles intercepted, and tied in certain Engines which he placed in the Front of the Battle, that so their Fellow Subjects might be under a Necessity of killing them, whenever they attempted to beat him back ^d.

^a Phil. de Comins, l. 2.

^b V. Groc l. 3. c. 11. f. 18.

^c V. Ammian. Marcellinum, l. 28. c. 6.

^d V. Diosd. Sicul. l. 20. c. 55. Gunter. Ligurinum, l. 10. Groc. l. 3. c. 27. f. 52. Et. Bzeler. in Groc. l. 1. c. 1. p. m. 102.

Of the Power of the Sovereign, over the Lives and Fortunes of the Subjects, in Criminal Cases.

- | | |
|--|--|
| I. The Power of Life and Death, whether, and how transferr'd, from particular Men to the Commonwealth.
 II. In a Liberty of Nature no human Punishment;
 III. But only in a Commonwealth.
 IV. Punishment what.
 V. Punishing, to what Species of Justice reducible.
 VI. That one Man should punish another not unjust.
 VII. The power of punishing where lodg'd.
 VIII. Human Punishment ought to have some End.
 IX. The first End of Punishment the Amendment of the Offender.
 X. Whether lawful for any Man to correct any.
 XI. The second End of Punishment, caution for the Injured.
 XII. The third, the general Security.
 XIII. How far private Men are allowed to inflict Punishment.
 XIV. What Offences it is needless for human Justice to punish.
 XV. Whether lawful at any time to pardon.
 XVI. How far this is lawful antecedently to the Civil Law.
 XVII. How far after it.
 XVIII. The Quality of the Crime to be estimated from the Object of it. | XIX. And from the Passion that gave the Impulse.
 XX. And from the force of the Inclination and Intention.
 XXI. And from the Obstinate and Resolution of the Criminal.
 XXII. And lastly, from Custom and Habit.
 XXIII. What to be regarded in demanding the Quantity of the Punishment.
 XXIV. The Measure of Punishments what.
 XXV. In Punishments the Person of the Sufferer to be regarded.
 XXVI. The Jewish Law whether an universal adequate Measure of the Punishment.
 XXVII. Of Retaliation.
 XXVIII. A Corporation or Community how punish'd.
 XXIX. The Crimes of Corporations wear out in course of times.
 XXX. Every fatal Evil not an human Punishment.
 XXXI. Difference between Damage suffer'd directly and by Consequence.
 XXXII. Difference between the Occasion and the Cause of Evil.
 XXXIII. No Man to be punish'd for another's Crime. |
|--|--|

THE civil Sovereign hath also a Power over the Bodies and Lives, as well as Fortunes of the Subjects, in criminal Cases, which is usually call'd in short, The Power of Life and of Death (a Power manifestly different from that which God hath over his Creatures, Pf. l. xc. 3. or that of Men over Beasts.) And the first Dispute that riseth upon this Subject, is, How such a Power could by Compact, from particular Men, be transferr'd to the Commonwealth? For since Punishment is an Evil inflicted against the Consent of the Party punished, and that which a Man inflicts upon himself, cannot be said to befall him against his Consent; it will be some Difficulty to account, how a Man can have a Power to punish himself, and consequently be in a Capacity to transfer such a Power to another. For the Severities of the monastick Life, and the Pains Men inflict upon themselves by ecclesiastical Discipline, are either no Punishments properly speaking, but are rather applied by way of Physick to suppress the Force of Lust, or else are wholly involuntary and imposed by the Priests upon the Pretensions of the Divine Authority of their Office. And therefore it makes no Alteration in the Nature of the Punishment, that the Stripes are inflicted with their own hands, because the Fear of a greater Evil threatned to the Disobedient, forces them to execute that Rigour upon themselves; as we see Malefactors go to the place of Execution, who would be dragg'd thither, if they refused. So it is the Custom in some Nations for the condemn'd Criminals to dispatch themselves ^a. And therefore as to the matter in Dispute, it will be easy to conceive, that as in natural Bodies the Mixture and Temperament of several simples forms a compound, in which we often perceive such Qualities as cannot be found in any of the Ingredients that compose the Mixture: So Bodies politick, which are compounded of a number of Men, may have a Right resulting from such a Composition, which no one of the particulars was formally possess'd of; which Right, derived from the Union, is lodged in the Governors of such Bodies ^b. Thus it was never pretended, that every particular Man hath a power to make Laws for himself, and yet when every Man submits his Will to one, 'tis confess'd there commences a Power to prescribe Laws to all. After the same manner the Head of a Body politick may have a Power to inflict Punishments on the particular Members, though the Members had no such power before themselves. And this will be easy to account for, since every particular Man obligeth himself, not only to defend the Person that is to be punished, but if need be, to assist the Sovereign as far as he is able against him ^{c d}. And from hence the reason is evident, why it does not follow, as some suppose, that whatever the Sovereign takes away from the Subjects by way of Punishment, is done by their Consent, because they at first consented to allow of, and confirm every Action of the Sovereign; because, since that particular Case, which gives the Sovereign a power over the Life of the Subject, is left entirely in the power of the Subject himself, so as he may for ever prevent it, if he pleases; therefore such a Case is never consider'd by particular Men as ever liket to happen. Hobbes indeed in his Leviathan, c. 28. in the beginning asserts, That the Right the Commonwealth has to punish is not grounded on any Concession, or Gift of the Subjects, but that the Foundation of that Right is built upon that other, which, before the Institution of Commonwealths, every Man had to every thing, and to do whatever he thought necessary to his own Preservation. And therefore that that Right was not given, but left to the Commonwealth; which yet, since it has power sufficient, it may make use of, as it pleases, to the Security of the Subject. To which it may be answer'd; That the Right of Punishing is different from the Right of Self-preservation : and by the Exercise of it upon Subjects, we can never understand what a State of Nature allowed, where there is no Subjection. But I must farther add, That the Punishments I here speak of, are such only as human Legislators arbitrarily prescribe against Offenders, and as are distinguish'd from those Evils which are the natural Consequences of Sin.

^a Dial. Sculuz, l. 3. c. 5. speaking of the *Ethiopi*s, says, One of the Officers is sent to the Criminal to carry him the Signal of Death, upon the Sight of which he goes home and kills himself. ^b L. 41. c. 3. l. 46. D. de acquir. rer. domin. The Author here cites a Law of the Dixells, which does not concern the Rights that belong to whole Societies in general, tho' the particular Members of which they are compos'd are not invest'd with 'em; but which only shews that we may make over to another, a Right that we have not our selves; as for Example, a Creditor that sells his Debtor's Pledge, makes the Purchaser Master of the Pledge, tho' he himself had no property in it. Non est novum, ut non Dominum non habet, alio Dominum prebeat. Nam & Creditor, pignus vendendo, causam domini prebet, quam ipse non habuit.

^c Citat. Hobbes de Civ. c. 2. s. 18.

^d See above in B. 3. c. 7. s. 5.

II. But in treating of the Right of punishing the Subjects, I will premise that I intend to confine my self to that Right only which one Man exercises over another, without Regard to the Methods and Proceedings of Divine Justice, which it must be allowed is in many Cases of a Nature much different from human Judicature. To begin therefore as high as we can ; it must be observed, that, in general, in almost every Sin, but especially in such as bear Relation to another Person, there are two things considerable ; First, the Defect or Deviation from the Law : Secondly, the Harm or Damage another Person sustains, either directly, or indirectly by it. And so far we may be certain, that every Man is obliged by the Law of Nature to make satisfaction for the Harm or Damage another suffers on his Account ; and in case it proceeded from malicious Design, to give Caution for his good Behaviour for the future. But there is a Difference indeed between such Caution, when it is to be given by Men that live in a Liberty of Nature, and them that are Subjects of a Commonwealth. The Law of Nature seems to oblige the First to give no other Caution, than that after they have express'd a Concern for what they have done, and voluntarily offer to compensate the Damage, they should either by simple Asseveration, or at farthest by Oath, oblige themselves to forbear the like Injuries for the future. For a voluntary Repentance is a sufficient Evidence of an Alteration of Mind, and that their Resolution to abstain from Violence for the future is sincere. And therefore if the injured Party refuses to accept of such an Accommodation, and is either so diffident, or so perverse, as to endeavour to force upon them Articles of larger Extent ; since the others are not obliged by the Law of Nature to comply so far ; the Blame of Breach of Peace must lie on his side, and the others may justly resist him. And in such Circumstances the Justice of the War must be determined for them that offer'd the Injury, and the Injustice will be on his side that receiv'd it. But when a Man will give no Satisfaction, unless he be forced to it, since from thence he sufficiently discovers the obstinacy of his Temper ; and when no Terms of Composition will be accepted, unless the Party injured has Strength enough to overpower the injurious ; it must be left to the Pleasure of the Conqueror, to insist upon what Proposition he thinks most likely to secure his future Quiet. And when the difference is grown to that height, the Conqueror may take the liberty, not only to disarm his Enemy, to demolish and take Possession of fortified Places, to condemn him to perpetual Imprisonment, and the like ; but may also put him to Death, upon sufficient Assurance, that if ever he recovers Liberty, he will renew his Outrages, and there can be no other effectual way found to prevent it. But then, as this Caution is demanded rather in a way of War, than Punishment properly so call'd (tho' tis usual with some to call all manner of Evils, whether such as are the natural Consequences of Sin, or those that are inflicted in a Liberty of Nature for Injuries committed, by the Name of Punishments, in a more loose Sense of the Word) so it cannot properly be said that a Man is obliged † to stand to it. Because it supposes and implies a sort of Blemish and Stain upon the Mind, and a Sin against the Law of Nature, in the Person 'tis extorted from, viz. his refusing to give a voluntary Satisfaction, and a violent Defence of his Fault. Nay, since the Evils that are the Effects and Incidents of War, cannot properly be call'd Punishments (as will sufficiently appear from what follows) it is manifest that human Punishments in a strict Sense, or such as are derived from human Authority, cannot affect them that live in a Liberty of Nature, though it cannot be denied, but that they too are subject to those Evils which flow by a natural Connexion from Sin.

III. But in Commonwealths if a Man suffer Harm or Damage, it is not only recovered with much greater Ease, than in a State of Nature, by a War that must be supported by his own single Strength ; but there is before hand as much Care taken, as the Nature of human Affairs will permit, to prevent Injuries or Harm that he offer'd the Subject, by awarding Punishments to be afflicted by publick Justice on all Offenders against the Law. For since the Wills and Inclinations of Men are so easily byas'd either to Good or Ill, it was certainly the most effectual Expedient that could have been pitch'd upon, to direct, or restrain them, to set in View the dread of some present Evil.

IV. Punishment therefore, in general may be thus defined ; It is an Evil of suffering, inflicted for an Evil of doing, Or, it is some uneasy Evil inflicted by Authority, in a compulsive Way, upon View of antecedent Transgression. For though 'tis common to enjoin several sorts of Labour in Punishment ; as suppose a Man be condemn'd to the Mines, to the Gallies, to the Work-house ; to raise a Fortification, to cleanse the common Sewers, or the like ; yet these are to be look'd upon only, as they are Hardships, or servile laborious Employments, and cause an Uneasiness in the Person who is forced to submit to them ; and therefore may be reduced to Sufferings. It is said therefore, that Punishment is inflicted upon view of antecedent Transgression. And hence it follows that none of those Inconveniences a Man suffers by an infectious Distemper, by an infirm or maim'd Body, or by any Uncleanness, can properly be call'd Punishments. Many of this Nature are mention'd in the Jewish Law ; as when the Lepers are commanded to be separated

^a And this Plutarch seems in some measure to be sensible of, L. de Sera Num. vindict. p. 449. F. A Man can hardly conceive any thing Good with better Assurance, than that he is one that exactly knows the proper time for the Cure of Vice, that Punishment is the usual Remedy he applies to every Sin, which he does not always distribute in the same Proportion to all, or at the same time.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. II, and IV.

¹ See above in B. 2. c. 5. f. 3. towards the End. † The Author here follows a false Idea of the Nature of the Obligation. See the 8th Note on the 4th Section.

² V. Grot. L. 2. c. 20. f. 1.

³ See Levit. Ch. xiii.

⁴ See Deuter. xxiii. 4.

⁵ See Levit. Ch. xv.

from the rest of the People; and when such as were maim'd or blemish'd in any Limb, were to be excluded the Priesthood, and the like^a; which are no more Punishments, than it is for a Stranger, or a Person of mean Quality, to be made incapable of certain Offices in the Commonwealth, or than it is for a Man to be in pain at the setting a broken Leg. Tho' sometimes such Misfortunes are improperly call'd Punishments, by the Resemblance they bear to the real. As we say in common Discourse of Persons extremely infirm, or miserably deform'd, that their Life is a Punishment to them. And hence it also follows, that Imprisonment, the Design of which is only the safe Custody of the Party accused, is not properly Punishment, because no Man can be suppos'd to be justly punish'd, before he be judicially heard. And therefore whatsoever Hurt a Man suffers by Bonds or Restraint, before his Cause be heard, and he be declar'd guilty, more than is a necessary to secure his Person, is against the Law of Nature, and ought to have Satisfaction, or at least some Allowance¹ made for it in the subsequent Punishment. I add, inflict by² Authority, to distinguish Punishment from those Evils a Man suffers, either by War, particular Quarrels, and Self-defence, or by private Malice. And therefore, there is no real Disgrace in losing an Ear, suffering the Blows of a Cudgel, or the like, but only in the Cause of it. 'Tis Selden's Opinion indeed³, That the Slaughter and Spoils committed in War are a sort of Punishments; which may be true enough in this Sense, that a just War, begun upon just Provocations, and the Calamities the injurious Party suffers by it, may be look'd upon as natural Punishment, and that a conscientious Warrior should endeavour to reduce the Outrages of War to the same Calmness and Proportion the civil Court ob-

^a Solent praesides in carcere continendos damnare, aut ut in vinculis continentur. Sed id eos facere non oportet: Num hujusmodi poena sunt interdicta: carcer enim ad continendos homines, non ad puniendos haberi debet. D. l. 48. t. 19 De Poenis, l. 8 l. 9.

^b De J. N. & G. sec. Heb. l. 4. c. 11.

Mr. BARBEYRAC'S NOTES on §. IV.

¹ See Levit. xxi. 17, &c. ² By a Rescript of the Emperors Honorius and Theodosius, it is ordain'd, that those who were condemn'd to Banishment, should be releas'd and discharg'd from the Punishment, provided it was found upon Examination, that during their Imprisonment the Term of their Banishment was expir'd. Omnnes, quos damnationis conditio diversis exiliis destinatos, metas temporis praestituti in carceris implevissent, custodiam deprehenderit, solutos poena vinculisque laxatos, custodia liberari praecipimus, nec formidare miserias ullas exilii. Sit satis immensorum cruciatuum semel luisse supplicia ne hi qui diu privati sunt aerae communis haustu, & lucis aspectu, intra breve spatium catenarum ponderibus praegravati, etiam exilii poenam sustinere compellantur. Cod. Lib. 9. Tit. 47. de poenis. Leg. xxiii.

³ The Author here leaves Grotius, and in my opinion, without any Necessity; tho' he is very much follow'd in that respect, by those Authors that have lately written Treatises of the Law of Nature, and even by Mr. Titius, who also extols abundance of things in his Observations on his Abridgement de Officio Hom. & Civ. However I will contradict 'em both, with so much the more Confidence, since besides the Advantage of defending Grotius, I shall have nothing to do but to follow the Opinion of Mr. Lock. The Laws of Nature (says that great Philosopher, in his second Treatise of Civil Government, Chap. ii. Sect. 7. &c.) as well as other Laws that are impos'd on Men here below, would be entirely useless, if in the State of Nature, no body had the Power to put 'em in Execution, and punish those who break 'em, whether with respect to private Persons, or in reference to Mankind in general, whose Preservation is the end of those Laws which are common to all Men. Perhaps they will say, That in the State of Nature there are some Evils annex'd to ill Actions by a necessary Consequence, and which our Author calls upon that Account, natural Punishments (see above Book ii. Chap. iii. Sect. 21.) without speaking of the Punishments which God exercises besides at his own Pleasure, by virtue of his being our Sovereign Legillator, and Author of the Law of Nature. Mr. Lock has not thought fit to obviate this Objection: But if it had been propos'd to him, he would have answer'd in all appearance, that neither of these two sorts of Punishments are sufficient to restrain human Malice, or procure the Peace and Tranquillity of Mankind; as it appears by the Complaints that have been made in all Ages, of the Prosperity of the Wicked, and the unfortunate Condition of the Good. Moreover (says Mr. Bernard, in his Novel. de la Rep. de Lettres Juin. 1706. pag. 648.) neither those who suffer the Punishments here in Dispute, nor those who are Eye-witnesses of 'em, do regard 'em as Punishments inflict'd for such or such Crimes. How many Distempers and Illnesses are there occasion'd by Debauchery, which no body imputes to the true Cause that produced 'em? This is still more true in the Punishments that God inflict, and whose Crimes are not the physical Cause. Thus he causes an Adulterer, an Usurer, or a Murderer, to perish by a Shipwreck, or break their Limbs by a Fall; but yet it is very seldom, that either the Person to whom these Accidents happen, or those who see 'em happen, ever guess the true moral Cause of 'em. Now that the Punishment inflict'd for a Crime may work some Effect, both upon him who suffers it, and upon them that are Witnesses of it; both must throughly be persuaded, that the Punishment was inflict'd for such and such a Crime. One cannot then forbear acknowledging, that in the State of Nature, it is requisite to have some Body here below, to punish Crimes; and if so (continues Mr. Lock) then every one is invest'd with that Power with respect to any other, since all Men are by Nature equal. However, this is not absolute and arbitrary: We must never suffer our selves to be so far transported with Passion, as to punish a Crime with too much Severity. All that is to be done on this Occasion, ought only to tend towards the Reparation of the Injury, and preventing them for the future, from doing the like. When any one violates the Laws of Nature, he in so doing demonstrates to the World, that he tramples under Foot the Maxims of Reason and Equity, which are the Rules God has prescrib'd to human Actions, as a common Security to Men; and thus he becomes dangerous to Mankind. As then every one has a Right to take care of every thing that relates to the Preservation of human Society, he may, by following the Light of quiet Reason, inflict on such a Person, what Punishment he thinks most likely to produce Repentance in him, and hinder him from falling again into the same Crime, or to deter others by his Example. When a Man kills another on purpose, he ought to be destroy'd himself, like Lions, Tygers, and other wild Beasts, with whom no Society or Security is to be had. Who ever shall meet me, will kill me, is the voice of Nature, which the Remorse of Conscience forced from Cain, after he had slain his Brother Abel, Gen. Chap. iv. v. 14. By the same Reason, we may punish, out of any civil Community, the least Infringement of the Law of Nature, as well as in a State, if it be necessary to the End for which indicting of Punishments ought to be design'd. The very same Laws that forbid the Crime, prescribe also the Manner and Degrees of the positive Laws which often have no other Foundation than the capricious or vicious Passions of the Legislators of the Earth. If any one thinks it strange, that we give to every individual Person, in the Independency of the State of Nature, a Right of punishing those who are guilty; let 'em tell us, by what Right Sovereigns punish, even with Death, any Stranger that has committed a Crime in their Dominions: For the Laws have no Force in relation to Foreigners: and Sovereigns, or Magistrates of Civil Communities, have no more power over those who are not Members of 'em, than each Person has in reference to another in the State of Nature. However, the Practice we are here speaking of, is very common and universally allow'd. Yet, I fancy our Author would not have fail'd to have answer'd this last Reason of Mr. Lock's, that every Foreigner, that enters into a State, either by way of Travelling through, or to make some stay in it, tacitly submits to the Laws of the Country, and becomes in some measure a Subject to the Prince, as long as he resides in his Dominions. (See above in Book 7. chap. ii. Sect. 200.) But it may be answer'd, that this tacit serves erves in inflicting Punishments. But 'tis evident, there are other Distinctions between the Evils of War, and Punishments; since, as Tacitus observes, In time of Peace the Cause and Merits of the Person are always regarded, when ill at the Sword makes no Difference between the criminal and the innocent. Neither does the civil Court look upon those Evils to be Punishments, that are only the natural Consequents of Sin; as when a Man loſes his health by committing any unlawful Act, or by assaulting another, is beat himself; for these are Evils not inflicted by the Authority of the civil Sovereign. And therefore if a Man by ill Courses happens to weaken his Constitution, impair his Estate, or lose the good Opinion of his Friends, from whom otherwise he might possibly have expected Favours; this does not make him the less liable to Punishment. And lastly, it was necessary to subjoin, that the Penalty was to be inflicted in a way of Compulsion, or by Force: Because otherwise it would be impossible to attain the End design'd by punishing; which is to deter Men from offending by the Severity of the Punishment. And therefore some have not thought it proper to allow the Criminals the Choice of their own Punishment; because, as the Declaimer says ^a, 'It might seem to give Countenance to Vice; and because it would take off those Fears that are generally the strongest Guard upon Mens Innocence, to allow Delinquents to suffer what way they pleas'd. For, as he reasons, a Man allow'd the Liberty before-hand to compose himself to an obstinate resolute Temper of Mind, may defy all our Racks and Tortures. 'Tis a Mistake to measure the Security of the Punishment by the Terror only of the Name of it, for there can be no Punishment but that which a Man suffers unwillingly and with Regret. And there can be no Pain but that which our own Impatience gives us. 'Tis our Fears only that make Cruelty itself look terrible. How can we call that a Punishment, which Men will meet half way, and which they are ready to demand? Condemned Criminals should be drag'd to Execution, and not left to go as they please". But after all, such a Choice does not always make the Punishment involuntary, but only perhaps mitigates the Degree, or alters the Manner of it; still the Punishment, whatever it be, that at last determines the Choice, is certainly involuntary and the Effect of Force.

Submission does not seem to extend to the giving the Sovereign a Power of punishing a Foreigner with Death, especially for certain Crimes committed in secret, or which are not hurtful to the State, but by the ill Example they give the Subjects; as Sodomy, Bestiality, &c. would be. All that could be done with respect to a foreigner would be to oblige him to make reparation for the Injury he had done to any of the natural born Subjects of the State, and then force him to depart from thence. If then Sovereigns put a Foreigner to Death, in form of Punishment; it must certainly be by virtue of a Right, that every one naturally has, of punishing the Violation of the Law of Nature. 'Tis thus that I answer'd before-hand the Reason alledg'd by Mr. Hersius in his Dissertation, de Societate, primo Juris Naturalis Principio. Sect. iii. xxv. which I had not seen before the first Edition of this Work. All that the same Author says there farther, is nothing to the point, since he will not prove that in the State of Nature, the Interest of Human Society, and the Laws of Sociability do not require the Punishment of the Wicked, tho' the injur'd Person, would not, or could not, either by himself, or the assistance of Friends, do them any Mischief: certainly we ought to concern our selves for the general good of Mankind, without any Exception; and to prevent as much as possible, the Evils to which they might be expos'd: And if so, 'tis also our Duty, to restrain, or discourage the Malice of those, who either by themselves, or by their ill Example, or through hopes of Impunity, will probably be the Occasion of doing an Injury to somebody, in defiance of the Laws both of Nature and human Society. 'Tis true, that in the State of Nature, these sorts of Punishments are not inflicted by Authority; and 'tis the source of their Illusion, who will not bear to have the Right of punishing out of civil States mentioned in their hearing. Yet, however, the Reality and Foundation of this Truth is no less certain for all that. But to return to Mr. Lock. He observes farther, that besides the Right which is common to all Men in the State of Nature, to punish the Violation of the Laws of Nature, he that is directly injur'd, or that receives some immediate damage by a Crime, has an entire and particular Right to demand Reparation for the Injury that has been done him. And if another Person find his Complaints and Pretensions to be well grounded, he may join with him, and assist him to make the offender give him satisfaction. (It is also much more honourable and generous, as Gro-tius very well observes upon this Subject, Lib. II. Chap. xx. Sect. 40. Num. 7.) to pursue the Reparation of Injuries done to another, rather than to demand Satisfaction for those done to our selves, which is more to be fear'd on Account of the last, that an Excess of Resentment should make us exceed the Bounds of a just Revenge, or at least fret our Spirits too much.) Of these two sorts of Rights, the first, I mean that of punishing the Violation of the Laws, is intirely confer'd upon the Magistrate, to whom, every one upon his entrance into any State, immediately submits, so that whenever the good of the Commonwealth allows it, he may, barely upon his own Authority, shew Mercy to the Guilty: But he has not the same Right or Power to demand Satisfaction for an Injury, or Reparation of a Damage done. The Magistrate cannot excuse the Offender; and the injur'd Person still keeps his Right, so that they do him wrong, if they hinder him from the Reparation that is due to him. Mr. Lock afterwards makes an Objection himself against the Power which he gives to every particular Person, in the State of Nature, of putting the Laws of Nature in Execution, and punishing those that infringe 'em; which is, that Men being by this Means become Judges in their own Cause, and being besides full of Passions, especially the Spirit of Revenge, they would generally exceed the bounds of Equity; from whence a thousand Evils and Disorders follow. I own (answers he) that the Civil Government is a proper Remedy for these Inconveniencies, which without dispute are very grievous. But if the State of Nature is to be disannull'd upon that account, we ought to think the same thing of a Government, where one Person alone, having a supreme and absolute Authority, is Judge in his own Cause, and executes what he pleases, without being liable to be call'd to an account, or oppos'd by any one. If we must always submit to whatever he commands, by what Principle soever he does it, whether he acts reasonably or no; we shall find our selves in that respect, in a worse State, than that of Nature, in which we are not bound to submit to every one, after that manner.

^a Quint. Decl. 11. p. 156, 157 Edit. Lug. Bat.

^b Senec. L. 4. Controv. 24. p. 234. Ed. Gronov. Imprisonment was no Punishment to me, I came thither of my own accord. Arrian. Epict. L. 1. c. 12. Where-ever a Man is detain'd against his Will, that Place is his Prison. Attil. Charron de la Sageſſe, L. 1. c. 6. f. 8. & c. 39. f. 9.

And therefore it may be further inferr'd, that it is an improper Expression to say, a Man is obliged to be punished, or that such a one owes a Punishment; because Punishment signifies Harm inflicted against a Man's Consent, and implies an Aversion of the Will to it. But now it is always suppos'd, that what we are properly obliged to, we ought to be ready and willing to perform. And therefore the Reason is plain, why, for instance, in working upon a Fortification, a Servant at the Command of his Master, without any particular Wages, and a Malefactor condemn'd to that Labour, may be employ'd in the same Service, and the Work be a Punishment to one, and not to the other; because the Servant undertakes it upon the Obligations he is under to his Master, and is therefore suppos'd to do it voluntarily; but it is impos'd upon the other as a Task, which he cannot submit to, but with Unwillingness and Reluctance c. And when we are told that in some Countries (as particularly in Japan) the condemn'd Criminals are their own Executioners, we are not to look upon that as a voluntary Action, any more than that with us they usually go to the place of Execution; or than that in Spain, the Executioner suffers his Prisoner to be unbound, and only commands him to follow him; or when (as it was the old Custom in Lituania) the Malefactors are forced to erect their own Gibbets, and hang themselves. For these can never be suppos'd to be properly the Acts of the Criminals themselves, but to be only Compliances they submit to, in hopes of avoiding greater Evils that might be the Effects of the Refusal. Thus it was very particular when Gracchus, in Livy a, is said to have made some of his Soldiers, who had not behaved themselves with the same Bravery as the rest of his Army, take an Oath, That they would not eat or drink in any Posture but standing, as long as they should be in the Service. For as they could not refuse the Oath, so they thought they ought rather to bear the Disgrace than be perjured. But further, neither can a Man properly be said to be punished, who is bound for another, and is afterwards forced to pay the Bond. For the other Man's Misdemeanour is only the bare Occasion of his sustaining that Damage, but the Obligation which he voluntarily took upon himself, is the proper and immediate Cause of it. Moreover from what has been said it follows, that, as a Man is not oblig'd to inform against himself b, that a Hus fustium infamiam non importat, sed causa propter quam id pati meruit, si ea fuit, quæ infamiam damnato irrogat. In cæteris quoque generibus pœnarum eadem forma statuta est. L. 3. t. 2. l. 22. D. de his qui infam. not.

a L. 24. c. 6.

b All that our Author says here and a little farther, upon the Subject of Obligation, cannot be admitted but in this Sense, that Men are not oblig'd to go before a Magistrate and inform against themselves: For that is not necessary to the End for which the Establishment of Punishments was design'd. But he is in the wrong to deny, that there is absolutely an Obligation, in reference to the Punishment in the Person committing a Crime punishable by the Law. It is certain, that the Sovereign has a Power to punish Criminals; and one cannot conceive a Right annexed to a Person, without supposing at the same time, an Obligation in him, towards whom he may lawfully exercise that Right. Our Author distinguishes, in another place, Book iii. Chap. v. Sect. 1. between what one has a Right to demand of another, and what one has a Right to do, with respect to him; the First, according to his Opinion, always imposes a true Obligation on him, from whom we may demand to have something given us, or something done in our Favour, but the other does not always suppose an Obligation answerable to it. For my Part, I do not see, by virtue of what the first Right does not take away the Obligation, as well as the last; if I can lawfully do a Thing, in Reference to a Person, methinks he is bound to suffer it, or not to resist me, when I make use of my Power; otherwise it would be useless and of no Effect. Mr. Titius (Observ. DCXLI.) seems to make the Obligation of a Criminal, with respect to Punishment, consist only in our not doing him any wrong in punishing him, and in his not complaining of our Usage. But we must go farther, in my Opinion. 'Tis already granted, that when the Question is concerning a bare pecuniary Punishment, to which we have lawfully been condemn'd, we ought to pay it, without expecting to be compelled by the Magistrate to do it: we are oblig'd to it, not only by the Maxims of Prudence, because it would be to no purpose to refuse doing what we may be forced to, but still more by the Rules of Justice, which require us to make Satisfaction for the Damage, and to obey a lawful Magistrate. The greatest difficulty in this Point then regards Corporal Punishments, and especially those that tend to taking away Life. Now I must here own, that the publick Good, and the Power of him who holds the mighty Sword of Justice in his Hand, do not require, that a Criminal should go merrily to suffer the Punishment that is inflicted on him; or that he should not endeavour to make his Escape, provided he can do it, without doing any mischief to any Body. But at the same time, it is just without dispute, that when the Criminal has been taken, and condemn'd upon a thorough Hearing of the Cause, in Form of Law, if he finds no way to escape, either by breaking open the Prison, or some other Stratagem, he should suffer the Punishment without murmuring, and having Recourse to any unlawful means, to get away, or opposing the Magistrate in the lawful Exercise of his Power. Neither ought he to resist or defend himself, against those who endeavour to hinder him from making his Escape, as he would have a Right to do against an unjust Aggressor, or Magistrates of Justice, whom supposing their being convinced of his Innocence, he finds manifestly endeavouring to destroy him, and cannot avoid being unjustly condemn'd, if once he falls into the Hands of Judges that are exasperated and prejudiced against him. The Reason our Author alleges for acquitting Criminals of all Obligations in relation to Punishment, has nothing in it that is solid; and if it were allow'd of, it would as well prove, that a Criminal is no more oblig'd to pay a Fine, or make Satisfaction for damage done, because the generality of Mankind have much ado to persuade themselves to it, and violent Means must be used to force 'em to do it; we should conclude from thence, against what our Author himself maintains, that a Soldier is not oblig'd to go to, or defend a Post, where, according to all Appearance, there is but little hopes of escaping with Life. See the former Chap. §. 4. & B. iii. c. vii. §. v. Moreover, tho' I yet see no reason, why I should here change my Opinion; that the Penalty the Law appoints may be put in Execution upon him, after he has made Satisfaction for the damage or harm he has done; so for the same Reason he may lawfully endeavour to escape from it, either by denying the Matter, concealing himself, or flying, without the Violation of any Obligation whatever^a.

Bæcker indeed in his Preface before Grotius writes very obscurely upon this Subject, p. 9. "The Merits of human Punishments, says he, belong to the Law of Nature, both as it is a Law, and as it is natural. If it be a Law, it produces an Obligation; but there can be no Obligation, neither can it be conceiv'd how there should be, without some Penalty attending the Violation of the Law". 'Tis beyond Dispute, that such as transgress the Law of Nature must expect to be punished, because Punishments are unavoidably annex'd to every Law; and it is not in the least repugnant to Nature^a, that a Man that does Evil, should suffer Evil. But it would be false Reasoning to infer, that because the Law produces an Obligation, therefore every Man that breaks it, is obliged voluntarily to deliver himself up to be punished by the civil Sword. Hobbes in his Book de Cive, c. 14. § 7. says very well, That the second Part of the Law, which is call'd the penal, is mandatory, and speaks only to the publick Ministers. There is no particular Clause in the Law, which commands the Criminal to go voluntarily to the place of Execution; but there is a particular Injunction to the Magistrate, to take care that Malefactors be executed. And therefore the Delinquent is not in fault; if he be not put to death, but the blame lies wholly upon the Magistrate, who neglects a Matter of such Concern and Importance to the Commonwealth. Socrates, when Crito persuaded him to make his Escape out of Prison, told him^b, that that would be to break the Laws of his Country, which every good Subject was bound to obey; that every Man ought to yield to the Sentence the Government passes upon him; and not return the Injury upon the State, or pretend to shew it has been unjust. But these are only noble Sayings, which perhaps, in some particular Circumstances, a Person truly brave and innocent might resolve to practise, but which can be or no Force (as I can see) against any thing here asserted. And therefore we may further conclude, That as no Man is bound to accuse himself in the civil Court, or to make any voluntary Confession of his Crime, so it is unjust in criminal Cases to put the Prisoner to declare his Innocence upon Oath: Tho' this Custom was usual at Athens^c, and the thing might look very dreadful, when the Party was obliged at the solemn Sacrifice of a Boar, a Bull, and a Ram, to imprecate, as the Form ran, Destruction to himself, his Race, and Family. And hence Hobbes inters, de Cive, c. 2. § 19. "That the Answers which are forced from a Man in Torture, are no Evidence to the Fact; but only helps to find out the Truth. So that a Man has a Right to give a true or false Answer, or if he please, not to answer at all^d". 'Tis an odd Story to the purpose we have in Ctesias's Account of

I will inform the Publick, that since the first Edition of this Work, I have seen two Treatises written by Mr. THOMASIVS; in one of which he refutes the Opinion I have here establish'd, and in the other maintains it himself. See his Instit. Jurisp. div. Lib. iii. chap. vii. and his Fundamenta Jur. Nat. & Gent. See what also the same Civilian has said in his Notes upon Huber. de Jure civitatis. Lib. ii. Sect. vi. cap. i. sect. xx, &c. where they had undertaken to refute our Author upon the Question in debate.

^a V. Grot. l. 2. c. 20. f. 1.

^b Plato in Criton. p. 37, &c. Ed. Wech.

^c Demosthen. contra Aristocrat.

MR. BARB. NOTES on § IV.

⁹ Quintil. Declam. 314. All Confession is of such a nature, that a Man would be thought Mad that were guilty of it. Id. Declam. 328. Neither is there any Man so desperate, or that hath so little love for himself, that doth not commit his Crimes with a design to deny them.

¹⁰ Vid. L. 48. t. 18. l. 1. f. 23. D. de Questionib. Charron. de la Sageſſe, L. 1. c. 4. f. 6. "This Invention of the Rack is a dangerous Invention; and seems rather a trial of Patience than Truth. And he that can bear, and he that cannot bear it, conceals the Truth. For why shall Pain make me rather confess what is, than force me to say what is not? And, on the contrary, if he, that has not committed the Fact of which he is accus'd, is patient enough to suffer these Torments, why will he not be so that has, when so great a Reward as Life is propos'd to him? I believe that the foundation of this Invention was owing to the consideration of the effort of Conscience. For to the Guilty it seems to aid the Torture, to make him confess his Crimes, and to enfeeble him; and, on the other hand, to fortify the Innocent against it. To speak the Truth, 'tis a Method full of Uncertainty and Danger: For what would not one do, what would not one say, to avoid such intolerable Pains? Etiam innocentes cogit mentiri dolor. Publ. Syr. ver. 191. From whence it happens, that he, whom the Judge has put to the Rack, that he may not put him to Death innocently, dies both innocent and rack'd. Thousands and Thousands have loaded themselves with false Accusations; among whom I place Philotas, considering the Circumstances of Alexander's Persecution against him, and the manner of his Torture. But however, say they, 'tis the least Evil that human weakness could invent; very inhuman however, and in my Opinion, very useless. Several Nations, less barbarous in that respect, than the Greeks or Romans that call'd 'em so, hold it horrible and cruel to torment and tear a Man in pieces, for a Crime of which you are still in doubt; what can it be but the Effect of your Ignorance? Are you not unjust, who rather than not kill him without a Cause, do worse to him than killing it self? Let it be so, see how often he had rather die without a Cause, than to undergo this Scrutiny, which is more painful than the Punishment; and often by its Severity, antedates both the Punishment and Execution of it". MONTAGNE's Essays, Book ii. chap. v. GROTIUS in one of his Letters (Let. DCXCIII, Printed at Amsterdam in 1686.) says, that there are infinite Examples of People that have been put to Death unjustly, upon a Confession extorted from 'em by the Rack; and therefore he does not at all wonder that there have been several grave and pious Persons of Opinion, that Christians ought not to make use of Torments, to force Men to a Confession of Crimes, since it is certain, that there is no such thing in the Law of Moses; that in England People live in as great Security as in any other Nation. tho' the Rack is not used there, and that during the time that Rome preserv'd her Liberties, no Citizens could be put to the Torture. It may not be improper to add here the Reflection of Mr. LECLERC, on this Subject; in his Abridgment of a Book, where 'tis maintain'd, that the inevitable necessity of using the Rack, for the preservation of the State, has made it lawful, as War, and other violent Remedies, are employ'd against the Enemies of the publick Tranquillity. "This Reason, says he, may prevail when they are persuaded that there are several Persons, that are Accomplices in a Crime, and when it is necessary to discover 'em, in order to defend our selves from 'em; but certainly, where they use the Rack, only because the Formality of the Law requires a Confession from a Criminal before he is punish'd, there it is an useless Cruelty: Since if there are sufficient Proofs, they need search for no more, and since a Criminal, who knows that he is in no less danger of being put to Death, tho' he does not confess, than if he does, suffers not himself to be put to the Torture to confess the Truth, when he finds that the Judges are convinced of his Crime. On the contrary, when the Fact is doubtful, and he knows that by resolutely suffering of the Indies; he says, "That there is a Spring in India, the Water of which, as soon as drawn, turns into a Curd like that of Cheese, and that if a very little Quantity of this be infused in Water, and so drank, there will follow a Distraction upon it, which, the same day, will certainly make a Man discover every thing he hath been concern'd in. He adds, the King takes the Advantage of this Water, when he would make a full Discovery, whether the Party accus'd is really guilty of the Crimes he is charged with, or no; and if a Man discovers himself to be guilty of what he is indicted, he is forced to be his own Executioner; but if his own Confession proves nothing against him, he is immediately acquitted. But it should be carefully observ'd, that generally in all Laws the dispositive part, or that which contains the matter of the Law, and the comminatory, or that which comprehends the penal Sanction, are express'd by two distinct forms of Words; as thus, You shall not do this; and, He that does so, shall suffer the Penalty. In some Law the latter part seems to be no more than the Condition of the forgoing Prohibition, thus, You shall not do so and so, except you pay so much by way of M^{ul}t. And in Laws of this nature, that which looks like a penal Sanction, is in reality no more than a Tax since it is left to the Discretion of Subjects, whether they will pay the Money the Law demands, or forbear such a particular Act. And this is generally the method observ'd in sumptuary Laws; the design of which is commonly alternative, either to induce the Subject to a frugal way of Life, or to enrich the publick Treasury. For to allow of any price for Privilege, or exemption from the Law of Nature is absolutely unlawful. But the common design of other Laws is only to dispose Men to Obedience by the fear of Punishment. And therefore that Person knew nothing of the true nature of Punishment, who when he had ask'd the Magistrate what was the Fine for striking a blow on the Face, throw down the Money, and struck the Magistrate himself. For the Laws were made to redress Injuries, not to allow of Dispensations to commit them upon the Payment of a Sum of Money. And therefore it is evident, that those Laws only, where the prohibition is alternative or conditional, excuse a Man from the Offence who has paid his M^{ul}t, or is in a readiness to pay it; which he is likewise obliged to do upon Demand; but not in other Laws, where the Interdict laid is absolute. But it must be confes'd, that there ought to be no such Laws as the purely penal, or such as propose no other End, but to make Advantage by the Fine. Some indeed call such a Law purely penal, which barely annexes a Penalty to a plain Command, and neither exprestly commands or forbids any thing; and this is given for an Instance, A Person elect Mayor of a Town, refusing the Office, shall be fined an hundred pounds to the Publick. But in my Opinion, this and all other Statutes of the like nature, imply some such Precept as this: No Man, when he is lawfully elected, shall refuse to assist the Commonwealth; so that, that before seems to be a penal Clause annex'd to this *.

V. But further, since we look upon a Judge to be just, when he inflicts Punishments agreeably to the demerit of the Offender; and since Justice is said to be administr'd, whenever the Penalties are duly allotted; it has from hence been disputed among Philosophers, what Branch of Justice the Imposition of Punishments belongs to; whether to the commutative or distributive; or as Græciv ^b changes the Terms, to the expletive or attributive. They that refer the Infliction of Punishments to distributive Justice, give us these Reasons for it, that in the Distribution of Punishments, as well as Goods, there is a proportionable regard had to the greater or less desert of the Persons. And since, according to their Opinion, distributive Justice is concern'd in all those Things, which the whole apply to the Parts, or the Commonwealth to particular Subjects; it is evident that the Commonwealth inflicts the Punishments on particular Subjects. But it may be replied, That it is a Mistake to suppose that distributive Justice takes place, as often as there is an Equality to be made between more than two Persons; or whenever any thing is to be divided proportionably between more than One. For in Partnership, the Dividends of the Profit are shared among every one of the Members, according to their different Proportions; and yet in this Contract, the Dividend of the Profit becomes due a quite different way from that of Rewards and Punishments. For I think it is manifest, that Punishments are not consequent upon force of Compact, and that no Man, when he submits himself to Government, makes any particular Agreement to be punished for the Crimes he may commit. And therefore the Imposition of Punishments does not any way agree with the Description of distributive Justice which I gave before. But farther; it is only by Consequence, and purely accidental, that greater Criminals are punished with greater Rigour, and less, with proportionable Severity, not that it was primarily and in it self intended. For there is no necessity that in awarding Punishment to any particular Crime, the Magistrate should make a Comparison between that Offence and some other, and so proportion the measure of the Punishment for both, according to their different degrees of Malignity: But every Crime has, as it were, a separate Punishment allotted to it with more or less Severity, as the publick Benefit requires it; tho' it usually happens, that the Punishment is "the Torture without confessing, they will do nothing to him, how great soever their Presumptions against him may be: the desire of avoiding the Punishment he deserves, make him often resolve to suffer that ever's Trial, to see if he can bear it, and thus it renders him more obstinate and harden'd." There are several Instances of Jews, that have eluded the Spanish Inquisition, by maintaining in the middle of their Torments, that they were Christians in reality. Biblioth. Univers. Tom. xvii. pag. 484. See the Example of Tam O' Shan mention'd in the vii. Tom. of the same Journal, pag. 239, &c. and the Diab. Hist. & Critique of Mr. BAYLE, Tom. ii. pag. 1399. 2 Edit. as also a curious Dissertation written by Mr. THOMASius de Tortura ex feris Christianorum proferenda. Printed at Hall in 1705.

MR. BARR. NOTES on § V.

* This is true: But, since upon a Sovereign, the Right of Life and Death, or the Right of the Sword is confer'd: His Subjects are oblig'd not to resist him, tho' he makes Use of it upon their own Persons.

^a Viti Sanderfon de Obligat. Conscient. Prælect. 7. §. 13. §. 77.

^b See Græc. B. 2. c. 20. §. 2.

^c See above in B. 1. c. 7. §. 11.

either increas'd, or alleviated, according to the different degrees of the Transgression.

Some Persons that reduce Punishment under commutative Justice, consider it, as if Punishment were something assign'd to the Delinquent in the same manner as is usual in Contracts. A Mistake they were led into upon a common Expression, that Punishment is the due of every Offender; which is manifestly an improper way of speaking. For a Man that has any thing due to him, has a right over the Debtor to oblige him to the Payment of it. But I think there will be no body so absurd as to say, that the Delinquent has a right to challenge his Punishment of the Magistrate. And therefore the meaning of that Saying is only this, that the Magistrate may justly punish a Criminal as the Law directs. Grotius, l. ii. c. 20. § 2. says, "That the Distribution of Punishments does originally and principally belong to expletive Justice, for this reason; because no body can punish another lawfully, unless he has a right to do it; which right ariseth from the other's Crime." But he was impos'd upon by the doubtful meaning of the Word Right. For there is a very wide difference between a right to do a thing, and a right to receive something from another. The meaning of the former right is this, I have a Power to exercise this particular Act, and no body ought to hinder me in it; the sense of the latter is this, I have a right to receive something from another, and he at the same time is under an Obligation to let me have it. Now when the Discourse relates to expletive Justice, the Word Right is not to be taken in the former Signification, but in the latter. And this right is fix'd in him that receives the Thing, and not in him that bestows it; as for instance, when I pay my Servant his Wages, I am engaged in an Act of expletive Justice; not because I have a right to pay him his Wages, but because he has a right to demand it of me. Thus, I may safely say I have a right to command my Servant to take off my Shoes; but certainly 'twould be strangely impertinent to infer from thence, that therefore to command him that Service was an Act of Justice. And it is an Argument much of the same nature, to say, that because Punishment cannot lawfully be inflicted but by a Person that has authority to do it, therefore punishing is a branch of expletive Justice. Another Argument produced by Grotius, is this, "That in Crimes and Penalties there is something that much resembles the nature of Contracts; for as the Seller of any Commodity is supposed to have oblig'd himself to every thing natural to the Sale, tho' he mention nothing particularly; so every Delinquent seems voluntarily to oblige himself to be punished; for every Man's Reason tells him, that it is absolutely necessary that every great Crime should be punishable; and therefore a Man that chooseth to transgress, directly and deliberately, may by consequence be said to consent to be punished: And therefore in Scripture we find that Sin is frequently call'd by the name of a Debt, which we are as much oblig'd to discharge, as they that are under Bond to their Creditors ². To which I answer, That thus much is certain, that if a Man knows the Penalty the Law appoints for such a particular Crime, and yet is wilfully guilty of it, he can have no reason to complain of unjust usage, or to think himself hardly dealt with, when he is brought to Punishment. But it cannot from hence be infer'd, that a Man gives a direct and immediate consent to his own Punishment; or rather, that he has oblig'd himself by his own consent to suffer it; since no Man is ever guilty of a Crime, but he has some hopes, either by concealing himself, or some way or other to secure himself from Justice ³. Lasquinus indeed ^a attempts to prove, that Criminals are oblig'd by their own consent to suffer Punishment, because the penal Laws, as well as others, are made by the consent of the Subject; or at farthest, because the legislative Power is deriv'd originally from the consent and agreement of the People. But I think there is little or no force in the Argument: For as I have prov'd elsewhere, Laws are not Compacts or Agreements. And I think there is no absurdity in the thing, that I should give my consent to the Establishment of a Power, which may perhaps afterwards exercise certain Acts upon me, whether I will my self, or no. Only, I can pretend no reason of Complaint, if I do afterwards feel its severity, because I consented to such a Power. But Sin is compar'd to a Debt, not because a Man is oblig'd to consent to his own Punishment, but because the Legislator has the same right to challenge the Penalty of the Delinquent, as a Creditor has to demand the Money lent to the Debtor; and because the Body and Goods of the Offender are no less liable to the Magistrate on a criminal Account, than the Goods of the Debtor are to the Creditor in cases of Debt. In the Elements of the Roman Law, ^b Obligations are divided into such as arise from consent, and such as are the result of Transgression; but it should be observ'd, that from Transgression there arises an Obligation, only to make Satisfaction for the harm that is done, but not to suffer the Punishment: And that Obligation it self is not properly founded upon a Man's consent to the Penalty; but upon that necessity of Restitution, which, upon a Settlement of Property, evidently flows from the Law of Nature. Thus Aristotle distinguishes Contracts into the voluntary, and the involuntary ^c. But his meaning may be thus explain'd; that as in Contracts of Duty there is a return made of equal for equal, so in criminal Cases, the Satisfaction ought to be an Equivalent to the Damage. But the reason why he calls the Obligation to make Satisfaction, an involuntary Contract, is because, for Example, in cases of Debt, it depends upon the Creditor's pleasure whether the Debtor shall receive the Money, or no: But, for Example, the Obligation a Thief is under, to restore me what he has robb'd me of, or the value of it, bears no manner of relation to any consent of ² V. L. 49. t. 14. l. 34. D. de Jure Fisci. L. 9. t. 8. l. ult. C. ad L. Julian Majestatis. In Tacitus, Ann. 12. c. 53. The Woman that married another Man's Slave without the Knowledge of his Master, is said to have contented to her own Slavery.

³ THUCYDIDES, l. 3. c. 45. Edit. Oxon. init. There are several Crimes which the Commonwealth hath forbid under pain of capital Punishment; and yet Men have Hopes strong enough to persuade them to venture and run that risque; and there is no Man that will undertake an hazardous Enterprize, when he despairs of the Success of his Plot. And we never heard that one State revolted from another, which did not imagine it self stronger and better prepar'd for War.

^a Vaiq. Controv. Illustr. l. 1. c. 28. n. 12, 13.

^b Institut. L. 3. t. 4. De Obligat. l. 2.

^c See above in B. 1. c. 7. f. 12

mine, but he brings it upon himself much against my Will. For 'tis certain, I had rather he should have left me in quiet Possession of what was my own, than have given me the trouble of bringing an Action of Theft against him, especially where there is no hope of recovering more than barely the principal by it. But it may be further considered, that generally every Right has an Obligation that answers it in another Person. And therefore upon Commission of the criminal Action, the Party that is injured has a right to demand reparation for his Loss, or the harm he has suffered; and the injurious is under Obligation to make him Satisfaction; and this is the matter which executive Justice relates to. But as the criminal Action is a deviation from the Law; the Governors of the Commonwealth have power to punish as they think necessary; but the Delinquent is under no Obligation to offer himself voluntarily to be punished. For which reason the Infliction of Punishments cannot fall under executive Justice. So that it may be said, upon the whole, that Punishment does not belong to either Species of Justice, but makes a particular branch it self. Unless it may be thought more proper to say, that both the imposition of Punishments and the distribution of Rewards, which have not been determined beforehand by particular Compact, are parts of Prudence necessarily belonging to the Government of others, and therefore should be rank'd under Justice in general.

VI. It will therefore, I think, be allowed by every Man that pretends to Reason, that tho' by Nature all Men are upon the level, and Punishment it self seems to be a severe and rigid sort of Discipline, while Men endeavour only to afflict and ruin one another; and tho' the wise Creator of the World hath so disposed the nature of Man, and the events of Things, that ill Actions are generally punished by ill Consequences, which in a manner revenge themselves upon the Causes of them: yet that positive human Punishment, after all, hath nothing in it repugnant to natural Equity; but that, on the contrary, it is absolutely necessary to the common Quiet and Security of Mankind. For as it was requisite to the publick Peace of the World, to put an end to the equality of Nature, by erecting civil Governments; so in the general Looseness and Corruption of Manners, and natural Aversion to Virtue, the force of Government would soon be dissolved, if bad Men were not confin'd, and frighten'd into obedience, by the dread of some present Evil. And since every Man is beforehand told publickly what he ought to do, and what forbear doing, and what Punishments will be inflicted on such as act otherwise, no Man can blame any body but himself, if, by a wilful Transgression of the Laws, he falls under the Severity of the Punishment.

VII. As to the Persons the right of punishing is to be lodg'd in, and exercised upon, 'tis Grotius's Opinion, l. ii. c. 20. § 3. "That Nature has not given any Determination upon it. So far indeed, says he, we may discover from Nature, that 'tis most convenient, some Superior should be impower'd with it; tho' that is not absolutely necessary neither; unless we take the Word Superior in such a sense as will imply, that a Man which is guilty of a criminal Action, shall be thought to "have made himself inferior to all the rest of Mankind by that very Act. The consequence of which is, that no Man ought to be punish'd by one equally guilty with himself^a. But I confess I cannot be persuaded but that the power of Punishing is a part of Sovereignty, and consequently that no body can properly be said to inflict Punishment upon a Man, unless he has^b Authority over him. For tho' upon a view of the ill Dispositions of Men, and how easily they are inclin'd to injure and molest one another, we find it absolutely necessary to the Preservation of Society in the World, that Punishments should be inflicted; and tho' every Man ought to contribute his Actions to the support of Society, as being generally good to all Mankind; yet it does not follow that every Man is oblig'd to undertake every Action that tends to advance that end; since that would be to no purpose, without a concurrence of certain other particular Requisites. Thus, it is necessary Men should be under some sort of Government or other; tho' no body imagines, that it is left at hand in for any Man to assume a Right or Power over others as he pleases. Now then, every Evil which is inflicted upon antecedent Transgression, cannot properly be call'd Punishment, but that which was threaten'd before, and is inflicted after the Crime is known. And therefore the Evils of War, and all Acts of Hostility, must not be call'd Punishments, tho' 'tis true that we procure Caution against future Injuries by them, for in a State of War, every Man provides Caution for himself by his own force, and in what manner he pleases; but the Caution an injured Person receives from Punishments must be procured by the power, and according to the determination of the Superior; in War the injured Party only is directly concern'd to punish and suppress his Enemy: but in civil Government the whole Commonwealth is as much concern'd, as the Party that is injured, to punish a Criminal. Again, 'tis left to the Discretion of the injured only, whether he will revenge himself upon his Enemy, with a War or not; but 'tis left entirely to the Superior, whether Punishment shall be put in Execution, or not; nay, he has Power to inflict it, tho' the injured Party desire the contrary. And lastly, the quantity of the Punishment is generally determin'd, before the Fact is committed; but in War the Caution must be settled according to the Circumstances of my own, or my Enemy's Condition. But besides, tho' Nature has not determin'd, whether I, or any other particular private Man ought to have the right of inflicting Punishments, any more than it has design'd us to be Princes; yet I think it is sufficiently clear from Reason, that Punishment, as it is the Execution of a judiciary Sentence, ought to be derived from some Superior, or from a Person who has Authority over the Criminal. Neither is there any reason why we should be so nice in the Explication of the Word Superior; for 'tis absolutely false, that every Sin leaves such a blot upon a Man's Honour and Character, that he must presently be thought no better than a Beast. Neither is it good reasoning to infer, that because such a Man is guilty of such a Crime, therefore I have power to punish him. For if I suffer by the criminal Action, in a liberty of Nature, I may demand Satisfaction of him for

^a See John Ch. viii. v. 7. R 7. ii. 22.

^b See what has been said in Note 2. Sect. 4. All the Reason our Author alleges, prove nothing, unless we allow of his Definition of the Word Punishment.

the Injury, and Caution for the future in a way of War: If the Action does not affect me, but some other Person whom I am not particularly obliged to defend, I can have no more pretence to engage my self in his Cause, than I have to prescribe Laws to those that owe me no Subjection. Ex. ii. 14. It was a Saying of Democritus, That it was most agreeable to Nature, that the most deserving Person should govern; which is perhaps true enough in this sense, that where the Government is to be conferr'd upon a single Person elected by a plurality of Voices, and no one Man has any particular claim of Right to it more than another, it would be the most rational way of proceeding, to make choice of a Person of the greatest Merits, and that seem'd to be best acquainted with the Arts of Government. But such a Person can pretend to no Authority over others, except they voluntarily submit to him. As for what Grotius says, 'That a Criminal ought not to be punished by a Person as guilty as himself; this does not properly concern them that have publick Authority to punish, but only affects such People as love to censure and impeach others, barely upon their own private Authority, and out of a pretended hatred to Vice, without Warrant from any Obligations they are under by the Duties of their Office and Place. Tho' without dispute it is very unbecoming, and must necessarily lessen the respect that is due to the Magistrate and the Laws, when the Person that administers Justice, is guilty of the same Vices he punishes in others, for a Man that punishes that in others, which he allows himself to be guilty of, does not seem to be out of love with the Crime, but to envy others the enjoyment of it ^a. Yet I don't think it had been unlawful for Nero himself, after he had kill'd his Mother, to have put others to death that had been guilty of the like Crime ^b. And in this, Hubbes is of the same Opinion, Leviath. Chap. xxviii. that Punishment is derived from the Superior as such. The Definition indeed, which he gives of Punishment is hardly so full as it ought to be, containing only those Punishments that are inflicted by the civil Power, and making mention but of one End only.

Punishment, says he, is an Evil inflicted by publick Authority on him that has done or omitted that which is judg'd by the same Authority to be a Transgression of the Law, to the end that the Will of Man may thereby be the better disposed to Obedience. But he rightly infers from thence; that neither private Revenges, nor Injuries of private Men, nor Pains inflicted by publick Authority without precedent publick Condemnation; nor Evil inflicted by usurped Power, nor Harms inflicted on the Subject without regard to future good, are properly Punishments, but rather acts of Hostility. But it must be observ'd, that such false Punishments as these do not immediately place us in a State of War, or give us Licence to make use of the Liberties of an Enemy, or that a Man who has suffered such Evils is left to his Freedom to return Hostilities upon those that inflicted them. The same Author also excludes those Evils from being Punishments, which are the natural Consequences of evil Actions; as when a Man in assaulting another, is himself slain or wounded, or when he happens to fall sick upon the Commission of some unlawful Act; tho' this indeed will look like a Punishment from God. Again, he says, that when the harm inflicted is less than the benefit that naturally follows the Crime committed, it is rather the Price or Redemption, than the Punishment of a Crime. And among his Acts of Hostility, he mentions the excess of Punishment; or when a greater Punishment is inflicted than the Law allows of; and when hurt is inflicted for a fact done before any Law forbid it; and when any Evil is inflicted on the Sovereign; and when Harm is inflicted upon a declared Enemy. But what he adds to this afterwards; that one who has been a Subject, and declares himself an Enemy, is not to suffer as a Subject, but an Enemy, and therefore that such as are guilty of Treason, may be made to suffer whatsoever the Representative of the Commonwealth will, or as Enemies. I cannot agree with him; because whatever Punishment is inflicted upon Treason, is inflicted upon the Force of Authority, and proceeds from the supreme Power, tho' the Traitor himself may rebel and deny his Authority, and sometimes

^a Vide Plin. l. 8. Epist. 22. Plato Minor. He is a wicked Man that does one thing himself, and commands another. Add. Gratian. Caus. 3. Quest. 7. c. 3. 4. seqq. ^b But yet not for Domitian to punish Women convicted of Adultery, when he himself had debauch'd them. Zmaras, Tom. 3. To this we may refer that which Medea saith in Seneca's Trag. v. 500. &c.

He did the Crime, that hath th' Advantage of it, He's Innocent to You, who only was Your Instrument.

And certainly all voluntary Informers and Censurers of others, ought to take care how they fall under the reach of what Juena saith, Sat. 2. v. 23. &c.

*Loricpedem restus derideat, Aethiopen albus.
Quis tulerit Gracchos de seditione querentes?
Quis caelum terris non misceat, & mare caelo,
Si fur displiceat Verri, aut homicida Meloni,
Clodius accuset macesbos, Catilina Cethegum,
In tabulam Sylla si dicant discipuli tres?*

And again the same Satyr, v. 38.

-----*Felicitia temporis; quae te Moribus opponunt; habent jam Roma puarum.
Tertius e caelo cecidit Cato.*

Seneca, Controv. l. 2. contr. 14. There is nothing more despicable than a Man that chastises Vice, and yet imitates it. Cic. Tusc. Quest. l. 3. c. 30. It is the particular Character of Folly, that it discovers another's Faults, and forgets its own. Plant. Trucul. Act. 1. Scen. 2. v. 58. He that accuseth another of a dishonest Action, ought to be cautious himself. Ovid. Fast. l. 6. v. 647.

*Sic agitur Censura, & sic exempla parantur,
Cum Judex, alios quod monet, ipse facit*

Unenvied he a brave Example stands,
Who by his Deeds confirms what he commands,

MR. TATE.

put the Commonwealth to a Necessity of Suppressing him by Arms, before he can be proceeded against as a Criminal; as when a Man is in pursuit of his Slave who is run away, he does it by a right of Property, and not of War. I may further add, that the Evils an Enemy suffers, are none of them thought to be infamous, whereas the Infamy of it is a particular addition to the Punishment of Traitors.

VIII. The next Thing that falls under Consideration, is the End^a of Punishment, which every Man ought to propose to himself in inflicting it, after Satisfaction made for the Damage, or when the Nature of the Case will not admit of Satisfaction. And here my first Assertion is, that though it does not appear to be unjust in it self, that the Man that did Evil should suffer Evil,^b yet that Punishment ought never to be inflicted without a prospect of making some advantage from it. And therefore Hobbes makes this one of his Laws of Nature, de Civ. c. iii. s. 11. That in Revenges or Punishments, Men ought not to look at the greatness of the Evil past, but the greatness of the Good to follow; whereby we are forbidden to inflict Punishment with any other design than for the Correction of the Offender, or the Admonition of others. And 'tis Plato's Judgment^c, That a Man that acts with Prudence, will never punish barely for the past Offence; for it is impossible for him to undo what is done already; but he will always regard what is to come, either to prevent the same Offender from being guilty a second time, or else to frighten others from transgressing by his Example^d. It is indeed absolutely necessary, that some regard should be had to the Crime committed, because, without that, 'tis evident there can be no Punishment; but then the end of Punishment ought also to be considered, that a Man may not suffer Evil for what is too late for him to remedy; for tho' he be a Criminal, yet he is of the same Flesh and Blood with other Men. And Hobbes proves this Law by these two Reasons; first, Because a Man is obliged by the Law of Nature upon Caution for the future, to pardon them that repenting desire it; and secondly, Because Revenge, as it respects only the past, without regard to the Example and Profit to come, is only a triumph and glorying in the Hurt of another, tending to no End, and is therefore vain and contrary to Reason. It might perhaps be a Saying proper for an Attila^e, that he knew nothing sweeter than Revenge, and thought no Satisfaction in nature greater: But a Judge when he is forced to punish, ought by no means to take pleasure in the Sufferings of the Criminal^f.

*Qui fruitur poenâ ferus est, legumque videtur
Vindictam præstare sibi; diis proximus ille est,
Quem ratio, non ira movet: qui facta rependens
Consilio punire potest ---*

^a See Grot. B. 2. c. 20. Vid. B. de. Serm. fid. 1. 4.

^l Pindar. Nem. Od. 4. v. 52.

Πῶς αὖτις ἴδωμι τὸν ἄνθρωπον;

He that doth ill, 'tis just should suffer.
When you have had the guilty Confidence
To do a Crime, learn to submit and bear
The Punishment.

Em. 5. in. Heecub. c. 1250, 57.

^e Plato Protog. p. 226. A. B. Edit. Wech.

^d Seneca de Irâ, l. 1. c. 16. speaks to the same Sense.

^e Jornandus

de Rebus Geticis, c. 39. ^f Claud. de Cons. Miltii, v. 223, &c. Valer. Max. l. 2. c. 9. l. 3. Fulcat. Gallicanus in Avid. Cass. c. 12. It never looks well for a Prince to be guilty of Revenge, purely to satisfy his own Repentments.

^g Suetonius Aug. c. 32.

^h Seneca de Irâ, l. 1. c. 16.

ⁱ Levit. th. c. 28. Add. L. 18. c. 7. de fac. l. 7. L. de jereis exportandis.

^k Cons. Seneca de Clem. l. 1. c. 22.

^l Plato, Gorgias, 325, &c.

^m Seneca de Irâ, l. 1. c. 5.

to bring crooked Timber to straightness, by plying it over Fire, or by opening its parts for use, by the Wedge and Sawe. Though we need not go so far, as to agree to what the same Author saith in another place; That when either by our Selves, or by Friends, we have injured another Person, it is our duty immediately to apply our selves to the Magistrate to be punish'd, as we would to a Physician; lest the injurious Distemper should so far infect us, as to settle in an incurable Disease: For a Man that is of so good a Disposition, as to be in a readiness to deliver himself up to Justice to punish his own Faults, has no need of making the Magistrate his Physician, but may be safely trusted with his own Cure ¹.

X. As to the Person who is to inflict this sort of Discipline, Grotius thinks ², "That 'tis naturally free for any Man to exercise that sort of Punishment, which designeth only the Reformation of the Offender; provided he be Master of a good Judgment, and not guilty of the same Faults, or others of the like nature himself." (For they are certainly the most unpardonable Criminals, who have the Impudence to impeach others of Crimes they are guilty of themselves; and if a Man would reform others, he must first mend himself ³. "But that as to other sorts of Punishments which are of a compulsive nature, such as Whipping, Beating, and the like; Nature hath made no Distinction between the Persons that may, and those that may not, inflict them upon others; except it be, that Reason hath particularly allow'd Parents the use of this right over their Children, upon the force of natural Relation. And therefore generally the civil Laws, to prevent Confusion and Disturbances, have justly restrain'd the common Affinity of Mankind, only to the nearer branches of Blood." But there does not seem to be much Satisfaction in this; for, as I said before, no Punishment, whatever the end of it be, can be inflicted, but by the Authority of the Sovereign: And therefore all Reproof by Words looks rather like Counsel and Advice, than Punishment; which when vehemently delivered and pressed in harsh Language, seems to be founded rather upon the particular Laws of Friendship ⁴, than upon any common right. And the truth of this appears from the common return that is made to any Man, who undertakes to reprove a Person he has no acquaintance with (as Terence ⁵ represents it) Have you so little Business of your own, as to intrude into another's, and meddle with what doth not concern you? And therefore Chremes, in that Author, when he justifies his reprimanding Menedemus, appeals to the right of a Neighbour, which, he said, he thought might claim the next title to Friendship ⁶. But besides this, a very necessary part of Prudence, to know how to apply our Reproof; for an unseasonable mistake of this nature may be of very ill consequence to a Man's self, and harden the Person he intended to reform in the vicious course he was in before. Parents ⁷ indeed have a right to correct their Children upon a double Account; both because the Methods of Education, which Nature obliges them to bestow upon their Children, would be to no purpose, if they had not the Liberty, as they see occasion, to use them with a little Sharpness and Severity; and because, out of civil Government, they would have an absolute Sovereignty over them. And though in many Commonwealths this Power is reduced to a very little compass, yet they have so much almost every where left them, as giveth them leave to correct their Children at Discretion, for those petty Misbehaviours, which are the Effects rather of the levity and imprudence of Youth, than of any inveterate settled ill habits of the Mind; and which more disturb domestick Quiet, than the publick Peace. And 'tis as necessary, that such as in the Parents stead have the care of educating young People committed to them, as Tutors, Governors, and Masters ⁸, should be allowed the same Power; because they can never discharge their Duties as they should, without the moderate use of gentle Discipline ⁹.

Mr. BARB. NOTE on § IX.

¹ Apuleius de Dogm. Plat. p. 615. Edit. in opum Delph. There is more disquiet and uneasiness in the Impunity a Delinquent enjoys, than there is in the most severe Punishment. Plato de LL. l. 9. in the beginning. No Punishment appointed by Law is intended for an Evil, but only to effect one of these two Things, either to make the Offender better, or at least not so bad as he was. Aristot. Eth. ad Nicom. l. 2. c. 2. p. 20. Ed. Paris. Punishment is a sort of Physick, and Physick commonly works by contraries. Athen. de Doctrin. Platon. c. 32. 'Tis as necessary for an Offender to be punish'd, as it is for a sick Man to apply himself to the Physician: For Correction is a sort of Remedy for a vicious Mind. Tacitus, Ann. iii. c. 54. A debauched, a crazy and violent Temper, must be cooled and kept under by Restraints as strong as the force of its Lusts. Plato in Critias, in the beginning. The proper Punishment for one that transgresseth out of Negligence, is that which makes him cautious.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § X.

¹ Uerat. de Permutatione. p. 539. Edit. Paris. Laërtius Div. Inst. l. 4. c. 23. When Crispus in Tertius, Hist. l. 2. c. 10. towards the end, C. micromid Fausus, tho' he himself had been employ'd and rewarded for bringing in the kind before, 'tis said, That Punishment of the Crime did not grieve Fausus so much, as it did that such a one should inflict it. Arnobius adv. Gentes, l. 1. It is a great Injustice in you, to make that Criminal in us, which you do your selves; or to allow your selves in the Practice of those things, which you strictly forbid to others.

² 2. Curtius, l. 3. c. 12. n. 16. speaking of Hephestion, No one could take that Liberty to reprove the King which he did, which yet he was so tender of using, that the King seem'd rather to allow him in it, than he to assume it. Cic. Off. l. 1. c. 17. Advice, Persuasion, Exhortation, Consolation, and sometimes Reproof, are particularly used in Friendship. Hæc. Iliad. l. 11. v. 92. Ἄρα δὲ πᾶσι παρὲς ἔστιν ἐπέου. And to this we may refer that of Mysippus Rufus in Tacitus, Hist. l. 3. c. 81.

³ SENeca de Irâ, l. 2. c. 27. The Corrections of Parents and Masters must be look'd upon to be of the same nature with Cutting and Abstinence, and other severe Methods of Cure, which do us good when they hurt us. What Power o'her Relations have over others in this Case, may be seen L. 9. t. 5. C. de Emendatione propinquorum. PLATO de LL. l. 7. p. 893. A decree, that in his Commonwealth. Since young People are as intractable as the wildest of Beasts, those Children that were Free should be subject only to the Correction of those that had the Charge of their Education. But that any Freeman should have the Liberty to chastise any Slave, whether Boy, Master, or Tutor, if he took him in any Fault. Xen. 2d. de Repub. Lacedæmon. Lycurgus made a Law, That no Man should command his own, or another Man's Children, to do any thing but what was just. And that if a Child should be beaten by another, and complain of it to his Father, it should be thought mean and irreputable, if the Father did not Correct him again. But what, Xenophon says, l. 5. πεινᾶν δὲ οὐδενός. (That, if I strike any Man for his own good, I own I deserve to be punish'd, but then it must be so as Parents are punish'd by their Children, or Masters by their Scholars: For thus Physicians are allow'd to cut and burn their Patients, when it is in order to their Cure was only to evince that severity and moroseness of humour that was observ'd in him. But what may be laudable for a General or a Commander to do, is not therefore laudable for every one else.

⁴ L. 2. c. 20. f. 7. ⁵ Vid. Terent. Heautontimor. Act. 1. Sc. 1. v. 24, &c. ⁶ Iliad. Act. 1. Sc. 1. v. 23, &c.
⁷ V. L. 47. t. 10. l. 7. f. 3. D. de Injuriis. Libanius Declam. 20. ⁸ See Mr. N. de la Roche's Treatise of Ligen Aquilian, c. 6.

But this sort of Punishment, Grotius says, ought never to proceed so far as Death; since 'tis very absurd to hope to reform a Man by throwing him into a Condition, in which 'tis impossible for him to express any amendment: though 'tis the Opinion of some, that when a Man is grown incorrigibly vicious, 'tis just and reasonable to deprive him of Life; especially since such sort of Persons are generally very bad Neighbours to others. So Seneca says, "That Death is the best Remedy for an incorrigible Disposition; and that 'tis the safest way for him to leave the World, who is never like to be Master of himself in it ⁴." And Plato says, "That a wicked Man had better not live, since he is under a Necessity of living ill." Sulpitius Asper, in Tacitus, gave this Reason for his engaging in the Conspiracy against Nero, that it was impossible for him to stop his Cruelties otherwise; or as Suetonius telleth the Story in his Life of Nero, some of the Conspirators charg'd all the guilt of the Plot upon Nero himself; as if they could not have better express'd the respect they had for him, than by killing him, after he had dishonour'd himself by such variety of Wickedness ⁵. Yet Charity should persuade us not to be too easily prevail'd upon to give any Man over for desperate. But this sort of Punishment may also promote the good of others. For 'tis certainly sufficient Caution to others, when a Man reforms upon the sense of the severity of his Punishment; and when an incorrigible Person suffers Death, greater Security cannot be given that he will never create fresh Disturbances. And that none but such incorrigible Persons should suffer Death, may perhaps be well enough admitted, in Crimes of a lower rank, and less malignity; but Crimes of a deeper stain must not be allowed the same Privilege. For since no Man is to be declared incorrigible, till he hath been frequently guilty of the same Fault, it would be but little for the advantage of the Commonwealth, to defer the punishment of a Criminal, till he had frequently repeated perhaps the worst of Villanies.

XI. Another end of Punishment is his good, whose Interest it was the Criminal should not have offended, or who suffer'd by the other's Offence; that he may not for the future be in danger of the like injury from him, or any one else ^a. And this is to be obtained these three ways: First, by the Death of the Criminal; or Secondly, if he be allowed Life, by depriving him of Power to hurt; as by keeping him in Custody, taking his Arms, and other Instruments of Mischief from him, securing him in some distant place, and the like: or else Thirdly, by obliging him to learn, at his own Peril, not to incur further guilt, or offend any more; which falls in with the amendment, I before treated of. But now there can be no effectual way to secure the Party injured from suffering the like from other Hands, but by such a Punishment, as shall be publick, conspicuous, and make the Criminal an Example. And for this reason Malefactors are seldom executed in Prison, but in places of common resort, and with such frightful Solemnity, as may strike Terror into the Multitude. And this is an end so natural to Punishment, that when, in heat of Passion and Revenge, a Man thinks he hath had sufficient Satisfaction from the Person that had abus'd him, 'tis usual to add, as you like this, provoke me another time. But however, the Sovereign only has just power to inflict this Punishment: Though Legislators in several Commonwealths, in compliance with the fierce and obstinate Tempers of their People, have made several Allowances and Indulgences to that ill-natur'd Passion, which urges Men to prosecute their own Revenments, and do themselves Justice. The Revenger of Blood in the divine Law seemeth to have been establish'd by such an allowance ^b; except we rather think this to have been some remainder of the State of Nature. And some think they discover a Custom like this in Homer, in that Passage which relates to Theoclymenus. Indeed, I think the Law Euripides mentions, can hardly be explain'd in any other sense ^c, εργασίῳ δ' ὀσίῳ, ἀναποκτείναι δὲ μὴ that is, they made Satisfaction by Banishment, and did not kill one another; implying that the old Custom of private Revenge was abrogated, to prevent the danger of its going too far; which, in Punishments inflicted by the Magistrates, there is no fear of. It appears indeed from Homer, that it was usual to buy off the Banishment, by paying a pecuniary Mulct to the next of Kin to the Party kill'd ^d. And at this Day, in Morocco, 'tis permitted the Kindred of the murder'd Person, either to compose all difference by an agreement with the Murderer, or to dispatch him without formal Process, if publick Justice hath not apprehended him before; because it is there taken for a settled Rule, that Revenge is no Sin. And Tacitus, in his Account of the Germans, c. 21. tells us, That the Father, or the next of Kin, are under a necessity of engaging in the quarrel; but the difficulty of an Accommodation (saith

⁴ SENECA de Irâ, l. 1. c. 16. in the beginning. You are now grown incurably Wicked, and are perpetually adding one Crime to another; you no longer give your self the trouble to bring Excuses (which ill Men are seldom without) for your Vices, but think the Sin it self reason enough for you to sin on. You have such a Thirst after Wickedness, and have indulged, and pleas'd your self in it so long, that it is impossible you should quit it, till you take leave of your self. You will one time or other endeavour to lay violent Hands upon your self. Well; we will be your Friends, and remove that Madness from you, which so disorders you; and since you are so deeply engaged in your own and other Mens Punishments, will shew you all the good that is now left for you, and that is, Death. Senec. de Benef. l. 7. c. 20. Plato in Gorgia, p. 349. B. Tacitus Ann. xv. c. 53.

⁵ Sueton. Nero, c. 36. Jamblicus in Protrept. c. 2. As it is safer to apply Causticks to a Swelling, than leave it to it self; so 'tis better for a wicked Man to die than live, Rosar. Persic. c. 1. When a Man is never Innocent but in his Sleep, 'tis better he should die than live, as PLATO will have it, de LL. l. 9. p. 928. D.

^a See Grot. B. 20. c. 2. f. 8. ^b Numb. xxxv. Deut. xix. Vide Selden de J. N. & G. sec. Hebr. l. 4. c. 2. Grotius upon Exod. xxi. 12. Add Rochefort Deser. Antill. p. 2. c. 19. Homer. Odyss. 6^o v. 276. ^c Euripid. Orestes, v. 512.

^d Homer. Iliad. 9. v. 628. Vid. Apoll. Rhod. Argonaut. l. 1. v. 90.

he) is not great, for 'tis usual to expiate a Murder, by a Present of a certain number of Sheep, and other Cattle, and then all of the Family will be fully satisfied ¹.

XII. The third end of Punishment is the good of all indifferently; the Severity of the Punishment being sufficient Caution for every Man's Security ¹. The design of which sort of Punishment is, either to prevent Malefactors that have done Injuries to some, from doing the like to others; an effect to be obtain'd, either by putting them to death, by confining or disabling them in such manner, as shall deprive them of the Power of doing harm ², or by the rigour of the Punishment, overcoming their Inclinations to transgress: or else to better others, that might be encouraged by the impunity of Delinquents, from hurting and disquieting their Neighbours. And this may be effected by publick Executions, or as they are usually call'd, publick Examples, at the sight of which others are to take warning ³. And the more publick the Punishment is, the greater effect it is like to have in reforming others. The Lacedemonians had a Custom contrary to the rest of the World, in punishing their Criminals in the Night ⁴; thinking perhaps that the darkness added something to the Terror of the Punishment ⁵. And under this end of Punishment we may comprise all those Advantages, which result from the Support and Preservation of the Authority of the civil Government, among all the impudent and violent Invasions upon the Laws, which so frequently disturb and weaken it. For 'tis the Interest of the whole Commonwealth, to be concern'd for the preservation of the supreme Authority; and as long as that continues entire, the most profligate Criminals may be kept under restraint. But besides these ends of Punishment I have here mention'd, I see no necessity of allowing those other Selden mentions de J. N. & G. l. 1. c. 4. as the satisfactory, purgatorial, or expiatory, or either that the deviation from the Law may in some measure be made up, and the inequality of the Action be corrected. The Arguments he produces from Scripture, seem to relate only to divine Justice, or the particular Sanctity of the Jewish Nation.

XIII. As to those Exceptions which Grotius ⁶ adds to this Proposition, That the Infliction of all exemplary Punishments ought to be lodged in the Government of every State, it must be observed, that whatever is inflicted in certain Places, and on certain Persons, which are not subject to any determinate Court of Judicature, as for example, upon Pirates, must be reduced under the right of War, which is utterly different from the Power of punishing. For Pirates and Freebooters are common Enemies, and every Man may draw his Sword against them. 'Tis good Advice indeed which Grotius gives afterwards ⁷, that it would be the most proper method for Merchants and Seamen, before they begin their Voyage, to procure Commissions for themselves from publick Authority to take all Pirates, where ever it be their fortune to come up with them, that so, when they are obliged to it, they may engage them, not as by their own, but upon the publick Authority. The Law mentioned Deuteronomy, Chap. xiii. v. 9. doth not give every private Man right to kill the Person that would lead him into Idolatry; but only to bring him forth to Justice, that upon cognizance of the matter, the People should stone him. But yet, admitting that every private Man had Power given him to punish one convicted of such a Crime, the establishment of such a Power by a previous Law makes the private Person an Instrument of the Government; and what Actions he undertakes on this account, must be look'd upon as commanded by publick Authority ⁸. The Action of Phineas ⁹ tho' favour'd by God's particular approbation, is not an Argument to be insisted on; for such a Zeal allow'd to any Man indifferently at other times would soon confound and distract all civil Order, and give Colour and Protection to every one's Rashness and Passion ¹⁰. The Power of Life and Death, which in some Commonwealths, Masters of Families have over their Children and Servants, tho' it does not originally flow from the Commonwealth, yet under civil Government we may imagine it to be a branch of publick Authority, which the Sovereign permits Heads of Families to exercise over those under their Charge. And there is no reason to the contrary,

Mr. BARB. NOTE on § XI.

¹ Vid. Dionys. Halicarnass. l. 1. p. 68. Edit. Lips. Leaving Numitor to inflict the Punishments as he pleas'd, because he thought it reasonable, that the Party that was injured should have the Right to punish.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XII.

¹ PLATO de LL. II. p. 977. B. Criminals are punish'd, not because they have offended, for what is done can never be undone; but that for the future the Criminals themselves, and such as see their Crimes punish'd, may take warning, and be put out of love to Vice. TULLUS in Livy, l. 1. c. 28. Let others at their Peril, attempt the like afterwards, when I have made him an Example to all Mankind.-----And let the World learn, by your Punishment, to think those things sacred which you have violated. Livy l. 1. c. 33. Ancus built a Prison in the middle of the City, just by the Forum, to frighten the growing boldness of Vice. Add. Agathias, l. 4. init. Lucian. Phalaris, 1. p. 735. in fin. It would be to no purpose to expect any benefit from any thing, if Malefactors were not perpetually terrified by the fears and expectations of Punishments.

² Gunth. Ligurin. l. 1. c. 527, &c.

*Nec melius stultæ, furor atque superbia, plebis
Puniri poterat, quam tantæ causa tumoris
Eriperentur opes, ut, quos opulencia dudum
Fecerat elatos, in se revocaret egestas.*

What happier Art could he have us'd t'assuage
A haughty Town, and a bold Faction's Rage;
Than to deprive them of that Wealth, from whence
The fatal Ills unhappily commence?
Seditions are by Wealth and Ease maintain'd,
But soon by Want and Poverty reclaim'd.

Speaking of the Citizens of Utrecht, who had been fined a great Sum of Money by Frederick, for an Insurrection there.

³ Vide L. 9. t. 27. l. 1. C. ad L. Jul. repetund. L. 9. t. 20. l. 7. C. ad L. Fabiam de Plagiar. Quintil. Declam. 274. When Criminals are executed, the most publick Places are chosen, where there will be the greatest Number of Spectators, and so the most, for the fear of the Punishment to work upon 'em. Senec. de Ira, l. 3, c. 19. The more publick the Punishments are, the greater Effect will they have upon the Reformation of others.

⁴ Herodot. Melpom. p. 107. Edit. H. Steph.

⁵ Comp. Val. Max. l. 2. c. 9, f. 3.

⁶ L. 2. c. 20. f. 9.

⁷ Ubi supra, f. 14.

⁸ See Grotius upon the Place.

⁹ Numb. xxv.

¹⁰ V. Selden de J. N. & G. &c. l. 4. c. 4.

why there may not be a Magistrate in every Commonwealth, who in certain Cases may be allow'd Power to punish Criminals extraordinarily, without any judicial hearing, provided care be taken he shall not abuse an Authority of so large extent. Thus when the Government sets a certain price upon the Head of a Traytor, the Person that kills him, is supposed to do it by publick Authority; for altho' such a Declaration has not always the force of a Command, yet when the Traytor is kill'd upon a view of that encouragement, the action may be defended as undertaken by publick Allowance and Authority^a. Grotius, in his Comment upon Esther, Cap. ix. v. 10. observes, That it was an Opinion which obtain'd among the Jews, that if any Man attempted to betray an Israelite, or his Estate, to the Gentiles, or put any publick Affront upon the whole Body of their Nation, that it would be no Sin for a Jew to kill him, his Estate being left his Heirs. But the Liberty which the Jews at that Time took in the Execution of their Revenge, does not seem to be agreeable to the nature of the civil Government. There is a Law mention'd in Andocides, Orat. 1. That if any Person attempted the Subversion of the Democracy at Athens, or if any Person, upon the dissolution of the popular form of Government, should create any Magistrate, he should be pronounced an Enemy to the State; and no body that kill'd him should be punishable; and then follows the Oath which all the Athenian Tribes engag'd in, to kill the Person that should do so. And Valerius instituted a Law at Rome, That no Magistrate should ever be created, from whom there should lie no appeal; and that it should be lawful to kill any Person that should make such a Magistrate. And that it should not be capital for any Man that did kill him^b. And the Pauchæi are said to have lookt upon it as unlawful for their Priests to pass the borders of their consecrated Country; and if any Man found them without those Limits, he was allow'd to kill them^c. Here therefore we may observe, that in these, and all other Laws of the like nature, upon such evidence of the fact, as admits of no scruple and dispute, the general Edict has the force of a positive Sentence of Condemnation; and the Death of the Person that follows upon it, seems to be authorized by the command of the Magistrate^d; and if a private Man, upon the influence and instigation of such a Law (supposing the Reasons of it be just) should kill the Party, he will not only be indemnified in the civil Court, but may be fairly acquitted by his own Conscience, so he was not induc'd to that action by any private grudge or resentment, but barely by a belief, that by such an action he should do good to his Country; and especially, if the reason why the Law permitted or commanded any Man to be the Executioner of the Penalty was, that the Commonwealth was in imminent Danger from such treasonable Attempts. But the Case is different as to the Blood which is spilt upon an Indulgence, the Law sometimes alloweth to a just Concern and over violent Passion; which only takes off the civil Punishment, but doth not excuse the guilt of the act. Of this nature are the Laws which permit Husbands to kill Adulterers and their Wives, when they surprize them in the Act; for human Laws pardon only the violence of a Discontent conceiv'd upon the most severe Injuries. Though possibly it might be a more convenient way, to leave such Injuries to be punisht by the Magistrate, so the Commonwealth might be in no danger by the delay of the Revenge^e.

XIV. But notwithstanding, from the ends of Punishment, and the State of human Nature, 'tis manifest, there may be some Actions in themselves evil, which yet it wou'd be needless, and to no purpose for human Justice to punish. Such as are, first, Acts meerly internal, as sinful Thoughts, evil Inclinations and Desires; though it may afterwards happen, they may (as suppose by a subsequent Confession) be discover'd^f. For since no Man is injur'd by such an internal Motion, no Man can be concern'd for the Punishment of it^g. 'Tis true indeed, as Philo saith, That while we entertain, tho' it be only, our Imagination, with bad Thoughts, we are guilty of those Thoughts: but this holds true with Relation only to divine Justice. Though Grotius in his Comment upon the 5th of St. Matthew, v. 28. shews from several Testimonies of Heathen Writers, that such Thoughts, from bare Reason only, may be proved to be real Sins^h. But 'tis a quite different thing, when the internal Acts are considered in Conjunction with the external; for the influence these have upon the Quantity and Quality of our Actions, is very considerable. And therefore many Crimes are punish'd, which have yet been stopt in the Attempt, and fail'd of final Successⁱ. But besides, it would be too rigorous to make every Peccadillo subject to the severity of human Punishments, since, in the present state of human Nature, the greatest Caution and Intention imaginable, is not sufficient to guard us from a Multitude of

MR. BARB. NOTE on § XIV.

^a Add. Bodinus de Repub. l. 4. c. 7. p. m. 734. Amnianus Marcellinus gives us a very strange Instance of Calumny, l. 15. c. 2. The Story he tells is of one Mercurius, whose Practice it was, when any Man happen'd to tell his Friend his Dreams, (and Dreams in Nature we know use to be odd and extravagant) to paint them in the worst Colours his Malice could give them, and then represent them to the suspicious Emperor: upon which the Dreamer was Indicted, as guilty of as great and high a Misdemeanour, as if he had actually committed some unpardonable Fact. So that when this came to be publickly known, People were so far from telling their Dreams before strange Company, that they would hardly own that they had been asleep. And some Learned Men were concern'd, that it was not their Fortune to be born among the Atlantæi, where they say, no body Dreams.

^b Add. C. L. 3. t. 27. Quando liceat unicuique, sine iudice se vindicare, vel publicam devotionem. L. 1. ^c Diodorus Siculus, l. 1. c. 46. ^d Vide Grot. L. 2. c. 20. f. 17. ^e Vide Gratian Can. quicumque, &c. Cauf. 33. Qu. 8. Senec. Controv. l. 1. Controv. 4. l. 4. Controv. 24. Xenoph. de Educat. Cyri. l. 3. p. 41. Edit. H. Steph. Valer. Max. l. 6. c. 1. f. 13. Bæcher ad Grot. l. 2. c. 1. f. 14. Ant. Matthæus de Criminib. ad L. 48. D. t. 5. Grot. in flor. sparf. ad Jus Justinian. ad L. 48. t. 5. D. l. 22. f. 4. ad L. Jul. de Adult. ^f Ad Grotius Imper. de Summar. Potest. circa sacra, c. 3. f. 1. ^g Cogitationis pœnam nemo patitur. Vide L. 48. t. 19. l. 18. de Pœnis. Philo Lib. quod det. pot. infid. The Origines Juris Civilis by Mr. Gracina, Lib. 3. p. 584. & seqq. and the Observationes Jur. Civil. by Mr. Bynckerhoek, Lib. 3. Chap. 10. ^h Vide Grot. in Flor. sparf. ad Lib. 48. t. 8. l. 14. D. ad L. Cornel. de Sicariis.

Slips and Infirmities. And therefore Themistius ^a when he had divided Mens Failings into three sorts, viz. Misfortunes, Mistakes, and criminal Actions, very justly adds, that a Prince ought to pity the first correct the second, and punish the third ^b. 'Tis said of Alphonfus King of Arragon, "That having carefully read over the whole Body of the Portugueze Laws, he highly commended the Wisdom, and the Order, and Administration that was observed in the Commonwealth; but was as much displeas'd to find so many particular Laws calculated for the most trivial and minute Cases; and to expose the scrupulous exactness of them, he ask'd the Portugueze, in way of raillery, How a Man was to be punished that set his Foot to the Ground ^c? Grotius, in his 2d Book, C. xx. § 19. speaking to this Subject, seems not to have said what is exactly proper, or true: Our slips and failings, saith he, can hardly be call'd sins; because, if we consider them in the general, they are not committed with that liberty, which in particular they seem to be: for I can't think it is a Consequence, that if it be morally impossible, but a Man must fall into some Sins; therefore such Sins of daily Infirmity, or Incurfion, as they are call'd, cease to have the nature of Sin. He adds in the same Chapter, that those Sins do not deserve punishment, which neither directly, nor indirectly, bear any relation to human Society, or other Persons; for that there can be no reason, why we should not leave such Sins to be punished by GOD Almighty, who has the highest Wisdom to know them, the greatest Justice to examine them, and the most absolute Power to punish them; and that therefore 'tis without any prospect of Advantage, and consequently to no purpose for Men to institute such Punishments. Though, I think, it may be very well made a Question, whether there be any such Sins as those he speaks of, if we except Thoughts before they are produced into Action. Besides, the civil Laws deny to some Acts the power of producing an Action, or exempt them from human Penalties; either for publick Peace and Quiet, or upon other reasonable Accounts; sometimes it may be supposed that a certain Action would look better, if it could not seem to have been undertaken upon fear of human Punishment, sometimes the matter may be too frivolous to give the Judges the trouble of hearing it; or perhaps be too perplex and intricate, to be determin'd; or when the evil is grown inveterate, and so rooted in the Temper of the People, that it is not likely to be suppress'd without a Convulsion, which might prove fatal to the Commonwealth ^d; or else to prevent an unreasonable Increase of Suits at Law ^e. In fine, it is absolutely necessary, that all those Diforders of the Mind, which are the Effects of the common Corruption of Mankind, should be exempted from Punishment; since they are so general, that 'tis impossible but all civil Government should be dissolv'd, if such Sins should fall under the Severity of human Penalty, before they discover themselves by an open Enormity; such as are Avarice, Ambition, Inhumanity, Ingratitude, Hypocrisy, Envy, Detraction, Pride, Anger, Discord, and the like: all which Vices, it was our Saviour's great Design, by the Holiness of his Doctrine, to extirpate and suppress. For 'tis certainly true, as Seneca says, "That if every Man was to be punish'd that was of a wicked and deprav'd Disposition, none could be excus'd from Punishment ^f."

XV. But neither is it always necessary that such Misdemeanours, as may properly be punished by the civil Court, should therefore always be punish'd by it ^g; but there may be sometimes room left for Pardon. The Stoicks indeed, as Stobaeus ^h represents them, were violent against this Opinion: For a wise Man, they said, ought never to pardon any Body; because the Person that pardons must suppose that it was not the Offender's Fault that he transgress'd; tho' 'tis certain, that every Man's own natural Depravity is the cause of his Transgression: And therefore 'tis still true, that Offenders ought not to be pardoned. What they meant by this Argument seems to be this: Either 'tis a Man's own Fault that he offends, or is it not; if it be not his Fault, there is no Offence committed, since every Man transgresses from his own natural Depravity, and therefore in this case there is no need of Pardon; and if it be a Man's own Fault, then he can't be admitted to Pardon, because Pardon is not to be allowed to any wilful Transgressors. Which Reason manifestly begs the thing in dispute. They add, that a good Man is not to be compassionate or merciful; for a compassionate or merciful Man deprecates and endeavours to alleviate the Punishment a Criminal deserves, but every Man ought to have Retribution made him, according to his Deserts. But now, the nature of Desert or Merit is different with respect to good, and with respect to evil. The good which is due to a Man cannot in Justice be denied him; but the Nature of evil is such (it not intending the Benefit of the Person that must suffer it) that it is no Injury to deny it him. They argue further, that a Man cannot be inclinable to Mercy, without thinking that the Punishments, which the Law appoints for Delinquents, are too severe; or that the Legislator has prescrib'd Penalties without due regard to Fact. But this is still but weak Reasoning. For 'tis no Contradiction, that the

^a Orat. IX. ad Valentin. Jun. Ad. Sanderfon. de Juram. Oblig. Praelect. 3. f. 18.

^b Hier Olorius, l. X.

^c Julianus in Caesaribus de Probo. 'Tis very difficult for a Man to govern an Horse, or any other Beast, and much more Men, without indulging them in some things they have an Inclination to; as Physicians usually allow their Patients in little Irregularities, that they may be the stricter in the Observation of the great and chief Prescriptions. The great Lord SHAFESBURY, in an imperfect Piece of Mr. Lockes, says, "That in every Person, there are two Men, the one Wise, and the other a Fool; and you must allow 'em the Liberty of following their Genius, each in his turn. But if you pretend to have the Wise, the Grave, and the Serious one, always sit at the Helm, the Fool will grow so uneasy and troublefome, that he will disorder the Wise one, and render him incapable of doing any thing: You must let the Fool also in his turn, have the Freedom to follow his Whims, to play, and divert himself according to his own Fancy, if you will have your Affairs go on smoothly and easily."

^d To this purpose is Tiberius's Epistle about Luxury, Tacitus, Ann. iii. 53.

^e Add. Seneca

de Clementia L. 1. c. 22.

^f De Ira, l. 2. c. 31, in fin.

^g V. l. Grot. ubi supra, l. 21.

^h Stob. Serm. XLIV.

Punishments prescrib'd by the Law may be just, and yet may sometimes be mitigated; for the Law determines only in general, what Punishments are to be inflict'd on such and such Crimes, without consideration of the particular Circumstances which may sometimes happen, in certain Persons, in certain States and Conditions of the Commonwealth. But particular Men are pardon'd for certain Reasons, which do not take place either in all Offenders, or at all Times. Seneca ^a, in his Book de Clementia, says, That Pardon is a Remission of the Punishment which is due (pœnâ delictæ) but that a wise Man always doth what he ought to do. But here the Mistake lies in the word due (debitæ) for if it be meant, that Punishment is due to Offenders; that is, that an Offender may be punished without injury or just occasion of Complaint; in this sense it will not follow, that if a Man doth not Punish an Offender, he doth what he ought not to do: For a Man may very justly and lawfully do many things, which he is not always necessarily oblig'd to do. Besides, as it is a mistake to say, that Punishment is due to an Offender, meaning by it, that there is an inherent Right in the Delinquent which the Punishment is to satisfy (for I think no Man ever complain'd that his Punishment was remitted; except it may be said, that a Man may wish that such Correction, as might have reclaim'd him when he was young, was neglected, when he finds that his childish Levities and Faults are grown up into bold and manly Vices) so 'tis improper to say, that a Delinquent ought to suffer Punishment (pœnam dare) meaning by it, that he is under an Obligation to suffer it: the reason of which I have explain'd before. But if by the Word due (debita) it be understood, that a wise Man is oblig'd to inflict the Punishment; I answer, first, That no Man can be under any such Obligation, unless the executive Power of the Laws be either publickly or privately committed to his Care. And, secondly, That the Obligation which lies upon the Governors, doth not relate to the Delinquent, but to the whole Commonwealth or Society, whose safety they are bound to provide for, and especially this way, by punishing the Insolence of Offenders; which if they neglect to do, there is no Injury done the Criminals, but they have violated the Obligations which they owe to the Commonwealth. But 'tis evident, that the Peace and Safety of the Commonwealth is so far from being subverted, that it is sometimes secured and establish'd by granting Pardon, in proper Times and Places.

XVI. Grotius, l. ii. c. 20. Sect. 21, 22. says, That there is room for Pardon even antecedently to the penal Law; but this ought to be dexterously explain'd, otherwise it will appear to be but a very vulgar Thought, that where there is no Law, there is no Punishment, no Transgression, or Pardon of Transgression. And a penal Law is not only a Law, which defines the particular sort of Punishment; but that Law also is a penal Law, which leaves the Determination of the Quality and Quantity of the Punishment to the Discretion of the Judge. Here therefore it must be observ'd, that in Commonwealths which have no written Laws, the Laws of Nature serve instead of civil Laws, and Justice is administr'd according to them; and Persons transgressing them are punish'd at the Pleasure of the Judge: but even, where the civil Laws are written, yet since it is impossible they should be so express and particular, as to comprise all that variety and compass of Action, in which Mens Impieties may be discover'd; it is necessary that Reason and the Law of Nature should supply the Defects of the civil Law: and where the express penal Sanction is not sufficient, it must be left to the Discretion of the Judge to determine the Penalty ^b. And thus we may understand how Punishment came to take place antecedently to the penal Laws ^c. But although, in such Commonwealths, the Magistracy hath Power to inflict Punishment on Malefactors, yet this is no Reason why every Malefactor should be punish'd; but that must depend upon the Connexion there is between those Ends for which Punishments were at first instituted, and the Punishment it self. And therefore, if in a particular Case, those Ends, upon a moral Estimation, do not appear to be necessary; as suppose, first, 'tis thought most advisable, that such a particular Crime should not be divulg'd; or, secondly, if there be other opposite Ends of no less Utility and Necessity, as suppose, the same, or a greater Good might be obtain'd by omitting the Punishment; or, lastly, if the Ends propos'd by punishing, may be more conveniently obtain'd some other way; I can see no direct Obligation that lies upon the civil Court to inflict Punishment ^d. To instance in the first Case, we must imagine some Sin, which is not yet grown into common Acquaintance, and in consequence, the publick Impeachment and Prosecution of which will appear neither necessary, nor safe: for many Mens Obedience depends more upon their Simplicity and Ignorance of Vice, than any real Love they entertain for Virtue; and the punishing such a Crime, so new and strange, would not frighten so much, as sollicite and provoke their perverse Curiosity, to make an Experiment upon it too, and to love what is forbidden them. For this reason, 'tis said, Solon instituted no Law against Parricide, that he might not seem by forbidding it, to have put People in mind of it ^e. And Busbequius tells us, "That the Turks seldom make Inquiries after secret Criminals, for fear they should only find Occasion for Scandal; but that every open Breach of Law they severely punish ^f. An Instance to the second Case may be conceiv'd in a

^a Senec. de Clementia, l. 2. c. 7. in fin. Vid. Ciceron. Orat. pro Muræna, C. 29.

^b Lycurgus contra Leocratem. It was not through any oversight in the Legislators, that the Punishments for such Crimes happen'd to be omitted; but because in the first Times there were no such Actions ever heard of.

^c And from hence that Passage in Cicero may be explain'd, l. 1. in Verrem. c. 42. No Law takes cognizance of the Time past, except it be in a Thing in its own nature criminal and wicked, so that if there were no Law in force, it ought nevertheless to be absolutely avoided.

^d V. Gratian. Caus. 23. Quæst. 3. c. 18, 24.

^e Apuleius Metamorph. l. 10. p. 319. Edit. in usum Delph. 'Tis the same thing almost, not to be, and not to be known.

^f Which is almost the same with the Counsel Mæcenas gave Augustus concerning the Imposition of Punishments. Dio. Cassius, l. 52.

Criminal who pleads his own, or his Parents, or his Ancestors Merits to balance his present Transgression; for it may sometimes be equally, or perhaps more beneficial to the Commonwealth, to reward a brave Action of a particular nature, than to punish a bad one: and the Expectation of future Benefits, as well as the Memory of past, may be thought sufficient to expiate the Crime, For though what is once ill done can never be remedied, yet it may be atoned for by the brave Actions of the same Persons afterwards, and so be honourably forgotten^a. An Instance in the third Case may be taken from a Man who is won by good Advice to reform, makes a verbal Satisfaction to the Person injur'd, and giveth Security that there shall be no further occasion of Punishments to these ends, and that his Fault shall not be of any mischievous Influence. And then Seneca himself says^b, "That a wise Man will be very ready to pardon a guilty Person, when his Sorrow for his Fault giveth him promising hopes of amendment; and when he perceives he acted not by Principle, but only out of Rashness and Folly; nor will the Impunity so given either be dangerous to the Person that receives, or to him that gives it." From all which, by the way, it appears how far a Crime may be released by Composition and Agreement with the Accuser or injured Party; namely, that they may safely remit and forgive it, so far as their private Concerns are engaged in it; but that no particular Composition with them can supersede or prejudice the right of the Commonwealth. And therefore such agreements between private Men may take away the second end of Punishment, but not the third^c. But to this Case we may reduce those Misbehaviours which we commonly call Follies of Youth, which any Man of candid Temper is willing to pardon; since, when the warmth of that Age is over, Men usually admit of cooler and more sober Thoughts^d. And so also, when a Man has been injured^e, as he thinks the Injury much the less, if the injurious Party confesses, that it was a rash and inconsiderate Action; so in all such Cases he will be more inclined to pardon than punish^f. For since all sorts of Punishment, and especially the more severe, seem to have something in them, which, consider'd in its self, is, though not repugnant to Justice, yet contrary to that Love and Affection, which should be the result of the common Affinity of Mankind; upon this account Reason will easily permit the Punishment should be sometimes superseded. And so we find Plutarch reasoning^g, "Why, says he, were the Rods and Ax always carried tied and bound up before the Roman Magistrates? unless either to signify to us, that their Anger ought not to be left loose and unconfid'd; or else that the slow unbinding the Instruments of Execution might give them occasion to demur and delay Sentence; and, as it hath sometimes happen'd, to reverse the Punishment, after it hath been pronounced^h?" For some Vices are curable, others are past Remedy; the Rods are to correct those that may be reform'd, and the Ax cut off what there is no hopes of amending". For sometimes a greater and juster Charity forces Justice to inflict the Punishment, that the pardoning one Man might not incommode many others: For 'tis but cruel Compassion to spare one Malefactor to the wrong and hazard of a number of innocent Personsⁱ. King James in his Donum Regium, l. ii. gives us this Catalogue of Crimes that ought never to be pardoned; namely, Sorcery, Robbery, Incest, Sodomy, Witchcraft, falsifying the Coin, Oppression or publick Violence. In these Cases I have mentioned, therefore, the Stoicks, say, A wise Man would spare, and not pardon^k.

MR. BARR. NOTE on § XVI.

^a The Words which our Author here makes use of, shew that he had in view a Passage of SENECA'S, quoted by GROTIUS, Sect. 22. Numb. 1. But as that great Man has manifestly cited it without Book (for he does not so much as mention the Treatise where it is) so he entirely changes and perverts the Thought of the Stoick Philosopher, in writing Injuriam instead of Injuria: And it is surprizing, that this oversight was not taken notice of by GRONOVIVS, who, before his writing a Comment on Grotius de Jure Belli & Pacis, had publish'd an Edition of Seneca. The Philosopher handles this Question, whether we are oblig'd to shew any acknowledgement of gratitude to a Person, who, after he has been serviceable to us, does us an Injury? And he concludes, that the Injury effaces the former Service or Benefit. Quomodo si quis scriptis nostris alios supernè imprimat versus, priores litteras non tollit, sed abscondit; sic beneficium SUPERVENIENS INJURIA adparere non patitur. De Benefic. Lib. vi. Cap. vi. in fine. GROTIUS on the contrary, makes him say, That the Benefits efface the Injury. But this last Maxim will be better illustrated by the following Passage in CICERO, to which GRONOVIVS refers in his Notes, and which that great Orator made use of in an Oration in favour of Julius Cæsar; Si jam violentior aliquà in re C. Cæsar fuisset, si cum magnitudine contentions, studium Gloriæ, præstans Animus, excellens nobilitas, aliquo impulisset ---- maximis rebus, quas postea gessit, obliterandum. Orat. in Vatin. Cap. vi. To which may be added, that Law of the Digests, that allows Pardon to a Deserter, who since his Desertion has discover'd a considerable Gang of Robbers, or several other Deserters. L. xlix. tit. xvi. de re militari Leg. v. Sect. 8.

^a Procop. Hist. Vandal. l. 2. c. 16. ^b Seneca de Ira, l. 1. c. 16. p. 20. Edit. Gronov. ^c Tacitus, Ann. iii. c. 70. There was Reason why he ought to be slow in pardoning the Indignities offer'd to himself, that he might be cautious how he forgave those that injured the Publick. ^d Juvenal, Sat. viii. v. 166, &c.

Quædam cum prima rejecantur crimina barba.

Some Faults of course with Childhood end.

Vid. Aristot. Rhet. l. 2. c. 3. init.

^e Vid. Arrian. de Expedit. Alexand. magn. l. 7.

^f V. Grot. l. 2. c. 20. s. 22.

^g Plut. Quæst. Rom. 82.

^h Juvenal, Sat. vi. v. 220. Nulla unquam de morte hominis cunctatio longa est.

ⁱ Julian. in fin. Misopog. p. 371. Ed. Spanhem.

'Tis an Encouragement to the growth of Wickedness, to shew any Favour to Thieves and Villains. Appianus Alexand. Mithrid. Bello, p. 250. Ed. H. Steph. There is nothing more ungrateful than a pardon'd Criminal. And therefore none ought to be pardon'd, but such as repent of their Wickedness.

^k Guntb. Ligurin. l. 1. v. 478, &c.

-----*Plus sæpe nocet sapientia Regis,
Quam rigor: ille nocet paucis, hic incitat omnes
Dum se ferre suos sperant impune reatus.*

Excess of Mildness in indulgent Kings,
More Danger, than the strictest Rigour brings.
Some few perhaps may by Injustice die,
But who can any pleasing Sin deny,
Secure of Pardon and Impunity?

Sadus Rosar. Perf. c. 8. 'Tis brave and generous to forgive. But there is no Reason we should find a Cure for his Wounds, who hath been a publick Enemy. A Man ought to think it an Injury to Mankind to let go a Serpent. To this relates what Lepidus said in Tacitus, Ann. 2. when he was against dealing severely with the foolish Poet; If he be pardon'd, the Commonwealth will be in no Danger by it; and if he be punish'd, his Example will have no Effect.

But

But 'tis a ridiculous Nicety to refuse to call that a pardoning with the rest of the World, which they themselves will have to be sparing; and 'tis certainly beneath Men of Sense to dispute about Words, when the Sense of the thing is agreed upon.

XVII. But after the Establishment of the penal Law, the Difficulty seems to be greater, how the Delinquent can be excused from Punishment ^a. For there seems to be more room left for Pardon, where the Penalty is arbitrary, than where 'tis expressly determin'd by a Law; and that, not so much, because 'tis expected that the Legislator should act conformably to his own Laws; as because the Authority of the Laws will be lost, if the due Execution of them is without good reason neglected; and because the Magistrate himself would seem to invite others to transgress, when the hopes of Pardon which he gives the Criminal is equal, or greater than the fear of Punishment ^b ^c. Therefore, though the force of human Laws depends upon the Will of Man, not only as to their Original, but also as to their Continuance; yet they ought not, but upon very urgent and weighty Reasons, to be alter'd or repeal'd. For this would be a breach of the Rules of Prudence in the Art of Government. But I don't know whether it be not a more dangerous Mistake, without very good Reason, to suspend the Execution of a Law still in force, for the sake of certain Persons; than utterly to abrogate it: since generally, none of the common grievances of Men seem more insupportable than this, that Persons of equal Merit are not used with equal Justice. But notwithstanding, as the Sovereign may, when he sees good reason for it, repeal an intire positive Law; so he has Power to suspend its Effect, with regard to certain Persons, and certain Crimes, the Law in other respects being still in force. The Sovereign I say; for subordinate Judges are not to make or alter Laws, but only to pass Sentence, according to those already made ^d. Grotius, in the Chapter beforemention'd, Sect. 25, 26. distinguishes the Reasons of Pardon given after the penal Law, into intrinick and extrinick. The intrinick Reason, according to him, is, when the Punishment would not be unjust, as being before lawfully enacted and promulg'd, but however has the Appearance of too much Severity, when set in Comparison with the Fact; though I confess, I should think, that if the Penalty the Law enforces be in general too severe, it would be a wiser Method to correct the Law it self, than to Pardon some few, and leave others expos'd to the Rigour of the Punishment. But undoubtedly Judges are obliged, upon all rules of Equity, if not entirely to remit, at least to mitigate the Punishment, when they find, in certain particular Facts, a Concurrency of Circumstances, that alleviate the Crime, as to the Quantity and Quality the Law supposes. In which Cases the Fact it self hath the intrinick Grounds, though not of Pardon, yet of some Mitigation of the Penalty adherent to it. And therefore, I am of Opinion, 'twould be much more proper, to allow of no other but the external Causes of relaxing Punishment; such as the former Deserts of the Criminal himself, the Merits of his Family, or Relations, or some other commendable Action or Thing; or lastly, the Hopes that the Delinquent may make amends for his Fault by many good Actions afterward. And therefore, Tully saith ^e, That a Man that petitions for Pardon, should first of all put the Judges in remembrance, what good things he hath formerly done, and shew how they overbalance the Guilt of his present Crime; and that, in short, he has been the Cause of more Good, than Evil: And then, saith he, in the next place, he should recount the good Actions of his Family, whatever he thinks proper to be insisted on, and then he is to prove that he did not commit the Fact either out of Malice, or Cruelty, but out of Rashness, or from some other Person's Instigation, or upon any other creditable or honourable Cause, which engag'd him in it; and after all make what Promises, and give what Assurance he is able, that the Sense of his Crime, and the Lenity of the Judges in pardoning him, shall have such an Influence upon him for the future, as shall entirely restrain him from ever attempting the like again. And thus it hath been usual to Pardon some Criminals, upon the Desert and Merit of their Ancestors, or at the request of Men in favour. 'Tis related of the Emperor Hadrian, that he alleviated the Punishment of Criminals, according to the number of Children they had ^f. And some have been acquitted, because they happen'd to be the last of noble and illustrious Families. Phryne, an Athenian Courtisan, when she was tried for her Life, was brought off by the Art of Lyfias the Orator ^g, who took off her upper Garment, and expos'd her naked Breast to the Court. And M. Antony the Roman Orator, brought off M. Aquilius, when he was plainly convicted of Bribery, by the like Art. For bringing him in publick View into the Court, at the Close of his Defence he open'd his Bosom, and shew'd the People the honourable Wounds he had receiv'd there ^h. Polydore Virgil relates it, as a Custom which obtain'd formerly in England, that no Criminals, except such as were convicted of Treason, suffer'd Death, but were condemned only to perpetual Imprisonment, if they could but read ⁱ. And these Reasons will appear more Satisfactory, if upon Examination of the Fact, it seems to be particularly exempted from the Reason of the Law. The general Reason indeed, for the Observation of every Law, is the Authority and Will of the sovereign Legislator;

^a Vid. Grot. l. 2. c. 20. f. 24.

^b See above in B. 1. c. 6. f. 17.

^c Arnob. l. 7. The Number of Criminals certainly increaseth, according to the Hopes they have of buying off their Crimes; and Men are less scrupulous of offending, when they see the Favour of a Pardon is easily purchas'd.

^d Lyfias ii. Orat. 13. c. 3. in Alcibiad. Themistius, Orat. 9. de Humanitate Theodosii. There is a great difference between the Power and the Duty of a Prince, and a Judge; the latter is to be directed by the Laws, the former may amend and alter them, alleviate and soften their Rigour and Severity; as being himself a living Law, L. 40. t. 9. l. 12. f. 1. qui, & a quibus manumiss. & L. 49. t. 8. l. 1. f. 2. D. quæ sentent. sine Appellat. rescind.

^e Cic. de Invent. l. 2. c. 35.

^f Vid. Xiphilin. Epit. Dion. Vid. Liv. L. 8. c. 35.

^g The Orator was Hyperides and not Lyfias, V. Athen. l. 13. Angl. l. 26.

^h Herodot. Thali, p. 112. Ed. H. Steph.

ⁱ P. lyd. Virg. Hist.

which, when there appears no other Reason, is Reason sufficient; but the particular is either some Benefit likely to accrue to the Commonwealth, or some Inconvenience which may be avoided, by the Observation of the Law; as for Example, let us imagine some place where sumptuary Laws are in force; the general Reason of these Laws is the Will of the Legislator; the particular, that the Estates of the private Subjects may not be wasted or squandered away by extravagant and unnecessary Charges; and in this Instance, though the general Reason of the Law may be enough to support the Authority of it; yet when the particular Reason of it ceases, the Punishment may justly be remitted with greater Ease, and less Discredit to the Authority of the Law; as for Example, in this Case, if we suppose the Offender in such plentiful Circumstances, as to be out of Danger of being reduced to Poverty by the Vanity and Lavishness of his Expences. Rigid Governments indeed will hardly bear Neglect in the Execution of their Laws or Commands, only because the particular Reason of them is ceas'd. As 'tis said, Cambyses was very well pleas'd that Craesus was saved, but yet put the Persons to Death that spared him, for their Remissness in Executing his Commands. Again, it may be a reasonable Plea for Pardon, either when a Man is intangled in a Crime through Ignorance, though perhaps not such an Ignorance as wholly dischargeth the Fault, but such as might proceed from Remissness or Negligence; or if he were taken with any sudden Weakness or Disorder of Mind, which could not be easily prevented or overcome. Under the first of these we may place the Misfortune of Charondas, in Diod. Siculus, who came through Inadvertency with a Sword on into a Publick Assembly, contrary to a Law he himself had made; and therefore I think he had no Reason, upon that Account, to lay violent hands upon himself^a. There is another Story in the same Author, of Diocles the Syracusan^b, who instituted a Law, by which it was made Death for any Man to be seen arm'd in the Forum, without any Allowances to be made for Inadvertency, or any other Circumstances; and yet he, upon the news that the Enemy had made an Incurfion into his Territories, arm'd himself, and hearing that there was a Sedition rais'd in the Forum, went thither with his Sword on; but being told of it by a private Person, kill'd himself with it. But indeed there was no Pity due to him, because in his Law he had cut off all Exceptions of Inadvertency, or any other Circumstances of the like nature. Neither is what has been said of this Point, in the least refuted by all that tedious Dispute of Mattheus, de Criminibus ad L. 48. Tit. 19. c. 5. D. To what has been already said it must be added, That as the measures of Punishment in human Judicature must be taken by the Advantages of the Commonwealth; so the same Rule may make it necessary to admit Criminals to Pardon upon account of their Numbers. For tho' in general 'tis no Excuse to plead, that there were others guilty of the same Crimes^c; yet every wise Government ought to take care that Justice, which is intended for the Preservation of human Society, should not prove the Ruin and Destruction of it.

*Cautius ingentes morbos, & proxima cordi
Ulceræ Præniæ tractat solertia curæ,
Parcendoque secat; ferro ne huius actò,
Irrevocandus eat scélis vitalibus error.*

The skilful Surgeon all his Care applies,
When nigh the Heart the burning Ulcer lies;
With gentlest Touch he tries th' affected Part,
And probes the throbbing Wound with cautious Art,
Nor wide th' Incision makes, but spares th' Unsound,
For fear the Vitals suffer by the Wound^e.

And therefore 'tis a very good Character of a Prince, Ovid gives us, L. i. de Ponto §, the Herforms more Vices by threatening Punishment, than by Punishment it self. Besides, 'tis frequently necessary either to soften the rigour of some Laws, or else suffer them to grow out of use. So Tacitus saith, Ann. l. iii. h. "That it was propos'd to reform the Law called Papia Poppæa, because the Number of Persons obnoxious increas'd, and every Family lay at Mercy, ready to be ruin'd upon the Suggestion of the Informers; and because, as he saith afterwards, the Informers had advanced themselves so far, that they had prevail'd not only in the City, but also over all Italy, and over every Citizen they could find any where else; so that many were already ruin'd, and almost every one was under the same Apprehensions. And thus Tiberius, in his Letter to the Senateⁱ, tells them, that he thought it a more proper Method to pass by the head-strong overgrown Vices, than by attempting to correct them, to discover only what Crimes they had not Strength enough to master; that it would be best to reform them first in themselves, and then to be content to wait till Shame had corrected them in the Nobility, Necessity in the Poor, and the Rich should grow weary

^a V. Diodor. Sicul. l. 12. c. 19.

^b L. 13. 33.

^c Vid. Hærat. laudat. Busrud. circa fin. p. 397.

^d Quæ sit auctoritas ejus, qui læ alterius factò, non suo, defendat? Cicer. Orat. in Vat. C. 6. p. 243. Ed. Græv.

^e Claudianus de Bello Getico. v. 138, &c.

^f Lucanus Pharsal. l. 2. v. 141, &c.

----- Dumq; nimis jam patriâ membra recidit,
Excessit medicina modum, nimumq; secuta est,
Qua morbi dâxere, manus: periere nocentes,
Sed cum jam soli possent supere nocentes.

While he, the sound, freed from th' infected part,
With diligence severe, and barbarous Art,
The weaken'd Body sank beneath the Smart,
The Guilty only were of Life depriv'd,
But when the Guilty only had surviv'd.

}
}

Tot simul infecto juvene, occumbere leto,
Sæpe fames, pelagiq; furor, subitaq; ruinae,
Aut cæli terræq; lues, aut bellica clades
Nunquam Pœna fuit.-----Ib. v. 198.

In Plagues and Famines, and relentless Seas,
By Earthquakes, and by common Enemies,
Rome oft her noblest Lives in numbers spent;
But ne'er before gave up to Punishment.

Senec. de Ira, l. 2. c. 10. There is a Necessity of Pardon when the whole Army deserts.

Multa metu pœna, pœna qui parat, coerces.

^h C. 25. 28.

ⁱ Tacit. Ann. l. 3. c. 54.

^k Epist. 2. v. 127.

of them. For Men were not made for Punishment, but Punishment for Men. And therefore, if they who have the right to inflict Punishment are under Apprehensions of imminent Danger upon the infliction of it, they can be no more oblig'd to punish, than a Man is to lay violent Hands upon himself. In a Ship, if a Pilot should commit a Crime, when no Body but he understands the Management of the Vessel, 'tis plain that the Man that would do Justice upon him must unavoidably shipwreck himself, and all the rest of the Passengers. And so also the Magistrate may lawfully wink at some Crimes, the Punishment of which would be of dangerous Consequence to the Commonwealth; and especially, when the Persons guilty are necessary to the common Safety and Preservation. Though the Magistrate ought never to make any direct Agreement for the Permission of Vice, much less make publick Gain by it ^a. In Italy Pardons are sometimes publickly promis'd to any of the Banditti, that shall bring with him the Head of another of the same Gang. (Tho' Harry Stephens ^b seems to have disapproved that Custom, and says, that the reason of it might appear agreeable enough in an Aristotle or a Plato, but could never become a Christian.) Upon such a Promise that the Villains might have a Jealousy of one another, and be hinder'd from uniting into Bodies, and from doing so much mischief as otherwise to the Commonwealth. (Sir Thomas Moor was of a contrary Opinion in his Utop. l. 2.)

XVIII. I shall in the next place enquire into the Method of rating Penalties, or what Measure of Punishment it is reasonable to allot to particular Crimes. And here besides what I have before ^c said concerning the quantity of Actions, 'tis obvious to observe, that in civil Courts the measures of criminal Actions are taken chiefly, first, from the Object they are concern'd in: and secondly, as their Malignity doth more or less harm to the Commonwealth; and thirdly, from the Intention and Malice of the Delinquent, which may be discovered by variety of Circumstances. The greater therefore and more noble the Object injured is, the greater and more criminal is the Fact esteem'd. As therefore, as of all Objects, God Almighty is the greatest and most excellent, so any Action which tends to his Dishonour, is of all others the most wicked and detestable. And as the Obedience and Reverence due to him, which consists chiefly in the Actions of our Minds, ought to influence and govern our whole Lives; so (as he himself has discover'd his Pleasure) those Actions by which we express our external Reverence to him may be superseded, when they come in Competition with those, which design any extraordinary benefit to Mankind, or to avert any great Evil from them, where there is danger in the delay. Luke xiv. v. 5. The Actions next in remove from these, are such as affect the whole Body of Mankind; and then such as disturb the publick order of the Commonwealth. Afterwards follow those criminal Actions, that affect only particular Men; and under this Rank, the civil Court sets those foremost, that strike at Life, the Foundation of all our temporal Happiness; and next such as concern the Members, not vital, but without which Life it self would be an uneasy Burden and which are to be valued according to the dignity of their use ^d. The next Class of criminal Actions are those, that disorder the quiet and honour of private Families; the Foundation of which is Matrimony (though Philo the Jew, in his Book de Decalogo & de Special. Leg. places the Command against Adultery, before that against Murder) and in the next place, we may rank those that rob us of, or deny us those Blessings, which make up the Necessaries and Conveniencies of Life; and that either directly or indirectly, by depriving us of them out of wicked design. And in the last place, we may reckon such as deprive us of our Reputation, or civil Character and Esteem. In the particulars of these Crimes, such are of the first Rank, which have reach'd to the greatest height of a consummate perpetration. The Inferior are those that terminate in some Acts, and are not arrived at their full growth. And in these the Degrees of Malignity differ according to the pitch they have arrived at. And here we may observe, that naturally, a Design and Inclination to transgress, in any particular Act, must not be consider'd under the same Degree of Enormity, with the Fact it self actually finished; because Evil presents it self to the Mind under more odious and disagreeable Colours, when we come to close with the Commission of it; and consequently a Man must have greater Obstinacy and Resolution to overcome it, than when it lies, as it were, at a Distance, and he hath but newly entertain'd the thoughts of the Attempt. When therefore we say the Will is the same with the Deed, we must understand, that this is meant only of such an Act of the Will which is united with the utmost Endeavour, so that no new Operation of the Will intervene between this and the Event of the Crime, though the success of the Action fail; as suppose a Man takes aim at another to shoot him, tho' he should miss his Mark ^e. And therefore Sir Thomas Moor, Eutop. l. ii. saith, "That there is no less Danger in having attempted any one's Chastity, than in having actually violated it. For in every criminal Action a settled and determinate endeavour, is equal to the Deed. For 'tis not reasonable, that that Man should have any allowance made him for what was wanting to the completion of his Action; since 'twas far enough from his intent that any such defect should happen. But the generality of such kind of Evils are rated higher or lower, according to the Disparity of the Subjects they happen to light upon, as to their State and Condition, Happiness or Infelicity, Age, Time, or Necessity, or any particular Passion or Affection, that might byas to some particular Good, or give an Aversion to some species of Evil. Neither ^a See 2 Pet. ii. 15. One might here put the Question, whether Magistrates may hire and command private Persons, to turn Informer, as was practis'd by the antient Romans, at least in reference to some certain Sorts of Crimes? Consult Hiber. de Jure civil. Lib. 3. Sect. 2. Cap. 4. Sect. 27. and Mr. Hertius's Dissertation, de Hærede occisi vindice, cap. 4. Sect. 3. in the third Tome of the Collection, publish'd in 1700.

^b Apolog. pro Herodot. c. 18.

^c B. 1. c. 8.

^d See Grot. B. 2. c. 20. § 30.

^e See hereafter in Section 27. towards the End.

must we only barely consider, what are the direct and immediate Consequences of any Action, but also what else may probably ensue; as in Fire, and Inundations, the Miseries and Deaths of a number of unfortunate People, are always to be consider'd ^a: And therefore the Chinese make it Death, for any Man to be the occasion of the breaking out of Fire, tho' it were only by his neglect.

XIX. The intenseness or remissness of the Will and Inclination are to be measured principally by the Causes and Motives, which engage Men in Sin ^b. There is hardly any Man wicked, without cause or design ^c; for if a Man be in love with Vice, purely for its own Sake, and Sin only out of Vanity and Affectation, or has no other reason to give for his Vices, than that they are unaccountable and incredible ^d, he must certainly be arriv'd at the highest pitch 'tis possible for human Impiety and Impudence to reach. And therefore, we never find any Malefactor so confident, but he will either deny the Fact, or pretend some plausible reason for excuse, and extenuate it from some pretence of Nature ^e. 'Tis certain, the greatest part of the World are persuaded into Sin by their Passions. Some of these press us with a sort of Violence, to escape present or imminent Evil. And 'tis reasonable these should be allowed to excuse or extenuate the Crime. And therefore such Crimes as are the Effects of the fear of Death, Imprisonment, or any great Discontent, Pain, or Passion, or of extream Poverty, are always look'd upon to be excusable. The wise Hebrew pronounces, That the Thief, whose mean Circumstances tempt him to Steal, is a more excusable Criminal than the Adulterer. So Theft, in case of Hunger, is a less Crime, than the same, when it is the effect of unmeasurable Avarice; and Perjury upon fear of Death is more excusable, than only upon the view of Gain, or to betray a Trust. And thus, as the Author ad Herennium speaks, B. 2. ^f. 'Tis a greater Crime to debauch a Woman of Quality, than commit Sacrilege; because 'tis possible Extremity may force a Man upon the one, but the other can be the effect only of ungovernable Lust ^g. And therefore Bawds that live by encouraging and supplying the Lusts of others, deserve more severe Punishment, than any Man that pursues only his own Pleasure. It is the Opinion of the Emperor Antoninus ^h, That those Crimes which Anger gives occasion to, are more excusable than those that arise from Lust. For, saith he, a Man that yields to the Passion of Anger, seems to break with the Laws of Reason, with some Regret and secret Reluctance of Mind; but one that sins in complaisance to his Lusts, gives himself up to Pleasure, and therefore is more intemperate, as well as more soft and effeminate in his compliance. And as another observes ⁱ, Anger has a much stronger and a more violent influence upon us, than Love; for that gives us time to deliberate and consider with our selves; but Anger raises such Storms in Mens Breasts, as hurry them besides themselves, and is never quiet, till it is satisfied. The Bias of the other Passions inclines Men either to some real or imaginary Good; the things that are really good, can have no natural tendency in them to tempt us into Sin; such as are all kind of Virtues, and the Actions which flow from them. Other things may indeed be good in themselves, but may be also Inducements to Sin, according to the Disposition of the Man's Mind, who is in Possession of them. Of this kind, some are pleasing and delightful; others instrumental only in the procurement of Delights, which are such as we call useful. Now every Crime committed in pursuit of any of these things, is (ceteris paribus) look'd upon to be more excusable, the more that good which was in view, appears to be agreeable to Nature, or the more uneasy Men are without it ^j. The imaginary good Things are such as Men owe the Credit and Value of, either to their Folly, their Vanity, or their Vices; among these, we may rank vain Glory, or an Opinion of more than common Worth, neither bottom'd upon Virtue, nor with any mixture of real Profit join'd to it; as also Revenge, as it proposes to it self nothing else but the harm of the injurious Person. And the less of Nature there is in Theft, and the easier it is for a Man to be without them, the more criminal are those Actions judg'd that flow from the pursuit of them ^k. It is also certain, that all Crimes which are the result of clear and distinct Knowledge, are greater than those which arise from Error and Mistake; and that those Errors are more dangerous and criminal, which a Man runs into through an obstinate pursuit of his own Principles, and false Reason, than those which he imbibes from publick Teachers. And it is also well observ'd by Hobbes, Leviath. c. 27. That the same Fact committed upon a presumption of Power, Friends, or Riches, by the assistance of which the Offender hopes to resist the publick Ministers of Justice, is a greater Crime

MR. BARR. NOTES on § XIX.

^a 'Tis upon this account, that there are some Crimes which appear little in themselves, and which indeed are so, as they relate to a thing of small value; which nevertheless are more heinous, when considered in reference to the Disposition of him that committed 'em, than if they concern'd a thing of a considerable Price. Thus an ancient Orator, in his Accusation against a Man, strenuously insisted upon his Baseness of having defrauded of three Farthings, certain poor Workmen employ'd in building a Chapel, over whom he was appointed as their Pay-Master. ARISTOTLE observes (Lib. 1. Chap. xiv. p. 244. Edit. Vistor.) upon this Occasion, that it is quite the contrary in good Actions; that is to say, that a Man, for example, that returns a large Sum of Money that has been deposited in his Hands, is more commendable, than if the Charge was less considerable: Because that demonstrates a larger Stock of Honesty, as the Prospect of a small Gain, that is capable of inducing a Person to commit a Crime, discovers in him a larger share of Malice, than if he had been tempted to it by the Allurement of a greater Gain.

^a Vid. Grot. d. 1. l. 2. c. 19.

^b Vid. Grot. d. 1. f. 20.

^c Calpurn. Placcus, Declam. 2. Princip. the end. See hereafter, Sect. 21 towards the end.

^d Libanius, Declam. 23.

^e Grot. d. 1. f. 20.

^f V. Senec. de Benef. L. 4. c. 17. ^g V. Auctor. ad Herennium.

^h Cicer. de L. L. l. 1. c. 14.

ⁱ Chap. 30. towards

^j Add. Vul. Max. l. 8. c. 1. in fin.

^k L. 2. c. 10.

than when it proceeds from hopes of not being discovered, or escaping by Flight; for the one is an open Contempt of the Law, the other not ^a. And therefore Aristotle saith ^b, "Such as deny and persist in their Crimes are punish'd with more Severity; but such as think themselves justly dealt with, deserve to be us'd with Gentleness and Lenity; and the Reason is plain, because 'tis impudence to deny what is plainly prov'd; and impudence is Contempt and wilful Opposition". And upon this View (says Seneca ^c) a wise Man will sometimes pardon a great Crime easier than a less, if he finds that that was the Effect rather of Weakness and Infirmary, than of Rancour and Malice; and that this is the product of a close designing, inveterate Craft. Neither will he punish the same Crime after the same manner, in different Offenders, when what the one committed through Indiscretion and Negligence, the other did industriously and deliberately.

XX. Another Argument of the great force and violence of the Inclination and Intention, is, when besides the common Reasons that ought to be sufficient to restrain a Man from Sin, there happen to be other particular Reasons founded either in the Person of the Delinquent, or in the Person of him who was injured in the Fact, or in any other Circumstances. Thus as Juvenal saith ^d,

Omne animi vitium tanto conspectius in se Crimen habet, quanto major qui peccat habetur.

-----More publick Scandal Vice attends,
As he is great and noble, who offends.

And thus the same sort of Sin, committed by a Churchman, is look'd upon to be a greater fault than by any one else, because 'tis expected he should be a Pattern of a pious and unblameable Life to others: For a Man that neglects himself, what he persuades others to do, confutes his own Counsel by his Practice; for the force of his Example by which he dissuades, is much stronger than all the Arguments by which he would convince ^e. Tully saith, "The Guilt there is in the Vices of a Prince, is not so much to be consider'd (tho' that too may be great enough) as the Consequences that attend them, that there will be always great numbers ready to imitate them; and therefore Princes of bad Morals deserve very ill of the Commonwealth; not only as they are vicious themselves, but as they spread and propagate Vice: not only as they are wicked themselves, but as they do more harm by their Example than by their Sin ^f." Thus Tacitus ^g saith of Capito, That he was the more remarkably scandalous, because being so great a Master in the Knowledge of human and divine Laws, he had forfeited his publick Character, and disgraced his own private Skill. And Tully saith in another place ^h, "As it would be unparadonable in a Man that profess himself a Grammarian, to speak improperly, or in one that profess to have Skill in Singing, to shew none in the Practice of it; because these are Faults in the Arts they pretend to: So a Philosopher that is guilty of Misbehaviour in the Conduct of Life, is the most inexcusable; because he is deficient in those Duties he affects to be thought a Master of; and commits Mistakes in the Art of Life, which he professeth ⁱ." In Peru, under the Empire of the Inca's, a Magistrate found guilty of any Crime was punished with greater Severity, than any private Offender: for this Reason, that he was expressly prefer'd to the Administration of Justice, and plac'd in an Office of Trust, upon the Presumption that he was a Man of more than common Probity and Goodness ^k. Upon this account the Injuries of a Friend affect us more, than those of an Enemy ^l. And on the other side, a Benefit conferr'd by an Enemy is more pleasing, and more valued, than the Kindness of a Friend: Notwithstanding what Terence saith, That when a Man stands in need of a good Turn, he is glad to receive it at any Hand; but 'tis double Pleasure to receive it from one he has reason to expect it from ^m. For the same Reason, an Affront from a Man of mean Circumstances is more insupportable, than from an Equal or Superior ⁿ: or from a Man's own Children or Servants, than from another's. There are also some particular Crimes, which are branded with particular Infamy, as consisting in the violation of such Acts of Duty, which Men are obliged to pay to certain particular Persons, ^o and are therefore judg'd to be more highly wicked; such as Disobedience to Parents, P Inhumanity, and Rudeness to Relations, Ingratitude to Benefactors; which are look'd upon to be more heinous, than if they terminated in any other Persons ^q. In fine, 'tis a material Aggravation, to consider the time, and place, when, and where the Fact was committed. And thus the same Crime committed in a publick Place, before Witnesses, is greater, than when a Man endeavours to conceal

^a Add. Aristot. Rhet. l. 1. c. 12. & 14.

^d Sat. viii. v. 140, 141. Dio Chrysost. Orat. 1. de Regno. p. 9. C. Any Vice in a Prince is more heinous, and more in View. And to this Sense we may apply that of Pliny, Nat. Hist. l. 5. c. 1. Men are never more credulous and easy of Belief, than when any Fallacy is promoted under the Authority of a great Man.

^f Cicero de LL. l. 3. c. 14. Senec. Hercul. Fur. v. 745, 746. The Crimes of Princes are of deeper Stains.

^g Annal. iii. 70. ^h Tusc. Quæst. l. 2. c. 4. ⁱ Quintil. Declam. 3. p. 38. 'Tis the Misfortune of Superiors to be thought to command others, what they do themselves: and Evil is always most pernicious when the Author of it is Great and Powerful.

^l Pitron. One that offers Violence to a Stranger is a Villain, but a Man that injures his Friend is little less than a Parricide. Among the Celtæ, according to Nic. Damascenus, de Moribus Gentium, a Man that kill'd a Foreigner was punish'd more severely, than if he had kill'd a Subject. The Punishment of the first was Death, of the second, only Banishment.

^m Terent. Adelph. Act. 2. Sc. 3. v. 1, 2. ⁿ Vid. L. 47. t. 10. l. 17. f. 3. D. de Injur.

^o D. ubi supra, l. 7. f. 8. ^p Vid. Grot. L. 2. c. 20. f. 30. & 2 Sam. c. xvi. v. 11. ^q To this purpose is that Passage in Lyfias, speaking to the Athenians, Orat. 4. contra. Andocid. c. 6. Ye ought to shew your selves more severe to your own Subjects, when they profane the Rites of your Religion, than to Foreigners; because the Crime, as those commit it, seems to come from Abroad; in your own People 'tis Native and Intelline.

it; both because, what is acted with the advantage of Secrecy, at least, gives less Scandal; and because, 'tis a strong Presumption, that that Man is a bold and harden'd Offender, who has the impudence to out-face the World, and to sin, as it were, in defiance to all the good and sober part of Mankind ^a. Thus it is a greater sin, to be guilty of unchaste Actions in a Church, than in a Tavern; to strike in the Court, than in a private House; and to be guilty of Intemperance on an ordinary Day, ceteris paribus, is more excusable, than on days set aside for Devotion ^b. Thus Cicero severely aggravates Antony's Crime, for coming into the Court so disorder'd with Wine, as to be forc'd to vomit while he sat on the Bench ^c. Thus the Declaimer saith ^d, "That though Rudeness in any other place may perhaps be excusable, yet in the Temple, where we set a guard upon our Words, where we compose our Souls, and confine even our Thoughts, to offer an injury, or affront there, with the same boldness, as in an unrequited, private place, is unsufferable ^e. Lastly, The Methods and the Instruments used in the commission of the Fact, seem to be accessory to the aggravation or extenuation of the Crime; because 'tis usual to infer from them the force or weakness of the intention. And therefore 'tis a greater Crime to rob a Man of his Goods, by forcing his House, by digging through his Walls, or artificially picking his Locks, than by going in boldly at an open Door.

XXI. Another thing which aggravates or extenuates the Crime, is the Power or Ability the Person was Master of, to forbear the Fact ^f. For some Men have clearer and more lively Apprehensions of the Reasons, why they should decline ill Acts, than others. And some have stronger Propensities than others to some particular sorts of Sins, which may be accounted for, either by the particular mixture and constitution of the Body; or else by the Age, Sex, Education, or other Circumstances ^g: For 'tis easy to observe, that young People, Women, and Men of grosser natural Parts, or that have had no advantages of Education, do not so accurately distinguish between just and unjust, lawful and unlawful; and know very little of the measures of them, or how to weigh and consider them ^h. In Persons where Choler is the prevailing humour in the Body, Anger is the governing Passion; others of more and warmer Blood, are easily inclined to Lust: Age turns our Desires one way, and Youth another ⁱ. Again, the nigher any Evil seems to threaten, the stronger is the fear it causes, and the more difficult it is to resist it. A fresh Repentment strikes us with more Violence, than that which hath been cool'd by interval of Time. And though Grief and Discontent will not always be silenc'd at first by Reason, yet they have not the same excuse, when they have had time to be compos'd and quieted. In general, it is more criminal to go sedately and calmly to commit sin, than in a disorder and disturbance of Passion ^k. And therefore Aristotle says, That every Man must think him less excusable, who engages in a bad Action upon weak Temptations, than one, that is guilty of the same, upon the violent persuasions of strong Passions. And that when a Man strikes in cold Blood, he is more criminal, than if he were angry; for how far would such a one proceed, saith he, if he were beaten into a Passion? It was Pittacus's Law indeed ^l, That such as abus'd others in their Wine, should pay double the sum, than if they had been Sober: "For since people in that condition (saith Aristotle) are generally inclined to be more abusive than others, the Law doth not so much regard the Pardon which ought rather to be allow'd to Men in the disorders of Drink, as the publick Good ^m. But Crimes that arise from Passions are look'd upon to be less odious, when they are the effects of a Passion alarm'd and rous'd in us at the appearance of Evil; and such as arise from an appetite or eager pursuit after Pleasures, especially the more needless ones, to be more criminal. For Pleasure doth not affect us so sensibly, and may be easier delay'd, or satisfied more innocently some other way without Guilt. And (Aristotle saith) therefore, That 'tis a greater uneasiness to bear Pain of any Sort, than to deny Pleasure. For (saith he in another place) Pain distracts and weakens Nature in the Person that suffers it; but Pleasure hath a different effect, and of-

^a Vide Aristot. Probl. l. 29. q. 14. Vide D. De injuriis, l. 7. c. 8.

^c Cicero. Orat. Philipp. 2. c. 25.

^d Quintil. Declam. 252. If any Injury be done to the Magistrate, it is an Act of Hostility against this State; if to an Ambassador, Satisfaction must be demanded by War, and the Laws of Nations. The same Sum of Money taken from a private Man, is Theft; from the Altar, or Temple, Sacrilege. And so one that violates another's Chastity, shall pay to the Party demanding barely Satisfaction for Virginity, ten thousand Sesterces; but one that hath been publicly Guilty of the same Crime, and ravish'd a Candidate to the Priesthood, must not be allow'd the same Terms. Quintil. Decl. 264. Add. Instit. Orat. l. 6. c. 1.

^e Demosten. adv. Midiam. I was abus'd by my Enemy, in cold Blood, in the Morning, out of Malice, not upon any heat of Wine, publicly, before Strangers, as well as Citizens, and that in the Temple, whither I was oblig'd to go by the Duty of my Office.

^f Vid. Grat. l. 2. c. 20. § 31. ^g Vid. L. 48.

^h Procop. Hist. Vandal. l. 2. c. 14. As it is very unusual, so it would be the more commendable, for the Son to lay aside that Falseness and Violence of Temper which run through the Family, and to take up a contrary Coolness and Probity.

ⁱ Gramond. Hist. Gall. l. 13. Young People seldom trouble themselves to be Wise, because they look upon it to be their Privilege to do what they please. Libanius Decl. 21. p. 531.

^k Cic. Off. l. 1. c. 8. Those Faults which are the effects of any sudden Commotion, are more excusable than such as are premeditated and designed. Philos. Jud. de Specialibus Legib. p. 791. B. Edit. Paris. says, That it is an imperfect Crime which is not the effect of much Deliberation, Plato de LL. l. 9. p. 931. C. Ed. Wech. They that kill a Man upon propense Malice, are to be punish'd more severely, than such as are guilty of Manslaughter only out of a sudden Rashness.

^l Aristot. Polit. l. 2. c. 12. ^m This Law is also mention'd by Plutarch in Conviv. 7. Sapient. p. 155. F.

fers it self fairer to our choice, and therefore ought to be thought more criminal and opprobrious ^a. Lastly, Another motive to alleviate the Penalty, is when a Man's Friends and Relations persuade him to transgress the Laws ^b.

XXII. 'Tis also usually considered, whether the Malefactor were himself the first of the Kind, or were seduced by the Examples of others; whether this be the first time he is found guilty, or whether he be an old Offender. For in every Commonwealth, the first Man that has the boldness to commit a Crime, which is like to be of ill Example, and which he does in a manner inform others in, is more highly criminal, than another that has been encouraged by frequent Precedents in the like Crime before ^c. Again, the same Fact, if it hath been constantly punish'd in other Men, is a greater Crime, than if there have been frequent Instances of Impunity; because the first is greater Contempt of the Government and Laws, than the latter. But the more or less frequent Repetition of the same Action doth not make it in it self better or worse, any farther than as it discovers it to proceed from inveterate Custom or Habit ^d. And since regard is principally had to the frequency of the Repetition, in the making an estimate of moral Actions (since from thence 'tis usual to measure the force of a Man's Resolution; and therefore it is commonly said, that ill Habits are worse than ill Acts) it sufficiently appears why a good Action, which a Man has frequently repeated, is look'd upon to be better than one he has but newly begun, or very seldom practis'd: and on the other hand, why a bad Action often reiterated is judg'd a greater Crime, than one the same Person has but once or twice been found guilty of ^e. To this purpose was the Emperor Julian's Law against Lyars ^f; If any of my Servants be found guilty of a Lye, the first time, I pardon it; if he presume a second time, I bear with him: if it be proved upon him a third, he has not absolutely incurr'd my Displeasure; but if he venture the fourth time, I forbid him my Presence. But the Peruvians, under the Government of the Ynca's, took particular care to punish the first Essays of their Criminals, because by this Method they thought they might prevent the return of the same Crime another time. For unless the Weeds are rooted up, when they first appear, it must be expected that they will plentifully increase. And where Justice moves so slowly as not to reach the Offender, till he has repeated his Crime, private Subjects are apt to grow impatient, and to take the liberty to redress themselves, to the prejudice of the publick Peace ^g. Neither is it any Objection, that a good Habit gives an easiness to good Actions; or that on the contrary, an ill Habit makes it difficult to forbear doing ill. For that labour it must cost a Man to attain the good Habit at first, is a sufficient reason why the value of it ought not to be lessen'd, though the exercise of it be easy and pleasant. And on the other side, the aversion to Sin ought to be therefore the greater, because by a frequency in doing ill a Man shall contract such a familiarity with Vice, as he will hardly ever be able to renounce, and by repeated Transgressions will be abandon'd to Impudence, and forget the Sense of Shame. For the common Infirmities of human Nature will excuse some Errors and Slips in the conduct of Life; but to be often guilty of the same Miscarriages is a degree of Madness not to be born with. ^h The Faults a Man is guilty of at sixteen will not appear the same, tho' all other Circumstances be supposed to continue, as when he is forty; for by that time, besides that his Habit appears inveterate and inexcusable, the maturity of his Judgment must cut off all pretences of excuse and plea for pardon. And all these things are, with good reason, to be considered in levying Punishment. For a Crime of no extraordinary Malignity, upon the first commission, may be more easily pardon'd; or at least punish'd with less Rigour, than one which has been the common Practice of the Delinquent ⁱ. Sometimes also future Reformation is made the condition of pardon for past Offences; and in defect of that, the Punishment of the past is join'd with that of the repeated Crime; and former Misdemeanours are again brought under the reach of Justice ^k. From whence it appears, in what Sense that common Aphorism is allow'd to be true, That the Estimation of a Crime is never increas'd by any after Act ^l. And here it might be also enquired, how far that Custom of the Persians, which Herodotus speaks of, was agreeable to natural Equity, when, in criminal Cases, the whole Course of the Delinquent's Life was examin'd, together with his particular Offence; and if upon the whole it appeared, that there was an over-balance of good Actions, the Crime was pardon'd. But upon a strict View, it must appear that all that signified nothing to the intrinsic estimation of the Crime; and therefore 'tis probable, this Method was not us'd in Crimes of an higher Quality, and where there were manifest Proofs of the propense Malice of the Criminal, but as Grotius d. l. §. 30. thinks, was, or at least ought to have been, confin'd to such Cases only, where the Delinquent, being not otherwise notoriously vicious was unwarily betray'd, by some Satisfaction or other, he conceiv'd he should find in the Commission of the Fact, or else, where the Proof of the Fact lay

^a Arist. Nicom. l. 7. c. 8. The Intemperance of Anger is less Criminal than that of Lust. Id. Magn. Moral. l. 2. c. 6. A violent inclination for Pleasure is much more faulty than any excess of Anger. For Anger is a very restless uneasy Passion, and every one that is under the Power of it, finds himself discomposed. But the Incontinence that ariseth from the concupiscible Appetites is attended with Pleasure, and therefore is less excusable, because, it seems to be the effect of Wantonness and Effeminacy. There is a Passage like this, in Marcus Antoninus, l. 2. f. 10. Ad. Aristot. Probl. f. 29. q. 16.

^b Vid. L. 47. t. 16. l. 2. D. de receptator. Ad. Grotius. d. l. f. 29. ^c Felleius Patere. l. 2. c. 3. Precedents seldom stop where they begin, but if allow'd never so little Liberty, will soon make way for themselves to break out further. Vid. Gell. l. 10. c. 19. Polyb. excerpt. legat. 93. c. 5. ^d Vid. L. 48. t. 19. l. 28. f. 3. D. de pœnis. Ant. Matthæus de crimin. tit. de furtis. f. 9. seqq. & L. 48. D. tit. 13. c. 4. f. 27, 28. ^e Vid. Grot. L. 2. c. 20. f. 30.

^f Libanius Legat. ad Julian. ^g Garcilas de la Vega, Com. R. l. 2. c. 10. ^h Sir Tho. Browne's Relig. Medici, f. 41. V. Grot. d. l. ⁱ See 1 Kings i. 52. ii. 23. ^k Nonquam crescit ex post factis, præteriti delicti æstimatione, intricate and perplex, a view of the Criminal's Life might be necessary to give the matter so much Light, as to discover whether it were probable, he was guilty, or not; since a Man must make several Steps, before he can come to the highest pitch of Guilt ^a. Yet Herodotus ^b gives us an Example of Sandoces a Perſian Judge, whom Darius commanded to be crucified for taking Bribes, and giving wrong Judgment; but when he call'd to mind, that the Services and good Offices he had done him, were more than his Crimes, he order'd him to be taken down, and admitt'd him again to favour. And Cicero, in his Defence of Sulla, reasons the same way, In all Matters of Importance and Concern, saith he, we are not to measure a Man's Intentions, Thoughts, or Actions, by the Fact it self; but by the Circumstances of his Life: And the reason, saith he, is, because, according to the Opinion we receive of a Man's Morals, we generally conjecture how far he may be guilty, and how far not ^c. And for this reason it was usual in the the old Roman Judgments, for the Accuser to begin with a Censure upon the Life and Behaviour of the Criminal; and on the other side, the Patroni either made excuses for him themselves, or brought in the Laudatores, Persons that should give Testimony of his good Behaviour. And there was good reason for the Practice; for considering the general Depravation of Mankind, a Judge ought to be very cautious, how he takes away the Life of any Subject, who upon the whole, may rather be thought a good, than a bad Man. But it is to be observed, that an Inquiry into the Criminal's Morals, and past Life, where the Fact is intricate and obscure, may make the Presumptions great on both sides; and therefore, that if any Man has clearly acquitted himself of the Crime he was indicted of, he may lawfully plead, that he was not oblig'd to make a Defence for his Morals, or vindicate his former Behaviour, but only to acquit himself, before the Court, of the Crimes his Accusers directly charged him with ^d. But yet when a Man that has always been a regular and dutiful Subject, changes his whole course of Life, there is good reason the Laws should deal severely with him, upon a double Account; both because he hath been guilty of a Crime, and because he has made so ill a Choice, as to change a good course of Life for a bad one ^e.

^l l. 50. t. 17. De divers. reg. Juris, l. 138. f. 1.

XXIII. Now although from what has been said, it sufficiently appears, that one Crime is greater than another; and that human Justice ought not to punish every Crime with equal Severity; yet notwithstanding, it must be confess'd, that both the precise Quantity and Quality of human Punishments depend upon the Determination of the civil Sovereign, which is principally to be directed by the advantages and publick Good of every Commonwealth. Upon this view Anyſis King of Egypt punish'd no Criminal with Death in all his Reign; but, according to the Degrees of every Man's Offence, condemn'd him to bring a quantity of Earth, or Rubbish to the City he belong'd to. And by this method the Ground the Cities stood upon was rais'd higher, and the Cities secur'd against the Inconveniencies of the Flood upon the rising of the Nile ^f. But indeed there is no Necessity, that there should be always the same Proportion observ'd between the Penalties, as there is distance between the Objects injured by the Offender. Every particular Crime may be sentenced to a particular Punishment, as it happens to be most agreeable to the Circumstances of the State; without any regard, whether another Crime, which in it self may seem greater or less than this, be punish'd with more or less severity. Plato proposes a Law of this nature ^g, That if any Man robb'd the Publick, whether of more or less, his Punishment should be the same. "For, saith he, a Man that takes away a thing of less value, though he doth it with less force than another; that robs the State of something greater, yet he is guilty of the same ill Principles and Intentions; and a Man that takes away something of considerable worth, which he never deposited, can but be unjust and criminal. The Law therefore doth not inflict greater or less Penalties upon the Offenders, from the Comparison it makes between the Degrees of their Theft; but because it supposes, that one is more capable of being reform'd, than the other." 'Tis certain, a Judge ought so far to observe Equality in the Distribution of Punishments, as to take care that such as are equally guilty should be equally punish'd; and that a Fault which was severely corrected in one Man, should not without very good reason be excus'd in another; since it must be expected that such Partiality would be a certain cause to raise Disturbances in the Commonwealth; and because a Punishment can have no effect when it is not inflicted upon any view of publick Good, but barely in gratification to private Passion. But still an equality of Punishment must be suppos'd only where the Criminals are guilty of the same Fact in Specie, and not of different. For 'tis common for human Justice to punish small Faults with greater Rigour, or to take the contrary Method, as the Exigencies of the State, or the Will of the Legislator determines. And the Criminal has no Reason to complain of the Partiality, since he knew beforehand what he was to expect ^h. For instance, though Theft in it self be a much less Crime than Murder, yet the Thief has not just reason to complain, should he be condemn'd to suffer the same Punishment with the Murderer, tho' his Crime was not equal in Degree. The reason why Crimes of different Degrees are equally punish'd with Death is, because Death is the greatest and last

^a Nemo repente fuit turpissimus-----Juven. Sat. 2. v. 83.

^d Auſhor. ad Herennium. l. 2. c. 3.

^e Polyb. l. 7. in Excerpt. Pœrſian

But when he took a quite contrary way of Life, and grew every day worse and worse; 'twas fit every body should change their Opinions of him.

^f Herodot.

Euterp. p. 90. Ed. H. Steph. Dindor. Sic. l. 1. c. 65. Tho' Aſiſanes King of Egypt, when he built Rhinocolura, took care that all those sort of People, the Scum and Filth of the Nation, should be carried into a Place by themselves, that they might not infect others, Diodor. Sic. l. 1. c. 60.

^g Plato de LL. l. 12. init. p. 982. C. Ed. Wick.

^h Calpurnius

Flaccus, Declam. 5 When the Consequences are threaten'd beforehand, the Fault lies no where but in the Sufferer.

Evil Men inflict ¹: unless it be that sometimes the way to it is short and easy, and at other times made terrible, and grievous by delay and torture ²; or that sometimes dishonour is done to the dead Body, and infamy fix'd upon the Memory of the Person ³, which is sometimes inflicted a considerable time after the Delinquent's Death; and may again be recall'd, and taken off ^b. Besides, the Will of the Legislator is often consider'd in determining the Penalty, though not in so absolute a Degree, as to exclude the Interest and Advantage of the Publick, yet to such a Degree, that the particular Punishment seems in a manner entirely to depend upon it. There are also some Crimes of so black a Nature, as will justify the greatest Severity that can be us'd upon Criminals, who have contracted the slightest Acquaintance with them ^c. So Philo says, That a Man who attempts only to kill another treacherously, is not the less guilty of Murder, tho' he fails of Success: And the written Law in this Case commands, That if a Man come presumptuously upon his Neighbour to slay him with guile, thou shalt take him from mine Altar, that he may die ³. The Athenian Judges indeed were too severe, when they condemn'd a Boy for pricking out a Bird's Eyes, upon Suspicion, that it was a sign of a barbarous Temper, and that he might prove a very ill Member of the Commonwealth, if he were suffer'd to grow up to years of Maturity ^d. But it is not the actual Commission of a wicked Act that makes the Criminal; 'tis enough that a Man has arm'd himself, and discovers his inclinations to Rob and Murder: For the Wickedness doth not always begin, but is exercised and improv'd only by the practice. For as Paterculus reflects upon Caius Cato's being condemn'd for a small Offence ^e; The Inclination and Intent of the Offender may sometimes be of greater force with the Judge, than the Crime it self. For 'tis natural enough to argue from the Fact to the design of the Criminal, and to consider rather of what nature the Offence is, than how great ^f. In Cases of Treason and Conspiracy against the State, bare Conscioufness, or Privy without any Assent, and Silence only, and the concealment of it deserves Punishment ^g. However in the distribution of Punishment there ought always to be as much Gentleness and Lenity us'd, as is possible. And therefore the Severity of Draco's Laws might justly appear insupportable, and deserve Solon's Corrections ^h. Yet the Course of Justice in Peru was altogether as Rigorous; for there almost every Crime was punish'd with Death; the Judges not so much considering the simple Nature of the Offence, as that it was a Breach of the Commands of the Inca, whom they look'd upon and revered as a God ⁱ. But there is good Reason for enhancing the severity of the Punishment, when just Repentment, and Care for the common Good, makes it necessary to secure the publick Quiet by punishing Malefactors. For Instance, Suppose the Criminal threaten Danger to the State, if he be not punish'd in time. H. Stephens gives us a Story ^k, of a Man that having begg'd for a Pardon of the King of France for the seventh Murder he was guilty of, and finding he could not obtain it, boldly told the King, that he would own only the first Murder to be his own proper Action; and that the Imputation of all the rest must lie upon the King himself; for that he should never have committed the other, if the King had not given him Encouragement, by pardoning the first. Sometimes also it is necessary to make Examples of some Malefactors to frighten others; especially where the general Persuatives and Inducements to Wicked-

MR. BARE. NOTES on § XXIII.

¹ Lycurg. Orat. contra Leocras. The greatest and the last of Punishments in Death.

² Ovid. Her. Epil. l. 10.

Morsque minus pœnæ, quam mora mortis habet.

Death hath less Pain itself, than the Delay.

Tho' some think a quick Dispatch an easier Punishment than a miserable Life. Vid. Cæsar's Orat. in Sallust. Conjur. Catilin. and Tiberius's Answer in Sactonius, c. 61. To one that desir'd his Punishment might be short, was, I am not yet reconciled to you.

Senecæ Hercules Fur. v. 512.	Death to the Miserable is Ease.
Senec. Æg. Agamem. v. 989.	He's yet unskil'd in the Arts of Tyranny, That punishes with Death.
El. Ibid. v. 996.	Why is there any thing beyond the Grave?
Æg. Ibid.	Yes Life when one desires to die.
Euripid. Hippol. Coron.	Τὸς γὰρ ἄδρις ἰπ̄ς ἔσθ' ἀδριε δεσυχῆ, v. 147. Th' unfortunate desires a speedy End.

Nay, Charron de la Sageſſe, l. 1. c. 39. (vi.) f. 10. ranks it among the ridiculous Notions of the Vulgar, to think to be reveng'd of an Enemy by killing him. For this, saith he, is only to take from him the sense of Misfortune, and to secure him from all further Harms; unless a Man thinks it necessary to his own Security, to leave no body alive that is like to be his Enemy, or to make him uneasy. In Apollonius condemn'd the Eunuch, that lay with the King's Concubine, to live, by way of Punishment.

³ Vide Philon. de specialibus legibus, p. 791. Tacitus Hist. l. 2. c. 77. Qui deliberant desciverunt, to demur is to desert. And to this we may refer that of Plutarch, Cæsar. Penalties are not always inflicted for the Fact, but sometimes for the Intention and Design. Quintil. Declam. 362. The Law lays the Punishment upon the Will. Lyſias Orat. in Simonem, c. 12. It is certain that those we receiv'd our Laws from, did not intend that a Man, who in a Quarrel had done harm to another, should therefore be banish'd: But that such as violently assaulted and injured a Man with a design to take away his Life, tho' they fail'd in the Attempt, should yet suffer that severe Punishment; because they supposed it just, that he should suffer as really guilty of the Fact, that deliberately endeavour'd to put it in Execution; for tho' it happen'd that they were mistaken in the success of the Action, yet they pursued it as far as they had Power. Add. Ælian. Var. Hist. l. 14. c. 27.

^a Ælianus N. Hist. l. 4. c. 7.

^b Vid. Socrat. Hist. Eccles. l. 7. c. 44.

^c Vide Ant. Matthæum de Crimin.

Prolog. c. 1. f. 5, 6. & ad L. 48. D. tit. 5. c. 3. f. 10. & tit. 18. c. 4. Ziegler ad Grot. d. l. f. 39. Valerius Maximus l. 6. c. 1. f. 8. Vide L. 47. t. 11. l. 1. f. 2. D. de extraordin. Crimin. D. ad L. Cornel. de sicariis. Vide L. 48. t. 8. l. 3. f. 1, 2, 3. Philo Judæus de confusione linguarum, f. 343. C.

^d Quintil. Instit. Orat. l. 5. c. 9. Senec. de Benef. l. 5. c. 14. c. L. 2. c. 8. ^e Ad L. 9. t. 8. l. 5. princ. C. ad L. Jul. Majest. Grotius in Flor. Sparl. in Jas Justinian. ^f We have an Example of Thæranus, in Benj. Priolus Hist. Gall. l. 1. c. 6. and of David Berchinus, in Bachman. Rerum. Scotic. l. 8. Ad Diodorus Siculus, l. 11. c. 54. ^g Vid. Plutarch. Solon. ^h Garcilaff. de la Vega. Com. Reg. l. 2. c. 12, 13.

^k Apolog. pro Herod. c. 17.

ness are strong ^a; such as are Easiness and Use, which nothing but a severe Discipline can reform. The Jewish Law lays a greater Penalty on the Person that steals out of the Field, than one that robs an House, because the first is done with greater ease; compare Exod. xii. v. 1. with the 7th and 9th ver. ^b. And thus the Scythians thought no Crime so heinous as Theft, because having neither Houses nor Folds to keep their Cattle in, no Man's Property could be secure, if Robbery had any Indulgence. And in some Nations Theft is look'd upon to be a greater Crime in a Domestick, than in a Stranger ^c. It was Death at Athens for a Man to steal from the Baths, from the Schools of Exercise, or the Market, or any such publick Place; but one that robb'd a private House was only to pay double the worth of what he stole ^d. Q. Curtius says, There was a Custom among the Persians, that oblig'd them to be strict in concealing any Secret that concern'd their Kings; and adds, that neither Hope, nor Fear, could extort any Expression from them that might give Light to discover it; the antient Constitutions of that Empire obliging them to such Silence, upon pain of Death; and that therefore no Intemperance was punish'd so severely among them, as that of the Tongue, it being thought that no Man could be capable of any great Attainments, who could think it a pain to be silent, when it was plain there is nothing in Nature easier. Further also, Custom, or when a Vice is grown popular, or in fashion (for as to that habitual Custom or Familiarity, particular Men contrast by repeated Sins, I have spoken already) though it be some extenuation of a Crime, yet doth certainly deserve very severe Punishment ^e.

-----*Veteri post obruta morbo
Corpora, Pœonias nequicquam admoveris herbas
Non levioꝛe manu, ferro sanantur & igni, f.
Ne noceat frustra mox eruptura cicatrix, &c.*

A crazy Body long inur'd to Pain,
From healing Medicines seeks Relief in vain:
When at the Bone the fretting Ulcer smarts,
It fears the Lance, but mocks the gentler Arts.
With Causticks and Incisions force your way,
The treacherous Wound will else your Skill betray.
Skinn'd o'er without, it seems to heal inclin'd,
But still the Sore lurks festering deep behind.
But searching Fires the secret Faults disclose,
Pursue the watry Humour as it flows;
From sickly Veins prevent the fresh supplies,
And stop the Springs whence first Corruption rise.
If obstinate the Sore, and still unbound,
And dangerous Gangreens gnaw within the Wound, }
A Limb cut off must for the whole compound. }

And therefore Grœtius judiciously observes ^g, that in publick Trials it is some Excuse for an Offender to plead, that his Fault is common; because in all

Trials the Point in Dispute is, what share of Guilt that particular Person has contracted; and this without doubt must appear the less, when the Man was carried away with the Violence of the Stream, rather than the Force of his own Inclinations; but when Laws are to be made, a prevailing Custom is an undeniable Argument, that there is greater need of severe Sanctions to suppress it; because Laws must be supposed to regard the Advantages that may accrue by the Punishment in general. However, when a Vice has rais'd it self to such an Head, and Offenders are grown so numerous, that if all of them were to fall under the reach of Justice, the Commonwealth must be much dispeopled, if not entirely ruin'd by rigorous Executions of Law, the Law must yield to the Necessities of the State, and rather be neglected, or laid aside, than occasion the Desolation of the Commonwealth ^h. But Laws are to be applied only where things are capable of being effected, and so may very well punish Offenders when they are few, and may easily be reclaim'd by Punishment, but to attempt upon Multitudes is to no purpose ⁱ. Lastly, where the Necessities of the State are pressing for the purpose, if upon an Invasion and War there should be no other Person fit for the Command and Charge of a General, there can be no Reason why a Criminal of experienc'd Courage and Conduct might not be releas'd even from capital Punishment, when it appears that the State cannot be safe without his Assistance; and therefore there was Reason in what Fabricius said, when he gave his Vote for Cornelius Rufinus a good General, but a very covetous Man, to be Consul; that he had rather he robb'd than sold ^k. And so Junius the Dictator after the Defeat at Cannæ, publish'd an Edict, That if any Man, whether he was a Prisoner for a capital Crime, or for Debt, would list himself for the publick Service, under his Command, he would grant him a Pardon, and discharge his Debts ^l.

XXIV. From all which I think it is evident, that there is no vindictive Justice in the civil Court, which determines what Degrees of Punishment ought to be inflicted on particular Crimes, by any Decision of Nature. But the true Measure of all human Punishment must be taken from the utility of the Commonwealth; and according as the Ends of Punishment seem most easy to be attain'd, the Punishment may either be enhanced or alleviated, according to the Discretion of the Government; yet still so as that the Method of Punishment may admit of great Latitude. And therefore, as it would be too severe to inflict a Penalty, when the Ends of punishing may be attain'd by gentler Methods ^m; so the Punishment is much too easy, when it has not Sharpness enough to produce the Ends design'd by it, and consequently to restrain the Insolence of the Subject, or settle the internal Security of the Commonwealth; or in short, when it is a Punishment

^a V. Grœt. d. l. f. 34, 35. ^b L. 47. t. 17. l. 2. D. de EffraCTOR. Julianus. L. 2. c. 2. de Scythis.
^c Tho' the Roman Law seems to have the contrary Method, L. 48. t. 19. l. 11. f. 1. D. de pœnit. Vide Ant. Matthæum de Crim. tit. de Furtis, c. 3. f. 2, 3. Ad. Argl. Prœol. f. 29. Quæst. 14. ^d Vide L. 47. t. 17. l. 1. D. de Furiis Balnear. Ant. Matthæum de Crimin. ad h. t. § t. 14. de Abigis. Add what Philos. Jud. urges, to aggravate the Crime of Sorcery, de Special. legibus, p. 791, 792. Ed. Paris. ^e Q. Curtius, l. 4. c. 6. f. 5, 6. ^f Leg. 10. f. ult. D. de Pœnis, ubi supra. ^g Chrysanus in Eutropium, l. 2. v. 11, &c. ^h In the abovemention'd place, f. 35.
^h See Tiberius's Epistle concerning Luxury, Tacitus Ann. 5. c. 54. in the Beginning. ⁱ Plutarch. in Solon. p. 90.
ⁱ V. A. Gelliam, l. 4. c. 8. ^j Livy l. 23. c. 14. Add. Grœt. upon 1 Kings ii. 6.
^k See Montaign's Essays, B. 1. c. 11. p. 309. Ed. Paris.

the Delinquents themselves despise ^a. If the Legislator go too far on the one hand, he is liable to the Infamy of being cruel; ^b and if he incline to the other side, he makes all Punishment insignificant; and gives absolute liberty to Vice. For since the natural End of all Punishment is to dispose Men to obey the Law, and, in consequence, to restrain them from Actions contrary to it; and since Men, whenever they allow themselves to consider, always weigh the Conveniences and Inconveniences which arise from the same Thing; it is evident, that if the Harm or Pain inflicted, be less than the Benefit or Satisfaction that naturally follows from the Crime committed, the Punishment will be but a very slender Inducement to persuade any Man to resist the Temptation to Disobedience ^c.

XXV. I am to add farther, That since the same Punishment doth not affect all Persons alike ^d, and consequently will not raise the same Dispositions in all to Obedience, it is easy to discover, that both the general penal Sanction, and the application of it to particular Parties, ought to be made with a suitable regard to the Person of the Delinquent, and in that, to all those qualities of Age, Sex, Dignity, Fortune, Strength, and the like; which may either increase or mitigate the sense of Punishment ^e. For the same Mule, for Instance, will press hard upon a poor Man, which will be no burden at all to a rich; an ignominious Punishment will sit easy upon a Wretch mean and despicable, when to a Person of Honour and Quality nothing will be more insupportable and afflicting; and Men, and full grown People have more Strength to bear Punishment than Women and Children ^f. And the Moors therefore punish Women guilty of Unchastity, with greater Severity than Men; because they suppose that generally the Arts and Enticements of the Women first give them Encouragement. But yet it doth not from hence follow, that Punishment ought to be inflicted in geometrical (or as Bodinus ^g affectedly calls it, an harmonious) Proportion; all that is intended here is no more than to make a simple Equation between the Crime and the Penalty, which the Circumstances of the Person are necessary to find out. But if on the account of such Qualities, which neither aggravate the Crime, nor augment the sense of the Punishment, Crimes equal in Demerit are unequally punish'd, 'tis a shameful partiality and respect of Persons; of which Cicero doth not always acquit the Roman Laws. And some produce this for an Instance ^h, a Man that kills his Wife, when he has taken her in Adultery, if he be a Person of inferior Rank, is sentenc'd to perpetual Banishment; but if he be in any Dignity or Office, he is only to suffer the Relegatio for some short time; for a mean Person may be as much concern'd and afflicted at the Disgrace he suffers by the falleness of his Wife, as a Man of Honour, and may leave his Country with equal Grief and Regret ⁱ. And lastly, it may also be observ'd, that in some Nations certain sorts of Punishment are attended with particular Infamy; thus Euripides, ^k

*High on the Gallows ignominious Pains
The very Slaves regret and think dishonourable;
But by the Sword to fall looks generous and brave.*

And Telemachus in Homer ^l would not dispatch his Maids, Κατακτεῖν δὲ Πανδράχην, that is, would not kill them by the Sword, but hangs them. The Punishment of Strangling, on the other hand, is look'd upon to be honourable by the Ottoman Family, who think it infamous that noble Blood should be spilt upon the Ground. And the Jews thought it a more ignominious Death to be Beheaded, than to be Strangled or Stoned ^m. On the contrary, some Punishments have had the fortune to be accounted Honourable. And upon such a Notion as this, we are told that the Athenians were angry, that so mean and contemptible a Wretch as Hyperbolus should be banish'd by Ostracism ⁿ; because it was usually thought an Honour to suffer that Punishment; and they could readily yield Ten Years Banishment to have been really a Punishment, when Thucydides and Aristides, and such great Men suffer'd it; but they thought it was too great a Credit to Hyperbolus, and would only encourage him to boast, that he had suffer'd the same Punishment which was inflicted upon the most gallant Men of Athens ^o.

^a V. Gellius, l. 20. c. 1. de Veratii petulantia.

^c Vid. Hobbes de Cive, c. 13. f. 16. Leviathan. c. 27. Author. De princip. just. & decori p. m. 200. Cumberland. de Legibus Nat. c. 5. f. 39.

^d Vid. Grot. ubi supra, f. 33.

^e Vid. l. 47. t. 19. l. 4. f. 1. &

^f l. 12. f. 1. D. de Incendio. ruina. &c. t. 10. l. ult. D. de Injuriis, &c. t. 11. l. 6. D. de extraord. Crim. t. 12. l. ult. D. de Sepulchro violato, t. 14. l. 1. f. 3. D. de termino motu. l. 48. t. 8. l. 3. f. 5. ad L. Cornel. de Sicariis. In most of these Laws which are here cited by the Author, there is an unjust respect of Persons, which he himself blames a little farther, as we shall find, if we take the pains to examine 'em. See the Orbis Romanus of the late Mr. Spanheim, of the Diversity of Punishments among the Romans; according to the Difference of Persons.

^g Vid. l. 48. t. 7. l. 38. f. 24. l. 39. f. 4. D. ad L. Jul. de Adul. l. 48. t. 13. l. 6. D. ad L. Jul. Pecul. t. 13. l. 5. t. 3. D. ad L. Jul. Pecul. l. 4. t. 4. l. 37. f. 1. D. de minor. l. 50. t. 17. l. 108. D. de divers. rer. jur. Ad. Olearius Utr. Perf. l. 3. c. 6. of the Pecuniary Mule, paid among the Russians for an Abuse offer'd, call'd by them Bizzellia.

^h De Repub. l. 6. c. ult. ⁱ V. D. L. 48. t. 8. l. 1. f. 5. ^j Vid. Editionem Theodorici Reg.

^k Helena, v. 306, &c. Plin. Nat. Hist. l. 2. c. 63.

^l Strangling is an odd sort of Death, by stopping the Breath which endeavours to find a Passage. Ad. l. 48. t. 19. l. 28. f. 2. D. de Pænis. To this also may we apply that of Dis Chrysolom. Orat. ad Alexandrinos. The one is the Death of a Malefactor, the other of an unfortunate Slave.

^m Odyss. l. 22. v. 465, &c. ⁿ Seld. J. N. & G l. 7. c. 6. Thus Philo Jud. in Faccum, is very angry that the Jewish Magistrates and Senators at Alexandria should be scourg'd in the same manner, and with the same Instrument, as the meanest Egyptian Slaves were. To this we may refer that of Seneca, de Constantia Sapient. c. 4. There are some Slaves, that had rather be scourg'd than beat. And it was I presume a very ignominious Punishment which is mention'd Addition. i. Leg. Burgund. tit. 10.

^o Vid. Platarch. Alibiades, p. 197. B. Where there are these Verses quoted out of Plato the Comick Poet.

Worthy to suffer what he did, and more,
But not in such an honourable way;
'The Abjeſt Wretch the Sentence did disgrace,

Vid. Plat. Nicias, p. 530. E. where he speaks of the same Matter.

[•] Thus it was some sort of Comfort, Aenea magni ſextra calis -----

Virg. Aeneid. l. 10. v. 830. t. de la Corda in loc.

XXVI. Neither can I see any Necessity that every Commonwealth should take its Measure and Standard for the Punishment of Crimes, from the penal Sanctions of the Jewish Law. Because that part of the Law was the positive and civil Law of the Jews, and was accommodated to the Genius of that People and Commonwealth. From which, since the Constitutions and Tempers of other Nations and Commonwealths are very different, there is good Reason why the Penalties too shou'd be different. Whether this indeed will hold true with respect to the capital Punishment of Murther, as well as to other Crimes, may bear some Dispute. Because, the Law which determines that Punishment, seems to have been promulg'd to all Mankind, as well as to the Israelites. And the Reason of the Punishment is evident: Because, a Man who is barbarous to that Degree, as to take away any Man's Life maliciously, can never give sufficient Caution to others, without losing his own ^a. However, I think it should not be thought a Breach of that Command God gives, Gen. ix. 6. ^b, if a Murtherer should be released from capital Punishment, upon some extraordinary Exigence of the Commonwealth. For since the Determination of all Punishment is of positive Institution, and all positive Laws may be accommodated to the Necessities of the State; that Law may also reasonably be suppos'd to admit of the same Exception. Some indeed are of Opinion, that that Passage is rather a divine Commination than a Law, and that God only declares by it, that he will execute Vengeance upon Murtherers, either by Men, or by some other severe Method, if they happen to escape the Inquisition, and Rigour of human Justice. See Acts xxviii. 4. Neither doth Grotius's Interpretation of it, L. i. c. 2. f. 5. exclude the Exception which is grounded upon the State of the Commonwealth ^c. But Selden, L. iv. c. 1. expressly affirms, that the Jewish Rabbins did not understand that place to be a Law of such Force, as that it should always oblige the Magistrate necessarily to punish Murther with Death; but that it was an exprefs Indication of God's Hatred to that Crime, from the Severity of the Penalty he annexed to it; which it might be lawful for Man, according to the Posture of Affairs, and Variety of Circumstances in the publick Government of the State, either to limit, or inflict. And for this Reason, the Jews (as their Law directs in other Cases) did not inflict Death upon any of their own Nation that kill'd a Profelyte of the Gate, or any other Gentile. Nay, if any Number of Jews, or other circumcised Persons, had by Blows or Kicks, or any other way kill'd one of their own Nation, so that no one of them separately did any thing which might be the immediate Occasion of his Death, all of them were acquitted from suffering that Penalty which was otherwise due by course of Law; because neither of them singly was guilty of the Murther ^d. However this be, I would not be thought to persuade the World to an unwarrantable Easiness in dispensing with the Punishment of this Crime. Neither would I undertake to defend that Expression in one of the Constitutions of the Kings of Poland, relating to the Punishment of ^e Murther in the Nobility, Nos divini Juris rigorem moderantes, We mitigating the Rigour of the divine Law ^f. And here I should take some Notice of the Dispute, which some scrupulous Persons have rais'd against the lawfulness of punishing Theft with Death. But upon this I refer you to the Opinion of Grotius, L. ii. c. 1. f. 14. g. Yet Selden says, De J. N. & G. L. vii. c. 6. That among the Jews the Punishment of a Gentile, found guilty of Theft, was Death; but that the natural Jews were used with more gentleness ^h. And Herod's Laws are condemn'd as too severe by Josephus, That such Persons as were guilty of Burglary, or of breaking up, or digging into Houses, and such as robbed in the Night, should be sold out of the Land to Strangers. By a Law of Solon's at Athens it was decreed, That the Penalty for simple Theft, if what was stolen was recover'd, should be to pay double; or if it was not recover'd, ten times the Value of it. But it was added, That if any Person had surreptitiously taken away out of the Licæum or Academy, or the publick Schools, either Clothes, or Cups, or any thing of the least Value, or any Vessels out of Schools of Exercise, the publick Walks, or Portico's, worth more than ten Drachms, he should be punish'd with Death ⁱ. What Punishment the Roman Law inflicted is very well known. Justinian does not allow that a Man who was guilty of no more than simple Theft, should suffer even so much as Mutilation of Members ^k; though otherwise it cannot be thought absurd that every Criminal should be punish'd in the Part which offended, so Alexander Severus punish'd a Notary who exhibited a false Libel of a Cause before the Council, by passing Sentence upon him, that the Nerves of his Fingers should be cut, so that he might never use them to write more ^l. So Seleucus pass'd a Decree, that an Adulterer should be condemn'd to lose his Eye, because the Eye makes the first Breach upon the Chastity, and so much forbidden Passion may be express'd in Looks, as may easily kindle the most unlawful Lusts. And so also

^a To this Purpose is that of Antiphon. Orat. 15. All Courts of Justice that sit upon Murder, are always in the open Air, that the Judges may not be forced to come into the same place with the Malefactors; and that the Prosecutor may not be under the same Roof with the Murderer. Add. Libanius, Progymn. loc. com. contra Homicidam. ^b See Grot. on that place, and on Mat. v. 40.

^c Add. Grot. in Flor. sparf. ad Jus Justin. ad L. Corn. de Sicar. ^d See more in the same place. ^e See the Abstract of the Latin Letters of Tollius in the Nouvelles de la Republ. des Lettres Avril 1700. pag. 371, 372. and Mr. Thomasius's Dissertation, de Jure aggratiandi principis Evangelici in causis Homicidii. Chap. iii. Sect. 9. Printed at Hall in 1707. also another of his de statuam Imperit potestate Legislatoria, &c. Sect. 43. ^f Add. Philo Judæus de legibus special. ^g Grot. Lib. ii. cap. 1. Sect. 14. says, that the Laws have no Right to punish with Death all sorts of Crimes, but only those that are so heinous as to make the Offender deserve to be cut off from the Commonwealth. But Gronovius judiciously remarks thereupon, that the smallest Faults in themselves may become capital Crimes, when they relate to Things, from which it is easy to abstain, and which there has been good Reasons to forbid on pain of Death. For in that Case, he that violates the Law, ought to complain of no body but himself. 'Tis upon that account, that the Severity of military Discipline is grounded; and we see that God forbid Adam and Eve, on pain of Death, to eat of the Fruit of a certain Tree, which, in it self, was a very indifferent thing. ^h Josephus Archæol. Jud. l. 16. c. 1. ⁱ Lampridius, Alexander. c. 28.

^j Add. Aristot. Problem. f. 29. c. 14.

^k Justinian. Novell. 134. c. ult.

the Law of God commands, That the Woman's Hands should be cut off, who in any Strife, between her Husband and another Man, drawing near to deliver her Husband out of the Hand of him that smiteth him, putteth forth her Hand and taketh him by the Secret, Dent. xxv. 11. ^a. However Anton. Matthæus, De Criminibus, Tit. de Furtis, C. 2. puts a handsome Interpretation upon Justinian's Institution ^b by urging for it, That since 'tis generally either Idleness, or Poverty, that forces People to steal, the Emperor was not willing Thieves should be punish'd by losing the use of their Limbs, that they might not be depriv'd of the Instruments necessary for them to reform their bad course of Life; and when they ought rather to be forced upon some laborious Employment. In Germany, the Law, that all Thieves should be hang'd, was made by Frederick the Second ^c. And it was afterwards confirm'd by Charles V. but look'd more severe in him than in Frederick, because he took no Care of the Value of the Coin which was then sinking. Upon the whole, though I am of Opinion, that 'tis possible for Judges to be too free in inflicting capital Punishments, and that sometimes it might turn more to the Advantage of the State, if such Criminals as are here spoken of, were rather condemn'd to some useful Labour and Service ^d; and so we are told Sabaco, King of Egypt, forced all Malefactors that were condemn'd in capital Punishments, to publick Labours; and that the Country was soon sensible of the Benefit it receiv'd from such an Application of them ^e: Yet I make no doubt but that Theft may lawfully be punish'd with Death. And from what has been said, it will be easy to answer all the Objections urg'd to the contrary, especially those from Ant. Matthæus.

XXVII. Neither lastly, is it necessary that a Man should suffer in the same manner in which he offended, or that a Criminal should always be punish'd by ^f Retaliation. This Opinion is commonly ascrib'd to the Pythagoreans, who defined Punishment by Ἀντιπέπονδες, or a suffering the like. And the Judgment of Rhadamanthus is brought to confirm this Method. Justice is duly then administered ^g; when the Offender suffers as his sins. But Aristotle, Nicom. l. v. c. 8. proves the Absurdity of the Ἀντιπέπονδες, or Retaliation, by this Instance: If a Magistrate, says he, strikes another Person, he is not to be stricken again, but if another Person strikes a Magistrate, he is not only to be stricken again, but to be further severely punish'd. As to that Command in Ex. xxi. 23. and Levit. xxiv. 20. the Jewish Doctors are generally of Opinion, that it does not oblige to a rigid Retaliation; but that such Crimes may be redeem'd by a pecuniary Mulct. Bodinus de Repub. L. vi. C. ult. denies that this Law was ever in force. For example, that it was never understood, that when one Man broke another's Leg, his should be broken too; and he adds, that that Form, An Eye for an Eye, and a Tooth for a Tooth, is no Argument to the contrary; because that was only a proverbial Expression, and implied no more, than that the Penalty ought to be proportion'd to the Offence: that what deserv'd only a Reproof ought not to be punish'd with Death; and that such Offences as deserv'd Death, ought not to be correct-ed with a Reprimand; and that this may easily be infer'd from hence, that those divine Laws do not punish Theft with Theft, Adultery with Adultery, nor Wound with Wound. But Theft with double or four times the value of the thing stol'n; Adultery with Death; and a Wound with a pecuniary Mulct. The same divine Law hath also respect of Persons; for instance, if a Man curses a private Person, the Law prescribes no severe Punishment to be inflicted on him; but if a private Man curses the Ruler, or a Son his Father, the Punishment is Capital. On the other hand, Constantius L' Empereur Babakama, c. 8. § 1. contends for the literal sense of those Words. I shall not undertake to determine the Dispute between 'em; but after all, 'tis confess'd however, that it was left to the Power of the Judge to transmute the corporal Punishment of Retaliation into a pecuniary, according to the nature of the Circumstances, from that Passage of the Law, Ex. xxi. 29, 30. where a greater Punishment is admitted to be chang'd for a less. And Josephus says in his Antiquities, L. iv. C. 8. That he that put out another Man's Eyes, was to suffer the like, and lose the same himself, which he deprived the other of; unless the Person that lost his Eye, was content to take a Sum of Money in lieu of that Penalty; the Law allowing the Sufferer to set the Rate upon his own Misfortune. But on the other hand, they that endeavour to prove Retaliation, urge that Passage in Deuteronom. xix. 19. ^h. But it may be answer'd, that the Laws there mention'd cannot with any appearance of reason be thought to belong to this Subject; since the Punishment for Evil-speaking, and Cursing, exceeds all the Measures of Retaliation; the bare Endeavour having the full

^a Thus Vulscius Gallicanus in Acidius Cassius, c. 4. relates, That he had cut the Nerves of the Deserters Legs. Add Cujacius's Observ. L. 7. c. 15.

^b Institut. l. 4. t. 1. De obligat. que ex delicto nascuntur, l. 5.

^c Feudor. l. 2.

^d 27. s. 8. de Pace tenenda.

^e Herodot. Hæcæse, p. 90. Ed. H. Steph. D. de Siculis, l. 1. c. 65.

^f Sir Thomas More, Utop. l. 1. l. 1. v. 655, 656.

^g See Græc. B. 2. c. 20. l. 32.

^h Ovid. de Arte Amandi.

-----*Neque enim lex æquior ulla est,
Quam necis artifices arte perire sua.*

-----*Th' Inventors, as 'tis just,
Should feel thole Pain: themselves discover'd first.*

Quintil. Decl. 11. p. 154. The Justice of Revenge is shortest when the Crime is the measure of the Punishment. And if the Nature of Revenge be consider'd, a Man is best reveng'd, when his Injuries are punish'd in the same way they were committed. Senec. l. 5. Contr. Præfat. p. 276. What a Man designs for a Punishment to another, is often by a very just Method of punishing chang'd into his own. Polyb. l. 12. in Excerpt. Peiresc. Since he hath carried himself with so much Bitterness and Moroseness to others, 'tis just others should use him with the same Unkindness. ^b Conf. L. 9. t. 2. l. ult. C. de Accusat. & Inscip. L. 9. t. 46. l. ult. C. de Calumn. L. 9. t. 12. l. 7. C. ad L. Jul. de Vi Publica. Josephus Archæol. Jud. t. 4. c. 8. No Israélite shall have by him any mortal Poison: And if any such be found in his Possession, he shall die, and suffer what he was to have done whom the Poison was prepar'd for. Diod. Siculus, l. 1. c. 77. repeats an Egyptain Law of the same Nature.

Evil set in view. However, in other respects the Penalty of that is not unjust. For there is no difference between an Evil-speaker, and one that does ill, but only in the Opportunity ^a. Thus by the Law of God, a Man that brought an evil Report upon a Virgin, was lookt upon to be equally guilty with one that forced her Honour. Deuteron. xxii. 19, 29. ^b. For there can be nothing more injurious and malicious than Detraction; it maketh us think well of Falshood, and forces Innocence it self to look guilty ^c. And the State of human Affairs must be reduced to a very desperate Condition indeed, if every Man's malice has power to make us criminal: For Innocence can never be happy enough, to escape the pernicious Diligence of a slanderous Tongue ^d. In one of the Laws of the Twelve Tables it is instituted, that the Man that breaks another's Limbs, unless he can make his Peace, and compound with him, shall suffer the like. Upon which Law I refer you to the Dispute between Favorinus and Sex. Cacilius in Gellius, ^e L. xx. c. 1. But it is plain, that Retaliation was grown out of use at Rome, from the 7th Section of the Institute, De Injuriis ^f. Diodorus Siculus, L. xii. c. 17. gives us an Account of a Law made by Charondas to this effect: If any Man puts out another's Eye, let his Eye also be put out. "It happen'd, that a Person blind in one Eye was set upon, and lost his other, and consequently was entirely depriv'd of Sight: Now in this case, tho' the Criminal was to be depriv'd of one Eye, yet his Punishment was justly thought less than he deserv'd; because, tho' he might seem to be sufficiently punish'd by the Letter of the Law, yet his Loss was not considerably so great as the others. And therefore it would look more like Justice, where the Penalty was to be laid equal to the Injury, that the Person, who entirely depriv'd the Man of Sight that had lost one Eye before, should lose both his. The blind Man grown therefore impatient at his Misfortune, and the Partiality of the Case, took the Courage to represent his Case to the People, bewail'd the unhappy Condition of his Life, and beg'd them to alter the Law; at last putting the Rope about his Neck (as the Custom was there upon such occasions) his Entreaties had the desir'd Effect, the Law was abrogated; a new one better consider'd was prefer'd, and he escap'd the Death he was ready to have suffer'd ^g." But however this be, 'tis certain, that so rude a Notion of Retaliation can never be a just Measure of Punishment. For in the first place, there are a great many Crimes, which it cannot possibly be apply'd to. As I believe, Retaliation was never thought a proper Punishment for Adultery, Ravishment, Bestiality, Treason against the State, Reviling, Detraction, Sorcery, Forgery of Wills or Deeds,

Counterfeiting the Coin, imposing of false Births or adulterous Children, procuring Abortion, Kidnapping, Crimen Ambitus, Incest, Sacrilege, Removing the Landmark, Defacing Sepulchres, Cozenage and Collusion, Prevarication, and the like. And by the way, it should be mention'd as an Instance of the Wisdom and Piety of the Emperor Theodosius, that he took off the shameful Punishment of Women taken in Adultery then usual at Rome, by which they were to be condemn'd to the publick Stews, and were there to be prostituted to all that came, a Bell ringing all the time they suffer'd that Infamous Punishment. For though an Ignominy of this Nature might possibly produce the same Effects, as the most severe Punishment; yet since this Punishment could not be put in Execution without Sin, it seem'd rather to increase than take away the Guilt of the Fact it punish'd ^h. But admitting that those Laws which seem to establish Retaliation apply it only to Injuries and Hurts that affect the Body; and admitting that one may imagine a Case, where the Crime committed may be well enough turn'd into the Punishment of it; and that neither the Persons, the Place, the Time, Quality, or Cause, inhanse or aggravate the Crime; yet even upon such Suppositions simple Retaliation will not be a proper Punishment. For Instance, a common Man strikes another a Box on the Ear, in some private Place; now if the Person that suffer'd the Stroke is to return the other the like, 'tis to be fear'd, he will hardly be exact enough to observe a just Proportion ⁱ. And if the Execution be refer'd to a third Person, how shall he know with what force the first Blow was given? Besides, in many Crimes Retaliation might be too severe, if there should be no Distinction made, whether the Fact were committed maliciously, or not; or if no difference of Persons be observ'd. For Example ^k, a Man designing to strike another a slight Blow in the Face with his Diamond perhaps, or some Stone he wears on his Finger, unhappily, against his Intention, strikes out his Eye; it would be very severe, if such a Person should, upon that Misfortune, be condemn'd to lose his Eye too. So if a Gentleman kick a common Porter or Labourer, it would be too severe to sentence that the Kick should be returned again upon him, because 'tis a Dishonour to a Person of Quality to receive a Kick, and none to one of mean Condition. Again, on the other hand, in many Crimes the Punishment of Retaliation seems too easy: And this may happen particularly from a Disparity between the Persons who did, and who suffer'd the Injury; or else from a Disparity of Place, Time, and other Circumstances. But in the general, the Arguments which Grotius produces in the Chapter before cited, § 32. entirely

^a Quintil. Decl. 331. 'Tis a sort of Murder to attempt any Man's Life, that ought not to be kill'd. And Pliny in his Panegy. c. 35. n. 3. speaking to the Delators, tells them, "That they were to expect Punishments equal to the Rewards they had had before, that their Hopes should be no greater than their Fears, and that they should be as much afraid themselves, as they were fear'd before by others."

Judges perjure themselves; extinguishes the Light of Truth, involves all that hearken to it in a Mist of Lies, and then easily finds a way to deprive Men of their Lives.

^b Isocrates de Permutatione, p. 540, 541. Detraction makes

^c Quintil. Declam. 11. Defamation can have no effect, but by ^d Constitut. Sicul. L. 2. c. 14.

^e Not. Attic.

^f Institut. L. 4. t. 4. l. 7.

^g Demolthenes mentions the same Law, adv. Timocratem. Aristot. Rhet. l. 1. c. 7.

The Punishment is not the same when a Man puts out his Eye that has but one, and one of his that hath two. Add. Pet. Gregor. Tholofanus Syntagm. l. 31. c. 10.

^h Socrates Hist. Eccl. l. 5. c. 18.

ⁱ Add. Lex Wisigothorum,

l. 6. t. 4. c. 3.

^k V. Aristot. Ethic. ad Nicom. l. 5. c. 8.

confute that wild extravagant Notion of Retaliation; where he also with very good Reason denies, that when a Man hath deliberately, and without much alleviating Circumstances, done hurt to another Person, he ought to suffer just as much Harm as he has done, and no more. For 'tis a Contradiction to Equity, that the Fears and Dangers of the innocent and the criminal should be equal. And there would be but slender Provision made for common Security, if Malefactors should be under no greater Fears from publick Justice and the Laws, than good Men are from their Insolence and Wickedness; especially since the Hopes of Concealment, of escaping by Flight, or by some way or other evading Justice, are in a manner additional Advantages to every Villain. And besides, the most sacred Laws themselves do sometimes ordain the same Punishments for imperfect and finish'd Crimes, Deut. xix. 19. Exod. xxii. 9. 2. It was a remarkable Law which Strabo mentions, L. xv. among the Indians, He that deprives Men of the use of a Limb shall not only suffer the like, but shall have his Hand cut off also. But if any Person deprives an Artificer or Mechanick of the use of an Hand, or an Eye, he shall be put to Death. And by Solon's Law, the Person that put out one of another's Man's Eyes, was to lose both his own ^b. And so also a Man that went arm'd with a Design to kill any Person, fell under the reach of the Law de Sicariis, L. xlvi. t. 8. l. 1. D. ad L. Corneliam. Now though the Consequence of this be, that the Punishment of a mature finish'd Crime should be proportionable to the degrees of its Consummation, yet since human Justice can inflict no Punishment greater than Death, and it is impossible that should be repeated, there must necessarily be a stop made there; though according to the degrees of the Crime, the Punishment of Death may be made more painful by Torture, or appear more grievous from the Circumstances of Ignominy and Disgrace, which either attend or follow after it.

XXVIII. I proceed in the next place, to consider those Punishments which are inflicted by human Justice, for other Mens Crimes. And here, without Dispute, ^c they that do really partake of the guilt of the Offence, ought to share also in the Punishment, in proportion to the Influence they may be supposed to have in the Fact; since they suffer not for another Man's Fault, but their own. But now how, and by what Method of acting a Man may be said to partake of another's Crime, I have shewed before ^{d e}. But it must be observ'd, that there is this difference between Satisfaction for Damage and Punishment, that 'tis more usual for human Justice to condemn an Offender to make Restitution, than beyond, and besides that, to suffer Punishment also: Because Imprudence or Levity of Offence may be sufficient Motives to supersede Punishment, though perhaps not to excuse Reparation for Damages. It was a remarkable Law which was made by Thomas Raudolf, Regent of Scotland ⁱ to suppress the Robbetries which were then frequent; and that was, That all Husbandmen should leave their Plows, and other Instruments of Tillage, in the open Fields; and that at Night they should not so much as lock or secure their Houses or Barns; and that the Losses they suffer'd should be paid to them by the Justiciaries of the Kingdom, who were to be reimburs'd by the King, and the King was to satisfy himself by the Goods and Chattels of the Robbers that were apprehended. But now as to Crimes contracted by Corporations or publick Bodies, it must be observed, that though the Decrees, to which the major Part consents are generally look'd upon to be Decrees of the whole Body; so that the lesser Number dissenting, shall be oblig'd notwithstanding to see them executed ^{g h}; yet if there be any Enquiry made about the guilt of such an Act, those Persons only are to be supposed liable, who actually gave their Consent. And those are innocent, who denied their Agreement to it from the Beginning, and constantly persisted to dissent from it ⁱ. Alexander the Great took Thebes, and commanded that all the Thebans should be sold for Slaves, excepting only such of them, as were against passing the Decree to break Alliance with the Macedonians ^k. Nay, it is not uncommon to excuse those at least (as to the highest degrees of Guilt) who dissented at first, but afterwards fell in with the prevailing Number, and then pursu'd the Execution of the criminal Decree as far as they had Power. So the Greeks were said to have spared Antenor and Aeneas, ^l who had persuaded the Trojans to restore Helena, though the latter of them perform'd many brave Actions in Defence of his Country. It is also to be further observ'd, that the Punishment of a Corporation or Body politick, as such, is different from the Punishment of particular Persons and Subjects. The Punishment of a particular Subject is sometimes Death. And that which answers it in the Body politick is Dissolution ^m; and when a Corporation or Community is thus dissolv'd, all usufructuary Advantages are said to be at an end with it, in the same manner as in Cases of Death ⁿ. Sometimes particular Persons are, by way of Punishment, made Slaves, and the Body politick suffers the like, in case it were once immediately subject to the civil Sovereign only, but is afterwards subjected to some other subordinate Body, or perhaps to a particular Subject. And lastly, as particular Persons may be punish'd by way of Mulct levied upon their Estates; so the Body politick, when it commits any publick Crime, is punish'd by Deprivation of the publick Goods belonging to it, such as Forts, Naval Stores, Ships of War, Arms, Treasure, publick Lands, Privileges, and the like. So when the People of Antioch, upon the Imposition of a new Tax, pull'd down the Emperor Theodosius's Statues in all the publick Places, he punish'd them by forbidding

^a V. Editum Regis Theodorici, C. 13. § 50.

^b Diogenes Laert. Salon.

^c V. Grat. L. 2. c. 21. f. 1.

^d See above in B. 1. c. 5. f. 14. and in B. 3. c. 1. f. 4, 5.

^e Vtd. Jacob. Godofredum disc. in C. L. 9. t. 8.

ad L. Juliam. Majest. l. 5. c. 9. & 10.

^f Buchanan Rer. Scotie. L. 9.

^g Vid. Polyb. l. 5. c. 49. in fin. Plin.

^h 1. 6. Ep. 13. Particular Men at the first Proposition of any Matter may lawfully dissent; but when the Decree is pass'd, that which the Majority agreed to, must oblige all.

ⁱ Upon this, see above in B. 7. c. 2. f. 15.

^j See Luke xxiii. 51.

^k Plut. Alexander. p. 670. D.

^l V. T. Liv. l. 1. c. 1.

^m Add Constitut. Sicil. l. 1. tit. 47.

ⁿ Medejinus in L. 7. t. 6. l. 21. D. quibus mod. Ujfract. amit them the use of the Theatre and the Baths, and by taking from them the Title of Metropolis, which their City enjoy'd before ^a. And so Marcus the Emperor took away from the same People all the publick Shows and other Ornaments of their City (though he afterwards restor'd them again) ^b. So Severus demolish'd the greatest part of Byzantium, ruin'd the Theatres, and Baths, and all the Ornaments of the City, reduc'd it almost to a Village, and made it subject to the Perinthians ^c. And thus the Emperor Constantius by way of Punishment to the same City, because they had kill'd his General Hermogenes, took away from them the Dole of Corn, which he had usually before distributed among them ^d. But however in Crimes where there are Numbers of Complices, 'tis reasonable, the chief Promoters and Abettors, should be punish'd with greatest Severity ^e. And in short, in estimating the Crimes and Penalties of Corporations and Bodies politick, it should be consider'd, as Quintilian very well observes ^f, "That generally whatever a Community undertakes, must be ascribed to the power of the Counsellors that direct it; and that all popular Disturbances and Insurrections are of greater or less Violence, according as the People are exasperated. Just as all Motion in our Bodies derives it self from our Minds, and our several Parts are as it were dead and useles, till put in Action by the Soul. 'Tis the easiest thing in Nature to raise any kind of Passion in a Multitude; for there was never any Assembly, where every Man could perfectly govern himself by his own Thought, Sense and Reason, Nor was there ever a Multitude that had the Foresight and Prudence particular Men have. Whether it be that all Men are less affected with publick Concerns; or that every Man is less solicitous, where he doth not think himself in particular answerable for the Success. For the Presumption and Dependence Men have upon others, make them negligent and remiss themselves. And so Cicero says, that among the Romans, if any Number of Soldiers had offended against the Laws military, some few of them were punish'd as their Lot happened, That so the Terror might reach all, though but few fell under the Punishment ^g. And this is implied in the Answer of Germanicus's Army to him in Tacitus, that he should punish the Guilty, but pardon such as had been Misguided ^h.

XXIX. And here it may be question'd, whether a Crime committed by a Community or Corporation will always leave it under execution of the Punishment; for Instance, if a Community has been publickly Guilty of some criminal Act, perhaps two or three hundred Years past? It may perhaps have some shew of Reason for the Affirmative to say, That as long as the Community lasts, it continues the same ^k, though the particular Members in it change, and succeed one another. But when the Question is of human Punishment, it ought in Truth to be denied. For it is more necessary, even in particular Men, to punish fresh, and therefore more scandalous Crimes, than old forgotten Faults. And therefore, there was very good reason for that Prescription of Crimes which the Roman Laws allow'd ^l. Besides, it is to be observed, that some things may be immediately and naturally predicated of a Community, as such; for Example, the having a common Stock, common Constitutions, Rights, and Privileges, which the particular Members cannot call their own. And again, that there are other things which agree to the Body, only as derived from the particular Members, or which first of all inhere in the Members, and afterwards influence and denominate the whole Body. Thus it is usual to call a Society learned, noble, wise, honourable, or contemptible, as the Majority of its Members is learned, noble, wise, honourable, or contemptible, tho' perhaps some of the Members may be unlearned, base, or imprudent. And in this latter Sense it is, that such Bodies may be said to have incur'd Punishment. For the Demerit adheres to the particular Members, as they are suppos'd to be Persons who have the use of their Understanding, and are capable of acting with Reason and Choice. But a Community, as such, and as it is conceiv'd to be distinct from the particular Members, has no Faculties by which it is capable of exercising such Actions as primarily and immediately contract Demerit; and which may therefore be suppos'd to be distinct from those of the particular Members. And therefore it follows, that if the Members, by whom the Body contracted the Demerit, are dead and gone from the Society, and the Guilt has not been continued by any Act of their Successors, that the Demerit it self expires with them; and consequently that which made the Body liable to Punishment; since the one cannot be justly inflicted without the other. Plutarch ^m indeed, in this case, appeals to the Methods of divine Justice, which sometimes, as we read visits the Sins of the Fathers upon the Children. But as the Proceedings of divine Justice are not always to be made a Pattern to human; so neither doth it follow that if it be Equity, to allow Posterity the Possession of those Rewards and Honours which were acquired by the Deserts of Ancestors; it is therefore Equity, that they should also suffer the Punishments due to their Ancestors Offences. For it is the Nature of a Benefit, that it may freely be bestow'd, at the Pleasure of the Donor, even upon a Person wholly undeserving; but the Nature of Punishment is quite different. The Romans (as Justin tells us) made use of the Pretence of an old forgotten Kindness, to undertake the Defence of the Acar-nians against the Etolians ⁿ, declaring that the Reason why they assisted them was, because the Acar-nians did not join with the other Cities of Greece, to send Forces against Troy, from which City the Romans would be thought to have derived

^a Libanius Orat. 13.

^d Socrates Eccles. Hist. l. 2. c. 13.

^e Cic. pro Cluentio, c. 46. Tacitus, Ann. l. 1. c. 44. init.

^f Bodinus de Rep. l. 3. c. 7. p. m. 527. & seqq. Ant. Matthæus de Crimin. ad l. 48. D. t. 18. c. 4. f. 30. Consl. Sicil. l. 1. tit. ult.

^g Vid. Ant. Matthæum de Crim. ad L. 48. t. 19. c. 4. t. 20. c. 4. f. 14.

^h Justinus, l. 28. c. 1. in fin.

^b Fulcatius Gallicanus in Avid. Cassius c. 9.

^c Vid. Liv. l. 28. c. 26. ab. init.

^e Herodianus, l. 3. c. 19.

^f Quintil. Declam. 11. p. 156. Ed. Lug. Bat.

^h Add. Polyb. l. 11. c. 27. in fin. & excerpt. Legat.

^k Plutarch de sera nurinis vindicta, p. 559. A.

^m Plut. de sera Num. Vind. d. 1.

themselves: Though it was clear this was nothing else but Pretence, and was only a Colour to excuse themselves for interposing in things it did not belong to them to be concern'd in ^a.

XXX. But however it is still true, that human Justice ought not to force a Man to bear part of the Punishment of another's Crime, when he was not accessary to the Commission of it. The Reason is, because all Merit and Demerit are entirely Personal, and founded in the Will of each Man; which certainly is, or nothing is, at his Command, and which can't contract any Guilt, but by some internal Motion of its own ^b. But because it often happens, that some Mens Offences are the Occasions of Evil to others, that we may not be apt from hence to make a wrong Inference, it is necessary to observe, in the first place, that not every thing that brings Uneasiness, Inconvenience, or Loss, upon a Man, is properly Punishment ^c. A Man when his Estate is confiscated upon some criminal Account, and he is reduced to Want and Poverty, may properly be said to have suffer'd Punishment. But how many Men are there, that come into the World without any other Fortune or Estate than their own Persons? How many are there that by Fire, Shipwrack, Incurfions, and Depredations of Enemies, are stripp'd of all, and whose Poverty cannot be call'd human Punishment, but fatal Misfortune? And I may say, that therefore the Evils, for Example, which Subjects sometimes feel from the Miscarriages and bad Government of their Princes, should be thought also to be of the same Nature with those other Inconveniences and Afflictions, which attend human Life; such as ill Constitution of Body, Infirmities of Age, unwholesome Air, Barrenness, and the like.

XXXI. And Secondly, it must be further observed, that there is great difference between the Damage which a Man suffers directly by another's hand, and that which falls upon him only by Consequence. A Man suffers the first, when he is depriv'd of that which he has already all proper Right to. The other happens, when that Condition is intercepted, without which he could not enjoy such a Right ^d. Thus when the Estate the Parents were possess'd of is forfeited, the Children also feel the Loss of it. But however, that is not a Punishment properly with respect to the Children, because they cannot come to the Inheritance of their Fathers Estate, unless their Fathers preserve it for them till they die. And therefore the Confiscation or Forfeiture only intercepts the Condition, without which the Children can have no Right to their Father's Estate ^e. But however, it was truly an unjust and barbarous Law (as Buchanan calls it) which was made by Mogaldus King of Scotland, That all the Goods and Chattels of condemn'd Criminals were to be forfeited to the Crown, excluding their Wives and Children from any Part of them ^f.

XXXII. Again, Lastly, it ought to be observ'd, that sometimes the Evil a Man may suffer, or the Loss of any Good he may sustain, may be occasion'd by another Man's Offence, or because another Man has not perform'd his Obligation; but still that this Man's Offence, or Deficiency in Performance of the Obligation, is not the proper and immediate Cause why the other suffers Evil; nor can any third Person pretend any direct Right from such an Offence to inflict Evil upon him ^g. Thus it is common for Fidejussors, or Bondsmen, to suffer Loss, when the Debtor they engage for, breaks his Promise. But the immediate Obligation that binds the Fidejussor or Bondfman to discharge the other's Debt, is his own Promise. For as a Man that engages himself to be bound for a Buyer, is not properly oblig'd from the thing bought, but from the Promise he made; so a Man bound for a Criminal is not properly oblig'd by the other's Crime, but by his own Engagement. From whence it follows, that when the Fidejussor or Bondfman is to suffer Evil, it must not be measur'd by the other's Crime, but by the Power he had to promise. And therefore when the Delinquent escapes, and it is necessary his Surety should make Satisfaction to Justice, 'tis not to be consider'd what Evil might have justly been inflicted on the Delinquent, but what Degrees of Evil the other could oblige himself by his own sole Consent to suffer for him. And hence it may also be interr'd, how far Bondsmen or Fidejussors may be admitted in capital Cases: And that may be only thus far; either that the Bondfman may promise the Magistrate (whose Duty it is to prosecute the Offender) that he will satisfy for the Damage he has done; or else that he will take care to bring him to Tryal, upon Condition that the Criminal may be admitted to Bail, if he be already apprehended, may be free from the Inconveniences of a Prison, and may not be oblig'd to appear at his Tryal in Irons; or if not apprehended, that nothing be issued out against him in his Absence, and before he has had a judicial Hearing. But no Man can oblige himself to suffer Death for a Criminal ^h; since no Man hath so much Power over his own Life. Neither can the nature of human Justice allow such Punishments to be inflicted. For the end of Punishment is to restrain Men from Transgressions, and dispose them to Obedience. But in this Case, neither has the Fidejussor himself offended, neither by his Act of Engagement doth he derive the guilt of the other's Crime upon himself. For it can be no Crime in him to desire that the Criminal should have a fair Hearing in a convenient Place, and be without trouble and disquiet, before Judgment pass'es upon him; nor is it any to promise he will pay the pecuniary

^a But the Expressions Mahomet the II. used to Pope Pius the II. were more ridiculous than this; That he was surprized to find Italy joined in a Confederacy against him, since the Trojans were his Ancestors as well as theirs, and since it ought to be their common Concern to revenge Hector's Death upon the Greeks, whom the Italians had now made an Alliance with, against him, Mich. Montaigne's Essays, l. 2. c. 36. p. 556.

XXXIII. Section. ^c V. Grot. L. 2. c. 21.

f. ult. l. 26. D. de Damn. Infesto, § L. 35. t. 2. l. 63. D. ad L. Falcidiam.

§ Relegat. &c.

in B. 5. c. 10. f. 12.

^f Buchanan. Rerum Sc. l. 4.

^b This Reason is taken from the Beginning of the ^d We have an instance of this in L. 39. t. 2. l. 24.

^e Vid. L. 48. t. 22. l. 3. D. de Interdict. & Relegat. &c.

^g Vid. Grot. d. l. f. 11.

^h See above

Mulct imposed on the Criminal, in what manner the Magistrate shall think fit to set it, when the Criminal is fled from Justice. Besides the End of human Punishment cannot be obtain'd by punishing the Surety; for if he punish'd, he must be punish'd, not because he himself is guilty of any criminal Action; but because he was so imprudent as to expose himself to Danger, upon the presumption of another Man's Honesty. And then all the Effect of such a Punishment will be this, that other Men will be more cautious for the future how they engage themselves; not that they will be more careful to avoid the Crime the Offender was guilty of. And therefore such a Punishment would seem to have no Regard to the Fact of the principal Criminal, but only to the unwary Credulity of the Surety. And therefore the Magistrate that punishes a Bondsman, or Fidejussor, understands neither the Nature of Punishment, nor his own Duty in inflicting it; except it appear that he design'd only to abuse him, and elude the force of publick Justice. And again, since no Man has such Right over his own Members, as to take Liberty to deprive himself at pleasure of any of them; it is evident that no Man can oblige himself to suffer the Punishment of Mutilation for another Person. But 'tis a different Case, when Jaylors, the Keepers of Malefactors, are punish'd with Death, who either by Neglect, or Collusion, gave them Opportunity to make their Escape; for they suffer for their own criminal Default, not for their Prisoners^a. Nay further, though it must be allow'd, that the free Heads, and Masters of Families, had the Liberty of setting up what sort of Government or Law they pleas'd; yet it does not seem to be a proper Method to banish the Fidejussors; as well because Banishment can hardly be called a Punishment; as because it is not the Interest of the Commonwealth to drive away such Subjects^b. There are several other Cases, where a Man may suffer Inconvenience by another's Offence. For Instance, if a Friend be so kind to me as to let me live in his House Rent-free, and it happens that my Friend, the Proprietor, be found guilty of some Crime for which his House is forfeited; 'tis plain that I must be sensible of Inconvenience in such a Case, because I must be forced to provide my self of a new Habitation, when perhaps he would have allowed me to have lived there longer upon the same Terms. But the Punishment doth not properly affect me. For the Publick, that is seiz'd in the Propriety of the House, may when it pleas'd, by its own Right, deny me the Use of it, at that Rate I had it before. So also Children of Traitors and Rebels are often denied civil Honours in the State. And this indeed aggravates the Punishment in the Parents, since their Children (whom they are supposed to have the greatest Affection and Regard for) must for their Fault live without any publick Character or Mark of Honour and Esteem in the Commonwealth. But this is in reality no Punishment to the Children; because the Government may bestow Honours where it pleas'd, and therefore may, by its own Right and Authority, exclude such Persons as have not in the least offended, from all Titles and Dignities it has power to confer, as often as it is thought agreeable to the Rules of Government, and the publick Good.

XXXIII. From these Distinctions it appears, that no Man can be justly punish'd by any civil Court for another Man's Offence, when he is free from the Guilt of it. And the Reason is, because that aptitude which disposes a Man for Punishment proceeds from Demerit, and Demerit in the last Resort is founded in the Will, which is certainly, or nothing is, at a Man's own Command, and which cannot contract any Guilt, but by some internal Motion of its own. 'Tis a Mistake in Grotius, in the Chapter before cited, Seç. 12. to think that there may be an Instance given to the contrary, extrinsecal to the Person of the Delinquent, in the Person of one he hath a violent Affection for. And I think it is nothing to the Purpose to say as Plutarch does^c; "that the Master, by correcting some of his Scholars, puts all the rest in mind of their Duty, and a General, by making a Decimation, punishes the whole Army." For both the Youth that is corrected, and every tenth Soldier that suffers, is really criminal himself. And hence therefore it follows also, that innocent Children are not to be punish'd for the Crimes their Parents were guilty of^{d e}. And therefore some Interpreters explain Josua c. vii. v. 24. thus, That Achan's Children were brought out only that they might hear the Instructions Josua gave them, and the rest of the People; and be advised to take warning how they were found guilty of the like Crimes themselves; not that they were to be ston'd with their Father. But if this Comment upon the Text will not be allow'd, see what Grotius saith, de J. B. & P. l. 2. c. 21. §. 14. in princip.^f.

-----*Ne perge queri, casusque priorum
Annumerare tibi. Nec culpa nepotibus obstat.
Tu modo dissimilis, rebus mereare secundis Excusare tuos.*

Lament no more, nor to your self misplace,
The Crimes or Fortunes of a former Race.
Our Parents Guilt but to themselves extends,
Taints not the Blood, nor to the Sons descends;
By your own worth you blot out the Disgrace,
And raise the faded Lustre of your Race^g.

^a See 1 Kings xx. 39. seqq. Acts XII. 19.

Provinces which bordered on the imperial City Cozco, were oblig'd, by way of Tribute, to furnish the Court of the Inca with Officers and Servants. And that upon any Crime or Neglect they were guilty of, the Provinces that presented them were to be responsible.

^c De fera Naminis Vindicta. p. 561. A. Ed. Weeb.

^d Vid. L. 9. t. 47. l. 22. C. de

Panis. L. 48. t. 19. l. 26. D. de panis.

^e Vid. Grot. ubi supra, f. 13, &c.

^f Ovid. Metam. L. 4. v. 669. 670.

*Illic immeritam, maternæ pendere linguæ,
Andromedam pœnas, injustus jussérat Armon*

There partial Jove did for her Mother's Crime.
The fair Andromeda in Chains confine.

^g Statius Thebaid. L. 1. towards the End.

And therefore that Law of the Persians, by which, when any single Person was found guilty of a Misdemeanour against his Prince, his whole Family and all his Relations were to suffer with him, was justly censured by Ammianus Marcellinus, as insupportable, and barbarously rigorous, beyond Example ^a. 'Tis certain indeed, that by Punishments of such Cruelty Princes intended above all things to provide for their own Safety ^b. For though a Man may have Bravery enough to despise his own Life (as Hellanicus, in Justin, is said to have done when he was old and childless, and was therefore the more animated in his Conspiracy against the Tyrant Aristorinius, because he had nothing to fear, neither his Age, nor Family) yet he will not be perhaps without Fear, when he knows that his Friends and Relations may be ruin'd with him, and upon his account. And again, it might seem to be a further Security to cut off the Sons, to prevent them from revenging their Father's Death. For says Aristotle, It is but folly to kill the Father when the Sons are spared ^c. Besides, is not easy to be believ'd, that a Man will have the boldness to undertake an Enterprize of so much Danger, without communicating his Design to his Relations. For which Reason Arian says ^d, Alexander put Parmenio to Death. And perhaps it may be true as Cassius in Tacitus said ^e, "That though there is a Mixture of Injustice in every exemplary Punishment, yet the evil particular Men suffer by it, is sufficiently recompens'd by the Benefit it brings to the Publick. Thus in the ninth Book of the Codes, t. 8. ad L. Juliam Majest. the Sons of Traitors were to suffer the same Punishment as their Fathers, when it was to be fear'd they might be influenced by their Fathers Example ^f. Thus the Children of the Maratocupeni (Robbers in Syria, who had that Name given them from the place they inhabited) were all cut off with their Parents, for fear they should grow to imitate them. Hobbes in his Leviath. c. xxviii. gives this Reason for Justice of this sort of Punishment, "Because such as are guilty of Treason against the State, are profess'd Enemies to it, and therefore it is lawful by the original Right of Nature to make War upon them; but in War the Sword judgeth not, nor doth the Victor make Distinction between nocent and innocent, nor has other Respect of Mercy, than as it conduceth to the Good of his own People. And besides, in publick Judgments and Trials in case of Treason, there is this thing particular, That the Sovereign may sit Judge in his own Cause; and sometimes, laying aside the Formalities and Intricacies of Process, begin with the Execution &. But yet conscientious Princes ought to consider what Tiberius said in the Case of Cn. Piso, Tacit. Ann. 3. c. xii. And indeed, neither in War ought the Sword to be so merciless, as not to spare such as Age and Innocence plead for. And since such as are born in the Commonwealth are Subjects, there is no Reason why they should be treated as Enemies, unless their own Acts make them such. And therefore, there can be no other way of punishing an innocent Son for the Treasons and Rebellions of his Father, than by intercepting those Goods from him which would otherwise have descended from his Father to him. In Peru under the Government of the Inca's, if a Curaca were put to Death for any Misdemeanour, his Son was not therefore denied to succeed in his Father's Place and Office, but was shew'd his Father's Crime and Punishment, that he might take Warning from thence how he offended ^h. But to be denied those Honours which a Man can lay no Claim to, is not properly Punishment. But neither do the other Reasons that are given, excuse the Injustice of this sort of Punishment. As for Instance, when the Greeks (as Dionys. Halicarnassus tells us) cut off any Tyrant, they always either kill'd or banish'd his Children, upon an Opinion, that it was a Contradiction to Nature, to suppose good Children could be born of bad Parents, or bad Children of good ⁱ. Neither can this sort of Punishment be justified by any Arguments from divine Threatnings, since the Dispute relates only to human Justice ^k. And therefore it was a wise and good Constitution of the Egyptians, that no Woman with Child should suffer Death, till she was deliver'd, which is also now observed in other Nations ^l. And here it may be observ'd, that it is an abuse of the legislative Power, when the Legislator takes Advantage of the Crimes of particular Offenders, to enact rigorous Laws against a whole Sex or Order; though perhaps afterwards, in Tract of Time, the Punishment it self may grow into Credit, and the Death inflicted by it be thought honourable. As it happen'd by that Law among the Indians; by which the Wife was to be burnt with her deceas'd Husband. The Occasion of which Law was, that the Women when they were tired, or out of Love with their Husbands, made no scruple to Poison them to make way for the Embraces of others ^m. And hence also it appears, that the Heir is not affected by any Punishment inflicted upon the Body, or Reputation of the Delinquent ⁿ. But a pecuniary Mulct will reach him, tho' in Equity it ought not to exceed the Value of the Inheritance which descends to him ^o.

^a Vid. Herodot. l. 3. p. 235. Edit. H. Steph. de Intapherne. Justin. l. 10. c. 2. The Macedonians had a Law much of the same Nature. Vid. Curtium, l. 6. c. 11. l. 8. c. 6.

^b Justin. l. 26. c. 1. l. 21. c. 4. towards the End. A. Cæ-

^c Rhet. l. 2. c. 21. ^d B. 3. ^e Ann. xiv. c. 44.

^f Vid. Ant. Matth. de Crim. l. 48. t. 2. f. 10. Am. Marcell. l. 28.

^g Id. Ant. Matth. de Crim. l. 48. t. 2. f. 10. Am. Marcell. l. 28.

^h Garcilass. de la Vega Comm. Reg. l. 2. c. 13.

ⁱ And it was very well said by Marcus in Vulcat. Gallicanus in Avidius Cassius, c. 12. And therefore ye ought to pardon Cassius's Children, his Son-in-law and Wife. But did I say pardon?

since they are Guilty of no Crime. ^k GOD, being the sovereign Arbitrator, and absolute Master of Mens Lives; may, when he pleases, take away the Life of whomsoever he thinks fit in his Wisdom; and in the Case now in Dispute, he destroys the Children, to punish the Fathers, by the afflicting sight of beholding their Execution. But besides, the Children themselves, being guilty before God, on account of their own Sins; he does 'em no wrong in taking away their Lives, which he only spar'd, purely as the Effect of his own Clemency. Grot. l. 2. c. 21. f. 14. ^l Diod. Sicul. l. 1. c. 77.

Ælian. v. Hist. l. 5. c. 18. cum Schefferi Notis. l. 48. t. 19. l. D. de Pænis. l. 1. t. 5. l. 5. f. 2. l. 18. D. de statu hom.

Plut. de sera Numin. Vindict. p. 552. D. Add. Quintil. Declam. 277. What Severity of Punishment on the other hand is used in Japan, we are inform'd by Bern. Varenius De Japanie, c. 18. Ferdin. Pinto Itin. c. 55. Varenius de Relig. Japan. c. 11.

p. 129. ^m Vid. Cic. Tusc. Quæst. l. 5. c. 27. Strabo, l. 15. Abr. Rogerius de Braminib. p. 1. c. 19, & 20.

n L. 48. t. 19. l. 20. D. de Pænis. ^o Vid. L. 47. t. 1. l. 1. D. de privatis Delictis.

CHAP. IV.

Of the Power of the Sovereign in determining the Value of Subjects.

The CONTENTS of every Paragraph of the Fourth Chapter.

- | | |
|--|--|
| I. Esteem defin'd and divided.
 II. Simple Esteem natural:
 III. Which may be either entire ;
 IV. Or impair'd ;
 V. Or utterly lost ;
 VI. Simple Esteem civil lessen'd or lost, either from a certain State ;
 VII. Or upon a Criminal Account.
 VIII. No Dishonour to refuse to engage in a Duel, when the Laws forbid it.
 IX. Simple Esteem not dependent upon the Pleasure of the Government ;
 X. Nor to be sacrificed for it.
 XI. Intensive Esteem.
 XII. The Foundations of it.
 XIII. Whether Power be the sole Foundation of Honour.
 XIV. An Aptitude only for Honour the Result of those Foundations.
 XV. What Persons have a Right of Precedence to others.
 XVI. Arguments upon which Precedence is pretended to :
 XVII. That of Antiquity examin'd. | XVIII. That of Power.
 XIX. The Quality and Titles of Power.
 XX. One Sovereign Prince not oblig'd to yield the Precedence to another.
 XXI. How such Princes might meet, without any Dispute for Places.
 XXII. Of Order between Equals.
 XXIII. The Power of appointing the Order of the Subjects lodg'd in the Sovereign.
 XXIV. Subjects of different Commonwealths, how compar'd.
 XXV. Nobility of Birth not from Nature ;
 XXVI. But from the Institution of Commonwealths.
 XXVII. Usually is, and ought to be founded upon Merit.
 XXVIII. The Nature of the Roman Nobility in the earliest Times.
 XXIX. Offices born in the State, the Measure of it afterwards.
 XXX. What is the Nature of the modern Nobility in greatest Part of Europe.
 XXXI. Nobility of Blood little regarded in some Places.
 XXXII. How far Civil Honours depend upon the Commonwealth. |
|--|--|

THOUGH there may be discover'd certain Foundations for the Preference of one Man to another, even in a Liberty of Nature, out of Civil Government; yet since those Foundations cannot give any Man a Right, unless enforced by Compact, or the Definitions of the Civil Power, I think this a proper Place to explain the Nature of those Distinctions, which are made between Men, according to the Esteem they are differently rated by. Now Esteem is the Value which is set upon Persons in common Life, according to which they may be equall'd, or compar'd with others, and be rated either higher or lower than those they are compared with. For there is a near Affinity between the two most noble Branches of moral Quantity, Esteem, and Price. The first is consider'd in Persons; the second in Things: Because as the one is the Rate of Persons in common Life, so the other is of Things. And as the chief Reason why a Price was set upon Things, was, that when they were to be exchanged or removed from one Person to another, they might be the better compared with one another; so the End intended by Esteem, is, that we may be able to form a Comparison between Men, by setting, as it were, a Value upon them, and, in consequence, establish a becoming Order and Distance between them, whenever they should happen to be united; it evidently appearing, that nothing was more absolutely inconsistent with the Convenience of Life, than an universal Equality. Now Esteem may be divided into simple and intensive. I shall consider both Parts of the Division, with the different Relations they may bear to such Persons as live in a *Liberty of Nature*¹, and such as are Members of the same Commonwealth.

II. Simple Esteem, with regard to such as live in a Liberty of Nature, seems chiefly to consist in this; When a Man's Behaviour and Character prove him to be one that acts upon Principles of Conscience, one ready to comply with the Laws of Human Society, and prepared, as far as he has Power, to observe the Law of Nature towards other Men². For as we say of a Thing which is of use in common Life, that it is of Value; and, on the contrary, say of a Thing there is no use of, that it is worth nothing; so it may be said, that that Person is a Man of some Value, that will suffer himself to be treated like a social Creature. But when a Man plainly shews himself unfit for Society, by disregarding and confounding the Law of Nature, and the good Offices he owes to other Men upon the Force of it; he may deservedly be look'd upon to be a Man of no Worth or Value.

III. Now this Sort of Esteem may be consider'd three Ways: First, as entire; Secondly, as impaired; Thirdly, as utterly lost. It continues entire,

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § 1, II.

¹ Such are Sovereigns, and Citizens of different States, with respect to one another.

² This simple Esteem answers to a perfect Obligation in another, by Virtue of which every Man is indispensibly bound to look upon all those to be Persons of Honour and Honesty, who have done nothing to render them unworthy of that good Opinion; and nor stain their Reputation in the least. Whereas, in the State of Nature, the Foundations of Esteem of Distinction produce by themselves but a very imperfect Obligation, as the Author shews a little further. We may also see, upon the Matter in Debate, a Dissertation, written by Mr. Thomassius, entituled, De Existimatione, Fama, & Infamia, printed in 1709. in which, he endeavours to set our Author right in some certain Particulars.

ture, till a Man, by some Act of deliberate wilful Malice, out of wicked Design, violates the Law of Nature to the Prejudice of another Person. For the Frailties of human Nature excuse Sins of Infirmity; and a Man does not by them forfeit the Reputation of being an honest Man, as long as he continues to have a firm Sincerity of Mind, and endeavours to do nothing but what is just and virtuous. And every Man is supposed to deserve this Esteem, till his own evil Actions deprive him of it. And therefore it may be said, that all Men naturally have an equal Share of this Species of Esteem, and before they have been guilty of any Criminal Action, must be supposed to be equally good and *virtuous*¹. And this is the Ground for that common Saying², Every Man should be supposed a good Man, till the contrary is proved. And this will hold True, notwithstanding those ill Dispositions Hobbes chargeth upon human Nature³. If he be in the right, indeed every Man must be supposed an ill Man, till the contrary be prov'd, or rather till he is depriv'd of all Power to do Hurt. But it must be said, that the Principle he at first lays down, That all Men have Power and Will to hurt or destroy one another, is far from being universally true, as I have prov'd already⁴. But yet because Men may wish and endeavour one another's Hurt and Ruin, therefore it may be said, that every Man may naturally be look'd upon to be a good Man; but that it is not impossible he may happen to be otherwise, and that Men may be kind and friendly to one another, but that it is not safe absolutely to rely upon or trust them.

IV. The same Species of Esteem is lessen'd or impair'd by criminal malicious Actions, especially by those of more than ordinary Guilt, and which were intended contrary to the Law of Nature, unjustly to disquiet other Men: The Effect of which Actions is, that it will not be thought safe to give Credit for the future to such a Deceiver, or to engage in Business or important Affairs with him, without solid Caution. But though a Man's Esteem may be impair'd, and his Reputation sink upon such ill Actions, yet it is not absolutely lost. For though I may justly suspect, that a Man will use me in the same manner, he hath used others; yet I cannot be always so absolutely certain of this, but that sometimes it may fall out contrary to my Expectations. For perhaps there might have been some particular Reasons which moved him to injure other Men, which he may not have against me; and a Man may sometimes be under the Power of violent Passions, which at other times he is free from. However, the Blot which a bad action leaves upon a Man's Reputation, may be taken off by a voluntary Tender of Reparation for Damages, or of some Equivalent; and by giving Evidences of Sorrow and Repentance. For all these voluntary unforced Motions may be Conviction enough, that his Intentions are really alter'd, and that he sincerely repents.

V. But a State and Way of Life which directly tends to the Harm of other Men without Distinction, and to make Advantages by manifest Injustice, utterly destroys all this Esteem. Now there are in most Commonwealths People, that, by a particular Way and Manner of Life, own and profess the Exercise of certain Vices; such as are, all Whores, Barwds, Strolers, and sturdy Beggars; all those Plato banisheth his Commonwealth⁴. And they are (as *Isocrates*⁵ saith) a Disgrace to that they live in⁵.

But now, how little Share of Esteem all these are to have, must be determined by the Government that tolerates them⁶: When the Publick thinks fit to give them Indulgence⁷, they cannot certainly, at least, be denied the common Rights of Men. So the Pimp expostulates in Tereuce, *Though I am a Pimp, the common Bane of Youth, a perjur'd Wretch, and publick Nuisance, yet I never did you any Wrong*⁸. 'Tis certain indeed, that a Way of Life maintain'd by the Profession of any sort of Vice, must very much tend to ruin all Natural Esteem; but unless the particular Vice be also attended with Injury to other Men, I do not see why the Persons that profess the Practice of it, should be treated as publick Enemies to all the World. But where the Profession of a Vice is accompanied with Harm and Injury to other Men; and where the Persons professing it treat no Man who is not of their own Society with better Usage than they would Beasts, declaring Hostility not against any certain Enemies, but against Mankind in general, 'tis manifest they utterly forfeit all that Esteem Men usually measure one another by. And such are all Pirates, Highwaymen, Robbers, Ruffians, Pickpockets, and the like. And the Difference will not be material, nor will their Characters

¹ B. 2. c. 2. §. 7, 8.

² In Areopagitico.

³ See above in B. 2. c. 2. §. 10.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § III, v.

¹ Plin. L. 5. Ep. 3. The Inequality of the Orders among Men should make no Difference in the Exactness of their Behaviour, Sanc-titas morum non distat ordinibus.

² See Mr Bayle's Nouvelles Lettres, occasion'd by F. Maimbourg's Critique de l'Histoire du Calvinisme. Tom. 11. p. 435. and Mr. Thomasius's Dissertation de Presumptione Bonitatis, printed at Hall, in 1700.

³ De Civ. c. 1.

⁴ Plato de LL. l. 1.

⁵ Atticus, Bishop of Constantinople, in Socrates's Ecclesiast. History, tells Calliopus, That he should distribute his Charity not among those that made a Trade of begging only for their Bellies, and spent their whole Life-time in nothing else, but among such whose Modesty would not suffer them to ask it, Socrat. l. 7. c. 25.

⁶ Thus neither were Beggars tolerated in Peru, under the Government of the Inca's. But they that were disabled, so that they could not maintain themselves, were kept by the Publick. Vid. Garcilass. de la Veg. Com. Roy. l. 5. c. 9. & l. 5. c. 11.

⁷ But formerly, in Egypt, there were professed Thieves allow'd of, of whom Diodorus Siculus, l. 1. c. 80. gives this Account: "Such as would be employ'd in the Trade of Thieving, enter'd their Names with the Grand-Master of the Order, and were obliged by Article to bring all the Things they stole to him; and they that lost any Thing, were to apply themselves by Letter to him, in which they were to signify the Particulars they lost, together with the Time and Place, when and where they were lost; and so every Thing being easily discovered, the Person robb'd was to pay a fourth Part of the Value of the Things, and take them again. For since it would have been impossible to prevent all Manner of Thieving, the Legislator found out this Expedient, that what was lost might be recovered, by paying only a small Price for Redemption. But no Question, it would have been a better Method, and less inconvenient for the Subjects, to have made severe Laws against such sort of People, and to have taken care they should be strictly put in Execution.

⁸ Ter. Adelp. Act. 2. Sc. 1. ver. 34, 35. Vid. Constitut. Sicul. L. 1. t. 10.

acters be much better'd, whether such Persons act always up to the Height of Wickedness and Villany, or not; whether a Robber will satisfy himself barely with committing Spoil and Robbery, and forbear Bloodshed, and be contented only to have taken away my Money or my Goods. For as 'tis no Justice, so it can deserve no Commendation, not to be an accomplish'd finish'd Villain. And without Dispute, whole Bodies and Claus of Pirates and Robbers ought to be rank'd under this Denomination, as long as they continue their Course of Life, notwithstanding they may seem to have some Resemblance of Justice among them¹. Neither will whole States and Commonwealths deserve better Rank, when they are not content to acquiesce in the Enjoyment of their own *Rights at home*², but invade and ravage the rest of the World, without regard to Faith or Compacts to the contrary. But where States or Commonwealths are so partial, as to be just in the Observation of Compacts with some particular Allies, but to all other their Neighbours, or at least to certain Nations, shew little Regard in the Observation of the Law of Nature, and scruple not, without just Provocation, to break it; their Credit, it is evident, must very much sink, but it would be too severe to deny them every Degree of Esteem. Now, the Effects that attend Men under such a Loss of Esteem, are generally such as these; that unless they leave off their unjust and bloody Way of Life, it will be necessary for other Men to shew them no more Mercy, than they do to Beasts of Prey; that when they are apprehended, they will be used with more Severity than any other sort of Enemies, though others might have threaten'd equal Danger; that they will not be look'd upon to deserve the common Offices of Humanity; and that all merciful Usage will be denied them, lest it may seem to encourage them in their Villanies. Moreover, as there can be no Strefs laid upon their Faith, should they offer it, since the Habit of Outrage they live in, must have cancell'd all good Opinion of them; so I doubt not it may very well be maintain'd, that neither are they capable of receiving Obligations of Faith from other Men, as long as they continue in their ill Course of Life (which must always be presuppos'd) for I either make a voluntary Agreement with such a Person, or he compels me by unjust Force. I cannot do the First, without deriving upon myself some Share of his Guilt, by treating such a Man as a Friend, that professes himself a common Enemy to all the World, except his own Accomplices. Not to say further, that it may be often an Injury to other Men to keep their Faith with Robbers; for Instance, in the Case of leaving some Depositum in trust with them³. But if a Robber should have done me some good Office, which it was no Discredit to me to receive from such Hands, it can be but reasonable that I should give him the Reward I promis'd⁴; but then he is not the Person he was suppos'd to be, a common Enemy to all Mankind besides his own Companions. On the other hand, if he compels me by unjust Force to engage my Faith to him, it appears from what has been said before⁵, that Compacts extorted by Fear are invalid. But after all, such Persons may recover their lost Esteem, by giving over their infamous Course of Life, and by taking upon them some other creditable Profession. And so may whole Bodies of Thieves and Robbers by such a Change, as well as particular Men. And from that Time they are to be dealt with as Men of Repute and Honesty. But they ought first of all, either to make Reparation, or obtain their Pardons, for the Injuries they have done.

VI. Simple Esteem, with regard to such as live under Civil Government, is that Sort of Esteem by which a Man is look'd upon to be the lowest, a common, but a sound Member of the State: Or when a Man hath not been declar'd a corrupt Member, according to the Laws and Customs of the State, but is supposed to be a good Subject, and is look'd upon and valued as such. And this Esteem may be lost under Civil Government, either, first, when it is denied to certain States or Conditions; or, secondly, when taken away upon a criminal Account. The First may happen two ways; either 1st, when the State hath naturally in itself nothing bad or wicked belonging to it; or 2dly, when it really deserves, or at least is thought to deserve, such an Imputation. Thus a State of Slavery, though it implies in its own Nature nothing bad or criminal to belong to it, yet in many Commonwealths deprives Men of all simple Esteem; and Slaves are neither look'd upon to be Civil Persons, rated or number'd in Civil Assessments, or considered or valued as Subjects. It is well known how despicable their Condition was among the *Romans*⁶; and the Esteem the Jews allow'd their Gentile Slaves was not greater⁷. So also in some Commonwealths, 'tis a Dishonour to be base Born, though the Blemish of the Birth is certainly only the *Parents Fault*⁸. And thus in India, there is a certain Race of Men called Peneas, which are look'd upon to be *infamous*⁹. A State under

¹ See above in B. 3. c. 6. §. 11. towards the End.

² See the same Book and Chapter, §. 10.

³ See Grotius Lib. iii. Cap. 3. §. 3. and Specimen Jurisprudentiæ Historiæ by Mr. Buddens, among his Selecta J. N. & Gent. §. 2, 3, 4, 5. where this Principle is applied to the old Romans, whose Commonwealth was founded by a Troop of Robbers, and other Rogues of all Sorts.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. V, VI.

¹ Thus in Heliodorus's Ethiopicks. L. 5. c. 15. There is mention'd a Law that was among the Pirates, by which he that first boarded the Enemy's Ship, and expos'd himself to the greatest Danger in the Fight, was to have his Choice of the Booty. And in the same Place we are told, That the Robbers observe some sort of Conscience among one another, and shew Kindness and Humanity to those they are acquainted with.

² Our Author here seems to point at the People of Barbary, who never pillage the Mahometans, nor commit Piracies upon any but the Christians. See the Parrhasiana, Tom. p. 204. 1st Edit.

³ Vid. L. 16. t. 3. l. 31. §. 1. D. Depositum, &c.

⁴ Vid. L. 18. t. 5. l. 6. ad L. Fuliam de Adulter.

⁵ Joseph. Archæol. Jud. l. 4. c. 8. Neither are Slaves permitted to be Witnesses, because of the Baseness of their Minds; since it may justly be believed, that their Testimonies are corrupted, either by the Hopes of Gain, or else out of Fear. Ad Selden. de J. N. & G. sec. Heb. l. 5. c. 3. Lex Wisigoth. l. 2. tit. 4. c. 9.

⁶ Vid. L. 6. t. 57. l. 5. C. ad S. Ctum Orficiatum & Stobæum. Serm. 75. Unle's we perhaps allow there is something in that which is said in Procopius Hist. Arcan. That the Infamy of a Woman's Vices not only spreads itself to her Husband, but descends in a greater Degree to the Children, and they are condemn'd to bear a perpetual Mark of Disgrace, as if Nature had stain'd them with the Dishonours of their Mother.

⁷ Vid. Abr. Rogerium de Bramm, Part 1. c. 2.

under the latter Consideration takes away or lessens Civil Esteem, either because the Persons that live under it, are employ'd in Things which cannot be perform'd without the Guilt of some Vice or Sin; or else are obliged by it to undertake such mean Offices and Duties, which none but Persons of base and abject Spirits would stoop to be employ'd in. What Value is to be set upon those of the first Sort must be known from the Laws, or Customs and Manners of every *Commonwealth*¹, those of the second Sort are common Hangmen and Executioners, Bailiffs, Goldfinders, and the like; Persons that in most Commonwealths are denied the Society of all People of Fashion or Reputation. And in some States the Laws themselves have expressly so determined. In Rome, Cicero says², "The Executioner" was forbid by the Laws of the Censors, not only to be seen in the Forum, but to see the Light, "or breathe the Air of that Place, or to have" any Habitation in the City;" as if his Presence would strike Infection and Pollution upon the publick Assemblies. In other States, it is thought scandalous to mix in Company with such Persons, only upon the force of Custom and common Opinion; it seeming natural to suppose, that Persons employ'd in cruel and stovish Offices, would have generally Humours and Dispositions suitable to their Employments; and that none but Men of mean and servile Tempers could voluntarily submit to them. Among the Romans, the Soldiers indeed were often made use of in publick Executions in the City, as well as in the Camp, without Infamy, or Diminution of their *Esteem*³. For there is much Difference between doing an Execution at the particular Command of a Superior, and between doing it by Profession. So also among the Jews, Criminals were stoned by all the People. And Montaigne tells us⁴, that Witoldus, Duke of Lithuania, introduced a Custom in that Country, that condemn'd Criminals should put themselves to Death with their own Hands, it appearing unreasonable to him, that innocent Persons should be employ'd to commit Murder; though this was but a silly Reason, for the Executioner cannot be said to commit Murder, by inflicting the Punishment the Law awards. But others give this better Reason for the Law, that none might be forced upon the Office of an Executioner, to cause and to see the Agonies of the Criminals, to which the innate Tenderness and Compassion of human Nature must give every Man an Aversion.

The Roman Laws set a Mark of Infamy upon all Persons that acted upon the Stage for *Hire*⁵, or suffer'd themselves to be hired to fight with *Beasts*⁶. But the Reason why Infamy was annexed to such Actions, was not that any Immorality was supposed in them (for such Actions may, 'tis possible, be innocent enough) but the Gain made by them was that which made them look dishonourable and base to the natural Gravity of the Romans; for 'tis often the Hire only which makes the Service mean and base. By the same Laws it was look'd upon to be infamous, for a Man to permit his Daughter to marry while she was a Widow, within the Time of Mourning; or to marry any Person in such Circumstances himself; or to suffer any Person under his Charge to marry, or to be married within that Time; because it might seem to betray much Levity and Unsettledness of Mind, to argue weak Inconstancy of Faith, and wild defultory Lust. Among the antient Inhabitants of the Canary Islands it was thought very great Ignominy and Disgrace to be a *Butcher*⁷: And Sir Thomas Moore make his Utopians of the same Opinion⁸. Selden tells us, that the Jews refused to admit four sorts of Men either to be Witnesses, or to have any hand in judicial Matters, because of the ill Repute they bore among them; and those were Gamesters, Usurers, Persons that made Gain by the Produce of the Seventh Year, or Year of Remission; and such as taught Pidgeons to fly. And he adds, they gave this Reason for it; because none of these sorts of People apply'd themselves to any Way of Life which tended to promote publick Good, or bring any Advantage or Convenience to *human Life*⁹.

VII. Thus the Loss of simple Civil Esteem may be owing purely to a State of Life. But a Man may also entirely be depriv'd of it upon a criminal Account; when for some particular sort of Crime he hath committed (for every Offence will not deprive a Man of Civil Esteem)¹⁰ the Laws of the Commonwealth fix a Mark of Infamy upon him: Which is usually done, either by taking away his natural Life at the same Time, and by condemning his Memory, or by ejecting him out of the Commonwealth with Shame and Disgrace; or perhaps by allowing him to continue in the Commonwealth, but not as a sound, but disorder'd, infected Member; or, in other Words, by permitting him to inhabit in the Dominions of the State, and to enjoy the common Protection of the Laws, but by excluding him out of all publick Offices and Employments, and all honourable Societies, by making him incapable to make any Will, and by disabling him to do any legal Act, which supposes an untainted Reputation. But now what are the Crimes which contract all this Infamy, must be known from the Laws of every particular *Commonwealth*¹¹. And here it may be observ'd, that according to

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. VI, VII.

¹ To this Purpose is that which is related by Valerius Maximus, l. 7. c. 7. of Q. Metellus the Prator Urbanus, who would not allow Vecilius the Bawd, the Possession of Inventus's Goods, though they were left to him by Will; because he would neither seem to approve Inventus's Action, in throwing away his Fortune into such a Sink of Lewdness, nor allow Vecilius the Rights of a true Citizen, since he had renounced every honourable Way of Life. And thus in the same Author, when Genucius, a Priest of Cybele, had obtained a Decree of Cn. Orestes, the Prator, that Navianus's Goods should be restor'd to him, the Consul Æmilius Lepidus revers'd the Prator's Decree, that the Court of Justice might not, under the Pretence of his suing for his Rights, be polluted by the obscene Presence and contaminated Voice of Genucius. And to this belongs also that, in L. 11. t. 5. l. 1. D. de Aleator. Where the Prator saith, He would give no Judgment, if any Person should beat or do any Damage to him at whose House he should hear they play'd at Dice, or if any stole or cheated him of any Thing at that time.

² Pro Rabirio, c. 5.

³ Essays, l. 3. c. 1.

⁵ Vid. L. 2. t. 2. l. 1. D. de his qui Infam. not.

⁴ Alofius Cadamustus Navigat. c. 8.

⁸ Uop. l. 2.

⁶ Vid. L. 3. t. 1. l. 1. §. 6. D. de Postulando.

⁷ Selden de J. N. & G. sec. Heb. l. 4. c. 5.

⁹ Vid. L. 1. t. 54. l. 1. C. de modo Mulctarum.

¹¹ Vid. L. 50. t. 13. l. 5. §. 1, 2, 3. D. de extraordin. Cognit. Though in this Place I observe, that in some of the Exemples, there is hard'y any Distinction made between the simple and intensive Esteem. And here we may observe a Law of the Egyptians, by which Soldiers that dethe Civilians, the Infamy which is contracted by any bad Action may be either the Effect of an immediate^a Imposition of the Law itself; or of some antecedent Examination and Sentence of some Judge^b; or else of the Censure of Men of Character and Esteem, which is commonly call'd Infamy of the Fact^c.² But I am rather inclin'd to think, this Infamy of the Fact is not so much the immediate Effect of the Opinions of Men of Character, as a Punishment which the Law also inflicts upon that View, that good Men always condemn such Actions, and look upon them to be base and wicked. For though it may be thought a Discredit, to fall under Censure of Persons of approv'd Lives, and Reputation, yet unless the Law joins with, and confirms that Censure, no Man can suffer so far in his Civil Esteem by the Judgment only of private Men, as to be excluded from any Rights and Advantages which the Civil Laws allow to an unblemish'd Reputation. And therefore it is evident, that a Man doth not immediately forfeit Esteem, when he is accus'd of, and charg'd with any Crime of infamous Nature and Quality. For as Julian rightly answer'd Delphidius the Orator,^c when he cry'd out, Who would be guilty, if it were sufficient to deny the Fact? 'Who would be Innocent, if it were enough only to accuse?'³ But it is then a Crime produceth Infamy, when the Person is condemn'd for it, or confesseth it. And that he is also supposed to do, when he agrees with the Prosecutor to let his Action drop: Because all such Agreement naturally supposes *Confession*⁴; except perhaps it may be made appear, that he chooseth to come to Composition with the Prosecutor, not out of any Consciousness of Guilt, but for other just Reasons, as to escape the Vexation and Trouble of Trial, the Severity or Partiality of the Judge, or upon some particular Dislike he bears to his Person. To which our Author might have added, that not only the little Share of Honesty, and the Passions of the Judges, but also their Prejudices, and Carelessness, often lose the best *Causés*⁵. But though a Man's Reputation is suppos'd to be clear'd, when he is acquitted from the Crime which was charg'd upon him; yet to make his Innocence appear the more unquestionable, and to punish Calumny and false Accusation, 'tis usual in many States and Commonwealths to force the Accusers to beg Pardon, confess themselves guilty of Falseness, make their Submissions, and pay Respect and Honour to the Party accus'd, and the like⁶.

VIII. From what has been said it may also be inferr'd, that it is no real Infamy or Dishonour, when a Man hath suffer'd an Abuse either by Words or Actions, not to revenge it with his own Sword; as the Custom is in some Countries, especially among Persons of Rank, and Men of military Profession; but punish it by the Magistrate, or pass it by in Silence, supposing such Patience doth not imply Confession of any bad or base Action. It seems to argue indeed much Cowardice and Littleness of Spirit, tamely to submit to every Man's Insults and Injuries, without endeavouring bravely to vindicate and assert his Rights and Liberty; and it seems natural, in such Cases, for every Man to be of the Opinion of Neoptolemus in the *Poet*⁷.

Τεθναίνω μᾶλλον, ἢ ἀπτόλεμῳ χαλεπίμῳ.

I'd sooner die, than be a Coward thought.

There are certain Injuries, which if a Man chooseth generously rather to despise, than to revenge, he will not bring his Courage in question. Nor can I see any Thing in such Conduct that can rob him of his Natural or Civil Esteem. And therefore Hobbes says, "If a Man receive Words of Disgrace, " or some little Injuries from another, for which " there is no Punishment assigned by Law, and is " afraid he shall fall into Contempt, and be obnoxious " to the like Injuries from others, and to avoid this, " protects himself by the Terror of his private " Revenge; this is a Crime, and such a Fear will " not excuse it, because the Commonwealth would " have the publick Words, that is, the Laws, be " of more Force with the Subjects, than the Words " of any private Man, which they that made the " Laws therefore assign'd no Punishment for, be- " cause they thought it not worthy a Man that " had the Use of Reason to take any notice of " them⁸." And much less is it any Dishonour for a Man, in a Commonwealth, where the Laws expressly forbid private Revenge, to prefer Obedience to the Laws, rather than expose himself at once to the Danger of the Fight, and the Severity of Civil Justice, upon a vain Pretence of *Honour*⁹.

Neither

^a Vid. L. 3. t. 1. l. 1. §. 8. De pñulando.

^b Vid. D. d. l.

^c V. Ammian. Marcellin. L. 18. c. 1.

Mr. BARB. NOTES ON §. VII, VIII.

ferted, or did not obey the Orders of their Commanders, were not punished with Death, but only with Infamy and Shame. And if they could by their Courage afterwards wipe off the Ignominy, they were restor'd to their former Dignity. And thus the Legislator, by making Ignominy a greater Punishment than Death, taught them to think Infamy the greatest Evil; and at the same Time seems to have consider'd, that such as were punished with Death, must for ever be made incapable of doing any further Good in common Life; but that such as were only deprived of their Honour, would be always endeavouring to do something that might recover it, Diodor. Siculus. l. 1. c. 78.

¹ Infamia.

² Vid. L. 2. t. 12. l. 13. C. ex quibus Caus. infam. irrog. Add. L. 37. t. 15. l. 2. D. de obseq. Parent. prestand. l. 20. & D. l. 3. t. 2. l. 20. de his qui notant. infam. Vid. L. 9. t. 9. l. 25. C. ad L. Jul. de Adult. And to this you may refer that which Rochefort, Descript. Antillar. Part. 2. c. 8. relates of the Apalachita. They have no other Punishment, saith he, for Thieves, besides the Reflections that are made upon them in all Company upon that Account; and this is generally taken so hard by them, that to avoid it, they will fly away into the most uninhabited Deserts.

³ And to this we may apply that of Plautus in Trinum. Act. 1. Sc. 2. v. 44, 45. Not to commit a Crime, is in a Man's own Breast; the Suspicion whether he does not, is in another's.

⁴ Vid. L. 3. t. 2. l. 5. D. de his qui infam. notant. Quoniam intelligitur confiteri crimen, qui paciscitur.

⁵ Thus in Hocrates adv. Callimach. in the Beginning. Some persuaded the Defendant to compound the Matter with the Plaintiff, because in Trials there are several Things which fall out other wise than are expected; and in passing the Vote, there is more Chance than Equity. And therefore it is a much safer Way to bear some small Expence, to get clear of a Crime, than to refuse to pay any Money, and run so great a Hazard.

⁶ It is evident from Josephus de Bello Judaico, l. 4. c. 39. That the Ignominy of having been in Chains was supposed to be taken away, if the Chains were not unlock'd, but fill'd asunder; and this, he saith, was the Way, when any one had been put in Chains innocently among the Romans.

⁷ Q. Calaber, l. 9.

⁸ Leviath. c. 27. Vid. Leg. Salicam. tit. 32.

⁹ ——— Injustum rigido jus dicitur ense.

Ovid. Trist. L. 5. El. 10.

'Tis cruel Justice which the Sword inflicts.

Neither is it always, I presume, a Sign of Cowardice, for a Man to refuse to put his Life and Fortunes to the Venture upon every little insignificant Quarrel, when there may be often less dangerous, and more innocent and lawful Occasions offer'd to shew his *Courage*¹. Thus when Pyrrhus, in Plutarch, call'd Antigonus Villain, and challeng'd to meet him upon the Plain, and fight him for the Kingdom, Antigonus answer'd, τὴν μὲν ἀπὸ τῆς στρατηγίας ἐν ὄπλων μάχῃσιν ἢ καιρῶν εἶναι, That his way of making War consisted as much in knowing proper Times and Opportunities, as in Strength; and that if Pyrrhus were weary of his Life, he might easily find Ways enough to go out of it. And so Augustus answer'd Antony's Challenge, in the same Author, *That he might easily find a Way to die*². And in such Cases, no prudent, considerate Man, hath any Reason to be disturb'd at the Opinions or Censures of the Vulgar; since the Esteem of every Subject is to stand and fall by the Judgment of his Sovereign, and the Laws of the State; and since 'tis sufficient Proof of Bravery and Resolution to obey the Laws, in Defiance to all the little Cavils and Calumny of the vain and idle Part of Mankind. And hence it will be no Difficulty to answer what Hobbes says in his Leviathan, c. 20. "That it is hardly possible, but private Duels should be thought honourable, because they are the Effects of Courage, which is Power." For why should it not be rather look'd upon to be a Sign of Greatness and Bravery of Spirit, to know how to govern the Heats and Passions of our Minds, and to give them no other Liberty, but what the Laws allow? Though I think the same Author says very well afterwards, c. 30. "That all Laws that forbid Duels, should ordain Honour for them that refuse, and Ignominy for them that make the Challenge;" and thus those that refus'd to fight would have an honourable Excuse. The Remedy the Sicilian Constitutions propos'd against this Custom was, by inflicting severe Penalties upon them that offer'd any *Affront*³.

An Account, by the way, of the Antiquity of Duels, and whence they at first began, we may see in *Diodorus Siculus*⁴. "The Gauls, saith he, in the Height of their Entertainments, upon the least Quarrel that arose, would break off their Mirth, take their Swords, and without expressing any Value for their Lives, go out and fight. And this they did upon a Belief, that they should enjoy another Life, in a new Body; and therefore easily despised the Care of this; as Lucan expresseth it:"

----Inde ruendi

In ferrum mens proua viris, animæque capaces
Mortis, & ignauium est redituræ parcere vitæ⁵.

----Hence they so bravely dare
Defy the Sword, and all the Dread of War,
Scarce satisfied with Death; and think it mean,
To spare a Life that must return again⁶.

IX. But Further; It is also evident, that the Government cannot deprive any Man of his natural, simple Esteem arbitrarily, at pleasure, but only upon some antecedent Crime he hath been guilty of, which is attended with Infamy, either by its own intrinsic Turpitude, or by express Sanction of Law. For since such a Power can no way be supposed to promote Civil Society, or the Interest of the Commonwealth, it is not to be supposed it was ever conferr'd upon the Sovereign Governors in it. But as the Civil Sovereign may unjustly eject a Subject out of the Commonwealth, so he may unjustly also take away his Civil Esteem, so far at least, as to deprive him of all those Rights and Advantages which attend an untainted Esteem in the Commonwealth. But his intrinsic natural Esteem can no more be taken away from a Man, than his Virtue and Integrity. Besides, 'tis next to a Contradiction, that a Man should be declared infamous at the Pleasure only of the Government; that is, that a Man should be charg'd with a Suspicion of being guilty of some dishonourable or criminal Action, not because he is really guilty, but because 'tis the Pleasure of the Government by such means to use an innocent Person as if he were criminal. And I think it is also beyond Dispute, that there lies no Obligation upon any Subject, to sacrifice his own simple Esteem and Character to the Civil Government, or to contract any real Infamy for the Advantage of the Publick. For neither hath the Government Power to command any base or ill Action, which will be the Cause of real Infamy; neither ought a Subject to obey, if it should.

X. Whether indeed, it may not be required of a Subject of good Character, to take upon himself the Infamy of his Prince, or his Country; or, as it were, make himself criminal for their Faults, is not so clear. But here (though I think it hardly possible for a Man to counterfeit himself a Criminal, without being in some measure really so) I conceive, there ought to be a Distinction made between a Prince's domestick or private Faults, and those that are publick, or which have an Influence upon the whole Commonwealth. Now that a Man should take the first sort upon himself, and make himself criminal for his Prince, can neither be lawfully and justly desired by the one, nor safely be complied with by the other; whether with design to put some plausible Colour upon the Action of the Prince, or whether to take the Blemish, that would otherwise be fix'd upon his natural Esteem, upon himself. For no body can take away the Civil Esteem of the Sovereign, because he is placed above the Reach of any Civil Judicature. Thus it cannot be thought that any good Man can approve the Action of Anicetus, when he declar'd, he had been guilty of Adultery with Octavia, only that Nero might have Pretence to dissolve his Marriage with her

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. VIII.

¹ Vid. Cæs. Com. de Bell. Gallic. l. 5. c. 44. Vid. Busbeq. Epist. 3. de Velibego.

² Plut. in Pyrrh. p. 404. A. & in Anton. p. 950. E. Alexander de Rhodes Itiner. l. 2. c. 6. relates of the Soldiers in the Kingdom of Tonquin, that though they are very valiant against an Enemy, and set but little Value upon their Lives, yet among one another they never draw their Swords, but are as loving as Brothers: And that when they once saw a Frenchman and a Portuguese fight a Duel, they were amazed at it and said they never saw such Barbarity before.

³ Const. Sicul. l. 3. tit. 33. §. 4.

⁴ L. 5. c. 28.

⁵ Lucan. l. 1. v. 455, &c.

⁶ Vid. Appian Celtic. Where he gives the same Reason for the Boldness and Bravery of the Germans.

her^r. But yet 'tis not uncommon, that when publick Ministers, by secret Order from their Masters, enter into Treaties with foreign States, or oppose and form Designs against them, which, if known to be the Result of publick Counsel or Instructions, would bring Danger or Inconvenience upon the State, to avoid the ill Consequences which might follow, by laying the Fault upon the Ministers, as if they had acted only by their own private Judgment. And in such a Case, I think no good Subject would refuse to divert the Evil from the Commonwealth, by favouring the Excuse, and yielding that what he did, was beyond his Instructions, and without Command; provided his Punishment be no greater than some small pretended *Disgrace*¹. For to suffer Death upon that Account, or to be given into the Hands of the injured Party, would be a Severity not to be born or excused. But the pretended Punishment, whatever it be, may be easily either remitted or compensated otherwise. For 'tis unquestionable, that he that hath Power to inflict Civil Infamy, hath also Power to remove it². But notwithstanding, if Infamy be inflicted for any impious or flagitious Action, Restitution of a Man's Fame will only produce the external Civil Effects of an unblemish'd Reputation; but will not in the least wipe out the Blot which lies upon his natural Esteem.

XI. Intensive Esteem is that Species of Reputation, by which Persons, otherwise equal in the simple Repute, are preferr'd to one another, according as one possesses a larger Share than another of those Things, whatever they be, which are apt to raise in other Men Reverence and Respect. Now Honour, which answers the Intenseness of Esteem, is the Signification of our Opinion of another Man's Excellencies. And therefore the Honour is not really in him that receives, but in him that gives it³. For though a Man may set what Value he pleases upon himself, as the Seller does upon his Commodities: Yet, as in these, it is the Buyer at last that determines the Price; so the Value of Men is no higher or greater, than as others are pleas'd to set it⁴. For as Hobbes says, Let a Man (as most Men do) rate himself at the highest he can; yet *the true Value of him is no more than he is esteem'd at by others*⁵. But yet every Man is affected more or less with the Honour others pay him, as it answers to that Value which he puts upon himself. But the Esteem itself, or that which gives Men the Title of Desert to Honour, is often figuratively expressed by that Word. And so certain publick Stations, and Places of Dignity attended with Honour, are peculiarly called Honours. 'Tis rightly observ'd by the Author before mention'd⁶, "That it is impossible any Society should be either great, or of any long Continuance, that at first united only upon such a Bottom as a common Desire of Glory, or upon mutual Obligation to assist one another in their Pursuits after Honour; because Glory, and the Honour that is built upon it, consist in Comparison and Preference; and so what belongs to every body, belongs to no body; and because the Rate that is commonly set upon a Man, is taken from what he is able to do without the Assistance of others⁷." On the other hand, the further Ignominy spreads, the lighter it seems, and the easier it is supported. Now this intensive Esteem may also be consider'd, either with regard to such Persons as live in a Liberty of Nature; or such as are Members of the same Commonwealth. But I shall now proceed only to examine the Foundations of this Intenseness or Eminence, as they fall under these two Considerations: First, as they produce barely an Aptitude or Disposition in Men to receive Honours from others; and Secondly, as they give them a proper Right to demand Honour as their Due.

XII. The Foundations of intensive Esteem in general are all those Things, which discover, or are supposed to imply, extraordinary Excellence or Perfection of any kind⁸. The Effects of which are consonant to the Laws of Nature, and the Ends of Civil Government. For 'tis unusual to see Persons of dissolute Morals, and eminent for nothing but their Vices, celebrated and admired by the Multitude. So in particular, are Men of unusual Strength and Abilities at eating and drinking¹⁰; of extravagant, insatiable Lust; of mad, rash, ungovernable Humours; dextrous, ingenious, crafty, artful Villains; and in short, all Miscreants whatever, that are arriv'd at some signal Proficiency,

¹ See above in B. 7. c. 1. §. 2. towards the End.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. X, XI, XII.

¹ Vid. Tacit. Ann. XIV. 62. Euripides, Helena, v. 106, 107. Nor for my Brother can I bear that Stain. In which Case, however, the Matter in Dispute is not about Subjects with respect to their Prince. Add the Story of Simon Perez. in Thuanus, l. 104.

² Add. Marselier. Legat. l. 1. c. 33. p. m. 200.

³ See Cornel. Nepos. Alcibiad. c. 6. §. 5. Libanius, Orat. 7. To dissolve, and undo Things that are already done, is what we reckon among Things impossible; but to take off Ignominy from them that are in Disgrace, is not so difficult a Task; and you are the only Physician that can cure this Disease: Speaking to Julian the Emperor. See Justin. B. 5. c. 4.

⁴ Aristot. Nicom. l. 1. c. 3. We ought to think the Honour is rather in those that honour, than in them that are honour'd.

⁵ Vid. John viii. ver. 54.

⁶ Leviath. c. 10.

⁷ Hobbes de Cive, c. 1. §. 2.

⁸ Seneca Epist. 27 de Calvisio Sabino.

⁹ Cic. de Nat. Deor. l. 1. c. 17. Every Thing that excels, may justly command a Veneration. "Honour is a Privilege, that derives its principal Essence, and even Virtue, from the Rarity of it; cui malus est nemo, quis bonus esse potest? Martial. lib. 12. Ep. lxxxii. We never take notice of a Man, by way of Recommendation, that he is industrious and careful in maintaining his Family, because 'tis a common Action, notwithstanding it is very just and commendable: Nor of a great Tree in a Forest, where they are all of the same Bigness. I am of Opinion, that a Citizen of sparta ought not to have boasted of his Courage, since it was the popular Virtue of their Nation; and as little of their Fidelity or Contempt of Riches. There is no occasion of recompensing a Virtue, how great soever it is, that is once become customary; and I know not whether we should ever call that great, which is common. Since then, these Rewards of Honour have no other Worth or Value in them, than what arises from the small Number of those that enjoy them; a liberal Distribution of them is the Way to make them contemptible, and bring them to nothing." Montaigne's Essays, B. II. c. vii. towards the Beginning.

¹⁰ Such as Juvenal describes, Sat. IV. ver. 139, 140.

——Nalli major fuit usus edendi
Temperate mica.

In Arts of Eating, none more early train'd;
None, in my Time, had equal Skill attain'd. Mr. Dryden.

Aristoph. Acharnens. Act. 1. Sc. 2. ver. 35, 36. The barbarous People value Men only, as they can eat and drink most.

ency, and seem to be Leaders in their several Vices: And who, the more they are accomplish'd in their different vile Practices, will appear only the more insupportably wicked to all the good and sober Part of Mankind¹. It may possibly require much Strength of Body, and Readiness of Parts to be compleatly vicious; but 'tis also certain, that Vice will govern with greater Power and Violence, where there is more Vigour and stronger Appetites to entertain and support it. From all which it is easy to infer, that Commendation and Glory must be rated only by the Valuation of the Persons we receive it from. And therefore, that the greatest Commendation is that which comes from Persons that deserve it themselves; and consequently, that a wise Man will set no Value upon their Praise (as M. Antoninus saith) *who cannot so much as appear pleasing to themselves*². But in particular, the Foundations of this Esteem are such as these; Perspicacity of Mind, Parts and Abilities capable of much Improvement and Variety of Knowledge, especially when great Capacities are answered by great Attainments. A Judgment turn'd for Business, easily discerning the true State of Things, and Difficulty imposed upon³. Steadiness of Resolution, unshaken and unmoved at external Accidents, above Fear, and beyond the Force of Temptation. Eloquence, or the Power of expressing the Thought with much Fluency of Words, and Gracefulness of Utterance. And next these, Strength, Beauty, Comeliness, and good Proportion of Body; as these may be suppos'd to be either Instruments, or Promises and Signs of certain Graces and Perfections in the Mind⁴. Hence it has been vulgarly thought, that extraordinary Tallness of Body implies a Mind and Person great and noble: And the Gods and Heroes were therefore represented upon the Stage in the Buskin, that the Actors might appear of an unusual Size. And 'tis observable, that there are many Men that wish to be taller than they are; but that there are very few that would be content to lose an Inch of their Stature. But how ridiculous soever this Opinion seems to be, it prevail'd so far, that upon the Force of it the Ethiopians (as Herodotus saith⁵) chose their Kings by a certain Measure. A Method of Election, which would no doubt have been much approved by the Indian mention'd in Montaigne, who happening to be at Roan, while the Court was there, in the Reign of Charles IX. said, that he thought it very strange so many tall Men with long Beards, and so bravely arm'd, as they were that stood about the King's Person (meaning the Swiss-Guards) should be content to obey a beardless Boy, and that he wonder'd they did not choose one of them King⁶. But it is often seen (as the Poet says) that,

---- Natura breves animis ingentibus artus Finxerit.----

Nature large Souls in little Room confines⁷.

And that⁸,

---- Ἥνορέην τε
Ἄπειρον τελείθει, μέγροισ' δ' εἰς ἕδραν ἀέξει
Ἄνεροισ', εἰ μὴ οἱ σικκινὴ ἐπὶ μῦτις ἔπηθῃ.

'Tis fond to hope Success from Strength or Might,
Except with Force, Prudence and Art unite.

But besides these Foundations of intensive Esteem, there are also others to be mention'd, such as the Goods of Fortune (as they are call'd) which seem either to suppose Industry, Wit, and Prudence, necessary to obtain them, or to promise Power, or to supply Matter to do great Things. But that which advances Reputation most, and is the Foundation of the highest and most intense Esteem, is good Success and Fortune in great and important Actions. This first of all seeming to suppose intrinsic Worth and Excellence, and then to demonstrate the Advantages that arise from it, and the lawful Ends it may and has been applied to⁹. And as the Fame of such Achievements gains Belief in the World, it is properly call'd Renown. A Reputation of particular Prudence and Conduct in Difficulties relating to common Life and Practice, or to speculative abstracted Truths, is what is usually call'd Authority; which others more truly call an Opinion of greater Knowledge, joined with Probity and Sincerity. And hence those Degrees of Esteem, which Age is thought to confer, are founded upon nothing more than the common Persuasion, that Experience and long Observation upon Business and Things, generally produce Caution and *Prudence*¹⁰; though it is not to be denied, that there are Instances where grey Hairs are not *Signs of Wisdom*¹¹. But now on the other hand, Women generally desire rather the Complements

Mr. BARR. NOTES ON §. XII.

¹ Philo Judæus de Migrat. Abrahami. p. 413. A. Ed. Paris. To excel many Things that are bad, is only a more famous Infamy: Arrian. Epiclet. l. 3. c. 14. If you tell me you kick with a great deal of Strength; I answer You value yourself upon that which belongs to an Ass.

² M. Ant. l. 3. 1. 4.

³ Vid. Ecclesiast. ix. 15. 1 Kings iii. 28.

⁴ Vid. Virg. Æneid. 5. ver. 344. Isocrat. in Encom. Hellene. Though he is there a little too much an Orator. Lord Bacon's Essays. c. 41, 42.

⁵ Thalia. Vid. Themist. Orat. 14.

⁶ Montaigne's Essays. l. 1. c. 30. Add. 1 Sam. x. 23, 24. And here also we may apply to this Sense, that of Oppian. Cyneg. l. 3. c. 68.

Μείσοι μὲν μείων τελείθει, μείλοισι δὲ μείων.

The Great excels the Less, the Less the Great.

⁷ Claudian. de Bello Getico, ver. 584.

⁸ Calaber. l. 5.

⁹ Aristot. Rhet. l. 1. c. 3. 'Tis just to honour those that do Good; but not such as barely have it in their Power. Pind. Olymp. Od. 6. ver. 123, 124. τεμπαίρει γὰρ ἡ ἔκαστος, The Work discovers what the Author is.

¹⁰ Vid. D. L. 50. t. 6. l. 5. init de Jure Immunitatis. Q. Calaber. l. 5.

Αἰεὶ δ' ἐν βουλήσιν γέρον πολὺδ' αἰμείων
Ἄπλοτέρ' ἔπει ἀνδρῶν, ἔπει μάλ' αὖ μύλα οἶδε.

Youth is less fit than Age for wife Debates;
On sacred Wrinkles sage Experience waits.

Diod. Sicul. l. 19. c. 34. It seems more natural, to pay greater Reverence and Respect, to Aged, than to young People. Oppian. Haliens. l. 1. ver. 683.

Γῆρα; γὰρ ἐναίσιμον ἄνδρα τίθειν.

Age makes Men venerably Great.

¹¹ Such as we apply that of Ovid Metam. l. 9. ver. 436, 437.

— Quis propter amara senecta Pondera despicitur, nec quo prius ordine regnat.

Who tyr'd with Age and Years oppressive Weight, Sink to Contempt, and lose their former State.

plements of Youth and Beauty, than the Respect and Honours paid to Age. And therefore Lais, when she grew old, dedicated her Looking-glass to Venus, adding as it is in the Epigram ^a:

----- ἐπεὶ τοῖν μὲν ὄρεσθαι

οὐκ ἐδέλω, αἴν δ' ἔν πάρεσθ, ἔ δύναμαι.

The Face I once could boast no Glass can show,
And that I now have left I would not know.

The Roman Law seems to allow more Worth and greater Dignity to Men than Women ^b. Though in general, there are some Foundations of Esteem common to both Sexes. And there are others which are particular to the Women, such as the several Accomplishments of Virtues and Duties peculiar to their Sex. And there are others again, which are borrowed and derived to them, when they are said to shine with the Rays of their Husbands ^c; or when they value themselves upon the Number or Worth of their Children ^d.

XIII. From all which it readily appears what Judgment may be made upon what Hobbes says in Chap. X. of his Leviathan, where he reduces all the Foundations of Honour or intensive Esteem to Power, which he calls a Possession of present Means, to obtain some apparent future Good. And this he divides into natural and instrumental.
“Natural Power (he says) consists in the Eminence of the Faculties of Body or Mind, as extraordinary Strength, Beauty, Prudence, Arts, Eloquence, Liberality, Nobility, and the like. Instrumental Powers are those which, being acquired by these, or by Fortune, are the Means and Instrument of acquiring more, as Riches, Reputation, Friends, and good Luck; and in short, any Quality whatever, or the Reputation of any such Quality, as makes a Man to be lov'd, or fear'd of many. And then he desires Worth, or Dignity: That it is the Value or Price of a Man, or as much as would be given for the Use of his Power. And the Manifestation of that Value we set on one another is that, he saith, which is called Honouring and Dishonouring. Thus to value at an high Rate, is to honour a Man; at a low Rate, is to dishonour him. Afterwards he recounts the natural Tokens, or Ways of Honour, as to pray to another for Aid, to obey, to give great Gifts, to be sedulous in promoting another's Good, to give Way or Place to another in any Commodity; to shew any Sign of Love or Fear, to praise, magnify, or call happy, to speak to another with Consideration, to appear before him with Decency and Humility, to believe, to trust, to rely on another, to hearken, to counsel or discourse of what Kind soever, to agree with in Opinion, to imitate, to honour those another honours, to employ in Counsels or Actions of Difficulty. And further, Civil Dignity, according to him, is that Value which is set on a Man by the Commonwealth, which is understood by Offices of Command, Judicature, publick Employment, or by Names or Titles, introduced for distinction of such Value. And he rightly observes, that the Commonwealth may make whatsoever it pleases to stand for Signs of Honour, though it be otherwise in its own Nature indifferent; as for Instance, it was a Sign of Honour among the Perfians, to be conducted through the Streets in the King's Garments, upon one of the King's Horses ^e, (as it is also to wear certain Marks or Badges). Thus the Chinese salute with the Head and Hand; the Japonefe by putting off their Slippers; the Chinese always rise to any Person they design to honour. They of Japan pay their Honours sitting on the Pavement, and think it Rudeness, and ill Breeding to stand, when they perform their Ceremonies ^g. However all this be, that Notion of his, that Honour consists solely in the Opinion of Power, is by no means to be admitted; neither what he infers from thence, “That it doth not alter the Case of Honours, whether an Action (so it be great and difficult, and consequently a Sign of much Power) be just or unjust. And that therefore the antient Heathens did not think they dishonoured, but greatly honoured their Gods, when they introduced them in their Poems, committing Rapes, Adulteries, Thefts, and other great, but unjust or unclean Acts”. For though it might be granted, that the Foundations of Honours may so far be properly enough reduced to Power, namely, as they are naturally apt

And as Lucan, l. 1. ver. 135. expresseth it:

— Stat magni nominis umbra.

And therefore Horace saith very well, Ep. l. 1. Ep. 1. ver. 8, 9.

Solve senescentem mature sanus equum, ne
Peccet ad extremum ridendus, et illa ducant, — Retains the Shadow of a glorious Name.

Wisely in Time the generous Horse release,
E're batter'd and decay'd, he lose the Race.

Antiphanes. Life is like Wine, when it runslow, it will turn soure. Add. Charron de la Sageffie, l. 1. c. 35. §. 5. Strabo, l. 15. p. 488. The Indians allow no Pre-eminence to the Aged, unless their Prudence deserve it. Philo de Abrahama, p. 387. A Man ought not to be called Old from the Time he hath liv'd, but from the Way he hath spent his Life in. For many that have continued a long Course of Years in ill Practices, can only be called Long-liv'd Boys. And it is sometimes true, as Varro saith, de re Rustica, l. 2. c. 2. That is a better Age which is attended with Hopes, than that which is followed by Death. Quint. Inst. Orat. l. 2. c. 1. p. 104. We ought not to value any one according to his Age, but according to the Improvements he hath made. Isocrat. in Archidam. init. It is not our Years, but our Parts and Industry that makes us wiser than others. Philostrat. in Vit. Appollon. Thyan. l. 6. c. 8. p. 257. Ed. Morel. Youth doth not hinder a Man from seeing Things clearer than even old Age itself.

^a Antholog. l. 6. Quintil. Declam. 306. p. 462. There is nothing to be lov'd in an old Woman, but the Memory of what she was. Add. Ld. Bacon's Essays, c. 40.

^b L. 1. t. 9. l. 1. D. de Senatoribus. Add. Jac. Godofred de precedencia. Part. 1. c. 5. §. 35. ^c Vide l. S. D. de Senatoribus, ubi supra.

^d Vide Ovid. Metam. l. 6. fab. 4. ver. 172. et seq. Valer. Max. l. 4. c. 4. §. 1. Plut. in C. Gracch. Vide Buchanan Rerum Scotic. l. 12. int. Orat. Kennedi.

^e And upon this Foundation I suppose (though the Respect intended was oddly express'd) the Prince of Zanaga in Africa, as Leo Africanus, l. 1. relates it, kill'd a great Number of Camels and Ostriches, to entertain his Guests; which Sort of Provision they desired him to spare, he told them, that he should not deal civilly by them, if he treated Guests he thought so Noble, and that he had never seen before, with only the lesser Sort of Animals.

^f Esther vi. 8.

^g Bern. Varen. Japon. Descript. p. 21. Add. Neukof. in Genf. China, c. 4. Vid. Rocheport. Descript. Anisill. Part 2. c. 19; where also he tells of some unusual Signs of Honour.

apt to produce some Effect or other in Human Life; since what is of that dull, unactive Nature, as will produce no Effect either good or bad, seems to be capable of having no Value one way or other set upon it: Yet that Power alone, without Relation to, or in Conjunction with Goodness, should be the proper and natural Foundation of real Honour, is what is contrary to Reason, and Hobbes himself: For in his Book de Cive, c. 15. §. 9. he gives this Definition of Honour; that it is an Opinion of the Power of another in Conjunction with Goodness. And thence he infers, that there are three Affections necessarily consequent upon Honour; Love, that bears relation to Goodness; and Hope and Fear, that have regard to Power; and thus that only is true Honour, which is attended with all these three Affections together. Fear alone, excited by a Power determined to Evil, can never be look'd upon to be a Sign of Honour. For Fear hath always a Mixture of Hatred in it; and where a Man hates, he naturally wisheth Harm and Ruin, and not Honour. Thus by the Christian Religion we are assured of the great Power of the Devil, but that it is utterly averse to all Goodness, and always bent upon all Evil; but certainly no Man in his Senses can suppose that he deserves Honour upon that Account. And therefore he himself, when he tempted our Saviour, did not shew him his Force and Power, but his Gifts, the Glories and Kingdoms of the World, Matt. iv. 8, 9. Nor can any Man of Sense think it a good Reason, which the People of some barbarous Countries in the Indies give for their worshipping the Devil, that he should do them no Harm. And therefore also, methinks, I have no Patience to see Hobbes mentioning Flattery among the rest of his natural Signs of Honour. For Flattery in every Kind of it implies and supposes some Deficiency, or Blemish, both in the Person that gives, and in him that receives it; and is an Act and Species of Scorn and Derision, without the least Mixture of Love or Sincerity in it. But as to the Fables of the Poets, there are some Men indeed that think, that they imply no more than that the Gods are above all the Confinement of Laws. And others rather suppose; that all was Mystery in them, and that many secret Truths were concealed under the Disguise of those Vices and Absurdities. But whatever they make of them, it will never by me be conceivable, that Rapes and Adulteries could be an Honour to the Gods, any more than they would be to any ordinary Mortal here on Earth.

XIV. But after all, these Foundations of intensive Esteem produce only an imperfect Right to demand Honour and Respect from others; so that if a Man deny it where it is really deserv'd, he cannot be said to have done an Injury, but only to have been guilty of some Discourtesy or Incivility: For among Persons that live in a Liberty of Nature, where all are equal, it doth not appear how any Man can pretend Right to demand Honour from another; since from that Love every Man naturally bears to himself, it is very easy for him to imagine that there are Qualities or Endowments in himself, equal or perhaps superior to those which others value themselves upon. For Instance, one Man thinks Age deserves Reverence and Esteem; another, that Youth and Vigour have a much better Title to it. The Hopes and Expectations of some raise them to as great a Pitch of Vanity, as the real Success of others. Some value themselves upon Strength of Body; others think Wit and Prudence, the Endowments of the Mind, much nobler Qualities. This Man measures his Worth by the Largeness of his Fortune; another by an Easiness and Freedom of Mind, which he thinks equal to all the Wealth and Opulence in the World. Some presume upon their Learning; others will suppose that there is nothing true and real in human Knowledge, more than Resolution, Fidelity, and Sincerity; the τὸ βέβαιον καὶ πιστὸν, καὶ ὑγιὲς, as Plato states it. Some insist upon the Honours they have attained; others satisfy themselves that Honour is not always paid where it is deserv'd, or deserv'd where it is paid. And others set little Value upon Greatness of Birth, and despise it when ^a Silius Italicus, lib. 1. ver. 149.

Et metui demens credebat honorem.

And vainly thought it Honour to be fear'd.

^b And therefore Lucan, l. 5. ver. 385, 386. calls it,

Voces, per quas jam tempore tanto
Mentimur dominis.

The Words with which we have long Time abus'd.
Our Princes.

Vid. Plutarch. de adulator. & amici discrimine. Pescennius Niger in Spartianus, c. 11. when one was preparing to address him with a Penegyrick upon his being made Emperor, stopp'd him by saying, That he ought to write an Oration in Praise of Marius, or Hannibal, or any one of the famous ancient Generals, and recommend their brave Actions to the Imitation of the present Age. For to commend Persons that are living, added he, is only to deride and expose them, and especially Emperors, since 'tis evident, what you may hope, or what fear from them, since they have the Power of the Laws, can do as they please, and take away your Lives, or send you into Banishment.

^c Sallustius Philosoph. de diis & mundo, c. 3.

^d Pindar says very well, Olymp. Od. 1. ἄνδρ' ἀνδρὶ φέμεν εὐκλὸς ἀμφὶ δαιμόνιον καλλί. Men ought to speak with Reverence of the Gods. Isocrates in laudat. Busirid. p. 395. calls those Fables Blasphemies, by which (saith he) they boldly fix such Things upon the Gods, as no body would dare speak of his Enemy. For they do not only charge them with Thefts, Adulteries, and Slavery to Men; but accuse them further, of devouring their Children, depriving Fathers of their Genitals, Copulation with Mothers, and a thousand other wicked Actions. The Authors of which Stories were not indeed punished as they deserv'd, but yet neither did they altogether escape; for some of them were Strolers, Vagabonds, and Beggars; others were stricken Blind; and others were driven out of their own Country, and forced to make War continually upon their Relations and Friends; and Orpheus the chief Inventor of these Fables, was torn to Pieces. Seneca de brevitat. Vitæ. c. 16. To make the Gods Authors of Vice, what is it but to encourage and inflame our own Lusts, and to bring the Example of the Deities for our Liberty and Excuse? Fulgentius Mytholog. l. 1. p. 55, &c. If the Gods were guilty of Theft, Justice would have nothing to do with Criminals or Crimes, since they would be countenanc'd by Heaven.

^e Pind. Olymp. Od. 4. towards the End.

And Youth sometimes with hoary Hairs
Before the Noon of Life is crown'd.

The strongest have not still the best Success,
But Prudence never is unfortunate.

^f Sophocles. Ajax. Flagell. p. 69. Ed. H. Steph.

^g Plato. Ep. X.

^h Cic. Ep. ad Fam. l. 3. Epist. 13.

when it is not attended with an answerable Greatness of Fortune ^a. And certainly the wiser Part of Mankind will always think it as false a Method to value ¹ Men by their Riches, Dignities, or Honours, or by Things external to them, as it would be to take the Worth of Horses from the fine Furniture which may belong to them. But besides, since Honour is then properly paid, when a Man acknowledges superior Excellencies in another, and pays some voluntary Submissions to him upon that Score; and since no Man can be forced to pay this by outward Violence, that Method being more likely to confirm him rather in an obstinate Refusal of them; it is evident, that it is a Mistake to allow these Foundations the Force of any such perfect Right which might be asserted by Violence and Arms. For the Respect a Man pays to another upon Compulsion and Command, is no Sign of any internal Reverence he has for him, but only that he is afraid of Punishment. And further, since external Signs of Honour, unless they proceed from Submission of Mind, are to be call'd Shew and Mockery, rather than Honour, it would be Folly to threaten Violence when they are denied; especially if the Person from whom they are expected declares, that it is not out of Contempt that he omits to pay the Formalities of his Respect, but only because he would enjoy his Liberty, and not be forced to do that which ought to be left to his own Pleasure and Courtesy. And therefore the Scythian Ambassadors told Alexander the Great, "that they hoped it was excusable in them that lived in Deserts, not to know who he was, and whence he came." And Ariovistus, in Cæsar's Commentaries, tells Cæsar, "That if he had been to desire any Thing for himself, he would have attended him in Person; and that he could not but expect that Cæsar should shew him the same Respect." From all which it seems to be evident, that though it be agreeable to natural Reason, that Honours should be paid to Persons of superior Excellencies; or further, that though it might be also allow'd, that it is no less a Command of the Laws of Nature to honour Persons

^a Euripid. Phœniss. ver. 445. & Electra. ver. 37, 38.

Λαμπροὶ εἰς γένεθ', χρημάτων δὲ πένητες.

Noble in Birth, but miserably Poor.

^b Cæs. de B. G. l. 1. c. 34. And Vologeses, King of the Parthians, answer'd Nero, when he sent for him almost in the same Manner. It is easier for you to pass so great a Sea, than me; when you are in Asia, we shall easily agree when to meet. Xiphilinus Epit. Dianis.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XIV.

¹ I have borrowed Charron's own Words, Treatise of Wisdom, Book I. Chap. V. Sect. 9. Numb. 5. from whence 'tis visible that our Author hastaken the Thought: But Charron himself has done nothing, as 'tis usually his way, but abridged this fine Passage, from Montaigne. "'Tis strange, that nothing except ourselves, is valued or esteem'd but for its own innate Qualities. We praise a Horse for his being strong and well manag'd, and not for his Furniture: A Greyhound for his Swiftness, not for his Collar; a Hawk for his Wings, not for his Tassels and Bells. Why then do we not, in the same Manner, esteem a Man for what is his own? He has indeed a numerous Retinue, a fine Palace, a great Reputation, and a plentiful Estate; but all this is about him, not in him. You do not buy a Pig in a Poke: If you buy a Horse, you take off the Saddle, and view him naked and uncovered; or, if he is cover'd, as they formerly served Horses that were shew'd to Princes to buy, 'tis only upon the Parts which are least necessary, that you may not amuse yourself, with the Smoothness of his Coat, or the Largeness of his Crupper; but have Time enough to observe chiefly his Legs, his Eyes, and Feet, which are the most useful Member. (See Horace, Lib. 1. Satyr ii. ver. 86. & seq.) Why then in your Esteem of a Man, do you value him covered and wrapped up as he is? He shews us no Parts, but what are by no Means his own; and conceals from us, those by which only we can truly form a Judgment of his Merit. 'Tis the value of the Sword, not the Scabbard, that you seek after: And perhaps you will not give a Farthing for it, if you see it unsheath'd. You must judge a Man by himself, and not by his Dress. And as one of the Antients says, very pleasantly, (Seneca Epist. lxxvi. p. 221. Ed. Gronovii.) Do you know why you take him to be a tall Man? You reckon the Height of his Shoes: But the Basis does not belong to the Statue: Measure him without his Stils. Let him lay aside his Riches and Honours, and shew himself in his Shirt. Is his Body sound, vigorous, and fit to discharge its Functions? What Soul has he? Is it noble, large, and happily furnished with all the Endowments belonging to it? Is it rich in Accomplishments of its own, or another's? Does there only want an Opportunity to shew, whether it can bravely stand the Sight of a drawn Sword; whether it cares not which way Life issues out, through the Mouth, or the Breast; whether it is sedate, quiet, and contented? 'Tis this that must shew, and by this you must judge of the vast Difference between us. Essays 5. Book 1. Chap. xlii. towards the Beginning. Juvenal has admirably well express'd this Passage, which is quoted by Montaigne, and applied to the Nobility; in the following Lines.

Dic mihi, Teucrorum proles, Animalia Muta
 Quis generosa putet, nisi fortia? nempe volucrem
 Sic laudamus equum, facili cui plurima palma
 Fervet, & exultat rauco victoria circo.
 Nobilis hic, quocunque venit de gramine, cujus
 Clara fuga ante alios, & primus in aquore pulvis.
 Sed venale pecus Corinthæ, posteritas &
 Hirpini, si rara jugo victoria sedit:
 Nil tibi majorum respectus, gratia nulla
 Umbrarum, dominos pretiis mutare jubentur
 Exiguus, tritoque trahunt ephredia collo,
 Segnipedes, dignique molam versare nepotes.
 Ergo ut miremur te, non tua, primum aliquid da,
 Quod possim titulis incidere, præter honores,
 Quos illis damus & dedimus, quibus omnia debes.

Great Son of Troy, who ever prais'd a Beast
 For being of a Race above the Rest?
 But rather meant his Courage, and his Force.
 To give an Instance — we commend a Horse
 (Without regard of Pasture, or of Breed)
 For his undaunted Mettle and his Speed;
 Who wins most Plate with greatest Ease, and first Prints with his Hoofs his Conquest on the Dust.
 But if fleet Dragon's Progeny at last Proves jaded, and in frequent Matches cast,
 No Favour for the Stallion we retain
 And no Respect for the degenerate Strain;
 The worthless Brute is from New-Market brought
 And at an under Rate in Smithfield bought,
 To turn a Mill, or drag a loaded Life
 Beneath two Panniers, and a Baker's Wife.
 That we may therefore you, not yours admire,
 First, Sir, some Honour of your own acquire;
 Add to that Stock which justly we bestow
 On those blest Shades, to whom you fall Things owe.

Mr. Stepney.

Horace, to shew the Folly of those who only value and esteem Men for external Things, appeals to the Judgment of Children at Play,

Si quadringentis sex septem millia desunt,
 Est animus tibi, sunt mores & lingua, fidesque;
 Plebs eris. At pueri ludentes, Rex eris, aiunt
 Si rectè facies

Horace Epist. Lib. 1. Ep. 1. ver. 57. &c.

If you have not ten thousand Pounds in store,
 But want a thousand, or a little more,
 Though you have Virtue, Constancy, and Skill,
 In Arts, thou shalt be thought a Common still.
 And yet our Boys another Tale will tell
 And say, you shall be King, if you do well.

Mr. Creech.

sons of Worth, yet still that this Duty must be one of those, which a Man hath no Right to demand from others, but which must be left entirely to their good Nature and Civility. But when a Man pretends Right to demand Honour, or any Sign of it from another, 'tis necessary he should either have Power and Authority over him, or produce some Compact for his Right, or prove it by some Law made or approved by their common Lord and Master. Mandeflo in his Travels^a relates, that in a Treaty of Peace, after a long War between the Portuguese and the King of Cochin, it was a long Time before the Disputes on each Side could be brought to a Conclusion, because the Indian Nobles insisted, that the Portuguese should give them the Way, as the common People of their own Country were obliged to do. But that the Portuguese refusing such dishonourable Terms, it was agreed at length, that the Debate should be decided by single Combat, in which the Victory happening to the Portuguese, the Indian Nobility were obliged to give the Way to the Portuguese, and to stand still till they were passed by.

XV. But, however, between private Men, certainly the noblest Contest¹ for Honour and Eminence would be, to dispute who should express the greatest Readiness to pay Honour to others, or most Modesty in declining it themselves. And it is ridiculous enough for Men to grow warm and angry in a Contention about outward Honour; especially when there is little or no Profit or Advantage to be made by it, and when it may end perhaps like the Dispute mention'd in the Epigram^b, Who only shall go through the Dirt first. It was a good Determination enough which a certain Prince made, when two of the meanest of his Servants had quarrell'd which should take place at Church, that the greatest Fool should sit first. For as to what Quintilian says, that a poor Man's Honour is his best Estate^c, it must be understood only of simple Esteem. But between Princes and Nations, the Disputes about Eminence of Worth and Dignity, and the Precedence which depends upon it, have generally, and in all Ages, been managed with greater Shew of Reason, and stronger Pretences. The Argument usually urged in these Controversies will perhaps deserve closer Consideration. Thus much therefore is beyond Dispute, that where a Prince depends upon Another of superior Power, the greater is the most honourable, and has a perfect Right to Precedence; tho' perhaps the same Title may be common to both of them. Thus there are Instances of greater Kings that have others call'd Kings under them, though in reality they are no more than Magistrates and Governors of Provinces. Some Princes do Homage to others for their Kingdoms, as feudal; and there are others that hold theirs by other Titles. So in Tacitus's Life of Agricola, 'tis said to be an old received Art of Rome, to make and maintain Kings to be their Instruments of Slavery. And thus Adherbal, in Salust, says, that when his Father Micipsa died, he commanded him to think nothing in the Kingdom of Numidia his own, but the Administration of it, and that the Right of it belong'd to the Roman Senate^d. And so also a Prince, that has made an unequal League with another, doth by that very Act acknowledge a Superiority of Worth and Dignity in the other; since he obliges himself to pay more Respect than will be given. And it is, I think, also further clear, that where a Prince hath obtain'd against another a Right of Superiority of Dignity or Precedence, either for his own Person, or as Head of such a State or Commonwealth, whether by Compact or Custom, and such a Sort of Sufferance, as no other probable Account can be given of, than that he was allowed to be the greater Prince; that Right may be insisted on and maintained, as long as that Prince lives, who is, as it were, the Character or Mark of the Dignity, and under whom that Right was at first obtain'd^e.

XVI. But where no such Right has been already fix'd, there Variety of Arguments are used to prove Superiority of Eminence and Dignity. The Antiquity of Kingdoms, Families, and Governments, the Extent, Riches, and Power of Dominions, the Quality of that Power which the Prince holds over his Subjects, and the Magnificence of his Title, are the common and general Topicks. That Antiquity adds a Sort of Reverence and Veneration to States and Families, is an Opinion commonly receiv'd. And they that endeavour to support themselves upon the Strength of it, usually urge, they enjoy'd their Dignity in full Lustre long ago, when other Kingdoms were subject to the basest Slavery; or, it may be, when the Family which now wears the Crown, and triumphs so insolently in its new Honour, lay undistinguish'd among the common Herd of the People; that 'tis unpardonable Arrogance to dispute Precedence with Princes, whose Predecessors might, if they had pleased, have made the Ancestors of others their Slaves; that it is a sort of a natural and universal Law, that Things of later, should be inferior to Things of earlier Original. And from hence they usually pass to a pompous Representation of the several great Actions in War and Peace, which have been achiev'd in that Kingdom by the Princes of the Blood Royal: Few of which Sort those upstart Nations and Families

^a Mandeflo Itin. Part. 2.

^b Mart. Ep. 10. ver. 8. Per medium pugnas & prior ire lutum, Senec. de Ira. l. 3. c. 37. Because you were placed in a little less honourable Seat, you presently break into a Passion, and are angry with the Master of the Feast, him that invited you, and him that was put above you: How ridiculous is it? What Difference is there, what Part of the Table you sit at? Can a Seat make a Man more or less Honourable?

^c Declam. 252.

^d Salust. Jugurth. Bello.

^e Vid. Jac. Godofred. de Præcedentia, par. 1. c. 1. Add the Dispute between the French and Spanish Ambassadors in Andr. Maurocenus Hist. Venet. l. 8. p. 301, &c. & Memoirs touchant les Ambassadeurs. By Mr. Wicquefort.

Mr. BARE. NOTES on §. xv.

¹ In which, however, we ought not to go too far. 'I love, says Montaigne, to observe the Rules of Civility; but not so servilely, as to make my Life uneasy by them. There are some tiresome Formalities in them, which provided we omit through Discretion, and not want of Judgment, we are not the less Genteel. I have often known Men uncivil by too much Civility, and troublesome by too much Kindness. This industrious and genteel Way of pushing one's self forward in the World, is in short, a very useful Science. It is, as it were, the Beauty and Grace which makes us acceptable upon our first Admittance into Society and Conversation; and by Consequence, opens us a Door of Instruction, by the Example of others, and gives us an Opportunity of producing our own, if there is any Thing that is instructive and communicable." Montaigne's Essays, Book I. Chap. 13.

milies can presume to challenge. Moreover, Power adds Terror to Reverence, and makes it not only Impudence¹, but Rashness and Folly, to contend for Honour with those, in whose Power it is to do us Good or Harm, as they please. And without dispute, 'tis a certain Way to demand and to obtain Honour, to tell the World with Sword in Hand, that if they will not, THAT shall give it. Further, 'tis look'd upon to be an higher Degree of Eminence to be free from all other Restraints of Subjection, but those which are due to GOD, the supreme Governor of the World, than to be confin'd by human Laws, and to live under Ties of Compact. And lastly, since the Title is commonly used to express the Thing, the Magnificence and Greatness of it; that may be supposed also to imply an Argument against Inferiority of Dignity².

XVII. These with Arguments of a like Nature may perhaps be speciously urged; but after all, it must be confess'd, they can produce no more than an imperfect Right, unless confirm'd by Compact express or tacit, according to receiv'd Custom. And it will be no Difficulty to destroy the Force of these and all such Arguments, by answering, that Antiquity alone can have no real Honour in it, since it only implies Tract of Continuance, which may be urged for the most inconsiderable Things as well as the most valuable; that all Kingdoms are by their own Nature free and independent; and that it is not material to enquire how long they have been so; that it may indeed be allow'd, that when a Kingdom hath long continued in a flourishing Condition, the Strength of its Constitution and the Wisdom of its Government ought not to be question'd; and that it need not be denied, that the Favour of Heaven, and the Bravery of Subjects, was sufficient to defend them against foreign Arms. But then, that Commonwealths of later Growth may possibly be settled as wisely, and govern'd as happily, as those that have stood much longer, nay, perhaps be establish'd with greater Wisdom, and enjoy greater Happiness, since the wise and good Institutions of ancient States and Commonwealths generally cost them dear, and they of later Date have the Advantage of seeing and using what others discover'd before them; that the Favours of Heaven are not in human Disposal, or certain to be long enjoy'd; but yet that it is not impossible to provide so far, that the State may not fall to ruin of it self, for want of good and wholesome Laws. In fine, that all Things ought to be valued according to their present State; what is pass'd we have no more to do with, and what is to come doth not yet concern us. That distinct States and Commonwealths never unite into Systems, or form General Assemblies, where it may be necessary to oblige them of latest standing to be content to be placed lowest. All are allowed to enjoy distinctly their separate Freedom. That the Government of any State should continue in one particular Family for a long Course of Time, may be allow'd to be sometimes an Argument, that the Posterity succeeded and imitated the Virtues of their Ancestors; but it must also be allow'd, that great Wealth and Riches only are sufficient Guards, and not easily to be over-power'd. Much also in the long Possession of a Throne must be ascribed to the Disposition and Temper of the People, averse to Change; and much in the Succession of good Princes to the Blessing of Heaven alone. But still Princes and States of larger Origin, ambitious to be thought great, may easily answer, that they cannot look upon any Thing as their own, which was not got by their own Industry or Power³; that it is a very easy Thing to take Possession of large Estates or Dominions, purchas'd by the Success of Ancestors; but to raise a great Fortune, or an Empire, requires Bravery and Virtue; that others owe their Greatness to the Chance of being well born, they to their own Worth and Excellencies; that others can produce nothing for themselves, but old forgotten Monuments of their Fathers great Actions; theirs is no borrow'd Lustre, but the fresh Acquisitions of their own Virtue and Valour. Lastly, that no Degree of Honour is beyond that of being a sovereign Prince, and that this sets the latest Families upon the Level with those of the most ancient Date⁴.

XVIII. As for Power indeed, that may often force the Weaker to pay the Signs of Honour to the Greater, because it is Madness not to yield to them that have Power to do us harm, when they please. As Favorinus in Spartianus⁵ pleasantly told his Friends (who were angry with him for giving up a Word to the Emperor Hadrian, that was used in good Authors) certainly he ought to be allow'd more learned than every Man, that has thirty Legions at his Command⁶: But if a Prince hath Strength enough to defend his own Dominions, he cannot be obliged to yield Precedence to any others, however superior in Riches; since he has no Reason to be afraid of them, or to ask Relief or Protection from them. For where Liberty is equal, a Disproportion in Wealth can make

¹ Vid. Andr. Maurocen. Hist. Venet. l. 12. p. 484. Where he talks of the Emulation tht it happened between the Princes of Italy upon Pius Quintus's presenting Cosmus with the Title of Great Duke of Tuscany. Vid. Paul. Hist. Concil. Trident. l. 5. p. 402.

² Ovid. De Fasti. l. 5. ver. 26.

Quoque die partu est edita, magna fuit.

The Day that gave her Birth first made her Great.

And to this we may apply that of Arnobius, l. 2. Is this a new Thing which we are engaged in? In Time it will be old. Is that old in which you are concern'd? In the Times when it first began, that also was new.

³ Hadrianus in Spartian. c. 15.

⁴ Juvenal. Sat. 5. ver. 130, 131.

Plurima sunt, quæ
Non audent homines perisurâ dicere lænâ.

No Freedom will from him be born,
Whose Cloaths are thread-bare, and whose Cloaks are torn.

Mr. Bowles.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XVI, XVII.

¹ The greatest Part of this Chapter is Word for Word, taken out of our Author's Dissertation de Existimatione, which is amongst his Academical Dissertations.

² Nam genus, & proavos, & quæ non fecimus ipsi, Vix ea nostra voco ——— Ovid. Metam. l. 13. ver. 140, 141.

make no Difference. And therefore, if one Prince's Territories be six hundred Miles in Extent, and another's but one hundred, yet the Difference in the Kingdoms makes none between the Sovereigns; for their Power is of the same Nature in the greater and in the less; and the one may answer the Ends of Government as well as the other. Not to say further, that Power alone, as it implies Ability to do Harm, doth not include any Excellence in it, which is naturally proper to command sincere Respect: For all Respect hath a Mixture of Love in it, but Power to do Harm can certainly produce nothing but Hatred.

XIX. Further, absolute unlimited Power may perhaps force from Subjects greater Degrees of Respect, not without a Mixture of Fear: But with sovereign Princes it can have no such Effect, since they must look upon another Prince's absolute Power, as it relates to them, to be no more than Liberty of Nature, which in itself gives no Man Pre-eminence to another, not subject to him. And since every Prince is to be valued, not by his own Rights only, but by the State and Condition also of the Commonwealth he governs; it will not be difficult to imagine that a limited Monarch may from that enjoy Advantages, which will make him greater and more considerable, than a Prince entirely absolute. Lastly, Titles and Words of all Sorts, take their Value as Money doth, from Use. And since the highest Dignity of Princes is the sovereign Power, it is sufficient if that be express'd in its natural simple Sense, or according to common Use. For the Pomp, or Modesty of Words neither can add to, nor lessen the Thing. So the Turkish Monarch is usually called Emperor, the Persian no more than King; yet this Distinction in itself gives no Preference one to the other. For an affected Multiplicity of Titles added to the proper Style, seems to have a Sort of Barbarism in it; and may perhaps strike some Awe upon inferior and ignorant Subjects, but can make no Impression upon foreign States and Princes. For how was the Roman Emperor, for Example, concern'd, whether Sapores King of Persia call'd himself Brother of the Sun and Moon, as Ammian Marcellinus relates, or of Saturn and Venus.

XX. From all which it is sufficiently clear, that there is no perfect Obligation, which presupposes proper Right in another, by which a Prince really possess'd of sovereign Power is bound to yield Precedence to any other King or Prince as more honourable, however Superior in the Particulars before mention'd; neither is one free State or Commonwealth obliged to yield more, though perhaps another is more antient, or more powerful. Nor indeed is a State govern'd by the Populace, inferior in Dignity to a State govern'd by a Prince, though in a Democracy there is no particular Person to be compar'd with a King. And hence an Ambassador from a free Commonwealth is not necessarily obliged to give Precedence to an Ambassador from a crown'd Head. But because vicarious and deriv'd Honour cannot be supposed to appear with the same Advantage as original; and a Minister cannot be invest'd with the same Dignity as a Prince; and since free Commonwealths can never meet in the same Place with sovereign Princes, but by their Ambassadors and Deputies; 'tis evident, that the Ambassadors of free States ought to yield Precedence to all crown'd Heads, and sovereign Princes.

XXI. And this Equality between the Power invest'd with sovereign Power need not be any Objection against Interviews, or Conferences, to be made either in their own Persons, or by their Ministers, or against their uniting into an establish'd Council. For if a Prince make a Visit to another in a foreign Country, the Laws of Civility give the Stranger the Precedence, except he comes in the Quality of a temporary Subject. For though every Prince be supreme in his own Dominions, yet Princes in the same Manner as Ambassadors, by a sort of Fiction, seem still to continue as Persons free, and within any Prince's Territories, to whom and by whose Consent they make a Visit, without laying aside or disguising their Quality. For 'tis certainly unadvisable and dangerous, for a Prince to venture incognito into a foreign Country, without having first procur'd Leave. 'Tis certain Gramondus confidently pronounces, that it is no Violation of any publick Law, to seize and detain disguised Princes. But I confess I do not see for what Reason; unless it be, that to come in Disguise, without giving Notice, may seem to imply some Suspicious of, and Disrespect to the Prince of the Country. If two or more Princes are to meet in a third Place, it would not be difficult to dispose Things so, that no Preference be given to either of them. For the Rooms they are to meet in, might be so contriv'd, as to leave it absolutely uncertain, which is the first and most honourable Place in it. And upon this View, round Tables have been sometimes used upon such Occasions. The Princes may also declare before-hand, that the Congress shall be made without regard to Precedence, and that they intend to sit promiscuously, or as they please, or happen to place themselves. So Philostratus relates of the Brackmans of India, that they appointed no particular Place for their Prince (as the Greeks and Romans would think it necessary to do) but every one sits where he pleases. But

^a Add. Jacob. Godofred. d. tit. de precedent. part 1. c. 3.

^b Add. Geor. Bates Elench. motuum nuperorum in Anglia, part 2. p. m. 246, &c. & Author. Cardinalismi, part 1. l. 3. p. m. 375.

^c Ammian Marcellin. l. 17. c. 5. Add. Ibid. l. 23. c. 6.

^d Ausonius in ludo septem Sapientum. ver. 78, 79, 80.

^e Hist. Gall. l. 13.

*Recte olim ineptum Delphicus iussit Deus,
Quarentem, quisnam primus Sapientum foret:
Ut in orbe tereret nomina eorum inscriberet,
Ne primus esset, ne velinus quispiam.*

One to Apollo once this Question brought,
Which he the first of all the Sages thought?
Write in a Ring their Names, the God reply'd,
And equal Dignity to each divide.

^f De Vita Apollon. Thyas. L. 3. c. 8. p. 134. C. D. Lucian. Epist. Sat. ad divit. p. 628. 'Tis easiest and most agreeable in Entertainments, that all should be equal. Add. Athenaus Dipnosoph. l. 1. c. 4.

Mr. BARB. NOTE on §. XIX.

^g See Grot. B. 1. c. 3. §. 10. And Algernoon Sidney's Discourse upon Government, Chap. iii. Sect. 32.

But this will still be much easier to be done, if Princes will please to meet incognito, and without their usual Pomp and Retinue. Nor could they by any other Method more fully declare, that they would not raise Difficulties or Disputes about the Points of Dignity. Or if this Method be not thought the best, it may be determin'd by Lot; and that two Ways, either with Condition that every Prince shall for the future remain contented with what Place Chance determines for him; or else that every Prince, in Turn, shall succeed in a certain Order settled by Lot. But Disputes may be much more easily ended, if the Congress be form'd only by Ambassadors; especially since there is one Way more of preventing Difficulties among them, namely, if the several Princes their Masters send them with Characters of different Value. For since different Degrees of Dignity arise purely by arbitrary Imposition, they may easily be varied several Ways. But here it is to be observ'd, that the Value of such Characters must be determined by the common Consent of Sovereign Princes. For if one single Prince should, by his own Authority alone, create a New Character, to bestow upon his Ministers, whenever the Ambassador makes his Demand for any such particular Honour from others, they may justly except against his Master's Power to oblige them to pay it. But after all, it must be confess'd, that such an Evenness of Temper as Agessilaus express'd, when he was placed in an obscure Place in the Theatre, is often much the happiest, in preventing Disputes: For as he said, It should not be thought that the Place adds Honour to the Man, but the Man to the Place. It was a good Method which Abbas, King of Persia, took to prevent Differences at a publick Entertainment; them that were inclin'd to the Persian Persuasion he placed on his right Hand; those of the Turkish he seated on his left, because the Persians thought the right Hand the most honourable, and the Turks the left. And it was an artful Stratagem enough, which Alphonfus XI. used to silence an old Dispute for Precedence between the two Towns of Burgos and Toledo; when he came to ask their Opinions in Council, before any mention of their Dispute began, They of Toledo, I know, saith he, are ready to comply with my Commands; let them of Burgos speak: Which immediately silenc'd both; both equally thinking themselves preferred to each other; those of Toledo, because the King spoke in their Name first; and they of Burgos, because they were commanded to speak for themselves first.

XXII. But if a lasting Society is to be erected between a Number of Equals; and every particular Member be desirous that the Equality should continue, but unwilling to admit the Determination of the Lot, or that a constant Succession in Turn should prescribe their Places; there is another Method left resembling the Chance of Lots, and which can be no way prejudicial to the Dignity of any Member; and that is, that every Member should take Place in the common Assembly, in the same Course and Order in which he was admitted into it. And this Method is to be particularly observ'd with regard to all Members that are admitted into the Society, after it is establish'd. For they that at first constitute the Society, had better perhaps take Place by Lot, or by common Consent and Agreement. And because it is generally receiv'd in Colleges, and other Societies, that every Member is to be placed according to the Order of Admission, Grotius gives it for an universal Rule, that the natural Order between Fellows of such Societies is to be placed according as they were received into them. But it must be observ'd, that in such Societies Priority or Posteriority of Place, doth not in the least imply greater or less Degrees of Dignity, but is only the Order of Equals in Honour. And therefore there is no Difference between the first and last in that Respect. For it is a different Case, when the Preference is given for superior Eminence of Worth in the Person prefer'd; as Ausonius tells the Emperor Gratian, " 'Tis no Dishonour to be second, but of two honourable Persons he that hath the Precedence is the most honourable &c. ". But it is also observed by Grotius, in the Place before mention'd, that in Assemblies of Christian Kings and People, met to represent the Body of the universal Church, is was the Custom, that they that embrac'd Christianity should in all religious Assemblies have the Precedence to others. And upon this Bottom, some have taken the Liberty to challenge Precedence, and claim the Superiority of Dignity as their Right, in all other Assemblies of what Nature soever. But whatever good Reasons there might be to introduce Observations of such an Order in those sacred Conventions; yet that the same should be observ'd in all other Assemblies, and that the Antiquity of the Christian Profession alone should produce such Pre-eminence of Dignity, is what I can see no Reason for; especially since it is one of the Commands of the Religion, In Honour to prefer one another. Besides, in Councils the Clergy generally were the Parties principally concern'd; the Lay Persons appear'd only as Assistants, and how-

^a See Mr. Wicquefort, des Memoirs touchant les Ambassadeurs. Add. Jac. Godofred. de precedencia, part 3. P. Paul. Hist. Con. Trid. The Dispute between the French and Spanish Ambassadors at Trent and Rome about Precedence, l. 8.

^b See Mr. Wicquefort's Mem. touchant les Ambas.

^c Plut. Apoph. Lacon. p. 208. D. Damonides in a like Case said, 'Tis very well you have found out a Way to make even this Place honourable. Ibid. Apoph. Add. Plut. Symposiac. l. 1. c. 2, 3.

^d Pet. de Valle, Itin. part 2. Ep 5.

^e Hieron. Olorius de Rebus gestis Eman. l. 1. Add. Gramond. Hist. Gall. l. 3. init.

^f Grot. l. 2. c. 5. §. 21. Add. Boecler. in locum, add. L. 50. t. 3. l. 1. D. de Albo scribendo. L. 12. t. 3. l. 1. C. de Consul. &c. tit. 44. d. l. C. de Tiron. l. 3. C. t. 5. d. l. de Propos. sacri Cubiculi. l. 1. C. t. 4. d. l. de Praef. Prator. l. 2. C. L. 10. t. 5. 2. l. 10. de Profess. Jac. Godofred. part. 2. c. 3. §. 17, 18. de precedencia.

^g Auson. Panegyri. ad Grot. c. 24. in fin.

^h Rom. xii. 10. Phil. ii. 3.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. XXII.

¹ " So that, says our Author, in his Dissertation (de Existimatione, §. 27.) Kings and Princes were only looked upon in Councils, as " it were Subjects of Ecclesiasticks—'Tis perhaps through the Remains of this pernicious Custom, that in certain Places the Clergy, in " their publick Prayers for the whole State of Mankind, never fail to mention themselves first; and in speaking of the three Estates, or " Orders of the Kingdom, always name the Clergy first, then the Nobility, and lastly, the Commonalty. However Persons of good " Sense do not think it very decent nor reasonable, that a Minister, for Example, in the Prayers he makes on New-Years-Day, does not pray " to God for the Prosperity of the Prince, till after he hath wished a thousand Blessings to himself, and the rest of his Brethren, as if the " Welfare both of the Church and state, depended more on the Felicity of the Clergy, than that of the Prince. So much the more, as this " Prince is not one of those Enemies, or Persecutors of the Church, to whom nevertheless the Apostle St. Paul commands us, to render " Honour, as well as to others, as a sort of Tribute, (Romans xiii. 7.) by Virtue of an indispensible Obligation, but for a Foster-Father, " and a Protector of the Church, &c."

however this be, it cannot be Reason, that because a Person in a certain Assembly, for a certain Respect, which hath no Influence upon his Honour in general, yields the Precedence to another; he is therefore obliged to yield it everywhere, and when there is no Regard had to those Respects. And thus there are few States or Commonwealths, in which there are not particular Persons that are Members of several different Societies, and who therefore may in one be obliged to give Place to a certain Person; when out of that, or in another, they are known to be his Superiors.

XXIII. But, however, it is evident, that there is that Force in sovereign Power, which will always give the Person invested with it absolute Right to the Preference to all Persons subject to it. For without Dispute, Authority is superior to Obedience; and it must be allowed to be greater, to controul and command the Wills of others, than to submit and comply one's self. Nor can a Man have Power to deny Reverence and Regard to that Person, to whom he owes his Protection, and who has Power by Punishments to compel me to obey him. So that Government doth of it self naturally introduce Inequality among Men. Tho' it is not unnatural to think, that besides that Veneration which is due to the Place and Office of the Sovereign, good Subjects often suppose themselves obliged to pay other particular Marks of Esteem, to the particular Virtues and Excellencies eminent in their Prince. But it is also further manifest, that the greater and more absolute the Prince's Power is, the greater will the Honour be his Subjects pay him. Nay, long Possession of sovereign Power, though in itself it can give him no real Strength, doth yet wonderfully raise the Dignity of the Prince. But notwithstanding, Subjects may sometimes excel their Princes in those Foundations of Esteem, which produce only an imperfect Right. And therefore it was a most extravagant Vanity in Hadrian the Emperor, to make himself profess'd Rival to all the best Mas- ters in the Arts they were famous for. And it was ridiculous in Alexander the Great, when reading that Place in Homer, where the Greeks with'd the Lot might happen to Ajax, or Diomedes, or Agamemnon, he broke into a Passion and said, He would have kill'd the Person that should have nam'd him last. For it is no Discredit to a General, to have Soldiers under him of more Prowess and Bravery than himself, though 'tis true, as Domitian said, The Honour of being a good Commander is as great as that of being a good Prince. But among Subjects of the same Commonwealth, it is left entirely to the Sovereign to prescribe the Measures and Limitations of intensive Esteem; and to grant to some Persons perfect Right of Precedence to others. And whatever Station he thinks fit to assign to any Man, that he may lawfully maintain against any of his Fellow-Subjects, and that he ought to be satisfied with. For as the old Centurion in Livy said, Subjects should think every Post honourable in Service. And though perhaps sometimes undeserving Persons may be prefer'd to Men of Worth and Merit, yet if a Man should upon that Account be uneasy and dissatisfied with his own State, or give them Disturbance in theirs, he will deserve to be punish'd for Contempt of the sovereign Authority. For, as Terentius said in Tacitus, "It is not the Subjects Buiness to enquire who their Prince prefers, or for what Reasons Heaven has placed the supream Disposal of Things in his Hands, and it is their Honour to obey". But it might seem a good Way to silence the Complaints of ambitious Subjects, if Princes, when they prefer Persons to Places of Honour, would always have regard to those Foundations of Esteem, which were before mention'd; and more especially to the particular Services they have done to the Publick; which to reward with eminent Degrees of Esteem, rather than with Money, or Reward of like Nature, is generally the politick Art of Princes. But so much the rather, because, except the Dignity and ^a Nestor in Homer Iliad. l. i. v. 277, &c.

Μήτε σὺ, Πηλεΐδ᾽ ἄνεκ' ἐπίνομαται βασιλῆϊ.
Ἄνδρῶν, ἐπεὶ ὀπίσθ' ὁμοίη; ἐμμορε τιμῆ;
Σκηπεύχῳ βασιλῆϊ, ᾧτε Ζεὺς κῆρ' ἔδωκεν.

Cease Noble Youth, to Peace your Mind compel,
Nor let your Rage against the King rebel;
No Prince like him in God-like Honour reign'd,
That e'er from Heaven his envied Throne obtain'd.

Though Achilles rather submitted to the Conduct, than the Power or Command of Agamemnon.

^b Tacitus Agricola, c. 39.

^c Vid. L. i. t. 14. l. 3. De Offic. Prætoris.

^d L. 42. c. 34.

^e Ann. vi. c. 8.

^f To this we may apply that of Lucian, Judic. Vocal. 'Tis fit and proper that every Letter should continue in that Order in which it was at first plac'd; and to go out of that, is to break all that is just and equitable. And he that first made these Laws for you, settled this Order, by which every Letter was for ever to continue in its own Place and Dignity. Plin. l. 9. Epist. 5. If the Distinctions between Degrees and Dignities were mixed, disorder'd, and confounded with one another, nothing will be more unequal than Equality it self.

Mr. BARE. NOTES on §. XXIII.

¹ Vid Xenoph. Cyropæd. l. 8. p. 130. Ed. H. Steph. where he speaks of the Order in which he plac'd his Friends at an Entertainment. "Twas a fine Invention, says Montaigne, and received by most Governors in the World, to establish certain vain and worthless Marks to reward Virtue with, such as Crowns of Laurel, Oak, and Amyrtle; the Form of certain Robes; the Privilege of riding in a Coach through the City, or going by Night with Torches; some particular Seat in Publick Assemblies; the Prerogative of Surnames, and Honours, certain Distinctions in Coats of Arms, and the like: The Use of which has been differently receiv'd, according to the Opinion of the People, and still remains. As for our part, we have, as likewise several of our Neighbours, the Orders of Knighthood, which were established purely for this End. 'Tis certainly a very good and profitable Custom, to find out a Way to distinguish the Merit of Men of rare and excellent Parts, and to content and satisfy them by Payments that are not burthenfome to the Publick, and cost the Prince nothing. And it has been always known by Experience, and we ourselves have formerly seen something of it, that Men of Quality were more jealous of such Rewards, than of those where there was Gain and Profit; and this is very reasonable and likely. For if to the Value which ought to be simply of Honour, you put Riches and other Commodities of Profit, that Mixture, instead of enhancing the Worth of it, debases and lessens it. The Order of St. Michael, which has been so long in Esteem among us, never had any greater Advantage, than that of having no Communication with any other Advantage than Honour. That was the Reason, that formerly, there was no Employment or Estate whatsoever, to which the Nobility aspir'd with so much Ardour and Affection as they did to this Order; nor any Quality that bore more Respect and Grandeur: Virtue embracing, and more willingly desiring a Reward purely its own, rather glorious than profitable. For indeed, other Rewards, are not given on so noble an Account, since we use them upon every Occasion: With Money we recompense the Fidelity of a Servant, the Diligence of a Courier, a Dancing-Master, a Tumbler, a Flatterer, &c. and the most vile Offices they do us; nay, even Flattery, Pimping, Treason, and all sorts of Vice, are paid with Money: 'Tis no Wonder then, that Virtue receives, and desires less willingly this Sort of common Payment than that which is proper and peculiar to it, and is all generous and noble. Montaigne's Essay, Liv. 11. Chap. vii.

and Pre-eminence of great Men among Subjects be measured by the Benefits and Assistance they give, or at least are capable to give among their Inferiors, it will be but insignificant, and without Reality. But because, if Princes were obliged always to place their Subjects according to their intrinsic Worth and Merit, the Trouble would be infinite to make Reviews of them so often as it would be necessary; and besides, that no such Review could be made without displeasing the greatest Part of them, since 'tis certain, that the Generality of Men never consider how many they have left below them, but how many they still see above them; it might seem perhaps to be the most proper and easiest Method to bestow Honours upon the Subjects, at least upon them of the best Rank, according to the Offices they bear in the Commonwealth. And then again, it will be easy to prevent Complaints, if none but Men of Merit, and Persons well qualified are put into those Offices; and if the Offices themselves are disposed in a natural and proper Order. And in general, the most just and perfect Order of Offices seems to be, when the Honours annex'd to Offices are greater or less, proportionably, according to the Nature, Weight, and publick Importance of the Affairs and Business which belong to the Management of them; and according as it requires the greatest Parts and Accomplishments to discharge them. In Homer, Dignity of Office is prefer'd to that of Blood, even of natural Bravery and Courage. For thus Nestor tells Achilles:

Εἰ δὲ σὺ καλεῖσθαι ἐσσι, δεῦρ δὲ σε γένοιτο μέγιστος,
Ἄλλ' ἵνα σέβῃσθαι ἐσσι, ἐπεὶ πλείωνων ἀνδρείαι.

We own you brave, your Race divine adore,
Him greater think, because his Power is more.

But it sometimes also happens, that some Offices in the Commonwealth have larger Shares of Honour annexed to them, than of Authority and Power; and sometimes the quite contrary; perhaps, for fear, lest Honour attended with much Wealth, and Power, might tempt the Magistrate to take Arms against the Commonwealth. But in every Rank of Offices, Men should be thought more or less honourable, according to the Dignity of the Employment they have in it. Now though it is unavoidable, that one Office will be look'd upon as more honourable than another; yet this will be no Reason that all and every particular Person, entrusted in the more honourable Office, should therefore challenge Precedence from all and every Person in the less honourable; but only that the highest Person in the inferior Office ought to give Place to the first in the superior, but may still have Preference to all that are subordinate to the first. It is but rarely seen, that the Person gives Lustre and Honour to the Office. So it happened once at Thebes, to the Office of Tax-gatherer, after Epaminondas had born it. But as to the intrinsic Value of all Marks of Honour and Dignity, that depends upon the Virtues and Qualifications of the Persons that wear them. And this was what Antisthenes meant, when he desired the Athenians to make a Decree, that Asses should be Horses. "For though, as they told him, nothing could be more contrary to common Sense and Reason; yet, as he answer'd, to prefer Persons to Places of Trust, and Command in the Commonwealth, that are no way qualified for them, but only by that publick Act and Declaration, which puts them into them, is almost as absurd." But if the Subjects come to an Agreement among themselves, about their Order of Place, or if Custom hath introduced any particular Order, either Method may be supposed to have the Force of Law, unless the Government except against, or forbid it.

XXIV. But if Comparison is to be made between eminent Men of different Commonwealths, it is clear, that the Foundations of intensive Esteem, even where such Persons are concern'd, can produce nothing more than an Aptitude to receive Honour from others, who have less Pretensions to those Foundations than themselves. And that whether the Person of greater Eminence come into a foreign Commonwealth, as a Traveller or Stranger, or meet others in a third Place; it must be excepted only, if the Prince oblige his Subjects to give place to the Stranger, or if the Dispute be determined by some third Prince where they meet, or if it be decided by Agreement or Custom. And therefore the Dignity of an Office, which a Man bears in his own Commonwealth, gives him no Right to prefer himself to the Subjects of a foreign State that may perhaps bear Offices, which he in his own Country demands Precedence upon. For a Right which is of Force against Fellow Subjects, is not therefore of Force against all other Persons; for the same Reason that the Laws of foreign Nations oblige none but their own Subjects. Nor is it any material Objection, that perhaps the Foreigner in his own Country may have a greater Title than the Person he disputes against. For every State and Commonwealth may set what Value they please (within themselves) upon Titles and other Marks of Honour, whether given by themselves, or others. Besides, the Value of Offices, by the Greatness of which the Measures of Honour are generally taken, is different in different Nations. And even the most benefi-

^a Add. Lord Bacon's Essays, c. 52.

^b Otherwise it will fall out, as Claudian saith in Eutropium, l. 2. ver. 322.

— Quis non consule tali Vilis honos?

— Honour itself grows mean,
When such a Consul rules.

^c Ovid. Metam. l. 13. ver. 365, 368.

— Ratem qui temperat, antest Remigis Officium.

'Tis more to rule the Heins
Than ply the Oar.

^d Hom. l. 1. Iliad. ver. 280, 281.

^e Id. Plot. in præcept. gerend. resp. p. 811.

^f Id. l. 12. t. 8. l. 2. C. ut dignitatum Ordo servetur. And it is a remarkable Place in Suetonius Vespas. c. 9. That it might be known, that the two Orders were not distinguished so much by the Liberties they might use one another with, as by their Dignity; upon a Quarrel that happened between a Roman Senator and a Knight, he thus pronounced, That ill Language ought not to be given nil to a Senator; but that it was lawful enough to return it, when he began it himself.

^g Add Memoires de Wicquefort touchant les Ambassadeurs, p. 519.

cial and useful Arts are not every where equally esteem'd; as it is well known, that in some Countries the Arts of Peace are most valued, in others those of War. Besides, it is particularly observable, that the Words by which the different Degrees of Honour are express'd, do not only denote different Dignities in distinct Commonwealths, but have also sometimes greater Value set upon them, and sometimes less, even in the same Commonwealths, according to the Alterations of Time, which raises or lessens, we know, the Price of every Thing else. For the external Signs of Esteem have their determinative Value set by the Imposition of every particular Commonwealth; but the Foundations of intense Esteem, taken as they are in their own Nature, and in the Estimation of wise Men, can never lose their Value. And therefore the World is every where so just to Virtue, to all celebrated Arts, Functions, and Employments, as to pay them Honour and Respect. But by the Possession of these only a Man hath no Right to demand any particular Marks of Honour in foreign States; except he can obtain such a Right by some of those Ways before mention'd. But, because Marks of Honour are always presumed to be given as Rewards of eminent Virtues; therefore the civiliz'd Part of the World abroad generally pay almost the same Degrees of Respect to the Honours of foreign Nations, that are allowed them at *home*¹. But still they would be thought to do so, more out of Civility and Complaisance, than from any perfect Obligation. But there also are some States that allow but little Value to foreign Honours. Cicero speaking^a of some particular Foreigners, who were of noble Families, does not call them absolutely noble, but says they were (domi) at Rome, or (apud suos nobiles) among their own People noble; the Meaning of which is, that foreign Nobility was not allowed the same Value at Rome, that it had in its own Commonwealth. What Cicero says in another Place seems more insolent^b. If, says he, we make a Comparison between the Men, the meanest Citizen of Rome is equal to the greatest Man in Gallia. The Honours that were given them that won the Prize at the Olympick Games in ancient Greece, are well known: But it would have been ridiculous for them to have expected the same in other Places, where Strength and Activity of Body were not in so much Esteem.

^a Pro M. Fonteio, c. 8. in fin.

^b Pro L. Flacco, c. 13. in fin.

^c And this Value, I believe, is scarce any where higher, than among the Indians, according to the Account we have of it in Orosius, De rebus gestis Emanuel. l. 2. Who tells us, that if any of the Inferior People chance to touch a Nobleman, they think it a Stain upon their Nobility, and a Disgrace to their Family, and revenge it as an Injury of the highest Nature, by the Death of those unfortunate Persons, that happened upon them. And therefore, he says, all below the Rank of Nobility, when they take a Journey any whither, are forced to call out and make a Noise; and by that the Nobles, having Notice of their coming, command them to break the Way, and so the meaner People escape Death, and those of Quality the Danger of a perpetual Blemish to themselves and Family. And as the greatest Crimes do not deprive the one of their Nobility, so neither can the greatest Virtues excuse Obscurity of Birth in the others, but every Man must of Necessity submit to the Condition and State his Father left him in. And these Nobles, we are further told, were allowed the Privilege to lie with other Men's Wives when and where they pleas'd; and if any of them happen'd to be with another Man's Wife (a Sign of which was a Target hung up at the Door) the poor Husband dur'd not go into his own House.

^d Phil. Baldani Descript. Ora Malabar & Coromandel, c. 26. & de Idolat. Indor. Part II. c. 16. Mandilo Itiner. l. 2. c. 10. Add. Abrah. Rogerius de Brammibus, c. 1. 2. Diodor. Siculus, l. 1. c. 74.

In Euripides Hippolyt. Coron. ver. 409, 410. 'Tis said of Adulteries,

This Evil first from noble Families,
With wide Infection tainted the whole Sex.

^e Ed. Dio. Chryostom. Orat. 15. in 2. p. 235. Ed. Morel. Grotium. l. 2. c. 7. §. 8.

^f 2. Jugurth. c. 89.

^g Alcibiad. l. p. 440, 441. Ed. Wech.

Mr. BARB. NOTES ON §. XXIV, XXV.

¹ V. Cicero. Orat. in Ver. l. 3. c. 23. p. 44. Ed. Grav.

² Horat. L. 4. Od. 4. ver. 29.

XXV. Lastly, Since almost in every Nation some Degree of Dignity is supposed to adhere to Birth; it will not be improper in this Place to enquire particularly what is implied in Nobility of Blood, and what Value ought to be set upon it, when consider'd in itself^c.

And here it will undoubtedly be allow'd, that Nobility of Birth doth not of itself bestow better Constitution of Body (though perhaps Goodness and Elegance of Diet may sometimes seem to contribute to it) neither does it produce more excellent Dispositions of Mind, or a brighter Wit, or more vigorous Understanding; but all these Endowments may as well attend the meanest as the most noble Extraction. Nature does not take any other Method in giving Birth to noble, than she does to common Men. And conjugal Honour is, or may be kept as sacred among common People, as Persons of highest Quality. Nor would it be an easy Task to prove, that noble Families are less corrupted, or expos'd to Adulteries, than the poor or mean^d. So that if even the Virtues of Parents could be always suppos'd to be transfus'd into the Children, yet it would be extream difficult for many noble Persons to prove, that their Blood descended to them pure from the first Rise of their Family, without spurious or foreign Mixtures^e. And it is so far from being always true, that Fortes creantur fortibus & bonis^f.

The Brave do from the Brave and Good descend.

That on the contrary, we see nothing more common than Instances of the Degeneracy of the Children of the greatest Men. "Our Parents (as Marcius & saith in Sallust) may leave us all that it is possible for them to leave, their Estates and Pictures, and an happy Memory of themselves; but their Virtue they never did nor can leave; for that alone is what can neither be given nor received." But further, 'tis possible that common Persons may be as well educated as the noble; and 'tis not unusual to see the Advantages the Great and Rich have of cultivating and improving their Minds, scandalously mispent in Sloth and Luxury, to supply and support the most extravagant Vices. It may well be presumed, as Plato says^g, That Nobility of Birth, if attended with good Education, may produce eminent Virtues.

Virtues. But it is also evident in Fact, what Degeneracy noble Families sometimes sink into, and how much the Glory of Ancestors is obscured by the Blemishes of Posterity ^a. And 'tis certain, that many that have been obscurely born, have rais'd themselves to the highest Honours, purely upon the Stock of their own Virtues. Iscocrates ^b took it for a Topick to commend Nobility, that it did not, like other Gifts of Fortune, soon decay, or remove into other Hands, but continued always with the Person it once belonged to; and therefore was the best Inheritance Men could leave to their Children. But certainly, except a Man can support his Nobility by his own Merits, or except he enjoys by it some particular Privileges in the Commonwealth, it can be but a very worthless inconsiderable Thing. And therefore there is no Necessity in the Nature of the Thing, that the Son should succeed either to the Places, or Degrees of Esteem his Father enjoyed, only by his Birth; especially, since in the last Resort, Mankind are deriv'd from the same Original. For as Marius in Sallust says ^c "Every Man partakes of the same common Nature, and the Brave only have the best Title to Nobility." And therefore a Man's own Virtues, not those of his Ancestors, ought to recommend him; according to the Character Tibullus gives of Mejjala ^d.

*Nam, quanquam antiquæ gentis superant tibi laudes,
Non tua majorum contenta est gloria fama,
Nec quaris quid quaque index sub imagine dicat,
Sed generis prisceos contendis vincere honores,
Quam tibi majores, majus decus ipse futuris.*

For you, tho' grac'd by long descending Fame,
Depise the dull hereditary Name.
Nor from the dead will borrow sleeping Praise,
Or rob their Monuments your own to raise,
Greater than all the Heroes of your Line,
To your own single Merits, you confine
Your Praise; and to Posterity will leave
A greater Name than all your Race could give.

XXVI. But however, it hath obtain'd in many States and Commonwealths, that Persons of Merit, who have been placed by the Government in Stations to which particular Privileges, and peculiar Degrees of Esteem are allow'd, might have the Advantage of deriving the same down to their Children by Birth, and in the Nature of an Inheritance ^e. For 'tis certain, that Nature has made no real Distinction between the Birth of the Noble and the Plebeian. The Difference between them is grounded entirely on the Imposition and Indulgence of the Commonwealth, which allows, that such a particular State, to which certain Rights and Degrees of Esteem are annexed, shall descend to the Posterity of the Person it was first conferr'd upon ^f, barely by Birth, without any new Grant. And if this Imposition be taken away, all the Distinction of Birth ceases. And therefore, when a Prince removes a Commoner into the Nobility, he cannot be supposed to make any Alteration in his Nature or Extraction, or to infuse new Vigour into his Mind; but only to place him in a State opposite to the Commonalty, and to give him Liberty to entail that, and the Rights consequent upon it, upon his Children. Which was properly enough signified by Amasis King of Egypt, when to shew that the Obscurity of his Birth was no Reason why he should be denied his due Honour, as he was King, he melted a Bar of Gold into an Image, and set it up to be worshipp'd ^g. On the other hand, if any Man be degraded from his Nobility, either by way of Punishment for some Fault, or because he refuseth to conform to the Laws of the Nobility; it is not supposed, that his Nature or Temper of Mind is therefore altered, or that the Blood he derived from his Ancestors is changed, neither can it be denied, that he continues to be of noble Extraction; but he is only deprived of a certain State, and of the Privileges that belonged to it in the Commonwealth. And then he is in all Respects no better than a Commoner. And in the same Manner it must be said, that neither Legitimation nor Restitution ^h in Blood make any real Change in Nature, but only introduce certain moral Effects ⁱ. Machiavel in his History of Florence tells us ^j, that after the Tyranny of the Duke of Athens was expired, the sovereign Power being lodg'd in the People of Florence, and the Nobility excluded by Law from any Share of the Government, a certain Gentleman call'd Benchi, of the noble Family of the Boundelmonti, for his Gallantry and good Services in the Wars against the Pisans, was prefer'd to be one of the People, that is, was made a Plebeian. And the same Historian, in another Place, says ^k, that the same Privilege was granted several others of the Nobility. And, among the Romans, Clodius left the senatorian Order, and was adopted into the plebeian, that he might be capable to be made Tribune of the Commons ^l.

XXVII. But

^a Arist. Rhetor. l. 2. c. 15. Nobility consists in Greatness of Extraction; Generosity in not departing from Nature, which all that are Noble cannot pretend to; for many of them are Persons of no Worth or Value. Add. Stobæus Serm. 84. 85.

^b Encom. Helenæ. ^c B. Fugurth. c. 88.

^d Tibull. l. 4. El. 1. ver. 28. &c.

^e Lesbonactes Orat. hortat. The Children or such as have behaved themselves with Bravery, in Dangers that threaten'd the Commonwealth, are looked upon to be noble. 'The Great ought not to love the first Ages of the World; it affords them a melancholy Prospect to look into them, and see that we were all descended from one Brother and Sister.' La Bruyere's Manners or Characters of the Age, p. 308.

^f Add. Huartus Scrut. Ing. c. 16. p. m. 488. &c.

^g Herodot. Enterp. p. 99. Ed. H. Steph.

^h And in this Sense we may understand that of Euripides. Phœnij. ver. 821. &c.

ὅ γὰρ ὁ μὴ καλὸν, ὃ πῶς ἔφθυ καλόν, &c.

For what is once dishonourable and foul,
Is never otherwise, the baseborn Son,

Still on his Mother's black Reproach reflects,
And on his Father's Obloquy and Shame.

ⁱ Lib. 3.

* L. 5.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. XXVI.

¹ P. C. l. 6. t. 8. De jure aureorum annullorum, & de natalibus restituendis.

² Vid. Livii Epitom. l. 103

XXVII. But however, it must be allowed, that generally all Governments, when they bestow any such publick Honour as that of Nobility on their Subjects, have regard to Persons known by some distinguishing Excellencies, or extraordinary Merits. And as such Persons justly deserve a larger Share of Esteem than others, so 'tis to be supposed, that their Virtues are thought more valuable, when the Rewards of them are allowed to be derived to those, for whom Nature gives all Men the strongest Affection; especially since 'tis natural to believe, such Favours may provoke the Emulation of other Subjects, and make them ambitious to gain the like Rewards. Besides, it is but natural to expect, that the Children, influenced by the Example of their Parents, may be proud to rival the Virtues of their Families, and maintain their Title by their Honours, by the same Methods which at first gain'd them. Nor is it less easy to suppose, that Parents may think their Honour engaged to take Care, that the State should not have Reason to complain, that their Children were grown degenerate. Now, when it was allowed therefore, that Nobility should be annexed to the Birth, and run in the Blood, it was to be expected that Persons would not submit to mix with Families of mean Extraction; lest by marrying beneath themselves, they might seem to debase their Quality, and cut off those Rights which they would deride to their Children. It might seem also prudential, rather to admit the Daughters of Equals than Inferiors to share in their Dignity; and it might be thought of Moment, that the rich Tradesman's Daughter might not be capable of being prefer'd before the poorer of the Nobility. And that Posterity might not dispute their Descent, it would seem necessary to keep an exact account of their Families and Pedigrees. When, on the other hand, it would be needless for Persons of meaner Rank to take the same Care to register their Ancestors, since they enjoy no special Privileges upon the Score of Birth, but are obliged to support themselves by their own Industry and Virtue.

XXVIII. Further, to illustrate what has been said, it may not be improper to enquire, what particular Institutions, relating to Nobility, were observ'd amongst the Romans. Now Romulus therefore, that he might digest his rude disorder'd Multitude, into the proper Form of a Civil Body or People, made Choice of an hundred Persons out of the Muss ¹ to be his Council; and these he call'd Patres, either to express the Nature of their Station, or their Age; the rest of the People were still no more than Commons. The Descendants of the first were call'd Patricians, by an easy and plain Denomination, implying, that they were of the Family of the Patres; or as others suppose, That they only could show their Fathers, the rest being only a Company of Fugitives, that could not tell who their Fathers were, nor prove that they were free Parents, and therefore were no better than Filii Terræ ². And this Supposition they attempt to prove, because whenever the Patricians were to be assembled by their Kings, the Præcones or Criers call'd every Man by his own, and by his Father's Name; but that the Plebeians were summon'd to the Assembly by a Trumpet, or Ox-horn, the publick Servants going through the City, and calling them by that Sound only. Dionysius Halicarnassens indeed, according to his usual Turn, gives a fopper Interpretation to this Custom ³, telling us that the Præcones call'd the Patricians by Name, by way of Honour; and that the Commons were summon'd by the Horns only for Expedition. But 'tis clear that Decius in Livy seems to contradict him ⁴. "For was it never heard, says he, in what manner these Patricians were at first constituted? that they did not drop down out of the Clouds, but were only such Persons as could (Patrem ciere) name their Fathers, that is, were no more than Free-born: I my self can now call a Consul my Father, and my Son, his Grandfather ⁵." From all which it appears, that it was Title enough to the primitive Nobility of Rome, to be born in lawful Wedlock, and of free Parents; "For indeed in all new erected Commonwealths, Nobility must necessarily be late, and rais'd by Virtue ⁶. And hence the Patricians urged, that they were the only Persons that were of any Family, or that were related by Gentility to one another." And therefore Cicero in his Topicks gives this Definition of the Gentiles or Persons of Extraction and Quality: "They are Persons that have all the same Names, are descended from free Parents, none of their Ancestors were ever Slaves, nor were they themselves ever depriv'd of Liberty ⁷." Though in Course of Time, 'tis certain the Plebeians also form'd and asserted their Gentes or Families ⁸. And hence the modern Languages, derived from the Latin, call Noblemen and Persons of Quality (Gentlemen) Gentiles Homines: But afterwards when the Plebeians were allowed to make Inter-marriages with the Nobility, and so all the Disbonour and Baseness of their Original, if there were ever any such, might seem to have been worn out; then the Patricians found out another Difference to distinguish themselves from the Commons, by instituting certain Religious Rites particular to each

¹ V. Plutarch. Romulus, p. 24. D. Et Quæst. Rom. p. 278. C. D.

² Juvenal. Sat. 8. ver. 272, &c.

³ Rom. Antiq. l. 2. c. 8.

⁴ Liv. l. 10. c. 8. in fin.

Et tamen ut longe repetas, longæque revolvas

Nomen, ab infamæ gentem delucis Afylo.

Majorum primus quisquis fuit ille tuorum,

Aut Pastor fuit, aut aliud quod dicere nolo.

⁵ Liv. l. 1. c. 34.

⁶ Boetius in Topicis. The Gentiles are such as bear all the same Name, as the Brutus's, the Scipio's; but if they are Slaves, they are not Gentiles. And though perhaps the Children and Descendants of Freed Men may have the same Name, yet they are not therefore in the Number of the Gentiles, because Gentility must be derived down from a long Race of such as were Free-born.

⁷ Add Franc. Connanus Com. Jur. Civil. l. 2. c. 11.

Boast then your Blood, and your long Lineage stretch
As high as Rome, and its great Founders reach;
You'll find in these Hereditary Tails,
Your Ancestors the Scum of broken Jails;
And Romulus, your Honour's antient Source,
Was a poor Shepherd's Boy, or something worse.

Mr. Steppeny.

each Family, and assuming a peculiar sort of Sanc-timony to themselves. And upon this Account they insisted, that all the Offices in the Common-wealth ought to be given entirely to them, because they only had the proper Auspicia, or Omens of Success. But this ridiculous Pretence was soon, as it deserv'd, expos'd and neglected by the Ple-beians. Though some of them too, to shew that the Patricians had no just Grounds to assume such a Prerogative, set up their private Sacra and Family Rites *. Which afterwards growing bur-theusome upon their Heirs, were taken off by Com-emption, as Cicero informs us †.

XXIX. But afterwards, when the Senatorian Dignity, and great Offices of the Commonwealth, which had been engros'd all by the Patricians, were left open and free for the Plebeians especi-ally, the Nobility of Rome was not measur'd so much by Date of Families, or Patrician Descent, as by Number of Images. And from that Time the noble Families of Rome were distinguish'd into Patrician and Plebeian †. The Equestrian Order was not properly Noble by Institution of the Com-monwealth. Tacitus says, indeed, in his Life of Agricola, that Agricola's Grandfathers on both sides had been Procurators or Solicitors to the Emperor, which is the Equestrian Nobility: But the right Sense of that Place is, that as they who were Senatorian Families, measur'd their Nobility by the great Offices they had born, usu-ally call'd Magistratus Curules; so the Procurator-ship to Cesar was look'd upon by the Knights to have been a sort of Nobility, especially because, besides that of Prefect of the Prætorian Cohorts, or the Emperor's Life-Guards, there was no high-er Office which belong'd to that Order, as such. So that in the latter Ages, the Nobility of Rome did not constitute any particular Order, separ-ated from the rest of the People by peculiar Rights, but every Man was allowed to be noble upon his own, or his Ancestors Merits, either as he was able to produce their Statues or Images, or to raise himself to Places of Honour by his own Vir-tue †. But though many of the Roman Offices were no less necessary and serviceable in Times of War than Peace, as that of Dictator, Master of the Horse, Consul, Prætor; yet since Peace is, as it were, the ordinary State of a Commonwealth, War the extraordinary; and since those Offices also seem, as well by their Nature as Appellation, to bear a nearer Relation to Peace than War; it must be allowed, that Roman Nobility had rather a civil Original, than a military. And indeed, it would have been a Method altogether impolitick, to have confin'd Nobility to simple martial Cou-rage, separated and distinguished from the Office and Conduct of a Leader (so as hereby to have constituted a particular Order enjoying large Rights and Immunities) in such a Commonwealth, where War was the common Profession, as I may call it, of every Subject. The Roman Nobility therefore did not constitute any peculiar Rank of Persons in the Commonwealth; nor did it af-ford any other Advantage more considerable than this, that the Images of famous Ancestors usually made the Way to Honour more open and easy.

XXX. From all which it is evident, that the Nature and Genius of modern Nobility in most of the Kingdoms of Europe is much different. For with us the Nobility constitutes a particular Order, distinguished from the rest of the Subjects in Dig-nity, and by extraordinary Rights and Privileges. Besides that, the Prince frequently confers the Honour of Nobility without giving any pub-lick Employment with it, and that too, not so often in Consideration of civil as of military Accomplish-ments and Virtues. One Argument of which, among others, is, that noble Families distinguish themselves from one another, as well as from Commoners, by Devices impress'd upon Shields with an Helmet plac'd above; and which are therefore call'd Arms. Of the Antiquity of which, Diodorus Siculus may be thought to give an Ac-count †, when he tells us, "That the Arms of the Gauls, were Shields about the Height of a Man, flourish'd and emboss'd with every one's proper Device, as he pleas'd to have it. Some he adds, held before them Images of Beasts in Brass, artfully contriv'd to serve both for De-fence and Ornament. On their Heads they wore Helmets of Brass, beautified, as they thought, with some Mark upon the Crest of them, which might be seen at a Distance. Their usual Ornament was the Horns, or the Head of some Bird or Beast form'd upon them, or fix'd to them *." For what Reasons this Part of the World seems to pay so much Honour only to the Virtues military, when the Chinese, on the other hand, prefer the Men of Learning to those of the Sword, will not be difficult to resolve. For it may be consider'd, that though the Ad-vantages which the Commonwealth receives from Men of civil Life and Profession, are no way in-ferior to those it gains by Persons military (for certainly, to form good Laws; to administer Justice impartially; to increase the Riches of the State by Improvement of Trade and Commerce; to be able, by the Force of Eloquence, to com-pose popular Discontents, and to incline the Minds of the People what Way soever the Pos-ture of Affairs requires; to discover the Counsels and Designs of foreign Enemies, and to prevent or frustrate them; are Excellences of the highest Nature, and that deserve the greatest Honours)

yet

* V. Liv. l. 4. c. 2. l. 6. c. 40, 41. l. 10. c. 7.

† Cic. pro Muræna, c. 2. Add. Godof. in Cic. Epist. Fam. L. 7. Ep. 29.

‡ Liv. l. 10. c. 7. The Plebeians can number their Triumphs; and it doth not now repent them of their Nobility, l. 6. c. 37. to-wards the End. From that Time the Commons will enjoy every Thing the Patricians value themselves upon, Authority and Honour, Glory of War, Descent, Nobility.

§ To this Purpose is that of Claudian, De Cons. Prob. & Olyb. Paneg. ver. 13, &c.

— *Quemcumque requires
Hac de stirpe virum, certum est de Consule nasci.
Per fasces numerantur atri, semperque renata Nobilitate vivunt.*

Through all the Line, each Worthy you can name,
His noble Birth doth from a Consul claim,
Th' Imperial Fasces each Descendant grace,
And add repeated Honours to the Race.

¶ L. 5. c. 50.

* Add. Hobbes Leviathan, c. 10. in fin.

yet Civil Persons have not always that Esteem and Value paid them, which is their Due, and especially among People of scanty Knowledge and Observation, both because the natural and acquired Perfections, which are necessary to the Attainment of Civil Accomplishments, lie generally out of common View, and are not well understood by vulgar Apprehensions; and because they seem to discover themselves in a sedate silent Way, without Noise, or Violence, or Danger. But now the Military Virtues and Qualities are perfectly of another Nature. And therefore, though Courage and Resolution are no less necessary in Civil Administration and Conduct, than Military; yet People of Martial Temper and Spirit, that had rather purchase a Subsistence with their Blood, than by their Sweat and Industry, think nothing more glorious and noble, than to be prepar'd against all the Terrors of War, than to face and defy Death and Danger, and to hazard, what is of all Things most valuable, Life itself; that other Men may live in greater Ease and Security. For these Reasons in many Kingdoms of Europe, the Nobility hold their Estates by a feudal Right, and have Immunities from several Duties settled upon them, which are exacted from those of inferior Rank, purely because they are obliged to attend the Wars, and assist the State in Military Service. The Original of which feudal Right seems to be hinted in Lampridius's Life of Alexander Severus, c. 58. where he tells us, "That the Lands which the Emperor took from the Enemy were given to the Officers and Soldiers that liv'd upon the Borders, to enjoy them for ever, provided they would oblige their Heirs to enter into Military Service, and never to live a private Life; the Emperor supposing that they would be the better Soldiers, when they were also to defend their own Estate." And hence it is unusual for the Nobility to turn to Trade or Merchandize, not because such Professions are really mean and dishonourable^b; but because they would divert them from their Military Way of Life, and force them upon the Dishonour of enjoying Fiefs and Privileges gratis, without any Returns of Service. And therefore wherever the Nobility are allowed, without Disparagement to their Honour, to apply themselves to Trade and Merchandize, it may safely be infer'd, that they had no Military Original. The Egyptians, Scythians, Persians, Lydians, and almost all the old barbarous Nations, according to Herodotus's Account of them^c, look'd upon all Persons, that apply'd themselves to Trades and Handicraft Employment, to be the meanest and lowest Sort of Subjects; and their Children they always thought mean and base. They only were allow'd to be of Quality, that were above all mechanical Employments; and especially, that made War their Business and Profession^d. And at Rome there was a Law prefer'd by Q. Claudius Tribune of the Commons, "That no Senator, or Senator's Father, should have any Ship of greater Burthen than would contain the Quantity of three hundred Amphors." Such a Ship being suppos'd large enough to carry their Corn out of the Field; and all Trade look'd upon to be beneath Persons of that Dignity^e.

XXXI. But notwithstanding, there are and have been some States and Commonwealths, where the Honours allow'd to Birth, have been and are very inconsiderable; every Man being left to raise and support his Nobility by his Merits to the State. "So the Egyptians, we are told, in their Funeral Orations, never used to make mention, as the Greeks did, of the Family of the Party Deceased; because they thought every Man equally noble: But his Education they were always ^a Vid. Arist. Probl. §. 27. q. 5. The Nobility expose their Lives for the Preservation of the State, and their Sovereign's Glory. The Magistrate casts the Prince of Part of the Care in judging the People; on both Sides sublime Functions, and of great Advantage: And Men are scarce capable of performing greater Things. Yet I know not the Reason, why the Sword and the Gown are always quarrelling with each other; and have almost exhausted their whole Stock of Invectives on both Sides." La Bruyeres Manners or Characters of the Age. p. 305. Edit. Bruss. 1697.

^b Conf. Bodinus de Rejub. l. 3. c. 8. p. m. 546. Some indeed fetch the Reason of this from Ecclesiasticus xxxviii. 25, &c. and because, as Cicero saith, Offic. l. 1. c. 42. they make no Profit unless they resolve not to spare for Lies. ^c L. 2. p. 98. Ed. H. Steph.

^d Add. L. 4. t. 63. l. 3. de Commerc. & Mercator. & L. 12. t. 1. l. 6. C. de dignitatibus. Aristot. Polit. l. 3. c. 3. Cic. Offic. l. 1. d. 1. The Gains that all Mercenaries make, who sell their Labour, and not their Art, are base and fordid; and the Wages, they receive is the same Thing as an Earnest of their Slavery.

^e Liv. l. 21. c. 63. and Juvenal calls the Merchant, Vilis facci mercator elentis, Sat. 14. ver. 269. a fordid Wretch that trades for nasty Wares.

^f Juvenal in the following Verfes, admirably well exposes the false Notions of the Roman Nobility, and the ridiculous Pride of the Gentry, that had no personal Merit of their own, but owed every Thing to their Ancestors.

Tota licet veteres exornent undique ceras
Atria, Nobilitas sola est atque unica virtus.
Paulus, vel Cossus, vel Drusus, moribus esto.
Prima mihi debes animi bona. Sanctus haberi
Justitiaque tenax, factis, diis,que mereris?
Agnosco procerem

Tum licet à Pico numeres genus, altaque se te Nomina delectant, omnem Titanida pugnam
Inter Majores, ipsumque Promethea tonas:
De quocumque aces proavum tibi sumito libro.
Quod si præcipitem rapit ambitio, atque libido,
Si frangis virgas sociorum in sanguine, si te Delectant hebetes lasso lixtore secures:
Incipit istorum contra te stare parentum
Nobilitas, claram facem præferre pudendis,

Long Galleries of Ancestors, and all
Those Follies that adorn a Country-Hall,
Challenge no Wonder or Esteem from me:
Virtue alone is true Nobility.
Live therefore well: To Men and Gods appear
Such as good Paulus, Cossus, Drusus, were. — Convince the World that you're devout and true,
Be just in all you say, and all you do,
Whatever be your Birth, you're sure to be A Peer of the first Magnitude to me. —
Then trace your Birth from Pico, if you please;
If he's too modern, and your Pride aspire
To seek the Author of your Being higher,
Choose any Titan, who the Gods withstood,
To be the Founder of your antient Blood,
Prometheus, and that Race before the Flood:
On any other Story you can find;
From Heralds, or in Poets, to your Mind.
But should you prove ambitious, lustful, vain,
Or could you see with Pleasure and Disdain,
Rods broke on our Associates bleeding Backs,
And Headsmen lab'ring till they blunt the Ax;
Your Father's Glory will your Sin proclaim,
And to a clearer Light expose your Shame.

Mr. Stepney.

“ always sure to speak of, and Manner of Life, his Piety and Devotion, his Justice, Continnence, and what other Virtues he was known to have practis'd.” So the Turks never set a higher Value upon themselves, than what may seem due to their own Merit: To the Ottoman Family only they allow Nobility of Blood^b. Neither do the Chinese express any Honour for Antiquity of Descent, the poorest and meanest Person in the Empire is capable by his Learning only of preferring himself to the highest Places of Honour^c: And in their Marriges, neither the Emperor himself, nor any of his Children, make Choice of their Wives with regard to Extraction, but only to the Beauty and Agreeableness of the Woman^d. Such Customs, perhaps, may be contrary to those which are receiv'd in this Part of the World; but notwithstanding the wiser Part of Mankind ever have, and always must allow it to be true, that Nobility ought not to depend only upon the Blood, but should much rather be rais'd and establish'd upon Virtue^e. It was a severe, but a very proper Answer which Antigonus gave to the Son of a brave old Officer, ambitious of Honours he had not deserv'd, 'Tis your own Virtue, and not the Blood you derive from your Father, that must recommend you to me^f. For as Plato saith^g, “ Every Man has had a numerous Race of Ancelors before him, some of which were perhaps rich Men, and some poor; some may have been Princes, and some Slaves; some barbarous, and some civilis'd^h.” And it is not unlikely, as another suspectsⁱ, that the Poets derived their Heroes from the Gods, only to cover some Misfortunes or Defects in Birth or Quality, which might perhaps have been found out, upon a strict Enquiry into their Descent. For 'tis certain, if we were to unravel any Man's Nobility, we should at last come to something mean and little^k: And therefore Lycurgus prov'd by the fam'd Example of the two Dogs, that it is not Nature, but Education that forms Men to Virtue^l. And 'tis easy for a Man of the latest Quality to give them of ancient but corrupt and degenerate Nobility, the same Answer that Iphicrates did to Hermodius, one of the old Race of the Hermodii, when he objected to him the Meanness of his Birth, I am the first of my Family, and you are the last of Yours^m. Nor are there wanting those that argue, that it is unjust to exempt any Man, or to grant him Immunity from any particular Duty and Burden in the Commonwealth, to the Prejudice of other Subjects; or to give him easier Admission to Preferments and Offices, barely upon the Score of Birth, which, 'tis certain, can of itself confer no extraordinary Virtues, and which it is in no Man's Power to procure for himselfⁿ; since others may be as well, perhaps better acquainted with the Arts necessary for the Administration and Management of those Offices, than he is, and particularly if he be a Person given to the Enjoyments of Ease and Pleasure^o. In short, that it may seem to be a very great Misfortune in a Commonwealth, when the Civil Sovereign is so tied up and confin'd to a particular Order of Men, in ^a Diod. Sicul. l. 1. c. 92. Tullus Hostilius in Dicryf. Halicam. l. 3. p. 148. Ed. Lipf. says, I cannot think that human Nobility can consist in any Thing but Virtue.

^b Auger. Busbequimus, Ep. 1. And what he saith of the Fanizaries in the same Place.
^c Martin. Praef. Hist. Sin.
^d Neuhof. in legat. p. 280.
^e Senec. Hercul. Fur. ver. 339, 340. Quigenus jacat inum, aliena laudat. Boetius de Consolat. Philosoph. L. 3. Metr. 6.

*Quid genus & proavos strepitis?
 Si primordia vestra,
 Autoremque Deum spectes,
 Nullus degener axtat;
 Ni vitius pejora fovens,
 Proprium deserat ortum.*

Horace, Sat. 6. l. 1. ver. 7, 8. to Mæcenat.

*Referre neges quali sit qui que parente
 Natus, dum ingenuus.*

Claudian, l. 2. ver. 133. de Laudib. Stilicon.

———— *Lectos ex omnibus oris
 Erebis; & meritum, nunquam cunabula quaris
 Et qualis, non unde fatus.*

Add. Seneca de Beneficiis, l. 3. c. 28. & Epist. 44. and thus Camilejus in Livy, l. 4. c. 3. The Growth of the Roman Empire was owing to this, That no Family was thought mean and contemptible which was eminent for its Virtues. Herodotus l. 5. c. 1 The Gifts of Fortune are frequently bestowed upon such as do not deserve them; but the Virtues of the Mind are every Man's own proper Glory. And Greatness of Birth, Riches, and the like, though we think them happy that enjoy them, yet can add no real Praise to a Man, because they are derived from others.

^f Plutarch. de vitios. Pudore, p. 534. & in Apophth. p. 187. B. & In Theatrico, p. 128. C. Ed. Wech.
^g There is a Passage like this in Dio Chrystome, Orat. 15. de Servitute, p. 23; S. B. It is impossible, that from the Beginning of the World, there should have been any Race of Men, in which there have not been almost innumerable Instances of some of the Progeny that have been Slaves, of others of them that have been Tyrants and Princes, Captives and Criminals, Tradesmen and Mechanicks, and in short, some of all States, Professions, and Conditions, that have been in the World, and that have, in their Turns, gone through all the Business and Employments, all the Fortunes and Calamities of Human Life.
^h Dio. Chrysol. ibid. ⁱ M. Seneca, L. 1. Controv. 6. ^j Plut. Apoph. Lacon. p. 225.
^k Plut. Apoph. Adl. Philo Judæus de Nobilitate. Stobæus, Serm. 84, 85, 86, 87. Tho. Brown de Religione Med. Part. II. c. 1. When I speak of the Vulgar, I do not understand the common People only, and the lowest Dregs of the Rabble. For even among those of the higher Ranks, there is a Sort of vulgar inferior Multitude, you may safely say, made entirely of the same Materials with the meanest of the Populace. For my Part, I make no Scruple of ranking them with the Mechanicks, however their Fortunes may conceal the Defects of their Understanding, and their Riches seem to excuse their want of Sense.
^l Euripides Electra, ver. 551.

Παλλοὶ γὰρ ὄντες ἐδ γενεῆς εἰδὲ κακοί.

The Noble often are Degenerate.

^m Such as those Aristophanes mentions, Ran. Act. 3. §. 1. v. 2. That were good for nothing but to Eat and Drink for those Jurcal speaks of, Sat. XI. ver. 11.

Quibus in solo vivendi causa palato est.

Such whose sole Bliss is Eating, who can give But that one brutal Reason why they live.

Mr. Congreve.

in disposing Places of publick Trust, that he cannot have the Affistance of his other Subjects, though in Business they are well qualified for; and especially, if he has not Power to chuse any Person of Worth into such an Order. For when it becomes necessary for Princes to support and favour the Nobility only, that by their Affistance they may more easily restrain and keep in Awe the rest of their Subjects, 'tis certain that their Power grows feeble, and that the Reins of Government are ready to drop out of their Hands; since they are forced to enter into a kind of Faction with Part of their Subjects, to distrust the Force of an open Authority, and take Refuge in the artful Designs of secret Policy. I shall add only what my Lord Bacon says in his Advancement of Learning *, "That a Kingdom that would be great, mu't not increase its Nobility to too great a Number.

XXXII. It may be proper now, in the last Place to enquire, whether Civil Dignity and Marks of Honour depend upon the sovereign Power as to their Durations also and Continuance, as well as in their Original. And here it must be enquired, whether the Marks of Honour, and the Privileges and Rights annexed to it, are confid'd to any particular Office or Employment in the Commonwealth, which the Sovereign has the Disposal of; or, whether they are settled upon the Subject in the Nature of Property. Upon the first Supposition, it is evident, the Sovereign has the same Power that he has to appoint or to remove his Officers and Magistrates. Fabius the Consul very well express'd, not only the Greatness of his Spirit, but the Submission also he thought himself oblig'd to pay to the Power of the Commonwealth, by that Calmness of Temper which he shew'd, when the Master of the Horse was made equal with him, while he continued Dictator †. Solon us'd to say, "That Courtiers and the Favorites of Princes

"were like Counters used in casting up Sums; "for as Counters sometimes signify a greater "Number, and sometimes a lesser, so these Crea- "tures are absolutely at the Mercy of their "Princes, whose Pleasure makes them great and "noble, or mean and despicable." But upon the second Supposition, when the Subject enjoys his Dignity and the Marks and Badges of Honour in the Nature of Property, the Government cannot in Justice take them from him, unless by way of Punishment. And in this Case, as Aristotle in Ælian saith ‡, "There is a wide Difference between not obtaining Honour, and between being turn'd out of it after a Man has obtain'd it: For it is no great Pain to a Man not to gain what he pursues; but to be dispossessed of what he has gained must be a sensible Affliction. But notwithstanding, the Immunities and Privileges annex'd to Honour may either be laid under Suspension, or be entirely taken away upon some pressing Emergency in the Commonwealth; Allowance being made for them, as it best may, in some other Method. For since the Extremities and Necessities of the State must always be supposed to be Exceptions to all such Privileges; it would be the most extravagant Absurdity imaginable, to make them sacred and inviolable beyond the necessary Defence and Preservation of the Commonwealth. From what hath been said, it may also be discovered, how far any Commonwealth may with Justice enact, that Children of Traytors shall be excluded from all Honours in the Commonwealth? So it was decreed by the State of Athens in the Case of Antipho, as appears in his Life §: And at Rome, Sylla made a Law, that the Children of all Persons proscribed should not appear Candidates for any Honour. And the Answer to it in short is, that the State may justly enough deny them all publick Dignities and Employments, but cannot rightly deprive them of simple Esteem.

* L. S. c. 3. n. 3. Vid. Ellis, c. 14. by the same Author.

† Var. Hist. l. 12. c. 1.

‡ Vid. Liv. l. 22. c. 15. 26.

§ Vid. Polyb. l. 5. c. 26.

¶ Vid. Plutarch. in Ejus Vit. in Orat. 10. c. 1.

C H A P. V.

Of the Power of the Sovereign, both over the Publick Patrimony, and the Estates of Private Subjects.

The CONTENTS of every Paragraph of the Fifth Chapter.

- | | |
|---|---|
| I. What Power the Prince hath over the Goods of the Commonwealth, where the Kingdom is his Patrimony. II. The Subjects do not every where owe the Propriety of their Estates to the Commonwealth. III. The Sovereign may make Laws to direct the Subjects in the Use of their Goods and Estates. IV. And also impose Taxes upon them. V. What is to be observ'd in the Imposition of Customs. | VI. And other Taxes. VII. Of the Sovereign or Transcendental Propriety. VIII. What Power the Prince hath over the Goods that belong to the Commonwealth, as such. IX. Of the Alienation of the Kingdom, or any part of it. X. A Prince cannot make his Kingdom a Fief, or mortgage it, without Consent of his People. XI. Nor alienate any Thing incorporated in the Crown. |
|---|---|

TO understand distinctly what Power the Sovereign has over the Estate and Fortunes of the Subject, it will be necessary to observe, that this Power is derived either from the Nature of Sovereignty in itself; or else from the particular Manner of the Acquisition of it. For it is manifest, that there is a great Difference between a Prince¹, that has rais'd his own Kingdom, collected, as it were, his own Subjects, and who was at first the universal, absolute Proprietor of every Thing in the Commonwealth; and another freely call'd to Government, and invest'd with Sovereign Power, by Persons already in Possession of their distinct Proprieties. The first, it is clear, hath not only all that Power over the Bona Reipub. the Goods contain'd in the Commonwealth, which flows from the Nature of sovereign Power itself, but also the same which every Master of a Family has to his Estate, except he is pleas'd voluntarily to remit any Part of his Right. If such a Prince therefore keeps his Propriety entire, the Subjects can have no better Right to what they possess, than the Roman Slaves had to what they got by their own labour, that is, a precarious Possession, revocable at Pleasure, whenever the Prince thinks fit. But however, as long as the Subjects are in Possession of such Goods or Estates, they may justly supply themselves with Sustainance and other Necessaries from them, by way of Wages, for the Trouble of improving and preserving them. And therefore what Hobbes ² falsly applies to all manner of Subjects holds true only with regard to these, viz. "That the Propriety, which a Subject hath to his Goods, consists in a Right to exclude all other Subjects the Use of them, but not to exclude the Sovereign; as in a Family, the Father grants some of his Sons a Propriety to certain Goods, distinct from the Proprieties of other Sons of the same Family, but not from that of the Father himself; fo

" that every Son in the Family enjoys a Propriety barely to so much, and for so long as the Father pleaseth." But if the Prince I am speaking of recedes from any Part of his Right, the Subjects will have just as much Right to their Goods, as the Concessions of their Prince make over to them. And this, by different Princes hath been done different Ways. Pharaoh was to have the fifth Part of the Increase of all the Land of Egypt to himself; the other four were to continue to Husbandmen; only the Lands that belong'd to the Priests were not sold, and they had a third part of the Land by the Donation of *Isis*³. Strabo says, that in India the Land was the Prince's, and Husbandmen were hired to cultivate it for the fourth Part of the Produce⁴. And this is the Custom now in the Dominions of the Great Mogul; where the Emperour is also Heir to all his Ministers and Servants, and to all Merchants. In the Kingdom of *Congo*⁵ no Subject has any Property which he can transmit to his Heirs, but all falls to the Prince; and he administers and disposes the Goods to what Uses he thinks fit. In such Countries therefore, all the Right private Subjects have to their Goods and Estates, depends originally upon the Favour of the Prince, who hath an absolute Power to dispose of all they have, so far as the Compacts and irrevocable Grants he hath made will permit. But after all, it is usually observ'd by Travellers of those Countries, and particularly of the Empire of the Great Mogul⁶, that that absolute Propriety of the Prince, has been the Reason why that and other Kingdoms of the East, otherwise very happy in the Advantages Nature has given them, should lie wild, desolate, and barbarous, and either be always poor and decaying, or at least never arrive at the Splendor and Greatness of the European Nations, where the Princes are generally more tender of invading the Properties of

¹ De Civ. c. 6. §. 15, &c. 12. §. 7.² Gen. xlvii. ver. 23, 24, 26. Vid. Diod. Sicul. l. 1. c. 21. 72. Et Grot. Com. in Gen. xlvii. 26.³ Strabo, l. 15. p. 484. Ed. Genev. Casaub. Diod. Sicul. l. 2. c. 40. Vid. Garcilass de la Vega, Com. Roy. l. 5. c. 5.⁴ Bernier de Nupé:is Motibus in Imp. Magn. Mog.

Mr. BARB. NOTE on § I.

¹ See above, in B. 7. c. 6. §. 16.² Vid. Edvard Lopez.

Ppppp

of their Subjects, and where Subjects have the Liberty to defend their own, even against their Princes⁶.

II. But there are, on the other hand, Commonwealths, where the original Right the Subjects have to their Properties does no way depend upon the Favour or Indulgence of the civil Government. And this seems to have happen'd these two Ways; either first, when a People under the Conduct of a Prince they set over themselves remove in Search of new Seats: Or, Secondly, when a Number of Masters of Families, already possess'd of their several Properties, freely erect themselves into a Commonwealth, or voluntarily join themselves to some Commonwealth already established, and submit themselves and their Fortunes to civil Government. In the former Case, the Method usually observ'd is this: The whole Body of the People, under the Conduct of their Leader, possess themselves of some new Country, which perhaps in its large Extent is bounded by Limits which Nature her self, or the arbitrary Constitutions of the World, have given it; but which is afterwards canton'd into Parts, and distributed to particular Persons, either by Lot, or at the Discretion of the Commander, or possibly (tho' very seldom) by every Man's own *Choice*⁷. Now in this Case, tho' every particular Man's Property seems rather to be grounded upon the Leader's Appointment, than his own Seizure; yet it does not follow, that therefore all he has is owing purely to the Favour of his Commander. For every Man that voluntarily went in the Expedition, has certainly an absolute Right to share in the Acquisitions of it, and to be consider'd in the Division of the Land⁸. But much less do the Properties of the private Subject own any original Dependency upon the Favour and Indulgence of the civil Sovereign, where (as was supposed in the second Case) a Number of Masters of Families, possess'd of their Liberties and distinct Properties, freely submit to civil Government. For I take it to be clear, notwithstanding all that Hobbes has said to the contrary⁹, that Persons that live without civil Government, in a Liberty of Nature, may nevertheless enjoy their several *Properties*¹⁰. For admitting that Nature gave every Man a Right to every Thing, yet this is no Argument why every Man might not, by Intervention of Compact, have his separate Property divided to him. And tho' a Compact of two or more about Things left in a Community of Nature, does not in the least prejudice other Men, but leaves them to their full primitive Right; yet if all Men consent by common Compact, either express or tacit, to make a Division of Things, without Dispute this must introduce a true and real Propriety. And therefore *Hobbes's*³ Assertion is false, "That every Father of a Family, that is under no Subjection either to another Father, or to any common Master, has a common Right to every Thing⁴." Tho' it must indeed be allowed, that they that live under civil Government have their Properties better secured and defended, than they that live in a Liberty of Nature; for these must support themselves by their own single Force alone, while the others can call the whole Strength of the Commonwealth to assist them, either against the Encroachments of Foreigners, or the Injuries of their Fellow-Subjects⁵.

III. In Commonwealths therefore, where the Properties of the Subjects do not originally depend upon the Government, the civil Sovereign hath no further Power over them than what immediately flows from the Nature of the Supream Power in it self, unless the Subjects freely consent to enlarge it. "Every Thing, says *Seneca*¹, by a civil Right may be said to belong to the Prince, while yet the particular Parts of that wide Possession are divided among different Proprietors, and every Thing belongs to a distinct Owner. And therefore, when we present our Prince with our Houses, our Slaves, or our Money, we do not think we give him back his own. The Prince hath indeed a Power over all we have, but the Propriety is in the private Subject. 'Tis common to say, that such and such Territories belong to the Athenians or Campanians; but the People of those Countries distinguish and divide them further between one another by private Boundaries; the whole Extent of a Country may be under such or such a Commonwealth, but there are distinct Proprietors, who have their separate Portions of it. And therefore we may give away our Estates to the Publick, tho' in some Sense they may be said to have belong'd to it before; because the Title we have to them is of a very different Nature from that which the Publick can be said to have. For the Prince possesseth all by his Sovereign Command and Authority, the private Subjects by their *Propriety*²." And therefore the Emperour Adrian, when the People petition'd him to give a Slave Liberty that had pleas'd them in the Chariot-Race, reprimanded them for it, and told them, That it neither became him to free another Man's Servant, nor them to offer such an Injury to his *Master*³. And the Emperour Claudius made an Edict, to suppress a common Practice of begging

⁶ Garcilass. de la Vega, Com. Roy. l. 5. c. 2. relates, That it was the Command of the Inca's, that none of their Subjects should be obliged to plow the Emperor's Lands, before they had taken care of their own; because it was not likely any Man would be so diligent as he ought in his Prince's Business, that had not before well settled his own. The Poor, the same Historian says, were always look'd upon to be an useful Multitude among them, both in War and Peace.

⁷ See Cornel. Nepos in Mitridates, c. 2.

⁸ Vid. Genes. xiv. 14, 21, 22, 23, 24. VII. Supr. l. 4. c. 6. §. 3, 4.

⁹ Vid. Genes. iv. 4. xiii. 5. &c.

¹⁰ Vid. Genes. xxxiv. 30. Vid. Xenoph. Memorab. l. 2. p. 433. Ed. H. Steph. where Socrates saith, A Man is happier that lives secure in Society with a moderate Fortune, than he that leads a lonely melancholy Life, full of Fears and Dangers in the Enjoyment of the Riches of a whole Commonwealth. And in this sense we may admit of what Cicero saith, Orat. pro Ciccina, c. 25. That if we take away Civil Right and Government, there will be no Distinction left between one Man's Property and another's; and in his 2d Book of Offices, c. 21. more clearly. The chief Reason why Commonwealths were instituted, was, that every Man might enjoy what was his own: For tho' Men were by Nature directed to Society, yet they found it necessary to erect Cities for the Security of their Properties.

¹ Senec. de Beneficiis, l. 7. c. 4, 5.

² Vid. Grac. Com. in 1 leg. XVI. 24.

³ Zonaras, Tom. 2.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § II

¹ Ubi Supra.

² See above, in B. 3. c. 4. §. 2, 3.

³ De Cito, c. 6. §. 15.

begging other Mens Estates of the Emperor; it being an Opinion current at that Time, that it was in his Power to give them away; and he restor'd an Estate he had obtain'd that way himself, when he was a private Subject^a. But now this Power we are here speaking of, may, I think, be properly enough reduc'd to three Heads: First, to the Right of making Laws to direct such a Proportion in the Use and Consumption of certain Goods and Commodities, as the State of the Commonwealth requires. Secondly, to the Right of levying Taxes. Thirdly, to the Exercise of the Transcendental Propriety^b. To the first Head we may reduce all *Sumptuary Laws*¹, or such as prescribe Bounds to extravagant unnecessary Expences, which would in Course of Time be the ruin of private Families, and in consequence weaken the Commonwealth it self, by carrying the publick Money abroad into foreign Countries; whither the Humour or Vanity of Luxury and Waste generally runs^c. Besides, another Inconvenience to be prevented by such Laws is this, That they that squander away their Fortunes extravagantly, make themselves incapable of serving the Publick. For a Man, for Instance, that spends but two Parts in five of what he hath yearly

And therefore it was a Mistake in the Emperor Frederick to think that

*Quicquid habet locuples, quicquid custodit avarus,
Jure quidem nostrum, populo concedimus usum.
Rege figuratam Regis patet esse monetam;
Cæsaris & domino sub Cæsare fulget imago.*

All that the Rich and Covetous receive,
Is mine by Right, to them the Use I give;
The Royal Stamp, who claims the Coin, declares,
And Cæsar's Money, Cæsar's Image bears.

Gunth. Ligurinus, l. 3. ver. 480, &c.

It may be observ'd, that in these two last Verses, there is an Allusion to what our Saviour said to the Disciples of the Pharisees and Herodians, after he had ask'd 'em whose Image and Inscription the Piece of Money they brought him as Tribute bore: They answer'd Cæsar's; upon which he replied, Render unto Cæsar the Things which are Cæsar's, and unto God the Things that are God's. Matt. xxii. ver. 19, &c. But this does not prove, that by Right all the Subject's Goods belong to their Sovereign, as several of the Reform'd in France, have improperly maintain'd, who were in an Error, with regard to the Rights and Authority of the Prince. (Nouvel. de la Republ. des Lettres, Avril 1703. p. 415.) Our Saviour only means, that since the Jews made use of the Emperor's Coin, it was a Sign of his being Master of their Country, and of their tacit acknowledging him for their lawful Sovereign; so that they ought to obey him in every Thing that was not contrary to the divine Laws. See the Interpreters on this Passage.

^d Dominium Eminens.

^e V. Plin. Nat. Hist. l. 6. c. 22. The Arabians are certainly the richest People in the World, for they are the Merchants that exhaust the Wealth of the Roman and Parthian Empires: They are continually importing among us the Produce of their Seas or Woods, and never buy any Thing of us in return. N. H. l. 6. c. 23. Every Year constantly the Indies drain us of little less than 500000 Sesterces, besides that the Commodities we have from thence sell here for an hundred Times double the Advantage they do there. Vid. l. 12. c. 18. N. H.

Mr. BARB. NOTES ON §. III.

¹ "The other almost incurable Evil in a State (says the Sage Mentor to his Pupil Telemachus) is Luxury. As too great Authority poisons Kings, so does Luxury a whole Nation. 'Tis pretended that Luxury serves to maintain the Poor at the Expence of the Rich, as if the Poor could not get their Livelihood, by increasing the Fruits of the Earth, without effeminating the Rich by the Necessities of Voluptuousness. When once a Nation is accusom'd to look upon Superfluities to be Necessaries of Life, they will every Day be inventing new ones. They can no longer dispense with the want of Things, which were utterly unknown thirty Years ago. This Luxury is call'd a nice Taste, and the Perfection of Arts; this Politeness of a Nation, this Vice that draws so many after it, is commended as a Virtue, and spreads its Infection to the very Dregs of the People. The King's Relations imitate his Magnificence and Grandeur, the Nobility that of his Relations, and the Gentry or middle Sort of People equal the Nobility; for who is he that does himself Justice? The common People will pass for Gentry, every Body lives beyond what he has; some out of Pride and Ostentation to shew their Riches, and others out of an ill Shame, and to conceal their Poverty. Those even who are so wise as to condemn this great Disorder, are not wise enough to dare being the first in setting a contrary Example. Thus a whole Nation is ruin'd; and all Orders and Distinctions confounded. The Desire of getting Riches to support a vain and extravagant Way of living, corrupts the purest Minds. Their only Business is to be rich; to accomplish which, they borrow, they cheat, and use a thousand other mean and unworthy Artifices. Avantures de Telemachus, Tom. 5. p. 120, 121. History informs us (to borrow Mr. Le Clerc's Words, in the Parrhasiana, Tom. II. p. 275, &c.) that Julius Cæsar had never attempted to destroy the Liberties of his Country, had he been able to have pay'd the Debts which he had contracted by his excessive Prodigality; or had known how to have supported his expensive Way of living. (See Suetonius Cap. 30.) Abundance of People sided either with him, or Pompey, only because they wanted to supply their Luxury, and were in hopes of getting by the Civil Wars, enough to support and maintain their former Pride and Greatness. (See Sallust. ad Cæsarem, de Republ. Ordinanda, and the other Authors of that time.) One may say the same Thing of all sorts of Crimes, which every Hour, as it were, knock at the Door of indigent and proud Persons, and which seldom are deny'd Entrance, when they come attended with a large Sum of Money. To prevent these Evils and Disorders, there is nothing so useful as good Sumptuary Laws, that restrain Luxury, and a rigorous putting them in Execution. By which — you deprive Money, which is the most pernicious Thing in the World, of its Use and Use — Id ita eveniet, si pecunia, quæ maxima omnium pernicies est, usum atque decus amiserit. (Sallust. Orat. 1. de Republ. Ordin.) By that also we procure still another Advantage to the State, which is of no small Consequence, and that is, that People marry on much easier Terms, when a moderate Expence is sufficient for the Maintenance of a Family, than when they cannot handsomely avoid a greater; which, however, there are abundance of honest People, that are not able to be at. Augustus also, being desirous to reform the Manners of the Romans, among other Laws that he either made or renew'd, establish'd at the same Time both the Sumptuary Law, and that de maritandis ordinibus, which oblig'd the Romans to marry. (See Sueton Cap. 34.) If he could not oblige the Romans to observe the second, it is very likely, it was because the first was not severe enough (see Tacit. Ann. Lib. 2. Cap. 37.) We must observe farther, that abundance of People who decline Marriage upon the foresaid Reason, make no Scruple to commit all manner of Debauchery, which tends to the utter Ruin both of private Families, and the Commonwealth too, and which ought to be prevented by Sumptuary Laws. See what Mr. Le Clerc adds concerning the Republicks of Venice and Geneva. To make these Sumptuary Laws more effectual, Princes and Magistrates themselves, should, as the Author of Telemachus observes. "By the Example of their own Moderation, put those out of Countenance that love Extravagance, and encourage the Prudent, who would easily submit to follow the Pattern of an honest Frugality." To this we may add, the fine Passage of Montaigne's, on the same Subject. "The Manner, says he, in which our Laws endeavour to regulate the vain and foolish Extravagance in our Clothes and Eating, seems to be contrary to the Intention of it. The true Way would be, to raise in Mankind a Contempt of Gold and Silks, as Things vain and useless; but we enhance their Honour and Value which is a ridiculous Method of putting People out of Conceit with 'em. For suppose, that none but Princes were allowed to eat Turbot, and to wear Velvet, and gold Lace; and the People prohibited the use of 'em; what would it be but to bring those Things into Credit, and make every Body desirous of having them? Let Princes boldly part with these Marks of Grandeur, they have enough of others; such Excesses are more excusable in another Person than a Prince — 'Tis strange how easily and suddenly Custom assumes an Authority in these indifferent Matters: They had scarce worn black Cloth a Year at Court for Mourning for Henry II. but Silks were already grown so very contemptible in every Body's Opinion, that whoever appear'd dress'd in 'em, was immediately taken for some Citizen or Tradesman. At last none but Physicians and Surgeons wore 'em; and tho' every Body went dress'd pretty near alike, yet there were besides apparent Distinctions enough of Mens Qualifications. — Let Kings begin to leave off these Expences, and it will be done in a Month, without either Edict or Ordinance; we shall all follow after. The Law should express the contrary, That all except Whores and Watermen, were prohibited to wear Scarlet, and Gold and Silver. By such an Invention Zaleucus reform'd the corrupted Manners of the Locrians, Essay, L. I. Chap. XLIII.

yearly coming in, and pays two more in Taxes to the State, feels no Inconvenience by it, and lays up to increase his Stock one fifth Part more; whereas one that spends every Year all he receives, if he pays never so little to the Publick, must either lessen his Estate, or retrench his Expences. Of this Sort were those sumptuary Laws in the Roman Commonwealth, which P. Manutius recounts out of Macrobius ^a. And that Law of Plato's ^b, "by which he would not have a Marriage Invitation bring together more than ten Persons, and those Relations; nor that Persons of the best Quality should spend above a Mina, or ten Crowns, on such Occasions." To this Head also may be reduced Laws against Gaming ^c, and Prodigality; of which Nature was Periander's Law at Corinth, by which no Man was allowed to spend more than he had coming in ^d. A Law which deserves to be particularly enforced upon Persons concern'd in the publick Affairs and Places; since it is very well observ'd ^e, That 'tis impossible any Man should govern well in the Commonwealth, that is negligent in his own Concerns, or forbear mispending the publick Treasure, that hath used to live above his private Fortune; for a Man that hath managed his own ill, must be suspected when he undertakes for others ^f. And further, under this Head we may rank all Laws that determine the Rates and Quality of Possessions and Estates: Such was the Licinian at Rome, That no Man should have a Possession of more than five hundred Acres of Land, nor above one hundred Head of large Cattle, or five hundred of the Less ^g. As also the Law, which Aristotle says was generally observ'd in popular Governments, That no Man should sell his first Inheritance. And Oxylus's Law, That Money should not be lent upon Mortgage of Land ^h. As also that Decree of the Roman Senate ⁱ, that all Candidates for Offices in the Commonwealth should be obliged to turn a third Part of their Estates into Lands in Italy. And we may further reduce under this Head all Laws that determine the Quantity and Measures of Grants and Legacies, that lay Restraints upon the Power of making Wills, or that put a Stop to Excess in dedicating Things to pious Uses ^j. As also Laws that forbid certain Subjects to possess certain kinds of Goods; as in India no private Subject is allow'd to keep an Horse and an Elephant, the Prince only enjoying that Privilege ^k. Moreover, Laws against idle and lazy People; such as was that among the Nabathæi, by which every Man was publicly punished that wasted his Estate ^l. And those against Persons that suffered their Estates to run to ruin purely by Carelessness and Neglect ^m. And that made by Amasis King of Egypt, by which every Subject in his Kingdom was obliged every Year to make it appear to the Governor of the Province he liv'd in, what Trade or Profession he was of, making it Death for any Man to refuse to obey ⁿ. To this Head also belong those Laws, by which Subjects are forbid the Acquisition of certain Goods, and to increase their Estates certain particular Ways: So Pliny says, there was a Decree of the Roman Senate, to forbid the digging after any kind of Ore or Metal in Italy, tho' it was very well known that no Country had greater Abundance or Variety ^o. To this Head belongs also the famous Venetian Law, by which no Subject of that State can, either by Will or Sale, or any other Way, upon any Account, leave, sell, or alienate the Perpetuity of any immovable Goods to the Church, or Persons Ecclesiastical, without Leave from the Senate ^p. And lastly, the Laws that forbid the Exportation of Money, and command that all Trade with Foreigners shall be managed by Barter only, and Exchange of Commodities.

IV. But

^a Manut. de L. L. Roman. Macrobi. Saturnal. l. 3.^b Plato de L. L. l. 6. § 70. D. E. Ed. Francof.^c Vid. Ælium. Var. Hist. l. 3. c. 34. Garcilás de la Vega, Com. Roy. l. 5. c. 11.^d Vid. L. 11. t. 5. D. & C. L. 3. t. 33. de Aleatoribus. Gratian. c. 7, 8, 9. Distinct. 86.^e Heraclides de Politicis. ^f Polyb. l. 10. Excerpt. Peiresc.^g Lucian in Antholog. T. 2. p. 834. Ed. Amst.^h Vid. P. Manutium de L. L. Rom. Numb. xxxvi. 7, 9. Aristot. Polit. l. 2. c. 5, 7. l. 6. c. 4, 5.ⁱ Vid. L. L. Burgund. tit. 84. §. 1.^j Plin. l. 6. Epist. 19.^k Exod. xxxvi. 6.^l Strabo, l. 15. p. 484. Ed. Gen.^m Strabo, l. 16. p. 539.ⁿ Vid. Gellium, l. 4. c. 12.^o Herodot. Euterpe,^p Plin. Nat. Hist. l. 3. c. 20.^q Maurocenus, Hist. Ven. l. 17.

MR. BARB. NOTE ON §. III.

" Idleness, or Want of honest and useful Employment, is the Source of an infinite Number of Disorders: The Spirit of Mankind being of so busy and active a Nature as it is, cannot remain in a State free from Action; and if it is not employ'd in something that is good, it inevitably applies itself to what is ill: For tho' there are some Things of an indifferent Nature, they become ill when they wholly engross the Mind to themselves: If it is true, however, that there are idle Persons in the World, that busy themselves more about indifferent Things than ill ones. — One cannot commend those who spend their whole Time in Things neither useful to Man, nor pleasing to God; if it is true, as there is no doubt of it, that Men were born to do Good. But — we see by Experience, that those who apply themselves to no honest Calling, generally run into Debauchery, or Gaming. — It were then to be wish'd, that there were Laws against Idleness, to prevent its ill Consequences, and that no Person were suffer'd to live without having some honest Business to follow, either of the Mind or Body. — Those that aim at Employments, either Political, Ecclesiastical, or Military, ought not to be suffer'd to spend in Idleness their youthful Time, which is most proper for the Study of Morality, Politicks, Religion, and the Art of Reasoning, and, if they please, Mathematicks, and History. There are still other Persons that betake themselves to nothing but only eating and drinking quietly the Estates that their Relations left 'em, and care not for learning any Thing, being well enough satisfied with themselves, if they do not consume their main Stock. All the Virtue of those Men consists in regulating their Expences, so as not to live beyond their Income. But if their Estates are considerable, it infallibly happens that they make an ill Use of 'em, and plunge themselves into a thousand Debaucheries, which make 'em grow useless both to others and themselves. — We must compel 'em to follow the Advice which Ovid, who had but too well known the ill Effects of Idleness, gives in his Remedia Amoris, ver. 135.

*Ergo ubi visus eris nostra medicabilis arti,
Fac morus fugias aia prima meus.
Hæc ut ames faciumt, hæc ut scire tventur,
Hæc sunt jucundi causa eibusque mali,
Otia si tollas, periere Cupidis arcus
Contemptusque jacent, & sine luce faces.*

When you seem fit my healing Art to try,
From Idleness at first be sure you fly:
'Tis that, that in your Bosom rais'd the Flame,
And with fresh Fuel still supplies the same.
Be still employ'd, and Cupid's Darts and Bow,
Together with his Torch, will useless grow.

Parthianæ, Tom. II. p. 279, &c. See the Law of the Egyptians mention'd above, Book III. Chap. 3. § 2. & Herodot. in Euterpe.

IV. But Secondly, a farther Right which belongs to the Sovereign is, that he can take away Part of the Goods of the Subject by way of Tax. For Taxes moderately imposed, and faithfully laid out in the Service of the Publick, are only the Wages which every Man pays the Commonwealth for the Defence and Security of himself and Fortunes; and to maintain the Expences unavoidably necessary to that End. And therefore when Nero propos'd to give Orders to lay aside all sorts of Taxes, supposing that that would certainly be the noblest Grant he could ever possibly make to the World, the Senate put a Stop to his Heat, by shewing him that the Empire must be dissolv'd and ruin'd, if he cut off the Revenues from it that supported it. Which if a Man will be at the Trouble fairly to consider, he will be forced to confess, that the Complaints of the People (who are apt to think the Burthen of the Taxes the great Occasion and Cause of all their Miseries) are generally very unjust, as well as very impudent. But their Complaints are most groundless and intolerable, that wear whole Estates upon their Backs (as Plautus says) and yet when they are to be tax'd, pretend they are not able to pay, though at the same Time they find enough to allow their Vanity, which lays a much more unreasonable Tax upon them, than the State. Archidamus in his Peloponnesian War, when his Allies desired him to settle some stated Proportion for their Contributions, told them, that War could not be carried on by fix'd Allowances, for that there is no determining before hand, what Supplies of Money will be necessary. It being impossible for them that engage in a War to know what will be the certain Event of it. For it very seldom happens, that as Cato said, a War will maintain itself. And indeed in general, the publick Expences cannot be confin'd within any particular Bounds, because of that Variety of Casualties and Accidents which happen, and which do not depend upon ourselves, but our Neighbours, which will always demand Supplies of Money to be defeated or avoided.

V. However, a wise Prince will so far comply with the querulous Humour of his People, as to take care that his Taxes be collected with as little Disturbance, and as much Gentleness as possible. Now the Generality of People think it harder to be obliged to part with what they look upon to be their Property, than to be denied the Appropriation of some few particular Things. 'Tis generally true, that Men have hardly any Sense of publick Calamities (as Hannibal told the Carthaginians) but when they affect them in their private Fortunes; and there is no Loss they feel so much, as that which touches any Part of their own Estates. And therefore some have thought it the best Way to provide for that Inconvenience once for all, and set aside a Portion of their Estate, purely for the Use and Service of the Publick. Some again are of Opinion, that the Generality of the People are burthen'd less by Taxes rais'd by Custom or Excise, than when levy'd in a Way of Subsidy and Tribute. In laying Impositions or Customs upon foreign Commodities imported, it should be consider'd, whether the Commodities are for necessary Use, or only for Luxury. If they are of the latter Kind, the Custom may very justly be laid heavier, to prevent and suppress Extravagance and Riot; and because the Rich, or they that enjoy large Privileges otherwise, and contribute little to the Publick, are generally the only Buyers. It should also be consider'd farther, whether the same Commodities might not be produc'd at home, or wrought to the same Perfection, by the Industry and Application of our own People. And if it appears they may, the Imposts ought to be rais'd higher upon them, especially upon Commodities that serve only to supply Luxury and Vanity, and make us pay Tribute to other Nations, not for our Land, indeed, or Possessions, but what is much worse, for our Folly. As to the Exportation of Commodities

* Tacit. Ann. 13. c. 50. Vid. Hist. 4. Tac. c. 74. where Cerealis tells the Treveri, All the Harm we have done you by our Right of Conquest, hath been only to defend and secure your Peace; for it is impossible to support Peace in the World without War, to maintain a War without Money, or to have Money without a Supply from Taxes. Isaus, Orat. 6. He thought that he ought to be very thrifty in his own Expences, and reserve all that was left for the Use of the Publick, that there might be enough to defray the Charges of the State. Themistocles, Orat. 14. The Laws forbid every Man that is return'd into the Exchequer, to take any Place of publick Trust, before he hath discharged that Debt.

^b Vid. Hobbes de Cive, c. 12. §. 9.

^c Procop. de Bello Persic. l. 2. c. 26.

^d Plut. Apophth. p. 219. & in Crassus.
 It will not be impertinent to the Discourse, or difficult to apply to any Preparations for War, what is mention'd by Nicetas Choniates, l. 1. "The Emperor Manuel Comnenus was over-persuaded by his Treasurer Johannes Puzenus to apply the Money that was usually rais'd to maintain a Navy, to his own Use, and bring it into the Exchequer. The Reasons he gave to induce him to it were, That the State had not always occasion for a Fleet; and that the Charges to keep it were constant, and ran generally very high; and that therefore it would be a better Way to call the Money into the Exchequer; and whenever the Posture of Affairs made a Fleet necessary, the Emperor's Chests would be full enough to defray the Expences of it. The Proposition took, and Puzenus was applauded for an extraordinary Man, and look'd to have more than common Sagacity and Skill in the Management of publick Affairs. But in Reality the greatest Enemy to the Commonwealth could not have given more pernicious Advice. For he deceived the Emperor two Ways; on the one hand, by misrepresenting the Greatness of the Expence; and on the other, by falsely stating the Easiness of the Charge it might be reduc'd to. And upon this Counsel, rashly given, and obstinately adhered to, the Provinces that lay upon the Sea were continually afterwards infested with Piracies. And therefore the Historian infers, that the Calamities that followed might as justly be charged upon the Author of that Advice, as a Fire is as much upon the Person that does not put it out when he can, as him that at first kindled it." Vid. Niceth. Gregoras, l. 6. who gives an Account of some Instances, in the publick Affairs like this, in the Time of Andronicus Paleologus.

^e Vid. Liv. l. 5. c. 22. l. 30. c. 44. Plut. Camillus. Where the People took it very ill, that they were forced to give back a Tenth Part of the Booty that had been shared among them. Homer, Iliad. l. 1. ver. 125, 126.

Ἄλλὰ τὰ μὲν πολλὰ εἰσπράττα, μὲν τὰ διδάσται ἄνευ δ' ἐν ἐπέροις πολλὰ λυγρὰ τὰυτ' ἐπαείρου.

We have shar'd the Spoils of the victorious Field,
 And none will to a new Division yield.

Claudian de Laudib. Stilicon. l. 1. ver. 379, 380.

— Graviolem amissis dolorem Quam necdum quæsitâ, morant,

The Loss of our Enjoyments grieves us more Than not to have enjoy'd. —

Vid. l. 24. t. 1. l. 5. D. de Donat. inter Virum & Uxor.

^f Vid. Diocet. Sicul. l. 1. c. 72. Paulum Warnefridum de Gest. Longobardorum, l. 3. c. 16.

^g De Chrysof. Orat. 79. p. 664. D. Ed. Morell

MR. BARB. NOTE ON §. IV.

¹ In Epidiculis, Act. 2. Scen. 2. ver. 42, &c.

modities of our own Growth, it should be consider'd whether it be the Interest of the Commonwealth, that they should not be exported; or whether it be necessary to send them to foreign Markets, that the Subjects may have a Way to continue Trade, or increase their Wealth. The first naturally raises the Customs upon the Commodities, the second lowers them. But besides, it may be further consider'd, whether our Commodities are absolutely necessary in other Countries, and whether they are to be had from any other Place. For all know the Industry and Diligence of the Merchant, and what Difficulties and Dangers he will venture himself in, upon the Hopes of Advantage; and that if the Impositions upon their Commodities be too high in one Place, the Market will soon be carried to another; or else that they that buy, will content themselves to be without the Commodities; as Gallianus once said, What can't we live without this Egyptian Linen, and can't the Commonwealth be safe without these Robes of Honour? And in my Opinion, Hesiod's Rule may be very well apply'd to Customs, *ἡμῶν ἴπυρο πρῶτον*¹, The Hulf is more than the H hole. For a good Harbour is worth but very little, when it hath lost its Trade. And such a Constitution too as Nero made, might possibly deserve Consideration, *That Vessels of Trade should not be taken into the Valuation of Estates, and that the Merchants should not be obliged to pay Taxes for them*². The Government should also provide against the Frauds, which Collectors of Customs usually have, to promote their own private Gains, and take care to hinder their Importunity and Impertinence, and the Trouble they give Subjects and Traders, which are born with more Impatience and Regret, than the Customs themselves. Thus Dio Cassius B. 42. saith, *That Cæsar deliver'd Asia from the Exactions and Oppressions of the Publicans, and reduced all their Customs into a Form of Tribute*³. So Tacitus⁴ commends an Edit of Nero's, by which he commanded, that the Laws relating to the Taxes, that had been out of use till then, should be entirely laid aside; and that no Suit for any Tax that had been dropp'd, should be reviv'd after the Year was expired; and that the Magistrate should have a Power extraordinarily to pass Judgment against the Publicans. Neither indeed should the Exchequer itself be always allowed too much Favour, because that seldom loseth a Cause, but under a good Prince, and because there are never wanting those that have Impudence enough to assist all its Pretensions⁵.

VI. But in levying Taxes, and indeed any sort of Imposition upon the Subjects, particular Care should be taken not to give any just Occasion of Complaint, which will be unavoidable where the Taxes are laid unequally. For as Hobbes very well observes, *A Burthen which the whole Body of Subjects may possibly think easy and gentle, will if any considerable Number releas'd or excuse themselves, lie heavy and insupportable upon the rest*⁶. For generally, it is not the Tax itself, so much as the Disproportion and Inequality of it, that sits uneasily upon the People, either from the Discontent that followeth upon the Injury, or from Envy that others should be excus'd. And indeed, since all that the Subjects pay the Commonwealth, in Reality, is nothing else but the Price of Peace, 'tis but reasonable, that such as have an equal Share in the Peace, should pay equally for it, by assisting the Commonwealth, either with their Money or their Persons: so that all Immunities and Privileges granted in Commonwealths to particular Men, or Orders of Men, are no further reasonable, than as they who enjoy them balance them, by the extraordinary Merit of the Service they do⁷. But to discover in what this Equality consists, it must carefully be observed, that the Enquiry is not after Equality in Money, but in Charge and Burthen; or in other Words, it is not necessary to this Equality I speak of, that every Man should pay an equal Sum of Money, but that the Share every Man is to pay, should not lie heavier upon one than another, which may easily enough be effected by making the Proportions equal, between the Burthen of the Tax and the Benefit of Peace. For though all equally enjoy Peace, yet they do not all make the same Advantages by it. Some get much more than others; and again, some spend much more than others. And from hence Hobbes makes an Enquiry; "Whether the Subjects ought to contribute to the Publick, in Proportion to what they get, or what they spend? or whether a Man should be taxed according to what he hath coming in, or according to what he consumes?" Where first I think I may say, that since every Man is secured in his Property by the Care the Commonwealth takes of him, he may justly be taxed in proportion to his Income, as Servius Tullius said, in Defence of the Institution of the Census⁸: It is very just, I think, and very much for the publick Good, that such as have large Fortunes should pay largely, and such as have less in a due Proportion. And thus all Subsidies levied upon extraordinary Exigencies in the Commonwealth, ought to be laid according to the Value of Estates. And then, secondly, since every Man's Life is defended by the Sword of the Commonwealth, and Life is equally dear to Poor and Rich, they are both equally obliged to attend the Service of the Wars, and to pay an equal moderate Tax upon that Account, such as a Poll-Tax, in which the Rich pays no more than the Poor. But because it is owing in like Manner to the publick Care of the Commonwealth, that the Subjects have the Advantage and Opportunities of raising Estates by their own Industry, the great Difficulty in this Case is, how the Tax upon this Account ought to be laid? And perhaps the most convenient Way may be, to tax Men according to what they consume, rather than what they get; especially, since Men generally spend in Proportion to what they have coming

¹ Tacit. Ann. 13. c. 51.

² Plin. Penegy. c. 36.

³ Vid. Diod. Sicul. l. 4. c. 73. de Machaon. & Podair. Iscr. in laudat. Enfirid. de Priv. Sacerd. Egyptior. p. 389, 390.

⁴ Droyf. Halicarn. l. 4. p. 215. Edit. Sylburg.

⁵ Vid. L. 59. t. 4. l. 12. Princip. D. de Publicanis.

⁶ Tacit. Ann. 13. d. l.

⁷ Hobbes de Cive, c. 13. §. 9.

coming in. For if the Tax be laid according to what People have coming in; and it should happen that some who have equal Incomes, should yet have unequal Possessions (which is as common as it is for one Man to be frugal, and lay up what he can, and for another to spend what he gets in Waste and Luxury) the Consequence will be, that they that equally enjoy the Benefit of the common Peace, must yet bear an unequal Share of the Burthens of the Commonwealth. For Instance, here are two Persons which get equally an hundred Pounds a Year, and one of them spends constantly forty of it, and the other perhaps fourscore; since both of them equally enjoy the Benefit of Peace, it seems reasonable that both should pay equally for it. But then in this there will be these two Inconveniences: First, that it will be very difficult for the Government to discover what each Subject gets every Year by his Industry; besides, that there cannot be a Review made so often, of what every Man is worth. And Secondly, that if the Tax be levied at the Year's End, when both have made up their Accounts of what they have received, and how much expended, and the Tax be laid upon each of them in Proportion to what they have remaining of the last Year's Income; 'tis manifest, that one must pay double as much as the other, though both equally enjoy'd the common Peace. And what is worse, the one suffers for his Parsimony, and the other is eas'd by his Extravagance. And therefore it must be the best Method to lay the Tax upon the Things which are to be consumed, and then every Subject will insensibly pay his Share to the Publick, in Proportion to his private Consumption, not indeed for what he now actually is, but for what, by the Protection of the Commonwealth, he was formerly possess'd of; and so that which is paid to the Publick, will be look'd upon to be Part of the Price of the Things that are consumed. But what hath been said before, in other Respects, of the Customs, may also be applied to Taxes, and all other publick Impositions. What Ways of raising Money Necessity may sometimes force a Government to take, may be seen at large in Aristotle's Oeconomicks, l. II. c. I. I cannot by the way forbear mentioning a very odd Sort of a Tribute, which the Yncas of Peru laid upon the poorest of their Subject, which was to bring every Year to the Governors of their Provinces, a certain Number of Goat's Horns; the Design of which might possibly be, either that no Body should think himself exempt from paying Taxes, or else perhaps to free themselves from those Insects.

VII. ^a Sovereign or Transcendental Propriety (which is the third Head) is what some pretend to be afraid of, more upon Account of the Name, than the Thing. The Sovereign Power, they say, was erected for the common Security, and that alone will give a Prince a sufficient Right and Title, to make use of the Goods and Fortunes of his Subjects, whenever Necessity requires; because he must be supposed to have a Right to every Thing, without which the publick Good cannot be obtained. But the transcendental Propriety is too arrogant and ambitious a Name; and which ill Princes may sometimes abuse to the Damage and Ruin of their Subjects. But as it is trifling to dispute about Words, so I think there can be no Absurdity or Danger in giving a particular Name to a particular Branch of the sovereign Power, as it exerts itself in a certain Way, upon certain Things. What the Force of this Propriety is, I shall now endeavour to explain. It will be confessed agreeable to natural Equity, that when Contributions are to be made for the Preservation of some particular Thing, by Persons that enjoy it in common, every Man should pay his Quota, and one should not be forced to bear more of the Burthen than another. And the same holds to be Equity also in Commonwealths; but because the State of a Commonwealth may often be such, that either some pressing Necessity will not give leave, that every particular Subject's Quota should be collected, or else, that the Publick may be forced to want the Use of something in the Possession of some private Subject; it must be allowed that the sovereign Power may seize upon it, to answer the Necessities of the State. But then, all above the Proportion that was due from the Proprietors, is to be refunded to them by the rest of the Subjects. For Example, when a Town is to be fortified, the Fields and Gardens of private Subjects must be laid open, and perhaps their Houses be pulled down, to give room for the Works and Ditches. In Sieges, Houses and Trees that belong to private Persons are taken down, that the Enemy may not be shelter'd by them, or the Besieged incommoded. Materials, private

^a Besides, these Contributions, by way of Exciſe, are a Means to restrain the Excess of Luxury, and Profuseness. People need only forbear magnificent Feasts and Entertainments, and wearing fine Clothes, and then they will not pay much. But if they will, at any Rate whatsoever, indulge their Appetite, and humour their Vanity, they ought to blame no Body but themselves. See Hochſteveri Collegium Pufendorſianum, &c. Exercit. xi. §. 12.

^b Vid. Tacit. in Agricola, c. 19. Where he says, that if Agricola rais'd the Tribute upon the Britains, or obliged them to pay a greater Quantity of Corn, he made them amends, by allowing them proportionable Favours, and by taking away all those Exactions and Oppressions which were more insupportable than the Tribute itself; for they had been forced before to wait ridiculously at the Granaries, though they were shut against them, and to buy their own Corn, and sell it again at a set Price; and it had been common to set them new Roads, and Places at a great Distance, that the People might carry their Corn from the Incampments that were nearest to them, to those that were farthest off, and in the worst Ways, that so what lay open for all, might turn to the Advantage of a few. Vid. Cic. in Ver. 5. And it was too severe an Answer Pescennius Niger gave the Jews, when they begged him to lessen the Taxes upon their Estates: You would have me take off the Tax upon your Lands, but I assure you, if could, I would lay another upon the Air you breathe in, Spartianus, c. 7.

^c Garcilass. de la Vega. l. 5. c. 6. Moreover, as to what relates in general to the Manner in which a Prince ought to manage, so as to make the Revenues of the State considerable, without oppressing the People; see Charron de la Saſſe, Liv. III. chap. 2. §. 21. the Parrhasiana, Tom. I. p. 274, &c. and Mr. Budden's Philosophie Pratique, Part III. Chap. 5. §. 7. & l. 8. c. 5, 6.

^d Dominium Eminentis.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. VII.

^a See above in B. 4. c. 6. §. 3. &c. See Mr. Budaeus's History of the Law of Nature, in his Selecta Jur. Nat. §. 52. Besides, we must remember, that every Thing that lies in the Territories of a State, and has no particular Proprietor, belongs originally to the State, unless it is otherwise left in common by a constant and received Custom. See Mr. Titus in his Specimen juris publici Romanae Germaniae, Lib. II. Chap. 3.

^b See Grov. B. 1. c. 1. §. 6. and c. 3. §. 6. and B. 2. c. 14. §. 7, 8. and B. 3. c. 19. §. 7. and c. 20. §. 7, &c.

private Men lay by for their own Use, may be taken, and made use of in publick Fortifications. In general Scarcity, the Store-houses and Granaries of private Subjects are set open. In the Extremities of State, Monies entrusted with the Government are seized. And private Mens Coffers are rifled, when they are not kind or publick spirited enough, to offer their Money voluntarily by Way of Loan; as Xenophon says Cyrus did^a. Perhaps what Cæsar did of this Kind, when he came to Rome after the Defeat of Pompey, is not to be justified, though he be supposed a lawful Prince. For as Dio relates it; "He pretended to borrow the publick Money, when he found there was no other Way of getting it, but continued to threaten Force, and to demand it as his Due; and yet was resolved never to pay it back^b." So again, if there be no other Way to oblige a common Enemy to retreat, our own Country is to be laid Waste, and all Things which might be serviceable, to be carried away, or left unfit for Use^c. From all which it appears, that transcendental Propriety never takes Place, but in the Extremities and Necessities of the Commonwealth. Though Baeler, in his Comment upon Grotius, l. i. c. i. §. 6. observes, "That the Necessity here meant hath its different Degrees, and that it is not only at the last Extremity, this Power may be made use of." But neither, on the other hand, is this Power to be extended too far; but should be reduced to Equity, as nigh as it is possible. And a famous Example of this we have in Livy, l. xxxi. c. 13. From hence it may also be further infer'd, that the Prince himself cannot release a Subject from the Force of this transcendental Propriety; because the publick Extremities of the Commonwealth must always be supposed to be unanswerable Exceptions to all Sorts of Privileges. For it is a Contradiction to pretend to be a Subject, and yet to insist upon a Right utterly inconsistent with common Safety. But however, without Dispute, they that have loit or sacrificed their Fortunes to the publick Safety in such Extremities, ought to have a Restitution or Satisfaction made them, as far as it is possible by the whole Commonwealth^d. Some indeed will make this Exception, when though the Damage sustained be unavoidable, it might yet have been easily foreseen and prevented. For Example, when Houses built in the Suburbs, are pulled down in the Time of War. For the Proprietors of these can demand no Compensation for their Losses; because they knew before that they could not build in those Places upon other Terms. And consequently, by building there notwithstanding, did in a manner tacitly consent to it. But much less can any Compensation be allowed, where the Necessity was universal, and every Subject suffer'd equal Loss. For the Publick is concern'd no further than to take care that the Subjects be not injured by any ill Conduct in Government, but never obliged itself to bear all the Damages they might at any Time sustain^e.

VIII. As to the publick Goods which belong to the Commonwealth itself as such, it is to be observ'd, that in some Kingdoms they are divided into two Parts, one of which is intended for the Maintenance of the Prince, and the other to defray publick Expences for the Preservation of the State^f. So Dionysius Halicarnassens makes a Distinction between the Δημοσία κτήσις, or the publick Possessions, and the τῶν ἀπὸ βασιλείων κτήσις, and the Patrimony of the Prince. And in China one Part in Nine of the Land belongs to the Emperor^g. By that Part intended to maintain the Prince, I mean, that the Prince in some States hath certain Goods assigned him out of the Publick, the Income of which is to maintain the Expences of his Palace. And of all these the Prince hath the full Profits, and may dispose of what he hath coming in from them, as he pleases; and what he lays up out of his Income, where the Laws of the Kingdom do not provide otherwise, makes an Accession to his own private Patrimony^h. The *Emperor Pertinax*ⁱ, upon this View refused to have his Name put upon any of the imperial Possessions; because, as he said, They were not the Emperor's Propriety, but the common publick Estate of every Roman. In Peru, under the Empire of the Inca's, the Lands were divided into three Parts; one Part belong'd to the Emperor, another to their God the Sun, the third to the Commonwealth; and therefore the Subjects paid no Taxes out of theirs^j. But secondly, the Goods which are to defray the Expences for the Conservation of the State, are only barely intrusted to the Care and good Husbandry of the Prince, who should always have especial Regard for the publick Good^k, and express the same Caution and Conscience as a Guardian ought to have for the Estate of his Pupil. From whence it may be easily inferred, on which Side the Right lies, to what a Prince gets or lays up in the Time of his Reign, on his, or on the Commonwealth's. For if a Prince grows rich out of that Branch of the publick Revenues, which belongs to the Commonwealth, or by imposing Taxes upon his Subjects, or by the Expence of their Blood, or by employing them in any of those Services which by common Obligation they owe the Commonwealth; it is clear, that his Wealth must accrue to the Publick, and not to his own private Estate. But suppose, as it may also happen, that a Prince may make all necessary Preparation for a War, and carry it on afterwards, without any Assistance of the publick Treasure, upon the Strength of his own private Riches

^a Xenoph. Cyropæd. l. 8. c. 2.

^b Dio Cassius, l. 42.

^c Crispianus, when the Romans were making War upon him, agreed with the Achaian Magistrates, that all Suits for Debts should be put off, and no Man should be obliged to make any Payment till the War was at an End, Vid. Polyb. Excerpt. Leg. 144. c. 3. V. l. 18.

^d L. S. D. de leg. Commissoria. Curtius, l. 3. c. 4. See Sueson. ch. 42. of Jul. Cæs. the Law made by Cæsar about the Payment of Debts.

^e Jo. Christoph. Becmannus, Medit. Polit. Diss. 21. §. 8.

^f Dion. Halicarn. l. 3. Antiq. Roman. l. 3. c. 1.

^g Martin. Hist. Sin. l. 4. c. 24.

^h Senec. de Benef. l. 7. c. 6. Every Thing belongs to Cæsar; but to his Exchequer nothing but his own private Fortune; every Thing is at his Command; but his Patrimony only is his own Propriety.

ⁱ Herodan. l. 2. c. 15.

^j Vid. Garcilass. de la Vega Comm. Roy. l. 5. c. 14. and Francis Hotoman's Quæst. Illust.

MR. BARB. NOTES ON §. VII, VIII.

¹ See Grot. B. 3. c. 20. §. 7.

² See Grot. B. 2. c. 6. §. 11.

³ See the last Section of this Chapter.

Riches and Estate, without engaging the Commonwealth, either in the Expense or Hazard of it, or it may be, perhaps, barely from the Profits and Revenue of his Crown-Lands: In such a War 'tis also clear, that whatever Acquisitions a Prince makes, will be absolutely his own Right, and that he may, if he please, exclude the Commonwealth. For I have an undeniable Right to the Profits of what I have the Use and Produce of, and therefore may dispose of them as I think fit ^a.

IX. I shall in the next Place enquire, what lawful Power any Prince may have to alienate the Whole or any Part of his Kingdom. By which I do not mean a patrimonial Kingdom, but a Kingdom receiv'd by free Consent of the People. Grotius is very large upon this Question ^b. The Issue of the Matter in Dispute in short is this; That a Prince hath no manner of Power to transfer or give away his Kingdom by his own single Authority; and that his Subjects are not at all obliged by such an Act, if made; and that the Consent of the People is entirely as necessary as that of a Prince. For as the People cannot justly take the Crown from their Prince, so neither can he, without their Consent, set it upon whose Head he pleaseth. But in the Alienation of a Part of a Kingdom, besides the Prince's Consent, there is required not only the Consent of the People, that are to continue under their old Prince and Government, but the Consent of that Part too especially, which is to be alienated. The Reason is, because they that at first erected the Commonwealth; and they that came voluntarily into it afterwards, bound themselves by mutual Compact, to be govern'd by one and the same Government, as long as they thought good to continue in the Dominions of the same Commonwealth. And therefore, as every particular Subject acquired a Right by Virtue of that Compact, not to be violently ejected out of the Commonwealth, nor to be given up to any foreign Power, except by way of Punishment; so the whole Body of the Subjects, from the same Compact, acquires a Right to itself over the particular Subjects, by which no Subject can put himself under a foreign Government or Power, or disclaim and renounce the Authority of his own, as long as he is allowed to live in any of the Dominions belonging to it. And therefore, since all Commonwealths (as all moral Bodies) are formed and grow by a Consent of the Parts, we must look back upon the original Design and Intentions of the primitive Founders of them, when we enquire what Power the whole Body hath over the Parts in such a Case as this. And it cannot be presumed, that their Intentions were, that the Body should have a Right to cut off its own Members, when it pleas'd, and deliver them up to another's Power and Command. And for this Reason the People of Gnienne justly refused to be separated from the Kingdom of England, notwithstanding the Grant and Donation of Richard the Second ^c. But indeed there is one Exception against what was said before, that a Part ought not to disown or separate from the Body, while it continues within the same Dominions, and that is this; except it be in the last Extremities, and that it be impossible for it to preserve itself otherwise, than by submitting to the Enemy's Power and Authority. For in all Agreements of this Nature, the utmost Necessity seems of Course to be excepted; which, it is always allowed, gives a Man full Liberty to secure himself all the Ways he can possibly. And therefore 'tis no more than what must be expected, and is far enough from being criminal, that a Town, after it hath made the best Resistance it could against an Enemy, should at last choose rather to surrender, than suffer itself to be carried by Storm, and be put to the Sword. For since every Man that submits himself voluntarily to Civil Government, had before from Nature a Right to defend himself all the Ways he could, and therefore enters into the Commonwealth for the better Attainment and Security of that Right; when the Commonwealth can no longer afford Protection or Defence to the Subjects, they must be supposed to be releas'd from the Ties they were under before, and to be at Liberty to consult their own Safety as they think best. And without Dispute, the Commonwealth itself can have no other Right over the Members of it, than what was granted and left by them that at first erected it. And therefore as the Commonwealth engageth to protect and defend every one of its Members, unless hinder'd or prevented by unavoidable Necessity; so whenever it struggles under such a Necessity, it is supposed, that no Man is forbid to provide for his own Security as well as he can. In the natural Body indeed it is lawful to cut off any particular Member to preserve the whole, because every Member lives entirely by the Life of the Body, and cannot live otherwise; but in a moral or politick Body, 'tis possible the Members may exist and live in a separate divided State; and therefore the Body moral hath not the same Right over its Members, as the Natural. But if a Prince should be necessitated by Extremity of his Affairs, to compound for a Peace with an over-powerful Enemy, by giving him a certain Country in his Dominions, and that Country should disown and deny the Grant; in this Case, it is my Opinion, that the Prince may draw his Forces out of their Towns and Garrisons, and leave them naked, not hindering the Conqueror from taking Possession of them. But then that he hath no Power to oblige or force them to surrender themselves, or to submit to the Conqueror's Authority. Neither can I think, that the Country is under any Obligations, if they have Strength enough in it, not to make Resistance against such a Conqueror, or afterwards, if they can, not to erect themselves into a distinct Commonwealth. For thus when the Emperor Jovian was obliged by Treaty to give up the City Nisibis to the Persians, the Citizens desired they might have Leave to defend themselves ^d. By such Agreements therefore the Prince indeed and People lose their Right to such a Country; but the Conqueror, if they consent to receive him, and live

^a V. Grot. l. 1. c. 3. §. 12.

^b L. 1. c. 4. §. 10. & l. 2. c. 6. §. 3. (Upon both which Places see Boeker's Annotations) & l. 3. c. 20. §. 5. &c.

^c Froissard. l. 4. Polyd. Virgil. Hist. Angl. l. 20.

^d Amman. Marcellinus, l. 25. c. 12. Zojimus, l. 3.

swear Allegiance to him, acquires a lawful Authority and Power over them. As to that Opinion some are fond of, either with regard to all Kingdoms, or perhaps only to some Particulars, that whatever Goods are appropriated to, or, as they say, incorporated in the Crown, can never be any Way alienated, and that neither the longest Course of Years, or another's quiet and peaceable Possession can secure them from an Act of Resumption, at any Time after, it is without Dispute, false and groundless. And much more absurd and ridiculous is it to assert, that any Kingdom may have Privilege to waite and ruin others, and yet that what it hath once seized, can never afterwards be recover'd from it.

X. From what hath been said it is further evident, that a Prince cannot, without his People's Consent¹, make his Kingdom feudatory to another, or hold it upon Condition of² Forfeiture whenever the feudal Oath is violated, or that when his Family is extinct, it shall devolve to the Prince it is held from. For if the Conditions be such as these, the making the Kingdom feudatory is indeed a conditional Alienation. And again on the other hand, the People may recal any Act of Homage, which the Prince hath remitted without their Consent. And it further follows, that a Prince cannot mortgage any Part of his Dominions, so that the Government of it, and natural Possession, shall be for so long resign'd to the Creditor, without the Consent of his People, and the Part engag'd by the Mortgage; and much less if there be any Conditions of³ Forfeiture annexed. The Reason of which is, not only because a final Alienation is generally the Consequence of Mortgaging; but besides, because the People, when they made Choice of their Prince, chose to be govern'd by him, and not by any other. And because it may justly be presumed, that they that are grown and are strictly united in one People, can never be willing to be broken and antoned into Parts and Divisions.

XI. And it is also further evident, that the Prince hath no Power, without Consent of his People, to alienate those Goods, the Revenues of which are design'd, either to support the publick Expences, or to maintain the necessary Greatness and Dignity of his Court. For in those Goods the Prince is allowed only the Use and Produce of them, which can never amount to a Right of Allie- *nation*². And though perhaps he may think himself well enough provided for, for his own Life, yet it should be considered, that there are to be other Princes to succeed him, who are all to be maintain'd agreeably to the Dignity of crownd Heals. But however, we are to distinguish carefully between the Goods themselves or the publick Patrimony, and the Profits or Produce of them. The first the Prince hath no Power to alienate, the other he hath free Liberty to dispose of, as he pleaseth. Thus where the *Right*³ of what the Sea or Rivers cast up and join to the Land, is the publick Patrimony, or belongs to the Crown, the Prince cannot make away, or transfer that Right, to any one else; but I can see nothing that can oblige him, not to dispose of what is thrown up by the Tide or the Stream, as he thinks fit; because this is the Produce of that Right. So the Right of Confiscation may be a publick patrimonial Settlement, and the confiscated Goods be the Produce of that Settlement. The first is appropriated to the Commonwealth, the second belongs to the Prince. But after all, a Prince that hath Power, when Reasons of State require it, to levy new Subsidies upon the Subject, as he pleaseth, may, when the Necessities of the Commonwealth command, mortgage any Part of the publick Patrimony. For as the People are obliged to pay the Subsidies, such a Prince lays upon them, upon such Reasons of State; so are they obliged to redeem what was mortgaged upon such Reasons. Since the Thing is the same, whether they pay the Money beforehand, to prevent the Necessity of the Mortgage, or whether it be levied upon them afterwards to redeem it. And here it is manifest, that every particular Subject is not the Debtor of that Money, though every one be obliged to contribute his Share to discharge it³. So also, where the Prince lays out Money for the Use of the Publick out of his own private Estate, the Commonwealth must be supposed to mortgage to him the publick Patrimony upon that Account, till such Time as the Debts contracted upon it are cleared by the People. But all this will hold only upon Supposition, that there be no fundamental Law, or Capitulation, which provideth otherwise, and either enlargeth or confineth the Rights of the Prince or People.

¹ Sub onere Commissi ex Felonia.

² Lex Commissoria.

³ Vid. Senec. de Beneficiis, L. 6. c. 20.

* Alluvionum Fns.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. X, XI.

¹ See Grot. B. 2. c. 6. §. 9.

² Vid. Grot. ubi supra, §. 11, 12, 13.

³ See Grotius, B. 3. c. 2. §. 1.

C H A P. VI.

Of the Right of War.

The CONTENTS of every Paragraph of the Sixth Chapter.

- | | |
|--|---|
| I. The Division of what follows in the Chapter. II. Peace the ordinary proper State of Man ; War extraordinarily indulg'd by Nature. III. War either offensive or defensive. IV. The Causes of War ought to be manifest. V. The unjust Causes of War recounted. VI. Fraud lawful against an Enemy. VII. How far Violence may be lawfully used against an Enemy. VIII. In a Commonwealth particular private Men lose their Right of War. IX. War either solemn, or less solemn. X. A Magistrate as such hath no Right to make War. XI. Whether he may make War upon a Presumption of his Prince's Consent. XII. How far an Injury, done by a Subject, may give Reason for a War against the Commonwealth. | XIII. Of the Equity of Reprisals. XIV. For whom we may justly make War. XV. Of the Declaration of War. XVI. Of the Liberties commonly used in War. XVII. Of the Liberties used upon the Person of an Enemy. XVIII. Whether lawful to kill an Enemy by Assassines ? XIX. Things sacred not exempt from the Liberties of War. XX. Things, how acquired in War. XXI. To whom the Acquisitions of War belong. XXII. Things incorporeal, how far acquired in War. XXIII. A Loan, whether acquirable in War. XXIV. Dominion over the Conquer'd, how many ways acquired. XXV. Things lost in War, how recovered. XXVI. Whole Nations, how restored to Liberty. |
|--|---|

SINCE every particular Man in a Liberty of Nature hath the same natural Right, which States and Commonwealths have, to defend himself against unjust Violence, and to defend and assert his Rights by Force, when others injure him in, or endeavour to deprive him of them, it will, I think, be a proper Method to enquire, first, what may be supposed common to the Wars of particular Men, and Commonwealths ; and then, secondly, what hath either by Custom of Nations, or by Nature, been appropriated to the latter.

II. First therefore, 'tis, certain that nothing is more consonant to the Law of Nature, than that no Man should offer unjust Violence or Injury to another ; and on the other hand, than that all Men should shew Kindness and Humanity to one another, and be particularly exact in the Observation of Agreements and Compacts. And when Men duly attend to, and obey these Laws, they may be said to enjoy Peace; which is a State most agreeable to human Nature, which tends most to promote its Happiness and Security, and indeed which the Law of Nature was given to Men principally to establish and preserve*. Nay further, Peace is a State proper to human Nature, as such; since it ariseth from a Principle peculiar to Mankind above the Brutes ; whereas

War flows from Principles common to both. Brutes indeed by Instinct of Nature will endeavour to defend and preserve themselves as well as they can †. But Man alone understands the Nature and Constitution of Peace, For it is he only, that can voluntarily undertake or forbear the Performance of any Action, which may bring Good or Harm upon another Person, upon a Consideration of certain Obligations on one Side, and certain Rights on another. All which depends entirely upon the Use and Exercise of Reason. Beasts indeed perform the Service their Masters are pleas'd to use them in: But the Reason of that Obedience goes no higher than the Fear of Blows, or the Temptation of good Keeping; for the Sense of any Obligation, without doubt, lies much out of their Reach. We find too, that Beasts are seldom inclin'd to hurt Men, or one another; but this must be supposed either the Effect of Fear and Weakness, or because they find nothing to provoke their Appetite. Again, there are others of them that seem to be fond of, and to care for and assist one another. But it is not to be supposed, that they do so, because they are sensible they are obliged to it †. But notwithstanding, it is very lawful, and may sometimes be necessary for Man himself to make War; for Example, when he finds that another Person

* Vid. Polyb. l. 12. c. 14.

† To this Purpose is that Passage of Quintilian, Declam. 9. p. 128, 129. Ed. Lugd. Bat. Nature seems to have infused into Man, more than into other Creatures, a certain Sociableness of Temper and Constitution, which has taught us to think ourselves Happy in one another's Company and Conversation, to unite into Nations. and erect Cities and Commonwealths: And among all the Impressions she hath made upon our Souls, there is none that can be of greater Use to us, than that of Kindness and Good Will. For what can we imagine happier than Mankind, if all the World could be persuaded to be Friends? We should have no Wars, Seditions, Robberies, Quarrels, and Disputes, or any of those Evils which we ourselves add to those of Fortune. It hath pleas'd Heaven, indeed, that it should be otherwise; but however, the World hath always been agreed, that Sincerity, Integrity, and Gratitude, ought to be the great Principles in the Composition of every brave and noble Spirit.

Mr. BARB. NOTE on §. II.

‡ Vid. Lactan. Institut. Divin. L. 5. c. 17.

Person hath maliciously design'd to do him Harm, or denies him his Right. For in such Cases, the Care he is supposed to have of his own Safety, giveth him Power to defend himself, and assert his Right what Ways he thinks best, though it be with the Hurt of the injurious Person; or to recover his Right by Force, when he cannot obtain it by easier Means. For Nature hath not only given Man a quick Sense of Injuries, that he might not suffer himself to be oppress'd and insulted; but she hath also armed him with Strength and Agility of Body, that he should not be forced tamely to submit. But then, when Nature permits War, Peace is the Price and Reward of War. And when Men are forced to fight, it is not because they are to make War perpetually, but that they may enjoy a lasting Peace and Security for the future. But besides, though the Person that doth Harm, doth immediately, as far as he is concerned, give a Man Power to make War upon him, yet it ought to be considered, what Good or Evil may probably be brought upon himself or others that did him no Injury by it. For Injuries, which do not entirely rob a Man of Quiet and Safety, ought not to provoke him to revenge them with War; when either the Inconveniences he may bring upon himself, and those that belong to him by it, are like to be greater than the Advantages he can propose; or when others he at present is at Peace with, must by his War suffer such Evils, as by the Laws of Humanity, on a quiet Submission to the Injuries offer'd, he ought to defend them from. And therefore, that a Man is justly to be commended, that will not revenge an Injury, when he sees that a War will, in all Probability, produce greater Evils than Good.

III. The Causes of just War may be reduc'd to these three Heads. First, To defend ourselves and Properties against others that design to do us Harm, either by assaulting our Persons, or taking away or ruining our Estates. Secondly, To assert our Rights when others, who are justly obliged, refuse to pay them to us. And lastly, To recover Satisfaction for Damages we have injuriously sustained, and to force the Person that did the Injury, to give Caution for his good Behaviour for the future. And hence ariseth the Division of just Wars into offensive and Defensive. The latter of which I take to be those Sorts of Wars, in which

* Dicys Cretensis, l. 2. c. 21. p. 44. Ed. Amst. Max. Tyrinus, Dissert. 14. p. 138. Ed. Ludg. Bat. A good Man never begins a War but when he is forced to it; but a bad Man makes it his Choice. V. Baeler in Grot. l. 1. c. 3. §. 1.

† Aristot. ad Nicom. l. 10. c. 7. We make War that we may live in Peace. There is no Body that desires, or makes Preparations for War, purely for the sake of the War itself. For a Man must be of an inhuman Temper, that will make Enemies of his Friends, barely for the Satisfaction of a Quarrel. Tacit. Hist. l. 4. c. 76. There is no Body so forward in taking Arms, that had not rather obtain that peaceably, which he trusts to the Decision of a War. And therefore it is a very ill Character of some, which Silius Italicus describes, l. 3. ver. 330, 331.

Nec vitam sine Marte pati, quippe omnis in Armis Lucis causa sita est, & damnatum vivere paci.

They think Life pleasant when in Arms employ'd,
But dull and worthless if in Peace enjoy'd.

MR. BARB. NOTES ON §. III.

“ When we make War, we complain of something that has been done by those against whom we take up Arms. — We say, that they have cheated us, that they have insulted us, and taken our Goods from us.” Plato in the 1st Alcibiad. p. 109. A. T. II. Ed. H. Steph. 432. T. Ed. Wechel. Ficin. See Grotius, l. 2. c. 1. §. 1, 2. Our Author here tacitly excludes from the Number of Lawful Causes of War, the Punishing of criminal Actions; by which we are not injured ourselves. But we have shewn above (Chap. iii. Sect. 4. Note 3.) that the Reason on which he establishes his Opinion, is not very solid. It is true, that from Equal to Equal, we must not lightly take up Arms to punish all Sorts of Crimes, that do not relate to ourselves, we must always use the following Precautions, which Grotius justly recommends to us. I. Not to take them up for punishing the Violation of the Maxims of the Law of Nature, which is contrary only to certain Customs, though received upon some Foundation, among several Nations; such as were almost all those that gave the ancient Greeks such an Antipathy against the Persians. For this Reason (says J. Freder. Gronovius thereupon) King Darius was to blame, to require the Carthaginians to eat no more Dogs-Flesh, and not to burn their dead Bodies; since these two Customs had nothing in them to give a just Occasion of War: But what he pretended, at the same Time, I mean their not offering any human Sacrifice, was manifestly founded upon the Law of Nature, (Just. Hist. Lib. xix. c. 1. Num. 10. Ed. Græv.) II. Not lightly to place in the Number of Things forbidden by Nature, those which we are not well assured are contrary to it, and which are rather simply prohibited by a Divine positive Law: Such are perhaps Conjunctions out of Marriage, and those which are called Incestuous. Grotius here adds Ujury; but let us set aside the Abuse of it, and there is nothing in it contrary to the Law of Nature, as we have shewn in another Place. III. To distinguish carefully the general Principles of the Law of Nature, such as, we must live honestly, that is to say, after a Manner conformable to Reason, and some others like that, but which are manifestly incontestable, as when we say, that we must not take away another Man's Goods; from the Consequences that we draw from them. Some of which are easy to be perceived, such is the Prohibition of Adultery, supposing Marriage; whereas, there are others more difficult to be discovered; as for Example, That Revenge where we propose nothing but Evil for Evil, is criminal. — As then political Legislators excuse those to whom their Laws have not been declared, or who are incapable of understanding them; so in Matters of natural Laws, it is just to excuse those that violate them, through the Weakness of their Understanding, or the Unhappiness of an ill Education. — IV. In short, Wars undertaken only to punish those against whom we take up Arms, are suspected of Injustice, when the Crime is not undeniably plain, and very flagrant, or when there is no other Reason besides, that makes a just War. This is what Grotius says, l. II. c. 20. §. 41, 42, 43. In the following Paragraphs, to the End of the Chapter, he treats of religious Wars, that is, of those which we undertake against such as have, on that Account, some Principle or Practice different from ours (for as to the rest, it is clear that we may defend ourselves against those who would hinder us from professing that Religion which we believe to be the best.) All that he says amounts to this, that we cannot lawfully take up Arms for this single Reason, against any but Atheists, or else against those who insolently revile the Divinity itself, whom they make Profession of adoring. (See Mr. Budden's Dissertation on the Crusades; in his Select. Jur. Nat. & Gent. p. 97, Sec.) So far is a simple Difference of Opinion in other Tenets of Religion from giving any just Cause of pursuing by Force of Arms, or disturbing in the least those whom we believe to be in an Error. However, I question not but that Protestant Princes may with a safe Conscience enter into a Confederacy to destroy the Inquisition, and force the Powers that suffer it in their Dominions, to disannul this grand Cabal, under which Christianity has groan'd so long, and which under a false Pretence to Zeal, exercises a Tyranny the most horrible and contrary to human Society that ever was. Those who love to acquire Glory by their Arms, cannot find a fairer or more lawful Occasion of signaling their Valour, supposing they had otherwise, a sufficient Strength to embark in this Undertaking; and never would any Hero have tam'd Monsters more furious and terrible to Mankind, than he that could accomplish the Design of purging the Earth of these villainous Souls, who so impudently abuse it under the specious Shew of Religion, only to have wherewith to indulge themselves in Pride, Luxury, and Laziness, and to make both Princes and Subjects dependent on them, and live under their Subjection.

2 Upon which we must refer to our Observation in another Place, that in a Case of Necessity, an imperfect Right is chang'd into a perfect Right; so that then the Refusal of him that will not yield up to us what he ought to do, gives a just Occasion of War.

which Men endeavour to defend and keep what is their own. The Former are, when Men extort their Rights that are denied by Force, attempt to recover what hath been unjustly taken from them, and require Caution for the future. Sometimes indeed the Party that first began the War may have the Credit of being on the Defensive. For Instance, suppose he be often alarm'd and harass'd with sudden Incurfions upon him, the Enemy retiring always when he appears to oppose him; or suppose a Man be assur'd that his Enemy hath form'd Designs against him, and so disables him for the Attempt, while he is making his Preparation^a.

IV. But in general, the Causes of every War, and especially of the offensive, ought to be evident, and without Mixture of Doubt and Uncertainty^b. For it is very usual in Cases of this Nature for Doubts to arise; either perhaps out of Ignorance of Matter of Fact, when it is not absolutely certain, whether it was done, or not; with what Intention it was done; or else out of a negligent, slight Comparison between strict Justice and the Laws of Love and Charity; or it may be from a mistaken Computation of the Proportion of the Utilities, which it is probable will be the Effects of undertaking or forbearing the War. In these Cases therefore, as no uncertain Pretensions^c ought to be made use of; so neither should Men immediately seek Redress by Arms, but sincerely endeavour, and that these three Ways especially, to compose the Differences, before they break out into a War: First, by Conference between the Parties, or their Agents^d. Secondly, by Appeal to Arbiters^e. Or in the last Place, by Lot^f. But how evident soever the Causes of ^a Vid. Justin. l. 2. c. 3. n. 12.

^b Valerius Flaccus, l. 5. ver. 665, &c.

*Ar nullas præferre preces, nec fœdera Regis
Ulla sequi? cæca sed cuncta impellere pugna Debitum? sic Thraces agunt.*

Never to peaceful Overture to yield,
Or sacred League, but in the bloody Field.
Always in Arms to breathe relentless War,
None but the wildest Savages will dare.

MR. BARB. NOTES ON §. III, IV.

¹ In the fourth Tome of the Observations Choieses, printed at Hall in Saxony, Observ. VIII. there are some Reflections which I will here set down in the very Words of Mr. Bernard, who has given us an Abstract of them in Nouvel de la Rep. des Lett. Sept. 1704. p. 304. &c. 'Tis now a-days the Custom to excuse the most unjust Wars, by saying they are purely defensive Wars. There are some People that believe, that every unjust War ought to be called offensive, which is not true: for if there are offensive Wars that are just, as there is no Doubt of it, there are also defensive Wars that are unjust; as when we defend ourselves against a Prince who has Reason to attack us. Neither must we believe, that he who is the first Aggressor begins by that an offensive War; and that the other, who demands Satisfaction for the Injury receiv'd, is always only upon the defensive. There are a great many unjust Acts that may kindle a War, and which however are not the War; as the ill Treatment of a Prince's Ambassadors, or the plundering his Subjects: If then we take up Arms to revenge such an unjust Act, we begin an offensive, but a just War; and the Prince who has done the Injury, and refuses to give Satisfaction, commences defensive, but an unjust War. An offensive War then is not unjust, but when it is undertaken without a lawful Cause; and then defensive War, which upon other Occasions would be unjust, becomes just. In general then, he that first takes up Arms, whether he does it justly or unjustly, commences an offensive War; and he that opposes that War, whether he has or has not Reason to do so, begins a defensive one. Those who look upon the Word offensive War to be an odious Term, as containing something that is always unjust; and who consider, on the contrary, a defensive War, as inseparable from Equity, confound all the Ideas, and perplex an Affair, which of itself would appear plain and clear enough. It is with Princes as with private Persons. The Plaintiff, who commences a Suit at Law, is sometimes in the Wrong, and sometimes also he has Right on his Side: It is just so with the Defendant. We are in the Wrong not to pay a Sum that is justly due, as we are in the Right to forbear paying what we do not owe.

² See Grot. B. 2. c. 1. § 1. and c. 22. § 2. where he divides them into justifying Reasons, and Motives of the War: (Causa iustifica, & causa iustioris.) The first are those that render, or seem to render, the War just with regard to the Enemy; so that we believe we do him no Injustice in taking up Arms against him. The Motives are the Views of Interest, which oblige us to declare War. In a War, innocent upon all other Accounts, the justifying Reasons must not only be truly lawful, but must be blended with the Motives, that is, that we must never undertake a War but through the Necessity to which we are reduced of defending ourselves against another's Insults, of making him give up what is our undoubted Right, and of obtaining a Satisfaction for an apparent Injury done us. Thus a War may be vicious or unjust, with regard to the Causes, four several Ways: First, when we undertake it either without any justifying Cause, or any Motive of Profit, tho' never so little, but only out of a fierce and brutal Fury, that makes us delight in Blood and Slaughter purely for the sake of killing. But there is Reason to doubt, whether we can find any Example of so barbarous a War. (See Grotius, Lib. II. Cap. 22. §. 2.) Secondly, when we attack others only for our own Interest, without their having done us any Injury. And these Sorts of Wars are, with respect to the Aggressor, downright Robberies. (See Grotius, ibid. §. 3.) Thirdly, when we have some Motives founded upon justifying Reasons, but which still have only an apparent Equity, and which, upon a nice Examination, are found at the Bottom to be unlawful. Such are those mention'd by our Author in the following Section, after Grotius (ubi supra §. 4. & seq.) In short, Fourthly, when notwithstanding our having good justifying Reasons, we undertake the War upon other Motives, that have no Relation to the Injury we have receiv'd, as acquiring Vain-Glory, enlarging our Rule and Dominion, enriching ourselves, satiating our Revenge, or upon any other View of Interest, either publick or private, but quite divested of the justifying Reasons of the War in which we are engag'd. (See Grotius, ibid. § 17.) Of these four Sorts of Wars, whose Undertaking contains something that is just, or unjust; the third and the last are very common, there being very few People so barbarous and savage as to take up Arms, without declaring at least some sort of justifying Reason. The third is also very common; but it is not difficult to discover the Injustice of it. As for the fourth, perhaps it is the most common of all; it is not so unjust in itself, as with regard to the Disposition and Views of him that does it. It is besides very difficult to be convinced of it, the Motives being generally so impenetrable, or the greatest Part of Mankind so very careful in concealing them. Thus we are not oblig'd to restore what we have taken from the Enemy in such a War, exactly to the Value of the Damage and Injury he has done us. This is taken almost from Mr. Buddens's Philosophie Pratique, Part II. Cap. 5. § 2. &c. As he does very little besides abridging Grotius, in all this, I shall here make use of his Book in some other Places; and by that, as well as by Grotius himself, and also by the Abstract de Officio Hom. & Civ. I will supply what our Author wants, who has but lightly treated of all that concerns the Right of War and Peace, without doubt because Grotius had already almost exhausted the Matter. Moreover, whoever is desirous to see the Application of what we have just now said in this Note, to remarkable Examples, need only consult Mr. Buddens's Dissertation, entituled, Jurisprudentiæ Historiæ Specimen, § 82, &c. seq. in which he examines the Justice of the Wars of the Romans.

³ See above in B. 1. c. 3. § 7, 8. and Grot. B. 2. c. 23. § 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6. Besides, To the Question whether there can be a just War on both Sides, Mr. Buddens, in his Philosophie Pratique, § 16. answers, No, if we consider the Justness of the Cause in itself: For it implies a manifest Contradiction, that two Persons should have equal Right; the one to demand, and the other to refuse one and the same Thing. But it may happen, that one of the two that are at War together, may have a very lawful Reason for it, and the other be in an invincible Ignorance of the Injustice of his Cause. In that Case both of 'em make War justly and unjustly: the invincible Ignorance on his Side, whose Cause is unjust, hindering his Action from being reputed unjust in itself. But that cannot happen but very rarely; for those who engage in a War, examine, or at least ought to examine, with a great deal of Care, all the Reasons on both Sides. See Grotius, Lib. II. Cap. 23. § 13.

⁴ See Grot. B. 2. c. 24.

⁵ See above, in B. 5. c. 13. § 3:

⁶ See the same Book and Chapter, § 4. &c.

⁷ See the same Book, c. 9. § 2, 3.

of War may be, a wise Man, before he draws his Sword, ought to consider what Grotius says, That it is a great Folly in particular Men, as well as Commonwealths, not to accept of Accommodation, or hear of Reconciliation, while Things stand whole on both Sides; but when they have sufficiently punished and mortified one another, then quietly to give over, without giving any Body the Trouble of parting them *.

V. The unjust Causes of War are recounted by Grotius, L.ii. c. 22. § 5, &c. Some of them are manifestly unlawful; others of them have some Colour to be thought lawful, tho' it be but weak and faint. Under the first Rank is to be placed Avarice and all extravagant Desire of increasing Wealth, as also Ambition, and the Hopes of enlarging Rule and Dominion, of growing great, and purchasing a false Fame and Glory, by the Oppression of others. Avarice is a Cause of War usually conceal'd and dissembled with great Care, because it supposes a base and fordid Spirit. But Ambition is generally favour'd in the World, under the Name of Gallantry and Fortitude. And it is commonly thought Greatness and Bravery of Mind, to grasp after, and fight for what belongs to other Men. But yet Princes, as Phyliscus told Alexander †, Tho' they are never so ambitious of Glory, should not think it any, to be remember'd, as Famines and Pestilences are, as the Plagues of Mankind, but as the greatest Blessings, as Peace and Happiness. For tho' the great God often makes use of War to purge and punish the World ‡, yet when Princes make War without any other Design than that, it is the greatest Impiety. And yet the Jews thought that they were allow'd, when their Sinbedrin declared War, tho' without any other Reason than barely for the Greatness and Glory of their Nation, to invade their Neighbours, and, if they could, make an absolute Conquest of them †. Under the latter Class may be rank'd Fears, which arise from the Strength and Power of Neighbours; and when Men think, as the Poet says, they don't want Will to do what they have Power ‡. But this single Suspicion is not sufficient to make a Cause of War just, unless Men have very good moral Certainty, that they have form'd Designs against them. For an uncertain Jealousy of Danger may be Reason enough to persuade a Man to be circumspect, and fortify himself as well as he can, but can never give him a Right to strike the first Blow, tho' it be only with Intent that the other should give him real Caution, as they call it, that he will attempt nothing against him †. For as long as my Neighbour doth me no Injury, and I do not apparently take him in any Preparation for such a Design (for sometimes an intended Injury, and but begun, may as justly be punish'd with War, as an Injury that is finished) I ought to presume, he will always continue in the same Mind. But especially, if I have his Word and Faith to assure me of his Sincerity. And it would be extremely unjust in me to force him to give me real Caution; because thus he must be in a more suspected Condition than my self, being forced himself to rely upon my Faith alone. Supposing indeed, that there be just Cause of War, the Growth and Power of Neighbours may very well deserve immediate Consideration and Regard, in Debates about it: For Experience hath often proved it true, that Mens Desires of being great increase in Proportion to their Strength and Power †. “ And it is natural for Men to be suspicious, and “ afraid of being oppress'd, whenever they apprehend that there is an Over-balance of Power “ in their Neighbours; for it is easy to imagine, “ that

* Ilocrates, Orat. ad Philip. p. 154. Ed. Min. Paris. This Period is taken from the Abstract de Officio Hom. & Civ. Lib. II. Cap. 16. §. 3. See Grotius, Lib. II. Cap. 23. §. 11, 12. where he makes the two following Remarks, which are worth our taking notice of here. The first is, that what Assurance soever we may have of the Justice of our Cause, if it is not in our Power to produce a Title sufficient to convince him that detains what is ours, of the Illegality of his Possession, we cannot lawfully declare War against him on that Account; because in that Case we have no Right to force him to deliver up to us the Thing he is possess'd of. Besides, if the Possessor is a Person of no Honesty or Sincerity, tho' we should have lost the Deeds, that were necessary to be produced before the Arbitrators, that would diminish nothing from our Pretensions, nor hinder us from pursuing our Right by Force of Arms, as our Author has observ'd above, Book V. Chap. 13. § 8. Grotius's other Remark is, that when the Right is doubtful on both Sides, if neither of the Parties is in Possession of the Thing in Dispute between 'em, or if both of 'em are equally possess'd of it, they must decide the Matter by way of Division, and he that refuses this Expedient, ought to be look'd upon to be unjust, and an Enemy to Peace.

† As in Euripides, Hellena, ver. 38, &c. Jupiter is said to have engaged the Greeks and Phrygians in a Quarrel.

To ease the Earth of her too numerous Sons.

‡ Seldenus, de J. N. & G. sec. Hebr. l. 6. c. 3. & 12. To which we may add a fine Passage of Cicero's, upon the false Idea of Conquerors. “ If this Greatness of Soul which they shew in bearing Fatigues, and exposing themselves to the most hazardous “ Dangers, is not adorn'd with a large Stock of Justice; and if they use it for themselves, and their own private Advantage, instead “ of employing it for the publick Good, so far is it from being a Virtue, that it is a Vice, and a downright Fierceneis, that stifles all “ Sentiments of Humanity and Tenderness, De Officiis, Lib. I. cap. 19.

‡ Lucan, Pharsal. l. 3. ver. 100, 101.

‡ Gellius, l. 7. c. 3. A Gladiator that prepares himself to fight, must accept of these Conditions of Combat, either to kill his Enemy, or to fall himself; but the Life of Man is not confin'd by any such hard and severe Laws, as to oblige us to do others Injuries first, that we might not suffer them ourselves.

‡ Vid. Cumberland, de Leg. Nat. c. 2. § 15. in fin. Bacon's Essays, c. 19. Seneca, Oedip. ver. 542, 543. Stat ingens arbor atque umbra gravi sylvas minores urget.

A lofty Tree that stands, which with its Shade
Oppresseth all the Underwood.——

Procop. Hist. Goth. l. 4. Herodes Orat. de Repub. Neighbouring Nations are never concern'd at the Mischiefs which befall one another from their own Domestick Broils and Quarrels; the Weaker have no Reason, because thus they are secure from being enslaved; they that are equal in Strength, think of gaining a Superiority by it; and the Strongest, of purchasing an easier Conquest, Polyb. l. 1. c. 83. A Man should never trust another with so much Power, as to place him out of his Reach, when he is to contest with him about any Right that is confessedly his own. Appianus Alexand. Lybic. p. 32. Ed. Steph. Tho' it be a Friend, yet it is necessary to be cautious how he is made too great.

Mr. BARB. NOTE on §. v.

‡ Vid. Ælian. V. H. L. 14. c. 14.

“ that such as have too great a Share of Strength, will find Reasons, when they please, to make use of it upon them that are weaker, though they do nothing to deserve it.” But now as for Utility, to make that a Cause of War, or to pretend the same Right from thence to what belongeth to others, as Necessity may give, is unpardonably impudent; though it is no more than what the *Athenians*¹, in Thucydides, said for themselves, “ That no Body is so much a Friend to Justice, as to neglect an Opportunity of possessing himself of what he can get by Force, barely because it is unjust.” Especially since nothing can be more opposite to the publick Interest of Mankind, than to admit the Introduction of such a Right, which will give a Man leave to take away any Thing by Force from another Person, which he thinks will be an Advantage to himself: For it must be expected that other Persons will use him with the same Liberty he takes with them. And as to other Pretexts for War, which Grotius mentions in the same Place, they may be answered the same Way. My Lord Bacon, in his Advancement of Learning, gives this for a sufficient Reason for making War upon the Americans^a, which I must confess I cannot agree with him in: “ That they were to be look’d upon as People proscribed by the Law of Nature, inasmuch as they had a barbarous Custom of sacrificing Men, and feeding upon Man’s Flesh.” For it ought to be distinctly considered, whether Christian Princes have sufficient Licence given them to invade those Indians, as People proscribed by Nature, only because they made Man’s² Flesh their common Food? or, because they eat the Bodies of Persons of their own Religion? or, because they devoured Strangers and Foreigners? And then again it must be ask’d, whether those Strangers they are said to kill and eat, come as Enemies and Robbers, or as innocent Guests and Travellers, or as forc’d by Strefs of Weather? For this last Case only, not any of the others, can give any Prince a Right of War against them; and this to those Princes only, whose Subjects have been used with that Inhumanity by them.

VI. Tho’ it be also common to all Sorts of War that the particular Nature, and, as I may call it, Genius of them is Violence and Terror, yet it is also lawful to make use of Stratagem and Fraud against any Enemy, provided there be no Treachery, or Violation of Compact and Faith in it. For as Agessilaus said, To break the Faith of Articles and Leagues, is no less than a Contempt of GOD: But to circumvent an Enemy, is well enough consistent with Justice, and may be attended with as much Glory as Success^b. And the proper Sense of that famed Saying of Cleandridas implies no more: When the Lion’s Skin fails, it is necessary to put on the Fox’s^c.

VII. But the better to understand how far it is lawful to pursue Revenge, and use Violence against an Enemy, it will be necessary to observe, that there is a great deal of Difference between the Liberties which a State of Hostility, simply considered, gives a Man against his Enemy, and the Liberties which the Mercifulness and Gentleness of the Law of Nature would suffer him to take. The Law of Nature obligeth Men to a mutual Exercise of the Offices and Duties of Peace; and the Person that first violates them to my Prejudice, releases me, as far as lies in his Power, from paying any of those Offices to himself: And in Consequence, as long as he professes himself my Enemy, he gives me a Liberty to use Violence against him in infinitum, or as far as I please. Especially since, if I am not allow’d this Liberty, but am necessarily obliged to confine my Violence within certain Bounds, and in no case to proceed to Extremities, the proper End of War, whether offensive or defensive, can never be obtain’d. And therefore every open publick War seems to have something in it like such a sort of Compact as this: Try your Strength, and I will try mine. And this holds not only where my Enemy resolves to push Things to the utmost against me, but also tho’ he designs to destroy me, without going to Extremities: For he hath no more Right to give me a slight Wound, than one that may prove mortal. And therefore it is not only so far lawful for me to use Violence against my Enemy till I have repulsed the Danger he threaten’d me, or till I have recovered, or forced from him what he either unjustly deprived me of, or refused to pay me; but I may further oblige him to give me Caution for the future. Which if he suffers to be forced from him, he sufficiently discovers, that he still entertains malicious Designs against me, and that one Time or other he may put them in Execution. Neither indeed is it always unjust, to return a greater Evil for a less. It may, ’tis true, be objected, that Retribution ought to be made in due Proportion; but it must be said, that this is to be applied only to Courts of Judicature, where Punishments are inflicted always by Superiors. The Evils, which are the Effects of a Right of War, are properly Punishments, because they are not inflicted by a Superior as such, nor have any Tendency to reform either the injurious Person, or any others, but only to defend or regain the Security of a particular Man’s Rights and Properties. In pursuance of which End, it is lawful for me to make use of such Means as I think will best prevail against a Person, who, by his injurious Treatment of me, hath put me out of all Capacity of ^a De Augmen. Scient. p. m. 348.

^b Plutarch Apophtheg. Lacon. p. 209. B.

^c Cleandrid. in Polyen. Stratag. L. 2. c. 10. n. 5. Vid. Xenoph. Cyropæd. l. 1. & Grot. l. 3. c. 1. § 6. add. supr. l. 4. c. 1. § 19.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § v.

¹ B. 1. c. 76. Ed. Oxon.

² If these Anthropophagi eat only the Flesh of human Creatures that die a natural Death, or are killed by others, and not themselves, how barbarous and savage soever such a Custom was, it would give us no Right to attack them purely for that single Reason. But since they themselves kill human Creatures, either to eat them or sacrifice them to their Idols, ’tis a Thing so cruel, so contrary to Humanity, and so destructive to Society and Mankind in general, that we cannot look upon, but as just and commendable, a War that should be undertaken to endeavour to have the Use of it abolish’d, though these Men practis’d it but only among themselves, and always spared Strangers. If our Author maintains the contrary, ’tis because he always argues upon a Principle, whose Falseness I have prov’d elsewhere. See Note 1. § 3. of this Chapter, and Chap. III. § 4. Note 3.

doing him any Injury, till such Time as it shall be agreed between us to forbear Hospitalities. But now the Law of Humanity would have Men consider not only what an Enemy may suffer without Injury, but what it may be proper for a generous Conqueror to inflict. And therefore they ought to be particularly careful, that as far as is possible, and their own necessary Defence and future Security will permit, to proportion the Evils they inflict upon their Enemy, to the Measures and Moderation observed by Civil Courts in punishing Criminals and Offenders. Upon this Moderation Grotius ¹ is very large, l. iii. c. II, &c. ad 16. And the three Rules he prescribes, l. iii. c. I. § 2, 3, 4. will give us a clear View of the Liberties of Hostility. But besides, the Uncertainties and Turns of Fortune which may happen in War, ought to persuade Men to be very temperate in the Use of those Liberties, for fear an Alteration in Affairs should, as it were, make their own Weapons recoil, and return upon themselves the Usage they gave others^a. So when Colonna, in Gratianus ², gave Orders that the Turks, which were taken Prisoners in the Fight at Lepanto, should be well used at Rome, he turn'd to Mahomet, and said aloud, Learn to be merciful of us, you that are generally so cruel and barbarous to Christian Captives: To which the Turk replied, The Cruelty, Sir, you object, is however pardonable in us, because we never knew before what it was to be Prisoners, and be left to the Mercy of an Enemy. The Turks understood well enough how to take Prisoners, but never thought of being made such. How they are to be dealt with² that supply an Enemy with what he wants, may be seen in the Author mentioned before, l. iii. c. I. § 5. & c. 17.

VIII.

^a Vid. Diad. Sicul. l. 10. c. 47. Virg. Æneid. 10. ver. 533.

— — Belli commercia Turnus
Sustulit illa prior, jam tum Pallante perempto.

^b Gratianus de Bello Cyprio, l. 5.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § VII.

¹ Grotius, (Lib. III. Cap. 1. § 1, 2, 3.) lays down at first three general Rules, which serve to explain the Extent of the Rights of War. First, All that has a Relation morally necessary to the lawful End or Design of the War, is permitted, and no more: For it would be to no Purpose to have a Right to do a Thing, if we could not make use of the Means necessary to bring it about. But at the same Time, it would not be just, that under the Pretence of pursuing our Right, we should suffer ourselves to do every Thing, and carry on Matters, without any Manner of Necessity, to the last Extremity. Secondly, The Right which we pursue by Arms ought not to be consider'd only with regard to the Cause which began the War, but still in reference to the fresh Causes that happen afterwards: Just as at Law, one of the Parties often acquires some new Right before the ending of the Suit. There lies the Foundation of our Right, to act against those that join with our Enemy, whether they are his Dependents or no. Thirdly, There are abundance of Things, which, tho' otherwise unlawful, are permitted, because they are inevitable Consequences of War, and happen contrary to our Intention; otherwise there would never be any Way of making War without Injustice, and the most innocent Actions would be look'd upon as unjust, since there are but few from whence some Evil will not accidentally happen, contrary to the Intention of the Agent. (See above, Lib. I. Cap. 5. § 3. Note 6, 7.) Here now follow the Particulars of the Rights that War gives over the Enemy's Person and Goods, with the Moderation that ought to be observ'd in them. First then, It is certain that we may kill our Enemy, otherwise our taking up Arms would be to no Purpose. And to consider the Thing in itself, it is no Matter which Way we rob him of Life; whether by open Force, or by Fraud and Stratagem, by the Sword, or by Poison, tho', according to the Notions and Customs of civilized Nations, the not only causing any poisonous Draught to be given to our Enemy, but also the poisoning of Fountains, Wells, Springs, Arrows, Darts, Bullets, and other Weapons employ'd against him, is esteem'd as a base and criminal Cowardise. (Our Author a little lower, § 16. handles the Question, Whether it is lawful to assassinate our Enemy?) We may also kill him wherever we find him, either in his own Territories or ours, in Places that belong to no Body, but not in Neutral States; for violent Means are not suffer'd in a Civil Government, where we ought to beg the Assistance of the Magistrate. Now if it is lawful to take away our Enemy's Life, much more may we wound, maim, or do him any Damage in his Person any other Way whatsoever. (See Grotius, Lib. III. Cap. 4.) But the Rights of War do not extend so far as to authorize the Outrages committed upon the Honour and Chastity of Women: For that contributes nothing towards our Defence or Security, or the maintaining our Rights, but only serves to satisfy the Brutality of the Soldiers. (Grotius, ibid. § 19.) Besides, when we can defend ourselves, or have Satisfaction for the Injury the Enemy has done us, without making a Slaughter, we ought to forbear it, and not shed human Blood unnecessarily. Neither must we directly and deliberately take away the Lives of Prisoners of War, nor of those that demand Quarter, and surrender themselves; much less of Children, Women, and old Men; and in general of all those who are neither of an Age nor Profession fit to bear Arms, or who have no other Share in the War than their being in the Country, or Party of the Enemy. (See Grotius, Lib. III. Cap. 11.) Secondly, in relation to the Enemy's Goods: It is plain that we may carry 'em off, ravage, spoil, or entirely destroy them, even without excepting sacred and religious Things, as they call 'em, that is, Things design'd for the Use of Religion: For those belong either to the State or the Sovereign, and they are not called sacred but on account of a certain Use to which they are applied. Those who believe that they contain something that is divine and invulnerable, do ill indeed to meddle with 'em at all, but it is only because they act against their own Conscience. (See Grotius, Lib. III. Cap. 5. and Mr. Buddeus's Dissertation, de jure belli circa res sacras among his Selecta juris N. & Genr.) However, of what Nature soever the Things belonging to the Enemy are, whether Sacred or Profane, we ought not to destroy or damage them but as it is necessary and conducive to the Design of the War, and the accelerating of Peace. To do evil to another, without a Prospect of doing ourselves any good by it, either directly or indirectly, would be a Madness equally foolish and criminal. There are but few, for Example, that are necessary after the taking of a Town, and ruining the Churches, Statures, and publick or private Buildings; but we should generally spare all these, as well as the Tombs and Sepulchres.

² To give a clear and distinct Idea of this Matter, something must here be said in general about Neutrality, of which our Author speaks no where. I shall here borrow pretty near what Mr. Buddeus says in his Elemens de la Philosophie Pratique, Part II. Cap. 5. Sect. 6. § 36, &c. There is a general Neutrality, and a particular Neutrality. The general Neutrality is, when without being in Alliance with either of the two Enemies engag'd in the War together, we are very ready to do equally to both the good Offices which every State is naturally bound to render to others. The particular Neutrality is, when we are particularly engaged to stand Neuter, by some Compact, either express or tacit. This last sort of Neutrality is either fully and entire, when we act equally in all Respects towards both Parties; or limited, as when we favour one Side more than the other, with regard to certain Things and Actions. We cannot lawfully force any one to enter into a particular Neutrality, because every one has the Liberty of making or not making Alliances and Treaties, or because at least they are not bound to do it but by Virtue of an imperfect Obligation. But he that undertakes a just War, may oblige other Nations to observe an exact and general Neutrality, that is to say, not to favour his Enemy more than himself. This then is, as it were, an Abstract of the Duties and Obligations of Neutral Nations. They are oblig'd equally to put in Practice towards both Parties that are at War together, the Laws of Nature, as well absolute as conditional, whether they impose a perfect Obligation, or only an imperfect one. If they do one of them any Office of Humanity, they must not refuse to it the other, unless there be some manifest Reason which engages them to do something for the one, that the other had besides no Right to demand. But they are not bound to do Offices of Humanity to one Party, when they expose themselves to great Dangers by refusing them to the other, who has as much Right to demand them. They ought not to furnish either of them with Things employ'd in exercising Acts of Hostility, unless they are empower'd by any particular Engagement: And as for those that are of no Use in War, if they supply one Side with them, they must also the other. They ought to use their best Endeavours to bring Matters to an Accommodation,

that

VIII. I come now to consider what Difficulties and Enquiries relate to Wars raised by Commonwealths and Civil Governors. And here it is first to be observed, that the Right of War, which always attends all Men in the State of Nature, is taken away from private Persons in Commonwealths; and that therefore in Civil States Subjects are not to punish such as injure them with their own Swords, and as they please; nor endeavour to recover their Rights, when denied them, by their own Force; but they must apply themselves to the Magistrates in such Cases, whose Duty it is to take care that their Wrongs be redress'd, Satisfaction be made for Damages sustained, Caution be given for the future, and that every Man be maintain'd in his own just Rights^a. For though at some Times, and in some Cases, private Subjects may be allowed Liberty to defend themselves with their own Strength; yet such a Liberty is by no Means to be called a Right of War. For a Right to make War implies a Power to begin it at my own Discretion, to continue it as long as I please, and to put an End to it by Compact with the Enemy: But Subjects are never to be permitted to defend themselves by their own Force, except in Dangers unavoidable², and then no longer, than till they have overcome them. And as no private Subject hath a Right of War; so neither is it necessary that Peace should be made by any Compact of the Subjects, when the Authority of the Sovereign hath sufficiently settled it before. Nay, though private Subjects be perfectly reconcil'd to one another, yet when all is over, the Magistrate may, if he please, punish the Injury, which first gave occasion to the Quarrel. But, it may indeed sometimes happen, that any private Subject may assume the same Right of Defence, which he would have had in a State of Nature; for Instance, if he happened to come into any Place which belongs to no Commonwealth, but continues in its primitive Liberty of Nature. But then in this Case it is to be considered, whether the Person be assaulted by his Fellow-Subject, or by a Stran- ger: For if we suppose by the first, he is allow'd the Use of his own Force to resist only the present Danger: But the further Punishment of the Injury must be referr'd to their common Sovereign; except it appears that the Person who makes the Assault, intends to return no more into his own Country, and hath left nothing behind him that can make Satisfaction for the Injury: But if a Man be assaulted in any such Place by a Foreigner, he hath Liberty, if he can prevail against him, to bring him to the last Extremities. And he may also enter an Action against him in the Commonwealth he is a Subject of, and there demand Satisfaction and Punishment, and make use of the Interposition of his own Commonwealth. And then if Justice be denied him, his own Commonwealth hath Right to demand Satisfaction for him in a Way of War. And therefore, if a Man be set upon in the open Seas, he need not give himself the Trouble to use all his Force; but only just so much as will resist present Danger, because when his Enemy comes back to his own Country, he may enter an Action against him there: But if a Man be assaulted by a Subject used to despise and defy the Authority of the Magistrate, or the Magistrate himself openly refuse to do Justice, he must right and defend himself as he can, whenever he goes out of the Dominions of his own Commonwealth. But if the Magistrate should excuse himself, by pleading the Iniquity of the Times, or the bad State of the Commonwealth, and desireth either that the Prosecution of the Cause should be deferr'd to some other Time, or that the Neglect of Justice should be thought pardonable in the present Unhappiness of the Commonwealth; every sensible and good Man ought to acquiesce in, and be satisfied with the Answer.

IX. War is commonly distinguished into solemn, and *less solemn*¹. In the first, it is necessary the War should commence and be directed by the supreme Authority on both Sides, and that it should be duly *proclaim'd*². The less solemn Wars, are those that are either not publicly declared, or

^a Vid. L. 50. t. 17. l. 176. D. de reg. juris, & L. 4. t. 2. D. Quod metus causa gestum erit, l. 11, 12, 13. & L. 43. t. 24. l. 7. §. 3. D. quod vi aut clam.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § VIII, IX.

that the injured Party may obtain Satisfaction, and that the War may be brought to a Conclusion: And if they are under any particular or private Engagement, they ought to execute it punctually. On the other Side, those who are at War, must exactly observe, towards neutral Nations, the Law of Sociability; and not suffer their Country to be ravaged or plunder'd. They may however, in a Case of great Necessity, make themselves Master of a Place situated in a Neutral Country; provided that as soon as the Danger is over, they restore it to the right Owner, and make him Satisfaction for the Damage he has received by it. See what our Author has said, B. II. c. 6. §. last, at the End; and Grotius, L. III. c. 1. §. 5. and c. 17. Moreover, as to what relates to the Question, whether we may hinder Neutral Nations from trading, during the War, with the Enemy; see a little Letter of our Author's, publish'd about three or four Years ago, in a Book printed at Hamburg, and intitled, Fo. Groningii Bibliotheca universalis Librorum Juridicorum, &c. p. 105. of the Treatises that are in the Beginning of it, and Bæcler's Dissertation, intitled, Quies in Turba, p. 1004. of the Collection of his Dissertations, printed in 1701.

¹ Nor only from private Persons in a Commonwealth, but even from a whole entire Body of People, that are under the Dominion of any other, or a Sovereign. However, the antient Kings of Persia did often permit their Subjects to war one with another. See Esther ix. 6, &c. and Mr. Le Clerc's Commentary upon it.

² See Græc. B. I. c. 3. §. 4.

² The Declaration of War, considered in itself, and independently of the particular Formalities of every People, does not simply belong to the Law of Nations, taking this Word in the Sense that Grotius and others give it, but to the Law of Nature. Indeed, Prudence and natural Equity, equally demand, that before we take up Arms against any one, we should try all amicable Ways, to avoid coming to such grievous Extremities. We ought then to summon him that has done us any Damage, to make us a speedy Satisfaction, to see if he will have regard to himself, and not put us to the hard Necessity of pursuing our Right by forcible Means. See Mr. Budden's Elements de Philosophie Pratique, Part. II. c. 5. §. 4, 8, 9. and his Dissertation, intitled, Jurisprud. Historica Specimen, §. 34. where it appears, that the Declaration of War has no Place but in Offensive Wars: For when we are actually attacked, that alone gives us Reason to believe, that the Enemy is absolutely resolv'd to enter into no Treaty of Accommodation. From thence it also follows, that we must not begin Acts of Hostilities immediately upon declaring War; but must stay till he from whom we received the Damage, plainly refuses to give us Satisfaction, and has put himself in a Condition to receive us with Bravery and Resolution: Otherwise the Declaration of War would be nothing but a vain Ceremony, without any Effect. See Grotius, L. III. c. 3. where all this Matter is treated of.

or else that are levied by, or against private Subjects. The first looks like an Incurtion or Depredation of Robbers: The second supposes that one Side or other is in Rebellion, or at least in such a Way of Life, as can at no Time make the War just. And thus Civil Wars may happen to be a Species of the less solemn, when the Commonwealth is so divided, that it doth not appear on which Side the Sovereign is engaged. And here it is observable with regard to solemn Wars, that Authors usually call two distinct People, their Generals and Governors concern'd in them, just Enemies, in Opposition to Robbers and Pyrates. So Cicero says^b, "A just Enemy is one that hath a Commonwealth, Courts of Justice, and publick Treasure under his Command. And besides also, the Consent and Agreement of his People, and Power, when Occasion offers itself, to make Peace, or enter into League." Though a Commonwealth is not therefore to be look'd upon as only a Confluence of Robbers, when it hath been publickly guilty of some unjust Things. Neither on the other hand, can a Company of Robbers assume to themselves the Honour of a Commonwealth, though perhaps there be some Appearance of Justice among them^c.

X. And here, upon what Grotius asserts, l. i. c. 3. §. 4. a Question is moved, Whether a Magistrate properly so call'd, as such, hath Power to make War? Which I think is to be denied. For since War is a Matter of that Nature and Consequence, that it may involve the whole Commonwealth in Danger, to give the Magistrate, as such, Power to declare and determine War by his own Authority, would be the same Thing with giving him the sovereign Power. It must be allowed indeed, that whatever Branch of publick Business the Sovereign entrusts with the Magistrate, he must be supposed to give him all the Power necessary to the due Discharge of his Duty in it. And therefore it is a Maxim of the Roman Law^d, "That every Magistrate that hath Jurisdiction, as such, hath a mix'd Authority, which mix'd Authority is defined by a moderate Power, to punish obstinate Offenders, as far as is necessary to support his Jurisdiction, and a due Administration of Justice." But when a Magistrate, who is entrusted with Jurisdiction, useth Force only to reduce a few disobedient Subjects, it is not to be supposed that he is making War; for a coercive Power over Subjects is not a Right of War: War seeming to lie entirely between Equals, or at least those that pretend themselves to be such. But if the Number of the Malecontents, or disaffected Persons grow so incurable, as to make it to be fear'd, that an Attempt to suppress them would endanger the Safety of the Commonwealth and the common Officers of Justice are too weak to reduce them, the Magistrate ought to expect the Resolutions of his Sovereign to direct him in his Proceedings in the Matter. And therefore Grotius is under a Mistake when he says, l. i. c. 2. §. 4. "That if we consider the Thing without Relation to the Civil Laws, every Magistrate as he ought to protect the People under his Charge, so if he be opposed by Force in the Exercise of his Authority, he hath a Right to make War." For the Defence and Protection of the People properly belongs to the Sovereign, and a Magistrate entrusted with Jurisdiction is only so far to defend them, as he is obliged to guard the Poor and Weak by Justice against the Oppressions of the Rich and Great. To which End there is no Necessity he should have a Right of making War. By the Way it may be observed, that though the Slaughter of above three thousand Men, at the Command of Moses, upon the Idolatri of the Golden Calf, may with more Propriety be call'd a Punishment than a War; yet that the Destruction of the Benjamites looks more like a Rout in War than Punishment, though Erasmus is of a different Opinion^e. And here it will not be improper to add something in general of the Power of military Magistrates, or of Generals and Leaders, to whose Conduct the War is entrusted by their Sovereign. A General therefore sent to take the Field with an unlimited Power, may use what Measures he thinks fit, either to disquiet and offend his Enemy, or defend himself; but as he is not impowered to levy any new War, so neither when War is begun, can he make Peace without the Authority of his Sovereign. But Generals confined by limited Commissions have, 'tis plain, no further Power than those give them. However so much Power every General, whether his Commission be unlimited, or not, may justly assume, as to use what Method he thinks best, to defend himself against the Enemy, when they have advanced too far to give him an Opportunity of making an honourable Retreat. And in such a Case as this only, what Tully saith ought to be allowed^f. "That in Affairs of such unexpected and straitning Circumstances, a Man should not think of itaying for the Instructions of the Senate, but be a Senate to himself, and do what he thinks will be best for the Advantage of the Commonwealth." But a Defence indeed doth not consist only in a brave Resistance, or in repelling or avoiding the Enemy's Attacks, but also in making an Affault upon him, and returning the same Treatment back. And therefore, for Example, an Admiral at Sea, who is by his Orders to be only on the defensive, may yet, notwithstanding such a Confinement, upon Provocation sufficient, break in upon the Enemy's Fleet, and sink and burn as many of their Ships as he can; all that he is forbidden, is to challenge the Enemy first, when they don't think of Fighting. And so a General at Land, though his Instructions be not to engage the Enemy, may yet, if he be attack'd in his Intrenchments, not only repulse them, when they would force his Camp, but make a Sally, and give them Battle; and

^a Vid. L. 50. t. 16. l. 118. D. de verb. signif. L. 49. t. 15. l. 21. §. 1. c. 1. 24. D. de captiv. &c.

^b Cic. Philip. 4. c. 6.

^c Vid. Grot. l. 3. c. 3. §. 2.

^d Vid. L. 48. t. 4. l. 3. D. ad L. Juliam Majest.

^e See Exod. xxxii. 27. &c. and Judges xix, xx.

^f Erasmus, Epist. l. 6. ep. 29.

^g Cic. Ep. ad Familiar. l. 10. c. 16.

Mr. BARB. NOTE on §. x.

^h V. D. L. 2. t. 1. De Jurisdictione, l. 3. V. etiam L. 1. t. 21. De officio ejus cui mandata est Jurisdictione, L. 5. §. 1;

and if he be set upon in his March, and finds he cannot make a safe and an honourable Retreat, he may justly venture a Fight. And therefore a Governor of a Province or Town, especially if he hath any good Number of Soldiers under his Command, ought to make the best Resistance he can, when he is invaded by an Enemy, without expecting Instructions from his Sovereign. But he is not to carry the War into a foreign Country, without express Commission. An inferior Commander, that is left in trust with a Body of Soldiers for the Defence of a Town, or Fort, is obliged to do the utmost he possibly can for its Security; and indeed, to hold out so long in Defence of it, till he sees the Place must inevitably be carried by Storm, and his Forces cut off. And therefore from what has been said, we may judge of the Action of Pinarius, mentioned in Livy, l. xxiv. c. 37. His Orders were to defend the Castle of Enna; and to deliver up the Keys of it to them of the Town, would have forfeited his Head; and therefore when he saw that both himself and Soldiers must necessarily have been left to the Mercy of the Enemy, and be put all to the Sword, unless he prevented it by suppressing the Insurrection that was forming in the Town against him, he did nothing beyond what the Powers he had would allow him, in putting the faithless Citizens to Death, except, perhaps, it was carrying his Severity too far without Necessity, after he knew the Danger was over. Neither can it be said that Pinarius rais'd a new War. For the publick War was at that Time carried on in Sicily, against the Carthaginians and their Allies, with whom they of Enna endeavoured to join. But whether particularly when a War is at an End, the same Arms may be turned against them that assisted the Enemy with Succours and Supplies, is more than a General hath Power to determine. But if a Governor of a Province, at a great Distance from the Metropolis of the Empire, be impowered to make War or Peace with his Neighbours; the Wars he undertakes must be looked upon to be solemn. Because he that gives another Power to do a Thing, must be supposed to be the Author of what he doth by Virtue of that Power. But if a Governor that hath no such Power, make War upon another, without Authority from his Sovereign, it is left to the Sovereign, whether he will own the Action of his Minister, or not. If he owns it, the War must be looked upon to be solemn. And this Ratification doth, as it were, reflect back an Authority upon the War, so that the whole Commonwealth is obliged by it. But if the Sovereign disown the Action of his Governor, the War must be looked upon to be a Sort of Robbery; and if the Governor be given up or punished at home, and Satisfaction be made for the Damages sustained, the Commonwealth is not engaged in, or obliged by the War. And this was the Reason why the Roman Ambassador demanded of the Carthaginians, Whether Hannibal laid Siege to Saguntum, by his own, or by the publick Authority? To which the Carthaginians rightly answered, "That the Question first to be determined was, whether the Siege of Saguntum was contrary to any Articles of League between them and the Romans? That before this was decided, the Romans had no Reason to enquire, whether a Subject of Carthage did any Thing by his own or publick Authority."

XI. It may be further enquired, whether a Prefect or Governor, that hath no general or particular Commission to warrant him, can justly make War upon a foreign State or Prince, only upon Presumption, or because he believes his Sovereign will approve his Action? Which in my Opinion must be denied. For it is not sufficient to know what it is probable his Sovereign would approve, if he were consulted in such a particular Posture of Affairs, but it should rather be considered, what it is probable he would desire should be done without his Advice, when the Matter will bear Time, and the Point is nice and difficult, if a Law were to be made upon it, where he must determine universally of all such Cases. And then no doubt it will appear, that it would be provided, that no Minister should undertake any Action in which the Commonwealth is nearly concern'd (such as a War is, and especially the offensive, which is the proper Subject of the present Enquiry, and which will generally well enough admit of Delays) without the Advice of his Sovereign. And therefore, though it should happen that the Sovereign should at the same Time think a War with a certain Enemy necessary, yet to be sure he cannot be pleas'd to see his Minister go beyond the Bounds of his Duty. Thus Cambyses put his Servants to Death that saved

^a As Marius made War upon the Galle-Graci. See Liv. l. 38. c. 45, &c. and l. 41. c. 7. and Florus, l. 2. c. 11.

^b Livy, l. 21. c. 18.

^c Vid. Xenophon Rer. Græc. l. 5. Where the Justice of the Action of Phabidas in seizing Caimea, is disputel.

MR. BARB. NOTE ON § XI.

¹ 'Tis Grotius's Decision, I. I. Cap. 3. §. 5. Num. 3. upon which Gronovius pretends that this great Man ought not absolutely to maintain the Negative, but to distinguish between Defensive and Offensive Wars: For, adds he, there is no doubt, but that a Governor of a Province, especially if he has any Forces ready in Pay, as it is the usual Custom in Frontier Provinces, may, without exceeding the Limits of his Power, oppose his Neighbours, upon their attacking him, and repel Force by Force, without staying for a particular Order from his Prince. For my Part, I cannot conceive, how it is that this Commentator has contriv'd it, that this Exception is not understood of itself? Tho' Grotius had not explain'd himself here; what he has said elsewhere of the Privileges of Necessity, would have been more than sufficient to have hindred us from attributing any other Thought to him. But is it not plainly expressed in the preceding Paragraph, Num. 3. Si ut præens sit periculum, ut tempus non seriat eum consuli qui supremum in civitate jus habeat: hic etiam Necessitas exceptionem porrigit? After which he instances in the Example of L. Pinarius, related by Gronovius himself, and by our Author also; and in the very Place in dispute; Sed hoc magis videndum, quod ille, ubi res moram fert. — se inconsulto cupiat fieri; which manifestly supposes, that when the Business admits of delay, we are not obliged to stay for our Master's Orders; and that in such a case it is reasonably to be presumed, that he leaves us at Liberty to act as we shall judge most proper. All the Difficulty that would here be in it, would be with Respect to the Application to particular Cases; as for Example, Gronovius defends against Grotius, the Judgment of Cicero, who in a Panegyrick on Octavius and Bru-tius, commends and extols them, for taking up Arms upon their own Authority against Mark Anthony. But I have no Design to engage my self in a Discussion of this Matter, which does not belong to my Subject in hand.

saved Craesus's Life, though at the same Time he was well enough pleas'd that they had spared him ⁴.

XII. But now, as Persons that live in a Liberty of Nature cannot justly be punished with War, unless the Injuries they themselves do to others deserve it; so how it comes to pass, that in a Civil State the Guilt of the Injuries, and the Cause that gives Birth to War, diffuse themselves from the Persons that were immediate Authors of them, over the whole Commonwealth, will be Matter of further Enquiry. This therefore is certain, that no Community, whether Civil or otherwise, is oblig'd by any Action of particular Members, without some culpable Act or Omission of its own. For how severely soever the Commonwealth may threaten, the Subjects are still left to their natural Liberty to do otherwise if they please: So that the Commonwealth can no way be responsible for the Actions of the particular Subjects ⁵. But among the several Ways, the Governors of Commonwealths are involv'd in Wars from the Injuries committed by their Subjects, these two, I think, will most deserve our Consideration, viz. Sufferance and Reception. As to the Matter of Sufferance, it is manifest, that the Person who knoweth the Commission of a Crime, and hath Power to hinder it, without apparent Danger of greater Evil by doing it, and is oblig'd to do it, must be supposed to be guilty of the Crime himself. For it is necessary the Knowledge of the Fact should be attended with Power to hinder it; one of these separately not being sufficient to communicate any Share in the Guilt ⁶. And the Governors of Commonwealths are presumed to know what their Subjects openly and frequently commit, and their Power to hinder it is always supposed, unless the Want of it be manifestly proved. "The Guilt of a Crime before it hath been judicially tried, remains upon them that committed it; but after Sentence is pass'd upon it, they are the Criminals that neglect to put the Law in Execution." The Case of Reception, and how far the Commonwealth gives Reason for War against itself, by receiving and defending Persons that have injured others, may be seen at large in Grotius, l. ii. c. 21. §. 3, 4, 5, 6.

XIII. The same Author also, l. iii. c. 3. give, us a full Account of the Nature of Reprisals, which are violent Executions made upon the Persons or Goods of the Subjects of a foreign Commonwealth, that refuseth to administer Justice ⁷. In Defence of the Equity of which I further add, that as it is a natural Consequence of the Combination of Men into Civil Bodies, that the Injuries which one Member suffers from a Foreigner, seem to affect the whole Commonwealth; so it doth not appear to be unjust, that every particular Subject should be oblig'd to assist the Discharge of the publick Debts: Since whatever they pay upon that Account, must be refunded to them by the Commonwealth. But if it should be any Man's Misfortune to be a Loser by the Publick, he must look upon it to be one of those Inconveniencies, that are almost unavoidable in a Civil State, and consider that these are very tolerable Evils in comparison of those, which he must have felt in a wild Liberty of Nature.

XIV. It is manifest that Men often make War, not only upon their own Accounts, but also for others ⁸. But to answer for the Justice of it, it will be necessary, first, that the Party who is assisted should have just Reasons for War. And secondly, that the Party that assists should be under some particular Ties and Obligations to him that is principally concern'd in the War; because otherwise it would be very unjust to assist one Man against another; since as they are Men they both equally deserve Favour ⁹. They therefore

⁴ Herodot. Thais, p. 112. Ed. H. Steph. Vid. Senec. de Ira, l. 1. c. 16. Concerning the Action of Piso, Pro-prator of Sicily, Livy, l. 44. c. 10.

⁵ Vid. Cret. l. 2. c. 21. §. 2. and the Example he there produceth out of Livy, l. 29. c. 16. l. 35. c. 31. l. 45. c. 23. Valerius Maximus, l. 6. c. 6. §. 3. 5.

⁶ Panvina & Receptus.

⁷ Vide L. 47. t. 6. l. 1. §. 1. D. si familia furtum fecerit.

⁸ Livius. Orat. advers. Leocratem, Polib. l. 4. c. 27. ab init. Gratianus, Caus. 1 & 3. distinct. 36.

⁹ Lucan. l. 4. ver. 707. &c.

Quis conferre duces meminit? Quis pendere causas?

Qua stetit inde saret; veluti fatalis arena

Muneribus, non ira vetus concurre cogit

Productos, odore pares.

The Cause belongs not to a General's Care,
Their's he thinks best for whom his Arms declare:
As when in bloody Shews upon the Stage
The Gladiators generally engage,
Not Malice, nor Revenge creates the Fight,
But rival Bravery, and equal Might.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. XIII, XIV.

⁷ This Definition of Reprisals is taken out of our Author's Abridgment, De Offic. Hom. & Civ. l. 2. c. 16. §. 10. For he contented himself here with referring to Grotius, l. 3. c. 2. To give a general Idea of the Matter, let us add some Remarks which Mr. Bullden makes in his Elem. Instit. Prat. Part II. cap. 5. §. 3, & 6, &c. Reprisals being a Sort of an Act of Hostility, or at least the Prelude and Forerunner of War, it is plain that no Body can lawfully use this Right but with the Approbation of the Sovereign, who, before his granting that Permission, ought nicely to examine whether the publick Interest of the State allows him to carry Matters to that Extremity. The Occasion on which we make use of Reprisals, must also be very clear, and the Thing in Dispute of great Consequence: For it would be equally imprudent and unjust to accuse a foreign Magistrate of Connivance, or a malicious Denial to do Justice in an obscure and litigious Affair, or in one of no Importance, or without having sufficient Proofs of the Insincerity of the Prince, to whom we have made our Application. But how just a Cause soever we may have to use Reprisals, we can never directly, for that single Reason alone, put those to Death whom we have seiz'd upon, but only secure 'em, and not use them ill till we have obtain'd Satisfaction: So that during all that Time they are in the Nature of Hostages. As for Goods seiz'd by Right of Reprisals, we must take care of them till the Time set for the Payment is expir'd; after which we may either adjudge them to the Creditor, or sell them to discharge the Debt, and return to him from whom they were taken the Overplus, deducting out of 'em all Charges and Expenses. But it is not lawful to make Reprisals, but with regard to Subjects properly so call'd, and their Goods; for as to Foreigners, who do but pass through a Country, or only come to make a short Stay in it, they have no such great Union with the State, of which they are only Members but for a Time, and in a very imperfect Manner, that we may indemnify ourselves by them, for a Loss we have receiv'd by any original and perpetual Subject, and by the Sovereigns refusing to do us Justice. We must farther except Ambassadors, who are sacred Persons, even in the Height of War. But as for Women, Ecclesiasticks, Men of Letters, &c. the Law of Nature gives 'em here no Privilege, unless they have otherwise got it by Virtue of some Treaty. ! See Grotius, B. 2. c. 25.

fore, whom we not only may, but are obliged to defend, are first of all our own Subjects. And that not only because they are, as it were, a Part of the Government, but because the End Men at first propos'd to themselves by giving up their natural Liberty, and submitting voluntarily to a Civil State, was the Enjoyment of such a Defence. So the Campanians thought, that by yielding themselves and all that they had to the Romans, they laid a Necessity upon them to arm in their Protection². Tho' in this Instance it may be observ'd, that since the Campanians had exasperated the Samnites, and rais'd an unjust War against them before, the Romans could not justly resolve to defend them, notwithstanding that they had yielded themselves to be their Subjects, till they had made Satisfaction for the Damages, and defray'd the Expences of the War. But in Defence of any particular Subject, the Government can then only justly make War, when it will be no great Inconvenience or Disadvantage to the Whole, or the Majority of the other Subjects, because the Government is obliged to have a greater Concern for the Whole than for a Part; and the greater the Part is, the nearer it approaches to the Whole. The next to Subjects, whom we are obliged to assist, are those Allies that have made this particular Condition and Article of League with us. But then all Allies are to give place to our own Subjects, when both cannot be assisted, and that without any Breach of the League: For no Commonwealth can be more obliged to a foreign State than to its own Subjects. And therefore in every Promise of Aid and Assistance the Commonwealth makes, this Limitation is implied, As far as is consistent with the Obligations owing to the Subject. And therefore it is very absurd to place any Confidence in a League, which is not the Interest of our Ally to observe. But as we ought not to undertake any rash or unjust War, so neither can we be obliged by any League to assist an Ally, that engages only in such. 'Tis true, this holds chiefly in offensive Wars, but it may also bear sometimes in the defensive: For if my Confederate is sensible that he is much weaker than his Enemy, and that his own Forces, and all I can supply him with, will not make him a Match for him, and yet is obstinately bent to hazard himself, tho' it be to his certain Ruin, when he may treat upon tolerably good Terms; I should be a mad Man to join myself with him in so extravagant and hopeless an Attempt. And thus far what Grotius saith³ is very true, "That we are not obliged to send Assistance, when there is no Hopes of Success; for Society is form'd for Good,

"and not Evil." But then it is also to be consider'd, that it would be to no Purpose to make Leagues, if we were to run no Hazard, or sustain no Losses in the Defence of an Ally. Next to our Allies are our Friends, or those we have join'd ourselves to by particular Ties of Kindness and Respect. To these, tho' we have not promis'd by express Article of Treaty, to send a certain determinate Aid or Supply, yet the Nature of Friendship itself supposeth an Interchange and Union of Faith, and that one Friend must be concern'd for the other's Safety, as far as the stricter Obligations he is under will suffer him; and that his Concern ought to be much stronger for him, than that which is due from one Man to another, by the common Affinity and publick Relations of Mankind; tho' sometimes those alone may be sufficient Motives to us to undertake the Defence of a Person manifestly injured and abus'd; especially since it may easily be made our own Interest to do it; and since nothing can tend more to promote publick Good than to punish those that take pleasure in disquieting and injuring others. And therefore Solon, upon this View, when he was asked, how there might be fewer Injuries committed in the World, answered, *If they that were not injured would be as much concerned as they that were*⁴. But then we are not to imagine that every Man, even they that live in the Liberty of Nature, hath a Right to correct and punish with War any Person that hath done another an Injury, barely upon Pretence that common Good requires, that such as oppress the Innocent ought not to escape Punishment, and that what toucheth one ought to affect all. For otherwise, since the Party we suppose to be unjustly invaded, is not deprived of the Liberty of using equal Force to repel his Enemy, whom he never injured; the Consequence then would be, that instead of one War, the World must suffer the Miseries of two. Besides, it is also contrary to the natural Equality of Mankind, for a Man to force himself upon the World for a Judge, and Decider of Controversies. Not to say what dangerous Abuses this Liberty might be perverted to, and that any Man might make War upon any Man upon such a Pretence. The Wrong therefore another Man suffers is not Reason sufficient to engage me in his Quarrel, unless he calls me particularly to his Assistance; so that whatever I undertake to do, is not to be charg'd upon me, but upon the Person that desires my Help. But whether it be lawful to take Arms in Defence of the Subjects of a foreign Commonwealth, against the Invasions and Oppressions of their Sovereign, is a Question; for the

Mr. BARE. NOTE on §. XIV.

² Livy, l. 7. c. 31. Florus, l. 1. c. 7.

³ Vide Grot. l. 2. c. 25. § 4. Mr. Buddeus (in his Dissertation de comparatione obligationum, quæ ex diversis hominum sensibus oriuntur, § 60.) says, That we ought to esteem those of the same Religion with us more than our Friends and Allies, or else put them in the same Rank at least. But he forgets not to observe at the same Time, § 62. that we must not think it lawful, under a Pretence of defending and favouring that Religion which we believe to be the true, to do every Thing against those of another Religion whatsoever; which is a detestable Maximæ, universally and justly blamed in the Conduct of Roman Catholics, but which, continues he, those who have the greatest Abhorrence of the Tyranny of the Roman Church, do not seem to be entirely out of Conceit with.

⁴ Plutarch on Solon, p. 88. D. Quintilian. Inst. Orat. l. 4. c. 1. p. 270. 'Tis natural for us to pity the Distressed: Æschylus Suppl. ver. 267, 268.

the Solution of which I refer you to the Opinion of Grotius *; the safest Answer that can be given to it seems to me to be this, That we cannot lawfully undertake to defend the Subjects of a foreign Commonwealth in any other Case, than when they themselves may lawfully take Arms to repress the insupportable Tyranny and Cruelties of their own Governors.

XV. Of the Declaration necessary to solemn War, Grotius largely informs us, l. iii. c. 3.

XVI. The same Author, l. iii. c. 4, &c. gives us a long Account of many Nations that never set Bounds to themselves in any of these Liberties which, as I said before, the Law of Nature allows against Enemies. But here it is to be observed, that tho' Generals usually give Laws to their Soldiers, prescribing how far they are to use Hostilities against the Enemy, and punish the Violation of them upon the Offenders; yet this is not done because they suppose the Enemy is or may be injured, but because it is necessary that the General's Orders should be obey'd, and that military Discipline should be strictly observ'd. So that tho' a Person, who in a solemn War had behav'd himself with greater Cruelty and Outrage than the Law of Nature will permit, should afterwards happen to be indicted or accused for it in any third Commonwealth unconcern'd in the War, it would be a very uncommon Way of Proceeding, should he be sentenced for a Russian or Murderer, and be used as such; because as it does not belong to the People of one Nation to enquire what others are guilty of abroad, so there seems to have been a tacit kind of Agreement of Nations, that one should not pass Judgment upon the Wars another engages in. For why should one at a Distance from the Dispute, and no Ally to either of the Parties engaged, give himself the Trouble of making another's Quarrel his own? Besides that, even in a just War, it must be allow'd difficult to know what are the just Measures of Self-Defence, in what Method to exact Satisfaction for Damages, and what Ways to take Caution for the future. So that in short, it is safer to leave these Things to the Consciences of the Parties engaged in the War, than to venture to give Sentence upon an Affair, the condemning of which may be of dangerous Consequence to ourselves; especially since the Parties at War themselves, by a tacit sort of Compact, agreed either to increase or abate the Heat of the War, as they please.

XVII. How far in particular it is usual to extend the Liberties of War upon the Persons of the Enemy, may be seen at large in the same Author, l. iii. c. 4.

XVIII. It may also in the next Place be particularly enquired, whether it be lawful to assassinate an Enemy? And here Grotius † thinks that there ought to be a Distinction made between Persons that violate their Faith, whether expressly or tacitly given, as Soldiers, Subjects, Vassals, Refugees, and Persons that were never bound by Faith. And that to employ the latter as Assassines is what no Law forbids †: But that to make use of them, who must by the Act be guilty of Falshood and Treason, is what the more civilized Part of Mankind always look upon as the greatest Infamy and Baseness; tho' against Rebels, Pyrates, and Highwaymen, the most scrupulous Princes never doubt to propose even Rewards to the Persons that can kill or apprehend them. Nor does any body blame the Conduct, or think the Measure hard, because these are known to be common Enemies, and lie under the publick Odium of all. The same Answer will serve that other general Question, Whether it be lawful to use any Man's Service promiscuously in War? Where we are to distinguish between them that betray or revolt from their Masters, and offer themselves voluntarily, and them that suffer themselves to be corrupted in their Faith by the Force of Rewards and Promises. By the common Practice of the World the former may lawfully be employ'd; but as Grotius thinks, l. iii. c. 1. § 21, 22. not the latter †; tho' I think it may very well bear Dispute. For supposing the Cause I engage in be just, I have a Right to divest my Enemy of all Forces and Succours, to make him as defenceless, and to give him all the Disturbance, and do him all the Damage as I can, which are the Things aim'd at in soliciting his Subjects to a Desertion. And I do not see any sufficient Reason why I may not pursue that End, by tempting my Enemy's Subjects with the Hope of Rewards, as well as any other Way; especially since it is on all Hands allow'd, that an Enemy's Subjects may be lawfully frighted by false Threats, and Shews of Fear to surrender themselves, and consequently to desert their Master: Which sort of Desertion is not wholly excusable, since it is known, that by the Laws military, they that suffer themselves to be imposed upon in that Manner, are as liable to Capital Punishment as they that are guilty of Perfidiousness and Disloyalty; for Cowardice and Credulity are as inconsistent with the Duty of a Soldier as Faithlessness and Treachery. And further, tho' Force is the most lawful, and the bravest Way of attacking an Enemy, yet this doth not make it unlawful to have Recourse to Fraud. And tho' these Deserters I speak of are certainly criminal themselves, yet there is no Reason why the Party that solicited them to a Desertion, should bear any Share in the Guilt of it: Because I don't see any Manner of Obligation why I should abridge myself of the Liberty of making use of the easiest Methods to obtain my Right, only because by doing so I may give them occasion to be guilty of Sin, who have already, by the Injuries they have done me, broken off all Communication of Right with me. And why may it not be lawful for me to win those with my Money, whom I might otherwise conquer with my Sword? Especially since after all the Propositions and Solicitations I can make to them, it is still left to their own Choice, whether they will look upon me for an Enemy, or buy my Favour by entering into my Service. But in Time of Peace there are these two Reasons why I ought not to importune another Man's Servant or Subject, unjustly to desert from his Master, and come over to me. First, because

* B. 2. c. 25. § 8.
† Mori, Utop. l. 2.

† L. 3. c. 4. § 18.
‡ Vid Quintil. Decl. 257.

because I have no lawful Power to intercept any Thing that belongs to another. And secondly, because I cannot justly punish, or do any harm to him, tho' he should refuse to desert, and make me his Master; both which are manifestly allowed me in the Case before us. As therefore the Propriety my Enemy hath to what he calls his own, is no Manner of Reason to me why I may not take it from him; so the Right he hath over his Subjects is so far insignificant with me, as I am under no Obligations to be in the least concerned, that he should always inviolably enjoy it. And therefore the Objection usually made against this Opinion, that a Man cannot incite another to do a Thing, which he must sin in doing, or that, that Man is guilty of Sin himself, who supplies another with a Cause or Occasion of Sin, seems to me to hold only between such as are not Enemies: For an Enemy, in respect to me, is in such a State, that as long as I am in Pursuit of my Right, and in Arms against him, I have no Reason to trouble myself whether he takes from thence an Occasion to sin, or not. And therefore, tho' perhaps my Promises or my Money may be really the Inducement to another to be false, and desert; yet in Reason, the Crime of Falseness and Perfidiousness cannot be charged upon me as my own, because for the present the State of War hath entirely broken off all Commerce and Communication of Right, between him and me; and he himself, as far as in him lay, gave me an unlimited infinite Power and Liberty against himself. And since it is not in the least unlawful to put an Enemy to the Sword, when the State and Posture of War requires it, I do not see why it should be thought criminal to offer him a Temptation that may possibly tempt him into Sin: For it is evidently a weak Argument, which some produce to the contrary, that Faith ought to be kept by Enemies; and that therefore an Enemy's Subjects are not to be seduced to Desertion. But after all, a Man should be cautious, that he don't set an Example to others, that one Time or other may be of dangerous Consequence to himself. And without Dispute, it is an Evidence of uncommon Greatness and Generosity of Spirit, when a Man hath it in his Power to refuse to make use of so easy a Way of Acquisition. Besides that, "It is certainly true^a, that a Man that "accepts the Service of a Traytor, tho' upon "the Heat of his Success, he may think himself "obliged by him; yet afterwards, when he reflects upon the Action, he will begin to suspect, "and then to fear, and so to hate the Traytor, "tho' he loved the Treason, because he knows "he hath had already sufficient Experience of "the Insincerity of his Faith^b."

XIX. How far the Liberties of War may be extended upon the Goods of an Enemy, and Things we call Sacred, we are inform'd by Grot. l. iii. c. 5.

XX. The Laws of Nature and Conscience in a just War, allow¹ a Man to make such Acquisitions out of what his Enemy possesseth, as will either restore him what was due to him, or give him an Equivalent to it² further, and all that, the Refusal of the Payment of which gave Birth to the War; and besides, to satisfy himself for the Charge he was at in recovering his Right by Force; and to all if there be any Thing else, which he thinks necessary to secure further to himself, and take by way of Caution from the Enemy. And therefore if a Man insults and oppresseth his Neighbours, upon the Confidence he reposeth in his Riches, when he happeneth to be over-power'd, it is but just he should be deprived of his superfluous Wealth, that for the future he may learn to be more quiet and peaceable. But by the Practice of the World, a Man makes himself absolute and perpetual Master and Proprietor of every Thing he takes from his Enemy in a solemn War, tho' much exceeding the Pretensions the War begun upon, Vid. Grot. l. iii. c. 6. § 1, 2. Where he also sheweth, when both Movables and Immoveables may be supposed to be taken³. Where it is to be observ'd, that the Right to Acquisitions of War is of Force only against any third disinterested Party. But to give the Conqueror a Right of Propriety, that will hold good against the Conquer'd, there must of Necessity be a Pacification and Agreement between both the Parties, otherwise the Right is supposed to continue still in the old Proprietor, and whenever he is strong enough, he may justly struggle to recover it.

XXI. It is also disputed, to whom the Acquisitions of solemn War belong, whether to the whole Body of the People, or to any particular Persons among the People, or to them that made the first Seizure? Which Controversy I think may thus in short be concluded. It is certain that the Right of War is lodg'd in the Sovereign, under which Right is comprized that other of arming the Subjects, of leading or sending them abroad upon Expeditions, as also the Right to raise Money upon them, and other Necessaries for War. But since Wars are undertaken either to recover the Rights or Dues of the private Subject, which the Enemy wilfully refuseth to pay, or else upon some publick Cause, which concerns the whole Commonwealth, it easily appeareth, that in the first Case, the principal Thing to be taken care of is, that the Persons, upon whose Wrongs the War began, may be restored to their Rights. And the Overplus in this Instance, and in Wars that begin from a more publick Cause, all that is taken is first acquired to the Sovereign, as to him that gives Authority to the War, whatever Hands it first fell into, whether the mercenary Soldiers or Subjects obliged to military Service upon Summons, without receiving Pay^c. But because War lies heavy upon the Subjects, whether they are only taxed to support it, or are obliged

^a Procop. Hist. Goth. l. 1. c. 8.

^b Vid. Valer. Max. l. 6. c. 5. § 7.

^c Ælian. V. Hist. l. 6. c. 6. The Spartan Soldiers were not allowed so much as the Spoils of the Enemy.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § XX, XXI.

¹ This is shewn above, in B. 4. c. 6. §. 14.

² Provided they are his: For it is not so with those Effects that are found in his Country, but belong to Strangers, with whom he is in Peace, unless they have sent them to him with a Design to assist him in the present War. As for the Cargo of Ships belonging to the Enemy, they are lawful Prize, as long as Strangers have not demanded and clearly justified what Effects might have been in them.

³ Vid. Grot. d. l. §. 3, 4.

^c See Grot. B. 3. c. 6. § 8, 9, &c.

liged to serve in it themselves, it is no more than a good Prince, that hath a Love for his Subjects, would yield to, that the Subjects should be allowed in Return to make some Advantage to themselves by the War; which may be done, either by assigning to them a certain Pay from the Publick when they go out upon any Expedition^a, or by sharing the Booty among them, or by giving every one leave to keep the Plunder he gets himself (as the Custom was among the Greeks, when they proclaim'd War, to declare at the same Time that every Man should have free Plunder^b) or else by giving the Booty to the Publick, in order to ease the Subjects of the Burden of the Taxes for the future. Mercenary Soldiers have no Right to any Thing but their Pay. What is given them above, that is Matter of Bounty, or perhaps Reward for their good Service, or Encouragement to their Valour: Grotius, in the Place above mention'd, is very large upon this Subject. But upon his Distinction of Acts of Hostility into publick and private Acts, which are undertaken only upon the Occasion of the publick War, it may be observ'd, that it may be very justly question'd, whether every Thing taken in War by private Hostilities, and by the Bravery of private Subjects, that have no Commission to warrant them, belongeth to them that take it. For this is also Part of the Right of War, to appoint what Persons are to act in a hostile Manner against the Enemy, and how far. And in Consequence, no private Person hath Power to make Devastations in an Enemy's Country, or to carry off Spoil or Plunder, without Permission from his Sovereign. And the Sovereign is to determine how far private Men, when they are permitted, are to use that Liberty of Plunder; and whether they are to be sole Proprietors in the Booty, or only to share a Part in it: So that all that a private Adventurer in War can pretend Right to, is no more than what his Sovereign will please to allow him. For to be a Soldier, and to act offensively in an hostile Manner, a Man must be commission'd by publick Authority. And therefore Cato us'd to say, that no Man had any Right to fight an Enemy that was not a Soldier.

XXII. As to the Acquisition of Things incorporeal, it is to be particularly observed, that they are never acquired but with the Subject they inhere in. The Subjects they inhere in, are either in Persons, or in Things. Thus for Instance, in Things, there are often certain peculiar Rights inherent in certain Lands, Rivers, Ports, Towns, and Countries; or rather the Persons that are the Proprietors of those Things, are invested with certain Rights over other Persons and Things. But here it is to be considered, whether this Right be annexed to this particular Thing, by personal Compact, or by real; or whether the Person that first united this Right to the Thing, agreed by Compact, that that Right should continue in the Proprietor of the Thing, whoever he might happen to be, or by what Title soever he came to the Possession of it; or whether he intended that the Right should be no longer valid, than certain Persons should possess the Thing by a certain Title. If the Right be annex'd to the Thing in this latter Method, it is manifest, that it is not every one that possesseth himself of the Thing by any Title whatever at Random, that hath Power to exercise that Right; but it must be considered, whether that Right ought to follow a Title of an Acquisition of War, by its first Institution. But those Rights which are immediately, and in themselves applied, and annex'd to Persons, relate either to other Persons or Things. The Rights which are annexed to Persons over other Persons, since they are not obtain'd but with the Consent of the Persons themselves (and this Consent doth not respect any Man promiscuously, but only some certain Men) cannot be supposed to be acquired with the Persons, tho' perhaps the Persons they were annex'd to, and lodg'd in, may fall into their Enemy's Power. Thus for Instance, tho' a Prince happen to be made Prisoner of War, his Enemies have not therefore acquired his Kingdom with him. And the taking an Husband or a Father, doth not give an Enemy Power over the Wife or Children^c. When indeed an Enemy hath taken the Wife and Husband together, he hath a Right over the captive Wife, but not because he took the Husband with her, but solely because he hath made her his Prisoner. Neither would he have had more or less Power or Right, whether he had taken her Husband at the same Time, or not. Neither doth the Conqueror acquire any Conjugal Power over the captive Wife, but barely such a Right as is usually acquired over Captives. As to the Rights that relate to Things, we must distinguish, whether the Person be a Member of a Commonwealth, or live out of Civil Government, in a State of Nature. If he liveth in a State of Nature, the Enemy that taketh the Person is supposed to have taken all the Things with him, or at least to have possess'd himself of Power to take them, because there is no Body to resist him, or that hath any Right to hinder him from seizing upon all he had. But in Commonwealths the Thing is not lost with the Person, but the Right of it devolves to other Persons of the same Commonwealth, or, upon Default of these, to the Publick. And therefore if a Subject of any Commonwealth be taken by an Enemy, his Goods that were not taken with him, are not acquir'd by his Conqueror, but fall to him that would have been his Heir at Law, if he had died a natural Death. But if the Enemy hath taken the Goods with his Person, that the Things taken are Prize of War, is Title enough to justify his Propriety in them, and it is perfectly needless for him to derive that Propriety from the Person of the last Possessor, whom he took with them. And so the Thing is the same, as far as concerns the Right of the Conqueror, to the Things he hath taken, whether he take the Proprietor with them, or not.

XXIII.

^a Vid. Liv. l. 4. c. 60. & l. 5. c. 4.^b Cic. Off. l. 1. c. 11. Add. Ziegler upon Grot. l. 3. c. 6. §. 12.^c Vid. Polyb. l. 4. c. 26, 36.^d Vid. Grot. d. l.

Mr. BARB. NOTE on § XXII.

^e See Grot. B. 3. c. 7. § 4. and c. 8. § 4.

XXIII. The fam'd Question once moved in the great Council of Greece may serve to illustrate what hath been said, which Quintilian says was occasion'd thus: When Alexander the Great took and destroyed the City of Thebes, he found an Instrument, in which it appear'd, that the Thebans had lent the Thessalians an hundred Talents. Alexander, because the Thessalians were in his Service, freely gave them up the Instrument. The Thebans, who afterwards were restored by Cassander, demanded the Debt. The Reasons the Thebans brought to justify their Demand, are to be seen in the same Place in Quintilian. To which the Thessalians might have answered, First, That what was taken away by just Force cannot be demanded again; that by the Custom of Nations, the Hostilities committed in solemn War are look'd upon to be just; and in consequence, the former Proprietor can have no Pretenſion left to any Thing that was taken from him, after a Peace is established. Secondly, That a Right of War is a valid Title, when a Thing comes to be disputed in the Civil Court: For after a War is ended, if any Controversy arises about any Thing I have taken in the War, 'tis enough to plead that I have a Title to it as Prize of War. Thirdly, That what is taken in a just War may very justly be retain'd in Peace, especially after the Articles of Peace are settled, and agreed upon on both Sides. For then every Thing is supposed to be left entirely to the Possessor, which he is not expressly obliged to restore by the Articles of Treaty. Fourthly, those Rights which are properly and ultimately founded in the Things themselves, may be acquired with the Person that is made Captive, supposing the Captive giveth his Consent to transfer them to me; which Consent I have Power to force him to by threatening him with some greater Evil. Wherefore as I can make over an Action of Debt to another Man, and the Effect will be, that the Debtor must be obliged to pay his Debt to him, as much as he was before to me; so if a Captive consent to make over his Action to me, what the Debtor owed before to my Captive, is now become due to me. And thus Alexander might, if he pleas'd, have made himself the Creditor in the Instance before us, though he had left the Theban Commonwealth standing, only by forcing them to transfer their Right to the Debt to him. And indeed, he must be supposed to have made himself such, since he made himself absolute Master of Thebes, without any Exception; and therefore had a Right either to demand the Debt of the Thessalians, or to forgive it them: Nay, he might immediately have forced the Thebans to remit the Debt. And therefore when Alexander gave up the Instrument of the Debt, to the Thessalians, it is not to be supposed, that he did it for fear the City of Thebes, which he had then laid in Ruins, might some Time or other afterwards demand the Debt of them, but to give them Assurance that he himself would never require any Thing of them upon that Account. Fifthly, it is absolutely false, that as long as there is any one Subject of a Commonwealth left alive, he must be supposed to be the Creditor of the whole Debt, and consequently that he hath the same Right the Commonwealth had to demand its Debts. For those particular Persons that outlive the utter Dissolution of the Body of the Commonwealth can have no manner of Pretenſion to assume to themselves the Right of the Commonwealth; since it is not to be supposed that they any longer constitute it. And it is manifest that Alexander totally dissolv'd and extirpated the Theban Commonwealth, so that they that escaped the general Destruction, could not be look'd upon to be a People. And they that afterwards re-established the Commonwealth of Thebes, were manifestly a new People. And tho' perhaps the ancient Thebans might have had certain peculiar Rights, yet these new Inhabitants could not pretend to assume the same to themselves, barely from the Place they liv'd in, unless they obtain'd them all anew: Which was not done with relation to the Thessalian Debt. Sixthly, the Thessalians did not take any unjust Methods to obtain the Instrument, but received it from one that voluntarily offer'd it to them, and who had Thebes, and all that belong'd to it, at Mercy, purely with intent to pardon them the Debt.

XXIV. Conquer'd Nations, as well as particular Persons, may be brought under Dominion; but that it be lawful, and oblige the Consciences of those who submit to it, it is requir'd, that the vanquish'd Promise expressly or tacitly to acknowledge the Conqueror for their Master, and that he for his Part will not treat 'em any longer as his Enemies.

XXV. I shall now briefly enquire how Things lost in War return to the ancient Proprietors and Masters. And here, in my Opinion, nothing can be more agreeable to natural Equity, than that such as have been made Prisoners of War, when they find Means to escape out of their Enemy's Reach, and are under no Obligations of Faith to them, and return to their own Country, should not only recover their former Quality and State in the Commonwealth, but be also restored to all their Rights, Goods, and Fortunes. But with respect to Things, whether they be Moveables or Immoveables, if while the War continues they are retaken from the Enemy, either by ourselves, by our Subjects, or by our Soldiers, it is just and reasonable, if they are to be distinguish'd, that they should be restor'd to the ancient Proprietors. For since the Commonwealth is engaged to defend and secure the Subjects as far as is possible, in their Goods and Properties, there must, it is evident, be the same Obligations upon the Publick to take care that what is taken from them be restored. And it is no Exception, that the Goods were recovered by the Soldiers: For Soldiers are only the Hands of the Commonwealth,

* Inst. Orat. l. 5. c. 10. § 37. 388. Mr. Titus, in his Observat in Compend. Lauterbach. Obs. 1438. and Franc. Kottoman's Quæstion. Illust. Quæst. V. 6.

Mr. BARB. NOTE on § XXIV.

† This Paragraph is taken out of our Author's Abridgment de Offic. Hom. & Civ. B. 2. c. 16. §. 14. See Græc. B. 3. c. 3. & 15. See above, in B. 7. c. 7. §. 3. 4.

monwealth, and what they win with their Swords, they acquire to the Commonwealth, and are not to make their own private Purchase. And since it would be Oppression and Injustice in the Commonwealth to recover those Goods only for itself, which the private Subjects lost in War, there can be no Way left but to return them to the antient Proprietors.¹ Thus in Homer 'tis said that the Booty was divided among them that had lost to the Enemy before. How the Roman Laws provided in such Cases, and especially with regard to the Postliminium, is with much Exactness explain'd by Grotius, l. iii. c. 9.

XXVI. A whole Nation, when it hath either by its own Strength, or by the Assistance of Friends and Allies, shaken off an Enemy's Yoke, without doubt recovereth its Liberty and antient State. And if any Part of what they were possess'd of remains still in the Enemy's Hands, they have just Pretextions to attempt to recover it, as long as a War is kept on Foot, and Peace is not yet concluded. But if a third Commonwealth rescue a Nation by a War, which was overpower'd and enslaved by Enemies, in its own Name, and for its own Advantage, the Nation only changeth its Master, but is as far from Liberty as ever. And we may say the same of a Part of any Nation. But if a Part of a People be recovered by the People they were for some Time divided or torn from, or by their Allies, they again incorporate with the old Body, and return to the Place and Rights they had before: Though perhaps, indeed, with an Ally it may be agreed, that he may keep what he won from the Enemy, tho' it before belonged to us. Demetrius, in Justin, when he lost his Kingdom, chose rather to yield it to Philip, than leave it to the Romans.² But though a Part of a People assert their own Liberty, and suppress their Enemies by their own Strength, they must return of Course to their antient Body, and must not pretend to erect a separate Commonwealth by themselves, when the old Commonwealth hath not quitted its Right to them, as a Part of its Body.

² Just. l. 29. c. 2.

Mr. BARB. NOTE on §. XXV.

¹ Vid. 1 Sam. xxx. 22. Exe. Homer. Iliad. l. 11. as also Mr. Buddens, in his Elemens de Philosophie Pratique, Part 2. Cap. 5. Sect. 6. § 9. to which we may add Mr. Lock's Principles thereupon, in his Treatise of Civil Government, Chap. 15. A Conqueror, says he, even in a just War, acquires no Power over those that have been the Companions of his Conquest. 'Tis only over those that have concurred or consented to the making an unjust War on him. The Power he acquires over those whom he subdues, is altogether despotick, with respect to their Lives, but not with respect to their Possessions. The Reason of this last Article, which at first seems to be a Paradox, is, because we may kill those who have taken up Arms unjustly, to take away their Lives, if they could have done it, that have conquer'd them: But that being only a personal Fault in those that made an unjust War, their Posterity ought not to feel the Effects of it. Now the same Thing would happen if we should seize upon all their Estates, designed for the Breeding up and Maintenance of their Children, which we should by that Means reduce to Beggary on account of their Fathers Crime. All that a Conqueror can do with Justice, is, to indemnify himself, if he has suffer'd any Loss. Thus the People, whose Predecessors and Country have been oppress'd by Force, have always a Right, according to Mr. Lock, to recover it, and to use the same Means to regain their Liberties. Indeed it would be absurd to say, that a Prince hath a Right to take all he can, and that after he has been in Possession of it for some Time, the People that shall be born in those conquer'd Countries in After-ages, are beforehand, by a divine Right, subject to his Dominion, and that these People may never attempt to take away from the Descendants what one of their Predecessors seized on by Force. "The Truth of it is (adds Mr. Le Clerc, of whom I have borrow'd this Abstract) there are great Difficulties in this Matter on account of the Misfortunes of Civil Wars, which we ought to endeavour to prevent as much as possibly we can. But since it seems that all the Right that we can establish in this Matter is grounded upon the Publick Good, which is the sovereign Law, we must consider whether what we are undertaking will in all Probability do more harm than good to the Government. If it be so, then what we do becomes unjust; but if the Good which accrues by it is much greater than the Evil, the Enterprize must be call'd just. Biblioth. Universal. Tom. 19. p. 586." See according to this Law de Postliminio, what Men acquire by their Return into their own Country, or that of their Friends and Allies (ex reditu in limen) Grotius, Lib. 3. cap. 9. and Mr. Buddens's Elem. Phil. Pract. Part. 2. cap. 5. Sect. 6. § 25. & seq. As to the Ideas of the Roman Law, we shall find several Remarks in Mr. Bynckerhoek's Observations, Lib. I. cap. 20. Lib. III. cap. 6.

C H A P. VII.

Of Compacts that relate to War.

The CONTENTS of every Paragraph of the Seventh Chapter.

- | | |
|---|--|
| I. The Division of Compacts that presuppose War.
 II. Compacts that have no Tendency to remove the War, whether valid.
 III. A Truce, what.
 IV. Of the Duration of Truces.
 V. A Truce leaves the Dispute, the War began upon, undecided.
 VI. No need of a new Declaration of War, when the Truce expires.
 VII. Truces contracted and made by express Compact.
 VIII. Of the Beginning and End of Truces. | IX. The Subject when obliged by Truces.
 X. What Liberties a Truce allows, and what forbids.
 XI. Whether a Man, taken in an Enemy's Country, and forcibly detained, may be kept Prisoner after the Truce is expired.
 XII. What ensues upon the Violation of the Truce.
 XIII. Of Compacts, that relate to safe Conduct.
 XIV. Of the Redemption of Captives.
 XV. Of the Compacts of Generals.
 XVI. Of the Compacts of private Persons in War. |
|---|--|

IT may now be proper to take a View of that Sort of publick Compacts, which presuppose a State of War. And these are of two Sorts: First, such as put an End to War. Secondly, such as do not put an End to it, but only, in some Respects, qualify and confine it. But before I consider these Compacts in particular, I shall first enquire in general, into the Validity of those of the latter Sort.

II. All Compacts therefore made with an Enemy, saith Grotius in general, ought to be observed, l. iii. c. 19. which indeed is true of Compacts that tend to Peace, but is I think liable to Dispute with Relation to such as leave us in a State of War, without a Design to remove it. For I question, whether it be a conclusive Argument, that because a certain particular Man understands what is done, and hath Power to give his Consent to it; therefore that from his Promise another Person may derive a Right, and he himself may contract on Obligation to the other. For a State of War, as such, hath no other Measure of Action but Force. The proper use of Faith is to advance Peace. And therefore it looks like an Absurdity to employ Faith without Thoughts of restoring or preferring Peace by it, and much more to make use of it, to protract and carry on War, rather than put an End to it. Besides, when I enter into Articles of Treaty, 'tis implied, that I desire the Person I treat with should believe me, and rely upon my Faith: But now it is a sort of a Contradiction, to require of him such a Dependence upon me; and yet at the same Time to profess, that I resolve to continue his Enemy, that is, to do him all the Mischief every Way I can. For a State of Hostility in itself gives a Man unlimited Liberty, to take all the Advantages he can against his Enemy. And it is a Contradiction to my Actions to make a Protestation not to use the Liberty of an Enemy, while I persist to continue in an absolute State of War. And therefore what I said before doth not extend to this Case; that such as enter into Compact with one another, do by that very Act renounce all Exceptions to one another's Persons, which may make them suspect one another to be false to their Faith. For where both Parties do seriously renounce all such Exceptions, they are already ceased to be Enemies: But where they openly profess that they intend to continue Hostilities; the Evidence of Fact confutes their Promises.

Mr. BARB. NOTE on §. II.

Notwithstanding whatever our Author here asserts, I am of Opinion that these Sorts of Compacts ought to be as religiously observed as any other. His Reasons prove nothing, because they prove too much. For in short, if the Law of Nature did not impose on us an indispensable Obligation of keeping whatever Contract we have voluntarily made with the Enemy during the War, if it was lawful, for Example, to break on purpose a solemn Truce, to detain without having any Reason for it, Persons to whom we had given Passports, &c. I do not see what Crime it would be to circumvent the Enemy even under a Pretence of negotiating Peace. When a Treaty is set on Foot for this last Design, we are notwithstanding Enemies; 'tis properly but a Sort of Truce, which we agree to, to see whether any Method of Accommodation can be found out. The Negotiations prove unsuccessful; it is not then a new War that we commence; since the Differences which occasioned our taking up Arms, are not yet adjusted; but only a Continuation of the Acts of Hostility that were suspended for some Time. Thus we could no more depend on the Enemy's Sincerity in the Business of Compacts which tend to the establishing of Peace, than with Respect to those which only relate to the moderating or Suspension of Acts of Hostility; and this would be a perpetual Source of Jealousies, which would occasion eternal Wars, and would create an invincible Obstacle to a Peace of any kind. All that our Author says then only proves, that we ought to be very cautious how we engage our Word to the Enemy; since Mankind are apt to break it for their own Interest, especially when they have to deal with People that wish them ill, or hate them. But from the very Moment that the Treaty is concluded, we must keep it exactly, till either the Time is expired, or the Enemy's Violation of the Engagement on his Side, dispenses with the observing ours any longer.

mises. And therefore a Man must rather suppose that they only design to impose upon and ensnare one another, and by making one another heedless and secure, to lay Trains for further Mischiefs; so when Narfetas, in Procopius, sent to ask Totilas, what Day he would set for Battle, his Answer was, After eight Days I'll meet you in the Field. Upon which, they that were sent returned and told their Master what was agreed to. But he suspecting some Falshood, put himself in a Readiness to give his Enemy Battle the next Day; and he proved not to be mistaken, for the next Morning, before Intelligence could be brought by the Scouts, Totilus was advanced and marching towards him with all the Body of his Army^a. But then, neither can the Person that happens to be surprized by such a Compact, claim any new Right against the Person that betrayed him by it; because the State of Hostility itself already gives him as much Liberty as he desires. If it be said, that such Compacts should be observed, for fear the Enemy, when he finds himself deluded, should be exasperated, and pursue the War with greater Rage and Obstinacy: I answer, that this Objection allows, that these Compacts are to be measured only by the Use and Advantage of them. And I confess it is true, that when the Time or Place for Battle is agreed upon with an Enemy, it is a sort of Injustice to fail in either, because the Revenge of it will generally recoil upon the Cruel and Faithless^b. We are not always obliged indeed to make use of the utmost Liberties of War; nay, it is often the greatest Glory to spare an Enemy, when it is in our Power to ruin and destroy him. But since War becomes lawful upon this Account, namely, when it is necessary, we should defend or assert our own Rights, where they are not to be obtained by peaceable Means, we ought to think that the shortest Way to the Attainment of that End is most agreeable to Nature. And therefore since by Compacts, that tend only to moderate and qualify Hostilities, the War is only drawn out into greater Length; 'tis evident they must be contrary to Nature^c. But however this be, it is a Custom which among others hath obtained in the more civiliz'd Part of the World (perhaps out of a particular Respect to military Bravery) that such Compacts should be looked upon to be valid, which were not intended to put an End to the State of War, but only to abate the Heat of it, and give the Parties engaged, Liberty to take Breath. Of this Sort are Truces for certain Days, and sometimes Hours to bury the Slain; the Agreements to grant Passage through one another's Guards^d; and sometimes that no Hostilities shall be used in certain Places, upon certain Persons and Things; that there shall be a Cessation of Arms at such a particular Time; that certain Weapons and Instruments of War shall not be made use of. Olearius relates^e, "that the Turks and Persians made " an Agreement, that the Merchants on both Sides should have free Exercise of Traffick and Commerce, and Liberty to pass to and fro unmolested; because it was the Interest of them both to continue their Trade with one another." For since Men, to gratify their Ambition and Avarice, will often raise Quarrels and foment Wars in the World; it may be thought absolutely necessary to the State of human Affairs, to make War a sort of Trade and Profession, and to form it into an Art; that so at least, the Injuries which the Innocent must suffer may be less insupportable, when the Liberties of the Sword and the Miseries natural to a State of War are more restrained. Besides, the Reputation of being false and treacherous, and of deluding others by Compacts, is generally of dangerous Consequence to Persons often engaged in Wars: Since no wise Man will be imposed upon more than once. But after all, a cautious Man can never lay any great Strefs upon such Compacts; because if he persuades himself into Security by them, he leaves himself open to the Attempts of his Enemy. And therefore he ought to be careful, how he agrees to any such without manifest Necessity, unless he is in a Capacity, upon any foul Play, to give himself Satisfaction, or hath other sufficient Caution to depend upon.

III. Among other Compacts, which do not put an End to the War, but only suspend the Effects of it, must be number'd Truces, which are Agreements to forbear Hostilities for a particular Time, the War still continuing. Which Definition is explained by Grotius, l. iii. c. 21. §. 1. For Truces are sometimes granted for several Years. But in that Place, it may be said in Excuse, for Varro and Paulus, that they had regard only to such Truces, as are usually made when the Armies on both Sides are in the Field and in Motion², which are generally limited to a few Days, and not to those which put a Stop to all Hostilities, and Preparations for War, and for the Time they last, are little different from an absolute Peace; particularly where any Clause is inserted in the Truce, that mentions any Conference to be formed in the mean Time, towards the settling a full and entire Peace. But it must be observed, that though Truces of this latter Sort do generally comprehend all the Territories and Dominions of both the Parties engaged in the War; yet it may be, and often is agreed, that the Truce shall be observed only in certain particular Places, and that the War may be carried on, as it was before, in others. For Instance, those Nations in Europe, that have Plantations in the East or West-Indies, may make a Truce, that shall be of Force only in Europe, and continue the War all the while in the Indies.

IV. But it is a Question, whether if Peace be limited to any determinate Time; for Instance, that it shall continue for twenty or forty Years, or the like, it should be look'd upon to be a Truce? Now I confess, that in my Opinion, every

^a Procopius Hist. Goth. l. 4.

^c Vid. Hobbes de Cive, c. 3. § 27.

^b Ambros. De Offic. l. 1. c. 29.

^d Itin. Per. c. 1. §. c. 20.

^e See Gre. B. 3. c. 21. §. 14. &c.

² V. D. L. 49. t. 15. De Captivis, & de Postulatis, &c. l. 19.

every Peace in its own Nature eternal, that is, whenever a Peace is concluded, both Parties agree never to take up Arms again upon that Controversy which first gave Birth to the War; but that the Dispute shall be absolutely silenced; or be referred to the Decision of Mediators, or be some other Way amicably composed. And the Perpetuity of such a Peace is not to be supposed to be interrupted, though a fresh War afterwards breaks out between the same Parties upon new Reasons, and different from the former. For it is not to be imagined, that a perpetual Peace obliges Men always tamely to submit to another's Injuries, without opposing him, or making Resistance. And therefore though the Word Peace may be used, yet if the particular Time be limited for its Continuance, so that the Dispute, upon which the War began, is not entirely at an End, it can amount to no more than a Truce; which as long as it continues, obliges them mutually to exercise the Offices of Peace. Thus the Lacedemonians^a are said to have made a Peace for fifty Years, but yet when the War broke out again six Years after, they were complained of only for Breach of Truce. But then, on the other hand, it may seem absurd to make a Truce, as Romulus did with the Vejentians, for an hundred Years^b. Though Dionysius Halicarnassensis, l. ii. calls it simply a League, because there can hardly be an Injury, but must be worn out of Memory, in so long a Course of Time; so that to defer the Revenge and Prosecution of it to another Age, seems unreasonable. Livy indeed says, l. vii. c. 20. That a Peace was granted to the Cerites, but that the Act of the Senate run only for an hundred Years Truce. But I am inclined to think, that the Design of that was, that the Senate might not seem to lessen their own Authority, by appearing easy in pardoning so sensible an Injury^c. Thus also Theodosius the Second made a Truce with the Persians for an hundred Years. And Diodorus Siculus, l. xii. c. 60. mentions a Peace made for an hundred Years, between the Ambraciotes, and the Acarmanians. And thus Ferdinand King of Spain, and Alphonfus the First of Portugal, agreed to a Peace for an hundred and one Years^d.

V. Since therefore, notwithstanding the Truce, a State of War continues; which could not be, unless the Preterensions were still kept on foot, and the Controversy the War began upon remained undecided; it is evident, that it would be absurd to desire to make only a Truce with an Enemy, and yet require him to give up all his Preterensions; for if this be done, an absolute Peace is concluded. And it would be unreasonable to desire to have Liberty to renew the War without Grounds, when such a particular Time is expired^e.

VI. And it is further evident from the Nature of Truces, that if after the Truce expires, Hostilities begin afresh, there is no need the War should be proclaim'd again. But yet, where the Truce is of long Date, and hath entirely put a Stop to the Progress and Appearance of War; and where there is any Clause in the Truce, that expressly mentions Conferences to be held in order to put an End to the Dispute; if it be not necessary, it is at least honourable, some Time before the Truce expires, to signify our Design to the Enemy, and to make such Overtures as may convince him, that we take no Delight in War, and that it is no Fault of ours, that the Peace is not concluded.

VII. It may also be further observed, that all Truces, which have any binding Force and Obligation in them, are contracted either by express Compact, or by Acts that bear such an Affinity to Friendship and Peace, as they can be referred to no other Cause. Though Treaties of Peace have not in themselves the Force of Truces, except it be expressly so agreed. And therefore an Enemy can have no good Reason to conclude, that because I forbear Hostilities for a little Time, therefore I consent to give him Truce. Neither can he charge me with Breach of tacit Faith, if after such Cessation of Arms, which he hath been so unhappy as to grow secure upon; I make a sudden Descent upon him, and surprize him. And in this Sense are those Authors to be explain'd, that give such accidental Intermissions of Hostilities without Compact, the Name of tacit Truces, as Justin and Livy frequently do^f; but which must be supposed to mean no more than that for such a Time the Enemy lay still, without offering any Action in the same Manner as is usual upon formal Agreements, or Truces.

VIII. As for the Time Truces are generally limited to, I refer you to Grotius in the Place before cited, §. 4. But I cannot by any Means allow what he there insists upon, that the Day from which the Measure of the Time is to commence, is not included within that Measure or Compass of Time, because (says he) the Force of the Preposition From implies Separation and Division, and not Union and Conjunction. For certainly the Beginning of any Thing is a Part of that which it begins. And therefore if, for Instance, it be agreed that there shall be a Truce for ten Days, from the First of July, I believe it would be difficult for any Man to interpret this otherwise, than to take in the first Day of that Month within the Compass of the Truce. Besides, it is not true that the Particle From hath always such a Force as to divide what it is joined with, from what follows it. For it often signifies a Beginning comprehended within that which it begins. Thus what Expressions are more common, than from Head to Foot, and from the Beginning to the End^g?

IX. When Truces begin more particularly to oblige the Subjects on both Sides, we may find in Grotius, in the Place before cited, §. 5.

X. What

^a Livy, l. i. c. 15.

^b Cicero de Unione Lusitan. l. i.

^c Vide Grotium, l. 3. c. 21. §. 3.

^d Vide Sozom. Hist. Eccles. l. 6. c. 4.

^e Vide Baudium de Inducibus belii Belgici, p. 128.

^f Vide Just. l. 6. c. 7. Livy, l. 2. c. 18. & c. 64. l. 23. c. 46.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. IV, VIII.

^g Justin. l. 3. c. 7.

^h This because the Latin Preposition à, which in this Place answers to our From, separates the two Words to which it relates, from what is between them; so that, according to Grotius, when we say from the First of June, to the First of August, these two Days must be

X. What Liberty a Truce allows, and what it forbids, Grotius also accounts for in the same Chapter, §. 9, &c. But here I confess I am of Opinion, that Acts barely defensive are lawful in Truces of any Sort; though perhaps Truce was desired and obtained upon some other Pretext. Thus for Instance, though Truce be granted only to bury the Slain, yet I should not think it unlawful to make use of it to retreat to a Place of better Defence, or to repair or raise a Fortification; or if a besieged Town request Truce only to defer the Affault, I should not question but that they meant also to take in fresh Supplies of Men and Provisions. And Grotius's Reason to the contrary, seems to me to have no Force in it, l. iii. c. 21. §. 10. that since the Truce makes for the Advantage of one Party, the other that granted it ought not to be prejudiced by it. For since Men cannot by any sort of Compact give up their Right of Self-Defence; the Party that granted such Truce can only charge the Fault upon his own Easiness and ill Conduct, that he did not take sufficient Care that the Enemy should have no Opportunity to reinforce himself^a. So Tisaphernes, in Xenophon, made Truce with Agefilus, but continued his Preparations for War all the Time. And I do not think that if he really signified his Circumstances to his Master the King of Persia, and had Leave from him to enter into Articles with the Lacedemonians, that he was guilty of Perjury only for arming, and putting himself in Readiness to expect any Event^b.

XI. When the Truce expires, Grotius says, that a Man taken in his Enemy's Territories, and forcibly stopped, may be detained Prisoner, l. 3. c. 21. §. 9.

XII. When either Party breaks Truce, the Party injured is at Liberty to renew the War without making a new Proclamation of it. Though if he thinks it convenient, he may forbear till the Truce expires. But if it happen'd to be agreed, that the Party that first broke Truce should be liable to pay a certain Sum of Money by way of Penalty; where the Money is demanded and paid accordingly, it is evident that there is no Pretext for War left. For the Reason why the Party pays the Money is, because he is willing to keep himself secure from War. But on the other hand, if the injured Party make War, he must be supposed to recede from his Right to the Penalty. Though it must certainly be contrary to the Agreement, to declare War immediately, and neglect the Penalty. For it is not usual in such Compacts, to leave it to Choice, whether the Penalty should be accepted, or the War renewed^c.

XIII. Compacts that relate to safe Conduct, that secure free Passage and Return through Places in an Enemy's Power, and how they are to be interpreted, are largely explained by Grotius, l. iii. c. 21. §. 11, 12. to whom I refer you.

XIV. Compacts relating to Redemption of Captives^d are allowed much Favour among Christians, especially when the Captives are detained in barbarous Countries; and even the Treasures and consecrated Vessels of the Church are sometimes justly given for Ransom^e. The Practice indeed of the old Romans is known to have been contrary^f: For when Hannibal permitted them to redeem their Captives, the Senate answered, That they that would be made Prisoners when they had Arms to defend them, were very unnecessary Subjects^g. And Plato^h determines, that in his Commonwealth, if a Soldier were made Prisoner, he should be left to the Enemy's Mercy, though they were willing to give him Liberty. Nor were they without Reason thus severe. For (as the Disclaimer says)ⁱ, 'The greatest Glory in War is "Victory; and next to Victory, the greatest is "to die for the Cause you engage in; there is "indeed a third Way too, but that a dishonour- "able one, which is to fly when there is no "Hopes of Conquest. But then it may be "said in Excuse for such a Person, that he re- "served himself for a second Trial, and that he "had still Courage to meet his Enemy once "more. But a Man that yields in the Heat of "Fight, that lays down his Arms, and tamely "submits to the Conqueror's Mercy, must for "ever be given for lost. For what Hope can "be entertained of a Person that had rather be a "Slave than free, and that makes Captivity his "Choice?" What is to be observed upon this Sort of Compacts may be seen in Grotius l. iii. c. 21. §. 23, &c. to the 28th Section. I shall only

^a Vide Xenophon. Orat. de Agefil. laudibus. Cornel. Nepos. Agefil. c. 2.

^b See Montaigne's Essays, l. 1. c. 6.

^c Vide L. 1. t. 2. l. 21. C. de S. Eccles. Gratian. Jus Canon. Cauf. 12. Quæst. 2. c. 13, 14, 15.

^d Livy, l. 22. c. 59, 61. Horat. Carm. L. 3. Od. 5. Silus Italicus, l. 10. ver. 654.

————— Noxam superaverat omnem,
Armatum potuisse capi —————

^e Eutrop. l. 3. c. 6.

^f De Republ. l. 5. p. 662. Ed. Wech.

^g Quintil. Declam. 339.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. VIII, XI, XIV.

be understood exclusively. But our Author says, that this Preposition also includes very often, the two Terms, as in the following usual Ways of speaking, a capite ad calcem; ab ovo ad mala. Besides, though the Generals of the two contending Armies ought to forbear all Acts of Hostilities from the very Moment of the Conclusion of the Truce; yet the Soldiers on both Sides are not bound to observe it, till it has been publicly proclaim'd in their Camp. But all Acts of Hostility, that may have been committed during that Time, are of no Force, so that we must indemnify those that have been Sufferers by them.

¹ Mr. Buddeus, in his Elem. Philosoph. Pract. Part 11. c. 5. Sect. 7. §. 16. is of Opinion, That it is the Part of Humanity to let those go who are seized as Prisoners in a Country, not through any Fault of theirs; since no Body is responsible for an Accident. I must add that there is a great Difference between those that are found in the Territories of another State, immediately after its declaring War against their Prince; and those who after Truce stay in the Enemy's Country, by an unforeseen Accident. There has been no Compact between the first, and the Prince in whose Territories they are; whereas the other demand nothing but what is manifestly pursuant to the Execution of the Treaty of Truce. For since, by virtue of that Engagement, we are obliged to grant them the full Liberty of going and coming during the whole Time of the Truce; we ought also to give them, in my Opinion, the same Permission, even after the Truce, if it plainly appears, that any violent Misfortune, or unexpected Accident has hindered them from making use of it, during the Time agreed upon: Otherwise, as these Sorts of Accidents may happen every Day, we should not be so earnest in stipulating such a Permission, which would hinder us from being always in fear of a Surprise, and would be as it were a Snare to make us fall into the Enemy's Hands.

² See Grotius in the Place above mentioned, §. 23, &c.

ly add this Story ^a out of the Life of Castriot; a young Man of the barbarous Nations, that happen'd to be made Prisoner, was presented to Musachius for his Share of the Booty; who agreed to give him his Liberty for two hundred Pieces in Gold. The young Man immediately took the Money out of his Pocket and offered to give it for his Ransom: But Musachius refused to accept it, or give him his Liberty, telling him that Money was his own before, when he became Master of his Person. But when the Case was brought before Castriot, he determined in favour of the young Man.

XV. Of Compacts of Generals of Armies, and what Observations may be made upon them; see Grotius. But to the eighth Section of it, I add, that Generals have Power only to grant Truces of shorter Date, and not such as withdraw all Appearance of War; for these are to be granted only by the sovereign Power.

XVI. Lastly, how far private Persons have Power to make Compacts with an Enemy, may be seen at large in the same Author, l. iii. c. 22. To which I add the Custom observed formerly between the English and Scots, with regard to Compacts of this kind. If any Person (says the Historian Buchanan, l. ix.) did not make his Appearance at the Day appointed, this was his Punishment: "In the publick Meetings upon the Borders between the two Nations (which usually were held in order to the recovering and restoring what had been lost on either Side in War) if any Person happened to complain of another's Falseness to him, he only carried publicly a Glove or Gantlet upon the Top of his Spear: And this they look'd upon to be the greatest Disgrace that could be inflicted. Nor was it usual for Persons that had thus violated their Faith, ever after to be receiv'd by Friends or Relations, or ever to be admitted to the Acquaintance or Conversation of Persons of Reputation or Quality." It was also a memorable Compact which happened to be made between a Roman and a Gotbick Soldier, mention'd by Procopius, when they were both fallen into the same Pit ^b, by which they promised to assist one another, and the Goths afterwards ratified their Agreement.

^a Vide Martinus Barletius de Vita Castriota, l. 7.

^b Procopius Hist. Goth. l. 2: c. 17.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. XV, XVI.

¹ The Sovereign is obliged to keep the Compacts which are made by his Generals, Commanders, and other Military Officers, when they contain nothing beyond the Power that their Posts, or the Extent of private Orders they were charged with give them, whether they are executed openly in the View of the whole World, or privately known to those with whom they treat. But if a Compact be made without Orders, and afterwards ratified by the Sovereign, by an express or tacit Consent; it is plain, that in that Case it ought to be kept the very same as if it had at first been made by his Authority. Nay, when an Officer has gone beyond his private Instructions, the Sovereign is no less obliged by such a Compact: Otherwise the Execution of all sorts of Treaties would or might be evaded. See Grotius L. 3. c. 22.

² These Sorts of Compacts ought not to pass for valid but when they are authorized by the express or tacit Consent of the Sovereign, or State; and in that Case, the Sovereign may force those that have made them, to keep them. Now the Laws and Orders of Sovereigns ought always to be explained, as enjoining and commanding nothing above human Capacities.

C H A P. VIII.

Of Compacts that restore Peace.

'The CONTENTS of every Paragraph of the Eighth Chapter.'

- | | |
|--|--|
| I. Whether Compacts of Peace are invalidated by an Exception of Fear. II. Whether a Peace made with Rebels is valid. III. How far, upon a Pacification, the Goods of private Subjects may be excused. IV. The Term limited for the Performance of the Conditions of Peace, to be strictly interpreted. | V. How if a Peace be referr'd to the Decision of the Sword. VI. An Hostage succeeding his Prince can be no longer detained. VII. Of the Mediators of Peace. |
|--|--|

I Should now consider that Sort of Compacts which entirely put an End to War; but Grotius is so large on this Subject, l. iii. c. 20. that all I can add upon it, will be only a few Things he happened to omit. The principal Doubt on this Head is, whether an Exception of Fear unjustly given is sufficient to disannul or rescind these Compacts? which Grotius, in the Case of a solemn War, denies, l. ii. c. 17. § 19. and l. iii. c. 19. § 11. because it is contrary to the common Practice of the Laws of Nations, and because it would be otherwise impossible to put an End to this sort of Wars, which are known to be very frequent, when it is the publick Interest of the World that it should be done. But it must be said, that the Extortions and Ravages of unjust War can never be retain'd or defended by Conscience. And as it is beyond Dispute, that an unjust Conqueror is obliged to make Restitution, so I cannot think it appears by any Law of Nations, that it is unlawful to plead an Exception of Fear against him. And though there were such a Law, yet I confess I do not apprehend what Injury it would be to the common Quiet and Security of Mankind, if no Notice is taken of it. For according to *Grotius*¹, whatever be the justifiable Cause of solemn War, the Effect of it is the Acquisition of the external Dominion, as he calls it, of what belongeth to the Enemy. If therefore the Vanquish'd return a solemn War upon his Conqueror, however he may have no other justifiable Reason for doing it, beside that of Fear; yet if he happeneth to be successful, he will not only recover what he himself lost before to his unjust Enemies, but possess himself also of what he can win from his Conqueror. And therefore a Man must be very impudent, that imagines to secure himself in the Possession of what he hath unjustly gotten, by the same Force and Violence that made him at first Master of it. And it is equally absurd in a Conqueror, after he hath forced the Vanquish'd to submit to hard Terms and Conditions of Peace, not to see them obey'd, while he hath him under his Reach, and at Mercy: But to content himself barely in the Agreement and Compact of the Vanquish'd, and then leave him in a Posture which may give him Power to turn the Game upon him^a. And therefore in Reality, the Case seems to be this, if a Prince be invaded with an unjust War, and after he hath offer'd peaceably to concert and compose the Difference, be forced to consent to rigorous Demands, and accept an hard Peace, he is under no Confinement from any Law, while the Peace continueth unsettled, not to object his Exceptions of Fear; or afterwards as he seeth Opportunity, to endeavour to give himself Satisfaction for the Injury. And so Polybius, l. iii. c. 30. pronounceth, that the Carthaginians had just Reasons for their declaring a second War against the Romans upon this Account, because while they were embroil'd in Troubles and Confusions at home, the Romans forced them to give up Sardinia, and extorted a vast Sum of Money from them. And therefore saith that Author, the Opportunity the Carthaginians took to revenge themselves, was of the same kind with that the Romans had taken to injure them. But the State and Decision of the Case will be different, if the Parties engaged in a War consent at first, as it were, to a Contract of Fortune; that is, if while the Reasons of War lie yet in Dispute, they reject all Terms of Accommodation, take Arms, and commit the Justice of their Pretensions, and the Pursuit of their Revenge, which might have been determined and ended by Treaty, or some other Way of Composition, to the Event of War. For in this Case, the Sword is evidently made Judge of the Dispute, and both Parties put the Controversy upon this Issue, either I will right myself, and redress the Injuries I have suffered, or will suffer more; and they that begin a War with such Resolutions as these, have no more Reason to complain of the Injustice done them, than a Man would have that is hired to fight a Duel, and happeneth to be wounded in it. And therefore where a Man pushes on the Contest to such Extremities, and then finds the Fate of the Day turn against him, he must be content to say as one of *Plautus's*² Sofia's did ^a Vid. Guicciardus. Hist. l. 16. sub. fin. & l. 17. sub. init.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. 1.

¹ Grotius only means by that a Right of Property allowable before an human Tribunal, so that no body can lawfully use Violence to dispossess us of what we have thus gotten, besides our dispensing with the Restitution of it, in our own Conscience. See B. 3. c. 7. §. 6. and c. 10. §. 5.

² Plaut. Amphitr. Act. 1. Scen. 1. ver. 240.

did to t'other, Well, do as you please, since you have the strongest Arm ^a.

II. It hath likewise been a Question variously disputed, whether the Commonwealth or Government is obliged to observe a Treaty or Peace made with rebellious Subjects? Grotius is very large in the Affirmative, l. iii. c. 19. § 6, &c. But in my Opinion, the Case in a shorter and clearer View is this: A Prince, that hath suppressed his rebellious Subjects, may deal with them as he sees best; but if he recovereth them by Compacts, the very Nature of such a Negotiation is an Evidence that he pardons the Crime. So that the Compact is not to be declared void, upon pretence of the Rebellion: But the Rebels are by that Accommodation restored and reunited to the Commonwealth, and are supposed to promise Obedience to it. And the Observation of those Compacts by the Commonwealth, the Rebels may well suppose to be the Condition of the Obedience they promise. So that in kingly Governments especially, such a Composition may sometimes obtain the Force of a Capitulation or fundamental Law. But as Gramondus observes, "When Subjects rebel purely that they may force their Prince to yield to their Demands, they certainly quit the only Bond of Security Subjects can have, their Allegiance to their Sovereign ^b."

III. What Power the Commonwealth hath to excuse the Goods of the private Subject upon a Pacification, must be discovered from the Nature of the transcendental Propriety ^c; upon the Force of which, the Goods and Fortunes of private Men, whatever Title purchased and possessed by, may be given up, whenever the Necessities of the State and publick Interest require it. But with this Consideration, that the State is obliged to make good such Losses to the Subject, out of the publick Revenues, either immediately, or at least as soon as it is able. But whether a particular Subject's Goods ought to be excused, or taken from him, must in a Monarchy be determined by the Prince. And the whole Body of the Subjects, upon his Command, is obliged to make Satisfaction to the Person that has sustain'd Loss upon the publick Account beyond his own Proportion. But the Foreigners, that are left to the Possession of such Goods, need not trouble themselves to enquire, whether it was for the Interest of the Commonwealth to part with them, or no. For the Act of the Prince is sufficient to give them a just and lawful Propriety, because of the Presumptions that attend the Actions of Princes, and because there could be no Way of negotiating with Foreigners, without admitting that Things are justly disposed, when managed under the Conduct of the Head of the Commonwealth. Besides, as the Laws of Society oblige the rest of the Subjects, to make good what hath been given up to the Enemy; so they seem to engage them also to the Relief of those Persons that have suffered Losses by the War; especially if it began without any particular Fault of theirs. Though it is too evident, that the unfortunate Subjects have hardly any where other Redress or Satisfaction, than to be told, that it was an unforeseen and unavoidable Calamity.

IV. If the Time be limited, in which the Conditions of Peace are to be performed ^d, it must be interpreted in the strictest Sense; so far as to exclude all Excuses for the least Delays, except such as are manifestly the Effects of Force and Necessity, and such as give no Jealousy of Design and Subterfuge. The Reason is plain; because a short Delay may make a strange Turn and Alteration of Affairs. If therefore either of the Parties should be indulged in deferring Performance of the Conditions, it would be easy for them to find Occasions to elude the Agreement. Besides that, it must be a vast Expence to a Prince to maintain a standing Army; as he must in Prudence be obliged to do, till the Articles of Peace are put in Execution.

V. Sometimes ^e the Peace and the Conditions of it, are left to be determin'd by a decisive Battle; in which sometimes only two particular Combatants for both Sides, and sometimes two, and sometimes three on each Side, and sometimes whole Armies engage. And here a difficult Question occurs; Whether the Fate of the Commonwealth may lawfully be committed to the Fortune of such a Fight? This seems indeed to be a Way to prevent a greater Effusion of Blood, and to reduce the Miseries and Calamities of War to a lesser Compass. But then on the other Side, it is more satisfactory, promiseth fairer, and looks like a better Venture to stand the Shock even of a bloody War, than to lose the Security and Liberty of the Commonwealth all at once in such an Engagement. Since, on the other hand, the War may be set on Foot again, and perhaps the Success of it be changed after two or three unhappy Encounters or Defeats. But indeed when there are no Hopes of making a good End of a War, tho' the whole Force of the Commonwealth should engage, if the Enemy will admit of it, the Dispute may justly be decided by some such Sort of Combat, as the least of two Evils. Nay, and where Princes themselves make War upon their own private Disputes, without any Respect to the Interests or Rights of the Commonwealth, the State may easily give them Leave to decide the Controversy between themselves by single Combat. And we have an Example of this Nature in Dionotus Siculus, l. iv. c. 60. ^f Though Princes ought not to

^a Vide L. 47. t. 10. l. 3. § 3. D. de Injuriis, & L. 9. t. 2. l. 7. § 4. D. ad L. Aquiliam.

^b Gramond. Hist. Gall. l. 2.

^c Circa condonanda Bona.

^d Dominium eminentis.

^e Vid. L. 17. t. 2. l. 52. § 4. D. pro Socio, & t. t. D. de lege Rhodiâ, de jactu, L. 14. t. 2.

^f Dionys. Halicarn. l. 3. p. 149, 150. Ed. Lips. When the Generals design only to assert their own Power and Authority, the single Combat between them is an honourable and necessary Way to end the Dispute; but when the Commonwealths themselves contend for Superiority, the Uncertainty of such a Trial, makes it mean as well as unsafe to venture it.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § III, IV, v.

¹ See Grot. B. 3. c. 20. § 7, 8, 9, 10.

² See Grotius, in the above cited Place, § 25.

³ Vid. Grot. ubi supra, § 42, &c. and Mr. Buddens's Dissertation, intitled Jurisprudentiæ Historiæ Specimen, § 21. to 30, exclusively. This Custom was so firmly establish'd among the Antients, that there have sometimes been Princes who have lost their Crown, and been forced to resign it to another, because they would not submit to it. 'Twas thus the Posterity of Theus lost the Kingdom of Athens. Conon. lib. 39. apud Phot. Cod. 186. See the Dissertation de Prætorio by Mr. Ferrizonius, p. 6, 7. Ed. 1696.

to proceed to such violent Methods, while the Matter in Dispute is doubtful and uncertain. But here it must be observed, that they that leave the Issue of the Controversy to the Event of Combat or Battle, may determine as they please of what themselves are possessed of, but cannot transfer or lose to others any of those Rights, which are not in their Power to dispose of. And therefore if a Prince set his Kingdom to Stake, except it be his in a patrimonial Right, it will signify nothing, unless he hath his People's, and their Consent for it, that have by Birth a Right of Succession. But farther, in such pitch'd Battles it often comes to a Dispute, on which Side the Victory lies. And here it is to be consider'd, that generally such Fights are decisive, and put an End to the Controversy they began upon. And therefore where two particular Combatants engage, the Victory must be declar'd for him that kills his Enemy, or at least that so weakens and disables him, as to force him to confess himself conquer'd, as Turnus, when he was wounded, doth in *Virgil*¹. Where a greater Number fight, that Side is victorious which destroys the Enemies, or puts them into such Disorder, that they are not able to make longer Resistance. But where the Quarrel is left to be disputed between two entire Armies, the Plunder of the Field, the Burying of the Slain, the Lodging upon the Place of Action, the Offering Battle a second Time, are not in themselves any Proof of Victory; since all these may happen when the Battle is fought with equal Bravery and equal Loss. But if other Circumstances concur, there may perhaps be Arguments enough to prove the Enemy fled. And certainly when an Enemy retreats, so far as to quit the Field after the Engagement, it is a just Suspicion that he is fled. But when neither Side can shew any good Arguments to prove a Victory, Matters continue in the Posture they were in before the War, and the Parties must either come to a new Tryal by the Sword, or end the Dispute by *Treaty*². Thus when the Dispute was between the Lacedemonians and Ar- gives about the Thyrcatick Lands, it was agreed in a general Assembly of the States of Greece, that the Controversy should be decided by Battle between a select Number of Subjects on both Sides, and that the Lands should fall to the Conquerors. The Lacedemonians pitch'd upon Othryades for their Part in the Engagement; and the Argives made choice of Thersander. Two of the Argive Party surviv'd the Fight, Agenor and Cronius, who came home and brought News of their own Victory to the State: But after the Battle had been some Time over, Othryades, with the little Life he had left, made a Shift to support himself with Pieces of broken Launces, took off the Shields from the dead Bodies, and erected a Trophy with them, leaving upon it an Inscription in his own Blood, To Jupiter, Guardian of Trophies. For my Part I should make no Doubt to pronounce the Victory for the *Argives*³.

VI. As to *Hostages*¹ given for the Ratification of the Peace, besides what we find in *Grotius*², it may be further observ'd, that if the Hostage happeneth to be the Prince's Heir and Successor that giveth him up, when that Prince dies, he is no longer to be detain'd as an Hostage, though the League doth not expire at his Death. For this Case is supposed to be tacitly excepted; that he should be no longer an Hostage, when he succeeds himself in the room of the Principal: But then he is obliged to substitute another in his stead, whenever it is demanded.

VII. There is also another Way of securing Peace; and that is, when others, and especially such as interposed as Guarantees and Mediators of the Peace, engage their Faith, that the Articles shall be observ'd on both Sides; which Engagement of theirs implies a sort of Agreement, by which they oblige themselves to assist the Party invaded contrary to Treaty, against the injurious *Aggressor*³. But the Guarantees are not obliged to send Aids to any War that begins upon other Reasons, than the Violation of the Articles of Peace.

¹ Vid. Plut. in Parallis Herod. Clio.

² Vid. Diod. Sicul. l. 4. c. 55.

³ Vid. Jo. Meurf. Miscell. Lacon. l. 4. c. 14.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. v, vi.

¹ Virg. Æn. 12. ver. 931, &c.

² See Grotius, B. 3. c. 20. § 52, &c.

³ See the Second Chapter of this Book, Sect. the last.

C H A P. IX.

Of LEAGUES.

The CONTENTS of every Paragraph of the Ninth Chapter.

- | | |
|---|---|
| i. The Division of Leagues.
 II. Leagues that establish nothing but what was due by the Laws of Nature.
 III. Equal Leagues, which and what Sorts of them.
 IV. Of unequal Leagues.
 v. Of two Confederates, which a third ought to assist.
 VI. Leagues Real or Personal.
 VII. Which may be distinguished either by particular,
 VIII. Or general Marks. | IX. Whether exil'd and deposed Princes can have the Benefit of their Leagues.
 x. Future Allies, whether comprehended under the Name of Allies in general.
 XI. Leagues not to be supposed to be tacitly renewed.
 XII. What Obligations lie upon the Engagers, when their Engagements are not own'd and confirm'd.
 XIII. An Engagement, whether ratified by the Silence of the Sovereign. |
|---|---|

I Shall in the next Place consider that *Species of publick Compact*¹, which is usually called *Leagues*². Pliny in his Natural History, l. vii. c. 56. gives Theseus the Honour of being the first that made or us'd them; which is not to be allowed, in any other Sense, than that perhaps he might be the first in Greece that enter'd into League, or that perhaps annex'd certain Rights and Solemnities to be observed at the making of them. The most proper Division of them arises from the Matter of them; and from thence they may be divided, first, into Leagues that constitute what was an Obligation of the Law of Nature before. Secondly, into Leagues that superadd some Particulars to the Duties of natural Law; or at least, that, where these are too general and indefinite, restrain them to certain and particular Articles.

II. Under the first Head may be rank'd all *Leagues*³, that provide barely for the Exercise of Civility and Humanity, or to prevent Injuries on either Hand; see Genes. xxi. 23. And in the League the Lacedemonians made with the King of Persia there was this Article⁴, Whatever Towns and Countries the King is at present in possession of, and were before in the Possession of his Predecessors, shall continue in Subjection to him. And no Lacedemonian, or Ally to the Lacedemonians, shall make War upon them, or injure them any other Way, or demand Tribute from them upon any Pretence whatsoever. The King shall have the entire free Rule in his own Dominions. But perhaps it may be thought, that by this Article the Lacedemonians renounced all Claims and Pretensions whatever, in Asia: For Asia was the King's, notwithstanding the Lace- demonian League. And 'tis essential to all Propriety, both that what is mine should be free from the Invasions of other Men, and that I should have Liberty to do with it as I please. With this League may be compar'd the Treaty of Peace between the Athenians and the Persians, Diod. Sicul. l. xii. c. 4. 'Tis certain the Athenians look'd upon such Leagues to be necessary especially between Nations that never had Intercourse with one another before. And no wonder, since the greatest Part of the World had lost the Sense of that Law of Nature, that there was a Sort of natural Kindred between Men; and therefore that it was highly criminal for them to injure one another without Grounds of Provocation. Nay, so far was this Truth unknown to them, that the common Opinion was, that Offices of Humanity were due only to Fellow-Subjects; that all Strangers and Foreigners were Enemies, and might lawfully be treated as such upon any Prospect of *Advantage*⁵. However, at this Time of Day, when all Nations almost know more of the Law of Nature, are more strict in the Observation of it, and more polished in their Manners, such Leagues may be supposed absolutely unnecessary⁶; unless, perhaps it be allowed (as it is between particular Men) that when the first Advances are made towards Acquaintance, good Breeding should make the Preliminaries to Friendship a little ceremonious and solemn. As Cicero says in his *Epistles*⁷, "In every new Acquaintance it must be considered, what are the first Steps to be made, and by what Recommendation the Passage is to be opened to Friendship." In any other Respect, 'tis a Scandal to human Nature that any Civil People should

¹ Thucyd. l. 8. c. 18. Ed. Oxon.

² V. Grot. l. 2. c. 15. § 6.

³ Cic. Ep. ad Fam. l. 13. Ep. 10.

Mr. BARB. NOTE on Chap. IX. §. 1, II.

⁴ See Grot. B. 2. c. 15. § 1, &c.

⁵ I could not find a more proper Word to express the Latin Term Fœdera by. Treaties would have been too general; for 'tis plain that the Author here excludes all Compacts made during the War, whether to moderate or suspend Acts of Hostility, or barely to treat of Peace, having already treated of 'em in the preceding Chapters. Besides, he says himself in this very Chapter, § 3. Utraque Fœdera iniri potissimum solent OB ALIQUAM SOCIETATEM contrahendam. &c. so that the Word League may not be very improper here, though it is generally restrained to Treaties, by which several Princes or States unite, confederate, or league together, to defend each other, or in Conjunction to attack the common Enemy.

⁶ Utd. Grot. ubi supra. § 5.

⁷ See above in B. 2. c. 2. § 11.

should enter into any Treaty, the Articles of which have no further Intent, than to provide that the Law of Nature should not simply and directly be broken; as if a Man could not have a proper Sense of his Duty, unless he bound himself under such an Obligation. Such Leagues indeed are commonly called no more than Treaties of Friendship; but certainly the strict proper Notion of Friendship also includes much more than the common Offices of Humanity. For tho' the Actions due to Friendship are not so determinate, as those due by Compact; yet in general, every Man will allow that it is the Duty of one Friend to impart himself and his Fortunes to the Relief of the other, to provide for his Happiness and Security, to assist him with Advice, support him with Counsel and Comfort, to protect him, as far as he has Power, from Evils and Dangers which threaten him; and that all this is to be done with greater Intensity of Passion, than common Offices of Humanity pay'd to other Men indifferently require. Further, under this Head Grotius reduces all Leagues made for the Establishment of mutual Correspondence and Hospitality, and of the Trade and Commerce, as far as due by Right of Nature. But that all are not properly Allies and Confederates, who have made an Agreement barely to observe common Duties of Humanity, may appear from Livy, l. xli. c. 24. Where the Achaians, upon Displeasure conceived against King Perseus, forbid the Macedonians their Country. Whereupon Macedonia became the Refuge to all their fugitive Slaves, the Achaians not daring to attempt to recover them by pursuing them thither. But Perseus, to regain their good Opinion, promised them, that if they would take off the Prohibition of Intercourse between Macedonia and Achaia, he would send them back their Slaves. Upon which the Matter was debated in the Meeting of the States of Achaia. Callicrates opposed their gratifying the King, for fear of giving Umbrage to the Romans; and on the other hand, Arco contended that notwithstanding their League with the Romans, they might safely accept the King's Offer, and satisfy his Desire, urging, that the Thing in Debate was not, whether they should enter into any new Alliance or Confederacy; but only whether they would give and take the Liberty of Trade; to let their Country be open to the Macedonians, that they might have free Passage into theirs, and that their Slaves might not be out of Reach, when they fled thither. And that all this was not inconsistent with their Alliance with the Romans, since that did not oblige them to act particularly against Perseus.

III. Secondly, Leagues which superadd to the Duties Men owe one to another by the Law of Nature are of two Sorts, some Equal, others Unequal. The first are such as are alike on both Sides¹; or, when not only the Engagements and Promises are either simply, or, in proportion to the Strength of either Party, on both Sides equal; but also when the Manner of passing them is equal, so that neither of the Parties is obliged to harder Conditions, or left any Way obnoxious to the other.

The Unequal I shall consider by and by. *Isocrates*² distinguishes after the same Manner, "That Covenants or Leagues are equal, when the same equal Right is divided to both Parties; and that that is a Command or unequal League, when one hath harder Terms than the other (for I see no Necessity of adding contrary to Justice.) The End of both Sorts is chiefly the Advancement of Society. And this Society either relates to Commerce, or to Community of War; or to mutual Promises of Aid and Supplies in Wars offensive and defensive; or in short, to any other Matter. Equal Leagues relating to Commerce, may be various. For Example, suppose it be agreed that none of the Subjects of the confederate Commonwealths shall be obliged in any of the Ports, or any other Parts of the Territories belonging to one another, to pay Custom or Toll; or not more than is paid at present; or not above a certain Rate or Quantity; or not more than Subjects, or other Allies pay; and the like. Equal Leagues relating to a Community of War are settled thus; when, for Example, it is agreed, that both the Confederates shall furnish out an equal Aid of Mens and Ships, and other Necessaries for War; and that, either both, when either of the Confederates is invaded by Enemies, or make War upon others, or only when either Party is invaded. Sometimes Aids and Supplies are promised only for a particular War, or against a particular Enemy, or against all Enemies in general, excepting only the particular Allies of each Confederate. Lastly, Leagues about any other Matter are equal, when it is agreed, that one shall have no Forts upon the other's Coast; that one shall not defend the other's Subjects, or receive them into Protection, but apprehend and send them back to the other; that one shall not give the other's Enemies Passage through his Country, and the like.

IV. Having thus explained the equal Leagues, it will be easy to understand what are the unequal. And these are when either the Promises are unequal; or when either of the Parties is obliged to harder Conditions. The Promises may be unequal, either with regard to the superior, or inferior Confederate. The first happens when the more powerful Confederate promises his Assistance to the other, without requiring the like; or when the Aids he promises, are greater than what the other promiseth; or when the other is not bound to bring proportionate Aids. The latter happens when the inferior Confederate is obliged to Conditions of larger Extent than the other. Some of this sort of Leagues include a Diminution of the sovereign Power. Of this Nature was the League between the Romans and Carthaginians, in the End of the second Punic War; by an Article of which the Carthaginians were not to begin any War without Leave from the People of Rome. And thus Armenia Major received its Kings from Rome, though, it paid no Tribute to the *Romans*³. On the other hand, those Leagues are no Diminution to the sovereign Power, which include only a transient Burthen; or one which may be complied with once and for all. For Instance

¹ Vid. Supra, l. 3. c. 3. §. 9, 11, 12.

² Appianus Alexand. Praefat. p. 2. A. Ed. H. Steph. Vid. Procep. Hist. Gothic. l. 1. c. 6. The Agreement Peter made with Theodasius, concerning Sicily.

³ Onus transitorium.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. III, IV.

¹ See Crot. B. 2. c. 15. §. 6.

² Joc. Panegyri. p. 132.

³ Vid. Grot. ubi supra. §. 7.

⁴ V. T. Liv. l. 30. c. 37.

stance, if when a Peace is concluded, one Party is obliged to pay the other's Army; to defray the Charges of the War; or to pay a Sum of Money by way of Mulct; or when either Party is obliged to dismantle Towns, demolish his Forts, evacuate certain Place, remove from certain Countries, give Hostages, deliver up Ships, and Arms, and the like. Thus in the Articles of Treaty, which Por-senna allowed the Romans upon their Exclusion of the Kings, it was particularly mentioned, that they should have no Instruments of Iron for any Use, but in Husbandry ^a. And here, by the way, the Story which Procopius relates in the fourth Book of his History of the Goths, may perhaps deserve Observation. "When the Truce was made between Justinian and Cosroes, by the Conditions of it, Justinian was to pay two thousand Libre of Gold; whereupon Isliaganus the Persian Ambassador demanded immediate Payment; but Justinian proposed rather to pay every Year four hundred, thinking by that Means to lay the stronger Obligations upon Cosroes not to break the Truce. But the Romans complied at last, and paid the entire Sum, for a yearly Payment might look like Tribute. So common (saith the Historian) it is for a Man to be more afraid of a dishonourable Name, than dishonourable Actions. But here it may be ask'd, whether such unequal Leagues, as are attended with permanent and perpetual Burthens, do always and in themselves lessen and impair the sovereign Power? Or, whether an unequal Confederate may be supposed to retain his Sovereign? Now permanent and perpetual Burthens are such as these; when the one is obliged to have the same Allies with the other, and not on the contrary; when one Party is obliged not to build Forts in such particular Places, not to levy Forces, or raise an Army (and this was one of the Conditions of the League between the Romans and the Latines, that the Latines should make no Levies of Men, nor set any Officers of their own over them, or send them out upon any Expedition. The necessary Consequence of which was, that the Romans pass'd the Decrees of War or Peace, and that the Allies were Partners only in the Toil, while they took the Conduct themselves, and enjoyed the Honour and the Benefit of the Victory ^b) that one shall not have above a certain Number of Ships, shall not build new Cities, set out Fleets to Sea, raise Soldiers in such particular Places, and the like; but especially when one of the Confederates is obliged to pay a Deference and Submission to the other; or, what is the same Thing, to acknowledge him superior in Dignity, and to express a Reverence to him in all his Actions ^c. Thus the Athenians allowed their Allies their separate Liberties, and erected a popular Form of Government among them; but reserved Superintendence and supreme Direction of Affairs to themselves. Grotius answers this Question, l. i. c. 3. §. 21. out of l. xlix. t. 15. l. 7. §. 1. D. de Captivis, &c. But the Difficulty lies in the following Words of the Civilian, At sunt apud nos rei ex civitatibus federatis, & in eos damnatos animadvertimus. But the Subjects of our Confederates are brought to Trial before us; and we pass Sentence, and punish them. For this certainly implies Subjection, when another hath a Right to summon our Subjects to appear and stand their Trials in his Courts, and to punish them according to Sentence given. The Story of Decius Magius, in Livy, is an Instance of this ^d. But particularly, that which Pausanias relates ^e. When upon the Motion and Instance of Callicrates, the Roman Legate charged the greatest Men among the Athenians with being in Perseus's Interest; Xenion, who was one of them, upon Confidence of his Innocence in that Matter, answered, that he did not doubt but he could clear himself of that Charge, even before the Roman Senate itself; which the Legate immediately took the Advantage of, as if he had appeal'd to Rome; and thereupon he and several others were sent to Rome. And yet Polybius informs us, speaking of those that were sent thither, that the Senate did not think that it belonged to them to bring them to a Trial. And therefore, the Answer to the Difficulty mentioned is easy, that the former Part of the Words must be understood of the primitive Times of the Roman Commonwealth, when they were strict in their Observance of the Laws of Confederacy, and used to make a Distinction in their Carriage and Treatment, between such as voluntarily enter'd into an Alliance with them, and such as their Arms had conquer'd. And this Cicero confesses, that the old Romans thought themselves obliged to protect their Allies, and never assumed the Command over them ^f. And Scipio made it a particular Part of their Commendation, that the Romans did not confine the foreign Nations to their Interest by Severity and Servitude, but by the Ties of Friendship and Alliance. But the latter Words refer us to After-ages, when the Respect and Reverence they had to their old Confederacies ran low, and their Allies as well as the conquer'd Nations were reduced to equal Terms of Slavery ^g. So Sylla forced all the Roman Allies, that had been free till his Time, to pay Tribute. At which Time it was also common to bring the Subjects of the confederate States to Rome, to be tried, and to punish them there, as Roman Subjects. But it is evident, that in the Epistle of Proculus, between the former and latter Words, there were several intermediate Things mention'd. But here Grotius, after he hath tediously recounted the several Kinds of Disputes, which might happen between Allies and Confederates, at last dismisseth the Difficulty, without answering any Thing to it ^h. However, it is well observed by wise Men, that it generally happens, that if the Party superior in the League be considerably stronger, and more powerful than the other Confederates, he will by Degrees arrive at an absolute Sovereignty over them, especially if the Confederacy be perpetual, and allow him a Right to place Garisons in their Towns ⁱ.

V.

^a Plin. Nat. Hist. l. 34. c. 14. See also, 1 Sam. xiii. 19, 20.

^c Vid. Isocrat. Panegy.

^d Livy, l. 23. c. 7.

^e Polyb. Excerpt Legat. 105.

^f Cic. Off. l. 2. c. 8.

^g Vid. Anton. Marth. de Criminibus, ad tit. L. Jul. Majestatis, c. 1. § 5, 6.

^h Vid. Bodin. de Repub. l. 5. c. 6. Isocrates Archidam. p. 217. People that are jealous of their Liberty, should avoid all unequal Confederacies, for there is hardly any Difference between them and Slavery.

^b Vid. Dionys. Halicarn. l. 8. c. 15.

^e Pausanias in Achaicis.

^h Vid. Liv. l. 42. c. 1. Appian. de Bello Civ. l. 2.

V. Another Question Grotius enters upon ¹, is this, Suppose two Parties both Allies, and Confederates to a Third, make War upon one another, which of them the third Confederate ought to assist ²? In which Place it may be added, that in all Leagues which a Prince enters into with his Neighbours, upon the Points of Assistance and Supplies, this Exception ought always to be supposed, if the Condition and Circumstances of my own Kingdom will permit. For that Consideration ought always to over-balance, not only any private Respect, but even the Ties of Blood and Affinity ³. For since it is impossible a Prince should be under nearer or stricter Obligations to an Ally, than to his own Subjects; 'tis plain he can make no Promise that can be binding to any Confederate, when it is manifestly inconsistent with the good of his own Subjects. It was said by King Francis I. in Guicciardine, that he thought the Oath he took at Rhemes was of the strongest Obligation; and by that the Kings of France were obliged not to alienate any Part of the Patrimony of the Crown ⁴. And in this Sense, what my Lord Bacon saith, in his Wisdom of the Antients, c. 5. may be very well admitted: "That there is but one true and proper Bottom of Faith among Princes, and that is Necessity (a Deity of great Power with the Great) the Danger of the State, and the Communication of Profit. And Aristotle speaks very plainly ⁵: Advantage seems to be the main Cause of Confederacies between Commonwealths ⁶:" Polybius says of the Rhodians ⁷, that they made no Alliance with the Romans for a hundred and forty Years together, though they sent them Assistance in several Wars; and the Reason of this, he saith was, "Because they were willing to appear fair to all the World, and to give every Prince Hopes of their Assistance and Friendship, but at the same Time unwilling to abridge themselves of any Part of their Liberty, by binding themselves under Oaths and Compacts, to adhere to the Interests any one Nation." Sir Thomas Moore would have his Utopians forbear entering into Confederacies upon other Reasons ⁸. But a Prince that suffers by an Alliance, that expires upon a Change of Affairs with his Confederates, must charge the Misfortune upon himself, that he did not make stricter Search into the Circumstances of his Ally ⁹. Tho' an honourable Confederate, when he finds that the Posture of Affairs he is in will not suffer him to continue any longer in the Alliance, should give Advice of it to the others that are concerned, that they may have Time to provide for themselves, and secure their own Interest. For it is certainly the highest Pitch of Baseness possible, to sacrifice a Friend to save myself ¹⁰. And therefore in all Leagues of War, it is look'd upon to be a very important and necessary Article, that no one of the Confederates shall make a separate Peace with the common Enemy, excluding the rest of the Allies. Though 'tis reasonable this Article should be understood with this Limitation, supposing the other Confederate, or Confederates, do not refuse to comply with fair Terms and proper Overtures of Peace. For in such a Case, this looks like a Violation of the Confederacy, and in consequence the other Ally may justly take separate Measures for his own Security. But then this also must be allowed in a mitigated Sense only, and with certain Alleviations, that it may not be a Pretext to elude Confederacies, and that one of the Allies may not in some Sense be made the other's Judge ¹¹.

VI. Another celebrated Distinction of Leagues, is that which divides them into real and personal. The latter are such as are made with the Prince, purely with Relation to his Person, and expire with him. The former are such as are made with the Kingdom and Commonwealth, rather than the Prince or Government; and these outlive the Ministry and the Government itself, under which they were first made. To which of these every League belongs, will appear from what follows. This therefore is certain, that whatever Leagues are made with a free People are in their own Nature real, and must continue till the Term limited in the League, notwithstanding that the Government, by whose Intervention the Leagues were made, may die or be changed. And hence we may infer, that if a free People enter into a League, and afterwards the State of the Commonwealth happen to be changed from a Democracy, into a Monarchy, the League is still in force, because the People is the same, tho' the Form of the Commonwealth be changed. And because a Prince called to the Throne by the free Voice of the People is always supposed to take the sovereign Power upon him, together with all the Obligations contracted by the People, when it lay in their Hands. Besides, Leagues are made by them that are invested with sovereign Power. The common Subject of which Power is the Commonwealth; and sovereign

¹ Vid. Simlrum d. Repub. Helvetiorum, l. 1. p. 119.

² Vid. Gellium, l. 2. c. 29.

³ Guicciardine, Hist. l. 16.

⁴ Arist. Ethic. Nicom. l. 8. c. 5.

⁵ Arist. Rhet. l. 3. c. 14. 'Tis incredible, that any Man should choose to do a Thing without any Prospect of Advantage by it. Valer. Flaccus, l. 4. ver. 744.

Certa fides animis idem quibus incidit hostis.

They're certain Friends that have a common Foe.

Isocrates Orat. ad Philip. p. 1156. A Commonwealth hath no Regard either to Enemies or Oaths, or any Things else, further than it thinks it tends to Advantage: Thus Polybius, l. 2. c. 47. saith of Aratus, That he knew Kings naturally look'd upon none, either as Friends or Enemies, but rated Friendship and Enmity, purely according to their own Profit. Andr. Macrobius, Hist. Venet. l. 1. speaking of the State of Venice, saith, We measure our Alliances and Friendships only by the Credit and Interest they bring us.

⁶ Polyb. Excerpt. Legat. 93. c. 6.

⁷ Moore, Utop. l. 2.

⁸ Vid. L. 50. t. 17. l. 19. init. D. de reg. juris.

⁹ Euripid. Iphigenia in Tauris ver. 605, 606, 607.

¹⁰ V. Job. Labard. Hist. Gall. l. 5. p. 313. Ed. Paris. An. 1671.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. v.

¹ L. 2. c. 15. §. 13. His Decision is reduced to this: When two Allies make War unjustly against each other, we must assist neither of them. But if the Cause of one of the Allies is just, we must assist him, not only against Strangers, but even against one of our Allies; unless there be any express Clause in the Treaty that does not suffer us to undertake the Defence of the first against the last, though he is in the Wrong: But if several of our Allies enter into a Confederacy against a common Enemy, we must then equally assist them all, as far as possible: And when it is not in our Power to assist them all at the same Time, we must give the Preference to the most ancient Ally. See Mr. Baldwin's Dissertation de Comparatione Obligationum quae ex variis hominum Statibus oriuntur; and that by Mr. Thomasius de Sponsione Civium, Sect. 17. & seq.

reign Power is the same, both when it is exercised by the common Suffrages of the whole Body of the People, and when it is afterwards entrusted to a Prince, created by the Consent of the People. But here all those Leagues are excepted, that were made only for the Preservation of the present State of the Commonwealth. For Example, suppose two free Commonwealths enter into a Confederacy, by which they agree to aid and assist one another, against all such as shall endeavour by Force to subvert the present Establishment of the Government in either Commonwealth. For if afterwards, either of the two Nations freely consent to an Alteration of the State of their Commonwealth, the Reasons ceasing, the Confederacy is supposed of course to expire. But however in the general, though every League made with a free People be real; yet it does not follow, on the other hand, that therefore every League made with a Prince is personal, and dies with him. For the inserting a Person in a Compact, doth not make the Compact personal, but only shews by what Person's Intervention the Agreement was made.^a But because it is evident, that Princes make some Leagues with no farther Intention, than that they should continue till their Death; and others, with Design to derive them down to their Successors; it must therefore be enquired, what are the Marks whereby we may distinguish, which Sort every regal League ought to be reduced to.

VII. And it is Grotius's Opinion^b, that it is easier to discover this, from the Form and Phrase of the League itself, than from any general Rules, or Observations. And thus all Leagues will appear to be real, in which 'tis expressly mention'd, either that they are to be perpetual; or that they are made for the common Good; or made with the Prince and his Successors; or when a particular Time is limited for the Continuation of them. But besides, the other Words of the League sometimes, and sometimes the Matter of it, and sometimes the Motives of entering into it, may make a Conjecture easy in this Case. If the Conjectures are equal on both Sides, favourable * Leagues must be supposed to be the real, and the † odious, the personal. The favourable Leagues are those that are made for the Advancement of Commerce. Not that all Leagues of War are odious; for the defensive generally incline to the favourable Part; the offensive hath more of that which is odious in them.

VIII. But how far a Successor is obliged by the Leagues of the Prince his Predecessor, is what we may take a more distinct View of. For in the first Place 'tis certain, that if the Predecessor make a Peace, the Successor is obliged by it. For by a Peace 'tis manifest, all past Injuries that gave Birth to War are forgotten, the Articles of the Peace being duly observed. And then, secondly, 'tis beyond Dispute, that the Successor is obliged to stand to all those lawful Agreements, by which his Predecessor transferred any Right to a third Person. And again, thirdly, it is also certain, that when one of Confederates hath performed what the League oblig'd him to, and the Prince dies before he satisfies what was required on his Part, the Successor is obliged to satisfy it. For since what the other performed upon a Condition of an Equivalent to be paid him, did either really, or at least was intended to promote the Advantage of the Commonwealth; it is evident, that unless the Equivalent be paid him, he hath a Right to demand Restitution or Satisfaction, for what he performed, in a Manner before it was due; and consequently, that the Successor is obliged to refund all back, except he chooseth to pay the Equivalent, according as the Articles of Confederacy before determined. Lastly, as to these Leagues, where nothing hath been performed on either hand, or where the Performances have been equal, it may I think be said in general, that the Prince, if he enter'd into the League as Head of his People, and with design to advance the publick Good by it, must be supposed to have made a real League, and to have oblig'd his Successor by it. Because such a League affects the whole Mass of the People; and the succeeding Prince, the Head of them, enters upon the same Rights, and takes upon him the same Incumbrances with his Predecessor. But where the League directly regards the Benefit of the Prince's Person and Family, 'tis evident that when he dies, or that is extinct, the League must also be at an End. But it is grown into a Custom upon any new Succession, to renew the Leagues, though in themselves undoubtedly real, at least in general Terms, for fear any Dispute or Exception should arise, that since the Commonwealth hath not yet perceived the Use and Advantage of such a League, that therefore it hath no other Bottom but his Faith that made it, and doth not descend to the Successor. And especially since the Design of every League is to promote the publick Good; and since the Successor may perhaps have Sentiments in relation to that different from his Predecessor, he hath in consequence a Right to take different Measures; and therefore may neglect a League, which he thinks is now grown useless and unserviceable to the Commonwealth.^c And here it may be observ'd, that where several different Leagues have formerly pass'd interchangeably between Nations, and they afterwards renew them in general^d, the League that was last made, must be supposed chiefly to be renewed. Since the latter always lessen the Force of the former^e. And therefore it was unpardonable Inadvertence and Neglect in the Ambassadors, that went to renew a League with King Ptolemy, and in them too, who sent them without knowing what Treaties and Leagues had formerly pass'd between that Prince and the Achaians, or which of them the Achaians were desirous to renew.

IX.

^a Vid. L. 2. t. 14. l. 7. § S. D. de Passis.^b Grot. L. 2. c. 16. § 16.^c Vid. Johan. Labard. Hist. de Reb. Gall. l. 5. p. 74, 75. Ed. Par. An. 1671.^d Vid. Polyb. Excerpt. Legat. 41.^e Favorabua.

† Odiosa.

Mr. BARB. NOTE on § VIII.

¹ See above in B. 5. c. 12. § 6. in t'e Beginning.

IX. And here Enquiry may be made, whether if one of the Princes of a League happen to be depos'd and expell'd by his own Subjects, the other Confederate be obliged to send him the same Aids and Supplies, which were promised when he was in Possession of his Kingdom? Grotius, in the Chapter before quoted, § 17. affirms that he is. Because a Prince, unjustly depos'd and expell'd, hath still a Right to his Kingdom, tho' he hath lost the Possession. To me, so much in this Case seems to be certain, that if the Terms of the League expressly mention and intend the Defence of the Prince's Person and Family, he ought to be assisted in the Recovery of his Kingdom. But if the League was formed for publick Good only, 'tis a disputable Point, whether the exil'd Prince can demand Assistance in virtue of his League. For the Aids mention'd are presumed to have been promised against foreign Enemies, without View of this particular Case. Not but that still such a League leaves Liberty to assist a lawful Prince against an Usurper. And thus if while we are engaged in a League with a free People, an intestine domestick Enemy endeavours to enslave them, we may with Justice send them Assistance to suppress him, before he is grown into a lawful Prince. For the * Qualities in Leagues (as suppose it be expressly mentioned, that the League is made with the Prince and his Successors) imply a strict and proper Right, and intend such Princes only as have a just Title to the Kingdom, not that keep it by bare Usurpation, or that have no other Title to depend upon, but Force and Power.

X. It is also a famous Question, whether it be provided by the League, that neither of the Confederates shall injure or invade the other's Allies? By Allies is meant such only as were Allies at the Time the League was made, or such as were afterwards taken into Alliance on either Side. What was urg'd in a Dispute of this Kind between the Romans on one hand, and the Carthaginians on the other, at the Beginning of the second Punic War, may be seen in Polybius, l. iii. c. 27. and in Livy, l. xxi. c. 19. The Decision Grotius makes of it is this ^a, that it was no Breach of League either for the Carthaginians to make War upon the Saguntines, though after they were taken into Alliance by the Romans, or for the Romans to undertake to defend them. For it may happen without Breach of League, that of two Confederates, one may make War upon, and the other assist the same Party. And it is usual in Leagues to make Articles that relate particularly to such Cases; see the Leagues made between the Romans and the Carthaginians in the Time of the Tarentine War, Polyb. l. iii. c. 25. Tho' when Confederates are so far engaged in opposite Interests, 'tis evident, they must be upon the Brink of an open Rupture. For the Sense of Pain is the same, whether the Wound be given in another's Name, or in the Striker's own; but it is yet clearer, when the Seat of the War happens to be carried into the assisting Prince's Country ^b.

XI. And it is to be further observed, that Leagues limited to a particular Time, when that expires, must not be suppos'd to be tacitly renewed. Both because no Man can be presum'd to bind himself rashly by new Obligations ^c; and because otherwise it could never be known how long a League is to continue. And therefore if after the League expires, some Acts of seeming Alliance are continued, they are to be look'd upon as Acts of Kindness and good Nature, but not as Arguments of the Renovation of the League. For Friendship continues after the League is at an End. Again, it is evident from the Nature of all Compacts ^d, that where one of the Parties refuseth to stand to the Conditions of the League, the other is at Liberty to break too. Confederates may indeed agree, that though one Article of the League be neglected, yet the rest shall be inviolably observed. But then the other Party is not obliged to perform the Equivalent to the neglected Article, and so not to suffer any positive Evil by it.

XII. I come now to consider the Nature of † Engagements, or those publick Compacts which are made by Ministers of State ^e, in Negotiations relating

* Qualitates.^a Grot. l. 2. c. 16. § 13.^b Vid. Justin. l. 3. c. 7.† Sponsiones.

MR. BARB. NOTES on § XI, XII.

¹ See Grotius, B. 2. c. 15. § 14.² See the above-quoted Place of Grotius, § 15.

³ As our Author no where explains, in express Terms, the Right of AMBASSADORS, and has only but just mention'd it by the bye, Lib. 1. cap. 3. it will not be improper to treat of it in general and succinctly, since Treaties are usually negotiated and concluded by the Power of these Ministers. I shall borrow from Mr. Budeus's Elem. Phil. Pract. Part II. cap. 4. Sect. 5. § 19 & seq. enough to give a short and clear Idea of this Matter by the Principles of the Law of Nature, common to all Men, and not of the Right of Nations, taken in Grotius's Sense (Lib. II. cap. 18.) for a tacit Compact of all People, or at least the greatest Number. We can then make it appear, that these sort of Ministers are to be esteem'd as sacred and inviolable Persons, independently of this pretended Compact. We cannot doubt but that it highly concerns Mankind in general, and Nations in particular, not only to put an End to Wars and Disputes, but also to establish and maintain Friendship and Commerce between each other. Now Ambassadors are necessary to procure these Advantages. God then, who without Dispute commands every Thing that contributes to the Good and Preservation of human Society, cannot but forbid, by the Law of Nature, the doing any Injury to these sort of Persons. We abuse an Ambassador, either by refusing to receive him, without having any powerful Reason to oblige us to do so; or by doing him some Injury either in his Person, his Goods, his Honour, or his Domesticks, &c. We may lawfully dispense with receiving an Ambassador, when his Master, for Example, has already cheated us under Pretence of Ambassies, and we have Reason to suspect the like Deceit; or when he that sends the Ambassadors, has betray'd us, or is guilty, with respect to us, of any other heinous Crime; or when we are assur'd, that under Pretence of Negotiations, the Ambassador comes only but to raise some Disturbance, or as a Spy, &c. But if we have no Reason to mistrust any Thing of the like Nature, we must honourably receive every Ambassador that is sent to us, and not do him the least Injury, not even by the Right of Retaliation, or Reprisals, since by our bare receiving him in that Character, we have renounced, with regard to him, the Right which we might have had otherwise upon this Account. Ambassadors then must be regarded as sacred and inviolable Persons, that is to say, as far as the Design and Nature of their Ambassy requires it. Thus an Ambassador cannot be punished by the Prince or State to whom he is sent: For as he represents his Master, he treats in that Quality with the Power to whom he is sent, as one of an equal Rank with him. But if he has committed any Crime of Importance sufficient to demand Satisfaction, and we have Interest enough to get him punish'd, we must apply ourselves to his Master: And then, if his Master refuses to give us Satisfaction, we must use against him all the Rights that we have against a Prince that boldly tolerates and approves of the Crimes of his Subjects: Nay, it is allowable, when the Business requires it, to seize upon his Person immediately, as a declared Enemy, to imprison him, and even put him to Death, if it appears absolutely necessary for our Preservation; for we are not to bear every Thing from Ambassadors, neither does the Design of their Ambassy require it.

relating to the Sovereign Power, but without Advice and Command from it. And here, the first Question is concerning that difficult Case, where if the Engagement is pass'd absolutely without Proviso or Condition of being accepted and satisfied by the Sovereign, and the Sovereign afterwards refuse to give it any Ratification; what the Engagers are obliged to do in Satisfaction to the Party they made the Engagement to? This was a Case once warmly disputed among the old Romans, upon the Engagement made at the Furcæ Caudine. The Story is at large in Livy, l. 9. c. 8, &c.² And indeed if the Measure of that Matter were to be given by strict Justice, it must be said that the Romans were neither obliged to ratify the Engagement, nor to set Things in the Posture they were in before. But then, it had been enough for them to surrender up the Persons that made it. But if the State of the Case be rather estimated by Equity, certainly the Romans ought to have ratified the Agreement, however it was concluded without their Advice and Consent. The Consuls indeed had not Power to determine War, conclude Peace, or enter into League with an Enemy, without particular Instructions and Commissions from their Masters, the Senate and People; yet since they did not presume upon the People's Consent without very good Reason; when it was impossible otherwise to save the Lives of many thousand Citizens, the Flower of all the Roman Commonwealth; and when the Enemy had perform'd all that could seem equivalent to a formal Peace and League; the People in reason ought to have confirmed the Conditions, especially since there was nothing intolerably hard or unjust in them³. For it would have been enough for the People to have stood resolutely to their Principle, that their Magistrates could oblige them to nothing without their own Consent and Command, if the Samnites had demand'd any Thing that was unreasonable and insupportable. But 'tis clear, the great Mortification to that proud ambitious People was, that their Army was forced to submit to the Ignominy of passing under the Jugum. Which was indeed very ill Conduct in the Samnite General. For that Disgrace did not lessen the Strength of the Romans, but only provok'd and exasperated that fierce People to revenge the Dishonour. However, the Roman Army very well deserved the Treatment they met with, for venturing rashly to pass a Place they were Strangers to, without sending before to discover it. And it was certainly their wisest Way to submit to the Disgrace, rather than suffer the Strength of Rome to be cut off. And here the Arguments Lentulus offered to persuade the Engagement may be consider'd, Liv. l. ix. c. 4. And further, that a Commonwealth may often be obliged to ratify the Acts and Promises of its Generals, because of their Authority, and to oblige them not to go over to the Enemy. Hence Tacitus saith, Ann. l. 12. c. 18. "That Mithridates was at a Loss whose Pity he should address himself to; because none of the Romans had Powers large enough to give him any Assurance in depending upon their Promises." But in the Case before us 'tis manifest, that the haughty Romans never consider'd, that they might some Time or other be forced to accept as hard Conditions themselves, as they had imposed upon others. However, it was a Strain of Generosity in the Samnites not to accept the Surrender of the Sponsors: And it was an extravagant Action in Posthumius, when the Surrender was offer'd, to strike the Socialis, and then cry out that he was a Samnite Subject, and that, contrary to the Laws of Nations, he had injured a publick Minister; and therefore, that the Romans might carry on their War with more Justice. The Judgment of Livy upon this whole Proceeding may perhaps deserve our Observation; The Sponsors, saith he, after they had been offer'd to be yielded up, and were not accepted, return'd back to the Roman Camp, sua fide liberati, absolv'd from their own Faith and Engagement; but he adds doubtfully, forſan & publica, and perhaps from the Publick.

XIII. The last Question upon this Subject is, if the Sovereign knows that his Ministers have pass'd Promise and Engagement, and is silent upon it, whether it may be inferr'd from thence, that he owns and approves it? But for an Answer to this, I refer you to Grotius, l. ii. c. 16. §. 17.

² Vid. Grot. l. 2. c. 15. §. 16. Vol. Max. l. 4. c. 8. §. 1. Jo. Mariana. Hist. Hisp. l. 21. c. 12.

³ See Guccardine's Hist. l. 12. p. m. 342, & 344. where he talks of the Treaty that La Trimouille concluded with the Smis at Dijon, without the King of France's Orders. Sir W. Temple, in his Observations upon the Government of the United Provinces, saith, That in the Year 1668. he prevail'd with the States-General to conclude three Treaties, and to draw up and sign the several Instruments in the Space of five Days, without any Recourse to the Provinces, and from them to the several Cities, where by the Interest and Arts of others, the Affair would have been opposed and eluded, tho' it was of the greatest Importance to the States that it should be concluded. He adds, That doing this without Commission from their Principals, they ventured their Heads if they had been ditownd by their Provinces.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. XII.

Nor does this Character oblige an Enemy to their Master, to respect them in their Passage through his Territories to another State, or hinder him from doing them any Injury: It not being necessary to the Design of the Ambassies that their Rights should extend so far; unless there be some particular Compact made for that Purpose. What we have here said concerning Ambassadors, is also to be applied in some sort to their Domesticks, and their whole Retinue. If any one of their Domesticks has done any Damage or Injury, we may require his Master to deliver him up to us; otherwise he makes himself accessory to his Crimes, and in that Case he gives us Right to act against him as if it were his own personal Crime. Now he cannot punish his Domesticks himself; because this Right contributing nothing to the Design of his Ambassy, it is not to be presum'd that his Master has given it him. As for his Goods, we cannot seize upon them for Debt by way of Justice; for that would suppose a taking away from the Jurisdiction of the Sovereign to whom his Ambassy is made: But if he refuses to pay his Debts, we must take the same Measures with him, as we have already observ'd, are to be used in obtaining Satisfaction for the Damage and Injury he has done us. As for the Right of Privileges, it is a Consequence of the Nature and Design of Ambassies. Nevertheless, if we have once granted it to Ambassadors of a certain State, nothing authorizes us to revoke it, as long as the Good of the Commonwealth does not require it. Neither must we refuse, without pressing Reasons, to grant Ambassadors the other Rights and Honours, which are settled by the common Consent of Sovereigns, for then this would be a sort of an Affront to them.

² Sponsors.

³ See Mr. Buddeus's Dissertation, entitled, Jurisp. Historics Specimen; as also those by Mr. Thomasius de Sponsione Caudina & Numera. which are the sixth and fourteenth of the Collection of his Disputes maintain'd at Leipsick.

C H A P. X.

Of Promiscuous Compacts of Sovereign Princes.

The CONTENTS of every Paragraph of the Tenth Chapter.

- | | |
|--|---|
| I. The Division of the Chapter.
 II. How far a Prince may restore himself to his Right, when injured in Compact by a Foreigner,
 III. How far, when by his own Subjects.
 IV. The Contracts of Princes, how far exempted from the Civil Laws.-
 V. A Prince cannot dispense with any valid Oath he hath taken. | VI. How far a Subject may have an Action against his Prince upon Matter of Contract.
 VII. The Contracts of the Subject liable to be overruled by the Transcendental Propriety.
 VIII. How far Successors are obliged by the Contracts of their Predecessors.
 IX. The Grants and Donations of Princes, whether revocable. |
|--|---|

I. I Am, in the next Place, to consider the Difficulties which relate to any sort of promiscuous Compacts made by sovereign Princes, which may be reduced to these *three Heads*¹. First, whether a sovereign Prince has any particular Power, with regard to Compacts that affect himself? Secondly, what Liberty he hath in Obligations contracted with his Subjects? And, thirdly, how, and how far he can oblige his Successor?

II. The first Difficulty therefore is, that since a Prince has the Power to reverse any Contract made to the Prejudice of his Subjects, and can restore them to the State they were in before such a Contract was made, or upon just Reasons release them from their Obligation to observe it; whether he cannot make use of the same Power in Cases that concern himself? For Example, supposing that by Fraudulence or Force, or through Indiscretion of Age, he should have agreed to prejudicial Terms; or hath been any other Way notoriously abused in his Contracts; or bound himself by any *rash Oath*²? And here it is to be observed, that the Question, as it is stated in this rude Form, and as the Words of it lie, implies a Contradiction. For to restore Persons to the State they were in, and to release from Oaths, are Acts which bear Relation and Tendency to another Person; and which are derived and flow from one invested with Power and Authority over the Person that is to be restor'd and releas'd. And therefore the Question ought rather to be stated thus: Whether, when a Prince has prejudiced himself, by consenting to certain Obligations and Conditions of Contract, upon a Sense of the Injury he suffers, he may by his own Authority declare, that by Reason of certain Faults adhering to the Contract, he looks upon himself to be released from the Obligation? To which it may be answer'd; that as Persons that live in a Liberty of Nature, and own no Subjection, are under their own Conduct, and are Judges in their own Affairs; so if they are unjustly injured in their Contracts, they may by their own Authority demand Restitution or Amendments to be made to their Agreement; on Supposition the Prejudice and Injury they sustain be visible and manifest. For when the Thing is disputed, the Matter must be referred to the Decision of Arbitrators. And therefore if a Prince, since he is still in Possession of his natural Liberty, find any Abuse put upon him in the Terms he has consented to, he may by his own Authority declare to the Party concern'd, that he will not be obliged to stand to any such Compact. And there is no Necessity that he should procure a Rescise, since the Thing is in its own Nature incapable of producing Obligation or Right. Thus Lewis XIII. of France declared, That there lay a just Appeal from the King under Confinement and Bonds, to the King at Liberty. But because it may sometimes happen, that ill Men, when they have a Mind to put a Cheat upon the World, and falsify their Truth, may pretend an Abuse or Fault in their Contracts to cover their own Frauds and Perfidy; therefore under Civil Government it is very necessary to enact, what Acts shall in their own Right be look'd upon to be invalid and null, and what are to be examin'd into and determin'd by Sentence of Court.

III. But when the Case lies between the Prince and his Subjects, the Difference of the Circumstance will, I think, deserve a distinct Consideration. A Prince's Minority is supposed to continue as long as the Administration of the Government and Affairs of the Kingdom remains in the Hands of his Governors and Tutors; and during their Administration, the Prince himself can make no Contract with any Person of a foreign State: But if he enter into any Contract with a Subject, and afterwards find himself injured in it, I see no Reason why he should not enjoy

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § I, II.

¹ See Grotius, B. 2. c. 14.

² See Grotius, in the Place above mentioned, § 1, 2, 3, 4, 5.

enjoy the same common Benefit of the Law, which he allows and secures to other Men; otherwise his Condition would be more confin'd than that of private Subjects. Nor can any Renunciation of Exceptions, which might be made to his Minority, be supposed of Force sufficient against the Presumptions of the real Weaknesses that Age is liable to. A Prince cannot disannul the Treaties and Compacts that were lawfully made by his Governors with foreign Powers or Persons, when he is come to Age, upon Pretence that they were made in his Minority. Because then, nothing could be pass'd with any Security under a Prince that happen'd to be a Minor. However, the Prince's Governors, the Regents, are obliged to give an Account of their Administration. But no Exception whatever of Fear, Injury, or Fraud, is of Force against any of those Capitulations, which in limited Monarchies the People propose, and the Prince consents to, at his Accession to the Government. For if the Capitulations or Conditions seem'd too strict and severe, the Prince had his Liberty of accepting or refusing them; and the People would not have forced him to take the Government upon him. And it is not to be supposed, that any People would be so inconsiderate, as to tie up the Hands of their Prince with such Laws, as must make the Sovereign Power weak and feeble, and his Government unactive and unprofitable. And here I will by the way enquire, whether David could have retracted his Oath, when he swore not to punish Shimei that cursed him as he fled from Absalom? And I confess in my Opinion he could not. For the King was under no Apprehension of Force or Fear, when he gave him his Oath, neither could he be thought to have sworn out of Rashness or Indiscretion; but on the contrary, rather with mature Consideration and Design, that upon so remarkable an Instance of his Clemency, the People that had been engaged in the Rebellion, might return the more willingly, and with greater Assurance of being pardon'd, to their Obedience. Neither was the Promise of Impunity in itself unlawful; for the King might very justly, and without Injury to any Man, pardon a Crime which was committed purely against his own Person. But it hath given further Matter of Dispute to some, whether he can be excused for leaving such a Remembrance of Shimei's Crime in all his last Commands to Solomon. In my Opinion, David did nothing in this, contrary to his former Oath; for he did not leave any Command with his Son to punish Shimei for his Crime; but only advised him to keep a strict Eye upon that malicious bad Man and Enemy to his Family, and to take care that he did not create him any fresh Disturbance; and that if he should afterwards find him guilty of any Misdemeanour, not to be easy to forgive him. And therefore Solomon commanded him to live in Jerusalem under the Eye of the Court, and forbade him to pass over the Brook Kidron, that he might not insult upon his Impunity, nor conceive any secret Satisfaction in seeing the Place where he had with so much Bitterness reviled and cursed David. But divine Providence so disposed, that he should break those easy Conditions which he had himself approved and consented to, that there might be just Occasion given to take off so ill a Man by punishing him as he deserved.

IV. But here it is to be observed, that however Princes, when they enter into any particular Acts with their Subjects, not as Princes, but as other private Men, are presumed always to comply with the positive Laws of the Commonwealth which relate to the Validity of such Acts; yet since they are above the Civil Laws, they are under Necessity of following those Laws always in their private Acts. And therefore if they voluntarily and advisedly enter into any Contract that would otherwise be invalid in Law; they are supposed to have excepted that particular Contract from the Force of the Laws, where there are such, and to declare that no Nullity shall ensue upon that Account. For otherwise, all that was done would signify nothing*. And I think it is very reasonable to allow, that if a Prince find himself very much injured in a Contract, which at first he did not perceive, he may if he please annul, or at least correct and amend it^b.

V. That no Prince hath Power to release himself from his Oath, when there lies no Objection either against the Validity of his taking it, or the Matter contain'd in it, or the Circumstances belonging to it, upon Pretence that it is lawful for him to relieve his Subjects in some particular Oaths, I think is evident. For the Oaths which he has Power to vacate in his Subjects, have always this Condition annex'd to them, if it please the Sovereign. And 'tis certain it would be impossible to bind any Obligation upon a Man, if he reserves to himself a Power to break from it, whenever he thinks fit^c.

VI. But though Princes are as much obliged in Conscience by their Promises and Compacts as private Men; yet, in this Respect, there is a Difference between the Obligation of a Prince and that of a Subject, that 'tis easy for the Prince to force the Subject to stand to easy Terms, when perhaps he would willingly go back; but a Subject, as long as he is such, hath no way to oblige his Prince to give him his Due, when he refuses it. But no wise Prince will ever refuse to stand to a lawful Contract; since he must necessarily consider, that his Honour and Security depends upon the Credit he hath of observing his Compacts; and that it is the worst Thing that can be said of a Prince, that he observes not himself that Justice, which it is his Duty to administer and support. But however, if a Prince upon Contract give the Subject Liberty to enter an Action against him in his own Courts, the Action itself proceeds rather upon natural Equity than the Civil Laws; as if it were implied, that upon the Knowledge of his Obligation,

* Of the Action of Philip II. of Spain, who by a Fetch of Law, would have released himself from paying his Debts, see Grot. Hist. Belg. l. 5.

^b Vid. Grot. l. 2. c. 14. §. 2.

^c Vid. Grot. l. 2. c. 14. §. 3.

gation, he would not refuse the Performance of it. And therefore the End promised by such an Action is not to force the Prince to stand to the Contract, but only to make it appear to the Subject, that the Prince had obliged himself to observe it. And in such Tryals, there should be no Regard had to Honour or Greatness, but Judgment ought to be given barely according to the strongest Probabilities of Argument ^a.

VII. It may also happen, that the Subjects may be deprived of a Right acquired by Contract, either by way of Punishment, or by the Force of the Transcendental Propriety ^{*}. Always supposing in this Case, that the Necessities of the Commonwealth demand it, and that the Publick ought to make Restitution. And therefore for the same Reason the Prince may defer his Payments, when any pressing Exigence of State obliges him to turn the Money another Way, which should have been paid to the private Subject. And from hence it appears, what is to be determined about the Tabula novæ, or general Discharges from Debts or Obligations, which Solon call'd σεισάγνια, or the shaking off a Burden ^b.

VIII. But lastly, that it may appear, whether and how far a Prince hath Power to transmit an Obligation upon a private Contract down to his Successors; it is to be first consider'd, whether the Prince's Kingdom be his Patrimony, or whether he possess it only as it were upon an usufructuary Right. A Successor to a Prince that holds his Kingdom in the former Right, since he succeeds to all his Goods and Possessions, must be supposed to inherit all Debts of Princes that possess their Kingdoms; in the latter, Grotius, l. ii. c. 14. § 10, &c. is of Opinion, that the Successors are not immediately, and purely, because they succeed them in the Kingdom, obliged to discharge them. For such Princes do not derive their Right to the Throne from the King their immediate Predecessor, but from the People themselves. But even these Successors are obliged by the Debts of their Predecessors, mediately and by Interposition of the Commonwealth, not as upon their own Account, but as they are Heads of the Commonwealth. For in the last Resort the Debts of the Prince affect the State itself, as they were contracted by the Head and Governor of it. And the Truth of it is this, that Princes have Power to devolve Debts upon the Commonwealth itself, is evident from hence, that sometimes it would be impossible to supply the Necessities of the State otherwise than by contracting such Debts. And since the Administration and Security of the Commonwealth is entrusted with the Prince, he must be allowed to have the Command of those Means, without which that End cannot be pursued or obtain'd. But then, on the other hand, this Power to oblige the Commonwealth ought to be restrain'd no farther than the Prince can have good Reasons for contracting the Debt. But then again, neither ought the Prince to be so far limited, as not to have Power to devolve any Debts upon the Commonwealth, but what have actually given some Advantage to the State; tho' 'tis fit inferior Magistrates should be so confin'd ^c. But 'tis sufficient if he hath a fair Probability in Reason for what he attempts, though perhaps the Event may fall out contrary to his Expectations. And therefore upon the whole, all Contracts made by the Prince, oblige the Commonwealth, unless when they are manifestly absurd or unjust. And when the Case is doubtful, 'tis always to be presumed in favour of the Prince. And such Contracts as these also oblige the Successor, as he is the Head of the Commonwealth. Nay, the People themselves will be obliged by them, if they should change their Form of Government, and erect a free State. And so whatever a free People contract, devolves upon and obliges the Person they afterwards confer the Sovereignty upon, though they give him never so full and absolute a Power. And this I think is a better Way of deciding the Question, than by distinguishing between the greater and the lesser Injuries. For in the Administration of publick Affairs, the Probability of the Means ought to be allowed a fairer Consideration than the Success of the Event, since an unforeseen Accident may sometimes break and distract the wisest Measures and Designs.

IX. What hath been said of the Contracts of Princes, may also be applied to their Grants and Donations ^d, viz. that they cannot be recall'd by the Successors, where they were made upon fair and favourable Reasons ^e. Yet 'tis certain, on the contrary, that Galba endeavoured to recover the Largeſſes and Donatives made by Nero, allowing no Man to keep more than the tenth Part of his Liberality ^f. So also the Roman Senate reduced those Cities to a tributary State, that had bought their Privilege or Immunity of Sylla. Cicero indeed thought them too severe in it ^g. And I think it had been but reasonable to have refunded them their Money, since it had been employ'd in publick Uses. And so Basilus of Macedon, when his Predecessor Michael had exhausted the publick Treasure, published an Edict, commanding all Persons that had received any of the Money, and could give no fair Account, why, or for what they received it, to return it again, or at least the Half Part of it ^h. But indeed as to Grants of this Nature, it ought to be considered out of what they are made. If the Prince give out of his own Pocket, or Estate, without Dispute the Grant is irrecoverable. And if he distribute his Bounty out of the Revenues or Income of those Goods or Possessions which are entrusted to his Administration, it ought always to be considered, upon what Reasons and with

col. 17

^a Heliod. Æthiop. l. 10.

^b Vid. Plutarch. Solon Cic. Off. l. 2. c. 22. ad fin.

^c Vid. Sueton. in Tito, c. 8. Plin. L. 10. Ep. 66. Gratian. Caus. 25. Quæst. 1. c. 15.

^d Vid. Sueton. in Galba, c. 15.

^e Vid. Hieron. Obrisum de Reb. gest. Emanuel, l. 1. Where he gives an Account of the Grants King John made just before his Death.

^{*} Vi Domini eminentis.

^f Vid. L. 12. t. 1. l. 27. D. de rebus Creditis, &c.

^g Cic. Off. l. 3. c. 22.

^h Vid. Hieron. Obrisum de Reb. gest. Emanuel, l. 1. Where he gives an Account of the Grants King John made just before his Death.

MR. BARB. NOTES on § VII, IX.

^a See in Grot. the Place quoted, § 7

^b See Grot. ubi supra, § 13.

what Caution and Moderation the Donations were made. For as no Body denies but that the Prince hath Power to reward the Services of his Friends and Subjects out of the publick Monies, as far as the Riches and Occasions of the State will allow; so if the Money of the Nation be profusely squander'd away upon Persons that do the Commonwealth neither Credit nor Service, and the publick Stock is lavish'd away only to satisfy their Ambition; in my Opinion, they should be replenish'd from their Purses that at first exhausted it. It was the wisest Method Ferdinand King of Arragon observ'd, never to part with any of the Lands that belonged to his Crown; and his Reasons were good, that Princes that alienated their Lands, generally created themselves more Enemies than Friends by it, because they made some of their Subjects so great by it, that they would always be suspicious and fearful of being deprived of their Rights^a. What hath been said with Relation to Grants, may also be applied to² Privileges and Immunities, namely, that it ought to be considered upon what Reasons, and with what Caution and Moderation they were given; and whether they are consistent with the common Peace and Security of the State. For without Dispute, these Things are of far greater Concern than the unwarly Easiness of the Prince. And indeed all Privileges are to be confin'd under such Limitations and Restrictions, whenever they begin to lie heavy upon the other Subjects^b. So when the Romans demanded an Aid of Men and Money from the Celtiberi, and they thought to excuse themselves by pleading the Privileges that had been granted them by the Romans themselves, the Historian says, "That what they insisted upon was allowed to be true; but that the Senate when they gave such Privileges, always annexed this Exception, that they were to continue in Force as long as it should seem good to them and the Roman People, and no longer^c." Lewis, King of France, after he had reduced the Genoise that had revolted from him, disannull'd all the Agreements and Treaties formerly pass'd between him and that State, and gave them all back again by the way of Privileges, not as Compositions or Compacts; that so it might be always in his Power to recal them. Perhaps indeed that was not to hold with relation to Privileges of all Kinds, but to such only as were to have barely a precarious Dependence.

^a Vid. Bacl. ad Grot. l. 1. p. m. 107. Grot. L. 2. c. 14. § 12. Laurentius Valla de rebus gestis Ferdinandi. Arrag. l. 3.

^b Vid. L. 43. t. 8. l. 1. § 16. D. ne quid in loco publico, &c. Demosthen. Orat. adv. Leptim.

^c Appian. Iberic. Guicciardine Hist. 7.

Mr. BARB. NOTE on § IX.

² See upon this Subject the Observationes Select. ad rem litterarum spectant. printed at Hall in Saxony, Tom. III. Obs. 13, 14, 15. or Mr. Bernard's Abridgment of them in the Republ. des Lettres August, 1704. p. 190, &c. See also Mr. Le Clerc's Biblioth. Choisie, Tom. I. p. 41, &c. To which we may add, that the Revocation of lawful Privileges, is a very nice Point, and requires a great deal of Prudence. For, to use Mr. La Bruyere's Words (Caract. ou Moeurs de ce Siècle, p. 316.) "there are certain Circumstances of Affairs, in which we cannot humour the People too much. You may to Day deprive this City of its Liberties, Rights, and Privileges; but To-morrow, do not so much as think of regulating their very Signs." "Indeed (as Mr. Le Clerc says in the Place I have cited) we cannot make the Duration of all Sorts of Privileges depend upon the variable Caprice of Princes, without exposing the State to Disturbances, which would be difficult to appease.—What Elseem could we have for Privileges that were to last no longer than the Prince's Will and Pleasure? Thus in setting up Princes above Privileges, we do them as much Injury as the People.

C H A P. XI.

How Subjection ceases:

The CONTENTS of every Paragraph of the Eleventh Chapter.

- | | |
|--|--|
| I. A Man ceases to be a Subject when his Prince dies without a Successor. II. Or, if he removes out of the Commonwealth. III. What to be observed in such a Remove. IV. Whether lawful to remove in great Companies. V. Whether lawful to counterfeit a Refuge. VI. Whether the Commonwealth may eject a Subject, when it pleases, without Reason. | VII. Of Banishment. VIII. A Man is deprived of the Privileges of a Subject when overpower'd by an Enemy. IX. Whether a Subject surrender'd to an Enemy, and not accepted, continues a Member of the Commonwealth. |
|--|--|

AMONG the several Ways by which Men cease to be under Subjection, it is by some thought to be one, when a Prince dies and leaves no Heir or Successor behind; or gives his Kingdom for lost. For then (they say) every particular Subject is left free to a Liberty of Nature. But since it is clear that a Kingdom in such a Case is not absolutely dissolv'd, but only reduced to a State of Interregnum; it follows, that though the Obligation of the Subjects to the Prince they have lost, are indeed at an End, yet that they continue still united to one another by the original Bond and Compact of Society.

II. But now the usual Way by which Subjection ceases is, when a Man by Permission of his own Commonwealth voluntarily removes into another, and settles himself and his Effects, and the Hopes of his Fortune there¹. How far such voluntary Removes may be permitted, must be discovered by the Methods by which Subjects are admitted into the Commonwealth. For some Persons are forced to put themselves under the Protection and Government of certain Commonwealths, by being conquered in War, or reduced to the last Necessities. And what Liberty is allowed to these must be known by the Laws of those Commonwealths. But if a Person absolutely free, that never knew what it was to be Subject (such as the Patriarchs and Masters of Families of old) or is at present free from all Subjection he had been under before, voluntarily join himself to any Commonwealth; it must also be determined by the Constitutions of that Commonwealth, what Liberty to remove thence was left him². For in some Commonwealths no Man is permitted to leave them without the express Consent of the Government. In others, a Man may be allow'd that Liberty, if he will submit to certain Impositions; as suppose, if he will pay a certain Sum of Money, or leave Part of his Goods behind him^e. But where there are no Laws about the Matter, we must be determined by Customs arising from the Nature of civil Subjection. What Custom admits of, every Subject is supposed at Liberty to use. But if this gives no Light to the Matter, and the Compact of Subjection makes no mention of it; it must be presumed, that every Man reserved to himself the Liberty to remove at Discretion, and that he chose rather to be a Citizen of the World (as Socrates said) than a Subject in any particular Commonwealth^f. For when a Man enters himself into a Commonwealth, it cannot be supposed that he gives up all Care of himself and Fortunes, but rather that by so doing he takes the best Expedient to defend and secure both. But because it often happens, that the Nature of the Government does not suit with every private Man's particular Circumstances, or he thinks at least he can make his Fortune with more Advantage elsewhere; and since it would be unreasonable to reform and make Alterations in the Commonwealth at the Desire, and for the Benefit only of a few private Subjects; the only Method left is, to give them leave to remove, and provide for themselves where they think best. 'So Demaratus, the Father of King Tarquin, fled with his Family to Corinth, and settled there, because he could not bear the Insolence of the Tyrant

^a Ovid. Metam. l. 15. ver. 28, 29. speaking of the Argives

— Prohibent discedere leges,
Pœnaq; mors posita est patriam mutare volenti.

^b Valerius Flaccus, Argon. l. 7. ver. 227, &c.

Omnibus hæc potius communem animantibus orbem,
Communes & crede Deos; patriam inde vocato,
Qua relictæ itque des; nec nos diis nata Malignis
Cluserit hoc crulo semper sub frigore messis.
Fas mihi non stabile, fas & tibi relinquere Colobos.

The Laws forbid my Flight, and threaten Death
To those that leave the Land which gave them Breath.

The World to all her ample Fields extends,
And God and Providence are common Friends;
Where e're the Day discovers distant Earth,
The Country's mine; nor are we doom'd by Birth
To this cold frozen Soil: But unconfin'd
May change our Country, as we change our Mind.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § II.

¹ See Grec. B. 2. c. 5. § 24

² V. Dig. l. 49. r. 15. De Captiv. & de Postumio, &c. l. 12. § 9.

“Tyrant Cypsellus, wisely preferring Liberty, though in Banishment, to Servitude at Home.” So also sometimes it is known, that there is not sufficient Encouragement allowed to Men of Parts in their own Nation. And some have found it true by Experience, that a Prophet hath no Honour in his own Country¹. For Men of base Natures are apt to look with Envy upon Persons that would rise by their own Worth to an Height of Greatness above their Reach; when perhaps they remember themselves once superior, at least upon the Level with them; and as Lacydes said², Statues ought to be seen at a Distance, because too near a View lessens the Beauty of them. Now to deny such Persons the Liberty of removing would in effect be all one, with laying a Command upon Men free and at their own Disposal, and not to presume to rise above the Rank and Condition of their Ancestors. But the Commonwealth also itself may make Advantages by these Removes, by inviting in Persons of Worth and Eminence from Abroad. “By the Constitution of the Roman Commonwealth, no Citizen could be forced to leave the Commonwealth, or if he pleased, not to leave it, when he was made a Member of another he prefer’d to it. And therefore Tully says³, that a little before his Remembrance, several Citizens of Rome, Men of Credit and Fortunes, voluntarily left that, and settled themselves in other Commonwealths. And the Way, saith he, lies open from every State to ours, and from ours to every other.” And this Right he very often highly extols⁴. Neither is it any Objection against what is here said, that the Father of Families, who at first erected the Commonwealth, may be supposed to have bound one another by Compact, to assemble and unite their Strength in common. For even in other Societies any Member has Liberty to leave it, so it be not with fraudulent Design, at an ill Time, or to the Prejudice of the other Members, especially if the Society were not establish’d with any particular Limitation of Time. And therefore many Commonwealths have appeared to be very little concern’d, when their Subjects left them, as being already overstock’d with Men, and glad to have their Numbers lessened.

III. But however, since ’tis generally the Interest of every Commonwealth to know the Number of its Subjects; they that remove ought in point of Duty or Honour to signify their Departure; unless a Man has good Reason to suppose, that it will be no publick Concern whether he leaves it with such Ceremony, or not. But all Persons that have engaged themselves in any particular Service or Employ, for a certain Time, ought without question to have the express Consent of the Commonwealth for their Remove. For Example, Subjects that are sent on Ambassies, Expeditions, or that are entrusted in any other Business which they undertook upon particular Compact and Agreement. But besides, a Remove ought to be at a proper Time, and when it is not directly against the Interest of the Commonwealth to suffer it. For Example (to make use of the Instances in Grotius in the Place above quoted) when the publick Debts are great, a Subject should not have Leave to depart, except he would pay his Share of them before he remove; nor when the Commonwealth is engaged in War upon Presumption of the Number or Bravery of certain Subjects; and especially when there is Danger of Invasion, or of being besieged; except the Subject that would depart can be sure to leave others behind him, every way as fit to defend the State as himself. Neither can they be good Subjects that serve their Country, as Horace⁵ speaks of his Friends, Diffugiunt cedis cum fece siccatis amici, ferre jugum pariter dolosi, that is, who when they have drained all they could from it, leave it to struggle with Misfortune by itself. But then it must be observed, that by removing in this Place I understand the departing out of the Dominions and Territories of the Commonwealth, and not the denying its Authority, and continuing to live in its Dominions. For the Commonwealth, when it bounds its Power within certain Limits, is supposed at the same Time to prohibit every Person to inhabit within that Compass, who will not acknowledge its Authority. And therefore it may be observed by the way, that the Grandees of Spain were very much mistaken, when they thought themselves released from the Obligations of the Commonwealth, by renouncing the Laws of their Country, and then retiring to other Places. Though it was usually supposed, that when that was done, they might lawfully take up Arms against their Prince, and begin open Hostilities, without incurring the Guilt of Treason and Rebellion⁶. From what has been said we may infer, what Force those Assecuratory Commands may be supposed to have, by which the Commonwealth endeavours to recall its Subjects from Employments in foreign Countries. For Instance therefore, if a Subject, that is under no particular Ties or Restraints, remove from his Commonwealth, where that Liberty hath always been promiscuously allowed, and settles himself and his Effects under the Protection of a foreign State; the Commonwealth he left hath no longer any Authority over him. And therefore it is to no purpose to think to reduce such an one by threatening him with the Loss of Fame, which is the utmost that can be done, when he is determined not to obey. But the Commonwealth hath still Authority over Subjects that depart either contrary to the Laws, or are obliged to it by any particular Ties, or hold Possessions of Goods, especially of Immoveables, under its Dominions, or are absent only upon Travel, and reserve to themselves the Right of Subjects. And by the way

¹ Cic. Tusc. Quæst. l. 5.² Diog. Laert. l. 4. § 60.³ Cic. Orat. pro Balbo, c. 13.

⁴ O jura præclare, atque divinitus jam inde à principio Romani nominis à majoribus nostris comparata, &c. Cicero d. l. What noble Rights are these! Which by the Blessing of Heaven have been enjoy’d by us and our Ancestors, ever since the Roman State began, that none of us should be forced to leave our Country, or to stay in it against our Wills. This is the immovable Foundation of our Liberty, that every Man is Master of his Right, and may keep or resign it as he pleases.

⁵ Vid. Lycurg. Orat. contr. Leocratem.⁶ Vid. Mariana de rebus Hisp. L. 13. c. 11.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on § 11, III.

¹ Luke iv. 24.² B. I. Od. 37. ver. 26, 27, 38. 1

way, it was a prudent Law of Solon's, which Plutarch mentions in his Life, by which he obliged the Athenians, "To admit no Persons into their Commonwealth, except such as were condemn'd to perpetual Banishment from their own Country, or else such as remov'd with their whole Families to Athens, for the Convenience of Trade and Employment in the Arts they profess'd. And this Law it was said he made, not so much to keep out Foreigners, as to invite them to settle at Athens, by giving them Assurance of incorporating them into the Body of the Commonwealth. For he made no Doubt, but both these sorts of People would make very good Subjects, the one because they voluntarily quitted, and the other because they were forced out of their own Country." But further, since the Commonwealth really hath no Power or Authority over Persons free from all Civil Obligations to it, it is manifest, that if the new Commonwealth they settle in, send them in Quality of Ambassadors or publick Ministers to the State they left; that they ought to be received agreeably to their Characters, and enjoy all the Privileges of Ambassadors, one of the chief of which is to be free from the Authority and Power of the Commonwealth they are sent to. For if this be thought too great an Honour to be shewn to Persons who have formerly been Subjects, 'tis easy to deny them Reception. Nay, to carry the Thing farther, if for Instance, a Subject in the Face of his own Commonwealth engage his Faith to a foreign State, in order to take upon him to negotiate for it there, under the Character of Ambassador and publick Minister; the Commonwealth must be supposed to have releas'd him from all Civil Obligations to itself. Since it is impossible the same Subject should be capable of two Obligations of the same Nature. And in consequence, that Person must from that Time be admitted to all the Rights and Privileges of an Ambassador in his own Country, which by a sort of Fiction he is supposed to have changed.

IV. But however, to depart in Companies, great Numbers together, Grotius thinks unlawful for this Reason, because such a Liberty would be utterly inconsistent with the Nature of civil Society. And in Morality that must be judged necessary, without which, an End propos'd cannot be attain'd; and that inconsistent with it, which prevents or destroys the End. But the Truth of this Opinion may I think be question'd², for if it be lawful for particular Subjects to remove as they please themselves, why is it not lawful for greater Numbers to take the same Liberty, who all propose to themselves the like Conveniences of bettering their Fortunes by changing their Country; supposing none of those Objections against it that were mentioned before? For it is nothing to the Purpose to answer, that by this Means the Commonwealth must be enfeebled and dissolv'd. For where a Person hath no Right to detain me contrary to my own Inclinations, he suffers no Injury, tho' perhaps by my Departure some future Benefit, but not yet due, is intercepted from him. There is no Necessity such a particular Commonwealth should have so many Millions of Subjects, or should always appear formidable to its Neighbours, any more than it is that any particular private Man should be worth so many thousand Pounds, though 'tis true indeed, that neither one nor the other ought to be reduced to a lower Condition by unjust Means. And therefore I think there is but little Force in Grotius's Argument. For though perhaps, this or that particular Commonwealth may be much weaken'd, or perhaps by continual Drains in Time be utterly despeopled, where the Subjects are permitted to desert in Numbers together; yet civil Society among Men is in no Danger of being absolutely dissolv'd by it. For the Corruption of one Commonwealth is the Generation of another, and what is lost in one Place, is gain'd in another. Nature, when Men began to increase and spread themselves over the World, formed and divided them into civil Societies, but never gave Command that such or such a particular Commonwealth should stand for ever in an uninterrupted Course of Greatness and Fortune. Babylon was exhausted by Solencia, and that by Ctesiphon. However, when Companies depart, they are obliged as well as particular Subjects, to depart out of the Dominions and Territories of the Commonwealth. For otherwise there must ensue such Distractions and Confusions, as would necessarily be fatal to all Governments, that is, if whole Cities or Provinces were allow'd Liberty to withdraw at Pleasure from their Obedience, and either to put themselves under the Protection of others, or to erect separate States of themselves.

V. I shall now in the next Place enquire, whether, and how far those Persons may be justified, that pretend to be Refugees and Deserters only with Design to injure them that receive them, and to bring some Advantage to their Prince or Country. It is not indeed to be excused from great Imprudence, to be easy in giving Credit to such sort of Men, 1 Sam. xxix. 4. nor does the World generally appear dissatisfied, that Traitors are punished after their Treason hath taken Effect.

Yet

^a V. Liv. l. 41. c. 8, 9.

^b Vid. Plin. Nat. Hist. l. 6. c. 26.

^c Vid. Vopif. in Aurelian. c. 23.

MR. BARB. NOTES on § III, IV.

¹ Plutarch, p. 21. F.

² Ubi supra.

³ Mr. Wember, Professor at Wittenberg, answers our Author (in his Elementa. J. N. and Genr. Cap. 26. Sect. 4.) that though particular Members of a Body, taken one by one, have such and such Rights, it does not always follow, that a whole Multitude must have them also, because there may have been some Reason which hinders the granting to a great Number of Men, what is allowed to a small one; as it is here, where it plainly appears, that it is the Interest of the State, that their Subjects do not remove out of it into another, in large Bodies. Besides, that is contrary to the original Contract, which forms Civil Governments, and by Virtue of which the Subjects are bound to act nothing that tends to the Destruction of the State. And it signifies nothing to say, that one State makes an Advantage of the Ruins of another. For the Contract here in Dispute, relates to the Advantage of that State into which they enter; and it is not with respect to Civil Governments in general; but in relation to the Interests of every particular State, that we must judge of the Extent of Engagements and Duties of Subjects. This is the Manner in which that Author defends the Opinion of Grotius. However, the Case here in Question can seldom happen, but when Princes have made themselves odious and unprofitable to their Subjects, by their tyrannical Government; and then it is certainly their Business to alter their Measures, if they are unwilling to see their Countries depopulated. Otherwise all the Prohibitions in the World would not be very prevailing, nor hinder their being forced in Time to reign over vast Deserts.

Yet it ought not to be thought therefore lawful or honourable for me to betray a Man, because I find him of an easy Temper, and likely to be taken by the Train I have laid for him. Nor is any Man obliged to serve his Country at the Expence of his Honour and Conscience, as has been already shewed. And without Dispute, for a Man to engage his Faith purely with Design to make Advantage by the Violation of it, in doing Harm to a secure and heedless Enemy, is a very great Sin. And it was no Question an execrable Saying of Lyfander's, or Philip's, That Children were to be cheated with Trifles, and Men with Oaths *. If therefore a Deferter expressly engages his Faith, he cannot break it without Sin, whatever Pretence or real Design he may have of advancing their Interest he deserted from. It may perhaps be replied, that since they that give Reception to Deserters, know before-hand, that they can do them no Service without Sin, and that no Man can lay any binding Obligation upon himself to commit Sin, and therefore that the Faith given by Deserters signifies nothing; it follows, that no Injury is done them, if they are imposed upon by their own Credulity in depending upon such slender Arguments. But I answer, that it is foreign to the Question, to enquire whether it be a Sin, or not, to make use of the Service of Deserters. For it does not follow, that if I sin myself, in imploying such a Person in my Service, that therefore for that Reason he hath a Right to do me an Injury. As it does not follow, that because if a Man hire a Ruffian to commit Murder, he contracts the same Guilt with the Villain himself, therefore it is lawful for the Ruffian to kill also the Person that hired him. It is commonly said indeed, that Deserters are received by the Laws of Arms †; that is, that it is contrary to the Laws of Arms, not to give Admittance to Persons that leave the Enemy, and come over to us, as Grotius and Cujacius explain that Law ‡. But whether we ought to understand this Passage of the external Laws of Arms (as Grotius calls it) or of the internal, may very well be Matter of Dispute. But however, if a Man will defend that all Persons have absolute Liberty to make use of the Assistance of Deserters; methinks it should not be thought so proper for the Purpose to insist, that even God himself makes use of the Actions of the Devil and wicked Men; as to plead the Favour which ought to be allow'd to the Justice of Arms taken up, either to punish the Insolence of an injurious Enemy, or to assert and regain just and oppressed Rights †. For upon the Supposition of this Favour, a Prince engaged in a just War needs not think himself obliged to make a curious Enquiry, whether the Deserters gave over Hostilities against him upon honourable Motives, or not. And since he may presume, that they had good Reasons that moved them to relinquish the Cause they were before engaged in, he cannot contract Guilt by seeming to give Encouragement to unjust Desertions. But however this be, 'tis certain, that it is utterly unlawful to make Faith an Instrument to deceive and abuse Mankind. And again, 'tis also certain, that where a Deferter owns he deserted without reasonable Cause, his Faith can signify little; since it must either tend to advance new Treasons, or to continue the old; and therefore that it must be very great Imprudence to lay any Stress upon it. But Deserters therefore, that propose to ingratiate themselves with them that receive them, and yet, to carry on their secret Design under the Mask of Refugees, generally pretend that the insupportable Nature of the Injuries they suffered, forced them to take this only Way for their Security. The Stories of Zopyrus † and Sextus Tarquinius are very well known; and what Arts the one used to gain upon the Credulity of the Babylonians, and the other upon the Gabinians ‡. So Mizeras the Syrian, as Florus calls him, or Aberus the Arabian, as Aspian, or Ariamnes, as Plutarch, that drew Craffus into the Plains, gained Credit with him by extolling the Favours and Obligations he had received from Pompey, and by relating the Misfortunes he had suffer'd in espousing the Roman Cause. Virgil § seems to describe the Cunning of Sinon with more than usual Life and Beauty, that he might free the Trojans from the Impuration of being an imprudent credulous People. For first, Sinon pretends he was a Person mortally hated by Ulysses, a Man the Trojans would easily think bad enough to be guilty of any Fraud that could be charged upon him, and to whom to be an Enemy was with them the greatest Recommendation. The Cause of this Animosity between Ulysses and himself he then derives from the Death of Palamedes, who was put to Death for having imposed the continuing the War. He goes on with his Story, that he was at last doom'd to be sacrificed, not by any Oracle or Command from the Gods, that he might not seem to have refused even to be made a Victim for the common Safety; but only by the Malice of Calchas, who was suborn'd and hired to do it by Ulysses. And certainly an Injury of so high a Nature as this might very well justify him in saying, he thought himself now releas'd from all Obligations to his Country. And yet with much persuasive Art and Cunning, he first of all beseeches Heaven that it might now be lawful for him to renounce Faith and Love with those Greeks, that were so unjust and unkind to him, tho' he had once considered them as Country Men and Fellow-Subjects. And yet all he could say

* Vid. Ælium. For. Hist. l. 7. c. 12.† F. D. l. 41. De acquirend. rerum dominio, l. 51.‡ Cujac. Orl. 2. c. 9. Grot. l. 3. c. 1. § 22.§ Liv. l. 22. c. 22. Vid. ap. eund. Orat. Diatribis, l. 27. c. 17. and that of Cn. Marcius to the Volterri, in Dionys. Halicarnass. l. 8. And that of Segestes, in Lucius. Ann. l. 1. c. 58. Neque oho patria, &c. This I did, not out of any ill-will I bear to my Country (for Traitors are hated even by those they design'd by their Treason to oblige) but because I look'd upon it to be the common Concern both of Romans and Germani, and because I was more inclined to Peace than War. V. Ann. Marcellin. l. 18. c. 11. in fin.

Mr. BARR. NOTES on § v.

† See the sixth Chapter of this Book, § 15.

‡ V. Herodot. l. 3. & Justin. l. 1. c. 10.§ Liv. l. 1. c. 53. 54.§ V. Virgil. Æneid. l. 5. 57. 65.

say was hardly enough to overcome the Trojans, till the Gods themselves seem'd to confirm the Truth of what he had said by a very ominous Accident. But after all, 'tis certainly true, that a Deferter that comes over to an Enemy singly by himself, without betraying some considerable Advantage to him, brings but a poor Prize with him either of Credit or Value. But however such Persons are not to be look'd upon as Deserters, that go privately to an Enemy with Design to surprize, or make a sudden Attack upon him, without engaging their Faith to draw their Swords in his Assistance. And it is not to be supposed, that such are under any tacit Engagement upon this Account, because 'tis not probable they would make any Attempt against an Enemy, when they were within his Reach. For such a tacit Obligation can be presumed only in Persons, who go over to a foreign State in Time of Peace, and not in War.

VI. The next Enquiry I shall make, is, whether the Commonwealth on the other hand can forcibly eject the Subject at Pleasure, and without antecedent Transgression? Cicero, in the Passage before cited, makes it one of the Foundations of Liberty, that a Subject should not be forced to change his Country. But now admitting this to be true, the State of the Commonwealth is not therefore granted to be inferior in the least to that of private Subjects, because they are allowed to have Liberty to remove as they please, when the Commonwealth has not Power to force them to depart against their Will. For when a Man puts himself under the Protection of any Commonwealth, he does, at least for the present, entrust himself and Fortune entirely with it, and that, at least, must necessarily be exposed to Distraction and Ruin, if he may at any Time be forcibly ejected from it. And since this would be the greatest Hardship imaginable upon the Subject, every Man must be supposed to have made an Agreement with the State, that he should not be forced to leave it contrary to his own Demerits. But now on the other hand, the Commonwealth doth not build its Fortune and Security upon a few common Subjects, and therefore loses little or nothing by the Departure of some few of them. For where the great and particular Trust is placed in any Subject of extraordinary Value, 'tis usual to oblige him by particular Ties and Agreements not to leave the Commonwealth without Licence from the Government. And certainly it hardly deserves any Man's Envy, that the Subject in this particular should be allowed to have more Liberty than the Commonwealth. For the other Advantages which the Commonwealth enjoys more than, and beyond the Subject, are of much larger Extent. So when a Subject refuses to conform to the Commands of the Sovereign, 'tis an easy Thing to force him to comply. But when a Subject is dissatisfied with the publick Administration, he hath nothing else to do, but to submit and be patient, or to remove.

But however, there is sometimes a less incidious Way made use of in Commonwealths to remove suspected or useles Subjects; or burdensome Numbers of them, to make room for the others; and that is, by sending them abroad in Colonies. Tho' Colonies indeed generally consist of Persons that voluntarily offer themselves, either upon the Hopes of mending a broken and decay'd Fortune; or else, that are out of Humour with the Government, and willing to be out of its Sight, when they find they are not to expect Favours from it. So Isocrates persuaded Philip "to build a Cities in Asia, and to people them with such sort of Persons, whose Poverty forced them to lead loose vagabond Lives, and to rob and pillage the Country; in short with the Scum and Refuse of the People." And he commends the Prudence of that Method in the Athenians^b. What Account is to be given of that Custom, common among the Antients, both of barbarous Nations as well as the Greeks, of sending out great Numbers of their young People in search of new Seats, as it were, under the Conduct of some titular God, to whom they were supposed sacred, may be seen at large in Dionysius Halicarn. l. i. And the same Author is of Opinion, that the Aborigines were a Settlement of this kind, that is, of young People, who after the Custom of their Countries had been consecrated to the Gods, sent in Quest of new Seats, and that settled wherever their Valour or Fortune carried them^c. And so Pliny tells us, that the Prentes were sent out by the Sabines, upon a Vow which they look'd upon to be secret. And Strabo says the Sannites were descended from the Sabines the same Way^d. "So Lydus and Tyrrenus (as Paterculus tells the Story) upon a great Scarcity, threw Lots which of them should take his Share of the People, and go in search of new Seats^e." And Paulus Warnefridus † gives very near the same Account of the People of Scandinavia. But Colonies may be, and often are settled in different Methods. For either the Colony continues a Part of the Commonwealth it was sent out from; or else is obliged only to pay dutiful Respect to the Mother Commonwealth, and to be in a Readiness to defend and vindicate its Honour, and so is united to it by a sort of unequal Confederacy; or lastly, is erected into a separate Commonwealth, and assumes the same Rights with the State it is descended from.

VII. A Man ceases to be a Subject against his Will, when for some Crime, whether truly or wrongfully laid to his Charge, he is ejected out of the Commonwealth. For when the Commonwealth refuses to own any Man for a Member of it, and forces him to depart the Dominions; he is releas'd from all Obligations which before, as a Subject, he ow'd to it. Upon which he is left to his own Choice to settle where he can. And as long as he continues in this Exile, the Commonwealth hath no Authority over him. So Isolaus †† said, that the Agrives had no Power to bring

^a Orat. ad Philip.

^b In Panathenaisic. See Bacon's Essays, c 33.

^c Dionys. Halicarn. l. 1. c. 13.

^d Strabo, l. 5. Vid. Justin. l. 24. c. 4. & Festus in Ver sacrum & in Mamertoni Lib. l. 34. c. 44.

† Paulus Warnefridus de gestis Longobardorum, l. 1. c. 2.

† Europ. Hieradid. ver. 186.

^e Paterculus. l. 1. c. 1.

bring him away from Athens, when they had before condemn'd him to Banishment. But certainly to be forced into Banishment, if upon a false Accusation, is a very great Injury (though a Man of Courage will not want Supports under such a Misfortune.) And if upon a real Crime, a very severe Punishment, Philo the Jew thinks it worse than Death itself ^a. For though the exiled Person may perhaps be allowed to enjoy the best or greatest Part of his Estate in his Banishment, yet the Difficulties and Inconveniences that must attend removing it to another Place are unavoidable. It must be allowed too, that it is a very sensible Affliction to a Man to be forced to part with his Relations and Friends; and besides, to be judged a Person unfit to live any longer in the Commonwealth is a severe Disgrace, and must leave a foul Blot upon a Man's Honour and Memory ^b; nor can a Man have lost less than all Sense of Shame, that can have no Apprehensions of the Infamy of it ^c. Tully saith much on the other hand to the contrary, but it does not seem to me of much Force ^d. “Banishment, says he, is so far from being a Punishment, that I think it a Refuge only and Security from it. For when Men fly from Punishment and Misfortune, they only change the Air and Soil, remove and settle in other Countries. And therefore, by the Roman Law, Exile is never made a Punishment, as it is in those of other Commonwealths. But when Men would avoid Imprisonment, Death, or Ignominy, or other Punishments which the Laws appoint, they take Sanctuary in Exile; if they choose to stay in the Commonwealth, and suffer the Law, 'tis certain they cannot be deprived of the Right of Subjects, but with their Lives; but because there are none that will make that Choice, their Rights are not forcibly taken away from them, but they voluntarily relinquish and resign them ^e.” It was indeed peculiar to the ancient Roman Constitution, that no Man should be forcibly deprived of his Right of being a Member of that State ^f. And by the Porcian and Sempronian Laws it was provided, that no Magistrate should inflict capital Punishment on any Citizen without the People's Consent. But that Criminals might not enjoy absolute Impunity, and none seem to be ejected, or forced to quit his Privilege of a Citizen, they would have had it believed, that the Citizens voluntarily chose Exile to escape Punishment ^g. But the Necessity of the Delinquents leaving his Country was sufficiently implied in the forbidding all that were condemn'd to Capital Punishment, the Use of Fire and Water within the Roman Dominions. Though it is to be confess'd, that when Banishment is inflicted, Care should be taken that the Commonwealth may be secure from all Danger that may happen, by making the Person banished an Enemy to it. For which Reason some Nations never punish with Banishment; as the Turks and Moscovites now, and formerly the Jews, tho' they might be rather supposed to have Regard to other Reasons, viz. that they might not change their Religion. The Relegatio is a milder sort of Punishment, by which the Criminal is not entirely divested of the Right of a Subject, but is only confined to inhabit within a particular District, or else prohibited coming within a particular Part of the Dominions. They that lay under this latter Penalty, were by the Romans properly called (Interdicti) Persons interdicted ^h. But to be banished some particular Countries and People, may well enough be thought no Punishment; as Diogenes said, when one told him that the Sinopenes had condemn'd him to Banishment, And I have condemn'd them to stay where they are.

VIII. Again, a Man is forced, against his Will, to change his Commonwealth, when he is subdued and mastered by a powerful Enemy, is forced to put himself under his Protection, and to submit to his Authority as a Subject, whether at the same Time he be removed into another Country, or not. And this Method must be allowed to be lawful, not only for particular Subjects to take, at least for such as are under none but the common Obligations of Subjection; but also for entire Cities and Provinces, when they find no other Way left for their Safety and Preservation ⁱ.

IX. Sometimes also it happens, that a Subject upon Injury done by him to a foreign Commonwealth, is by his own Sovereign deliver'd up to the injured State, to prevent Wars that might otherwise follow upon his Account. Herodotus, in his Calliope ^j, gives us the Story of Timeginides and Attaginus to this Purpose, who had been Authors of engaging the Thebans in an Alliance with the Persians. And here a Question is moved, whether a Subject surrender'd by his own State or Commonwealth, but not accepted by the other, continues a Member of that which was his own, or not? P. Mutius was of Opinion that he did not ^k, because when a Subject is deliver'd up by the publick Voice and Consent of the People, he seems to be as much

excedit

^a Philo Judaeus de Abrahamo, p. 359. A. Ed. Paris.

^c As Juvenal describes Marius, Sat. 1. ver. 47, 48, 49.

————— Hic damnatus inani
Judicio, &c.
Exul ab octava Marius bibit & fruitur Divis Iratis —————

^b Oppian. Halient. l. 1. ver. 274, &c.

————— Contemns his Infamy,
Can rise at Twelve, and get him drunk ere Three;
Enjoys his Exile, and's condemn'd in vain.

^d Vid. Cic. Orat. pro Cæcina, c. 34.

^e V. Polyb. l. 6. c. 12.

^f Cic. pro domo sua c. 29. Hoc jus à majoribus proditum, &c. c. 29. This is a Right we all received from our Ancestors, That no Roman Citizen should ever lose that Privilege, but by his own Choice.

^g Dionorus Siculus, l. 3. c. 5. mentions an Institution of a quite contrary Nature among the Æthiopiens. Sallust. Bell. Catilin. c. 50. Cæsar in his Oration to the Senate tells them, That there were Laws by which no Citizen's Life could be taken from him; but that after Condemnation he should be permitted to go into Exile; and again afterward, Banishment was always allow'd the condemn'd Criminal.

^h Vid. Brillon. Select. Antiq. l. 3. c. 5. Anton. Matthæ. de Crimin. ad Tit. de Pæna, c. 1. § 6. 10.

ⁱ Vid. Groc. L. 2. c. 6. § 5.

Mr. BARB. NOTES ON §. IX.

^j Pag. 344 Ed. H. Steph.

^k See Groc. B. 2. c. 21. § 4.

^l Vid. D. L. 50. t. 7. De Legat. l. 17.

ejected out of the Commonwealth as he would be, had he been forbid the Use of Fire and Water. And the same Question was disputed with great Heat in the Case of *Mancinus*⁴, who had been surrender'd at Numantium, but not received. For when Mancinus afterwards offered to go in to take his Place in the Senate, Rutilus the Tribune of the Commons stopp'd him, and refused him Admission; telling him, that when the Pater Patratus, to release the Commonwealth from the Obligations of the Treaty he had sign'd, surrender'd him up to the Enemies of the Roman State, he then ceased to be a Roman Citizen. However, when the Case was debated and put to the Vote, the Majority declared in favour of him; and among others for this Reason, That no Person could properly be said to have been delivered, who was not accepted by the Party the Offer was made to. Now to me the State of the Controversy seems to be this, The Commonwealth that suffer'd the Injury, hath a Right to prosecute the Subject of the foreign State with War. But by the Surrender of him he is entirely consigned over to the injured Commonwealth, and may be punished as one of its own Subjects. And if he be received, the Commonwealth he was formerly a Member of, must be supposed to quit all Right to him; since by publick Consent and Approbation, he is delivered up to the Authority of the foreign State. But if the injured Commonwealth refuse the Offer, and decline the Acceptance of the surrender'd Person, the State that offered the Surrender may dispose of him as it pleases, and may either absolutely eject, or punish him according to the Demerits of his Crime. But if no Punishment happen to be inflicted on him, it is not to be supposed that he hath lost the Right of a Subject. For the Act of Surrender is in itself only a Tender made to the foreign State of that Right, which every Commonwealth hath over its own Subjects, and not an utter Abdication and Renunciation of him. And therefore the Surrender doth not in itself deprive any Man of the Right of a Subject, unless it be declared by any particular Law in express Words, that in a Concurrence of such Circumstances, the Person shall be supposed to have forfeited all Rights of a Subject. And Cicero is of the same Opinion. For, says he⁵, *A Citizen that hath been deliver'd by the Pater Patratus, if he is not accepted by the Enemy, retains the Rights and Privileges of a Citizen entire*⁶. But from what hath been said it may be inferr'd, that if the Surrender is accepted, and afterward the Person that was given up should happen by some Chance or other to return to his own Country again; he cannot be admitted as a Subject, but by a new Grant of *Favour*⁷. For the Right of Postliminium belongs only to Persons forced to submit to an Enemy's Power, contrary to the Consent and Approbation of their own Commonwealth; not to those that are voluntarily given up to foreign Authority by their own State.

⁴ Cic. Orat. pro Cæna, c. 24.

⁵ Vid. L. 49. t. 15. l. 4. D. de Captiv. & Postlim. &c.

Mr. BARB. NOTES on §. 18.

⁶ Vid. Freinshemii Supplementor. Livianor. Decad. in Lib. 55.

⁷ Vid. Cicero. Topie. in c. 8. Vid. etiam de Orat. l. 1. c. 40. & l. 2. c. 22.

C H A P. XII.

Of the Changes and Dissolution of the Commonwealth.

The CONTENTS of every Paragraph of the Twelfth Chapter.

- | | |
|--|---|
| I. The People continue the same, tho' the Form of the Commonwealth be changed. II. The Debts of the Commonwealth not discharged by a Change in the Form of it. III. The Acts of an Usurper, how far valid after his Government is expir'd. IV. What Place a Commonwealth may challenge after a Change in it. | V. One Commonwealth may divide into more. VI. More may unite into one. VII. The People, how eternal? VIII. How the Materiale of the People may be destroy'd. IX. How the Formale. |
|--|---|

CHANGES happen in the Commonwealth three Ways; First, it may be so changed as still to continue the same; secondly, it may be so changed as still to continue, tho' not the same it was before; thirdly, it may be so changed as to be utterly destroy'd. The first sort of Change happens when the Form of the Commonwealth is changed; as when a Monarchy changes into an Aristocracy, or an Aristocracy or Democracy change themselves into a Monarchy¹. For in either of these Changes the essential Form of Civil Government is still preserved, only the accidental Form which results from the proper Subject of sovereign Power is changed². So that the People are the same, whether the Government be Monarchical, Aristocratical, or Popular. Nay, tho' it should happen, that a free People should in some War with a Sovereign Prince, be reduced to so entire a Subjection, as to be made an Accession to his Patrimony, yet they do not cease to be the same People as long as the Conqueror governs them as a distinct and separate Kingdom, and does not annex them as a Province to another People. For since the People in a large Extent may be supposed to comprehend the sovereign Power, it is no material Difference, whether the Prince exercises the Government over them in the most full and absolute Manner, or not. For either Way he is Head of one and the same Body.

II. From what hath been said, the Question proposed by Aristotle³ may be answered, Whether if a Commonwealth, from a Tyranny, or an Oligarchy, become a free Popular State, it be obliged⁴ after such a Change to observe the Treaties, Capitulations, Pacts, Convents, and other Acts, made during the Government of the Tyrant or Oligarchy? The Reasons of the Negative are, that the Acts of a Tyrant or Oligarchy are not Acts of the Commonwealth, and that the Commonwealth can be obliged by its own Acts; that the Commonwealth is concern'd only where the Advancement of the publick Good is consider'd, and that where it is otherwise, the Right and Name of a Commonwealth is abused, and Force and Violence only have the Rule. But these Reasons are certainly weak. For not to repeat what was said before⁵ concerning Tyranny; a distemper'd and disorder'd Head is certainly a Head; and the Acts of an Head, though indispos'd, are look'd upon to be Acts of the Commonwealth. And a Commonwealth must not be denied a Being, because it is in some Disorder. There was a Dispute of this Nature formerly among the Athenians which begun on this Occasion: The Thirty that govern'd the Athenian State, borrow'd Money of the Lacedemonians upon publick Faith; after the Athenians had ejected the Thirty, and recovered their Liberty, the Lacedemonians demanded their Money of them; the Matter was debated at Athens, and it was resolv'd that it was just, and for the Peace of the State, to pay it. Demosthenes's Opinion of the Case was †, *That the People chose rather to pay the Money, than not make good their Articles of Agreement; and again (he says) speaking to the Athenians, And then you consented to pay your Money to those that had injured you, rather than go back from any Part of your Articles*⁶. Nay, though a Commonwealth should be reduced to a Province, and lose the very Nature of a Commonwealth, yet the Debts it has contracted are still due. For Debts being founded in the Commonwealth, not precisely as such a Commonwealth, but as possess'd of certain Goods, whoever is Master of those, must take the Debts with them.

III. But tho' the Case seems to be beyond Dispute, as to the Debts contracted for the Use

* See Isocrates in Areopag.

Mr. BARE. NOTES on Chap. XII. §. II.

† Demosthenes contra Leptin. The Author propos'd this for two different Reasons; and yet afterwards he refutes it himself but as one single Reason. Indeed there is but one with its Proof. For if the Commonwealth is not obliged to discharge the Debts, and observe the other Acts and Engagements of an absolute Monarch, or of a small Number of Men, who had got the Administration of the Government into their Hands; 'tis according to them, because what was done is not look'd upon to have been done by such a King, or by such Magistrates. And the Reason why it is not look'd upon as being done, is because the Dominion of these Men was not founded upon the publick Good, but only upon the Superiority of their Force and Violence; and consequently that it was not lawful: From whence they would infer, that the People ought not to stand to what they did in their Name, but without their Consent.

¹ See Græc. B. 2. c. 9. § 3.

² See above, in B. 7. c. 5. § 1.

³ Aristot. Pol. l. 3. c. 7.

⁴ See Græc. nos. § 17.

⁵ In B. 7. c. 8. § 3, 8.

of the Commonwealth, and supposed to continue upon the whole Body of it; yet whether all the Acts of an Usurper will fall under the like Determination, when he is deposed or ejected, is still a Question. If an Usurper indeed make a League with a foreign State for mutual Supplies of Aid against some common Enemy, and then either divide the Booty of War with his Confederate, or sell Part of it to him; the League, the Donation, and the Sale, must continue in Force after the Usurper is deposed. For the foreign Commonwealth acquires a solid Right from such Acts, because it agreed upon them with the Usurper as Head of his Commonwealth, and in Appearance for its Interest and Advantage: And there was no Reason why the foreign Commonwealth should concern itself what Title the Usurper might have to his Government; supposing there be no other Fault in the Acts supposed. But then the Difficulty is, if any Usurper by Oppression and Violence rise his own Subjects of their Goods and Fortunes, and sell them to foreign States, whether upon Dissolution of Government, they can demand them back again? Baccler thinks they may; and that if they that bought them did it advisedly and deliberately, they ought to acknowledge their Fault, and be content to part with what they could neither buy, nor the other sell, without Injustice. He adds, nay, though they knew nothing of the Case when they bought them. All which may perhaps appear reasonable enough in Foro Conscientiæ; but if we consider the general Practice of the World, I don't see how the Sufferers can recover what they have been thus deprived of. For as long as the Usurper continues his Oppressions, he is look'd upon to be an Enemy to the Commonwealth, and the Spails he takes from his Subjects, when transferr'd to foreign States, are retain'd with the same Pretences of Right as other Acquisitions of War'. But if the Usurper's Government has been confirmed by the Consent of his Subjects, Foreigners may pretend Right to the Goods of his Subjects, as lawfully confiscated. For as in other Cases, Nations at Peace with, and unconcern'd in the Wars of their Neighbours, treat the Parties engaged with equal Respect, attending only to the Event: So foreign States are not supposed to be concern'd what Measures their Neighbours take in their Government at home. But the unjust Acts of Usurpers which are confin'd within the Commonwealth, may, when their Government expires, be rescinded and repeal'd by a lawful Power, as far as the Occasions of the Commonwealth require. And by the Acts is also meant, not only the Laws they made, but all Grants and Alienations whatsoever, contrary to the Constitutions of the Commonwealth.

IV. In the next Place, it is a common Question, What Place ought to be allowed Princes that have raised themselves to sovereign Power over People before free, and what to free People after Extirpation of kingly Government? To this Grotius answers^b, that a Commonwealth may challenge the same Place after such a Change, which it had by itself, or Representative in any Assembly before. But to me it seems necessary to distinguish, whether, for Example, the Prince that has obtain'd the Government of the People before free, continue in the Assembly or System he was before Member of: Or whether he divides from it, and enters upon a separate Administration of his own Affairs. For in the first Case, without Dispute he can have no Pretence to any other Place than what the free People were before contented with, notwithstanding that Greatness and Majesty with which the Persons of sovereign Princes are invested. And so on the other hand, a free People after Extirpation of kingly Government, may demand the same Place in any Common Assembly which was allow'd to their Princes before. But if the Prince or People separate from their old Assemblies or System, the Place that antiently belonged to them ought to be no Prejudice to them, or be any Argument for the Precedence of others that had formerly that Privilege in the common Assembly; since all sovereign Powers are naturally equal.

V. Changes which so disguise the Commonwealth, that it appears no longer the same, happen generally these two Ways; either first, when one Commonwealth breaks into two, or more; or secondly, when many distinct Commonwealths unite into one. The first may be the Effect either of mutual Consent, or else of Force of War'. Different Commonwealths may be form'd out of one by common Consent, by sending out Colonies in the Manner usual in Old Greece. For the Romans afterward (who are follow'd now by the Nations of Europe) when they sent a Colony abroad, continued it under the Jurisdiction of the Mother Commonwealth, or greater Country. But the Colonies planted by the Greeks, and, after their Method, constituted particular Commonwealths, were oblig'd only to pay a kind of Deference and dutiful Submission to their Mother Commonwealth. But however, a Colony settled after this Form is not obliged to pay the Debts contracted by the Mother Commonwealth, unless that Article was expressly agreed upon when the Colony was settled. Because all publick Debts in the last Resort affect the Goods and Effects of the Commonwealth, which the Colony (tis supposed) hath no Share in. And tho' particular Persons in the Colony might perhaps have enjoy'd the Benefit of those Debts, while they were Members of the old Commonwealth; yet when the Mother Commonwealth dismisses them free, it seems to declare that they shall not be liable to pay any Thing upon that Account. But indeed, upon a stricter View, the Commonwealth is not really in itself changed upon the sending out Colonies; neither doth it cease to appear the same; but only as in a natural Generation, one Commonwealth gives Birth to another. But where a Kingdom divides by common Consent into two or more distinct Commonwealths, the publick Patrimony, with ^a Boeder. Dissert. de eo quod agit Civitas,

^b L. 2. c. 9. § 8.

^c Vid. Touss. l. 1. Hen. Valerius ad Excerpt. Peiresc. p. 6. & 7. Hobbes de Cive, c. 9. § 8.

¹ See Grot. B. 3 c. 9. §. 4.

² See Grot. ubi supra, § 10.

with all the Debts and Incumbrances upon them, ought to be equally shared among them. Tho' indeed when such Separations are made by mutual Agreement, there is commonly express Provision made for such Cases.

VI. Another Change in the Commonwealth, and by which it ceaseth to be the same, is where two People unite (not by way of Confederacy or Subjection to one common Sovereign, but) in such a manner that the two States grow entirely into one. In which Case *Grotius*¹ thinks, that the Rights, which the particular Commonwealths that make the Union enjoy'd before, are not lost, but communicated to the whole Body, as also the Debts and Incumbrances, unless the contrary hath been particularly agreed upon². But it must be consider'd, whether the two or more People unite with Design to erect a new Commonwealth, where all are to enjoy the same Rights; as suppose two distinct People subject to a Government of the Populace abolish their Form of Constitution, and unite into one Kingdom; or two Kingdoms take away their fundamental Laws, displace the antient Line Royal, and set up a new Kingdom. By this Union'tis manifest, that their former Commonwealths are subverted, and a new one erected upon their Ruins. But when one Commonwealth unites with another, in such Manner that one keeps its Government and States, and the Subjects of the other change their Country, and are taken into the Rights and Privileges of the foreign Commonwealth, it is evident that one is swallowed up and lost in the other. But that which remains doth not cease to be the same, though from such an Accession it receiveth a considerable Increase in Strength and Power. But there are no Ways of uniting distinct Commonwealths, so that each shall preserve its own separate Constitutions, and be as it was before; but by strict Alliance and Confederacy, which rather gives Rise to a System than a Commonwealth, properly so call'd.

VII. The last Change, that by which the Commonwealth entirely ceaseth to be, happens when the People themselves are either dissolv'd or *destroy'd*³. It is a common Saying, that *Kings are mortal, but Commonwealths eternal*⁴. By which it is not meant, that it is impossible that a People should ever be scatter'd or utterly extinguished by any Violence or fatal Period; but that they do not suffer such Decays of Nature, as particular Men do, after a certain Course of Years. For though Individuals change, yet there continues a constant Succession, either by Resort from neighbouring States, or by the natural Iiues of Procreation at home. By a continual Course of which Successions the People always appear the same, and possess the same Rights and Privileges, tho' particular Subjects are frequently changed⁵, as Virgil saith of his Bees,

*Ergo ipsas quamvis angustus terminus ævi
Excipiat (neque enim plus septima ducitur ætas)
At genus immortale manet, multosque per annos
Stat fortuna domus, & ævi numerantur avorum.*

Tho' seven short Springs conclude their vital Date,
Yet by re-peopling their decaying State,
Their antient Stocks eternally remain,
And in an endless Race their Childrens Children reign.

Mr. Addison.

The Sense of the old Philosophers upon the Diversity of Bodies will perhaps give us a clearer View of this Matter. And Plutarch tells us⁶, that some Bodies (according to them) are compounded of Parts disjoint'd, as a Navy, an Army, and the like; others consist of compact'd Parts; as an House, a Ship, &c. a third Sort are framed of united Parts, such as are combin'd into one Nature, as *every particular Animal*⁷. Which in other Words may be thus express'd; a Body in general is a Thing contain'd by some Habitude, Coherence, or Tie, so that it constitute one. The Ligament or Tie, by which the Parts of a Body are join'd and united, is threefold; natural, artificial, and moral. The natural Tie or Bond, is that by which natural Bodies are contain'd; the artificial, is that by which Things otherwise divided in Nature, are by human Industry brought to Unity and Community; and the moral Tie, lastly, is that by which several Individuals are connected by human Institution, and supposed to make one Body. And this Body may indeed consist of Beasts, as in a Flock or Herd: But here I suppose it to extend no further than to a Combination of a Number of Men. And from these different Modes of Union, result those three Sorts of Bodies, the natural, artificial, and moral. All which are supposed to continue the same, as long as that Connection which at first join'd the Parts together, is not all at once dissolved and broken. And thus therefore a Man still appears the same, tho' innumerable little Particles of his Body perspire; and are constantly supplied with new, from the Nutrimment he takes in⁸. And though some of the Antients thought Thesens's Ship (about which they had so many Disputes) the same; though in Tract of Time it went through so many Repairs, that hardly any Thing remain'd of the Materials it was first built with⁹. Plutarch says

¹ Vid. Liv. l. 1. c. 52. init.

² Vide Lucianum, in amoribus. p. 555. Ed. Amst. T. 1. Nature, being sensible that we were all framed of perishing Matter, and that Fate had given so short a Period to every Man's Life, provided that the Loss of one Man should be repair'd by the Birth of another; and balanced the Number of them that died with a new Generation, that so by continued Successions we might, in some Sense, live to Immortality, Virg. Georg. l. 4. ver. 206, &c.

³ Vide L. 41. t. 2. l. 30. D. de Usurp. Uti cap. & L. 6. t. 1. l. 23. § 5. D. de rei vindicat. Seneca Epist. 102.

⁴ Brown. Relig. Med. § 26. This very Body I carry about me came in at my Mouth, and all this Bulk of Flesh lay once upon my Trencher; in fine we devour our own selves. Seneca Epist. 58. Plut. de Ei apud Dolph. Edit. Xylani. p. 392. A. B. Lucian. l. 3. ver. 560, &c. But this Passage must be cautiously interpreted, that it may not reach the Article of the Resurrection.

⁵ Plut. Thesens. p. 10. C. Yd. L. 5. t. 1. l. 76. D. de Judicis. Vid. L. 7. t. 4. l. 10. D. quibus modis Ufus fructus amittitur. Tho' this Law seems to be contrary to those in L. 46. t. 3. l. 98. § ult. D. de Solution. in L. 53. § 5. Vid. Dionysium Halicarnassicum, l. 1. de Cas. Remuli. Alex. ab Alexandro, l. 3. c. 1. Mich. Piccardus ad Polit. Aristot. l. 3. c. 3.

MR. BARB. NOTES ON § VI, VII.

¹ Ubi supra. § 9.

² Vid. Grotium, ubi supra, § 3.

³ Tiber. apud Tacit. Annal. l. 3. c. 8.

says on this Subject ^a, A Commonwealth is one entire Body, which comprehends a Number of Members, and resembles the natural, that it neither loseth its Nature by Succession of Years, nor is it liable to change by Alteration of Time, but always preserves the same Affections and Properties, that are agreeable to its Constitution, as long as it continues united by common Ties and Obligations, and preserves the Unity of a publick Body. He adds, that particular Men are more exposed to the Injuries of Time, than Commonwealths; for if a Man be absent from his Friend but a few Years; at his Return he discovers a Change in his Constitution and Face, and often such Alterations in his Humour and Behaviour, that he hardly knows him again. But if a Man after thirty Years Absence, come again into the same Commonwealth, he not only finds the same Houses and Buildings, but the same Institutions, and the same Manners and Dispositions in the People ^b. Tho' indeed it is impossible but in a long Course of Time, a Nation should receive some Alterations, and not appear the same as to all Effects ^c. Hobbes (Philos. Prim. c. 11. § 7.) chooseth to express the same Thing thus, When any Thing is denominated from such a Form, which is the Principle of Motion in it, as long as that Principle remains, the Individual is the same.

VIII. But notwithstanding the Truth of all this, it is possible for a Commonwealth to be utterly destroy'd; and that either when the Materiale of the People, or whole Number of Subjects, perish or scatter, or when the moral Tie which joins the People together is utterly broken and dissolved; the Materiale or Body of the People perishes, either when the Parts absolutely necessary to the Subsistence of the Body are taken away, or when the Body itself is destroy'd. Grotius ^d gives several Instances of Nations utterly destroy'd all at once, by publick Fatalities. And here Enquiry may be made, whether if after such a general Desolation some weak Remains are left that cannot be call'd a People, they may be supposed to retain the Rights of their antient Nation? Grotius is of Opinion, l. ii. c. 9. § 4. that the Propriety which the People had, as they were private Persons, might still subsist in their Remains, but that nothing belongs to them which agreed to the People as such; that is, that they may claim Inheritance of the Possessions and Substance of those that were once their Fellow Subjects, but have no Right to assume Sovereign Power, or any of those Rights that are the necessary Consequents of it ^e. But however, if the few that are left were reduced to so thin a Number not by War, but some other casual Misfortunes, and are able to defend themselves against the Invasions of their Neighbours, till either by Supplies of their own Growth, or by Invitations to others to settle among them, they grow up again into a People, I see no Reason why they may not claim the Rights of the former People ^f. Especially since it has not yet been agreed what Number of Masters of Families is necessary to make a People; and since when first Mankind divided into Nations, a very small Number made a People. In Justin & Artaxerxes's fifty Sons are call'd Tantus Populus, and Niole calls her fourteen Children a People ^g. Again a Multitude of Men of which a People consists is broken and dissolved, when not every particular Subject perishes; but when upon Pestilence, Discontent, or Sedition, they voluntarily desert and scatter elsewhere; or else are disunited, and forcibly carried away, so that they can never meet or make Head again. And therefore it was Flattery rather than Truth, when the People of Urum boasted, that they were Ancestors to the Romans ^h.

IX. The Form or Species of the People is destroy'd ⁱ, if either the whole or the perfect Community of Right be lost. The Community of Right and Government is entirely lost, when the Subjects scatter different Ways, and settle in different Commonwealths, whether they retain personal Liberty, or are forced to submit to a Condition of Slavery; the Story of Capua is an Example of this Nature ^j. A perfect Community of Right between the Members of the same Commonwealth is lost; when though the particular Subjects are allowed their personal Liberty, and are permitted to inhabit their own Cities, and live in their own Country, yet they are under the Government and Dominion of a foreign State. And such a People are usually said to be reduced into the Form of a Province. But barely the changing Country, evacuating Towns, demolishing Ports, are not Alterations sufficient to make a People cease to be the same.

^a Plurarch. de sera Num. Vindict. p. 555. B. C. Edit. Mech. He also says, p. 559. ibid. that a Commonwealth may be compared to an Animal, that does not become unlike itself, by the different Changes that happen to it with Time, and which has different Ages, without ever changing for all that its Nature; but has always the same essential Properties, and is antient or commendable for every Thing it does or has done as such, as long as the same Ties and Compacts which unite it remain pure and undisturbed. So that to conceive a Commonwealth as different, only because the Members that compos'd it are a new Generation of People, is as if one Man were made several distinct Persons, as being a Child, a Youth, and an old Man.

^b Vid. Grot. l. 2. c. 9.

^c Vid. Supra. l. 8. c. 3. § 29.

^d L. 2. c. 9. § 4. Vid. l. 7. r. 4. l. 21. § 1. D. quibus modis Ulusfruct. amitt. &c.

^e Vid. D. d. l.

^f Vid. Justin. l. 5. c. 6. n. 5.

^g L. 10. c. 1. n. 6. Orul. Met. l. 6. ver. 127.

^h Apuleius Apo'log. Fifteen Freemen make a People. Vid. l. 3. r. 4. l. 7. §. 2. D. quod casu' quoque Univerlit. &c. Where the Title of a Community (a Corporation, not a Commonwealth) is said to remain in one Person, but that he is never a Necessity of taking in distinctions in Time.

ⁱ Vid. Suchman. Rer. Scot. l. 4. fin. How the Seats were dispers'd by Maximus Just. l. 28. c. 1. & l. 31. c. 8.

^j Grot. ubi supra, § 6.

^k Vid. Liv. l. 26. c. 16.

A N
INDEX of the AUTHORS

Explain'd or Cited in the Text or Notes of this Edition,

Or referr'd to in

Monsieur BARBEYRAC's Translation.

The small Roman Numerals refer to the Book, the first Figure to the Chapter, the latter to the Section.

GATHIAS, Hist. i. 7. 6. ii. 3. 9. ii. 4. 13.
Ælian, Claud. i. 1. 10. i. 5. 2. ib. 14. i. 6. 3. ii. 4. 19.
Alvarez, Franc. of the Practice of Thieves in Abysinia, ii. 3. 8.

Ambrose, Saint, ii. 3. 3.
Antonine, Mar. Aurel. Reflections upon one of his Maxims in relation to Sinners, i. 3. 12. cited i. 5. 13. 14. i. 6. 11. i. 7. 15. ii. 2. 7. ii. 3. 10, 14, 15, 21. ii. 4. 4, 5, 15.
Aristophanes, Poet, i. 4. 8.
Aristotle, Philos. i. 2. 4. 6. 7. i. 4. 8, 9, 10. i. 4. 1, 4, 6. His Contradiction in relation to Pleasure and Pain. ib. 7. i. 5. 7, 10. His επιπρήματα, ib. 13. i. 6. 11, 18. His Thoughts upon Justice, i. 7. 12, 13. False Reasoning, ib. 17. His Notion of Injury, ib. 15. 16, 17. ii. 1. 6. ii. 2. 7. iii. 5. 6, 8, 9. ii. 4. 10. His Definition of an Oath explain'd, iv. 2. 18. His false Reasoning to decry lending Money upon Usury, v. 7. 10. The inhuman and wicked Expedient he approves of, to stop the too great Increase of Citizens, vi. 1. 8. His false Reasoning upon the Antiquity of Monarchical Government, vii. 5. 4. His Thoughts upon mix'd Government, ib. 12. Reflection upon what he says of absolute Monarchy, vii. 6. 5.
Arrian upon Epicletus, i. 3. 11. i. 4. 3. i. 5. 14. i. 6. 5, 12. i. 7. 9. ii. 2. 9, 16, 23. ii. 4. 7. 10, 13, 15. ii. 5. 3.
Aulu Gellius, i. 5. 14. ii. 4. 13, 15. ii. 5. 4. A Passage of his explain'd, v. 4. 5.
Aukor de Principis Jusitibus Decoris, i. 5. 13. His Reasons not strong enough to establish a twofold natural Law, divine and human, ii. 3. 5, 11, 12. ii. 4. 18. ii. 5. 2.

B.

Bacon, Francis, i. 4. 5. i. 4. 6. ii. 3. 15. ii. 4. 4, 5, 13, 14, 15. Examination of what he says in Defence of taking up Arms against the Americans, viii. 6. 5.

Balsamon, Theodore, what he says upon Self-Defence refuted, ii. 5. 9.
The Author of the Political Balance consider'd, vii. 5. 9.
Benzo, Hist. Nov. Orb. ii. 4. 4.
Bion, Idyll. ii. 4. 10.
Boccalme, Trajan, his Reason for Malomet's allowing Pogamy consider'd, vi. 1. 16.
Bohm, John, his harmonious Proportion of vindicative Justice, unjust, viii. 3. 25. The weak Reason he alleges in the Matter of Divorce, vi. 1. 22.
Boecler on Grotius, i. 6. 15. ii. 2. 4. ii. 3. 22, 23. censured in relation to the Right of Self-Defence, ii. 5. 3. proves not fully that an equal Distribution of Goods is commanded in the Decalogue, iv. 4. 4. Examination of his Thoughts upon the Original of the Propriety of Goods, ib. 12. 13.
Boetius, de Consol. Philos. ii. 4. 3.
Bruyere, de la, one of his Thoughts taken from Seneca, iii. 6. 16.
Budeus, Jo. Franc. expresses not well Hobbes's Thoughts upon the Power of a Mother over her Children, vi. 2. 2. Reflections upon what he says of the Condition of Children in Comparison with that of Slaves, vi. 3. 0. His Thoughts upon War, when just, or not, viii. 1. 8.
Busbequius, of the Practice of the Colchians in relation to Theft, ii. 3. 8.

C.

Cato, Marc. i. 3. 7. censured, v. 7. 10.
Chamberlain's Present State of England, i. 5. 14.
Cæsar, Cæ. Jul. Bel. Civ. ii. 2. 8. Bel. Gal. ib. 10. ii. 3. 14.
Charron, Peter, censured for his Thoughts upon the Faculties of Beasts, i. 3. 1. i. 4. 5. ii. 1. 4, 6, 7. ii. 2. 7. ii. 3. 7, 8. ii. 4. 4, 10, 11, 13, 16, 19. A Reflection upon what he says of Revenge, viii. 3. 23. censured, vi. 1. 10.
Cicero, M. Tullius, i. 1. 1, 7, 14. i. 2. 10. A Passage in his Tu cul. Quist. explain'd, i. 3. 3. i. 3. 8. How Y y y y

An INDEX of the AUTHORS explain'd, &c.

- he ought to be understood concerning the Foundation of Honesty and Justice, ii. 4. 3. i. 4. 7. i. 5. 9, 10, 12, 14. i. 6. 6, 11, 14. i. 7. 2. i. 8. 4. ii. 2. 4, 6, 7, 8. ii. 3. 6, 13, 14, 15, 16. ii. 4. 4, 5, 13, 14, 15, 19. ii. 5. 3, 4, 14. Defended against Lactantius, ii. 5. 14. A Passage of his Off. censured, ii. 2. 2. See his Defence in Barbeyrac's Notes, N. 4. A Reflection upon what he says of Promises made to Robbers and Pyrates, iii. 6. 2. In what Sense he ought to be taken concerning Dissimulation, iv. 1. 9. What he says of an Oath made to a Pirate, defended against Grotius, iv. 2. 8. A Passage about an Oath explain'd, iv. 2. 15. His too rigid Determination about Merchants, v. 3. 4. Censured for what he says upon Promises which one is not oblig'd to keep, v. 12. 22. See his Defence in Mr. Barbeyrac's Notes, ib. N. 1.
- Claudian*, Poet, i. 5. 11. ii. 2. 2, 10. ii. 4. 9, 10. prais'd, vii. 6. 3.
- Comenius*, Francis, an Examination of what he says in relation to simple Promises, iii. 5. 9. &c.
- Corinthians*, 1 Epist. vi. 12. vii. 6, 7, 8, 9. i. 2. S. vii. 3. S. ii. 3. 21. A Passage in the eleventh Chapter explain'd, v. 3. 10. Mr. Barbeyrac's Notes, N. 3.
- Crujaeus*, James, censured for what he says of one Law of the twelve Tables, ii. 5. 17. Concerning Prescription, iv. 12. 7.
- Cumberland*, Richard, i. 2. 4, 5, 6, 11. i. 3. 2, 3. i. 4. 4. 7. i. 6. 4. An Examination of his Opinion upon the Sanction of natural Laws, i. 6. 14. i. 7. 13. ii. 1. 3, 5, 7, 8. ii. 3. 5, 10, 15, 16, 20, 21. His Prolegom. ii. 3. 12. His Maxim about Marriage censured, vi. 1. 7. His Arguments against Hobbes, vii. 2. 4.
- D.
- Des-Cartes*, Renat, i. 2. 7. Censured for what he says concerning Doubts, i. 3. 9. i. 4. 7. i. 5. 5. De Pass. ii. 3. 14.
- Demosthenes*, Phil. ii. 5. 6, 7, 14.
- Dionorus Siculus*, i. 5. 14. i. 6. 14, 17. i. 8. 3. ii. 2. 2, 10. ii. 3. 10, 20. ii. 4. 13, 15, 19. His false Hypothesis upon the Original of Mankind, iv. 4. 8. The Meaning of the Law of Charondas, which he relates, vi. 1. 7.
- Dio Chrysostom*, ii. 3. 3, 12, 18, 20. His Definition of a State, vii. 2. 13. See his Defence in Mr. Barbeyrac's Notes, N. 1.
- Dio Cassius*, i. 6. 12. ii. 2. 10.
- Diogenes Laertius*, i. 5. 11. i. 8. 1. ii. 3. 1, 8, 10, 14. ii. 4. 4.
- Dionysius Halicarnassensis*, i. 5. S. i. 6. 2, 10.
- E.
- Empiricus*, Sextus, ii. 2. 10. ii. 3. 7. censured, ii. S. 9.
- Epictetus*, i. 3. 7. ii. 3. 14.
- Euripides*, Poet, i. 5. 10. i. 8. 5. ii. 2. 2. ii. 3. 5, 9. ii. 4. 1, 4, 10, 11. viii. 6. 5. Hipp. vi. 1. 10.
- Eusebius*, Eccl. Hist. de Prepar. Evang. ii. 3. S. Eccl. Hist. ii. 4. 19.
- Esstratus* upon Arist. a false Maxim which he advances concerning Adultery, i. 4. 9. i. 5. 13.
- Exodus*, iii. 4. i. 1. 14. ii. 14. 16. ii. 5. 3. xxiii. 4. 5. ib. The Reason of a Law concerning Things borrowed and lost, v. 4. 6. See Mr. Barbeyrac's Notes, N. 12.
- F.
- Felden*, ad Grat. i. 6. 7. i. 7. 12. ii. 3. 23.
- Filmer*, Robert, censured concerning the Foundation of the Right of Propriety, iv. 4. 4. Concerning the Foundation of the Authority of Kings, vi. 2. 10.
- Florus*, Lucius, ii. 4. 19. ii. 5. 3.
- G.
- Gassendus*, Syntag. Epicu. i. 7. 12. ii. 3. 10.
- Gramond Bartholomew*, A Reflection upon a Maxim of that Historian, viii. 4. 21.
- Gruswinkel*, Theodore, A Remark upon what he says concerning Natural Instinct, vi. 1. 3.
- Grand*, Le, i. 4. 2. i. 4. 7.
- Gronovius*, John Frederick, explains not right a Passage of Gronovius, v. 6. 2. about Princes are above the Laws, vii. 6. 3. Against the perpetual Superiority of the People over the Prince, ib. 5. Concerning Debts contracted by the Prince's Predecessor, vii. 7. 12. Concerning Disputes about Succession to the Throne, ib. 15. Of the Power of a Governor of a Province, viii. 6. 11.
- Grotius*, Hugh, censured for what he says concerning the Foundation of the Morality of human Actions, i. 2. 6. Defended, see Mr. Barbeyrac's Notes on ii. 3. 4. n. 4. The Application he makes of some Passages of Scripture, i. 2. 6. Defended, see Mr. Barbeyrac's Notes. An Examination of what he says concerning Doubts in Matters of Morality, i. 2. 9. Censured for his Definition of Law, i. 6. 4. A Reflection upon what he says of the Sins of Infirmity, i. 5. 8. What he says concerning Doubts of Conscience, i. 5. 8. Concerning his Division and Thoughts of Justice, i. 7. 11. His false Application of a Passage in Plutarch, ii. 3. 4. His Definition of Natural Law, ibid. An Examination of his Opinion, That the Laws of Nature would take place, even if there were no God, ib. 19. A Remark upon the Reason he gives of Moses's Law concerning Thieves, ii. 5. 18. What he says about the Lawfulness of taking another Man's Goods in extrem Necessity, ii. 6. 6. A false Application of a Maxim of the Civil Law, ibid. A Refutation of what he says concerning the Reparation that a Thief owes when the Thing stolen is quite lost or perish'd, iii. 1. 11. An Examination of what he says concerning the Right of passing through another Man's Ground, iii. 3. 5. Concerning Transportation of Merchandize, ib. 6. Concerning forc'd Promises, iii. 6. 12. A false Explication of the Law of the Digest, ib. 15. An Examination of his Opinion concerning unlawful Promises, iii. 7. 8. An Explication of what he says concerning the Conditions annex'd to a Promise, iii. 8. 4. A Reflection on what he says concerning Equivocations, iv. 1. 13. Concerning his Reason why one may speak a false Thing to Children, ib. 15: Why the Action of Rubab is commended in Scripture, ib. 15. Censured for what he says about the Oath that Laban made to Jacob, iv. 2. 4. Defended, see Mr. Barbeyrac's Notes, ib. n. 2. A Refutation of his Thoughts upon the Oath of Jehus, ib. 7. Concerning the Obligation of an Oath, ib. 6. An Examination of his Thoughts upon the Original of the Community of Goods, iv. 4. 9. A Remark upon his Proof, that one may have a Propriety in a River, iv. 5. 3. A Passage of Orat. is misapplied by him, iv. 6. 8. A Remark upon what he says of the Acquisition of Propriety by the Right of the first Possessor, iv. 6. 14: An Observation ill founded upon one of the Roman Laws concerning Accessions, iv. 7. 5. A false Explication of some Terms which concern the Measures of the Limits of Lands, iv. 7. 11. An Examination of his Definition of a Will and Testament, iv. 10. 2. The Power of disposing of our Goods by Will is derived from the Law of Nature, iv. 10. 4. An Examination of his Thoughts concerning the Foundation of Prescription, iv. 12. 8. A false Application of some Examples to the Possession of the Goods of another upon Credit, iv. 13. 4. A Reflection upon what he says of the Natural Measure of the Price of Things, v. 1. 4. Examples of a mix'd Contract not rightly apply'd, v. 2. 10. Why the Seller ought to discover the Faults of the Thing sold, v. 3. 3. Explication of what he says concerning Commissions, v. 4. 5. An Examination of his Decision in case that two buy the same Thing, v. 5. 5. His Multiplication of the Action of Joseph the Patriarch, ib. 7. An Example from Strabo misapplied, ibid. An Examination of what he says concerning one's Labour being serviceable to many at once, v. 6. 4. A Remark on his Thoughts upon Usury, v. 7. 11. Of his Distinction of Things favourable and odious, v. 12. 12, 13, &c. A Remark upon a Rule he gives in case two negative Laws clash, ib. 23. An Examination of what he says concerning the Division of Sovereignty, vii. 4. 14. That Princes are above the Law, vii. 6. 3. See Barbeyrac's Notes, n. 4. An Examination of his Thoughts on the Authority of the Roman Dictators, ib. 15. That the Christian Religion does not permit the Resistance of the Supreme Power,

An INDEX of the AUTHORS explain'd, &c.

Power, vii. 8. 5. An Examination of what he says of Justice, to which the Imposition of Punishment belongs, viii. 3. 5. A Reflection upon what he says of some Sins which ought not to be punish'd before a human Tribunal, ib. 14. A Reflection upon his saying that there is Room for Pardon even antecedently to the Penal Law, ib. 16. The Reasons for granting Pardon, ib. 17. An Explication of his Maxim concerning the Succours that one ought to grant to an Ally, viii. 6. 14. A Remark on what he says of those to whom belongs the Booty taken from the Enemy, ib. 18. An Examination of what he says, that all Compacts made with an Enemy ought to be observed, viii. 7. 2. Censur'd for what he says concerning the Time that Truces are limited by, ib. 8. Acts of Hostility are unlawful during the Truce, ib. 9. Concerning Men taken in the Enemy's Territories when the Truce expires, ib. 11. That 'tis unlawful for Subjects to depart in great Companies out of the Kingdom, viii. 11. 4.

Gunter, Poet, i. 4. 4. A Remark on what he says of the Emperor Frederick Barbeross, viii. 5. 2. See Mr. Barbeyrac's Notes.

H.

Herodotus, i. 4. 5. i. 5. 8. ii. 3. 9. ii. 4. 19. v. 1. 13.

Hesiod, ii. 3. 2. ii. 5. 3.

Hobbes, Thomas, censur'd for what he says concerning inanimate Beings, i. 1. 12. A false Reason that he alleges, to prove that Morality and Polity are capable of Demonstration, i. 2. 4. Censur'd for what he says of Liberty, i. 4. 2. and of the Nature of Good, ib. 4. and of the common Rule of Virtue and Vice, i. 4. 6. A Reflection upon what he says of Councils, i. 5. 14. i. 6. 1. ib. 2. Censur'd about the Foundation of the Obligation of natural Laws, ib. 4. and ii. 2. 20. and about the Foundation of the Sovereignty that God has over Men, i. 6. 10. An Examination of what he says of distributive Justice, i. 7. 9. Of Justice, Injustice, and Injury, ib. 12. His Comparison betwixt the State of Nature and that of a Society, ii. 2. 3. Of the Foundation of natural Law, ib. and ii. 3. 16. &c. A Reformation of his Principle, That the State of Nature is a State of War, ii. 2. 5. &c. What he says of Robbery authoriz'd among the Ancients, ib. 10. Censur'd about the natural Equality of Men, iii. 2. 2. What he says of Lots examin'd, iii. 2. 5. His false Opinion of Atheism, iii. 4. 4. An Examination of his Opinion about the Nature of conveying a Right, iii. 5. 2. 3. Fear of being deceiv'd does not justify the Non-Performance of a Contract, iii. 6. 9. Of the Validity of Promises and forc'd Contracts, ib. 13. Concerning his Maxim, That 'tis sufficient for one to do all he can to keep his word, iii. 7. 4. Whether a Man can by Covenant oblige himself to suffer such Evils, as exceed the ordinary Strength of human Nature, ib. 5. His Difference between simple Pacts and Contracts, v. 2. 1. Of the Foundation of the Authority of Fathers and Mothers, vi. 2. 2, 3. That a separate and independent Family is a State, vi. 2. 10. vi. 3. 1. Of Slaves, vi. 3. 7. 8. Of the Means of living securely in the State of Nature, vii. 1. 8. That there is no Covenant between a Sovereign and his Subjects, vii. 2. 9. &c. That the People rule in every State, ib. 14. Of the Constitution of Democracy, vii. 5. 6. Of Aristocracy, ib. 8. Of Criminals, who are executed without the ordinary Course of judicial Proceedings, vii. 6. 12. That Sovereignty is absolute, ib. 13. Of Kingdoms establish'd by a free Consent of the People, ib. 17. Concerning Interregnums, vii. 7. 9. Of the Succession of hereditary Kingdoms, ib. 11. That Frugality is not a Virtue in Prince, vii. 9. 10. That Civil Laws ought not to be contrary to natural Laws, viii. 1. 2. That the Precepts of the Decalogue are Civil Laws, ib. 4. There was not just or unjust before the Civil Government, ib. 5. Of the Foundation of that Power that Sovereigns have over the Lives of their Subjects, viii. 3. 1. Of the Definition of Pain, ib. 7. Of Criminals guilty of High-Treason, ib. 33. Of Duelling, viii. 4. 8. Of the Foundation of Honour, ib. 13. Of the Fables of the Heathen Poets, ib. The Right that Sovereigns have to the Goods of their Subjects, viii. 5. 1.

Homerus, Poet, A Remark upon a Reflection that he makes of Hector, iv. 2. 14. Whether Money was us'd in the Time of the Trojan War, v. 5. 1. See Mr. Barbeyrac's Notes.

Horace, Poet, i. 4. 5. i. 8. 5. ii. 2. 2. ib. f. 6. ii. 3. 10. ii. 4. 9, 10, 15, 17. ii. 5. 1.

Hornius, John Frederick, the false Reason he makes use of to prove that some Societies are called Simple, vi. 1. 1. Of the Foundation of the Authority that a Husband has over his Wife, ib. f. 12, &c. How Civil Societies are form'd, viii. 1. 5. Of the Original of Sovereignty, vii. 3. 3. His Opinion of free States censur'd, vii. 5. 5. Of Conquests, vii. 7. 3, 4.

I.

Jamblicus, Protrept. ii. 1. 6. ii. 3. 15, 18. Explain'd, ib. 20.

Josephus, Jewish Hist. censur'd about Cam, iv. 4. 6.

Joshua, his Book, in Chap. ix. of his Oath to the Gibeonites, iv. 2. 7.

Ifoerates ad Dam. i. 4. 8. iv. 2. 2. Ad Nicocol. iv. 1. 1. vi. 1. 19. vii. 9. 2, 4, 5, 8. Nicocolus. vii. 5. 22. Paneg. iii. 2. 8. iv. 5. 8. Explain'd and defend'd, vii. 2. 13. See Mr. Barbeyrac's Notes, viii. 9. 3. 4. Ad Phil. ii. 3. 7. viii. 6. 4. ib. 9. 5. ib. 11. 6. Arbul. i. 3. 7. viii. 4. 12. ib. 9. 5. Aetep. 1. 7, 11. ii. 3, 10. ib. 4. 15. v. 9. 1. vii. 2. 13. 10. 9. 4. viii. 4. 5. ib. 12. 2. De Pace, vii. 1. 2. ib. 5. 11. Hel. ii. 4. 13. Busir. ii. 4. 15. An unfit Epithet apply'd to Nile, iv. 5. 7. viii. 4. 12. Of Nobility, ib. f. 25. viii. 3. 17. ib. 4. 14. and 5. 6. Panath. Of the Triballians, ii. 2. 10. The Persians Hatred of the Greeks, iii. 2. 8. iv. 1. 13. vii. 9. 5, 11. viii. 1. 3. ib. 11. 6. De Parm. ii. 5. 3. viii. 3. 10. 27. Trajanz, v. 13. 9. Adv. Call. i. 6. 2. ii. 5. 2. iii. 4. 1. viii. 4. 7. Ægim. iv. 11. 18.

Jurænal, a Thought of that Poet concerning Nobility, taken from Sallust. viii. 4. 31. See Mr. Barbeyrac's Notes.

L.

Lactantius, ii. 3. 1. ib. 4. 18. ii. 4. 10. Concerning Self Defence, ii. 5. 14. His false Explication of a Passage in Virgil, iv. 4. 8.

Laertius, Diogenes. i. 5. 11. i. 7. 13. i. 8. 1. ii. 3. 1. ib. 8. 10, 14. ii. 4. 4.

Law, Roman, How Justice is defin'd by it, i. 7. 6. The Definition of natural Law, ii. 2. 2. By the Delivery of the Deeds, the Creditor forgives the Debt, v. 11. 7. Concerning an Article of a Lease, ib. A Limitation of that Maxim, That what is null in its Original, cannot be made valid by an After-Act. iii. 6. 14. An Explication of a Law concerning simple Promises, iii. 6. 15. Of another which relates to Strumpets, iii. 7. 9. Of the Law that permits the swearing against a Woman, that she is not with Child, iv. 2. 2. A Remark upon the Institution of the Emperor Frederick, concerning the Oaths of Children in their Minority, iv. 2. 11. Pigeons and Peacocks are falsely reckon'd amongst those Fowls which are term'd wild, iv. 6. 5. A Remark on what they say of wild Beasts which recover their natural Liberty, ib. f. 12. A Defence of that Maxim, That Plants go with the Soil, iv. 7. 5. About Paper and Parchment, ib. f. 7. Concerning Specification, or turning a Thing into a new Form or Shape, ib. f. 10. Disputes about Possession, iv. 9. 7. Of the Definition of Prescription, iv. 12. 2. Of the Division of Conventions and Contracts, v. 2. 2, 3. An Examination of a Law, which prescribes what Damage is sufficient to make void a Contract, v. 3. 9. Of another Law which permits one Man to over-reach another, ib. f. 10. A Defence of that Law, which concerns Judges whose Opinions are different, vii. 2. 18. A Remark upon a Division of Obligations, viii. 3. 5. Examples of an unjust Partiality in punishing Crimes, ib. f. 25. A Reflection on what the Civil Law saith concerning the Insanity of the Fact, viii. 4. 7.

Libanius, i. 3. 15. i. 5. 14. i. 6. 14. i. 7. 2. ii. 1. 6. ii. 3. 15, 18. ii. 4. 7. ii. 5. 2, 12.

An INDEX of the AUTHORS explain'd, &c.

Lipsius, Justus, a false Maxim in Politicks that he advances, iv. 1. 19.
Livy, Titus, i. 2. 4. i. 4. 10. i. 5. 9. i. 6. 10, 14. i. 7. 4. A Passage explain'd, viii. 9. 2.
Lucian's Dialog. i. 4. 3. i. 5. 14. ii. 3. 18. ii. 4. 3. 13.
In contru. ii. 4. 13. ii. 5. 3.
Lucretius, Poet. ii. 2. 2. ii. 3. 10. ii. 4. 9. A Reflection on what he says against Pyrrho's Sect, v. 12. 19. See Mr. Barbeyrac's Notes.

M.

Mathsus, Anton. A Refutation of what he says of Men reduced to extrem Necessity, ii. 6. 7. Of Oaths extorted by unjust Fears, iv. 2. 8. Of Julius Casar's Oath to the Pyrates, ibid.
Milton, John, an Examination of his Reasons concerning Divorce, vi. 1. 24.
Montaigne, Michael, i. 8. 5. ii. 3. 7, 8. ii. 4. 19. v. 4. 5. What he says of a Prince of Lithuania, viii. 4. 6.

P.

Plato, Philosopher, of his Community of Goods, iv. 4. 7. And of Women, vi. 1. 15. A Reflection on what he says of the Penitment of incorrigible Sinners, viii. 3. 10. i. 2. 6. i. 3. 8. i. 4. 3. 5. 8. 13. 14. i. 6. 10. ii. 3. 2. His Opinion of the State of Nature, ii. 2. 3. ii. 3. 1. ib. 7. ii. 4. 13. 19. ii. 5. 14.
Plutarchus, his Opinion of Providence, i. 6. 13, 17. i. 7. 10. ii. 1. 8. ii. 2. 2. 10. ii. 3. 3. ib. 10. Explain'd, ib. 20. ii. 4. 7, 13, 14. ii. 5. 2. What he says of Civil Society, vii. 1. 11. False History concerning the Patricians, viii. 4. 28.
Pliny, Sen. i. 4. 8. ii. 1. 6. 8. ii. 3. 14. ii. 4. 13, 15, 17. Of those that invented the Custom of making Slaves, vi. 3. 5. Of the Original of Alliances, viii. 9. 1.

Q.

Quintilian, a Reflection on a Passage of his concerning Advocates for Criminals, iv. 1. 21. His Opinion about restoring a Charge, v. 4. 7. Of Punishment, viii. 3. 4.

R.

Roy, Hugh de, an Examination of the Principles, on which he founds the Right of Prescription, iv. 12. 6.

S.

Samuel, first Book of, an Explication of a Place of this Book, vii. 6. 9.
Sanderfon, Robert, a Remark upon what he says of Oaths, iv. 2. 2.
Sharrock, Robert, a Remark upon what he says of this Rule, Quod tibi fieri non vis, &c. ii. 3. 13. 0

Selden, John, that Slaughters committed in War are a Sort of Punishments, viii. 3. 4.
Seneca, Philos. a false Opinion of his concerning Contracts and Bonds of Obhgation, iii. 6. 16. About Pardon, viii. 3. 15. Of Communion, iv. 4. 2.
Sidney, Algernon, a general Remark upon his Book of Government, vi. 2. 10. See Mr. Barbeyrac's Notes, N. 2. A Reflection upon what he says of a Thought of Aristotle, vii. 6. 5.
Sophocles, Tragced. A Passage of that Author explain'd, ii. 4. 6. See Mr. Barbeyrac's Notes, N. 6.
Spinosa, Benedic't. a Remark upon what he says of the Foundation of natural Law, ii. 2. 3. Of Atheists, iii. 4. 4.
Strabo, Histor. commended, iv. 1. 15. A Passage of that Author explain'd, v. 2. 3.

T.

Tacitus, Cornelius, a Remark upon a Passage of that Historian, iv. 11. 18, Terence, Comced. a Thought of that Poet explain'd and defended, viii. 3. 20. See Mr. Barbeyrac's Notes, N. 4.

V.

Valerius Maximus, i. 5. 14. i. 6. 17. i. 7. 4. ii. 3. 7. ii. 4. 19. ii. 5. 15. A Passage explain'd, iii. 1. 6.
Vaquez, an impious Maxim of that Casuist, ii. 3. 4. A Reflection on what he says of Penal Laws, viii. 3. 5.
Veitshuyfen, Lambert, an Examination of what he says of Moral Causes, i. 5. 3. Of his fundamental Principle of Natural Law, ii. 3. 6, 12. His Opinion of Shame, vi. 1. 30.
Victoria, Francis de, an Examination of what he says in Favour of the Spaniards, iii. 3. 9. Concerning the Liberty of Commerce, ibid. f. 12.
Virgil, an Exposition of a Passage in that Poet against Lactantius, iv. 4. 8.

Z.

Ziegler, Gaspard, confounds two sorts of moral Certainty, i. 2. 11. A Remark upon what he says of the Obligation of repairing a Damage, iii. 1. 4. Concerning the Gain that a Man makes, ib. f. 7. Of securing the legitimate Children from any Damage by an adulterous Offspring, ib. f. 9. Of a Contradiction attributed to Grotius, iii. 3. 6. Of negative and positive Communion, iv. 4. 2. Of the Original of Propriety, ib. f. 11. Of the Propriety in wild Beasts taken as Game, iv. 6. 7. Of wild Beasts which return to their first Owner, ib. f. 12. A false Application of a Law of the Digest, iv. 13. 5. A Reflection 'll founded on a Distinction of Grotius, concerning Paternal Power, vi. 2. 7.

A N
I N D E X
O F T H E
M o s t M a t e r i a l T H I N G S

Which are Mention'd or Explain'd in the T E X T or N O T E S.

A.

Abandon'd, how a Thing abandon'd may return to its first Proprietor, iv. 6. 12.

Abdication, what it is, ib. 11. 11.

Abraham, whether Abraham acted prudently in calling Sarah his Sister, iv. 1. 11.

Absent, absent Members, when not to be consider'd in Assemblies, vii. 2. 19.

Absurdities, to avoid them general Terms are to be restrain'd, v. 12. 19.

Acceptance, it is necessary to make Promises irrevocable, iii. 6. 15. Whether a third Person may accept in our Behalf a Promise made to us by another, ib. 9. 5.

Accessions, what they are, iv. 7. 1. Rules to determine to whom they belong, ib. 2. 3. &c. When a Prince out of his own Income may make an Accession to his own Patrimony, viii. 5. 8.

Account, how many Ways one gives an Account of his Conduct, vii. 6. 2.

Accusations, unjust are disadvantageous to the Persons accus'd, viii. 4. 7. None would be innocent, if it were enough to bring an Accusation against a Man. ib.

Accuser, why he ought to lay open all the past Actions of the Delinquent, ib. 3. 22.

Accused, whether the Person accused may innocently deny the Fact with which he is charg'd, vi. 1. 20. An Agreement with the Accuser is supposed a Confession of the Crime, viii. 4. 7. Why the Person accused may appeal to his past Conduct, ibid. 3. 22. A Man does not become infamous by being barely accused, ibid. 4. 7.

Acquittances or Discharge, what it is, v. 11. 7.

Acquisition, originary, iv. 6. 1. Derivative, and the Sorts of it, ibid. 10. 1. Natural and Civil, ibid. 6. 11.

Act, how far those who concurr'd in the same Act of Damage, are all responsible for it, iii. 1. 5. There are dividual and individual Acts, ibid.

Actors upon the Stage, they had a Mark of Infamy set upon them by the Roman Laws, viii. 4. 6.

Action, in what Cases one Man may be answerable for the Actions of another, i. 5. 14. Because an Action is advantageous or hurtful, it does not follow that 'tis morally good or evil, ibid. 2. 6. Good Actions are the surest Foundations of Glory, viii. 4. 12. In what Sense human Actions are indifferent in themselves, i. 2. 6. Actions pure and mix'd, what they are, ib. 7. 7. When a Man is said to be compelled to act, ib. 4. 10. Mix'd Actions, ibid. 1. 9. Actions, which make a Part or no Part of Commerce, ibid. 7. 7. What it is that sets a greater Value upon those, that make a Part of Commerce, v. 1. 6. What a moral Action is, i. 5. 1. What is the Matter of it, ibid. 1. 2. The Form of it, ib. 1. 3. It has the Nature of a positive Form, ib. 1. 4. How its Effects are dissolved and extinguish'd, ib. 9. 6. How many different Qualities it can have, ibid. 7. 1. Its Quantity or absolute Estimate, ibid. 8. 1. Its Relative, ibid. 1. 5. What moral Action is perfect in its Kind, ibid. 1. 4. What is meritorious, ib. 9. 5. Actions necessary or indispensable, and lawful or allow'd, ib. 7. 2. Good or Evil, ib. 1. 3. Indifferent, ib. 1. 5. One good Action is not better than another, ib. 8. 1. Actions just, ibid. 7. 7. Unjust, ibid. 1. 14. When it is not imputed to the immediate Performer of it, ibid. 5. 14.

Action in Law, there are Actions wholly privileg'd by the Civil Law, v. 11. 15. Actions after a constant Silence for thirty Years utterly drop, iv. 12. 2. A personal Action upon a Right to a Thing, ib. 9. 8. A real Action upon a Right to a Thing, ibid. Actions in fix'd Forms of Proceeding, v. 2. 7. Unreasonable Action, iii. 4. 5. Inscripti malefeci, viii. 1. 1. Institoria, iii. 9. 1. Exercitoria, ibid. De signo juncto, iv. 7. 6. Noxalis & pauperici, iii. 1. 6. Of Robbery, ibid. 1. 4. Action founded upon Commission, v. 4. 2. Quod jussu, iii. 9. 1. Action of false Debt, iv. 9. 4. Of Things given upon a certain Cause, which Cause did

An INDEX of the most Material Things, &c.

- not follow, ibid. f. 4. Actions whereby one may recover a Thing given, and when not, ibid. Action upon concealing the Qualities of any Thing sold, &c. v. 3. 2. Of Condemnation, ib. 11. 15. Rerum amotarum, viii. 1. 3. Negotiorum gestorum, iv. 13. 13. v. 4. 1.
- Adam*, he had the sole Propriety of every Thing, while he was the only Man in the World, iv. 4. 11. Whether his Posterity are beholden to him for their Right to the Goods of this World, ibid. f. 4. 11. Whether he gave Names to all Creatures agreeable to their Natures, ibid. 1. 4.
- Adhuc in diem*, what it is, v. 5. 4.
- Adoption*, what it is, ib. 12. 11. An Adoptive Father should be prefer'd to a natural Father, and the Reason of it, iv. 11. 13.
- Adpromissor*, what it is in the Roman Law, v. 10. 11.
- Advantage of another*, how many Ways it may be procured, iii. 3. 2.
- Adventure*, if one may adventure Money, iv. 7. 12.
- Advocate*, he ought not to take Money of both Parties, v. 1. 5. He ought not voluntarily to undertake a bad Cause, iv. 1. 21. If he may use false Colours, or feigned Arguments to defend his Party, ibid.
- Adultery*, what it is, i. 1. 6. viii. 1. 3. A just Cause of Divorce, vi. 1. 21. Whether the Husband, who lies with his own Wife, taking her for another's, commits Adultery, i. 3. 16. Whether the Adulterer ought to indemnify the Husband and his Children, iii. 1. 9.
- Affairs*, when one manages another's Affairs at his own Cost and Charges, the other ought to requite the Pains, and refund the Charges, ibid. 6. 2. iv. 13. 13.
- Affinity*, when it ceases, vi. 1. 36. What Degrees of Affinity are forbid, ibid. f. 35.
- Age*, its different Degrees, i. 1. 10. What Age is capable of meditating Guile, ibid. What is the Foundation of that Respect and Honour we pay to old Age, viii. 4. 12.
- Aggressor*, he is not always the Aggressor, that first takes up Arms, ii. 5. 6. If one may always slay an unjust Aggressor, ii. 5. 1. and Sect. 3. Or one that assaults another by Mistake, ibid. 1. 5. Or one that is more useful than the Person assaulted, ib. f. 14. Or who only would maim, not kill, ib. f. 10. Or who makes an Attempt upon another's Honour, or Chastity, ibid. f. 11. Or for giving a Box of the Ear, ibid. 1. 12. If the Aggressor who first gave the Injury, may fairly resist the other Man when he endeavours to revenge it, ibid. f. 19.
- Air*, whether it may be appropriated, iv. 5. 2.
- Alienation*, a Consequence of full Property, ibid. 9. 1. Its necessary Conditions, ibid. f. 2. 3. Whether in the Alienation of Property, Delivery is requir'd, ibid. f. 5. &c. The Right of Alienation is not always join'd with a Right of Property, ibid. 4. 2. See Mr. Barbeyrac's Notes, n. S. Alienation is either simple or conditional, ibid. f. 4. If the Alienation of a Kingdom, or any Part of it is in the Power of the King, viii. 5. 9.
- Alliances*, what they are, and of how many Sorts, viii. 9. 1. They are made by both Parts in Prospect of some Advantage, ib. f. 5. How they may be broke, ib. f. 11. Real and Personal Alliances, ib. f. 6. Rules to distinguish them, ib. f. 7. 3. Equal Alliances, and their different Sorts, ib. f. 3. Unequal Alliances, ib. f. 4. Alliances for the Establishment of some Things, as far as they are due by a Right of Nature, ib. f. 2. and ii. 2. 11.
- Allies*, if by Allies are meant such only as were Allies, when the League was made, or such as are afterwards taken into Alliance on either Side, viii. 9. 10. He that hath bound himself in an unequal Alliance with another, doth by that very Act acknowledge a Superiority of Worth and Dignity in the other, ib. 4. 15. Whether an unequal Ally does not thereby endanger his Sovereignty, ibid. 9. 4. Every Ally is to have his Share of the Booty, ib. 6. 18. In what Cases he is oblig'd to assist his Allies, ib. 6. 14. When two Parties, both Allies to a third, make War upon one another, which of them the third Ally ought to assist, ib. 9. 5. When he may break his Alliance, ib. Suppose it had been stipulated between two Allies, that one should not pass through the other's Territories with an Army, what is to be done, in point of Convenience, in Time of War, v. 12. 4.
- Ambassies*, Law of Ambassies, upon what founded, ii. 3. 23.
- Ambassador*, his general Duties, vii. 8. 10. He is not responsible for what he says by his Master's Order, i. 5. 14. When he can return home of himself, v. 12. 20. When he may be look'd upon as a private Person, viii. 4. 21. Whether an Ambassador of a Republick ought to yield to that of a King, ib. f. 20. Whether Reprials may be made upon an Ambassador ib. 6. 13. & ib. 9. 12. Whether he is to enjoy the Privileges of an Ambassador in a State whereof he was a Member, ibid. 11. 3.
- Ambiguities*, how they may be explain'd, v. 12. 5.
- Ambition*, a general Evil, vii. 1. 7. That of Conquerors does not make a War just and lawful, viii. 6. 5.
- Analogy*, it ought to yield to Use, iv. 1. 4.
- Ancestors*, their Glory serves but to set in a clearer Light the Shame of their degenerate Posterity, viii. 4. 31. Their Posterity is frequently respected upon their Account, ib. 3. 17.
- Animals*, to whom belong their Breed, iv. 7. 4. Tamed and wild, ib. 6. 5. Sociable Animals, vii. 1. 3.
- Antiquity* alone hath no real Honour in it, viii. 4. 17.
- Apology*, if those who make an Apology for a bad Action are answerable for the Damage, iii. 1. 4. If one can make justly an Apology for the Crimes of his Prince, viii. 1. 7.
- Apprentice*, if one may justly exact of every Apprentice so much as he alone should pay, if none else were to be taught the same Thing, v. 6. 4.
- Approver*, if he ought to be punish'd as much as the Author of an evil Action, iii. 1. 4.
- Arbitrators*, who they are, v. 13. 3. How many Sorts there are of them, ib. f. 5. The Duties of an Arbitrator, ib. f. 4. Whether there may be any Meeting betwixt the Arbitrator and the Parties concern'd, ib. If one is oblig'd to acquiesce in his Determination, just or not, ib. What Persons ought not to be Arbitrators, ib. After what Manner he ought to execute his Sentence, ib. f. 10. Of referring a Matter to his Judgment, v. 13. 3.
- Aristocracy*, what it is, vii. 5. 3. How it is formed, ib. f. 8.
- Arms*, what we understand by that Word in Treaties, v. 12. 7.
- Army*, what is understood by it, v. 12. 4. If one should give Passage through his Country to a strange Army, iii. 3. 5.
- Coats of Arms*, their Use and Antiquity, viii. 4. 30.
- Arts*, Men are intirely instructed in such Arts as are most necessary for Life, ii. 2. 4.
- Articles*, the particular Articles of a Contract are as so many Conditions, iii. 8. 8.
- Ascendants*, they succeed upon Failure of Issue in the Descendants, iv. 11. 13.
- Ass*, the Decision of a pleasant Dispute about the Shadow of an Ass, v. 1. 5.
- Assassines* are infamous, viii. 4. 5. If one may make use of them against an Enemy, ib. 6. 16. They cannot demand their Reward, nor be compell'd to commit that Murder they were engag'd in, iii. 7. 7. Whether the Man that only makes an Attempt to kill another, ought to be punish'd with Death, viii. 3. 23.
- Assembly*, how many Persons it ought to consist of, vii. 2. 19.
- Associates* or Partners, their mutual Offices, v. 8. 4. If one Associate is responsible to the rest for the Losses occasion'd by him, ib. He ought to have a Part of the Profit, that partakes of the Loss, ib. f. 3.
- Assurance*, a Contract of Assurance, vii. 9. 8.
- Asylums*, or Places of Refuge, why they were established under the old Law, ii. 5. 15. If those who fled thither were not liable to repair the Damage, iii. 1. 7.
- Astrology*, it is contrary to Religion and Morality, ii. 4. 4.
- Atheists*, how many sorts there are of them, iii. 4. 4. If they have any true Idea of Duty, Right, and Obligation, ii. 4. 3. If they ought to be tolerated, vii. 4. 2. If one may justly punish them for their Infidelity, iii.

An INDEX of the most Material Things, &c.

4. 4. If one may place any Trust in them, ib. 6. 9. If a Society of Atheists would not be more corrupted than those which keep the fundamental Principles of Religion, though mix'd with Error and even Idolatry, ii. 3. 19.
Atheism, it wholly destroys all natural Obligation, iii. 4. 4. It is not a simple Fault of Imprudence or Ignorance, ibid.
Auction, publick, what it is, v. 5. 6. The Law of this sort of Sale, v. 1. 10.
Avocatory Commands, what they are, and of what Force, viii. 11. 3.
Authority, what it is, viii. 4. 12. How it may be the principal Cause of moral Actions, i. 5. 14. The Authority of Masters is a Hindrance to the Discovery of Truth, ii. 4. 13. See Mr. Barbeyrac's Notes, n. 11.

B.

Bail. See Surety.
Bailiffs, why their Office is accounted dishonourable in many Places, viii. 4. 6.
Banishment, whether it is lawful or not, viii. 11. 7. He that is condemn'd to it, ceases to be a Member of the State, ibid.
Barbary, Part of Africa, if the People of it ought to be look'd upon as wholly infamous, viii. 4. 5.
Barrenness, it is not a sufficient Cause for breaking Marriage, vi. 1. 21.
Bastards, they are as near related to their Parents as legitimate Children, iv. 11. 6. Maintenance is due to them, ib. They may share with the Legitimate, if their Parents die intestate, ib. How they are look'd upon in many States, viii. 4. 6. Their Legitimation or Restitution in the Blood does not change the Nature of the Thing, but only produces certain moral Effects, ib. 26.
Bachelor, if he is always free to remain so, vi. 1. 7. If the Civil Laws can oblige certain Persons to it, ib. f. 8.
Beasts, wherein consists their Liberty, ii. 1. 4. There are two Extrems to be avoided in Reasoning upon the Springs of their Motions, i. 3. 1. Morality taken from their Example is not solid, ii. 3. 2. No Law common to them and Men, ib. 1. 2. and iv. 3. 5. If we may lawfully kill and eat them, ib. f. 4, 5. We ought to spare those which are serviceable to us in our Husbandry, ib. f. 6. Why God forbid the Israelites to eat some Beasts, ib. f. 2. If the Owner of a Beast is responsible for the Damage it causes, iii. 1. 6. and iv. 3. 5. When our Neighbour's Beast falls into a Ditch, we ought to help it out, though he is our Enemy, iii. 3. 4. Why the Law of Moses order'd the Beast to be slain with the Man that had abused it in an unlawful Way, ii. 3. 3. Wild Beasts of a Park or Forest, to whom they belong, iv. 6. 11. How they may be restor'd to their first Owner, ib. f. 12. If the Marks which one puts upon them is sufficient to preserve his Property in them, ib. How to take Possession of a Herd of Cattle, iv. 9. 7. The Right of putting them to drink in a Neighbour's Field, iv. 1. 12.
Beatitude. See Felicity.
Beauty, it is not a lawful Reason to pardon one convinc'd of a capital Crime, viii. 3. 17. Disfiguring the Face of a Virgin requires Compensation, iii. 1. 8.
Bees, they are wild by Nature, iv. 6. 5. The Difference between their Communities and human Societies, vii. 2. 4. Whether that Man is guilty of Trespass, who, by poisoning the Flowers of his Garden, causes the Death of his Neighbour's Bees, iii. 1. 3.
Beggars, the Profession of lusty Beggars is shameful and highly blameable, ii. 4. 15. iii. 3. 2. Upon what Condition they ought to be regarded in States, where they are tolerated, viii. 4. 5.
Being, what a Physical or Natural Being is, i. 1. 2. A Moral Being, ib. f. 2, 3. Who is the Author of Moral Beings, ib. Their Original and End, ib. f. 4. Their Effects and Virtue, ib. Their different Sorts, ib. f. 5. How they are destroy'd, ib. f. 23.
Benefactor, if in the Inheritance of an Intestate he ought to be prefer'd to Parents, iv. 11. 16.

Benefice, when 'tis vacant, v. 12. 8.
Beneficence, the Excellencies and Rules of that Virtue, iii. 3. 15.
Benefits, what they are, iii. 3. 15. We ought not to be curious in enquiring into the Motives of it, iii. 3. 16. It is not a Benefit to abstain from doing us harm, i. 9. 4. Nor to bring one out of that Danger, into which he had brought him, iii. 3. 16. If 'tis of greater Worth from an Enemy than from a Friend, viii. 3. 20.
Benevolence, it is most agreeable to human Nature, ii. 2. 7.
Blank, what the Effect of Blank Papers subscribed, iii. 9. 2. What a Blank is, and how it is legitimate, v. 9. 7.
Body, in what the Care which every one ought to take of his Body consists, ii. 4. 14. How many sorts of Bodies there are, viii. 12. 7.
Body of Men, Community, how it may be reduced to one only Person, vi. 2. 19. Men attribute to it different Things which differently agree with it, viii. 3. 29. How it may be punish'd, ib. f. 28. Crimes committed by a Body are effac'd by length of Time, ib. f. 29. The different sorts of subordinate Bodies of the same State, vi. 2. 21, 22.
Borrower, his Engagements, v. 4. 6. ib. 7. 1.
Booty, how a Man acquires the Propriety of the Booty, which he takes from an Enemy, iv. 6. 14. viii. 6. 17. To whose Profit it is, ib. 6. 18. To whom that which is retaken ought to be restor'd, ib. f. 22.
Brothers, in what Order Brothers, both of the same Mother (Uterini) as well of the same Father as Mother, succeed an Intestate, iv. 11. 17.
Buildings, whether they go along with the Ground, iv. 7. 6. The Right of raising a Building higher, ib. 8. 11.
Buyer, whether one Man is oblig'd to buy the Commodities of another, iii. 3. 12. Obligations between the Buyer and the Seller, v. 5. 5. The Buyer ultimately resolves upon the Price of any Commodity, ib. 6. 1. Who takes any Commodity without agreeing upon the Price, is suppos'd to oblige himself to the common Price, ib. Whether the Want of any Commodity can justify the selling of it the dearer, ib. 1. 4. Whether the not wanting it can justify a Man's buying it too cheap, ib. f. 10. Whether the Buyer can innocently give for a Commodity less than the Price appointed by the Law, ib. f. 8. If two buy the same Commodity, how it is to be decided, ib. 5. 5. iv. 9. 8. See Mr. Barbeyrac's Notes.

C.

Cabals. See Factions.
Calumniators, they cannot be too severely punish'd, viii. 3. 27.
Capacity, the natural Capacity of commanding is not of itself a Title sufficient to give us any Authority over those who are not in a Capacity of governing themselves, iii. 2. 8.
Captain, if a Captain of a Ship may blow up his Vessel without being guilty of Self-murder, viii. 2. 4.
Cardinals, the vain Formality that Cardinals use in entering into the Conclave, iv. 2. 5.
Care, three Degrees of it, i. 7. 16.
Carcer, if one ought to give the Reward propos'd to those that arrive at the same Time at the End of the Career, v. 12. 14.
Carthage, how we ought to understand these Words of the Treaty concluded with the Romans, Carthage shall abide free, v. 12. 16.
Causes, in what Sense Natural Causes furnish us with Matter for an Imputation, i. 5. 6. The invariable and inevitable Concatenation of Causes and Effects, is an Opinion contrary to Religion and Morality, ii. 4. 4. Moral Causes, i. 5. 3. The Principal Cause, Subaltern Cause, and Collateral Cause of an Action, i. 5. 14. Cause (in Matters of Law) what it is, v. 2. 3.
Certainty, moral, there are two sorts of it, i. 2. 11.
Charges, publick. See Employment.

Chance,

An INDEX of the most Material Things, &c.

- Chance*, the Injury that is done by meer Chance, is not to be imputed, i. 5. iii. 1. 6.
- Children*, if one may do a Child an Injury while he is yet in his Mother's Womb, i. 1. 7. Why they correct Children, ib. 5. 10. If a Child can have any Right or Property, iv. 4. 15. vi. 2. 8. If his Promises are valid, iii. 6. 3. Why one ought to take great Care of hindering them from Lying, iv. 1. 7. How long they are incapable of contracting any valid Obligation, iii. 6. 4. If it is lawful to tell them any Thing that is false, iv. 1. 15. Whence comes the Easiness that they have to discern Just from Unjust, ii. 3. 13. If one ought to put an Enemy's Children to Death, viii. 6. 7. A Child which is but conceiv'd, is regarded in many Matters of Law, as if he were already in the World, iv. 12. 10. The Rights which ought to pass to a Child not yet born, but even conceiv'd, ib.
- Children*, Sons or Daughters, what is meant by them in the Law, iv. 11. 6. One may make them perish to save their Mother, but not kill or expose them, vi. 2. 6. To whom a Child that is expos'd belongs, iv. 6. 14. vi. 2. 3. If a Father may pretend to the Succession of his Child, iv. 11. 13. Children do not always resemble their Fathers, viii. 3. 33. ib. 4. 25. In what their Dependence on their Parents consists, and what is the Foundation of it, vi. 2. 1. &c. If they may marry without the Consent of their Parents, ib. f. 14. The Duties of emancipated Children, ib. f. 12. Legitimate Children ought to be acknowledg'd such by their Fathers, iv. 11. 10. They are prefer'd to natural Children in Successions to an Intestate, ib. f. 9. Children pass before all other Relations, ib. f. 3. If they ought to inherit what is beyond their Nourishment, ib. f. 7. If their Fathers and Mothers are indispensibly oblig'd to nourish them, ib. f. 4. If they may be punish'd for their Fathers Crimes, i. 9. 10. viii. 3. 33. ib. 4. 32. If 'tis properly a Punishment for them, to be excluded from the Inheritance, or have the Goods of their Fathers confiscated, ib. 3. 31, & 32. How one imputes to them the good or evil Actions of their Fathers, i. 9. 2. The Number of Children was (according to the Emperor Adrian) a good Reason for alleviating the Punishment of their Fathers, viii. 3. 17.
- Christianity*, the Precepts of Christianity are not contrary to the just Defence of a Man's self, ii. 5. 14.
- Citizen*, what he properly is, vii. 2. 10. An Idea of a good Citizen, ib. 1. 4. viii. 6. 14. Their general and particular Duties, viii. 8. 10. A Citizen ought, notwithstanding an Oath to the contrary, to discover the Plots that are contriv'd against the Prince or State, iv. 2. 9. If he ought to sacrifice his Honour for the Good of the State or Sovereign, viii. 4. 10. If they have a Right of requiring Indemnity for the Losses they have sustain'd upon the publick Account, ib. 8. 3. What Rank Citizens of some States ought to hold amongst those of another, ib. 4. 24. If every one is a Debtor for the Sums borrow'd in the Name of the State, ib. 5. 11. If he may be deliver'd to any Foreign Power that demands him, ib. 2. 5. If he may retire when he pleases, viii. 11. 2, 3, 4. If he may be banish'd without having merited it by some Crime, ib. 1. 6, 7. If some Citizens assembled in so little a Number, that they cannot make up a Body of the State, preserve the Privileges of the antient People, viii. 12. 8. See more under the Word Subjects.
- Civility*, one ought not to push Civility too far, viii. 4. 15.
- Clauses*, the different Sorts of them, iii. 8. 1. What is the Effect of those, where one declares that all posterior Acts or Ordinances shall be null, i. 6. 6. What a commissary Clause is, v. 5. 4. vii. 5. 17.
- Clemency*, how many Parts it hath, viii. 8. 23.
- Cognati*, who they are in the Roman Law, v. 12. 11.
- Choler*, Anger, it ought to be repress'd with a great deal of Care, ii. 4. 12.
- Cedterals*, when they are call'd to Succession, iv. 11. 14, 17.
- Collegues*, how many sorts of Collegues there are, vii. 2. 19.
- Colonies*, the Use and different sorts of Colonies, viii. 11. 6. & ib. 12. 5. If a Colony, which forms a new State, ought to acquit the Debts of that from whence it proceeds, ibid.
- Combats*, if single Combats, or those of an entire Army, made to decide a Difference, are legitimate, viii. 8. 5. Those who prais'd themselves for a Fight with Beasts, were declar'd infamous amongst the Romans, viii. 4. 6.
- Commerce*, the general Law establish'd in Commerce, v. 3. 10. The just Bounds of the Liberty of Commerce amongst all People, iii. 3. 11, 12. iv. 5. 10. viii. 5. 4. The different Sorts of Alliances in Matters of Commerce, ib. 9. 3. The Treaties of Commerce run upon a favourable Thing, ib. f. 7.
- Commission*, the different Ways of giving a Commission, v. 4. 5. How one ought to execute it, ib. f. 2, 3. If it can be satisfy'd by an Equivalent, ib. f. 5. He who gives a Commission to commit a Crime, is as culpable as the Author of the Action, i. 5. 14.
- Common*, how many Ways a Thing is said to be common to many, iv. 4. 3.
- Community*, how the primitive Community of Things hath been abolish'd, ib. f. 6. How it was prejudicial to Society, ib. f. 7. How many sorts of it one may conceive, ib. f. 2.
- Compassion*, it is an interested Settlement, iii. 3. 4.
- Compensation*, what it is, and in what Things it hath Place, v. 11. 5, 6.
- Complements* ought not to be taken at the End of a Letter as if they engag'd to any Thing, iii. 5. 10.
- Compulsion*, there are two sorts of it, i. 5. 9. In what it differs from Obligation, i. 6. 5. iii. 4. 6. If it always hinders one from having the Guilt of an Action, to which he was forc'd, imputed to him, i. 5. 9.
- Conduct*, how many Ways one may give an Account of his Conduct, vii. 6. 2.
- Concourse*, how in a Concourse of many Persons to the same Action, every one is responsible, iii. 1. 5.
- Concubines*, what is meant by Concubines, iv. 1. 36. What Claim the Children of a Concubine have to the Succession of their Father, iv. 11. 9.
- Condition*, what it is, iii. 8. 2. What are the Effects of it, ib. f. 2. If they have sometimes relation to the present or Time past, ib. f. 3. Tacit Conditions, iii. 6. 2. & ib. 8. 1. Chargeable Conditions cannot be added to a Promise after the Moment it hath been offer'd and notifi'd, ib. 9. 7. Conditions possible or impossible, ib. 8. 4, 5. Conditions casual, arbitrary, and mix'd, ib. f. 5. Conditions which include something unlawful, ib. f. 5. A Condition is held for accomplish'd, when the one Party hinders the Execution of it, ib.
- Conditions*, Estate of Life, the Difference of Condition does not make one Man more honest than another, vii. 4. 3. Whence it comes to pass, that certain Conditions pass for dishonourable, although they do not of themselves include any Thing vicious, ib. f. 6. One ought to be content with his Condition, ii. 4. 9.
- Confederation*, a perpetual Confederation is the most strict of all Leagues, viii. 9. 6.
- Confederate Powers*, how one ought to regulate the Order of Ranks and Precedency amongst many confederate Powers, ib. 4. 22.
- Consequences*, the necessary Consequences of an Action entering in the Estimation of Damage, iii. 1. 3. The Consequence of a Crime render it more grievous and worthy of greater Punishment, viii. 3. 18.
- Confidence or Trust*, what a Contract of Confidence, or Trust is, v. 10. 8. One ought not to make it to evade the Force of the Law, ib.
- Confiscation*, to whom the Right of Confiscation belongs, viii. 5. 11.
- Confusion*, what it is, in the Style of the Law, v. 11. 14.
- Conjectures*, the Uses of them for the Interpretation of Things, ib. 12. 5, &c.
- Conjunctions*, those which are against Nature, are unlawful, as well as confus'd Conjunctions, vi. 1. 4, 5.
- Conquerors*, they have no Right over those who have been their Companions in their Conquests, viii. 6. 21.
- Conquests*, the Foundation of the Right of Conquests, ib. Just Conquests, vii. 7. 3. Unjust, ib. f. 4.

An INDEX of the most Material Things, &c.

Consanguinity, what Degrees of it are forbid, and why, vi. 1. 32, 34.

Conscience, what it is, and the different Actions of it, i. 3. 4. Different Sorts of it, ib. f. 5, &c. The Rules which it ought to follow, ib. Its Sentiments are not a Bridle sufficient to restrain the Malice of all Men, vii. 1. 11.

Consent, the Conditions that are essential to every true Consent, iii. 6. 3. The Signs of Consent, ib. f. 16. Consent is the Foundation of every Obligation impos'd by Promise or Conventions, ibid. f. 1. Express and tacit Consent, ib. f. 2. If it is necessary to suppose a presum'd or feign'd Consent, as the Roman Lawyers do, ib. f. 2.

Consent, an Agreement of many Persons to acknowledge the same Thing; if the Consent of the People is the Foundation of natural Law, ii. 3. 7, 8.

Consolidation, what it is in the Style of the Law, iv. 8. 7.

Contract, the Difference between Contracts and simple Pacts, v. 2. 1. The essential, natural, and accidental Qualities of a Contract, ibid. 10. 2. Obligatory on one Side, or two, or mix'd, ib. 2. 5. Real or simple Consent, or verbal, ib. f. 6. Nam'd or nameless Contracts, ib. f. 7. Gainful and chargeable Contracts, ib. f. 8. Of Trust and strict Right, ib. f. 9. iii. 6. 8. The different Sorts of chargeable Contracts, v. 2. 9. Mix'd Contracts, ibid. f. 10. There ought to be an Equality in chargeable Contracts, ibid. 3. 1, &c. But not in gainful, ibid. f. 7. In chargeable, nothing is to be taken upon Presumption that 'tis a Gift, ibid. f. 8. What a Contract of Estimation is in the Roman Law, ib. 2. 9. Contracts which are enter'd with Hazard, ibid. 9. What is the Meaning of the Distinction of voluntary and involuntary Contracts in Aristotle, i. 7. 12. viii. 3. 5. A Contract concerning any Thing belonging to another, but of which one is in Possession by Trust, is null, iv. 13. 5. See more under Pact.

Contracting, the Parties, the Infidelity of one Party disengages the other, v. 11. 9. They ought and are suppos'd to know the State and Interest of each other, viii. 9. 5.

Contradictions, how one ought to reconcile seeming Contradictions, v. 12. 6. And manifest ones, ib.

Conversation, if in Conversation one may express himself after a Manner, which may make a third conceive a false Opinion, iv. 1. 18.

Corn, Ears of Corn may be pluck'd by those that pass by, iii. 3. 4. One ought to leave for the Poor the Gleaning, ibid.

Corporal, Things Corporal or Incorporal in the Stile of the Law. See Things.

Correction, if any one may use Correction towards all others, viii. 3. 10.

Counsel, it is in some Respects sacred, iii. 3. 3. In what it differs from Law, i. 6. 1. How they, who give Counsel, which engages to Sin, participate of the Crime of another, ib. 5. 14. How they are responsible for the Damage, iii. 1. 4.

Counsellors of a State, their Duty, vii. 8. 10. If they are responsible for the Damage, for not having oppos'd the pernicious Designs of the Prince, iii. 1. 4.

Country, how one renders himself Master of a Desert Country by Right of first Occupant, iv. 6. 3. 4. All that is enclos'd, not belonging to any particular Person, belongs to the State, ib.

Cowards, a Stratagem which the Cowards amongst the Romans made use of to avoid going to the Wars, and how they punish'd those who had Recourse to this Expedient, viii. 2. 3.

Courtesans. See Whore.

Creatures, it is with the Permission of GOD that Men make use of Creatures, iv. 3. 2.

Credit, what it is, v. 5. 4. They who sell upon Credit, may set a great Price on their Goods, ib. 1. 10.

Creditor, what is meant by a Creditor in the Roman Law, v. 11. 1. In rendering his Bond of Obligation he quits the Debtor, iii. 6. 2. 16. How he ought to use the Thing given in Pawn, v. 10. 14.

Crime, it is personal, viii. 3. 33. Legislators cannot determine at their Will the Nature of Crimes, ibid. 1. 3. One must distinguish in every Crime, the Vice and the Punishment, iv. 6. 20. By what Circumstances one judges of the Greatness and Enormity of a Crime, viii. 3. 18, &c. In what Sense Crimes are said to be perfected, even before their Execution, i. 7. 4. viii. 3. 18. Crimes to come cannot be imputed by a retroactive Effect, i. 5. 12. One ought not to be punish'd for another's Crime, viii. 3. 33. How one may be as guilty as the Author of a Crime, i. 5. 14. When it is that one punishes a Crime that is but in its Birth, viii. 3. 14. What Crimes carry Intamry, ibid. 4. 7. If there are properly any publick Crimes, ibid. 3. 28. How many Ways a Crime may be abolish'd i. 9. 6. One ought not to commit a Crime to obey a Superior, viii. 1. 7. It is not a good Deed nor a Merit to abstain from a Crime, i. 9. 4, 5. When it is that the Prosecution of a Crime before Civil Tribunals hath Prescription, iv. 12. 2. The Crimes which often pass unpunish'd, ought to be punish'd more severely, ii. 5. 17. Those which have been committed a long Time, ought not to be punish'd so exactly, nor with so much Rigour, as those which are quite recent, viii. 3. 29. Princes sometimes punish Crimes by which they get an Advantage; as Treason, &c. iii. 7. 8. They who get some Profit from a Crime committed by their Consent, cannot complain of the Author of the Crime, ibid. The Crimes against which it is most hard to precaution one's self, are those which deserve the most Rigour, v. 8. 4.

Criminal, if one may, to avoid Punishment, fly, or deny his Crime, iv. 1. 20. viii. 3. 4. It is not a valid Excuse for him to have Accomplices or Companions of his Crimes, ibid. f. 17. If he who marches of himself to the Place of Punishment, or mounts the Ladder, is guilty of his own Death, i. 5. 3. The Criminals to whom one ordains to kill themselves, viii. 3. 1. If a Criminal may be punish'd by another Person as culpable as himself, ib. f. 7. If one ought to permit Criminals the Choice of their Punishment, ibid. f. 4. Why they punish those who forbear saving them, ibid. f. 32. If one may sometimes pardon a Criminal, ibid. f. 15, &c.

Criticism, the general Rules for it, v. 12. 3. What the Ule and Necessity of it is, ii. 4. 13.

Curious, how one may gull People which are ridiculously curious, iv. 1. 18.

Custom, if those Customs which have relation to the Law of Nations are obligatory, ii. 3. 23.

D.

Damage, what it is, iii. 1. 3. In what it differs from Injury, i. 7. 13. How many Ways one causes a Damage, iii. 1. 6. Rules for judging whether one is bound or not to repair it, ib. f. 4. Exterior Damage, ibid. f. 3. Who they are that one ought to regard as the Authors of a Damage, ibid. f. 4. What is the Order according to which they who concur in the causing a Damage are oblig'd to repair it, ibid. f. 5. The indispensable Necessity of repairing a Damage which one has caused, ibid. f. 2. The general Rule which the Author of a Damage ought to follow to make an Estimation of it, ib. f. 7. If a Magistrate may dispense with this Reparation of a Damage, viii. 3. 4. If in the Reparation of a Damage caused without Design, one ought to take Account of the Esteem that the Person endamaged had for the Thing that is spoil'd, or made worse, v. 1. 7. The Action which one had by the Roman Law to oblige him from whom one apprehended a Damage, which was not yet happen'd, but which one had Cause to fear, to prevent it, ii. 6. 8. Damage direct, or caused by Accident, viii. 3. 31.

Danger, no Danger ought to make us abandon our Duty, ii. 4. 18. When one is in Danger of his Life, he ought to think of nothing but saving it, ii. 5. 2. iii. 7. 8.

Dart, it with a Dart one may take Possession of an Immoveable, by right of first Occupant, iv. 6. 8.

David, if King David might revoke his Word which he had given to Shimei with an Oath, and if he violated his Oath by the Orders which he gave to Solomon at his Death, viii. 10. 5.

An INDEX of the most Material Things, &c.

- Day, what they intend by that in a Treaty of Truce by Example, v. 12. 7.
- Days, Services for Days, iv. 8. 11.
- Death, how one must understand that common Maxim, That Death puts an End to all in Matter of Engagements, iii. 1. 11. v. 11. 12. It is not absolutely above the Firmness of human Spirit to suffer Death, iii. 7. 5. Why several expose themselves to Death to save the Persons they love, ii. 3. 14. Cruel Death, iii. 6. 3. Dying Persons, whether one ought to execute their Orders, iv. 10. 8.
- Debts, active Debts are taken according to the Number of the Creditor's Goods, i. 6. 11. If one may acquire them by Right of War, viii. 6. 20. What passive Debts are in the Roman Law, v. 11. 1. If one may remit them, or give Delay to the Debtors, when they are Men that are very necessary in the Time of War, viii. 5. 7. Or in some other Circumstance, where the Good of the State demands it, ib. 10. 7. How the Members are bound to the Debts contracted in the Name of the Body, vii. 2. 22. The Debts of Kings, if their Successors, or the People, ought to acquit them, viii. 10. 8. The Changes which happen in a State do not annihilate publick Debts, ibid. 12. 2. If a Colony ought to contribute to the Acquittance of the Debts of the State from whence it proceeds, ibid. f. 5. Whom the Debts fall upon, when two or more distinct States are formed or reunited into one, ibid.
- Debtor, what is meant by Debtor in the Roman Law, v. 11. 1. When it is that he is acquitted by having recovered his Bond, iii. 6. 16. If he may be acquitted by the giving up his Goods, v. 10. 10. He who swears not to pay, is not acquitted by that, iv. 2. 6. If another may discharge him, v. 11. 1. When a Debtor is held insoluble, iii. 7. 3. All the Goods of a Debtor are tacitly mortgaged to his Creditor, v. 3. 10. If he is obliged to reimburse to those who have paid without his Order, ib. 11. 2. Privileged Debtors who are only obliged to what they can do without incommoding themselves, iii. 7. 3.
- Decalogue, if the Commandments of the Decalogue are Civil Laws, viii. 1. 4. It only mentions the most enormous Crimes of every kind, ibid. If the Division of Goods is a Commandment of the Decalogue, iv. 4. 4.
- Deceit, what it is, iii. 6. 8. Real Deceit oppos'd to personal Deceit, ib. How Deceit annuls a Covenant, ib. f. 8.
- Decimation, why there is a Decimation of Soldiers, viii. 3. 26.
- Declaration, if natural Law indispensibly requires a Declaration of War, ib. 6. 9. If it is necessary after the Term of a Truce expired, ib. 7. 6.
- Defect, one ought faithfully to discover the Defects of the Thing about which he treats, v. 3. 2. &c. If a Defect perceiv'd after, breaks the Contract, iii. 6. 7. It imposes an indispensible Obligation to repair the Damage done to him who makes the Contract, v. 5. 9. A considerable Defect annuls a Contract made even with an Oath, iv. 2. 11.
- Defendant, in an Equality of Voices the Defendant is acquitted and absolv'd, vii. 2. 17.
- Defence, if the Defence of one's self by Action is permitted, or present'd by Natural Law, ii. 5. 1. 2. How far one may use it in a natural Liberty, ib. f. 3. And in Civil Society, ib. f. 4. Upon what its Right is founded, ib. f. 5.
- Deformity, whether in the Reparation of Damage, one ought to have regard to the Deformity caus'd by the Hurt, iii. 1. 8.
- Delegation, what it is, v. 11. 13.
- Delusion, what it is, i. 7. 12. By what one judges of its Enormity, viii. 3. 18. &c.
- Delivery, is either real or suppos'd, iv. 9. 9. It is done either in short, or by a round about Way, ib. If it is indispensibly necessary for the Alienation of a Thing, ibid. f. 5. &c. If when it is not founded upon any Title it transfers Propriety, ibid. f. 5.
- Demand, how one sometimes eludes a Demand, iii. 8. 5.
- To demand, he who demands is under a greater Obligation than the Possessor, to try all possible Ways of Accommodation, v. 13. 3.
- Demerit, what it is, i. 9. 5.
- Demerit, what a Demerit of the State is, and what that of the Crown is, viii. 5. 8. If the King may absolutely dispose of it or engage it, ib. In what Sense it is as mortgag'd to the King ib. The King hath the full Use of it, if the Goods incorporated to the Demerit of the Crown are entirely unalienable, ib. f. 9.
- Democracy, what it is, vii. 5. 3. Its Constitution and proper Characters, ib. f. 6, 7. There is a Sovereign in it as well as in other Forms of Government, ib. 2. 8. &c. ib. 5. 5.
- Demonstration, what it is, and what are its Principles, i. 2. 2, 3. What is that which is made a Posteriori, ii. 3. 7.
- Depositum. See Trust.
- Dereliction, Tacit Dereliction is the Foundation of Prescription, iv. 12. 8.
- Descendants, what we understand by them, v. 12. 13.
- Desertion, a wilful Desertion is a just Cause of breaking Marriage, vi. 1. 21.
- Deserters, if one may lawfully receive and make use of Deserters, viii. 6. 16.
- Desires, they ought to be proportion'd to the just Price of Things, ii. 4. 9.
- Destiny, the Opinion which establishes it, is contrary to Religion and Morals, ib. f. 5.
- Devotion, without Probity and an exact Practice of our Duty towards our Neighbour, is but Hypocrisy, equally contrary to Religion and good Morals, ib. f. 4. The Devotions which they practise in Japan, and some other Places, are contrary to Natural Law, ibid. f. 18.
- Dictators, if they were Sovereigns at Rome, vii. 6. 15.
- Differences, if in a Natural State there is any one who may, with Authority, decide Differences, v. 13. 2, 3.
- Diffidence, the Necessity and just Bounds of it in a Natural State, vii. 1. 7. &c.
- Dignities, when they are really Honourable, viii. 4. 23.
- Disbanded Persons, they ought to be maintain'd at the publick Expence, ib. 2. 1.
- Discipline, military, it ought to be very strict, ibid. And why so, ib. 3. 26.
- Discovery, one ought to communicate all Discoveries which are profitable to Life, iii. 3. 2.
- Disinheritance, there should be just Causes for disinheriting Children, iv. 11. 7, 11.
- Dispensations, what they are, and how one ought to manage them, i. 6. 17.
- Dissent, the mutual Dissent of the Parties dissannuls the Engagement, v. 11. 8.
- Dissimulation it is a necessary Consequence of Silence and Secrecy, iv. 1. 7. In what Case it is permitted or even laudable, ib. 1.
- Divinities, the Ideas which Men form of the Divinities of Paganism are pernicious and contrary to good Morals, as well as true Religion, ii. 4. 4.
- Divorce, if a Divorce is entirely contrary to Natural Law and the Gospel, vi. 1. 22. &c.
- Doctrines, how and how far a Sovereign has Right to examine Doctrines, and defend those which appear false or pernicious, vii. 4. 8.
- Doctor, one ought not to receive an ignorant Doctor, v. 1. 5. The Intention of him who installs a Doctor, does not hinder him from being receiv'd in Form, iv. 2. 5.
- Dominion. See Propriety.
- Domesticks, the reciprocal Duties of Domesticks, and their Masters, iv. 3. 4. 1.
- Doubt, the general Rule of conducting one's self in a Doubt, i. 3. 8.
- Dowry, is a favourable and priviledg'd Thing, v. 12. 12. The Recovery of a Dowry, iv. 9. 4.
- Dreams, if one is responsible for them, i. 5. 11.
- Duels, the Antiquity of them, viii. 4. 8. There is no real Dishonour in refusing a Duel, ib. He who in a Duel kills or wounds his Antagonist, does not do any Injury to him properly, i. 7. 13. And is not bound to have him healed at his Expence, iii. 7. 8. Nor to indemnify indemnify his Wife or Children when he is dead, v. 9. 3. He who goes to a Rendezvous, cannot alledge for an Excuse, the Necessity of a just Defence of himself, ii. 5. 9. The Means to prevent Duels, and render the Laws effectual, ib. f. 12. Why they were formerly permitted, v. 9. 3.

An INDEX of the most Material Things, &c.

E.

Ecclesiasticks, the Duties of them, vii. 8. 10. Their Negligence and Ignorance in what concerns the Study of Morals; they do not right in attributing to themselves, Mal à propos, the first Place in Assemblies, as well politick as Ecclesiastick, viii. 4. 22. And in publick Prayers, ibid. As well as in the Numeration of divers Orders or Estates of a Kingdom, ib. They have no particular Privilege which authorizes them to dispense with Vows and Oaths, iv. 2. 24. The same Sin notoriously committ'd by an Ecclesiastick is greater than if it were a Person of another Order that was guilty, viii. 3. 20.

Edifice, one cannot build a lasting Edifice upon a River, without the Permission of the Sovereign of the Country, iii. 3. 8.

Education, is the proper Duty of Fathers and Mothers, and a Matter of the greatest Consequence, vi. 2. 6. It very much conduceth to the Good of the State, viii. 9. 4. It is also the Foundation of the perpetual Obligation of Children, vi. 2. 12.

Effects, how natural ones may be imputed, i. 5. 6. Retroactive Effects. See Civil Laws.

Election, how Election of Sovereigns is made, vii. 7. 6.

Eloquence, the Art of it is often pernicious, ii. 4. 13.

Emanicipation, how it was made amongst the Romans, v. 10. 8.

Emperors, what the Dignity and Authority of the Roman Emperors was when there was more than one at a Time, vii. 5. 15.

Empire, what Reasons oblige us to submit to the Empire of any one, ib. 6. 5. If every Empire is founded upon the Consent of those who are subjected to it, iii. 4. 4. If there is amongst Men any Natural Empire which excludes all Liberty absolutely independent, ii. 2. 4.

Employments, which are most honourable, i. 1. 9. How one ought to confer publick Employments, and what Degree of Honour one should allow to every one, viii. 4. 23. One ought not to give them singularly, as to the Nobleness of their Birth, ib. f. 3. It is bad Politicks only to prefer Men of a certain Order, ib. No Citizen hath a perfect Right to pretend to have Employments before others, whatsoever Merit he hath, he hath only a Right to require them, iii. 1. 3. They who have given them to unworthy Persons are responsible to the State or Sovereign for the Evil that proceeds from them, ib. If they who have a publick Employment may quit it, and retire any where else without the Consent of the State, viii. 11. 3. How pernicious and blameable the selling of Ecclesiastical Employments is, v. 1. 5. What an Honorary Employment is, i. 1. 6.

End, of what Actions of the Will the End is the Object, i. 4. 1. How many sorts there are of it in general, iii. 6. 10. One ought to propose one which is conformable to our Nature, ii. 4. 6.

Enemy, what Acts of Hostility one may lawfully exercise against an Enemy, viii. 6. 7. If one may deceive him by false Discourse, iv. 1. 19. If it is permitted to defame him without a Cause, ib.

Enemies, they ought not to be perpetual, v. 13. 1.

Entia, what a Physical or Natural Entity is, i. 1. 2. What a Moral Entity, ibid. f. 2, 3. Who is the Author of Moral Entities, ibid. f. 3. Their Original and End, ib. f. 4. Their Effects and Virtue, ibid. Their different sorts, ibid. f. 5. How they are destroy'd, ibid. f. 23.

Envy is a Passion entirely vicious, ii. 4. 12. And a Sentiment contrary to Humanity, iii. 3. 1.

Equality, what Equality there ought to be in Contracts, v. 5. The natural Equality of Men is either physical or Moral, iii. 2. 2. The last ought to be acknowledg'd by every one in relation to others, and how, ib. One ought to procure himself Equality of Mind, ii. 4. 6.

Equity, the different Significations of it, v. 12. 21. Interpretation according to Equity, i. 6. 17.

Equivocations, if one may sometimes use them, iv. 1. 13.

Error, the different Sorts and Effects of Error, i. 3. 11, &c. In regard of Promises and Contracts, iii. 6. 6, 7. Oaths, iv. 2. 7. It diminishes the Unity of a Crime, viii. 3. 19. If one may cast others into any innocent Error, iv. 1. 8. That which one is call'd into by the Discourse of publick Doctors is more excusable than that into which one falls by following the Principles of particular Men, viii. 3. 19.

Estates. See Heritage.

Esteem, what it is, ib. 4. 1. How one ought to seek it, ii. 4. 9. How many sorts there are of it, viii. 4. 1. In what simple Esteem consists, and how it may be impair'd, ibid. 1. 2. Esteem of Distinction, ib. f. 11, &c.

Establishment, every human Establishment always supposes the Exception of a Case of Necessity, ii. 6. 2.

Event, one should not judge of Actions by the Event, ib. 4. 8.

Eunuchs, if it is permitted to make Eunuchs, vi. 1. 6. If natural Law permits them to marry, ib. f. 25.

Exactors of publick Taxes, we ought to hinder their Impositions, viii. 5. 5.

Examples, of those who induce others to a Crime by their Example, i. 5. 14. How pernicious evil Examples are, viii. 3. 22.

Exchange, what it is, v. 2. 9. ib. 5. 1. There are two sorts of it, ib. If it is a Contract which hath a proper and peculiar Name, v. 2. 7. Dry Exchange, ib. 7. 12.

Exceptions, tacit Exceptions, iii. 6. 2. Peremptory Exceptions, ib. f. 12.

Execution, if the simple Execution of an Order manifestly unjust, is criminal, viii. 1. 6. Imperfect Execution, when punishable, ib. 3. 27. Of the Execution of criminal Promises, iii. 7. 8.

Executioner, he is not guilty of Murder in executing his Office, viii. 4. 5. Why his Office is infamous, ibid. f. 5, 6.

Expiation, the Expiation of a Crime is not one of the Natural Ends of Punishment, ib. 3. 12.

Expences, what Expences one must pay in the Line of Account, in stating the Price of Merchandize, v. 1. 10.

F.

Fables, if one may invent Fables, iv. 1. 15.

Faction, what it is, viii. 2. 23.

Faculties, why the Faculties of our Soul have been principally given us, ii. 1. 5. How the Effects of the natural Faculties of the Body and Mind may be imputed to any Man, i. 5. 7.

Faith, if one ought to keep his Faith to one who has none, iii. 6. 9.

Fairs, one ought to let Strangers carry from Fairs what they have bought, ib. f. 2.

Falsity, all Falsity is not a Lye, iv. 1. 9.

Family, if a separate and independent Family may pass for a State, vi. 2. 20. The Interest of great Families requires that the Eldest have some Advantage in the Succession, iv. 11. 8. One sometimes pardons a Man because he is the last of an illustrious Family, viii. 3. 17.

Farmer, if the Accidents which befall a Farmer, afford a just Reason for diminishing the Rent agreed upon, v. 6. 3.

Fathers, whence comes the great Tenderness which a Father hath for his Children, ii. 3. 14. The extreme Guilt that Fathers have to know their Childrens Wickedness, viii. 3. 32. What Authority they have over their Children. (See Paternal Power.) If a Father has more than a Mother, vi. 2. 5. If he can sell his Children, ib. f. 9. He ought to nourish and educate them, iv. 11. 4. 5. Why he has Right to chastise them, viii. 3. 10. If he can favour any of his Children in the Division of his Estate, iv. 11. 8. He has the Profit of his Childrens good Advancements, ibid. 8. 7. When he succeeds his Children,

An INDEX of the most Material Things, &c.

- Children, and when he is excluded from their Succession, ib. 11. 13. The Foundation of the Right of Life and Death, which Fathers of Families have over their Children and Slaves in some States, viii. 3. 13. How they may become Sovereigns in the independent State of Nature, vii. 3. 6.
- Adoptive Father*, the Roman Law did not permit an Adoptive Father to marry his Adopted Daughter, iv. 1. 32.
- Fault*, what a Fault is, and how many Sorts of it, i. 7. 16. If the smallest Faults are real Sins, ib. 5. 8. If they ought to be punish'd at human Tribunals, viii. 3. 14.
- Favourable*, what it is in the Style of the Law, v. 12. 12.
- Fear*, 'tis a Passion hurtful to Men, ii. 4. 12. What Fear induc'd Men to form Civil Societies, vii. 1. 7. If Fear annuls the Oaths which it forc'd Men to take, vi. 2. 8. If the Fear of being deceiv'd, or an unjust Fear of Evil, annuls Pacts, iii. 6. 9, 10, 11. If the Fear of a Neighbour's Power is a just Reason to make War against him, ii. 5. 6. viii. 6. 5.
- Felicity*, what Felicity one may promise himself in the World, ii. 4. 8.
- Feller of Wood*. See Wood.
- Felony*, what it is, and what is the Consequence of it, iv. 8. 12.
- Fiefs*, what Fiefs are, ibid. Their Original, viii. 4. 30. When they return to the Lord, iv. 8. 12.
- Fine*, we ought not by paying it to insult the Magistrate, viii. 3. 4.
- First*, an Explication of the Maxim, that the First in Date hath the best Right, iii. 7. 1. He that hath First committed a Crime, ought to be punish'd more severely than those who are seduc'd by his Example, viii. 3. 22.
- Fishing*, upon what is founded that Right of Fishing which particular Men have, iv. 6. 5. Whether one can appropriate to himself the Fishing upon any Part of the Sea, ib. 5. 7.
- Fishers*, they ought not to fish (according to a Chinese Philosopher) but with Nets with large Meshes, ib. 3. 6. Why the Roman Law forbids them to burn Fire upon a River in the Night-time, iii. 3. 4.
- Flattery*, it is a kind of Injury and Mockery, viii. 4. 13.
- Flatterers*, how pernicious they are to Princes, vii. 9. 2. If they are oblig'd to repair the Damage that proceeds from their Flattery, iii. 1. 4.
- Flesh*, if in a great Scarcity of Victuals one may eat human Flesh, ii. 6. 3. If the Custom of it which is establish'd amongst the Savages of America, is a sufficient Reason to declare War against them, viii. 6. 5.
- Flight*, whether in Cases of Assault a Man is oblig'd, if he can conveniently, to betake himself to Flight, ii. 5. 13. Whether in Flight one may break down a Bridge behind him, or shut a Gate, when by that he leaves his Companions expos'd to the Fury of the Enemy, or run over an innocent Person, who is in his Way, ii. 6. 3.
- Force*, if Force alone produces any Obligation, i. 6. 9, 10. Whether Contracts made by Force are null and void, iii. 6. 10.
- Fornication*, whether simple Fornication be contrary to the Law of Nature, vi. 1. 4. How it was look'd upon in different Nations, ibid.
- Fortifications*, if, to make them, one may take the Gardens, Houses, or Lands of particular Persons, and the Materials which were prepar'd for their own Use, viii. 5. 7.
- Fortitude*, if they can demonstrate that Virtue without supposing the Immortality of the Soul, ii. 3. 19.
- Fortune*, Men cast upon Fortune, the evil Effects of false Measures which themselves take imprudently, ii. 4. 8.
- Found*, a Man that has found any Thing, ought to endeavour that the Owner may recover it, iv. 13. 4. When a Man becomes lawful Owner of what he has found, ib. 6. 12.
- Fountains*, one should not stop it up or conceal it, after he has made use of it, iii. 3. 4.
- Fraud* it is put in the same Rank with Violence, with relation to the Validity of Contracts, ib. 6. 10. Whether it makes Oaths void, iv. 11. 17.
- Friends*, we ought to succour them, viii. 6. 14. If in Point of Succession, they ought to be prefer'd to Relations, iv. 11. 15. Injuries done by a Friend affect us more than those of an Enemy, or a Stranger, viii. 3. 20.
- Friendship*, wherein consists its Duties, ib. 9. 2. Friendship and Faith two most sacred Things, v. 4. 2.
- Fruits*, what they are, and how many Sorts of them, iv. 7. 3. To whom the Offspring of Living Creatures belongs, ib. Whether Fruits are reckon'd in the Estimation of Damage, iii. 1. 3.
- Fruition*, what it is, i. 4. 1.
- Function*, no Member of a State ought to render himself incapable of military Functions, viii. 2. 3.

G.

- Gain*, whether the Gain that a Man that is kill'd could have made, may be reckon'd in the Estimation of Damage, iii. 1. 7.
- General of an Army*, what the Extent of his Power is, viii. 6. 10. He can assign every Man his Post, ibid. 2. 4. If he may tell his Soldiers any Thing that is not true, iv. 1. 16. If the Sovereign is oblig'd to ratify the Agreements which the Generals or other Officers of War make with the Enemy, viii. 7. 13.
- Generation*, whether it be the Foundation of Paternal Authority, vi. 2. 4, 12.
- Gestures*, they are imperfect Signs of Consent, iii. 6. 16.
- Gibeonites*, whether the Trick they us'd to Joshua be criminal, iv. 2. 7.
- Glory*, in what true Glory consists, viii. 4. 12. Vain Glory is nothing but an imaginary Good, ib. 3. 19.
- God*, although God cannot do certain Things, he is nevertheless omnipotent, ii. 3. 4. If his Sovereignty is founded upon his Omnipotency, i. 6. 10. He is not the Cause of the Mixture of human Actions, ibid. 7. 5. Universal Liberty void of all Hindrance and of all Defect, is applicable only to God, ii. 1. 3. In what Sense God is a Law to himself, ib. If there is any Law common to God and Man, ibid. 3. 5. If Men can do any Thing meritorious in relation to him, i. 9. 5. A general Idea of the Duties of Man towards God, ii. 4. 2. His will is the Foundation of the Obligation we lie under to observe the Law of Nature, ib. 3. 20.
- Good*, what it is, and how many Sorts there are of it, i. 4. 4. Real and imaginary, viii. 3. 19. In what Sense Good or Evil depends upon the Determination of the Sovereign, or of the Civil Law, ib. 1. 5. Good which happens to Man is of three Sorts, ii. 3. 21. The Scarcity of a good Thing does not make it more valuable in it self, v. 1. 6. When the Prospect of an agreeable and profitable Good lessens a Crime, viii. 5. 19. If any good Thing may be communicated gratis and without any Motive, i. 9. 2. How one may do another a real good Turn, iii. 6. 13.
- Goods*, Riches, they are the Object of the greatest Part of the Law, and are as it were the Life of Mortals, iv. 3. 1. The Inequality of the Goods or Fortune are not contrary to the natural Equality of Men, iii. 2. 2. If we may lawfully kill him who would take them from us, ii. 5. 16. The Prince may use what Use we should make of them, viii. 5. 3. If he has a Right of disposing of them absolutely, ibid. 1. 2. If he can give up at a Pacification the Goods of private Subjects, ib. 8. 3.
- Goods of another*, every one ought to abstain from them religiously, iv. 13. 1. If one may take them in extreme Necessity, ii. 6. 5, 6. If one may destroy them to save his own, ib. 1. 8. Promises of another Man's Goods are null, iii. 7. 10. The Duty of him who is entrusted with them, iv. 13. 2, &c. Different Ways of having a Right over the Goods of another, ib. 8.
- Publick Goods*, how many Sorts of them, viii. 5. 7. How far the Prince has the Power of disposing of them, ibid.
- Goodness*, the Goodness of an Action is not absolutely in itself susceptible of Quantity, i. 8. 1. Whence it consists, ib. 7. 3.
- Good Luck*. See Felicity.

An INDEX of the most Material Things, &c.

Government, Civil, it binds stronger than Government form'd by ordinary Compact, vii. 4. 9. If accidental Circumstances change the Form, ib. f. 1. 12. What a regular Government is, and how many sorts there are, ib. f. 3. Irregular Governments, ib. f. 14, 15. Whether they are reckon'd among mix'd Governments, ib. f. 13. The Difficulty of the Art of Government, ib. 9. 2. What is the best Government, ib. f. 5. 22. The Government may be different according to the Genius of the People, ib. 6. 5.

Governor of a Province, whether he can of his own Head make War or Peace, viii. 6. 10.

Governments, they are as profitable as Swordsmen, viii. 4. 30.

Grafts, whether in Accession they follow the Stock on which they are grafted, iv. 7. 5.

Grapes, they should be left after Vintage to poor People, iii. 3. 4.

Gratitude, the Necessity and Rules of this Virtue, ib. f. 16. A Comparison betwixt its Duties and those of Beneficence, v. 12. 23.

Guarantees of a Peace, what they are oblig'd to, viii. 8. 7.

Guests, if they sit down to Table at a publick House, they are oblig'd to pay their Scot, tho' they made no Agreement with the Host, iii. 6. 2.

Gulfs, to whom it belongs, when many different Nations possess the Lands on its Shores, iv. 5. 8.

Gutters, the Service of Gutters, iv. 8. 11.

H.

Habitation, the Right of it, what it is, iv. 8. 9.

Habit, what Influence it has upon moral Actions, i. 4. 6. ib. f. 13. The Terms which constitute it are capable of any Latitude, ib. 2. 10.

Hatred, we ought not to nourish it, ii. 4. 12.

Hazard, or Contracts wherein is Hazard, v. 9.

Heard, in what Case one is culpable for having heard a Thing said, i. 5. 14.

Hereicks, how unjust the Animosity is which Men have against them, and how detestable that Opinion is, which permits a Violation of Faith with them, ii. 4. 4.

Heritage, Heritage in the City, Prælia Urbana, what they are in the Roman Law, iv. 8. 11. Heritage in the Country, Prælia Rustica, ibid.

Heir, he is thought to have the Propriety of the Fruits of the Deceas'd, before the Formality of taking Possession, iv. 4. 10. Whether he can lawfully receive in the Name of the Deceas'd, the Offers which he had refus'd, iii. 9. 6. Whether he can claim any of the Fruits of the Grounds, of which the Deceas'd had the Use and Profits without the Property, when he dies before Harvest, iv. 8. 7. If he finishes the Time of the Prescription which run before the Death of the Deceas'd, iv. 12. 4. How far he is liable to pay the Debts of the Deceas'd, ib. 11. 20. And to answer for his Oaths, ib. 2. 17. His Promises or Contracts, ibid. If he ought to pay the pecuniary Reparations to which the Deceas'd had been condemn'd, viii. 3. 33. If one may inflict any infamous Punishment upon him, as he is an Heir, ibid. To what the Heir of a Thief is liable, iii. 1. 11.

Hermits, whether they do well to withdraw themselves from human Society, ii. 4. 15.

Hiring or Renting, what it is, v. 6. 1.

History, what the Knowledge of it is necessary to, ii. 4. 13.

Historian, he is indispensibly oblig'd to tell the Truth, as far as it is known to him, iv. 1. 7.

Homage, Forc'd Homages are no real Marks of Honour, viii. 4. 14.

Homicide, what it is, i. 1. 6. Whether it is culpable when one only intends a Wound, ibid. 3. 16. How the Damage done by it ought to be repair'd, iii. 1. 7. Whether it should always be punish'd with Death, viii. 3. 26. See more in Murder.

Honesty, if the Honest or Dishonest are such of themselves, or by Appointment, i. 2. 6. ii. 3. 4. The Ideas of Honesty separated from the Relation which they have to the Will of God, are nothing but sine Chinara's, or barren Principles, ii. 3. Every one is suppos'd honest as long as they cannot be proved the contrary, viii. 4. 3.

Honour, of Distinction or Preference, what it is, iv. 4. 11. What are its Foundations, ib. f. 12. How one must seek it, ii. 4. 9. Whether Honours depend absolutely upon the Will of the Sovereign, ib. f. 32.

Honour, the Reputation of an honest Man, whether it depends upon the arbitrary Determination of the Sovereign, viii. 4. 9. Whether one can without a Crime sacrifice it for his Pounce, ib. f. 10.

Honour, Chastity, whether 'tis lawful for a Woman rather to kill herself than lose her Honour by being ravish'd, ii. 4. 19.

Point of Honour, the Vanity of Point of Honour in relation to Duels, ibid. f. 8.

Hope, how it ought to be ruled, ibid. f. 12. If one may sometimes make a Man conceive false Hopes, iii. 5. 5.

Hospitality, in what its Rights consist, ib. 3. 9.

Hostage, if one may give himself an Hostage, ii. 4. 18. If the Sovereign can force us to it, viii. 2. 6. If he engages the Life of Hostages, or only their Liberty, ibid. If they should be punish'd for the Breach of a Treaty, ib. If when an Hostage comes to be Heir to him who sent him, he be bound to stay, ib. 8. 6. Of Hostages given to Robbers, iii. 6. 11.

Humanity, wherein the Duties of it consist, iii. 3. 1, &c. In what they differ from those of Justice, ibid. 4. 1. To what Nations one may refuse them, ibid. 3. 3. and viii. 4. 5.

Humility, in what honest and reasonable Humility consists, iii. 2. 6.

Humour, if the Inconsistency of Humeurs be a Reason sufficient for the dissolving of Marriage, iv. 1. 22.

Hunting, 'tis an Exercise fit for Nobility and Princes, iv. 6. 6. To whom the Right of Hunting belongs, ibid. f. 5. How one may make the Laws concerning Hunting valid, ibid. f. 7.

Huntsman, if the Beasts he hath taken contrary to the Laws belong to him, iv. 6. 7. If a Beast belongs to him after the Moment he has kill'd it, ib. f. 10.

Hurt, one is not hurt for being frustrated of that which others owe us by virtue of an imperfect Obligation, iii. 1. 3. He who is hurt is not oblig'd to content himself with the Punishment of the Offender, ibid. f. 11.

Husband, his Authority does not necessarily imply the Power of Life and Death, vi. 1. 13. The Foundation of his lawful Authority, ib. 11, &c. Whether he be responsible for what his Wife does, i. 5. 14. If when he consents to the Prostitution of his Wife, she commits Adultery, ib. 7. 17. The Laws absolve him who kills his Wife with her Gallant surpriz'd in the very Fact, ii. 5. 15. viii. 3. 13. Whence it comes that the Disgrace of the Immodesty of a Woman reflects upon her Husband, vi. 1. 10. If when a Husband is taken Prisoner, the Enemy thereby gets any Right over his Wife and Children, viii. 6. 19.

I.

Ideot, his Promises are null, iii. 6. 3.

Idle, one ought not to assist idle Men, ib. f. 6.

Ideas, innate, if there be such, ii. 3. 13.

Jealousy, if it be unjust and ridiculous in itself, vi. 1. 15.

Ignominy, Marks of Ignominy are little mortifying to those who have many Companions, viii. 4. 11.

Ignorance, its different sorts, i. 2. 10. The Actions which proceed from it are more involuntary, than those which Fear causes, ibid. 7. 17. Invincible Ignorance excludes all Imputation, ibid. 5. 10.

Immovable Goods, what is meant by them, iv. 6. 2. How one makes himself Master of them by Right of first taking Possession, ib. f. 3. 8. When 'tis that they are taken by the Enemy, viii. 6. 17.

Immunity, how one can lawfully grant an Immunity, viii. 5. 6. No one extends to a Case of Necessity, ib. f. 7. and ibid. 2. 1. ibid. 4. 33. They who have Immunities ought not to abuse them, by making the

Bbbbbb

Goods

An INDEX of the most Material Things, &c.

- Goods of others, which are not free from Imposts, pass under his Name, v. 10. 8. They ought not to be given purely and simply for the sake of the Nobility, viii. 4. 31.
- Impossible*, an Explication of that Maxim, No Body is oblig'd to Impossibleities, i. 5. 8. iii. 7. 2, &c. Evil Actions are esteem'd impossible in the Roman Law, i. 7. 2. How one must explain it, when one finds Impossible in a Law, Contract, or in a Will, ib. 5. 8.
- Impossibleities*, are either physical or moral, ibid.
- Imposts*, who has a Right to exact them, viii. 5. 4. Rules which one must follow in their Establishment, and in the Taxing of every Particular, ibid. 1. 5, 6, 8, and ib. 9, 10.
- Imprudence*, in what it consists, i. 2. 6.
- Impotency of Husbands*, when it is incurable, it annuls the Marriage, vi. 1. 25.
- Impunity*, why 'tis given to certain Crimes, i. 6. 15. One ought not to grant it to certain Persons without very great Reason, viii. 3. 17. Frequent Examples of Impunity lessen the Heinousness of a Crime, ibid. 1. 22.
- Impunity*, if those Inconveniences caused by them, which are mention'd in the Law of Moses, were Punishments properly so call'd, viii. 3. 4.
- Imputation*, whence it proceeds, when a Thing is capable of Imputation, i. 5. 5. What Things are capable of it, ib. 1. 6. &c. What is an Imputation which is grounded upon Favour, ibid. 9. 2. An Imputation concerning Right, ibid. 1. 3. Simple Imputation and powerful Imputation concerning Right, ib. 1. 6.
- Incest*, what it is, ib. 1. 6. Whether one can commit it to preserve one from Death, ib. 5. 9.
- Inclinations*, to what their Diversity tends, ii. 17. 9.
- Incorrigible Persons*, it would be better for them to be dead, viii. 3. 10. Whether none but incorrigible Offenders ought to be punish'd, ib. 1. 10.
- Inequality*, whence come those Inequalities between Men, iii. 2. 9. How one ought to set right that Inequality which appears in a Contract, v. 3. 9.
- Infamy*, how one is marked with Intamy, viii. 4. 6, 7. Intamy de jure & de facto, what it is among the Lawyers, ib. 1. 7. How, and by whom, Intamy can be wip'd off, ib. 1. 10. Whether one is oblig'd to incur real Infamy to obey one's Sovereign, ib. 1. 9.
- Infant*. See Children.
- Informers* ought to take care not to be guilty of the same Crimes of which they accuse others, viii. 3. 7. Altho' they be suborn'd by their Sovereign, they commit an evil Action, ib. 1. 7.
- Ingrateful*, whether one can lay an Action of Injustice against ungrateful Persons, iii. 3. 17. In what Places it is impracticable, ibid.
- Ingratitude*, the Baseness of that Vice, ibid. Why it is more shameful and odious than Injustice, ib. Complicated Ingratitude, ib.
- Injury*, what it is, i. 7. 15. In what it differs from Damage, ib. 1. 13. From Injustice, ibid. And from Fault, ibid. From Misfortune, ib. 1. 16. Injuries can produce no Right, iii. 6. 10. How they judge of its Greatness, viii. 3. 20. Every one has a natural Right not to suffer Injuries, iii. 2. 4. Rules of Prudence which they ought to follow who have receiv'd any, ii. 5. 3. There is sometimes a Greatness of Mind to despise Injuries, viii. 4. 8. When it is that an Injury is esteem'd morally not done, i. 9. 3. How they make Compensation for Injuries, or Benefits with Injuries, v. 11. 6.
- Injustice*, what it is, i. 7. 14. It can produce no Right, nor impose any Obligation, iii. 6. 10. A less gives no more Right to its Author than a greater, ibid.
- Innocence*, it does not always find its Defence in itself, vii. 1. 8.
- Innocent*, it is better to hazard letting a Criminal escape, than to punish an Innocent, i. 3. 6. In what case one can hazard the perishing of an innocent Person, ib. 5. 3.
- Instinct*, whether those Things to which natural Instinct carries us, can be the Matter of any Obligation, vi. 1. 3. When it is we must restrain it, ibid.
- Instrument*, they spoil exterior Instruments sometimes as well as the inanimate and destitute of Reason, ii. 3. 3. How the Nature of the Instrument tends to aggravate a Crime, viii. 3. 20.
- Intention*, what it is, i. 4. 1. Full Intention, and imperfect Intention, ibid. The good Intention does not render an Act materially good, ibid. 7. 4. In Judgment, when there is a doubtful or equivocal Intention, it must be taken on the more favourable Side, ibid. 8. 3. What sort of Intention is necessary to make a moral Action good before the Divine Tribunal, ib. 1. 2. How far it has Regard in human Tribunals, ibid. 1. 3.
- Interest of Money lent*, whether natural Right forbids absolutely to take it, v. 7. 9. Interest lucratory and compensatory, what it is, whether both of them are lawful, ibid.
- Interpretation*, how one ought to take it in that of Laws and Conventions, v. 12.
- Interregnum*, what it is, vii. 7. 7.
- Invention*, one ought to communicate the Inventions of Things necessary to human Life, iii. 3. 2.
- Joy*, how and how far that Passion is lawful, ii. 4. 12. Malignant Joy for Mischief which happens to another, is contrary to Humanity, ibid. 3. 1. Whether the Joy one shews at the Wrong which one sees done to any one, obliges one to repair the Damage, iii. 1. 4.
- Joshua*, whether the Oath which he made to the Gibeonites were valid, iv. 2. 7.
- Judge*, he ought not to sell Justice, v. 1. 5. Whether he who pronounces an unjust Sentence, but by Order of his Prince, commits by that any Crime, viii. 1. 7. In what consists the Equality which he ought to observe in the Exercise of Justice, ibid. 3. 23. When it is that he can administer the Oath to Parties, iv. 2. 22. Whether he can use an Artifice to discover a Crime that is not proved, ib. 1. 20.
- Just*, whether there would be any Thing just or unjust, without the Establishment of Civil Laws, viii. 1. 6.
- Justice*, of the Justice of Actions, i. 7. 7. Of that of Persons, ibid. 1. 6. Justice universal and particular, ib. 1. 8. Distributive, ib. 1. 9. Commutative, ibid. 1. 10. Avenging or Vindicative Justice, viii. 3. 5. In what consists the Inequality which one must observe in the Exercise of it, ibid. 1. 23. Its Exercise is capable of being understood, both with relation to Clemency, and to Rigour, i. 2. 10. Whether Satisfaction to Justice be a natural End of the Punishment of Crimes, viii. 3. 12.

K.

- Kings*, to whom it belongs to give the Title of King, viii. 3. 9. If the Power of a King flows from Paternal Authority, vi. 2. 10. If a King is above all his People, vii. 6. 5. If the People may depose their Kings as they think good, ibid. 5. 9. The different sorts of Promises Kings make at their coming to the Throne, ibid. 6. 10. How important it is for the Good of the State, and the Interest of Kings, that their Authority be limited, ibid. 1. 9. Who are Kings, whose Authority is not inviolable, ibid. 8. 8. Kings ought indispensibly to keep the Oaths they have made, viii. 10. 5. In what Sense their Contracts are above the Rules of the Civil Law, ib. 1. 4. How long their Minority endures, ib. 1. 3. If Contracts made in their Name during their Minority are valid, ibid. How he may free himself from Engagements made to Strangers, ib. 1. 2. And to his own Subjects, ib. 1. 3. If one King really ought to give Place to any other King, ib. 4. 2. If he may leave the Decision of a Quarrel, or of Articles of Peace, to a single Combat, or to a Battle of two Armies, ibid. 8. 5. If when he is fallen into the Hands of his Enemies, they become thereby Masters of his Kingdom, ib. 6. 19. If his Alliance with a King, who has been since chas'd from his Kingdom, do still continue, ibid. 9. 9. See more in Prince and Sovereign.
- Kingdom*, what it is, vii. 6. 17. A Patrimonial Kingdom, ibid. 1. 16. What Power the Master of such a Kingdom hath over the Goods included in his Dominions, viii. 5. 1. The Order of Succession ab intestate to such a Kingdom, vii. 7. 11. A Kingdom established by the free and voluntary Consent of the People,

An INDEX of the most Material Things, &c.

ple, ibid. 6. 17. If the King of such a Kingdom may alienate it, either wholly, or in Part, viii. 5. 9. Or engage it, or make it a Fief to another, ib. f. 10. Or discharge a Vassal of his Kingdom from the Homage he owes him, ibid. If a Part of a Kingdom may separate itself from the whole Body, ib. f. 9.

Knowledge, an indifferen^t Knowledge of profitable Things is more valuable than a perfect Knowledge of unprofitable Things, ii. 4. 23. The Necessity of the Knowledge of one's self, ib. f. 5.

L.

Labours, if one may shorten his Life by hard Labour, ii. 4. 17. When Labour is in the Place of Punishment, viii. 3. 4.

Land, if one may make a Division of Land amongst Men, iv. 5. 4. If Strangers may, without the Permission of the Sovereign, seize on the vacant Lands which they find in a Country, iii. 3. 10. What Lands are, iv. 6. 3. How they take Possession of them, ibid. 9. 7. If a little is better than more, when Money circulates in a great Quantity, v. 1. 16. If 'tis for the Interest of a State to permit Subjects to bequeath their Lands by Will, iv. 11. 18.

Landlord, in what Case the Loss that happens to the Tenant ought to be charg'd upon him, v. 6. 2.

Languages, of their Original, iv. 1. 3. To what the Knowledge of divers Languages tends, ii. 4. 13. It is no Matter in what Language a Contract is wrote, provided the Parties understand one another, iii. 6. 16.

Latitude, moral, in what it consists, i. 2. 8. &c.

Law, what it is in general, i. 6. 4. What Difference there is between Law and Counsel, ib. f. 1. Between it and a Compact ib. f. 2. Between Law and Right, ibid. f. 3. The essential Parts of a Law, ibid. f. 14. Its Matter, ib. f. 16. and i. 8. 4. Its different sorts, ibid. f. 18. An obligatory Law, and a Law of simple Permission, ib. f. 15. If one ought to divide it into Directive and Compulsive, ib. f. 14. In what Sense the Law acts, ibid. and vii. 6. 11. It ought to be known by them for whom it is made, ib. f. 13. Who ought to explain the obscure Parts of it, ibid. Imperfect Laws, ib. f. 14. Who those are whom the Laws oblige, ibid. f. 17. Who can dispense with them, and how, ibid. Laws Affirmative and Negative, ii. 6. 2. v. 12. 23. Whether all Laws ought to be published by writing, i. 6. 4. and ii. 3. 20. Cases of Necessity are tacitly excepted in Laws, ii. 6. 2. Why particular Cases are not express'd, i. 2. 5. Rules for the Interpretation of Laws, v. 12. An Opposition between two Laws, i. 3. 8. v. 12. 23. The Cincian Law, i. 6. 14.

Civil Law, what it is properly, viii. 1. 1. How they ought to be made, vii. 9. 5. We must distinguish two Reasons upon which they are founded, viii. 3. 17. If they can be contrary to natural Law, ib. f. 2, 3. If the Nature of Crimes depends absolutely upon their Determination, ibid. Why they do not give all the Force of the Civil Law to all the Maxims of the Law of Nature, ib. 1. 1. and ib. 3. 14. The publick Interest requires that their Rigour go sometimes beyond Justice, i. 2. 10. Necessity obliges us sometimes to mitigate, or quite abolish them, viii. 3. 17. They ought to have been very few, before the Establishment of the Propriety of Goods, iv. 4. 13. If the Consent of the People be always necessary to make them oblige the Conscience, i. 6. 13. How far they extend their Power with relation to those who are simply in an Error, ib. 3. 2. When the Laws are extended to Cases not express'd, ib. f. 17. They ought not to be purely penal, viii. 3. 4. Of Laws whose Prohibitions are conditional, ibid. How the Civil Laws ought to be made, vii. 9. 5.

Laws, Fundamental, what they are, ib. 6. 10. If a Prince can dispense with them, viii. 10. 3.

Law, Licinian, what it is, viii. 5. 4.

Law, Mosaic, if it is the whole Rule of Punishment, viii. 3. 26.

Law of Nature, what it is, i. 6. 18. If its Principles be innate, ii. 3. 13. What is the Foundation of the Obligation which it imposes, ib. f. 20. In what consists its Sanction, i. 6. 14. ii. 3. 21. iii. 4. 6. If it has not the Force of a Law, as it is publish'd in the Holy Scriptures, ii. 3. 20. If its Precepts are always in Force, iv. 4. 13. If Equity has a Place in its Interpretation, v. 12. 21.

Law, penal, what it is, viii. 3. 16.

Law, positive, what it is, i. 6. 18. If these are divine Positive Laws, which oblige all Mankind, ib.

Law, Rhodian, ii. 6. 8.

Laws, Sumptuary, how they are profitable to the State, viii. 4. 3. Their End is sometimes alternative, ibid. 3. 4.

Leagues. See Alliances.

Legislators, how they may be known, i. 6. 13. In what Sense they may force Men to obey, ib. f. 14. They cannot specify and foresee all Chances, v. 12. 17. What Rules they ought to follow in the Determination of the Obligation to which they would give the Force of the Civil Law, iii. 4. 6. viii. 1. 1.

Legacies, pious, for restoring the Frauds and Thefts which have been committed, and contrary to Religion, ii. 4. 4. The Sovereign can prescribe Bounds to Legacies, viii. 5. 4.

Libels, they are culpable who publish them, iii. 1. 4.

Liberalty, the Excellency of that Virtue, ib. 3. 15. The Rules which all Men ought to follow in the Exercise of it, ibid.

Liberty, a Faculty of the Soul, i. 4. 2. ii. 1. 2. Its Indifference, i. 4. 3.

Liberty, Independency, if that of the State of Nature be contrary to Nature, ii. 2. 4. Why Liberty is call'd an inestimable Good, v. 1. 5. There are two sorts of Obstacles to that Liberty, vii. 3. 10.

Lie, wherein it consists, iv. 1. 8, 9.

Life, what Use one ought to make of Life, ii. 4. 15. If an active Life is preferable to a contemplative one, ib. 3. 15. and ib. 4. 13. In what Case it is permitted to expose or sacrifice it for the Advantage of another, ib. f. 17. The Life of a free Person is not capable of Estimation, iii. 1. 7.

Loan, a Loan for spending, v. 7. 1, &c. What a Loan for Use is, ib. 4. 6. If a Loan for Usury is contrary to natural Law, vii. 7. 9. What a Lender is oblig'd to, v. 4. 6.

Lot, a Decision by Lot is not always the Voice of God, v. 9. 2. Why 'tis made use of, iii. 2. 5. v. 9. 2, 3.

Lottery, what it is, and what Conditions are necessary to make it lawful, ib. f. 6.

Love, when 'tis lawful, ii. 4. 12. Self-Love is the strongest of all Inclinations, ib. 3. 14. Well understood it is one of the three great Springs of the Law of Nature, ib. f. 15. and ib. 4. 1. How far the Love of our Neighbour should carry us, ib. 5. 14. To love our Neighbour as our selves, in what Sense it is to be taken, ibid.

Luxury, how it is pernicious to a State, viii. 5. 3. Means to make it cease, ib.

M.

Madness, if it seizing a Man, makes his Compacts null and void, iii. 6. 3. If a Madman have any Right of Propriety, iv. 4. 15. One may disguise the Truth to him, ib. 1. 15.

Magistrate, what he is, i. 1. 12. vii. 2. 24. Magistrates ought to judge according to the Laws, viii. 3. 17. If they ought to punish Crimes which they themselves are guilty of, viii. 3. 7. If they may use sometimes a Lye, iv. 1. 17. Their Connivance is criminal, i. 5. 14. In what Cases they may use Connivance, viii. 3. 17.

Majority, what it is, i. 1. 10. ib. 5. 1.

Malice, in what the Malice of an Action consists, i. 7. 3.

Man, his natural Weakness, ii. 1. 8. He is more wretched than the Beasts, ib. f. 6. If he can be sociable, and live without Laws, ibid. 1. If he naturally loves Society, vii. 1. 2. He is liable to correct the Evils which trouble Society, ib. f. 4. If all Things were created for Man, iv. 3. 2. If all Men have Will and Power to hurt one another, ii. 2. 6. What Right he has over the Goods of this World, iv. 3. 1. If he is always in a State of War with the Beasts, ib. f. 5. He ought not to abuse the Right he has over them, and why, ibid. If they have Power to confer of themselves,

An INDEX of the most Material Things, &c.

- selves, on one of their Equals, a Power so eminent and absolute, that it may exempt him from all Obligation, with relation to them, iii. 4. 8. If it be unjust for one Man to punish another, viii. 3. 6. What Care Men ought to take of themselves, ii. 4. 1. They ought to be easy and complaisant one to another, iii. 2. 4. To do good to each other, ibid. 3. 1. If supposing they had continued in a State of Innocence, they would have establish'd a positive Law, or Civil Society, i. 1. 11.
- Mandate. See Commission.
- Market, Strangers which are permitted to come to Markets, ought to be suffer'd to carry away what they have bought, iii. 6. 2.
- Marriage, it is the Nursery of human Kind, vi. 1. 2. The Foundation of the Order of Civil Society, ib. 1. 5. Irregular Marriages, or according to the Fashion of the Amazons, ib. 1. 9. The Laws of regular Marriage, ib. 1. 10. Whether a Marriage be valid, when one has sworn not to marry him or her whom one espouses, iv. 2. 11. Whether Consent of Parties constitutes Marriage, vi. 1. 14. Natural Obstacles which hinder Marriage, ibid. 1. 14. and 1. 25. Moral Obstacles, ib. 1. 27, &c. Just Reasons of dissolving it, ib. 2. 1, &c. It ought not to be broken without great Reasons, not even by the Consent of the Parties, ibid. 5. 20. Whether one can be oblig'd to enter into an Engagement of Marriage, and how far, ibid. 1. 3. 6. 7. Of forced Consent or Error on the Subject of Marriage, ibid. 1. 26. Whether a Marriage against the Consent of Parents be null, ibid. 2. 14. Whether the Sacerdotal Benediction be necessary by the Law of Nature to finish the Marriage, ibid. 1. 4. Of Marriages of Conscience, ibid. 1. 36. How they annul Marriages, or strip them of certain Effects, ibid. The Facility of Marriages is very useful to the State, viii. 5. 3. Whether one be indispensibly oblig'd to permit Strangers to contract Marriages in our Country, iii. 3. 13.
- Masters, how far they extend their Power over their Domesticks, vi. 3. 4.
- Mathematicks are useful Sciences, ii. 4. 13.
- Mediator, the Difference which is between a Mediator and a Person simply charged to notify and declare the Will of any one, iii. 9. 4. Of Mediators of Peace, v. 13. 7.
- Members of human Body, whether of themselves they are capable of Esteem, iii. 1. 8. What Power Necessity gives us over our Members, ii. 6. 3.
- Members of an Assembly, whether they ought to be punish'd when they have advis'd any Thing contrary to the Deliberation which had prevail'd, viii. 3. 28.
- Merchants, how he ought to set a Price on his Merchandizes, v. 1. 10. Why an insolvent Merchant is treated more rigorously than a Debtor that does not trade, iii. 7. 2. Whether one can sometimes compel the Merchants to sell their Merchandizes or Wares, v. 3. 6.
- Merchandize, the Loss of it sold but not deliver'd, upon his Account, whose it is, ibid. 5. 3. Whether one has a Right to transport his Merchandizes through the Lands of another, iii. 3. 6. Whether one can establish the Rights of coming in and going out upon Merchandizes or Wares, ibid. 1. 7. Upon what Foot one ought to regulate those Rights, viii. 5. 5.
- Merkit of a Person, what is its Foundation, ii. 4. 7. One cannot precisely mark the Degree, i. 2. 10. It is the only reasonable Foundation of Esteem and Honour, viii. 4. 12. It however does not suffice for giving a perfect Right, to require the Marks of Honour, ibid. 1. 14.
- Merkit of Actions, what it is, and what is its Foundation, i. 9. 5.
- Metals, which are proper for Money, v. 1. 12. To whom they belong which are hid in the Entrails of the Earth, iv. 6. 4.
- Misc and Thine, whether it is the Cause of Divisions and Wars, iv. 4. 7.
- Minors, whether the Engagements of a Minor be always invalid of themselves, iv. 2. 11. Whether he who borrow'd without the Approbation of his Tutor, be oblig'd to pay, iii. 4. 5.
- Ministers, publick, of the State or the Prince, vii. 2. 24. Their Duties in general, ibid. 8. 10. What Persons the Sovereign ought to choose for his Ministers, ibid. 9. 9. How one knows when they act in his Name and in his Authority, i. 6. 13. Whether a single Presumption of the Will of their Master authorizes them to exceed his Orders, viii. 6. 11. Whether to avert a great Evil with which the State is menaced, they are bound to expose themselves to any feign'd disgrace, ibid. 4. 10. To what they are oblig'd who have concluded any publick Treaty, without Orders of the Prince or State, ibid. 9. 10. Means to avoid Contestations for the Precedency between the Ministers of many Potentates, ibid. 4. 21. Ministers of Religion, their Duties in general, vii. 8. 10.
- Modes, what it is, and how many sorts there are, i. 1. 3. Simple moral Fashions, ibid. 1. 17.
- Moderation of Soul, one ought to procure one's self that, ii. 4. 6.
- Monks, their Life is of itself contrary to the Law of Humanity, iii. 3. 2. The greatest Part, even of their Societies, do not agree with the Maxims of Religion and Right Reason, ii. 4. 4, 15.
- Monarchy, what it is, and how it is formed, vii. 5. 3. 9. In what Sense the Will of the King is in a Monarchy the Will of the State, ib. 2. 14.
- Monarchs, where there are Monarchs for a Time, vii. 6. 14, 15.
- Money, its Original and Use, v. 1. 2, 13. Whether it was in the Time of the Trojan War, ibid. 5. 1. Whether it is little worth in its own Nature, ib. 7. 10. How Sovereigns can regulate its Value, ib. 1. 14, 15. Its intrinsic Value, if subject to Change, ib. 1. 16. Whether in restoring Things lent for Consumption, one ought to have Regard to the extrinseck or intrinsic Goodness of the Money, ib. 7. 6, 7.
- Monopoly, whether all Monopolies be contrary to the Law of Nature, v. 5. 7.
- Mortgage, what it is, v. 10. 16.
- Mulleter, how he is responsible for the Damage caus'd by his Mules, iii. 1. 7.
- Multitude, the Difference which is betwixt a Multitude and a People, vii. 2. 14. What it is, ibid. 1. 6. Its Approbation is oftentimes a Mark of Error, ibid. 1. 15.
- Mutilation, if one can, to avoid it, defend one's self so far, as to kill the Assailant, ii. 5. 10. How one ought to be recompens'd, iii. 1. 8.

N.

- Names, to whom it belongs to impose proper Names upon another, iv. 1. 4. Whether it be permitted to change a Name, ib.
- Nature, the Excellency of it does not suffice for giving a Right to impose any Obligation upon another, i. 6. 11.
- Nature, human, its Constitution is the Foundation of the Law of Nature, ii. 3. 14.
- Natural, what Force it has with relation to the Production of moral Actions, i. 4. 5.
- Naturally, the Sense which that Term has sometimes, v. 3. 10.
- Nakedness, whence comes the Shame of Nakedness, vi. 1. 30, 31.
- Necessary, that which is physically so, cannot be imputed to any one, i. 5. 6.
- Necessity, there is an absolute and a conditional Necessity, ii. 3. 4. In what the Privileges of Necessity consist, and what is its Foundation, ib. 6. 2, &c.
- Negligence, how many sorts of it there are, i. 7. 16. It does not dispense with repairing any Damage, iii. 1. 6.
- Nephews, in what Order Nephews, both by the Father's and Mother's Side, come to the Succession Abintestate, iv. 11. 17.
- Neutral, to what Neutral Nations are oblig'd, viii. 6. 7.
- News, whether one can spread false News to raise the cast-down Courage of the Soldiers, iv. 1. 16. Whether one can sometimes be responsible for the Evil which false and uncertain News which one has spread causes, ib. 1. 8.

Nobility,

An INDEX of the most Material Things, &c.

Nobility is not a Thing which belongs truly to us, viii. 4. 17. Nor a natural Title of Distinction, ibid. f. 25. Its Rights depend only upon the Institution of the Laws of every State, ibid. f. 26. They ought notwithstanding, and are even ordinarily founded upon some Merit, ibid. f. 27. The History of the Original, and Revolutions of Nobility among the Romans, ib. f. 28, 29. In what it consists now among most of the Nations of Europe, ibid. f. 30. The too great Multiplication of Nobility is contrary to the Grandeur of a State, ib. f. 31.

Novation, what it is, and how many sorts there are, v. 11, 15.

Nourishment, what they mean by that, iv. 11. 5.

O.

Oath, what an Oath is, iv. 2. 2. Its Use, its Signification, and its inviolable Sanctity, ibid. It ought to be interpreted conformably to the Religion of him that takes it, ib. f. 4. In what Sense the Intention of swearing and engaging is requisite, ib. f. 5, 15. Obligatory Oaths, ib. f. 19. If in these sorts of Oaths the Obligation of an Oath is distinct from the Engagement of it, ib. f. 6. The Interposition of an Oath doth not render an Action valid which is null of itself, ibid. A posterior Oath doth not annul a Convention which is otherwise valid, ibid. Error and Fraud, as well as Fear, annul Oaths, ib. f. 7, 8. Every Oath which regards a Thing unlawful, or hinders a greater Good, is null, ib. f. 9, 10. An Oath doth not change the Nature of Things to which one adds it, ib. f. 11. It excludes all perplexing Tricks and vain Subtily, ib. f. 12. But not Conditions and tacit Restrictions, ib. f. 14. The Words of an Oath ought to be understood in the same Sense as he that takes it understands them, ib. f. 15. How one may defer or refer an Oath, ib. f. 21. If the Violation of a Part of the Engagements to which a Man was enter'd, by one and the same Oath, makes him guilty of Perjury, ibid. f. 23. How one is dispensed with, or discharged from an Oath, by a Superior, ib. f. 24. Oaths made in the Name of a Person absent, ibid. f. 16. What Oath of another Man one is obliged to keep, ibid. f. 5, 17. If one may defer an Oath in Matters of criminal Causes, viii. 3. 4. If a King may dispense with keeping Oaths, ibid. 10. 5.

Obligation, what it is, i. 1. 21. ib. 6, 5. What is that which makes capable of Obligation, ibid. f. 6. and so on. How far one Man may impose any Thing upon another, ibid. f. 9. Why one cannot enter into an Obligation with one's self, ib. f. 7. Whether the Impressions which an Obligation makes upon the Conscience, diminishes any Thing of natural Liberty, ib. 4. 8. ib. 6. 5. Obligation exterior and interior, ib. f. 6. Natural and additional Obligation, iii. 4. 3. Natural and Civil, ib. f. 5, 6. Perfect and imperfect, i. 7. 7. Perpetual, and for a Time, iii. 4. 7. Reciprocal and not reciprocal, ibid. f. 8. v. 12, 23. Obligations contracted by an Attorney, iii. 9. The Want of satisfying an imperfect Obligation does not engage one to repair the Damage, ibid. f. 4. The just Meaning of those which one contracts voluntarily, v. 12. 2. The Obligation appointed to a certain State of Life can be drawn from many distinct Principles, i. 1. 11. What Legislators have Regard to, in determining the Obligations, to which they give the Force of the Civil Law, iii. 4. 6.

Oblige, in how many Ways one obliges one's self for another, v. 10. 9.

Occasion, what they mean by that, i. 4. 2. ib. 5. 5. Whether he who gives Occasion to a Thing, is always the Cause morally speaking, ib. f. 3.

Ocean, whether the great Ocean be capable of Propriety, iv. 5. 9.

Odious, what it is in the Stile of the Law, v. 12. 12.

Offended Person, what he ought to do when the Offender makes Shew of repenting, ii. 5. 3 v. 13. 1.

Offices, Good Offices ought be reciprocal, iii. 24.

Oligarchy, what it is, vii. 5. 11.

Olives, one must leave to the Poor, those which remain after one has shaken the Olive-trees, iii. 3. 4.

Omission, when it is that the Omission of a Thing can be laid to one's Charge, i. 5. 5.

Opinion, what Opinions are contrary to Religion, ii. 4. 4.

Orders, (Command) whether one can change or exceed one's Orders, v. 4. 5. Secret Orders and known Orders, the Distinction which one must make in that Regard, iii. 9. 2. Whether one can sometimes innocently exceed the Orders of a Superior, viii. 1. 6.

Ostracism, an honourable Punishment, viii. 3. 25.

Outrages wound the natural Equality of Men, iii. 2. 7.

P.

Pacts. See Contracts.

Pagans believed the Gods to be Authors of the Law of Nature, ii. 3. 20. The Description which the Pagans make of the Life of the first Men, ib. 2. 2.

Pardon, whether the Sovereign can give it sometimes to Criminals, viii. 3. 15.

Parole, its Original, iv. 1. 3. Its natural Use, ibid. f. 1. How it is that Words ought ordinarily to be explain'd, v. 13. 3.

Parting, Rules which one must follow in the parting Things between many Persons, who have no more Right the one than the other, iii. 2. 5.

Partners. See Associates.

Particular Persons, in what Case they can defend themselves without waiting for the Help of the Magistrate, viii. 6. 8. How far the Conventions which they make of their own Head with the Enemy, have Force, ibid. 7. In what Cases they can do themselves Justice for certain Crimes, ib. 3. 13.

Parts, natural, what Use of those Parts is contrary to the Law of Nature, vi. 1. 4.

Patricians, what they were among the Romans, viii. 4. 28.

Pawn, what it is, v. 10. 13. Its different Sorts, ibid. f. 14.

Pedantry, it is a Vice of the Mind, and not of the Profession, ii. 4. 13.

People, in what Sense a People is immortal, viii. 12. 17. Whom the Oath of a People obliges, iv. 4. 17. If Prescription hath Place amongst a People, ib. 12. 11. If the Change of Inclination which happens to a People, authorizes it to shake off the Yoke of a lawful Prince, v. 11. 10. vii. 6. 6. How it is disengag'd from its Obedience to its Sovereign, ib. 7. 5. How the Form of a People is destroy'd, viii. 12. 9. How it is again restor'd, ib. 6. 23. If its Consent is always necessary to give Laws the Force of obliging in Point of Conscience, i. 6. 13. The barbarous Manners of some particular People don't make an Example for the Rights of a natural State, ii. 3. 10. There is no People which is entirely conducted by the Laws of Nature, ib. f. 9.

People, Common, whence comes that Facility that the Common People have to discern Justice from Injustice, ii. f. 13.

Perfection, a Man ought to endeavour his own Perfection; ii. 4. 1.

Permission, there are absolute and imperfect Permissions, i. 6. 15. ib. 7. 2. The Permission of human Laws does not hinder a Thing from being contrary to the Divine, ibid. and viii. 1. 3. How the Permission of a Crime makes a Man Partaker in it, i. 5. 14.

Persecutions, for the Cause of Religion, are criminal, ii. 4. 4.

Person, what a moral Person is, i. 1. 12. The Rights and Advantages of a moral Person, ibid. f. 13, 14. Feign'd Persons, ibid. f. 15. Free Persons cannot be taken for a Reward of Money, v. 1. 5.

Petitory, what it is, v. 13. 6.

Philosophy, wherein it consists, according to Plato, viii. 4. 14.

Physick, the Use of that Science, ii. 4. 13.

Place, what is meant by a strong fortify'd Place, v. 10. 4. How long a Commander ought to defend it, viii. 6. 10. When a Man may seize on a Place in his own Country, ii. 6. 8.

Places of Honour, how a Man may order Places of Honour to avoid Contests, viii. 4. 21, 22. Every Place is honourable;

An INDEX of the most Material Things, &c.

- nourable, where a Man finds himself posted for the Defence of a State, ib. f. 23.
- Pleaders at Bar, their Duties, v. 11. 6.
- To please, who it is that a Man may be glad to please, viii. 4. 12.
- Pleasure, how a Man may seek after it innocently, ii. 4. 11. What Pleasures are the most lively in all Creatures, vi. 1. 1.
- Plants, they follow the Soil in Case of Accession, iv. 7. 5.
- Plebeians, what they were among the Romans, viii. 4. 28.
- Pledge, what it is, v. 10. 12. If one Man may give himself as a Pledge for another, ii. 4. 8.
- Poesy, what it is, and of its Use, ii. 4. 18.
- Point of Honour, the Vanity of it, viii. 4. 8.
- Pond, to whom the Fish in it do belong, iv. 6. 11.
- Polygamy, it is contrary to the Law of Nature, vi. 1. 17, &c.
- Portions, what is meant by equal Portions in the Distribution of an Inheritance, iv. 11. 8.
- Possessor, in what the Right of the Possessor of another Man's Estate upon Trust consists, iv. 8. 5.
- Possession, what it is, iv. 9. 7. Natural or Civil, ibid. How it is interrupted, ib. 12. 4.
- Posts, how a Man ought to assign perilous Posts, viii. 2. 4.
- Postliminy, what it is, viii. 6. 12. If this Right is for those who had been deliver'd by the State and accepted, ib. 11. 9.
- Power, what Power (moral) is, and how many sorts there are of it, i. 1. 19. In what the absolute Power of Sovereigns consists, vii. 6. 7. If the absolute Power of a Prince does of itself give him the Precedency over another Prince whose Power is limited, viii. 4. 19. The Power of making Taxes, vii. 4. 7. Judiciary Power, ibid. f. 4. The Power of making War and Peace, and of contracting Alliances, ib. f. 5. The Power of establishing Magistrates, ib. f. 6. The Power of inflicting Punishments, ib. f. 3. Legislative Power, ibid. f. 2. The Power of examining Doctrines, its just Bounds, ib. f. 8. Power is not the only Foundation of Honour and Authority, i. 6. 10. viii. 4. 13. 18. If the Suspicion which a Man takes from the Power of his Neighbour, is sufficient to give him Right to attack him, ii. 5. 6. viii. 6. 5. The Law of an interior Power gives Place to those of a superior Power, v. 12. 23. What is the Foundation of paternal Power, vi. 2. 1, &c. How far it extends, ib. f. 1, &c. It can be transfer'd to another, either wholly or in Part, ibid. f. 9. How it hath been taken or bounded in civil Societies, ib. f. 11. How it ends, ib. f. 13.
- Power, physical, does not always imply a moral Power, iii. 5. 3. iv. 1. 10.
- Prayer, the Impiety of those Prayers which Men make to desire God to send Evil to their Neighbours, and to implore the Benediction of Heaven, or to give God Thanks for advantageous Success in an unjust War, ii. 4. 4.
- Prescription, what it is, iv. 12. 12. In what Things, and at the End of what Times it hath Place, ibid. Necessary Conditions to make this Right lawfully prevail, ibid. f. 3. 4. Why it was introduced, and what is the Foundation of it, ib. f. 5. &c. If it hath Place amongst different Nations, ib. f. 11.
- Precedency, upon what its Right is founded, viii. 4. 15, &c. A Man may have Precedency in one Place, and not in another, ib. f. 22.
- Presents, some are injurious, iii. 2. 7. The Presents which a Man makes of Things that he doth not care for, are but sottish and ridiculous Liberality, ib. 3. 3. v. 7. 1, &c.
- Princes, the Duty of Princes (see Sovereign and King) as they are Men, and as they are Sovereigns, vii. 8. 4. It is easy for them to strengthen and preserve their Dominions by just Ways, ibid. 2. 10. The Maxims which they ought to follow in the Distribution of Honours and Recompenses, and in the Government of Places amongst their Subjects, viii. 4. 23. 31. How they may dispose of the Goods of particular Men, ibid. 5. 2, 7. And of publick Goods, as well those of the Demesne of the State, as those of the Demesne of the Crown, ibid. f. 8. How many Ways Princes may be injurious to their Subjects, vii. 8. 4. Of Precedency amongst Princes, viii. 4. 15. How they may meet without having any Dispute of their Passage, ibid. 6. 21.
- Prisoner, what Evil a Man may make a Prisoner suffer, who is not yet either condemned or heard, viii. 3. 4. If only because a Man holds him captive, he is thought Master of all his Goods, without excepting those which he himself hath not in his own Hands, ibid. 6. 29. If he who hath been released upon Condition of not serving against the Enemy, may be constrained by the State to break his Promise, ibid. 2. 2. If he is obliged in Conscience to come and put himself into his Enemies Hands, when the Condition upon which he was releas'd is not fulfilled, ibid. If he who escapes, re-enters into the Possession of all his Goods, and all his Rights, ibid. 6. 22. The Conventions which concern Prisoners of War, are a most favourable Cause, ibid. 7. 12.
- Price, what Price is, and how many sorts there are of it, v. 12, &c. What is the Foundation of proper and intrinical Price, ibid. f. 4. The Price of Things and Actions is capable of a great Extent, i. 2. 10. What is the Reason there's no Price bound to certain profitable Things, v. 1. 5. What it is that augments and diminishes the Price of Things, ib. f. 6. The Price of Inclination, ibid. f. 7. Legitimate Price, or Price ordain'd by the Laws, ibid. f. 8. Ordinary or current Price, ibid. f. 9. The Meanness of Price is sufficient to demand an Indemnifying, or to annul a Contract, ib. 3. 9.
- Privation does not constitute the Essence of a Thing, i. 7. 5.
- Privileges, when a Man may revoke Privileges. See Immunities, viii. 10. 9. A Man may renounce his Privileges when he can do it without Prejudice to a third, ii. 5. 2.
- Profit, if a Man may never make any Profit of another's Disprofit, iv. 13. 6.
- Promises, there are perfect Promises and imperfect Promises, iii. 5. 6, 7. If a plain simple Promise obliges in Point of Conscience, ibid. f. 9, &c. If a Promise without a Cause obliges, ibid. If all sorts of Incommodities and Damages have the Virtue of excusing a Man from keeping his Promise, v. 12. 22. Promises of that which is already engag'd to some other Person are null, ii. 7. 11. And those which are made of another's Goods, or of what depends on another, ib. f. 10. If every Promise includes the tacit Condition, supposing the Things remain in the same State or Condition, v. 12. 20. The lawful Matter of Promises, iii. 7. The different Causes which are capable of making them void, iii. 6. 3, &c. What Acceptation is necessary to render them irrevocable, ibid. f. 15. If a third may accept a Promise, ibid. 9. 5. If this Acceptation may be made by Heirs, ibid. f. 6. If a Man may add any burdensome Condition to a Promise already accepted, ibid. f. 7. Of Promises made by the Mediation of a Solicitor, ibid. f. 3, 4. Absolute and conditional Promises, iii. 8. 1.
- Propagation, how Propagation of Mankind ought to be made, vi. 1. 5.
- Propriety of Goods is a moral Quality, i. 1. 16. iv. 4. 1. What it is, ib. f. 2. The different sorts of Propriety, ibid. The End of the Establishment of Propriety, ii. 6. 5. In what Sense it is from Natural Law, iv. 4. 14. What Qualities a Thing ought to have to be capable of Propriety, ib. 5. 1. What Persons are capable of enjoying some Right of Propriety, ib. 4. 15. Duty as to the Propriety of Goods, ib. 13. 1.
- Protector, he who makes himself Protector of a Crime, is responsible for the Damage which proceeds from it, iii. 1. 4.
- Prudence, what it is, i. 2. 4. If it comes only from Experience, iii. 2. 2. A Man ought always to act with Prudence, ii. 4. 6.
- Punishment, what it is, viii. 3. 4. To what sort of Justice it relates, ibid. f. 5. To whom it belongs to inflict it, ib. f. 7. What is the End of it, ib. f. 8. If it it hath Place amongst those who live in the Independence of a natural State, ibid. f. 2. All sorts of Sins are not subject to the human Tribunal, ib. f. 14. The Proportion of the Punishment to the Crime cannot be exactly determined, i. 2. 10. They do not inflict Punishment upon the same Crime twice, ibid. 9. 6. What Rules a Man ought to follow in the precise Determination of the Nature and Degree of Punishment, viii. 3. 23, &c. A Man is not secure from Punishment, tho' he hath repair'd the Damage, iii. 1. 6. If Punishment can wholly be inflicted upon many Persons who have concurr'd in the same criminal Action, ibid. f. 5. If Legislators are obliged to govern themselves, in the Determination of Punishments, according to what the Law of War permits in the Independence of a natural State, ii. 5. 17. The natural Punishments of Sin, ib. 3. 21.

An INDEX of the most Material Things, &c.

Q.

Quality, the different Sorts of Moral Qualities, i. 1. 17. The particular Qualities of a Person are sometimes a lawful Reason for pardoning him a Crime, viii. 3. 17.
Quantities, the different sorts of moral Quantities, i. 12. v. 1. 1.
Questions, why they make use of an Oath in Questions of Fact, and not in Questions of Law, iv. 2. 18.
Quit, when a Debtor is quit, v. 11. 7.

R.

Rahab, if she did well to hide the Spies of the Israelites, and why, iv. 1. 16.
Rape, a young Woman, to avoid a Rape, may kill him who endeavours to force her, ii. 5. 11. Rapes ought not to be permitted in War, viii. 6. 7.
Rarity, it contributes very much to raise the Price of Commodities, v. 1. 6.
Reason, how one knows if a Maxim be agreeable or not to Right Reason, ii. 3. 13. Its Light can discover the Foundation of natural Right, ibid. If its Maxims alone impose any Obligation, ibid. f. 20. The Use of Reason is absolutely necessary to give a true Consent, iii. 6. 3.
Reason of State, what it is, vii. 9. 3.
Reason of Law, what it is, v. 12. 20.
Rebels, it a Treaty of Peace made with Rebels is valid, viii. 8. 2.
Recompense, what it is, i. 9. 5. When a Man has full Right to demand a Recompense, ib. f. 3. There are natural Recompenses of Virtue, and arbitrary Recompenses, ii. 3. 21.
Refugees, if one ought to give a Retreat to Refugees, iii. 3. 10. If one is always oblig'd to deliver up those which are accus'd of any Crime, viii. 6. 12.
Refusal, the blameable Easiness of those who cannot give a Refusal to any one, iii. 5. 10.
Regents, the Authority of the Regents of a Kingdom during the Inter-regnum, vii. 7. 8.
Relapses, frequent Relapses aggravate a Crime, viii. 3. 22.
Religion, the Opinions contrary to Religion, ii. 4. 4. The Sovereign may limit the Liberty of consecrating certain Things to the Use of Religion, viii. 5. 4.
Render, the Sense of that Maxim, That a Man ought to render to every one his own, viii. 3. 15.
Rents appointed according to the Price of Money, v. 7. 12. See more in Hiring.
Repentance, there is no true Repentance without Restitution of what a Man hath taken unjustly, iii. 1. 2.
Representation, what the Right of it is in case of Succession, and what is the Foundation of it, iv. 11. 12. It hath no Place in the Line of Ascendants, ibid. f. 13.
Reprimands of an Equal to an Equal are not permitted but amongst Friends, viii. 3. 10.
Approaches of some corporal Infirmity are absurd and unjust, i. 5. 7.

Republick, if all Alliances made with a Republick are real, viii. 9. 6. Most important Maxims for maintaining a Republick, v. 7. 9.
Reputation, what Care one ought to have of his Reputation, ii. 4. 9.
Reservations, mental, how ridiculous and absurd they are, iv. 1. 14.
Resistance, interpretative, or presumed Resistance, i. 4. 10.
Retaliation, Law of, if one ought always to follow it, viii. 3. 27.
Retention, the Right of it, v. 11. 6.
Retreat, he who gives a Retreat to Evil-doers is as guilty as they themselves, i. 5. 14. If a Man may sometimes fall upon his Sovereign for giving a Retreat to one who has injured him, viii. 6. 12.
Revenge, simple Revenge is condemn'd by the Law of Nature, ii. 4. 12. ib. 5. 3. The Satisfaction which a Man finds in it, is but an imaginary Good, viii. 3. 19. How ridiculous that is, that proposes to it self the Death of the Offender, ibid. f. 23. Particular Revenge is permitted in some States, and why, ibid. f. 11.
Revenge, why the Law of Moses gave the Revenger of Blood Permission to kill, out of the Bounds of the Asylum, him who had fled thither for Refuge, iii. 1. 7.
Right, the Right of holding in Fee, iv. 8. 3. Different Senses of the Term Right, i. 1. 20. The Sense of the Maxim, That he who uses his own Right, does not injure any one, i. 5. 3. viii. 3. 31. If one ought always to grant others the same Right that he has himself, iii. 2. 4. In what Sense Right is the strongest Will, i. 6. 12. In what the transferring a Right consists, iii. 5. 2, &c. How the Right over Persons and Things is acquired, ib. f. 4. Negative Right, iv. 9. 7. Personal or real, viii. 6. 4. Perfect and imperfect, i. 1. 19. ib. f. 7. In what strict Right differs from Equity, ib. 2. 8. See more in Law.
Riches, how one may seek Riches innocently, ii. 4. 10.

Rivers, the Use of Rivers ought to be common, iii. 3. 4. To whom they belong properly, iv. 5. 3. If additional Lands go to them, whose Banks Rivers augment, iv. 7. 11. If they improve in like manner private Estates, ib. 1. 12.
Robbers, they are wholly infamous, viii. 4. 5. If an Oath is obligatory in respect of them, ibid. f. 5, &c. iii. 6. 11.
Robbery, amongst whom it passes for an honourable Profession, ii. 2. 10.

S.

Sacrifice, what is meant by Sacrifice, v. 12. 7.
Sages, if Sages have a Right of exacting to the Rigour, that those which are less wise and provident than they, should put themselves under their Directions, iii. 2. 2.
Sale, what a Sale is, and when it is accomplish'd, v. 5. 2. Of forc'd Sales, ibid. 3. 6. Of those where a Man runs a Hazard, ib. f. 6. Of whole Sales, ib. If in a Sale Men may deceive one another in regard of the Price, ib. f. 10.
Salary, what it is, i. 9. 5. ii. 3. 21. v. 6. 1. If one may demand the Salary he had given for the Commission of a wicked Action, iii. 7. 8.
Sanction of the Law, what it is, i. 6. 14. Penal Sanctions are sometimes alternative, viii. 3. 4. In what the Sanction of natural Law consists, i. 6. 14. ii. 3. 21.
Satisfaction to Justice is not one of the natural Ends of the Punishment of Crimes, viii. 3. 12. The false Notions of the Satisfaction of Jesus Christ are contrary to Religion and Morality, ii. 4. 4.
Scandal, receiv'd, what it is, i. 5. 3.
Sciences, some are profitable, some are curious, and some vain, ii. 4. 13. How one ought to study them, ibid. Those which teach a Science ought not to conceal any Thing that has relation to it, iv. 1. 7.
Schools, publick, are necessary in a State, vii. 9. 4.

School-

An INDEX of the most Material Things, &c.

- School-master*, he has Right to use moderate Correction towards the Children which are under his Direction, viii. 3. 10.
- Scruples*, how a Man ought to cure himself of them, i. 3. 9.
- Sea*, of the Dominion of the Sea, iv. 5. 5. &c.
- Secret*, if one may dispense with communicating to others an innocent Secret and profitable to Mankind, iii. 3. 2. Especially when he has taken an Oath not to discover it, iv. 2. 10.
- Seller*, his Engagements towards the Buyer, v. 5. 5. He ought faithfully to discover the Defects of his Merchandise, ib. 2. 2. See more in Buyer.
- Sentinel*, he is responsible for the Damage occasion'd by Fire happening through his Inadvertency, i. 5. 14.
- Separation*, if that of Body and Goods, the Bond of Marriage still subsisting, is conformable to natural Law, vi. 1. 22.
- Sepulture*, if one may refuse Sepulture to those that die insolvent, v. 10. 12.
- Services*, of innocent Profit, iii. 3. 3. If one may exact Payment of one for Services which turn to the Advantage of many, v. 6. 4. Services done to a State by a Criminal, or even his Ancestors, may sometimes obtain him his Pardon, viii. 3. 16.
- Servitude*, if God is the immediate Author of it, vii. 3. 3. Its Original, and Extent of Power that it gives to a Master, ib. 1. 4.
- Sexes*, why God hath establish'd the Difference of Sexes, v. 1. 2. There are some Foundations of Honour which are common to both Sexes, and others which are particular to one, viii. 4. 12.
- Siege*, if in a Siege one may pull down the Houses of particular Men, viii. 5. 7.
- Signs*, there are natural Signs, and Signs of Institution, iv. 1. 2. Wherein Signs of Consent consist, iii. 6. 16. Without these, internal Action hath no Effect of Right, iv. 12. 28.
- Silence*, in what a Man is oblig'd to keep Silence, iv. 1. 7. when it is criminal, ibid. and i. 5. 14. v. 3. 4. How one ought to interpret the Silence of the Law, i. 6. 15. Long Silence is not sufficient to make one presume, that a Man abandons his Goods or Right, iv. 12. 8. If upon the Silence of a Sovereign one may presume, that he ratifies a Treaty concluded without his Order, viii. 9. 13.
- Simony*, what it is, v. 1. 5.
- Sin*, how many Things include the Idea of Sin, viii. 3. 2. Why it is compar'd to a Debt, ibid. f. 5. If Sins of Weakness are truly Sins, i. 5. 8. If all Sins are punishable at a human Tribunal, viii. 3. 14. The Limitation of that Maxim, That those who induce others to Sin, sin themselves, ib. 6. 16. If the natural Consequences of Sin are instead of Punishments, ibid. 3. 4.
- Sinners*, Charity does not permit us to despair of Sinners Amendment without great Reasons, viii. 3. 10.
- Sisters*, in what Order Sisters ought to succeed, iv. 11. 17.
- Slavery*, vi. 3. 3. In what its Inconveniences consist, ib. f. 10. What is the Original of it, ib. f. 4, 5. If there is any who is naturally a Slave, iii. 2. 5. The Condition of Slaves is vile and disadvantageous in many States, viii. 4. 6. In what Sense they make a Part of their Master's Goods, vi. 3. 7. If one may do them an Injury, ib. f. 8. What is the Condition of the Children, ib. f. 9. What is the Foundation of the Obligation of a Slave made by War to his Master, ib. f. 6. How a Slave is deliver'd from Servitude, ib. f. 11. If a Master is responsible for the Damage caus'd by his Slave, iii. 1. 6. The Right of having the Service of another's Slave, iv. 8. 10.
- Sociability* is the Foundation of natural Law, ii. 3. 15. A Man is dispens'd with for not practising the Laws of Sociability toward them who violate 'em in regard to us, ibid.
- Societies* are simple and compound, vi. 1. 1. Society in general, which is betwixt all Men, must not be confounded with particular, ii. 3. 17. How one ought to rule himself in the Distribution of Advantages and Charges amongst Members of the same Society, i. 7. 9. Society may treat with one of its Members, as from a Particular to a Particular, ibid. In what Case one may lawfully renounce Society, viii. 11. 2. The divers Means of contracting a Society, v. 8. How they call its Parts, ibid. 6. 2. Irregular Society, ib. f. 3. Universal, or of all Goods, ib. f. 4. How and why Civil Society was establish'd, vii. 1. 7.
- Solomy* is a Sin contrary to natural Law, vi. 1. 4.
- Soldiers*, if they be oblig'd, upon Pain of Death, firmly to hold a Post where they run the Risk of Perishing, iii. 7. 5. viii. 2. 4. It one ought to give some Salary, even to Citizens, when the State is rich enough to make such Expences, ib. f. 1. If a Soldier who in Exercising, kills a Man undesign'dly, is guilty of Homicide, iii. 8. 7.
- Son*, every Son must be presum'd to be the Son of his Mother's Husband, iv. 11. 10. vi. 1. 10.
- Soul*, how it ought to be taken care of, ii. 4. 1, &c. How one endamages another in relation to his Soul, iii. 1. 3. The undeniable Possibility of its Immortality, is sufficient to fix any Man's Resolution upon a virtuous Life, ii. 3. 21.
- Sovereignty*, the Duties of a Sovereign in general, vii. 9. His Rights and Power, vii. 4. 2, &c. It's easy for him, if he performs his Duty, to make himself obey'd and lov'd by the greatest Part of his Subjects, ibid. f. 5. A Man ought to obey him rather than his own Father, v. 12. 2, 3. In a Matter of Doubt, a Man ought always to presume upon the Justice of his Orders and Enterprizes, viii. 1. 7. How far his Power of ordaining the Value of sorts of Money extends, v. 1. 14. And of constraining his Subjects to make certain Sorts of Contracts, ibid. 3. 6. Of ruling Marriages, and of compelling and hindering Men to enter into this Engagement, vii. 1. 8. Of granting to some particular Persons, or certain Societies, the sole Privilege of driving certain sorts of Commerce, v. 7. Of pardoning Criminals, viii. 3. 17. If he may use mental Reservations, or innocent Dissimulations, iv. 1. 17. He cannot out of a meer Caprice, blot any of his Subjects with Infamy, viii. 4. 9. Nor banish an innocent Subject, ibid. 11. 6. And in what Case he is responsible for the Injuries done by his Subjects, iii. 1. 11. All Actions cannot be revoked, i. 6. 6, 8, 10. See Princes, King. The Original and Foundation of Sovereignty, vii. 3. How many distinct Parts it includes, vii. 4. 1, &c. Its common and proper Subject, ib. 6. 4. If there is a real and personal Sovereignty, ibid. How far its Rights are inviolable, ibid. 8. The different Manners of acquiring it, ib. 7. And of possessing it, ib. 6. 14. If there may be a Sovereignty which is but for a Time, ibid. f. 5. If he receives any Taint by unequal Alliances, viii. 9. 4. The proper Character of Sovereignty, vii. 6. 1, &c. Why, and in how many Manners it is limited, ib. f. 9.
- Stratagems* are permitted towards an Enemy, iv. 1. 12. viii. 6. 6.
- Subjects*, their Duties. See Citizens. If the State may do them an Injury, viii. 8. 2. The unjust Complaints that they may sometimes make against their Sovereign, ibid. f. 3. They can promise nothing to the Prejudice of him, iii. 7. 11. How the Sovereign may deprive them of the Right they had got by Contract, viii. 10. 7. How they may have an Action at Law against their Prince, vii. 6. 2. viii. 10. 6. How far their Goods are in the Disposal of their Sovereign, ib. 5. 1, &c. The Disposal of Places amongst them depends upon their Sovereign, ib. 4. 23. If they may sometimes resist their Prince, vii. 8. 5.
- Successor*, how he is oblig'd to the Contracts, Treaties, and other Engagements of his Predecessors, viii. 9. 8. ibid. 10. The general Foundations of Successions, abintestate, iv. 11. 1, 2. Successions by Heads, and Succession by Pedigree, ib. 6. 12. and 11. 2. The different Ways that Successions are rul'd by the Civil Laws, ib. f. 18. Of Succession to patrimonial Kingdoms, vii. 7. 11. Of Succession to Kingdoms establish'd by the free Consent of the People, and of the different Sorts of them, ib. f. 12, &c. What ought to decide Disputes in point of Succession, ibid. f. 15.

Suffrages,

An INDEX of the most Material Things, &c.

Suffrages, why Plurality of Suffrages carries a Thing in Deliberations of Assemblies, vii. 2. 15. A Limitation of this Maxim in certain Assemblies, ib. f. 16. Of a Case where the Suffrages are equal, ib. f. 17. When one ought to join or separate them, ib. f. 18.

Superior, if one may sometimes execute the Orders of a Superior, which are manifestly unjust, viii. 1. 6. How a Superior may engage himself in relation to the Goods and Actions of those that depend upon him, iii. 7. 10.

T.

Talents are only estimable as a Man makes good use of them, viii. 4. 12.

Tax, how to order the Tax of Subjects, viii. 5. 6.

Terms, they signify nothing but by Institution, iv. 1. 3. There is a principal and an accessory Signification of Terms, ib. f. 6. Every one may sometimes forge new Terms, i. 1. 1. Two different Ideas, which one must distinguish in the Terms which relate to Morality, ib. 2. 6. Of Terms which have many Significations, v. 12. 11. If one may sometimes make use of particular Terms, iv. 1. In a Contract the Terms ought to be understood according to the Custom of the Place in which the Contract is made, ib. f. 6.

Testament, what a Testament or Will is, iv. 10. 3. If one may in Conscience make void a Will, where there is no Formality wanting, ib. f. 8. If a Testament may be revok'd by the Testator, when there is a Clause intimating that every posterior Testament shall not be valid, i. 6. 6.

Thefts. See Robbery.

Time, if Courte of Time gives any Right, iv. 12. 7. The Effect of Time inserted in a Promise, iii. 8. 7. The Times of Truces, viii. 7. 8. The Time appointed for settling the Articles of Peace, ib. 8. 4.

Titles, divers Remarks upon the Subject of Titles, i. 1. 18. If they of themselves give a Prince Precedence above another Prince who hath not so proud Titles, viii. 4. 19.

Traitors, if one may make use of them, viii. 6. 16.

Transactions, how far the Transactions of a Crime are valid, viii. 3. 16.

Transfugees, if the Desertion of Transfugees, true or feign'd, is innocent, viii. 11. 5. If one may receive and make use of them, ibid.

Treaty, the Maxims of Prudence which one ought to follow in making a Treaty, iii. 6. 9. If there is any Need of making a Treaty about those Things to which a Man is already oblig'd by natural Law, ii. 2. 11. viii. 9. 2. Treaties ought to be more inviolably observ'd by a King than by a Commonwealth, iv. 2. 17. If a Treaty of Alliance is renew'd tacitly, viii. 9. 11. Of a Case where one renews many Treaties different in certain Things, ib. f. 8. If publick Treaties made without the Order of the Sovereign, are valid, ib. f. 12.

Treasure, to whom a Treasure which is found ought to belong, iv. 6. 13. What publick Treasure is, and who may dispose of it, viii. 5. 8.

Troops, if one ought to give Passage to strange Troops, iii. 3. 5. One ought to give nothing to strange Troops which are enroll'd beyond single Pay, viii. 6. 18.

Truce, what it is, and how many sorts there are of it, viii. 7. 3. If there is any tacit Truce, ib. f. 7. It leaves the Subject of the War, and the Pretensions of the Parties subsisting, ib. f. 5. What is permitted or not permitted during a Truce, ibid. f. 9. Of the Duration of a Truce, ib. f. 8. Of its Infraction, ib. f. 11. If the Enemy may retain those Prisoners who by Accident are found in their Territories after the Time of the Truce is expired, ib. f. 10.

Tutors, the Use of Tutors, and the different sorts of them, iv. 4. 15. They have Power to use moderate Correction upon their Pupils, viii. 3. 10.

Tyrant, if one may take up Arms to deliver Subjects from the Yoke of a strange Prince who is become a Tyrant, viii. 6. 4.

Tyranny, what it is, vii. 5. 11.

V.

Vanquish, by what one may know which vanquishes in a Combat, vii. 5. 8.

A Vales cannot require that it may be permitted him fraudulently to dissipate his Master's Goods, v. 10. 3.

Vengeance, the Content which a Man finds in it is an imaginary Good, viii. 3. 19. How sottish and ridiculous that is which proposes to itself the Death of an Offender, ib. f. 23. Particular Vengeances are permitted in certain States, and why they are, ibid. f. 11. Why the Law of Moses gave a Revenger of Blood Permission of killing out of the Bounds of the Asylum him who had fled thither for Refuge, iii. 1. 7.

Vice, what it is, i. 4. 6. It is equally dishonest and pernicious, ii. 3. 10. It is more fatiguing than Virtue, ibid. f. 21. There are national Vices, i. 4. 5. viii. 3. 21. Whence the Honor which we have for some Vices from our Infancy proceeds, ib. 2. 6. What is the best Way of noting up Vices, viii. 3. 14. What Vices one ought to leave unpunish'd, ibid. 25. If the particular Vices of a Person authorize us to break our Word with him, iii. 6. 9.

Virtue, what it is, i. 4. 6. The Profit of it, ii. 3. 10. The Practice of it is more easy than the abandoning of it to pursue Vice, ibid. f. 21. The Exercise of most Virtues has much Liberty and Extent, i. 2. 10. No Virtue counsels any Thing which engages to a Crime, viii. 3. 19.

Vow, what a Vow is, and what Conditions are necessary to render it valid, iii. 6. 15. iv. 2. 28. Absurd and impertinent Vows don't oblige, ibid. 2. 10. How one is dispens'd with, and discharg'd of his Vows by a Superior, ibid. f. 24. Fathers may annul their Childrens Vows whist they are under Power, vi. 2. 1.

Voluntion, what it is, i. 4. 1.

Use of a Thing, in what it consists according to the Lawyers, iv. 8. 8. Use is the Master of Languages, ibid. 1. 6.

Usury is blameable, i. 7. 10.

Usurper, how, and how far, an Usurper's Orders oblige Subjects, during the Life of their legitimate Sovereign, vii. 8. 11. How his Empire may become legitimate, vii. 7. 4. ib. 8, 9. How far his Actions, Contracts, and other Engagements are valid, after he hath been chased away, viii. 12. 3.

Utility, there are two sorts of it, ii. 3. 10. Particular Utility is not the Foundation of natural Law, ibid. f. 10, &c.

W.

Wager, how it is permitted, v. 9. 4.

War, what it is, i. 10. 8. How many sorts there are, ib. and viii. 6. 1. War offensive and defensive, what it is, ib. f. 3. Solemn and not solemn, ib. f. 9. What End they ought to propose to themselves in making War, ibid. f. 2. Just Causes of undertaking it, ibid. f. 3. The Justice of the Causes of War ought to be clear and manifest, ib. f. 4. How far Acts of Hostility can be carried, ib. 6, 7. How far the Custom established among Nations have carried the Licence of War, ib. f. 15. When it is that a Prince may undertake a War, vii. 9. 13. Whether a Subject can without Crime bear Arms for his Prince in an unjust War, viii. 1. 8. In a Civil Society no particular Person has a Right to make War of his own Head, ib. 6. 8. How it is that in a Treaty these Words (to make War) are to be understood, iv. 12. 15. Whether the Prescription ought to continue during War, ib. f. 5. The divers sorts of Alliances which have relation to War, viii. 9. 3.

Water, if one may appropriate Water to himself, iv. 5. 2. The Right of drawing it out of a Neighbour's Well, ib. 8. 12. Services of Running-waters, ib. f. 11. If one ought to let every one draw, iii. 3. 3, 4.

Widows marrying before the Time, were noted with Infamy by the Roman Law, viii. 4. 6.

An INDEX of the most Material Things, &c.

Will, what the Will is, i. 1. 2. Its different Actions, ibid 4. 1. If a simple Declaration of our Will in the favour of another, imposes an Obligation upon us, iii. 5. 5. When a Man may revoke his Will, i. 6. 6. How many distinct Wills are united, vii. 2. 5. In what Sense M n say the Will is as criminal as the Action, viii. 3. 18.

Free-Will. See Liberty.

Will or Testament. See Testament.

Witness, the Use of Witnesses, iii. 6. 16. Their Duties, v. 13. 9. What Witnesses are receivable or refusible, ibid. Whence it comes that there must be two at least, ibid. The Oath which they take, iv. 2. 20. They ought to tell what they know, even without an Oath, when they are required by the Magistrate, ibid. 1. 20.

Whores, how they ought to be regarded in the World, viii. 4. 5.

Women, the Brightness of their Husband's Honour reflects upon them, viii. 4. 12. Those that sell their Favours, sin doubly, v. 1. 5. If it is against natural Law, that one Woman should have many Husbands, or that Women should be common, vi. 1. 15. If one ought to permit Strangers to marry Wives in his Country, iii. 3. 13. If one can swear that a Woman is not with Child, iv. 2. 2.

Young Women, those that willingly let themselves be debauch'd, cannot complain that their Gallants do 'em an Injury properly so call'd, iii. 7. 8. How one ought to indemnify a young Woman he has abused, ibid. 1. 10. A young Woman cannot demand when she marries, that she may grant any Favours to any other than her Husband, v. 10. 3. She who is married against her Will, is nevertheless oblig'd to be true to her Husband, i. 6. 11.

Worship, God himself allows one in a pressing Necessity to suspend the Actions of his Worship, viii. 3. 18.

Writings, they are the most sure Signs of Consent, iii. 6. 16. What is the Force of Obligations by Writings, v. 2. 6.

Writing-Masters, they ought not to debase themselves in writing Scandal, v. 1. 5.

F I N I S.

MAR 8 1934

